House of Commons Debates

FIRST SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—50 VIC.

THE FIFTH PARLIAMENT of the DOMINION, which had been prorogued from the 2nd day of June, 1886, and thence from time to time, was dissolved by Proclamation on the 15th day of January, 1887, and, Writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the Despatch of Business, on Wednesday, the 13th day of April, 1887, and did accordingly meet on that day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 13th April, 1887.

ON which day, being the first day of the meeting of the First Session of the Sixth Parliament, for the Despatch of Business,—John G. Bourinot, Esquire, Clerk of the House of Commons, Donald William Macdonell, William Wilson, and François Fortunat Rouleau, Esquires, Commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the Oath to Members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty;—Richard Pope, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said John G. Bourinot a book containing a list of the names of the Members returned to serve in this Parliament.

The aforesaid Commissioners did administer the Oath to the Members who were present, which being done and the Members having subscribed the Roll containing the Oath, they repaired to their seats.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

Gentlemen,

The Honorable Sir WILLIAM JOHNSTONE RITCHIE, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of this Honorable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Honorable Sir WILLIAM JOHNSTONE RITCHIE, Deputy Governor, does not see fit to declare the causes of summoning the present Parliament until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but to-morrow, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the causes of summoning this Parliament will be declared.

And the House being returned,

ELECTION OF THE SPEAKER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, addressing himself to the Clerk, said: Mr. Bourinot, I move that Joseph Alderic Ouimet, Esq., the member representing the Electoral District of Laval, do take the Chair as Speaker of this House. To the old members of Parliament I need say nothing in favor of the selection of Mr. Ouimet. To those who have not sat in Parliament before, I would say that Mr. Ouimet has represented his county without interruption since he was first elected. The people have shown their confidence in him by electing him on five different occasions. He is, therefore, a gentleman of parliamentary experience. He is also an advocate of high standing at the bar, and one of Her Majesty's counsel. I am sure the House will have great pleasure in accepting this motion which I now make.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I second the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Bourinot: It is not my intention to oppose the motion. The position which it is proposed that we should fill by our unanimous vote—as I hope it will be—is one of high distinction, a worthy object of honorable ambition to the first men on the floor of this Chamber; and it requires the possession of some distinguished and some rare qualities. It requires a reasonable acquaintance with both official tongues, the power of continuous toil, the rapid comprehension of and familiarity with the rules and customs of Parliament, and the capacity to apply them on the spur of the moment. But it requires even more than these, a somewhat rare combination of qualities—patience and courtesy combined with dignity, firmness and decision, and, most of all, it requires the possession of a judicial spirit, a spirit of justice, and a determination to act justly between the majority and the minority, between friend and foe, between the highest and the humblest person on the floor of the Chamber. In 1878, the hon. gentleman who has just proposed this motion, occupying a position on this side of the House, thus expressed himself with reference to the position of the Speaker:

“The Speaker is chosen to act judicially between the parties. He is to free himself from all political connection, and therefore the rule in England—the wise rule and practice in England—has been, although we unfortunately have not introduced it into this country, and we now see more than ever the disadvantage of not following English precedent, that the Speaker is not to be nominated by a member of the Government.”

The hon. gentleman had had, before he made these observations, two or more opportunities of directing the course of procedure in the election of Speaker, in which he did not follow what he called the wise rule and practice in England that we unfortunately had not introduced into this country. Since moralizing, as we are in the habit of doing in Opposition, on the subject, he has had two more opportunities of restoring and correcting our practice by the practice of the English Parliament. I expected that at this time, perhaps, he would have adopted the views he expressed in 1878; but I observe that, like other great men, he is better at moralizing than at practice. For my part I care little about the form—I care little about the form except as an expression of a principle. It is of little consequence whether a so-called independent member proposes the Speaker, who has been the prior choice of the Administration, or whether that proposal is made by a member of the Government. But I quite agree that, as a symbol of a principle, the form is of importance, and that principle is vital—the principle, namely, of the relation of the Speaker to both sides of the House; in truth, that in order that we should properly do our business it is necessary that the House should have confidence in the impartiality of the Chair. I feel—I have always felt—that it is important that, if it be at all possible, we should avoid division on the selection of the officer who is to fill that delicate relation towards us; and, therefore, I rejoice that the occasion does not at this time arise for any such division. I may be allowed to repeat here a suggestion which I made on the last occasion of our choice of a Speaker—a suggestion which, I am afraid, subsequent events indicate it is not altogether unnecessary to repeat, and that is, the great importance which we ought to attach to the spontaneous and prompt repressing by the Speaker of this House of disorderly language. In this particular matter I consider that the first word is the worst word, and that the higher the quarter from which the word comes the worse the word. My hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has set us in his position on the floor a very admirable example in this regard, and I trust that that example which he has set us during the thirteen or fourteen years now past on the floor, he will enforce by precept when he is entrusted with the authority to which I refer. I shall not expect any weakness in the discharge of this duty on his part, but rather shall hope for the best. The hon. gentleman has referred to the parliamentary career of my hon. friend. I have watched it with interest and not without sympathy. I have observed in him at times efforts which I deemed to be in the right direction in the discharge of his duty as a Canadian citizen. I have observed in him aspirations towards that interpretation of the Federal pact to which I adhere, and aspirations towards the development of our powers, for example, of dealing with our relations with other countries, in which I have entirely coincided with him. If I were disposed to be critical I might say there have been occasions upon which it appeared to me he hardly pushed his principles fully into action, that he did not carry to their full logical development the views which he entertained. But I trust that, fortified and ripened by experience in the position which he is about to occupy for the next few years, we may find—if there be that blemish—that blemish entirely removed when he retakes his place on the floor. My hon. friend has at times been rather a disturbing element in the party ranks. I recollect very well when to him was ascribed a somewhat prominent part in the extraordinary convolutions which were performed by the Figure 8 some years ago in the neighborhood of this Chamber. To him is ascribed, not the authorship indeed, but the application—as illustrative of the relations of his friends of that time in the Administration to his colleagues from his Province—of the phrase “à quat’ pattes, Canayens;” and to him is ascribed, encouraged no doubt and inspired from a quarter still higher and nearer to the Administration than himself, that resistance which resulted in the submission of the Minister—in his placing himself “à quat’ pattes before the Canayens,” and entering Room No. 8 under the Caudine forks. I hope there never may be occasion to say of him that he illustrated in his own person the application of the phrase; that it never may be said of him that he was “à quat’ pattes”—that he marched from mutiny to ministerial favor, or touched the Treasury by treason. I hope it never may be said of him that he attained, or could retain this Chair by anything approaching to base subserviency or abandonment of principle. For my part, I feel special pleasure in acceding to this particular choice on this particular occasion. We are just now come from a very severe election campaign, in which the chief Tory slogan and battle-cry against myself was my vote on the execution of Riel and my opinion of the management of North-West affairs. I was called on to express an opinion on that subject, which I did in this place about twelve months ago, when I declared that in my opinion the execution of Riel was a severe blow to the administration of criminal justice in Canada, a cruel act which I felt ought to be regretted. I knew that that opinion was unpopular. I knew that it was not shared by many of my own friends. I knew it was perilous of utterance and that it was liable to misinterpretation. I asked only that I should be allowed to be sincere and honest in the expression of my convictions. But the Tory party declined to permit that position.

Mr. BLAKE.

They declared that no honest man, no jurist, no parliamentarian, no statesman, could honestly believe that which I, as they said, professed to believe. They declared that I was setting up the French above the English, the Roman Catholics above the Protestants—that I was breaking down the sacred rule of one law for all, that I was raising the cry of race and revenge, that I was destroying the prime principle of the administration of criminal justice. They roused the Orange Tories to madness. I was insulted in the press, in the pulpit, on the platform. I was called a Rielite, a conspirator against Canadian law, a hypocrite and coward, a knave, a fool, a rebel and a traitor. And as to the Half-breeds, the Tories declared that there was no neglect, no delay, no mismanagement on the part of the Government—that, on the contrary, all was kindness, promptness, diligence and wisdom; that the accusation was false, and the accuser a calumniator. A year ago, discussing these questions here, I appealed to a later day—to the next generation—for my final verdict, and the judgment of history recorded by posterity. Who, at that time, could have believed that within these few months I should find these, my accusers, to-day laying the first stone of my vindication. What is the earliest step which they propose to this Assembly, elected largely under the influence of those cries? They propose for the first place here, for the position of Speaker and mouthpiece of the Canadian Commons, for the vindicator of our privileges, for our judicial arbiter, the gentleman who voted with me a few months ago:

“That this House feels it its duty to express its deep regret that the sentence of death passed upon Louis Riel, convicted of high treason, was allowed to be carried into execution.”

They propose for that high office the gentleman who a few months ago followed up that vote by voting with me

“That it was the duty of the Government to proceed with diligence, under the authority they obtained from Parliament in 1879, to settle the claims arising out of the Indian title of the Half-breeds of the North-West Territories, and also to settle the claims of those of the Manitoba Half-breeds who were temporarily absent during the enumeration, and that in this respect the Government has been guilty of neglect, delay and mismanagement, prejudicial to the peace, welfare and good government of Canada.”

These votes of censure on the part of the hon. member for Laval do give him a title to my support. These votes of want of confidence in the Administration do lead me to the conclusion that he possesses a soundness of judgment which I hope he will illustrate in the duties of the Chair. But what is to be said of the men who called me Rielite and conspirator—nay, even fool, hypocrite and coward, calumniator, traitor and rebel, because I so voted, and who propose to elevate to the first place in this Chamber the gentleman who shared in the votes with me? Is this the application of the principle of one law for all? Is this the administration of even-handed justice—highest honors for one, execration and contempt for the other? Are they acting thus in spite of the hon. member's votes? If so, it proves that the votes cannot have been so very bad after all. But they are not so acting; they are acting so largely because of the votes. We know, and no one knows better than the hon. member, that he largely owes his elevation at this juncture to the fact that he occupies the happy position of having voted to condemn the execution of Louis Riel and the conduct of the Government with reference to Half-breed affairs. It is because of the votes largely, and not in spite of them, that this motion is made. Tell it not, Mr. Bourinot, on the 12th of July; name it not in the lodges of the Orangemen; but so it is; and such being the situation, I extend in advance my hearty congratulations to my fellow Rielite, to my co-conspirator against Canadian law, to my brother knave and fool, my fellow-hypocrite and traitor, my associate in calumny, treason and rebellion, on being about to receive, by the unanimous vote of the Canadian Commons, the position of first commoner of Canada. Motion agreed to.

Mr. BOURINOT. I declare Mr. Ouimet duly chosen to occupy the Chair of this Honorable House as its Speaker.

Mr. OUMIET was conducted from his place to the Chair by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Hector Langevin.

Mr. SPEAKER ELECT, standing on the upper step, said: I beg leave to tender to this House my sincere thanks for the high honor it has conferred upon me in electing me to be its Speaker. It will be my earnest endeavor to deserve the confidence you have reposed in me, and to discharge the important duties that devolve upon me with firmness and impartiality. I know how ill-fitted I am for the position compared with others, but I trust in the co-operation of honorable gentlemen on both sides in maintaining our rules and usages, and in preserving the dignity and freedom of debate, according to well-established custom.

And the Mace, which before lay under the Table, was laid upon the Table.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 3:40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 14th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER ELECT having taken the Chair,

PRAYERS.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

Mr. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honorable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber

Then the HONORABLE JOSEPH ALDERIC OUMIET, SPEAKER ELECT, said:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:—

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of Speech in their Debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all reasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favorable consideration.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the Senate then said:

Mr. SPEAKER,—

I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's Person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow, their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you, that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all reasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favorable construction.

Then His Excellency the GOVERNOR GENERAL was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned,

Mr. SPEAKER said: I have the honor to state that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen on me, and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House, Judgment bearing date the eighth day of June, 1886, of the Hon. Mr. Justice Angers, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, in the matter of the election petition for the Electoral District of Beauce, by which judgment the said petition was dismissed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS OF OFFICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform this House, that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is my pleasing duty on the opening of a new Parliament to congratulate you on the general prosperity of the country and on the prospect of a coming season of peace and progress.

You will, I am sure, gladly join in with the rest of the loyal subjects of the Queen in offering Her Majesty your sincere congratulations on her having reached the fiftieth anniversary of her accession to the Throne, and in giving expression to an earnest hope that she may be long spared to reign over her vast dominions.

The prominent position taken by Canada at the Colonial and Indian Exhibition, recently held in London, has made the Dominion more widely and favorably known than before, and will, I have no doubt, contribute largely to its material progress by calling attention to the advantages offered by our country to the agriculturist, and by attracting the capital necessary for the development of its great natural resources.

Negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States on the Fishery Question, with respect to which my Government has been fully informed and consulted, are still in progress, and will, we may be permitted to hope, result in an arrangement honorable and satisfactory to both nations.

Meanwhile the necessary provision has been made for the protection of our inshore fisheries. The papers on this subject will be laid before you.

Your attention will be invited to the expediency of establishing a Department of Trade and Commerce, under the supervision of a responsible Minister.

You will also be asked to consider the propriety of making such improvement in the organization of the Departments of Justice, Customs, and Inland Revenue, as will provide greater facilities for the despatch of the large and increasing volume of business with which those Departments are charged.

A measure will be submitted to you giving representation in the Senate to the North-West Territories in addition to that which they now possess in the House of Commons.

Other measures will be laid before you, and among them will be found Bills for the amendment of the Acts relating to Government Railways, for providing a better mode of Trial of Claims against the Crown, for the improvement of the Procedure in Criminal Cases, and for the further amendment of the Chinese Immigration Act.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

You will be asked, in order to provide against the possible interruption of the navigation of our great inland waters, for an appropriation in aid of the construction of a canal to connect the waters of Lakes Huron and Superior at Sault Ste. Marie.

The Accounts for the past year will be laid before you, as well as the Estimates for the ensuing year. They have been prepared with due regard to economy and the requirements of the Public Service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate :Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I commend these important subjects and others which may be laid before you to your best consideration, with full confidence in your earnest desire to promote the development and well-being of Canada.

On motion of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, HIS EXCELLENCY'S Speech was ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House, the Report of the Joint Librarians on the state of the Library of Parliament.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections. 2. On Expiring Laws. 3. On Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines. 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills. 5. On Standing Orders. 6. On Printing. 7. On Public Accounts. 8. On Banking and Commerce. 9. On Immigration and Colonization; which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Mr. BOWELL. With the permission of the House I propose to move the usual Committee for the Supervision of the Debates of this House. In selecting the names we have had particular reference to the different sections of the whole Dominion, and have therefore selected a representative from each Province. I hope the names chosen will meet with the approval of the House. I beg to move :

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time, the said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Baker, Béchard, Charlton, Colby, Davin, Desjardins, Ellis, Innes, McIntyre, Royal, Taylor, Tupper (Victou), Weldon (Albert).

Mr. BLAKE. I had rather that the hon. gentleman should move that on to-morrow, or move it as a notice for to-morrow.

Mr. BOWELL. It will stand as a notice for to-morrow.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I beg to call the attention of the House to the matter connected with the election in the County of Queen's, N.B. I do not propose to enter into the question until we have the requisite information before the House. I feel this is a matter which affects the dignity and privileges of the House and the electors at large, and I hope it will not be approached in any partisan spirit. Without further discussing the matter I would move :

That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery be ordered to attend at the opening of this House, to-morrow, with the return of the last election for the Electoral District of Queen's, in the Province of New Brunswick, together with all poll-books and all other papers, letters, documents and memoranda which may have been transmitted to him by the Returning Officer and received by him since the despatch of the Writ of Election, and copies of letters sent by him to the Returning Officer.

Mr. SPEAKER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that a question of great importance will arise in connection with the papers moved for. I have not the slightest objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand a great deal of private legislation will come before the House this Session and it is advisable, therefore, that the Standing Committees be struck as soon as possible. I move :

That a Special Committee of seven members be appointed, to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House, this day; to be composed of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin, Sir Richard Cartwright, and Messrs. McLellan, Bowell, Blake and Laurier.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 3:50 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 15th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

QUEEN'S, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. WELDON moved :

That the papers in possession of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery relating to the election in the Electoral District of Queen's, N.B., be now read

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose they may be considered as read.

Mr. BLAKE. It is believed, from what we know of the contents of these papers, that it is necessary to follow them up with an immediate motion, and for that reason the House should be put in possession of them at once. I think the hon. gentleman will see, when he hears the papers read, that a sort of interlocutory motion is necessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, however, that the matter will have to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as is always done.

Motion agreed to, and the papers were read by the Clerk accordingly.

Mr. WELDON. My excuse for bringing this matter before the House is its great importance, inasmuch as it involves an infringement of the liberties of the people in general and of the electorate of Queen's, New Brunswick, in particular, and I trust that in discussing this matter we will avoid displaying any undue partisan spirit. This matter affects the rights and privileges of every elector in the Dominion, involving as it does, the decision of the question whether a returning officer can set at defiance the wishes of the majority of the electors of an electoral district by declaring, in the exercise of a jurisdiction not given to him and in defiance of the law, a party not elected to be elected a member of this House. It appears from the statements read by the clerk that the nominations were made and a poll was held, and that the court was adjourned for the purpose of receiving the return of the state of the poll. On the 28th of February the court was held, and then adjourned until the 5th of March, in consequence of some of the ballot boxes not being forthcoming, owing to the bad state of the roads; on the 5th of March the returning officer held his court and opened the ballot boxes. He summed up the votes, but in the return which has been laid on the Table, we find he has carefully and studiously avoided stating what was the result of the voting. He has stated that he summed up the votes, and so far he was right, but beyond that there was gross dereliction of duty on his part, and I hope this House will not tolerate such conduct on the part of a returning officer where his duty is so clearly pointed out by the statute. I hold in my hand the certificate and the copy of the affidavit made by Mr. Baird, one of the candidates on that occasion, who states:

"That on the said 5th inst. the said returning officer opened his court, opened the ballot boxes, and added together the number of votes given for said George G. King and for myself, from the statement contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers, and stated that he found by said statements that 1,191 votes had been given for said George G. King, and 1,130 votes had been given for this deponent."

If that was the case—and I state here from my place as a member of this House that I believe the statement to be correct that Mr. King, when the votes were summed up, had the majority—I say that, by the law, the duty of the returning officer was clearly laid down. What his duty might be at the nomination, it is not necessary to enquire. We find that the nomination was made, that the deposit was made, and a receipt given to Mr. King; and that, according to the requirements of the law, the names of the candidates were posted throughout the county, that a poll was held on the 22nd of February, and that the ballot boxes, certificates of return and poll books, were returned to the returning officer. What then was the duty of that officer? The law says:

"The returning officer at the place, day and hour appointed by his proclamation, and after having received all the ballot boxes, shall proceed to open them, in the presence of the election clerk, the candidates or their representatives, if present, or of at least two electors, if the candidates or their representatives are not present, and to add together the number of votes given for each candidate, from the statements contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers of the ballot papers counted by them. The candidate who, on the summing up of the votes, is found to have a majority of votes shall be then declared elected."

The duty of the returning officer was simply ministerial, or, to use the language of an eminent judge in England, in a very late case, his duty was the arithmetical calculation of the number of votes, and that is all. Beyond that he had no power, and if any of the proceedings were irregular there is a tribunal provided in the Controverted Elections Act by which returns can be rectified. But I say, without fear of contradiction, no power exists in a returning officer to declare an election invalid, or to refuse to count up the votes, or to refuse to declare elected the candidate who had the majority of votes. Then we find, still further, that after he is to do this:

"The returning officer shall, immediately after the sixth day after the final addition by him, unless before that time he receives notice that he is required to attend before a judge for the purpose of a final addition or recount by such judge of the votes given at the election, transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been duly elected, and shall forward to each of the respective candidates a duplicate or copy thereof, and such return shall be in the form OC in the first schedule to this Act."

"The returning officer shall accompany his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with a report of his proceedings, in which report he shall make any observation he thinks proper as to the state of the ballot boxes or ballot papers as received by him."

"The returning officer shall also transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with his return the ballot papers, the original statements of the several deputy returning officers hereinbefore referred to, together with the lists of voters and poll-books used in the several polling districts, and all other lists and documents used or required at such election or which have been transmitted to him by the deputy returning officers."

The duty of the returning officer is plain, and, with regard to his duty as to the return to the Clerk of the Crown, the law is so clear and distinct that "he who runs may read." It requires no legal lore to decide what is his duty, and that duty this officer has entirely failed to perform. He has failed in refusing to declare the person who had the majority of votes elected, and he has also failed in refusing to return the ballot boxes. If rumor speaks true—I do not vouch for the correctness of the statement—these ballot papers are no longer in existence, and if that be so, the duty and the honor of this House require that this matter should be fully investigated. I do not care on what side the candidate may be, but justice should be done, and as far as the law can be maintained we should maintain it in every particular. In a case decided in England a short time ago, I should like to read the language of Lord Esher, as the case is very much like this one. In that case, the returning officer, after the nomination, and after the poll, undertook to declare that one of the candidates was disqualified, and that the other candidate, having the minority of votes in a municipal election, should be returned. I may also add that the language of the statute in England, the Ballot Act of 1872, and that of our own Act are almost the same. In that case, delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, Lord Esher said as follows:—

"It is next said that Roberts was not duly elected because the returning officer did not declare him to be elected. It is not denied that he obtained a majority of votes. We have to see, therefore, what are the powers and duties of a returning officer in a municipal election. First comes the nomination, which is to take place before the mayor, when the borough is divided into wards. It is not necessary here to decide whether the mayor could reject the nomination of a candidate not properly qualified. If he had that power, he did not exercise it in the present case, because he accepted the nomination of both candidates. Then come the powers and duties of the returning officer, which are indicated in and limited by the second section of the Ballot Act, 1872. Those powers and duties begin after the close of the poll. He is to take charge of the ballot boxes; open them in the presence of such of the agents (if any) of the candidates as may be present, 'and ascertain the result of the poll by counting the votes given to each candidate.' The result of the poll is what he is to ascertain, and he must ascertain it in the way prescribed by the Act, and in that way only. The section then proceeds: 'And shall forthwith declare to be elected the candidate or candidates to whom the majority of votes have been given.' No power is given to him to declare that candidate elected to whom the majority of votes has been legally given. The moment he has cast up the votes, he must declare the candidate elected who has the arithmetical majority. He may only adjourn for the purpose of finishing the count. The section does not entitle him to enquire whether the candidate is under any personal disability to be elected, whether the candidate be man or woman, or whether the person nominated be dead or alive. The returning officer has simply to perform the arithmetical duty of adding up the votes, and to declare the person elected who has the majority. Though it is not necessary to decide the point, I am inclined to think that his declaration is merely ministerial, and that, if he remained silent and did not make any declaration, the person who had the majority of votes would be duly elected."

I say that no language could apply more absolutely to the case I am now presenting to the House than the language of the Master of the Rolls in England, and I say that under our Act the same duties devolve upon the returning officer, and that is his only duty. It would be unfortunate for the people of this country, it would be unfortunate for the liberty of the people, that any such powers should be given to returning officers as one of them has undertaken to exercise in this case. I trust that the spirit of honor and fair play will animate every member of this House, irrespective of political leaning, so far as to see that the law is carried out, and that right and justice is done as between these parties. I beg to move:

That Mr John R. Dunn, the Returning Officer for the Electoral District of the County of Queen's, N.B., be ordered by telegraph to transmit forthwith to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the poll-books, certificate of return, ballots, and all other papers used and otherwise connected with the late election and poll held in the said Electoral District.

I trust that this motion will pass, and that immediate steps will be taken to communicate with the returning officer so as to have these papers laid before the House at as early a day as possible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am quite sure the House will approach this case, as they ought to approach every case, in a judicial spirit and not in a partisan spirit. I have heard the statement of the hon. gentleman, and I have heard the particulars for the first time. My attention has not been called before to this case, but it is a very important case, and involves a very important principle. I have not the slightest objection that this motion should be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand from the hon. the leader of the Opposition that he would prefer that the name of Mr. Mills should be substituted for his own on the Striking Committee. By the universal consent of the House the change can be made.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Mr. BOWELL. I beg to move the motion of which I gave notice yesterday:—

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time; to be composed of Messrs Baker, Béchard, Charlton, Colby, Davin, Desjardins, Ellis, Innes, McIntyre, Royal, Taylor, Tupper (Picton), and Weldon (Albert).

I may explain to the House, for the information of those who were not present yesterday, that, in increasing the number of this committee, I have selected a representative from each of the Provinces, and two or three from the larger Provinces, making the total thirteen, which I hope will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has made another attempt in the direction which I objected to on a former occasion with reference to this committee. It must be well understood by the House that this is a very special committee, and that the possibility of maintaining the institution which is presided over by the committee depends upon the very full recognition of the equal rights on both sides. That recognition was made until the year 1885. The committee, for example, for the year 1884, and I believe also for the preceding year, was composed of nine members, of whom five were from the side of the majority and four from the side of the minority. It was not unreasonable, since there must be a majority on one side or the other, and of course, it was not merely not unreasonable, but it was proper, that the majority should be on the side of those who have the majority in the House. But the hon. gentleman opposite, who had a majority in the House of about two to one, recognized through a series of years, and up to the year 1884, the special circumstances belonging to this committee, and had the committee composed as nearly as might be of an equal number of members. In the year 1885 the hon. gentleman proposed to change that, and he proposed a committee in which the number on the side of the majority should be very considerably increased. I objected. He did not propose that our number should be increased at all; he left them at four, and he put at either six or seven, the number of gentlemen who were to belong to the side of the majority. I pointed out the special circumstances which had been recognized for all these years as applying to the constitution of this committee, the practice which had been pursued, and I requested that it should be maintained. The hon. gentleman declined to maintain it in its integrity, but he agreed to add one member, a member for the minority, and thus the committee was increased to twelve, being five from the side of the Opposition and seven from the side of the Ministerialists. That, of course, did not preserve the proportion, did not keep as nearly an equality as possible, but it

mitigated the injustice which the hon. gentleman had designed and proposed to the House. Well, since that time, in 1886, the committee was renewed in the same way. Now, we come to a new Parliament in which there has been no circumstance which entitles the hon. gentleman to propose that the Ministerial side should be increased on the committee; but what the hon. gentleman proposes is that the Ministerial strength should be still further increased on this committee. He proposes that there should be eight Ministerialists to five members of the Opposition on that committee now. That is proceeding in the same improper direction, although the popular voice has not indicated to the hon. gentleman that he has got any right to make such an assumption at all. I, therefore, object to the constitution of the committee in these proportions. I am sorry, also, to find that the hon. gentleman should have proposed to strike off the committee, a number of gentlemen formerly, and still, members of this House, who have taken an active and intelligent interest in the discharge of the labors of the committee. I believe that there is, perhaps, none of the committees in which an acquaintance with the duties, an acquaintance with the permanent staff, and an acquaintance with the general run of the business, is more important than with reference to the Debates Committee; and for my part, and to the extent to which I may have any voice at all in the selection of the members of the committee, I shall endeavor to promote the notion that those members who have satisfactorily acted in the past should not be withdrawn from the committee in the future. I am not myself a very great admirer of the notion that there is an absolute necessity in this House, twenty years after Confederation, of each Province being represented nominatim upon each and every single committee we strike. It seems to me to be a very painful confession—if it is a confession we are called upon to make, and the hon. gentleman made it yesterday for himself and repeated it to-day—that we cannot trust one another sufficiently, but that, in order to remedy some apprehended injustice to each Province, each Province must always be represented on each committee. This is the proposal which the hon. gentleman makes, and by which he proposes to justify, as I understand, first, the enlargement of the committee, and secondly, the changes he makes in its number. However, I am not going to quarrel with the notion that the committee should be enlarged, to the extent of pushing my objection to a vote. I differ from the view that the business of the House requires this committee to be enlarged, and my opinion is that there will be a greater sense of responsibility, that the work will be better done by the small, than by the larger, committee. But I do most emphatically object to this alteration, this still further alteration, in the proportions of this committee to the disadvantage of the gentlemen sitting on your left, which is now proposed; and also, in so far as we are to be represented on the committee, I think we would prefer to be represented by those who have represented us in times past—to a certain extent, at any rate. My hon. friend from the Island of Prince Edward (Mr. McIntyre), who is proposed to be placed on this committee now for the first time, would, I am sure, if he were in his place, object to the view that either my hon. friend the member for the County of Huntingdon (Mr. Soriver), or my hon. friend the member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), should be displaced from the position with the labors of which they have familiarized themselves, in order that, forsooth, the Island of Prince Edward should be represented for fear some injustice might be done to that Island in the preparation of the reports. I, therefore, ask the hon. gentleman to reconsider the construction of the committee, and to arrange for such a disposition of the strength of the committee from one side and the other, as has been recognized in former days, and if the members are to be increased, I should like to propose a substitution of the name of Mr. Scriver for that of Mr. McIntyre, and the addition of the name of Mr. Somerville, the member for North Brant, to the committee. That would give us the old members, and it would give us six to eight instead of five to eight, which the hon. gentleman proposes. I do not think that is justice, but it is as near justice as I expect.

Mr. BOWELL. As the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, will be satisfied with that change, with even that measure of justice, I shall be very glad to accept his proposition. But I must at the same time dissent in toto from the principle he has laid down that because the members of the committee have been changed, or that because a majority of that committee may belong to this side of the House, therefore, in a matter of this kind, at least, the committee would not do that justice which has always been meted out to the Opposition by the Debates Committee. I may mention that it was not from any want of confidence, on the part of those who selected this committee, in the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), or in the member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), that their names were left out; but it was necessary in forming a large committee in adopting the principle which I laid down when making the motion, that some members of the committee must be left out. Some of those who were left out belong to the Conservative party and represent constituencies in the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario, but certainly it was not for the reason that we had not confidence in them but because, in a committee which was to represent the whole House, in supervising the reporting of the debates, we thought that it was much better that each section of the Dominion should be represented. I have no objection to accept the proposition made by the leader of the Opposition, to substitute the name of Mr. Scriver for that of Mr. McIntyre and to add Mr. Somerville to the committee.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, in the performance of the simple task assigned to me upon the present occasion I would earnestly crave the indulgence of yourself, Sir, and this honorable House. Although not a young man, I am a young member, and he who for the first time addresses you, Sir, in the presence of these hon. gentlemen, must be deeply impressed with the dignity of his audience, and must feel all that trepidation of heart which a novice experiences when he first displays his raw accomplishments before those who are the masters of his art. If, therefore, I stumble or falter in that which I desire to do, I trust that you, Sir, will kindly forget that I have failed, and only remember that I have tried to do my duty. His Excellency, in the first paragraph of his Speech congratulates us upon the great prosperity of the country and upon a coming season of progress and peace. It is gratifying to us to hear that the country is thriving, quiet and prosperous, and that the prospect for the future is equally bright and cheering. However widely hon. gentlemen may differ in their opinions in regard to the best means of promoting this peace and prosperity, yet I am sure all have the same end in view, and it must be to them a source of the highest satisfaction, a most pleasing reward for their arduous labors in this House, to learn of the well-being and the well-doing of our people, and to know that peace and plenty dwell amongst them. As loyal and attached subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, we, in common with all who in other lands bear to her true allegiance, would offer our most hearty congratulations upon the near completion of the 50th year of her mild and beneficent reign. At the period of Her Majesty's accession to the Throne, a century and a quarter had nearly elapsed since a lady ruled in England. The world, and especially the British world, had changed marvellously in that time. Not only were the social, industrial and economical condition of her people altered, but the lines of political liberty had been extended, the franchise had been widened, and new and very different ideas had been introduced regarding the rights of the people and the political influence and prerogatives of the Crown. Many of Her Majesty's predecessors were sovereigns largely endowed with intellectual gifts of the highest order, yet I venture to say that none better, and few as well, apprehended and appreciated the spirit of the age, the temper of the times, as did that innocent, simple-minded, blushing maiden, Queen Victoria, fifty years ago. None have ever better or more clearly understood the wishes of the people, interfered less with the popular will, or performed more acceptably or more diligently all the onerous duties of an exemplary constitutional sovereign. And while we have the highest admiration for her political discernment and sagacity, let us not forget that her personal and private virtues as a daughter, wife and mother have illumined the Throne with a resplendent moral grandeur which shines through all the earth, and shall continue to shine long after the fame of her greatness as a monarch shall have become dim in the memories of men. We are dutiful and respectful to our most able sovereign, the Queen, but our hearts have their argument as our understandings have, and it is our love and reverence for a pure and noble woman that sing so lustily

"God Save our gracious Queen,
Long live our noble Queen,
God save the Queen."

But to us, as the representatives of the people of this Dominion, the year of Her Majesty's jubilee suggest many and varied thoughts. Fifty years ago, of the Provinces which form the Confederation some were altogether unknown and some were known by names other than those they now bear. Our people were few, scarcely one-third of their present number, our revenues were small and their sources limited and unproductive, our public improvements were insignificant, and communication between the separate Provinces was difficult and rare; our agriculture was crude and unscientific, and manufactures, in the proper acceptance of the term, had neither a local habitation nor a name. We were hewers of wood (in a literal sense) and drawers of water for the skilled workmen of other lands. Our value as a mart for commerce was but trifling, and other nations, if they thought of us at all, regarded us with indifference, if not with pity and contempt. But worse than all, fifty years ago the people of each of the older Provinces were involved in bitter dissensions amongst themselves. One branch of the Legislature was arrayed against the other, one class of society was not in sympathy with another class. We hear the ominous sounds of popular grievances, governmental scandals, bills of right and most comprehensive resolutions. We hear the shouts of fiery orators, the whisperings of ardent plotters, crimination and recrimination, till we witness the pitiable sight of the whole inflammable mass wrapped in the consuming flames of civil war. We who are today so peaceful, dutiful and loyal, had no pleasanter spectacle to exhibit to our young and inexperienced Queen fifty years ago, in the beginning of her reign, than the citizens of one common country arrayed in virulent opposition to each other, grasping each other by the throat, seeking each other's lives,—dead patriots, blazing buildings, and garments rolled in blood. Fifty years under the wise and mild government of Her Majesty the Queen have changed all that. We are an orderly, law-abiding people, and although in this period there have been outbreaks of violence, yet these have been confined to a remote corner of our territory and to a very few of the people, and have been so deeply regretted by all classes of the community that they cannot be reckoned now as impairing the peace-loving character of Canadians. The people of this Dominion look, and wisely look, to their representatives in this House, and confide in their sense of justice, their love of fair play, their intelligence and their patriotism, to ensure that they will, as far as the constitution of our country permits, remove all sectional animosities; that they will allay all discontent, redress every grievance and right every wrong. After these fifty years our people number five millions, our revenues are buoyant and productive, showing for nine months of the current year a surplus of nearly a million and a quarter, and the end of the financial year promises to pay a very handsome compliment indeed to the careful management of the present Ministry. Our public works are magnificent and of essential utility; our agriculture, in its different branches of grain, stock and fruit, and our manufactures of every kind, aided and encouraged by a wise policy, are making rapid strides; interprovincial communication is easy, cheap and rapid; the intelligence, the thrift, the virtues and the enterprise of our people make our future sure. Fifty years hence he who stands in the same relation to the Parliament of that day as I do to this—the mover of the Address—will, I hope, be able to present a picture brighter than the one I have attempted to outline—the figures on the canvas larger, more clearly defined and suffused with a richer glow. He will, I hope, be able to speak of a people four times as numerous as now we are, of revenues productive and adequate, of vast improvements, of increased activity and remuneration in every art and labor of life. He may tell you of a Dominion not only prosperous as a whole, but every Province therein solvent and self-sustaining, and that “better terms,” from its long disease, has become an obsolete phrase; of a population patriotic, and, if not homogeneous, united, happy and contented; of Canada’s great works, her widened fame and merited glory. The display of Canadian products at the recent Colonial and Indian Exhibition in London, a display encouraged by the Government, contributed by the people and strenuously aided by our indefatigable and indomitable High Commissioner, must have a tendency to enlarge the knowledge and diffuse more correct ideas of our country and its capacities; it must drive from the common mind of Europeans that lingering dread that, after all, Canada is only a few square miles of snow. The excellence of our varied productions from the workshop, the field, the forest or the mine, will convince the intelligent observer who is looking for a wider and less crowded field for his labor and his energies, or for the investment of his small capital, that here, at least, under the British flag, is a country highly civilized and well developed, temperate in climate, productive in soil; that here there is wealth for honest labor, here a reward for toil, here a comfortable competency in age for youthful labor and a sober life. Let us hope that the many advantages which Canada possesses—and has shown so decisively that she possesses them—will attract to our country many thousands of the worthy and industrious poor from other lands. It is earnestly to be hoped that the negotiations on the fishery questions at present going on between Her Majesty’s Government and that of the United States—negotiations in which we are largely interested—may terminate in a peaceful solution of the present misunderstanding. It is the desire of every Canadian to be on amicable terms with the great Republic to the south of us, and for this reason we wish that the settlement may be in accordance with right and justice; for there can be no hearty goodwill between either individuals or nations when there is persistent aggressiveness on one side and a firm determination to resist on the other. Of this matter, however, we shall be able to form a fuller and more correct judgment when the papers which are promised are carefully perused. The proposed changes and improvements in the different Departments of Justice, Customs and Inland Revenue, and the formation of a new Department of Trade and Commerce under a responsible Minister will, I have no doubt, be made in so careful and liberal a spirit that the effectiveness of each service will be much increased, and the country will derive much benefit therefrom. A very pleasing evidence of the growth and development of the North-West Territories is the presence in this House of hon. members from that portion of the Dominion—once designated the “Great Lone Land”—and the increasing importance of these great Provinces is still further attested by the proposed measure to give them representation in the Senate. Our fellow countrymen there will then feel that they are indeed citizens of this great Confederation, and that they, in concert with others, are shaping the destinies of a nation. Our intimate trade connections with our own far west will not be completed until the continuous navigation of our great inland waters is entirely in our own hands and free from foreign caprice. A trans-continental railway within our own borders will be most fittingly supplemented by uninterrupted navigation from the lower lakes to Port Arthur, at which these two great lines of Canadian trade and commerce will unite and pour their rich burdens of freight upon the country beyond. The prudence, skill and tenacity of purpose which gave to our country the Canadian Pacific Railway will find in the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal a fitting, proper, congenial and most suitable complement to that great work. I have the honor to move the Address in reply to the Speech of His Excellency.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). In reading in the columns of Hansard the speeches which had been made by the movers and seconders of the several Addresses in reply to the Speech from the Throne, for the twenty Sessions of Parliament since the union of the Provinces, it is noteworthy that those speeches are characterised by a resolute and stubborn spirit of optimism, and that in years of leanness as in years of plenty the men who have delivered these speeches have taken a cheerful view of their country and of the capacity of its Government. Therefore the traditions of this House pledge one to that spirit of cheerfulness which the conditions of the country to-day so fully warrant. I heartily agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Porter) with regard to the paragraph of the Address congratulating Her Majesty on having reached the fiftieth anniversary of her accession to the Throne. We remember with some little humiliation that almost the very first thing that our young Queen knew of her Canadian Provinces was that they were rather troublesome and turbulent Provinces, which were causing her some anxiety; although we, who come from the Maritime Provinces, can recall with some complacency that her Provinces down by the sea were behaving themselves at that time in the most admirable manner. But counting ourselves now as one country after those fifty years have gone by, we are glad to tell her that we have a united Canadian people who have amply atoned for their turbulence of that time; that we are in the habit of giving something better than smooth words of loyalty—that we have done a heroic act in consolidating her Empire—that we have given to her, by a great sacrifice, a strong, secure military route, over which the Queen can send her soldiers from the British Islands to her possessions in the far East without ever touching a foreign land. In approaching the so-called fishery question between Her Majesty’s Government and that of the United States, we are pleased to learn that the resources of diplomacy for the settlement of that question have not yet been exhausted, and we hope that up to the present hour they have not even been seriously taxed. It is so delicate a question that we approach it with a feeling of restraint, as if we were walking over fires concealed under treacherous ashes. It has been said by an eminent statesman that diplomacy has her triumphs, not less renowned than the triumphs of war. Certainly the history of the fishery question during the last hundred years, between the two great powers who rule over this continent, does not record any great diplomatic triumphs. The history of that question we cannot now enter upon. It is enough to say that the rights and duties of those two nations in respect of the fisheries are to-day governed by what is known as the Convention of London, entered into in 1818—that whatever our rights are in this matter, they rest on that treaty, and are not determined by any earlier treaty, nor by the rules of public law; and if that treaty is clear, our rights and duties are clear. That treaty simply says, with respect to the rights of the two parties to the fisheries along the Canadian coast, that the Americans have hereby renounced forever the liberty to take fish in what are known as the territorial Canadian waters, and also the liberty to enter the bays and harbors of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America for any purpose whatever, except for the single purpose of asylum—for the purpose of shelter and repairs, wood and water. It is true, during the 70 years which have elapsed since that treaty was entered into, the conditions under which American fishermen made use of the deep-sea fisheries have greatly changed. Arrangements which in 1818 did not press heavily on American fishermen are to-day very burdensome. The mackerel, the herring, and the other fish which were found abundantly along their own coasts at that time, have, in the intervening years, migrated eastward and northward, and are now found chiefly along the Canadian coasts; and so the migration of the fish, the changed conditions under which they are taken by the fishermen, and the development of railway and steam communication from the provincial ports to the American markets—all these things have made a treaty that was not found oppressive 70 years ago most oppressive to-day. Therefore, we can sympathize with our neighbors, and can understand their desire to enter our harbors and ports, either for the renewal of supplies, for the purchase of fresh bait, and to tranship their cargoes from their fishing schooners in order that they may be carried by rail and steamship to the American ports. It is very natural that they should desire—for they have a strong commercial interest in doing so—to have a basis of supply near their fishing grounds. But under the plain wording of the treaty they have no right to enter our waters, except for the one single purpose of refuge; and if the Convention of 1818 had been drafted last night by an officer of the Fishery Department of Canada, with the view of governing and protecting Canadian fishermen, I do not know how the terms could be more clearly drawn. Our American neighbors complain that we have been harsh and niggardly and technical in the construction of that great instrument. There is a sentiment of justice under that complaint, namely, that it is not right on the part of any great people to construe a treaty harshly, niggardly, and in a technical spirit. But there are no two interpretations of that treaty possible in regard to the subject-matter in dispute. Its terms are clear and unambiguous, and when we say that we rest on our treaty rights, it is no answer for our American friends to say: "Oh, we are sixty millions of people." If we were disposed, Sir, to reflect upon the way in which our neighbors have construed treaties, we could show, I think, in respect to a much more recent treaty than the London Convention of 1818—in respect to the Treaty of Washington of 1871—that our neighbors have been somewhat technical and narrow in the construction of that treaty. In the first article of the Treaty of Washington a provision was made for the free admission to American ports for 12 years of fish the produce of Canadian fisheries, and within five years after that contract was entered into, the American Government placed a duty of something like 125 per cent. on the cans carrying the fish. Another provision of that treaty was that Canadians should have free access for 12 years to American ports for fish oils the produce of our fisheries, and not long afterwards their Government decided that seal oil was not fish oil, and a duty of 20 per cent. was imposed on seal oil entering their ports from Canada. It is a matter of pride, I think, to all of us in this House, that our own Administration has not seen fit to adopt that method of construing these instruments. The Canadian Government have not sought to harass American fishermen. They have had no desire to put any compulsion on them with the view of securing a re-opening or settlement of the fishery question, or with the view of forcing our neighbors to enter into new trade relations with us. I think nothing has been farther from the thoughts of our people. But, Mr. Speaker, when we come to rest upon our exact rights, when we read the treaty and find that its words are clear and distinct, we are justified in saying that although the 60,000,000 of Americans to the south of us are conscious of their strength, we are 5,000,000 of Canadians in the north who are equally conscious of our rights. We are children of two great historical races in the Old World who over the sea in times past were not wont under a threat to abate one jot or tittle of their claim to their own property or their rights. We do, nevertheless, anticipate with the Administration that the negotiations which are in progress will result in an arrangement favorable and satisfactory to both nations; and our hopes rest not alone on the clearness of our rights, not alone on the military strength of the Empire to which we belong, and the consciousness of its support, but very largely on the common sense and fair-mindedness of the great body of the American people. In that country there exists a public opinion, somewhat inert, somewhat slow to move, yet with as keen a regard for law and as high a sense of honor as we could have, and when this fishery question has moved along, if unhappily it does, to a more acute stage, when it will cease to be the clamor of a small section of the country whose interests are seriously affected, when it seems to touch the national honor, then the whole American people will consider this question, ascertain their legal position, enquire into their rights and cheerfully accord to us all we are entitled to. That great country has, I am sure, no desire to stain its honor with the unpardonable crime of perfidy. We are glad, therefore, to learn that the necessary provision has been made for the protection of our inshore fisheries, not by way of menace or bad temper, but in simple and manly self-respect. The establishment of a Department of Trade and Commerce, under the supervision of a special Minister, is a proper subject for congratulation. If, unhappily, our trade relations with our neighbors, which are menaced, should be in any way adversely interfered with by any action on their part, it will be our imperative duty to seek other outlets for the produce of our farms, fisheries, mines, mills and factories, and by the establishment of this Department of Trade and Commerce the Government will show that they are fully alive to the interests of the people and to the necessity of making the strongest possible efforts to extend our trade in every direction. I ask to be allowed now to thank the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government for the honor he has done the county which I have the honor to represent in inviting me to second this Address, and I desire to thank him and the other hon. members of this House for the patience with which they have listened to my remarks. May I be permitted also to express, on behalf of the new members, the feeling of pride we all share in finding ourselves sitting here for the first time in this legislative chamber, along with illustrious statesmen on both sides of the House whom I was taught to reverence years ago, and who are held in high honor by the people for the patriotism and courage and political capacity and eloquence which they have brought to the administration of public affairs and to the influencing of public opinion.

On paragraph 1,

Mr. BLAKE. Upon former occasions similar to this, I have felt it my duty to enter at some little length into a review of the political events and developments of the year, as the year has passed from one Session to the other without any appeal to the people; and the hon. gentleman who leads the Government has more than once objected to the somewhat exhaustive, and, I suppose I may say, to some people, perhaps to the majority of the House, the somewhat exhaustive review which I felt it my duty to make; but the character of the Speech which was read the other day and the character of the Address which we are asked to make in answer to that Speech are both so harmless, so entirely innocuous—there is so very little indeed in them—that I think they may, conjoined with the other circumstances to which I am about to refer, induce me upon this occasion to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, and to delay for a much shorter period even than I have formerly done our progress to the real business of the Session. I am glad to be able to congratulate the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the answer to the Speech from the Throne on both the manner and the matter of their addresses. They certainly did themselves credit, if for nothing more than this: that there was no word used by them calculated to promote an acrimonious discussion or protracted debate, so that the Speech itself, being of the character to which I referred, and the hon. gentleman who proposed the reply having addressed us in these tones, there is the less need or occasion for engaging in lengthy discussion. Not having had the satisfaction of having met on former occasions these hon. gentlemen or being able to gauge their respective qualities for the discharge of such an important duty, I, of course, was not aware of the special qualifications which they have shown to-day; and, in ignorance of those special qualifications, I confess that I had myself made a forecast of two other hon. gentlemen as perhaps, upon reviewing the situation, the fittest persons to present the case of the Government on this occasion. I refer to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), and the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird). I quite agree, after having heard these hon. gentlemen, that my view was arrived at in ignorance of those special qualifications which they had for the discharge of the duty. Now, the hon. gentleman adverted in grateful and graceful terms to the happy circumstances that we are asked to day to express at an early stage, what I dare say we shall be asked in some more formal manner at a future time to express, our feelings upon the subject of this being the jubilee year of the Queen, and I was glad to be able to notice that the general sentiments with which they regarded that happy event were such as can be shared by us all. There is no doubt that the British Empire during those fifty years has developed in the most extraordinary manner. To us, who are interested in the development of this particular portion of the Empire, enormous in area if not in population as yet—to us, amongst the most interesting circumstances which are recalled to our mind by the occurrence of this jubilee year, are not our material progress, not our increasing population, not even the conjunction of the various Provinces, but the fact that under the rule of the Queen the principles of self-government, of popular government, may be said to have almost begun and received that high degree of development which they have received within the area of British North America. I do not share, perhaps it is natural that I should not, coming from the Province of Ontario, the sentiments of humiliation with which the hon.

Mr. WELDON (Albert).

member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) seemed to recur to a portion of the events of fifty years ago. I quite agree that there were circumstances which then occurred which had better not have occurred, but I would tell him that amongst the most honored men on both sides of politics in the old Province of Canada, and since the Canadian Confederation was formed, have been found men who were active and prominent in the events to which he looks back with humiliation, and that not least amongst their titles to the sympathy and confidence of their fellow-countrymen in these latter years has been the recollection of the prominent and outspoken, if imprudent and reckless, part which they took in vindication of that which now all acknowledge was the essence of popular liberty. Nor, although that agitation which culminated in unhappy risings in Upper Canada and in Lower Canada in 1837 did not reach the same head in the Provinces from one of which the hon. gentleman comes, can I forget that the man whose name was for many years most loved and most venerated in the whole region of the Maritime Provinces, and whose reputation and power extended even in those old days of difficult communication—of absence of communication—far beyond the Maritime Provinces, and reached the west, was Joseph Howe, who took a prominent and active part in that constitutional agitation which brought Nova Scotia happily not through bloodshed or open insurrection, because it was not necessary, but brought Nova Scotia also to the front in the struggle for responsible government. I rejoice then that we have reached the recognition so long ago of the vital principle of self-government, and that the principle—the exceptions to its operation growing less from year to year—has been from year to year more and more recognized that we do control our own concerns; and the happy condition of loyalty to the British Crown and to the noble lady whose head is surmounted by that Crown to-day is not based merely upon tradition, not merely upon an unreasoning love for the past, but exists because it is her good fortune to have had a reign which has been commensurate with the growth and development in these Provinces of the principle of self-government, because we know that the reign of the Queen is synonymous here with the reign of the people, and therefore it is that in Canada the secure foundation of the Throne lies in the fact that it rests upon the hearts of the Queen's Canadian subjects. There is, however, a blot upon the jubilee year, and it is a blot which deeply affects us, and deeply affects us in a direction to which this Speech refers, and to which the hon. gentlemen have alluded. There is a country, there is a part of the so-called United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in which these principles of self-government and popular government, government according to the well-understood wishes of the people, have not yet been accorded to the citizens of that land; and I am sure that we shall do our duty as loyal subjects to Her Majesty, as promoting to the uttermost the peace and harmony and prosperity of her reign, if we express the opinion upon all suitable occasions that it would be a happy, a providential dispensation if the jubilee year of the Queen should see in all her vast dominions which are fitted for the application of constitutional government that principle of the government by the people, according to its well-understood wishes thoroughly applied. The hon. gentlemen have alluded, as the Speech has alluded, to the condition of the fishery question. Now, with reference to that question, the Government has, during the period which has elapsed since negotiations were opened, continuously invited abstention from discussion on the floor of this House, and I think that there never has been an occasion in which a question of such great and far-reaching consequence to a free people parliamentarily governed, has been prosecuted so long a time without parliamentary ventilation and discussion as this fishery question. I do not intend, in view of the statement in the Speech, to depart at this day from the course which, at the request of the hon. gentleman opposite, I chalked out for myself upon previous occasions. There was a time when I thought it right that we should speak. It was a time when action of a particular description ought, in our opinion, to have been taken, and, when the Government declined to take that action, we felt it our duty to invite the House to agree that that action should be taken; but since these negotiations have been going on, we have known little and we have said less. I am told—I have not had the good fortune of seeing them—that important state papers on this subject have been distributed in the Imperial Houses and in the Congress of the neighboring country. I see by the Speech that at length we are to have some too, but as they have been published to the people of the Empire through the proceedings in the Imperial Parliament, and as I believe they have been published to the people in the United States, to a large extent, through the proceedings in Congress, I trust the promise which is made in the Speech will be redeemed at the earliest possible day, and that the papers will be laid before us, not in manuscript but in printed form, which I have no doubt the Government, according to its duty, has taken order for, even before the commencement of the Session. The rule I have just stated for myself precludes me until these papers come down from considering whether it is fit to engage in a discussion of the situation. I confess to some regret at the very faint character of the language in which we are permitted to hope for an adjustment. I observe that all that is said is that negotiations are still in progress, and will, we may be permitted to hope, result in an arrangement honorable and satisfactory. That certainly is not a very great encouragement. I hope that the results will be even stronger—well, they could not be weaker—than the statement. Nor is that statement, faintly encouraging as it is, altogether without some drawback. In another portion of the Speech, we find that, expressly with a reference to the possibility of the interruption of intercourse, and that necessarily in view of possible retaliatory measures by the United States, we are called upon to make an appropriation for the construction of a Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and so the completion of the much-despised water stretches of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). Now, I said that the Speech itself contained a reference of a topic which indicated the importance of the removal of that blemish on the jubilee year of the Queen, to which I referred, and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), in the observation which he made, in many of which I am glad to be able heartily to concur, as to the conduct and character and temper of the United States, touched upon something which I think deserves the least word of supplement. He said, and I hope he was right in saying it, I believe he was right in saying it, that there was much dependence to be placed upon the common sense and just spirit of the people of the United States. But, Sir, I would wish to remind him and all of us, that independent altogether of the difficulty which is created by the local feeling and the special personal interests of the fishermen of the United States, and independent altogether of that general feeling of a disposition to assert a supposed national dignity, sometimes unnecessarily, on the part of a great power like the United States, there is always before us this, that the sore with reference to Ireland creates a body of public feeling in that country hostile not to Canada because it is Canada, but to Canada because it may be a means of humiliating and interfering with England; and, therefore, we have an additional reason for the hope which I ventured to express as earnestly entertained by one, and, I hope, by both sides of the House on this question. The hon. gentleman alluded to the additional step which we find has been for these many years designed for the promotion of trade and commerce. We have been going on since 1880 promoting our trade and commerce.

We have been told since the year 1880, Session after Session, not merely with that spirit of optimism which distinguishes speakers who move and second the address, but also with rather an extension of that spirit on the part of hon. gentlemen controlling the affairs of the country, and their supporters, that the extension and development of our trade and commerce were most satisfactory. Each year we heard the same story. But one hon. gentleman has told us that in view, once again, of possible difficulty with our neighbors, an extra effort is now required, and it seems that effort is to take the form of another department. I remember the last time when an increase in the number of the Cabinet Ministers was proposed in Parliament. It was in the fall of 1873, in the Session in the course of which you first made your appearance on the floors of this House. You had not an opportunity any more than myself of expressing an opinion upon that proposition. But circumstances, to which I hope the state of feeling and the harmony of the proceedings of to day would make it almost unmannerly to allude further, rendered that proposition the object of a premature death and of a silent burial. But at length, fourteen years later, it is revived. I hope that everything that can be done for the promotion of our trade and commerce will be done. I hope, however, that in promoting our trade and commerce it will be found possible to combine the accomplishment of that object which we have so much at heart, with the utilization of some of the existing light offices, so that we may not at the same time add still further to the taxes and the expenses of the Government. We have got a President of the Council, we have got a Secretary of State, whose official duties are very light, I think. I said official duties. There are other duties which I know the hon. gentleman who shakes his own head—and shakes his head for the hon. Secretary of State as well—performs, that are very onerous, very onerous, indeed, but I am not quite certain that the character of those duties is such as ought to induce this House to agree to the creation of a new Minister in order that the present Ministers may have more leisure to discharge those duties. Now, Sir, this appears to be the main proposition. We find some statements, more moderate than statements that I have seen on former occasions, with reference to the condition of the country, statements which we will be better able to analyze and discuss when we get the public documents which are awaiting us, and on which I need not trouble the House just now. You have also a reference to some proposed improvements, some small matters of administration, and very little else. It appears that it is intended, in so far as Government business is concerned, that we shall not have very much to trouble us this Session. I never read a Speech from the Throne which was less promising of good things. The only plum, in point of fact, that we are promised is a new Minister, who is not, I suppose to be a Plumb. But, Sir, as there is so little here, as we are met here very late, and as consequently we are all desirous of getting to the real business of the Session, I propose, as I said in opening, to follow the suggestions made some time ago on two other occasions by the First Minister and so admirably seconded, in fact, if not in words, by the mover and seconder of this Address, not further to protract my observations, in order that we may, as soon as we can, enter upon the duties which we were elected to perform.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite evident that we are a happy family, at all events to-day. Both sides are agreed, both sides are shaking hands, metaphorically, across the floor. The hon. gentleman has extended his favor to the Speech from the Throne, so far as to say that it was harmless. He joined with me—he could not help joining with me and with the House—in expressing himself favorably and eloquently as to the character of the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address. The whole House must feel that in the accession to their number of the two hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address to-day, the House has been strengthened, and we, on this side in particular, are proud and happy that those gentlemen are reckoned among their number. The hon. gentleman worthily compliments those two gentlemen; but he cannot check himself from making an unpleasant allusion, which was altogether uncalled for. Why, Mr. Speaker, we agree with the hon. gentleman who sits behind him, that in all cases respecting seats, the members, in all cases respecting the right to sit in this House, agree that there should be no politics, there should be no partisan feeling; that we should act in a judicial spirit, and yet the hon. gentleman has shown by his sneer, in reference to two young members of this House, the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), and the member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird), that he has prejudged both their cases. I would ask the hon. member who moved in the case of Queen's county—when this House adjourns and when he has a private and confidential conversation with his leader—to give him a warning that it would be just as well to avoid that kind of acrimony, and not so quickly show his partisanship and desire to fight the battle too strongly. The hon. gentleman, in his recollection of the past, speaks of fifty years ago, and reproves the seconder of this motion for speaking of those days as days of humiliation. Mr. Speaker, they were days of humiliation to all parties, because it is a great humiliation for a country to see, rightly or wrongly, the people of the same race, of the same country, and subjects of the same Government, flying at each other's throats. We were all humiliated in that regard. Thank God! those days have long past. Thank God! there is no longer that war of races. Thank God! we are all loyal subjects of Her Majesty. Thank God! we can all look back and respect those men who fought on one side or on the other, for we know that there was a feeling of right and of justice on both sides, that both sides of those who were drawn up in hostile array judged they were acting rightly and conscientiously. But those days of humiliation, those days of misery, those days of conflict are now gone, and we, as the hon. gentleman who has seconded the motion has truly said, can look back with philosophy upon those unhappy days and those wretched and miserable events. The hon. gentleman spoke with some good feeling, and very proper feeling, about one of the earliest exponents of political freedom and of the earliest advocates of responsible government, and mentioned the honored name of the Hon. Joseph Howe. But we can all remember how that honored statesman, when sinking in this House under the weight of disease, and of years of unhappy circumstances, was hounded and vilified by some of the hon. gentlemen who cheered the leader of the Opposition to-day when he paid that deserved compliment to the father of responsible government in the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman, referring to the fishery question, said there has been a great deal of reticence and but little ventilation of that great subject. Sir, there was but little opportunity for ventilation. The subject is well understood in this House; the subject is well understood in this country. The rights of Canada on that question were ventilated years and years ago, were understood years ago and were asserted years ago; and they were asserted in this House, asserted on the statute-book and by the protection of those lawful rights and interests along our maritime shores and coasts. The negotiations going on since must, of course, until something like a result is arrived at, be kept from the public eye. The result so far has been a series of negotiations, a series of interchange of views, and we are permitted to hope that the negotiations will result in an arrangement honorable to both nations, and fully protecting the legal rights and interests of the people of Canada. But in the present uncertainty of the negotiations, and more than all in the great uncertainty as to whether, if a result is arrived at between the two Governments, it will be sanctioned by the legislative bodies of the two countries, especially by the Congress of the United States, it would have been unwise in the advisers of the Crown to have used stronger language than has been inserted in the Speech. I quite agree in all that has been said respecting the progress and development of our trade and commerce; but I was not prepared for the sneer of the hon. gentleman as to one of the modes which have been adopted by the Government for the development of the trade and commerce of the country. The hon. gentleman says he hopes there are some other steps to be taken than making a new departure. The hon. gentleman must know that from year to year the different Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade of Canada have been representing to the different Governments of the country, have been petitioning and applying for the establishment of such a Department as is proposed, and for the appointment of a Minister specially charged with the interests of trade and the development of the commerce of the Dominion. I have evidence of this desire from every great city in Canada and from every great commercial body formed for the purpose of aiding in the development of trade, and in obedience to this universal cry the Government have resolved to establish a Department specially devoted to those subjects. I am proud to say in this House, I am proud to say it everywhere in Canada, that the establishment of a Bureau of Trade and Commerce is not the only evidence this Government has given of its desire and of its success in developing the trade and commerce of the country. I shall not enter into all the particulars to prove that, it is not necessary in this House. The majority of this House explained that fully to their various constituents before they became their representatives, and the voice of the country has declared it in unmistakable terms. The people supported the Government at the last election because it had been true to the material interests of the Dominion, because it had forwarded all those material interests; and if Canada enjoys at this moment a great degree of prosperity, if her commerce is in a flourishing state, if her people are happy and contented and are looking forward with great hope to the future, it is in a great measure due to the judicious steps and the persistency with which the Government has pursued that which is the one great object in a new country, the development of all its material and social interests. Mr. Speaker, I shall say no more just now. The hon. gentleman has stated that the bill of fare is rather meagre. I shall not go so far as my late revered friend, Sir George Cartier, who on one occasion said in this House that he would never be satisfied till the only measure brought down by the Government of the Day would be the Supply Bill. But in consequence of the general elections taking place in the beginning of the year, which could not be brought on earlier because the rolls under the new Franchise Act had not been completed in many parts of the country, and the premature hurrying on of the elections would have excluded very many of those to whom the Franchise Bill had given the right to vote, this House has met later in the spring than usual. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will be very glad indeed, considering that we have got a good body of laws on the statute book and have got them in such a form, revised as they are, that every man can understand them, will be gratified and satisfied at very little general legislation being undertaken this year. I am glad to see, Sir, that the amount of Private Bill legislation of every form to be introduced this Session for the purpose of advancing almost every industry in Canada, and assisting in the development of our material and physical resources, affords a strong evidence of the enterprise and prosperity of the country and of the feeling in Canada that we are in a prosperous condition, and that we are entering on a season of great development and material prosperity and progress.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows :—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Right Honorable Sir John A. Macdonald, G.C.B., President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, the Honorable Sir Hector Langevin, K.C.M.G., Minister of Public Works, the Honorable Sir Charles Tupper, G.C.M.G., O.B., Minister of Finance, and the Honorable Mr. Costigan, Minister of Inland Revenue, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purpose and under the provisions of the Act intitled; "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 14th April, 1887.

REPORTS.

Public Accounts of Canada for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

Annual Report of the Department of Marine for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Mr. Foster.)

Tables of Trade and Navigation for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Report of the Department of Militia and Defence for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Sir Adolphe Caron.)

Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ending 31st December, 1886.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Report of the Postmaster General for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Mr. McLelan.)

Report of the Department of Inland Revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not observe that the report of the Auditor General has been laid on the Table. I presume from the thinness of the volume presented by the Finance Minister, that the suggestion that has been made for some time past of avoiding much of the duplication of these tables has been acted upon, and that the real details are in the other report. Therefore it is the other report which we want but which we have not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has judged aright, and that accounts for the great thinness of the volume I have laid on the Table.

Mr. BLAKE. Too thin.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will not be considered too thin, I think, when it is supplemented by the report of the Auditor General, which will soon be laid on the Table.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely, meeting here on the 13th of April, we should have had that report long ago. My impression has been that many of these reports would be of great advantage to us, if, according to the custom of other countries, they were given to the public, or at least the substance of them, without waiting until they are nine months after date. But it is an extraordinary circumstance that on the 15th of April, the report of the Auditor General for transactions terminating on the 1st July previous, is not laid before us, and that the Minister of Finance cannot tell us when it will be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure the hon. gentleman will be quite satisfied when I tell him that the one reason why it is not laid on the Table, is that it may give him the information down to the latest possible period. I have no doubt that on Monday it will be laid on the Table.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 5:50.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 18th April, 1887.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on the 14th inst., reported lists.

Mr. BLAKE. There are a great many new members in the House, and I think the House should have an opportunity of seeing the selections made, so as to save trouble afterwards. There may be some changes required.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say it is understood among the members that I should not move the adoption of this report to day, and I find there are one or two mistakes which we will correct quietly to-morrow.

REPORTS.

Report of the Auditor-General on Appropriation Accounts, for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

Annual Report of the Minister of Public Works, for the fiscal year 1885-86, on the works under his control.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Annual Report of the Department of the Interior, for the year ending 1886.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES—LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DAVIN moved first reading of Bill (No. 2) to establish full representative government in the North-West Territories. He said: I hope the House will permit me to alter the title of the Bill. The title here is rather more descriptive of the Bill than I intended. The title is "An Act respecting Local Government in the North-West Territories."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. Some hon. gentlemen desire that I should explain. I do not know that there is anything to explain. I may say this, that we want complete representative government, but not full representative government.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the gross public debt of Canada on April 1st, 1887; also, the net public debt, April 1st, 1887?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The gross debt on the 31st March, 1887, was $270,340,146.80. The net debt on the same date was $225,865,831.09.

LIABILITIES FOR PUBLIC WORKS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the total amount of liabilities for subsidies to Railways and other purposes under existing Statutes?

Mr. POPE. I would ask my hon. friend to let that stand, as it will take a little time to get that up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be glad if the hon. Minister of Railways would call the attention of his Department to it, and get it in two or three days. These statements are all statutory, so there should not be much difficulty about them. I also beg to enquire of the Minister of Finance, or whatever other Minister it concerns, what is the estimated amount required to complete public works now in progress chargeable to capital?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The estimated amount required to complete public works now in progress chargeable to capital is $594,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is for the current year, I suppose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman wants the details I can give them now. There is $124,000 for Cape Tormentine, and then there are the other works; $300,000 for the new public buildings here, and the rest for smaller works.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that include the Welland Canal appropriation?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; that is not in my Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see that my question goes a good deal further. It refers to all public works now in progress chargeable to capital, which would include all the expenditure on canals, &c.

Mr. POPE. I will give that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you give it now?

Mr. POPE. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will understand that what I want to get at is a rough estimate of the sum total which it is expected to expend on the Welland Canal and on similar works of magnitude in which we are engaged.

Mr. POPE. It must be a rough estimate, especially in regard to the railways, because subsidies are granted and in a good many cases are expired or are not called for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If they are expired you can deduct it.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

NORTH-WEST LAND SALES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What sums have been received for the sale of lands in Manitoba and the North-West Territories during the ordinary year 1886? How much from the 1st January, 1887, to the 1st April, 1887?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The revenue received was for homesteads, pre-emptions and sales, $509,341.71; for leases, $136,618.29. The revenue from sales for the present year, from the 1st January to the 1st April, was for homesteads, pre-emptions and sales, $93,873.81, and for leases, &c., $26,179.66.

MANITOBA WHITE POPULATION.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the actual resident white population of Manitoba, according to the recent census?

Mr. CARLING. According to the recent census in Manitoba, the white population was 95,455.

BOURINOT'S PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to furnish to the new members of this House, copies of M. Bourinot's work on Parliamentary Procedure?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is not.

CLOTH SUPPLIED TO PENITENTIARIES.

Mr. BAKER asked, What is the contract price or prices per yard paid by the Government for white flannel and brown and yellow cloth supplied the Penitentiaries of the Dominion; the name or names of the contractor or contractors, duration of contract or contracts, and date and expiry of same?

Mr. THOMPSON. At Kingston Penitentiary the price paid for white flannel is 44½ cents per yard; brown and yellow cloth, 48 cents. Mr. John Lazier has two contracts which expire on the 30th June next. At the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, 40 cents per yard is paid for white flannel, and 50 cents for brown and yellow cloth. Lamallice Bros., Montreal, have the contract, which expires on the 30th June next. At the Dorchester Penitentiary the price paid for white flannel is 48 cents per yard, and for brown and yellow cloth 64 cents. Thomas R. Jones, St. John, has the contract, which expires on the 30th June next. At the British Columbia Penitentiary, cloth and flannel is not furnished by contract. The white flannel was furnished by Messrs. Lamallice Bros., the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary contractors, at 53 cents per yard. No brown or yellow cloth was furnished this year (fiscal year) to this penitentiary. In 1885-86 this cloth was supplied by the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary at 74½ cents per yard. It was furnished by the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary owing to the fact that the cloth was wanted in a hurry and before it could be procured by Lamallice Bros. At the Manitoba Penitentiary, 60 cents per yard is paid for white flannel and 44 cents for brown and yellow cloth. The Hudson Bay Company have the contract, which expires the 30th June next.

FLOODS ON THE RIDEAU RIVER.

Mr. EDWARDS asked, Have the Government taken any steps to enquire into the causes of the floods on the Rideau River, between the city of Ottawa and the Township of Gloucester, with a view of preventing a recurrence of the same. If not, is it the intention of the Government to direct the making of such an enquiry?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department was, last fall, directed to institute enquires into the causes of the flooding of the Rideau. A careful survey has been made, and notes have been taken respecting the breaking up of the ice, the area of the flooded district, &c., and a report will be furnished in a very short time.

REPRINTING BRITISH COPYRIGHT WORKS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay before this House this Session any measure of legislation for placing Canadian publishers upon the same footing as American publishers in regard to the reprinting of British copyright works, or whether it is proposed to invite this House to address Her Majesty upon the subject of modifying any Imperial legislation which is restrictive of the powers of the Canadian Parliament respecting copyright in Canada?

Mr. THOMPSON. The matter is still being considered.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

The Order being called for resolutions on the subject of the granting of a measure of Home Rule for Ireland—(Mr. Curran), Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend, seeing there are a good many members away, who desired to be present when this question comes up, to fix another and an early day for the discussion of this matter. I would suggest Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. CURRAN. Thursday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the said Resolutions be the first Order of the Day on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

FRANCHISE ACT—COSTS OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

A return giving the total cost of the preparation of the voters's list under the Electoral Franchise Act in Canada; together with a detailed statement of the cost in each electoral division for salaries of revising officer, clerk and bailiff, and travelling allowance to each, if any; giving also amount paid for printing lists, and showing to whom paid in each division; the amount paid for advertising, rent of halls, and for every other service connected therewith in each electoral division in the Dominion of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that he will find almost all the information asked for in this motion in the report of the Auditor General, which has just been laid upon the Table of the House and I would ask him to allow this motion to stand until he has examined that report, and then he may move for anything in addition he requires. The great bulk of the information will be found in that report.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I dare say that will be satisfactory. I hope that the information is given in detail, so that it will be in a convenient form—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And that we can get at it without much search and examination. It appears to be the order of the House that these papers stand, and I suppose I must follow the example. Coercion stands too.

Motion allowed to stand.

PRINTING OF THE VOTERS' LISTS.

The Order being called for notice of motion (Mr. Innes) respecting amounts paid for printing the voters' lists, and amounts paid to officials connected therewith,

Mr. INNES. As the design of this motion is similar to that of the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), which has just been allowed to stand, with the consent of the House I beg to withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE CHARGEABLE TO CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Return of the receipts and expenditure, in detail, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, from the 1st day of July, 1886, to the 1st day of April, 1887.

He said: By a clerical error the 1st April has been given for the 10th. What I want is what is usually known as the ten days statement. I also wish to add what seems to have been omitted in the printed notice, that I want the usual printed estimates of receipts and expenditure. The hon. Minister will understand that I want the ordinary ten days statement which is usually laid before us.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return in the form used in the statements usually published in the Gazette, of the exports and imports from the 1st day of July, 1886, to the 1st day of April, 1887, distinguishing the products of Canada and those of other countries.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return in detail showing the description and values of grain and animal products exported from the Dominion of Canada from 1st July, 1886, to 1st April, 1887.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 19th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

Report of the Department of Railways and Canals for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Mr. Pope.)

Report of the Minister of Justice as to Penitentiaries in Canada, for the year ending 30th June, 1886.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

LIABILITIES FOR PUBLIC WORKS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the hon. gentlemen ready now to give the information asked for by my motion yesterday: The total amount of liabilities for subsidies to railways and other purposes under existing Statutes? The estimated amount required to complete public works now in progress chargeable to capital?

Mr. POPE. I cannot give it very clearly or exactly, because a good deal of this depends on whether they go on with the work. We have assumed obligations, by entering into contracts, to the amount of $3,268,000.

Mr. BLAKE. That is the amount for which you have contracted, I understand?

Mr. POPE. Yes. Then there is besides that an annual subsidy of about $250,000. Then with respect to the canals, the amount required to complete works on canals now in progress will be about $2,000,000.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE PENSIONS.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session providing that members of the North-West Mounted Police shall, after certain terms of service, be entitled to pensions?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is under consideration.

NORTH-WEST EXPERIMENTAL FARMS.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish Experimental Farms in the North-West this year.

Mr. CARLING. The matter is under consideration.

WHARVES AT LONGUEUIL.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE asked, Whether the contract for the construction of the wharves at Longueuil, in the county of Chambly, for the building of which a sum of $10,000 was voted by this House during its last Session, has been awarded? If so, to whom; and why has the work not been, as yet, begun?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract for the wharves at Longueuil was given to Messrs. John Burns and A. Smith, whose tenders were the lowest. The work cannot be commenced until after the river is free from ice. It is to begin shortly.

FRANCHISE ACT—COST OF PREPARING VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved for:

A return giving the total cost of the preparation of the voters' lists under the Electoral Franchise Act in Canada; together with a detailed statement of the cost in each electoral division for salaries of revising officer, clerk and bailiff, and travelling allowance to each, if any; giving also amount paid for printing lists, and showing to whom paid in each division; the amount paid for advertising, rent of halls, and for every other service connected therewith in each electoral division in the Dominion of Canada.

He said: I have examined the report of the Auditor General this morning, and, finding that it does not contain the information I have asked for here, I shall be very much obliged to the Minister of Finance if he will consent to the motion passing, as we could then get the information much more fully and more conveniently than in the report of the Auditor General, which does not give the particulars in the different electoral divisions.

Mr. MILLS. Before the motion is put, I would like to say that it seems to me to require some amendment, in order that the House may get all the information they need. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, perhaps, may tell us whether the Government have decided what amount they propose to pay to these revising officers. If the Government have not yet decided what amount these officers are entitled to, it would be well for us to know what these gentlemen claim, so that we may have some idea what has been the actual cost of the preparation of the voters' lists. If the Government have determined what the amount should be, then they can say so; if they have not yet determined, I think the House ought to know what claim the revising officers are making in reference to compensation. We know that these gentlemen place some value upon their services, and it would be interesting to know what value they have so placed. Now, a return asked for by the motion of the hon. gentleman would not give us that information, and that information it is most desirable the House should possess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are two notices of enquiry on the paper for to-morrow, and I think the hon. gentleman had better let the matter stand as it is.

Motion agreed to.

SCRIP FOR SERVICES IN THE REBELLION.

Mr. DAVIN moved for:

A return of those, outside the regularly enrolled militia force, who have been recommended for scrip for services of whatever kind in the late rebellion, either as Volunteers, Home Guards, Scouts, or any other capacity.

He said: There are a few persons in the North-West—not very many—who are interested in the object I have in view in moving for this return, and which I propose briefly to explain to the House. If I confine my remarks to one portion of the class for whom I speak, I think the House will understand the necessity that exists for dealing with the question. It cannot involve much outlay, and it is very undesirable that there should linger any sense of grievance among even a small portion of the people of the North-West. On March 27th, 1885, Mr. D. L. Scott telegraphed to the Minister of Militia:

"Will you authorise enrolment of volunteer rifle or infantry corps, and direct equipments to be forwarded forthwith? Corps will be filled at once."

In answer to that a telegram arrived:

"Yes, authority is given to organize company at Regina. Arms and equipment on the way to Winnipeg."

On the 31st March, Mr. Scott wrote a letter to Lieut.-Col. Houghton, asking for the equipment of his force, and saying in that letter:

"I hope to be able to put them in a shape for active service by the time the arms and equipments reach here."

On 17th April, 1885, Mr. Scott again telegraphed to the Minister of Militia:

"Has my company been placed on active service? When will uniforms be forwarded?"

On the 18th April the following telegram arrived, in answer, from the Minister of Militia:—

"Yes, your company is authorized. Make requisition for equipments."

And later, from Lieut.-Col. Houghton, there came a letter to Mr. Scott telling him:

"Your service roll was duly received and forwarded to headquarters in October last."

Now, Sir, this company was duly organized under the provisions of the Militia Act. I have here, in the Canada Gazette of 11th April, 1885, a list of the companies duly enrolled, and I find the Regina company called for actual service. We have a battalion at Winnipeg, Manitoba, under command of Lieut.-Col. Osborne Smith, a battalion at Winnipeg, under command of Lieut.-Col. Scott, M.P., the company at Regina, Capt. David L. Scott, and I call the attention of the House particularly to this last—a company at Birtle, Capt. J. H. Wood. Well, the members of the company were duly enrolled under the provisions of that Act to serve as members of the Regina volunteer company for three years, and were duly sworn in as such. The service roll of the company is on file at this moment in the Militia Department here. The company's status as a volunteer company under the Act was afterwards recognised in the Militia General Orders, as may be seen by the Canada Gazette of 18th September, 1885, where, among the corps which were released from service and disbanded was the infantry company, Birtle, Captain Wood. The members of the company, we contend, are entitled to the bounty under Acts 48 and 49

Vic., chap. 73, because, although they were not in actual service, in actual conflict with the enemy, they were members of the enrolled volunteer force, and were actively engaged in bearing arms in the suppression of the rebellion. If it is contended that the company was a home guard within the meaning of the Act, 49 Vic., chap. 29, that Act is not a contracting but an enlarging Act, and is not intended to restrict or narrow the provisions of the former Act. The expressed intention, as may be seen by section 1, is to widen the scope of the original Act by extending its provisions to certain classes who would otherwise be excluded, as, for instance, the members of an irregular force. Now, if we turn to 49 Vic. we find in sub-section A, in clause 1:

"Every officer, non-commissioned officer and man of any irregular force raised by authority and actively engaged in bearing arms in the suppression of the said outbreak, other than as a home guard for the protection of property at or near their place of residence."

That clearly is intended to extend the provisions of the first Act and not to narrow them. But the Regina volunteer force is not within that section, by reason of the fact of having been duly organised and enrolled under the provisions of the Militia Act; it is not an irregular force, and the sub-section only excludes an irregular force serving as home guard. I call the attention of the House to the Birtle company. That company is found mentioned in the Canada Gazette of April 11. It is also found again in the Canada Gazette of September 18, side by side with the Regina company. But that company, the Birtle company, received the bounty, while the Regina company has not been able to obtain it. The last letter that passed between the Department and Col. Scott was a letter from the Deputy Minister, saying that bounty would not be given. Not only did the Birtle company get bounty, but—and this is the reason I have moved for these returns—it will be found that persons who did not really belong to the regular Militia got bounty, as, for instance, clerks and others engaged in the transport service. Under these circumstances I would urge on the Minister of Militia the necessity of dealing with this question in a comprehensive manner. The expense could not be much, and it is a very undesirable thing that for the sake of a small economy there should exist among any class of our population a sense of injustice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman has brought before the notice of the House, in the most complete manner possible, the question of how the scrip was distributed to those who took part in the suppression of the North-West troubles. The action of the Department of Militia is altogether controlled by the Acts on the Statute-book, which the hon. gentleman has correctly quoted. The first Act which was passed authorised the Minister of Militia to recommend the issue of scrip to members of the regularly enlisted militia force of Canada. By a subsequent Act, 49 Vic., chap. 29, this was extended, and to that list of those who were entitled to scrip were added others who in the first Act had not been provided for, in so far as related to receiving the scrip which was accorded to the regularly enlisted militia force. I am quite prepared to bring down, if the hon. gentleman requires it, and to give to the House and the hon. gentleman all possible information in connection with that question. But I must draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that a return of those who under the first Act were recommended to receive scrip would be a very extensive one, and one which would take a great deal of time in preparing. I do not see how, even if such a return were brought down, it would be of any value in conveying any more information than the Act itself conveys, coupled with a list of the regularly enlisted militia who took part in the suppression of the trouble. I think that if the hon. gentleman were to alter the motion so as to ask for a return of those outside of the regularly enlisted militia who were recommended to receive scrip, then all the information which the hon. gentleman requires could be conveyed without much expense or much loss of time. Of course it is quite impossible for the Department of Militia to travel outside of the Act under which the recommendation for scrip was granted. If it were considered that others should receive that consideration which was accorded to the regular militia force, then the law would have to be altered to cover those exceptional cases to which the hon. gentleman has drawn attention. Outside of the regularly enlisted militia we could not consider the claims of purely home guards, for the simple reason that the Minister of Militia was not authorised, under the Acts passed by Parliament, to consider such claims. However, if the hon. gentleman considers that the motion as proposed should be adopted, I will bring the return down as rapidly as possible, but I would ask him to consider whether it would not be better to amend the motion in the sense I have indicated, so that the names of those outside of regularly enlisted militia who were recommended for scrip should alone be brought down. If this course were followed all the information required would be conveyed without much labor and loss of time, and the hon. gentleman's object would be accomplished.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the suggestion of the hon. Minister is a good one, and will meet the point at which I want to arrive.

Mr. SPROULE. While this subject is under consideration I should like to say a word with respect to the Macdonald Scouts of Moose Jaw. Application was made last year and the previous year, or early and late last year, for the same recompense to be made them as had been made the regular militia. I understand the law would not allow those scouts to obtain that compensation, and to meet their case the law was amended last year. It was, however, subsequently found that it would still not meet their case, and they are now applicants for compensation. I hope, if any change is made in the law, it will be such as will enable those parties to be compensated equally with the active militia. They were engaged as police scouts, travelling all over the country and performing very important duties—duties almost as dangerous as those performed by the troops at Batoche, and those scouts are, therefore, entitled to the same consideration.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Last year I brought up a matter relating to volunteers who were called out and went to great expense in that connection. I refer to the volunteers of St. Andrew's and St. John. As some hon. gentlemen have spoken on behalf of some of the battalions in the west, I hope the Minister of Militia will reconsider his decision of last Session with regard to the cases of those men who, although they were not actually engaged in the conflict, or did not proceed very far on the way, were put to great expense and privation in preparing to do their duty.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the report of the committee appointed to strike the Select Standing Committees, be adopted.

He said: I did not happen to be in the House when the motions were put, and I desire to make a few changes in the composition of these committees. By a mistake of the clerk the name of my hon. friend from Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Shakespeare), was omitted altogether, whereas on the list as prepared his name was on several of the committees. I propose that Mr. Shakespeare shall replace Mr. Ives on the Public Accounts Committee; that the name of Mr. McDougall (Cape Breton) shall be placed on the Committee of Standing Orders; that of Mr. Montplaisir on the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; Mr. Wilson (Argenteuil) to replace Mr. Smith (South Ontario) on the Committee on Banking and Commerce; Mr. Smith (South Ontario) to replace Mr. Wilson (Argenteuil) on the Committee on Agriculture and Colonisation.

Mr. MILLS. I would also suggest the following changes: That the name of Mr. Edwards be substituted for that of Mr. Lister on the Committee for Miscellaneous Private Bills; that the names of Messrs. Langelier (Montmorency) and Turcote be substituted for those of Messrs. Innes and Livingston on the Committee on Standing Orders; that the name of Mr. Ellis be substituted for that of Mr. Trow on the Committee on Public Accounts; that the names of Messrs. Fiset, Flynn and Turcote be substituted for those of Messrs. Charlton, Innes and McMullen on the Committee on Banking and Commerce; and that the name of Mr. Innes be substituted for that of Mr. Turcote on the Committee on Agriculture and Colonisation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As I understand that it is necessary to move a separate motion in order that these amendments be made, I beg to move that the changes referred to by the right hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) be made.

Motion agreed to, the said committees being composed as follows:—

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 20th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock:

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

Report of Weights and Measures for 1886.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Report of the Department of Agriculture for the calendar year 1886.—(Mr. Carling.)

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: I find that on a previous occasion some of my hon. friends thought that I was not sufficiently lucid and lengthy, and I shall endeavor briefly to explain the nature of this amending Act. The first clause provides that:

"In addition to the cases already provided for by the said Act, any person claiming a patent for a homestead, or for a homestead and pre-emption, who has completed the three years' residence required by the said Act on or before the 1st day of July, 1886, shall be entitled thereto upon proving that he has erected upon his homestead a habitable dwelling, and that his family have bona fide resided therein and cultivated the homestead for six months of each of the three years as required by section 38 of the said Act."

That provision has reference to persons who came in and settled as bona fide settlers, but who found that, in consequence of the bad seasons we have had for the last two or three years, they could not remain upon their homesteads. They accordingly left their families to cultivate the homestead, and they themselves went to work in towns along the railway. This is merely a temporary provision; it arranges nothing whatever as to the future, and only does a measure of justice to persons who, through no fault of their own, have been placed in a difficult position. The next clause adds a rider to sub-clause 2 of section 43 of the Act of 1886. It provides that:

"Provided that any person who has gone into the North-West Territories at any date between 25th May, 1883, and 2nd June, 1885, shall be entitled to a second homestead, and may enter thereon on any day after he has received his recommendation for the patent."

That is only the merest measure of justice to the persons who will be affected by it. I apprehend it will be found that it was by mistake, rather than by design, that clause 37 of the Act of 1886, section 43, as it appears in the Revised Statutes, was inserted, cutting off, as it does, a number of persons from second homesteading, who were clearly entitled to it. For what happens is this: A is entitled to a second homestead, and gets his recommendation on June 2nd. He can obtain a second homestead. B is entitled to a second homestead, but he does not get his recommendation until one day afterwards, although he may have gone into the country before A, and yet B cannot get a second homestead. It is to provide for such cases that this clause of the amending Bill has been drafted. The other provision is that:

"The extent of a homestead grant shall be identical throughout the North-West Territories."

It is intended to provide that in what is called the Mile Belt or in Hudson's Bay sections, any man entering as a homesteader shall not only have 80 acres, but shall have 160 acres. I think that this clause could probably be covered by Order in Council, but there can be no harm in the House affirming the general principle. The next clause provides that:

"Every person who is entitled to a second homestead may elect to take the land for which he holds a pre-emption entry as a second homestead."

That change will be very acceptable to a large number of people in the North-West Territories, and it might be made to apply solely to persons who came into the territories up to say July, 1886, so as to not encourage persons coming in to make arrangements respecting 320 acres of homestead instead of 160. The last clause provides that:

"Squatters who have settled prior to surveys on what proved to be school sections, or Hudson's Bay sections, or odd sections, or any sections not thrown open for homesteading, shall not be disturbed and shall be entitled to enter for homestead or for homestead and pre-emption as if the land so squatted on had been open for homesteading, and the Governor in Council shall compensate, out of other lands, the parties entitled to the sections so squatted on."

I think that this Bill, if passed, will materially improve the legislation in respect of Dominion lands, and I hope the majority of the sections, if not all of them, will meet with the acceptance of the Minister of the Interior.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 4) to amend the Act 49 Vic., cap. 52, "To prevent seduction and like offences, and to make further provision for the protection of women and girls."—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 5) to amend the Act respecting Public Officers.—(Mr. McLellan.)

Bill (No. 6) to amend the Government Railways Act.—(Mr. Pope.)

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to establish a Department of Trade and Commerce. He said: This is a short Bill providing for the establishment of a Department of Trade and Commerce, and prescribing the duties which shall be performed by such Department. As a Bill will be brought down to provide for the reorganisation of some of the other Departments of the Government, I shall probably ask the House to discuss the whole reorganisation at the same time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TERRITORIES REAL PROPERTY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Territories Real Property Act. He said: This
Mr. DAVIN.

Bill would get rid of a difficulty which is found to exist in the working of the Act, especially in regard to the town sites. At present it is a most expensive process to transfer any property in the town sites, in consequence of the number of documents which have to be copied. Those documents are in the possession of the registrar, and the direction to him is to copy all documents for himself, whereas, I think, that under the circumstances, an arrangement whereby he be directed to make search and make a minute of the results of his search—he having the documents in his custody—would answer every purpose. Such a provision might be added as a rider to one of the clauses of the Torrens Act. I call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the fact that, in order to make the Act complete as an amending Act, it would be desirable that clauses should be introduced in it that could only come from the Government. For instance, the clause providing for an insurance fund seems to me to require too much. One-fifth might properly, I think, be changed to one-tenth, which would give an ample sum, and at the same time would not press too heavily on the people. There is one other thing provided for in this little Bill, and it is this: that an attorney in the North-West Territories may be appointed a registrar. As the Act stands at present there are, I believe, only two persons in the whole North-West Territories that could be appointed a registrar—Mr. D. L. Scott, of Regina, and myself. I do not believe that there is any other person who has been a sufficient length of time at the bar to enable him to be appointed. This is a difficulty which, I think, it is desirable to get rid of.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF HER MAJESTY.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to contribute: (1) by a grant of money; (2) by a military demonstration or review, towards the celebration, in the several capitals of the Provinces of the Dominion, of the fiftieth anniversary of Her Majesty's reign?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I have the honor to state that it is not the intention of the Government to contribute, by a grant of money, or by a military demonstration or review, towards the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the reign of Her Majesty in the several capitals of the Confederation; but authorisation will be given by the Government to any battalion or military corps whose desire it will be to take part in any demonstration which will take place for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the reign of Her Majesty.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—COMPLAINT AGAINST EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant an enquiry in the matter of the complaint made by François Côté, of the Parish of St. Thomas, against James Lavery and George Larchez, both of them employed on the Intercolonial Railway, in the Parish of St. Thomas, county of Montmagny; and if so, when? Who is to be the Commissioner to make the enquiry?

Mr. POPE. It is not the intention of the Government to issue a commission to enquire into this matter. Anything of this kind we shall enquire into through our own officers.

UNLAWFUL MANUFACTURE OF WHISKEY.

Mr. GUAY asked, Whether the Government have been informed that the manufacture of whiskey is being unlawfully carried on in the vicinity of St. Sauveur, Quebec, and whether they have taken any steps in consequence of that information; and if so, what steps?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not in the public interest that any reply should be given to this question.

WHARVES IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repair, during the present season, the wharf at West Point, Prince Edward Island?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention to do so during the present season.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take charge of the Cascumpec Wharf, Prince Edward Island, and to repair the same during the present season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention to take charge of that wharf, inasmuch as there is one not far from it which is under the charge of the Government.

WHARF AT ST. FRANÇOIS.

Mr. LANGELIER, Montmorency, asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to continue during the present year the works already initiated for the construction of a wharf in the Parish of St. François, in the Island of Orleans?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to give an affirmative answer to the hon. member to-day.

DOCUMENTS ON THE FISHERY QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay before the House the correspondence which has taken place in relation to the Fishery question, as well between the Canadian and British Governments, and between the British Government and the Government of the United States; and if so, when?

Mr. FOSTER. The correspondence referred to will be laid before the House on Friday, I hope—on Monday at the latest.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to lay before the House copies of instructions given to commanders of vessels for the protection of the Fisheries, as well during the past season as the present one; and if so, when?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention that copies of these instructions, issued as well during the past season as the present one, so far as given to date, shall be brought down, and form part of the correspondence referred to in the preceding question.

SEIZURE OF BRITISH VESSELS ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to lay before the House the correspondence in relation to the seizure of British vessels in Behring's Sea and other places on the Pacific coast by an armed United States vessel?

Mr. FOSTER. This correspondence is being prepared, and will be laid before the House at as early a day as possible.

SALARIES OF REVISING OFFICERS.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Has the salary of Revising Officers yet been fixed by Order in Council? If so, when, and at what figure?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The salary has not yet been fixed.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Have any sums of money been paid to Revising Officers in advance of their salaries on work performed by them? If so, what amount up to the present date?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would refer my hon. friend to the report of the Auditor General, page 1795, I think. To the 11th April the sum of $44,000 has been paid on account of the salaries of revising officers.

DISMISSAL OF ODIAS CARBONNEAU, EUDORE GAUMONT AND FIDÈLE PELLETIER.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation) moved for:

Copies of all papers, documents, &c., respecting the dismissal of Odias Carbonneau, Eudore Gaumont and Fidèle Pelletier, all three employed on the Intercolonial Railway: the first as telegraph operator at the Chaudière, County of Lévis, the second as a section man at St. Thomas, County of Montmagny, and the third as station master at Cap St. Ignace, County of Montmagny.

He said: In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to make a few remarks with regard to these three dismissals, as I would like to know the circumstances under which and the reasons why they were made. These dismissals were made under rather extraordinary circumstances, some of them within a few days, others within a few weeks after the polling day during the last elections. My attention was more especially called to them by the fact that the newspapers published a correspondence containing a letter from the hon. Minister of Public Works which contradicted, to a certain extent, a letter from the Minister of Railways which I have in my possession, and which was addressed to my opponent, Mr. Landry, some time before polling day. As regards Mr. Carbonneau, I will suppose for the moment that he was dismissed for cause. If he was dismissed for cause, then I ask what was the reason which caused him to be reinstated a few days before the votation during the last elections. A few details will give you a better idea of the long and short of these dismissals. In the first place, I see in Le Canadien of the 11th of April instant, under the signature of P. Landry, a correspondence mentioning a letter from Mr. McDonald dismissing Mr. Carbonneau, and bearing date the 31st of July, 1886, the reason stated in that letter being that he had absented himself from his office for a few hours and that he had previously been guilty of offences of the same nature. Later on, Mr. Speaker, on the 15th of November, 1886, I see a letter from Mr. Pottinger addressed to my opponent, Mr. Philippe Landry, and containing the following words:

"As regards O. Carbonneau, telegraph operator, concerning whom you wrote to me quite a while ago, it is impossible for me to do anything for him, for the simple reason that he was dismissed after a minute investigation of his case, referred to me by Mr. McDonald, and then by me to the Department. The neglect for which he was dismissed was not his first fault."

Now, on the 6th of December, 1886, I find a letter signed "Hector L. Langevin" which is, I suppose, the signature of the Hon. Minister of Public Works, in answer to Mr. Landry, and containing the following:—

"I have received your letter of the 2nd December transmitting to me the letter of Mr. O. Carbonneau, of Montmagny, and requesting me to interfere in order to have him reinstated. If I thought Mr. Carbonneau would stand any chance of being reinstated, I would speak about it to the Minister of Railways, but really I do not see any chance in that quarter. It is true there has been no accidents, but the operator was doubly at fault. He should not have left his post, or if he left it he should have made sure that somebody was left in his place.

"I do not like to suppose that the reason why he absented himself is not the reason given by him, but all appearances are against him, and I know that in a similar case the Minister of Railways refused to re-appoint the operator."

Here then, Mr. Speaker, are three letters dated before the elections, in 1886, stating that Mr. Carbonneau was dismissed for cause, that he was not a good operator, and refusing to re-appoint him. I presume that at that time there was no signs of general elections, for when it was thought that we should have general elections in January last, Mr. Carbonneau wrote to Mr. Landry, in my office, telling him that unless employment was found for him before polling day, he and his family, who gave, I believe, six votes, always on the Conservative side, would vote against Mr. Landry. Now, Mr. Landry transmitted this letter to the hon. Minister of Railways who, on the 27th of January, not long before the election, as will be seen, gave Mr. Landry the following answer:—

“As requested by your letter of the 8th instant, I have much pleasure in stating that upon enquiry of my chief officers, I find that Mr. Odias Carbonneau is considered to be a very fair telegraph operator, and I should be much pleased to hear of his obtaining suitable employment.”

Thus, Mr. Speaker, on the 27th of January last, the Department of Railways said that they were informed that Mr. Carbonneau was a good operator, that he was an excellent officer, although before the elections during the months of November and December last, Mr. Carbonneau was a bad operator, had been dismissed for cause and nothing could be done for him. Well, Mr. Speaker, for this change of opinion I see no reason, except political reasons on the 27th of January, 1887. But what do we see next? On the 10th of February, 1887, a few days after this letter was written, Mr. McDonald, the Superintendent of the Intercolonial, gave Mr. Carbonneau leave to go to Chaudière where he was employed by the Government, and naturally his vote and the votes of his family were given to the candidate of the Government. And what do we see next? After the election he was discharged, and the reason given for this dismissal is the following, which I find in Le Canadien of the 11th of April, 1887:—

“The Chief Superintendent has refused to ratify your appointment at Ohaudière Curve, and I am obliged to say your services are no longer required.”

Mr. Speaker, the elections were over, the Government had received his vote and the votes of his family relations, and his usefulness was gone. Well, I have yet to learn that the Intercolonial Railway, which is a public property, the property of the Government, should be turned into a political engine, and used on the eve of elections to create offices and to obtain votes. In the first place, this appointment was very extraordinary. One of two things: either Mr. Carbonneau was dismissed for cause, or he was dismissed without cause. If he was dismissed for cause, it was exceedingly dangerous to re-appoint this man, who was not a good employé, who had already failed to do his duty on a previous occasion, for this incompetent officer might have been the cause of collisions, might have been the cause of endangering the lives of passengers. Consequently, he should not have been re-appointed, if he was not a good officer. On the other hand, if he was dismissed without cause after the elections, the Government were still wrong, because they had simply done an act of justice in re-appointing him, for I find his rehabilitation in the letter from the Minister of Railways, and I say the Government have wronged this man by dismissing him after securing his support and that of his family. Consequently, I desire to have all the papers and documents which are in the possession of the Department, in order to see whether, in the first place, this appointment was a political appointment, and, secondly, whether his dismissal was a political dismissal and was contrary to justice. As regards the case of Mr. Pelletier, I do not know the reason of his dismissal; but the reason given was the following: It is that that gentleman, who has not even the right to vote, has the misfortune of belonging to an essentially Liberal family. I desire that the documents concerning him should also be brought before the House. The dismissal of Mr. Gaumont is equally extraordinary. This man has always been a friend to the Government; he had always supported my opponent until the last contest which took place in that county. He understood then, I suppose, that it was in the interest of the country that he should alter his opinion, and he expressed his opinion against the candidate of the Government. He was threatened at once and was told that if he persisted in his determination he would be dismissed. In spite of that, Mr. Speaker, he voted against the Government. In order to find a reason to dismiss him, the revising officer, with the foreman of the St. Thomas section, called upon Mr. Gaumont and asked him to go and see some of his political friends in order to obtain from them declarations to the effect that they might have received money for their votes. Mr. Gaumont answered that he was neither a traitor nor a spy, and he refused to stoop to the low work which he was asked to do. Two days after the voting there was a report of insubordination against him and he was dismissed. Well, Mr. Speaker, I again ask whether the Intercolonial Railway is a political engine, or if it ought to be managed according to justice and in the interests of the public? I move that these papers be brought down, and when they are before the House we will be enabled to see what were the reasons which have brought about these dismissals, which, at the present, certainly appear unjust and arbitrary.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. gentleman that it would probably have been better for him to have waited until the papers were brought before the House before discussing the question. The papers not being before the House, it is impossible to appreciate the position in which were placed the three individuals whose names were given by the hon. gentleman in his motion. Consequently I will not now discuss the question whether any one of these gentlemen has been dismissed without sufficient cause, and I am satisfied that the House will withhold their judgment on this question until the papers are laid on the Table. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that we have no objection to bring down these papers and they will be laid before the House as soon as copied.

FOREIGN REPRINTS.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Statement showing all sums collected since 1st October, 1868, under the provisions of Statutes and Orders in Council in that behalf, as duty on foreign reprints of British copyright works, giving the amounts so collected upon each copyright work, and showing the amounts remitted in each year to the Imperial Government for payment out to those beneficially interested in the copyright of such works.

He said: As I was informed the other day by the hon. the Minister of Justice, in reply to a question I put in the House, that the question of legislation on the subject of copyright laws was still under the consideration of the Government, I think it but right to try and get, for the information of the House, all the papers I can upon that important question. There is no doubt that a great boon was conferred upon the Canadian public—or, at least, the Canadian reading public—when the Imperial Government arranged some years ago that American or foreign reprints could be introduced and sold in Canada upon paying an author's tax of 12½ per cent. ad valorem. I am very much afraid that the authors have not appreciated that to a large extent, and have received, so far, very little recompense from the large number of American reprints of British copyright works that come into Canada every year. I am sure that nobody advocates, and that the people would not tolerate, any proposal to do away with the right of introducing into Canada reprints of English copyright works, but I am sure that no interest would suffer if the Canadian publishers were put upon the same footing as American publishers in the publishing and selling of English copyright works. It seems an extraordinary anomaly that the law should stand as it has for so many years, and that Canadian publishers cannot publish in Canada what Americans can publish and send to Canada to be sold here. If the law should be altered, as I hope it will be this Session, so as to make the change I suggest, it would be greatly in the interest of the Canadian public and of the Canadian publishers. The former would have competition with the American reprints, and the latter the opportunity of doing a very large business which they are now debarred from doing. It would also be very advantageous to the English authors, who would get more of the author's tax than they are now getting for their works.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to the adoption of the motion. I may point out that some of the information it is impossible for us to give. We can bring down the amount collected upon these copyrights, and the amount transmitted to the Imperial Government to be paid to the different authors, but there are no records in the Department to show the names of the works, or of the authors of the works, upon which these duties have been paid. The practice in the past has been that each port makes a return to the Department of the amount collected, with the names of the works upon which it has been collected, and these returns are, with the amount collected, transmitted to the Imperial Government. Such information as we can give, we will bring down as early as possible.

Motion agreed to.

TEA FROM CHINA AND JAPAN.

Mr. BOWMAN moved for :

Return of the quantity and value of tea imported from China and Japan, and entered at ports or outports of British Columbia, either for home consumption or in transit, from the 1st July, 1885, to the 1st April, 1887.

Mr. BOWELL. A portion of the information asked for by this motion it is impossible to furnish to the House. There is no record of the quantity of tea which passes in transit through the country. The other information will be brought down. Cars containing goods passing through the country, upon most occasions, are simply manifested as merchandise; a car may, therefore, be filled with a variety of articles which are simply passing through, of which no record is kept. I make this explanation merely to show why the record of all articles passing in transit through the Dominion cannot be kept in the Department.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—ELECTION RETURNS.

Mr. MILLS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring to the attention of the House a matter of privilege of which I think it is not necessary that I should give any notice, because I believe it is always in order to bring under the attention of Parliament a question affecting the constitution of the Parliament itself or anything affecting the privileges of this House, or of members of this House. I think it is only necessary to look at what has transpired during the recent elections to see that the privileges of the House have been invaded by some of the officers who have been appointed by the Government as returning officers, or by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, either at the instance of the Government or upon their own motion. It is clear that we are having revived again, in a new form, difficulties and abuses that we supposed had been corrected by legislation in former years. There is no principle better settled in the United Kingdom than this: that it is a breach of duty on the part of any Minister of the Crown to interfere with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in the discharge of his duties in the issue of the writs.

When the Crown dissolves Parliament, and an appeal is made to the country, the duties of the advisers of the Crown are in that respect at an end, and the issue of the writs is solely under the control of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, without any interference on the part of the Government or any member of the Government. It was found necessary in this country a few years ago, in order to put an end to the abuses—to the undue influence, which was being exercised by the Government upon the people in holding a general election—to adopt the law of simultaneous elections. If Ministers in this country had acted as they do in England, if they had refrained from exercising an improper interference with a public officer in the discharge of his duties, legislation upon that subject would have been altogether unnecessary. But those of us who remember the elections of 1867, and again in 1872, know how those elections were extended over several weeks, how the elections in those constituencies that were thought to be most favorable for the Government were brought on first, how the writs were issued to the parties authorised to hold elections in those constituencies before they were issued in cases where it was supposed the popular sentiment was less favorable to the Administration. Now, that abuse was terminated by the adoption of the law of simultaneous elections. The power improperly to interfere in such matters was taken away from the Administration; but we find, either by the improper influence of the Government, or by a notorious dereliction of duty on the part of public officers, either in the constituencies or at the Capital, that other abuses, scarcely less serious than those intended to be remedied by that Act, are again perpetrated. We know that the hon. gentlemen who are now on the Treasury benches repealed the law which gave to this country, to some extent, the protection which exists in the United Kingdom. The officers under whom elections are held in the United Kingdom are not named by the Administration. Anciently, the mayors of boroughs and towns were the parties to whom the writs were sent, and the sheriffs to whom the writs were sent in the shires were not appointed by the Administration; and to-day the parties are designated by law to whom the writs are issued, and under whose direction the elections are held. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman repealed, or, through his influence, Parliament repealed, the law which designated certain officers as the parties by whom elections were to be held, and he has taken into his own hands their appointment. If there ever was a case where it was necessary that great care should be exercised, it was in the case when the Government undertook to assume an authority which might give it an undue influence, or power to exercise an undue authority, in the appointment of those officers. So far as I remember, there were no abuses existing in this country under the elections held by official appointees. In 1878, so far as I am aware, there was not a single complaint with regard to irregular elections. In the elections that have been held where the writs have been sent to the sheriffs and to registrars, no complaint has been made. These officers are responsible to the public; they have other responsible duties to discharge besides those with which they are entrusted in holding elections. They are men who are trained, in some degree, to the discharge of official duties; they are not liable to fall into the mistakes or to commit the blunders that are committed by men who are appointed for particular purposes, without any official experience, who are drawn from obscurity for the discharge of those duties which the Government imposes on them, and who go back into private life the moment the elections are over, to disappear as officials. Well, Sir, the Government has appointed, in many cases, extreme partisans for the purpose of holding the elections—men who were only known for their connection with the Tory party, men who held offices as members of political organisations, and whose partisanship was the only thing to recommend them to the Government for appointment to those particular places. Now, Sir, we know that grave irregularities have occurred; we know that serious abuses have been committed; we know that the law has been scandalously, flagrantly, violated by many of these parties in the discharge of their official duties. But the mistakes and wrongs that have been done, and the illegal practices, are all on one side. The offences that have been committed, were committed in favor of the Administration and against those on this side of the House. It would be impossible to instance a case where the rights and privileges of Parliament have been more grossly violated than in many instances connected with these elections. One would have supposed that the scandalous conduct of some returning officers in the elections of 1882 would have warned the Government against the wrong they would commit in persisting in the course which they had then marked out. But, Sir, we find the same course has been persisted in, the same abuses are continued; the same mistakes in the interests of the Administration that were committed before are repeated again. We find that the returning officers in many cases are simply political janissaries who were employed by the Administration to strangle those who were supposed to be opposed to the Government. In fact, the process of strangulation is carried on in the interest of the Administration to a sufficient extent to give the Government a certain amount of security, and the hon. gentlemen, perhaps, occupy at present their seats on the Treasury benches rather more owing to the abuses that have been committed in carrying on the elections, than to any confidence that the public at large may have in them. Now, I hold in my hand, so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, the dates when certain members of this House were gazetted. We know that by the Act relating to contested elections, section 9, the electors have thirty days after the gazettement of a member to contest his election, if they think proper. Now, what do we find? Why, we find these gentlemen making haste to be gazetted. We find the names of members on the Reform side of the House withheld. Why, Sir, if there were gentlemen on both sides of the House mingled together, in this long protraction of the gazettement of members, we might suppose that it had no political significance. But we know right well when we find that, in the first instance, members on that side of the House are exclusively gazetted, and members on this side of the House are excluded from the Gazette, that it is done for a purpose, and it is the duty of this House to enquire into the irregularities of the proceedings in this particular. Sir, I find that on the 5th of March there were gazetted: West Hastings, Alexander Robertson, Tory; West York, N. C. Wallace, Tory; North Renfrew, Robert Campbell, Reformer; Frontenac, G. A. Kirkpatrick, Tory; Hamilton, Adam Brown, Tory; Alex. McKay, Tory; Ottawa, W. G. Perley, Tory; H. Robillard, Tory; Kingston, Sir John A. Macdonald, Tory. So on 5th March there were gazetted eight Tories and one Liberal. Then on 12th March: South Simcoe, R. Tyrwhitt, Tory; West Northumberland, Geo. Guillet, Tory; Welland, J. Ferguson, Tory; Carleton, Sir John A. Macdonald, Tory;—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I am not a Tory.

Middlesex, W. F. Roome, Tory; North Lanark, J. Jamieson, Tory; West Durham, Edward Blake, Reformer; Dundas, C. E. Hickey, Tory; East Middlesex, J. H. Marshall, Tory; North Essex, J. C. Patterson, Tory; North Ontario, Frank Madill, Tory; South Ontario, Wm. Smith, Tory; West Lambton, J. F. Lister, Reformer; East Lambton, George Moncrieff, Tory; North Simcoe, D. McCarthy, Tory; Brockville, J. F. Wood, Tory; Cardwell, Thomas White, Tory; Peel, W. A. McCulla, Tory; West Bruce, Edward Blake, Reformer. So on 12th March there were twenty-eight Tories and five Reformers gazetted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Too many.

Mr. MILLS. On 19th March there were gazetted: North Perth, S. R. Hesson, Tory; North Grey, James Masson, Tory; Lennox, N. Wilson, Tory; East Hastings, S. B. Burdett, Reformer; West Toronto, F. C. Denison, Tory; South Victoria, D. Hudspeth, Tory; East Durham, H. A. Ward, Tory; North York, Wm. Mulock, Reformer; Addington, John W. Bell, Tory; South Waterloo, James Livingston, Reformer; Monck, A. Boyle, Tory; South Leeds, George Taylor, Tory; South Norfolk, D. Tisdale, Tory; East Toronto, John Small, Tory; North Hastings, Mackenzie Bowell, Tory; East Grey, Thomas Sproule, Tory; Haldimand, W. H. Montague, Tory;—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. I observe that hon. gentlemen opposite are delighted with that name. I regard that case as another instance of breach of privilege, and there will be another opportunity of considering the propriety of that return. So there were on 19th March fourteen Tories and three Reformers gazetted. On 26th March the following were gazetted: East Simcoe, H. H. Cook, Reformer; Russell, W. C. Edwards, Reformer; North Leeds, C. F. Ferguson, Tory; Glengarry, P. Purcell, Reformer; North Waterloo, J. E. Bowman, Reformer; West Ontario, J. D. Edgar, Reformer; South Perth, James Trow, Reformer; North Wentworth, Thomas Bain, Reformer; Halton, John Waldie, Reformer; South Oxford, Sir Richard Cartwright, Reformer; South Grey, George Landerkin, Reformer; North Brant, James Somerville, Reformer; South Huron, J. McMillan, Reformer; North Norfolk, J. Charlton, Reformer; South Wellington, J. Innes, Reformer; South Middlesex, James Armstrong, Reformer; Prescott, S. Labrosse, Reformer; Centre Wellington, A. Semple, Reformer; West Elgin, G. E. Casey, Reformer; West Peterborough, James Stevenson, Tory. So there were two Tories and eighteen Reformers gazetted on the 26th March. On 2nd April there were gazetted: North Wellington, J. McMullen, Reformer; East Peterborough, John Lang, Reformer; Kent, A. Campbell, Reformer; South Essex, James Brien, Reformer; Bothwell, D. Mills, Reformer; Muskoka, W. E. O'Brien, Tory; East Huron, P. Macdonald, Reformer. So there were six Reformers and one Tory gazetted on that day. On 9th April there were gazetted: for East Elgin, J. H. Wilson, Reformer; East Northumberland, A. E. Mallory, Reformer; East York, A. Mackenzie, Reformer; Prince Edward, J. M. Platt, Reformer; South Brant, W. Paterson, Reformer; Algoma, S. J. Dawson, Tory; East Bruce, H. Cargill, Tory. This was the second time Mr. Cargill had been elected. So, although the hon. member for East York, Mr. Mackenzie, was elected on the same day as Mr. Cargill, he was not gazetted until Mr. Cargill had resigned his seat, been appointed to an office, vacated his seat, if he held the seat, and ran a second election, if he was entitled to run again, and again elected. I find in my own case that the returning officer made a return in my election in Bothwell, on 8th March, and I was not gazetted until twenty-five days afterwards. In Kent the sheriff of the county returned Mr. Campbell as the member-elect on 9th March, but he was not gazetted until 2nd April. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) informs me that he was returned by the returning officer on 4th March, but he was not gazetted until 26th March. I think the conduct of some parties connected with the elections was so highly irregular, so partisan like, and so utterly inconsistent with everything like equality in election contests, that it is most desirable the House should enquire into the conduct of the various persons connected with the elections; and with this object I beg to move:

That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery be ordered to attend at the Table of the House forthwith with all the papers necessary to show in each electoral district the date of the return made to the writ by the returning officer in such electoral district, the date at which such return reached his office, the date at which such return was gazetted, and all correspondence between himself and returning officers in reference to the said returns.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says that this being a matter of privilege he can bring it up without notice. Well, perhaps he can, but, at the same time, he ought to have given notice. The rule, as generally used, is applied to matters of privilege which are of urgency—to matters which require the immediate action of the House. I do not think that there is any urgency in this matter, and, therefore, I think the hon. gentleman ought to have followed the usual practice and given the usual notice, because I do not think any man has been deprived of his seat in this House by any action, or want of action, on the part of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. We are all here, I think, in our seats in this House; if there has been any irregularity it can be brought before this House—if it comes within the competency of this House—or it can be rectified through other tribunals, if they are the proper tribunals, and the persons can be punished, so that I think the hon. gentleman ought to have given notice. The hon. gentleman is not in a very good temper. He has been abusing the returning officers, the revising officers, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the Government, and everybody else. Well, I am not surprised at his being a little out of temper, because if there ever was a disappointed body of men in the world, if there ever was a body of men who thought they had got us at last, a body of men who were deceived as to the feeling of the public with regard to them, it is hon. gentlemen opposite; and I take it that no one of them was more disappointed at being relegated for—I do not say how many years—to the cool atmosphere which he is now occupying, it is my hon. friend from Bothwell. And so it was necessary to abuse everybody. As I have said before on one occasion, when the sailor is tied up to the gangway and is receiving the lash, he is allowed to use what language he likes to the captain. He can abuse him as much as he likes in consideration of his taking the lash. The hon. gentleman is not taking the lash here, but he took it with his political friends at the hands of that potent master—the great electorate of the Dominion of Canada. The returning officers, the hon. gentleman says, are partisans. Well, they are partisan because they returned us on this side; the revising officers have hounded the lists, because there was not a strong enough body in the various lists in the Dominion of Canada to change the minority of last Parliament into a majority in this Parliament. Therefore, we can quite understand the attacks and the want of the usual amenity of the hon. gentleman, in his speech on this occasion. But the hon. gentleman says there was a great abuse in our altering the law; that before the law was altered the sheriffs and registrars were the officials, that they were responsible men, holding high offices, and that, therefore, they were the right men to be returning officers. Well, they were responsible men, certainly, but not responsible to this House, nor to the Government of the Dominion. He states that in England the sheriffs were usually returning officers, and that they were not appointed by the Crown. Yes; but they were not appointed by any hostile bodies—hostile to the Government of the day. They were picked in the usual way by the old and well-known process—the sheriff of the county was selected and he and certain other persons were the returning officers. The hon. gentleman says that before the alteration was made there was no complaint. I deny that altogether. I say that when the sheriffs and registrars were the returning officers, responsible to the Provincial Governments, there was no security for any member—I do not care on which side—if the Provincial Government happened to be of opposite politics to a particular candidate. I have no hesitation to say that there has been a most hostile spirit shown, especially in the Province of Ontario, and I believe also in the Province of Nova Scotia—a most hostile spirit to the Government, who are Her Majesty's advisers, sitting on this side. I say it has always been so, and never more so than during the late elections. I say that the hostility of the Provincial Governments was marked, that every individual composing the Provincial Governments worked as he never worked before, in order to defeat the Administration. I say that it was as much as the office of either a registrar or a sheriff was worth in the Province of Ontario if, being a returning officer, the incumbent of that office dared to be impartial. I say that the most open threats were made by every member of the Administration in the Province of Ontario against their officials—that they were threatened openly and boldly, if they did not work locally for the Provincial Government, and, in the Dominion elections, against the Conservative party. It was notorious that it was so, from the Premier down to the bailiffs of the Division Courts and the license inspectors and commissioners. I know how that was—that a Conservative licensed victualler could not get his license, or was threatened with the loss of it, unless he voted against the present Government. It was a matter of self-protection that we altered the law and took away from the hostile Provincial Governments the right of selecting the returning officer who was of necessity, for fear of losing his office, bound to act against us. If we appointed the returning officers, it was from the necessity of the case. The Dominion Government are responsible to Parliament for the propriety of their appointments of returning officers, as of all other officers; but the Dominion Parliament have no control whatever over the provincial officers, who have acted with such glaring impropriety that no defence for them could possibly be offered. I say, also, that the returning officers in the last elections were a body of respectable men. I believe they have performed their duties impartially, and if they have not performed those duties there is a recognised tribunal fixed by law to punish them and to report to this House the misconduct of any returning officer—aye, and of any revising officer—who has committed any breach of his duty. If the hon. gentleman will alter the word “forthwith” to “to-morrow,” I have no objection to bringing down the papers. I have only this to say, that I do not see what difference it makes whether an hon. member is gazetted first or last.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see any difference.

Mr. MILLS. How came the hon. gentleman and all his colleagues to be gazetted first?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No matter whether it is first or last, the parties opposed to the return had thirty days to petition against the member, and if he is last in the Gazette there are still those thirty days. The hon. gentleman says I was gazetted early. I was gazetted first, I think, for Carleton—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, for Kingston.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I have a petition against me there. I was not in any way protected by being early in the Gazette; here I am to stand my trial, and so it will be with the last gentleman in the list. And so it will be with the last gentleman in the last Gazette; he will have his thirty days of anxiety. I suppose the only difference is that my anxious thirty days are over, and the others' are only beginning. However, I have not the slightest objection that all these papers should be brought down to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hastings). As my name was the first mentioned by the hon. member for Bothwell as having been returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, I wish to say that the returning officer of my riding is the registrar, a Reformer.

Mr. JONES. The hon. member who made this motion alluded to the Province from which he comes—the Province of Ontario. The right hon. leader of the Government, in the course of his observations, thought proper to refer to the hostility that he assumed was shown towards the General Government, not only by the Local Government, but by the officials under their control, in the Province of Nova Scotia. The right hon. gentleman must have a very short memory. Does he not remember that only last summer, while the Local elections were in progress in that Province, we had a visit from the hon. Minister of Marine, the hon. Minister of Finance of that day, and the hon. Minister of the Interior, who held public meetings throughout the Province, and what for?—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The elections were over long before.

Mr. JONES—They were there to endeavor to persuade the electors of Nova Scotia to vote against the Liberal Government of Nova Scotia; but, despite all their efforts, that Government was triumphantly sustained on that occasion. Therefore, when the right hon. gentleman says that the Administration were indebted to the Local Administration of Nova Scotia for their hostility, we can point to that occasion; and we can go further back, because there has scarcely ever been a Local election in the Province of Nova Scotia, but we have been favored with visits from members of the Dominion Ministry. The right hon. gentleman said they also had the open hostility of the returning officers. On that point, so far as my own county is concerned, I beg most respectfully to differ from him. In the county of Halifax, in the Local election, the sheriff, who was returning officer by virtue of his office, appointed one-half of the deputy returning officers from the Tory side of politics; and so fair was his conduct on that occasion, that when the Dominion elections came on last year, the General Government thought they could not place the election in fairer hands, and they sought to make a bargain with him. They sent down and said to him: "If you will give us one-half of the deputy returning officers in the county of Halifax, and submit a list of the Liberal deputy returning officers to a number of our friends, we will make you returning officer for the county of Halifax." The sheriff said that while he was a friend of ours, he purposed to carry out the law fairly, and he would give them one half of the deputy returning officers, but he would not submit the names of the Liberal deputy returning officers to them for their approval. Under these circumstances the election was conducted there; and that case goes to show that the contention of the right hon. gentleman is not borne out by the fact. But the subject my hon. friend has brought to the notice of the House was more strongly exemplified in the Province from which I come than possibly in any other part of this Dominion. The Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General, and Minister of Justice, I believe, had their elections at the same time as myself and all the other candidates in Nova Scotia; but, Sir, they had the good fortune to have sympathisers either in the returning officers or in some of the officials here—which I leave to be decided when the papers are brought before the House. Their elections were gazetted on the 12th of March. The certificate of my election was sent from Halifax on the 4th of March, and I was not gazetted until fifteen days afterwards. Now, everybody must admit, that the circumstances hardly justified those hon. gentlemen in being gazetted so early. The elections were held on the 22nd of February, the declaration is usually filed six days subsequently, and the ballots are required to be kept four days longer in the event of recount being demanded; so that it was barely possible for those hon. gentlemen to be returned before that time. But it is easy to understand why they were gazetted so early; because their friends supposed they would have that much advantage over the other members, some of whom were not gazetted until the 2nd of April. They would have all that length of time to look over the field of action, and decide what course they would adopt. Therefore, I think the motion of my hon. friend is a very proper one. That a grave liberty has been taken with this House is evident. That the returns have been kept back cannot be denied, for the Gazette proves that hon. gentlemen who happened to be on the Government side of the House were gazetted far in advance of those who happened to be in Opposition. Such a state of things is simply unbearable. The hon. gentleman boasts of having been returned to the Treasury benches again. Well, perhaps, that may form the subject of debate at a later stage of the Session. Perhaps it would not be in order to-day to refer to the various causes which have contributed to the success of the hon. gentleman and his friends; but from the influences that were brought to bear in the Province of Nova Scotia, and which we shall expose before the Session is over, the public will be able to see whether the honest opinion of this country was fairly expressed, or whether their return was not secured by means which all honest electors in this country should condemn.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. member for Halifax speaks of gentlemen on this side of the House having very short memories. I am afraid my hon. friend's recollection is slightly confused, owing, no doubt, to the excitement under which he seems to labor in consequence of the petitions to which he referred having been filed in some of the counties of Nova Scotia, notably in the county of Halifax. Now, I may point out to him and the House as well, that this supposed interference of the three Ministers with the provincial interests of Nova Scotia and the Government of that Province happened, strange to say, long after the so-called victory for repeal in June last. I should say my hon. friend ought to have recollected that fact, because, before they came to that Province—

Mr. JONES. Did not the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Justice speak in Halifax previous to the Local elections?

Mr. TUPPER. My hon. friend cannot get away in that manner. I speak of the reference to the visit of the three Ministers whom he named, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Foster), the Minister of Interior (Mr. White), and the late hon. Minister of Finance (Hon. A. W. McLellan), and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman well recollects their visit and its consequences. Before their visit, the city of Halifax, by a large majority, voted confidence in the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) and the party with which he is identified; while, after their visit, the city of Halifax repudiated the hon. gentleman and showed by their votes that, on second thoughts, they believed the views of the three Ministers to be sound, and those of the hon. gentleman and his friends to be unsound and unworthy of trust. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Local Government is childlike and bland in all these Dominion elections, that these elections would be fairly carried out under the direction and management of officials acting under its orders. Let me point out a strong evidence to the contrary, in which the facts are already transpiring on the floor of the Local House. So excited are the friends of the hon. gentleman from Halifax in the Local House of Nova Scotia over the recent victory of this Government in that Province, that, not content with having disfranchised many Dominion officials, they have introduced a Bill, and have succeeded in carrying it through nearly all its important stages, disfranchising, in connection with municipal elections, all Dominion officials and preventing them exercising any municipal rights. That is an evidence of the friendship and impartiality of the Local Government of Nova Scotia, and by it we can judge of the way in which they would be inclined to carry out the law in reference to Dominion elections. Further than that, a short time before the Local elections in Nova Scotia in June last, the hon. gentleman's liberal-minded friends took from the judges the power they previously had in regulating the appointment of sheriffs and assumed that power to themselves. They appointed their most bitter partisans, and at present their friends in some parts of the Province are quarrelling over the distribution of that patronage. The hon. gentleman has not quite fairly stated this question, as it affects the administration of the election law in the Province of Nova Scotia, and I think the people in that Province will be rather surprised to hear that there is no necessity for this House to guard against an attempt on the part of the Local Administration of Nova Scotia to interfere, and improperly interfere, in the elections for the Dominion House of Commons.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. the leader of the House was good enough to tell us that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was out of temper because he was disappointed as to the attitude of public opinion towards the party of which we form a part, and that for the same reason we all appear to be out of temper; and he gave us the liberty of being out of temper, because we were so badly beaten. Now, if we were to judge from the tone of the hon. member for Bothwell and that of the right hon. the leader of the House, if we are to judge by the temper expressed in the two speeches, we must come to the conclusion, did we not know which side has the majority, that the gentleman who felt himself in the minority must be the right hon. gentleman, since his speech was the worse tempered of the two. He launched out in a most unmeasured strain against the officials of the Local Government; he said they were all men hostile to the Dominion Government, and therefore not to be trusted to conduct the Dominion elections. Yet, to correct this partisanship of the provincial officials, what does he propose to do? Does he propose to appoint impartial men? By no means. He proposes instead to appoint men specially for the occasion, who, he knows, will be partial to himself. He could not trust his candidates before the country unless he appointed revising barristers and returning officers known to be partial to himself and his Government. On what does he base his argument? He bases it on a very strong assertion. He is in the habit of making strong assertions. He declares that open and undisguised threats have been used against sheriffs and registrars to prevent them from acting impartially as returning officers. That is a sweeping assertion; but I challenge the right hon. gentleman to name a single instance, in Ontario at all events, where any threat, open and undisguised, or covert or hidden, was used towards a registrar or sheriff to induce him to act partially as returning officer. The hon. gentleman has traded for years in assertions without bringing proofs to sustain them, and it is time for him to bring forward some instance to bear out his present statement, or retract what appears to be on its face, as far as we have any evidence to show, a purely gratuitous assertion. He denies that we were free from complaint in regard to the action of returning officers, when registrars and sheriffs were the only returning officers. I do not say that we were absolutely free from complaint, but I do not remember any complaint being made that a registrar or sheriff had favored the Local Government at the expense of the Dominion Government during the time registrars and sheriffs were the returning officers. The right hon. gentleman would create a case for himself, which he has not at present, if he would bring forward an instance of a sheriff or registrar under the old law having acted partially against the Government of the Dominion and in favor of the opposite party, at all events in Ontario; but, Sir, after all these sweeping assertions, after all this assumption of universal knowledge in regard to the motives of sheriffs, of registrars, of local governments and of local officials, he wound up his speech by displaying the most childlike simplicity in regard to the action of which we are complaining to-day. He said he could not see that it made any difference whether a man was gazetted first or last, that there were thirty days to intervene in any case. Of course in the case of a young member of the House like the right hon. gentleman, the suggestion may be pardoned, but to the numerous gentlemen who sit behind him and have so much longer experience than he has, it will be clear that, the longer the time that elapses between the election and the gazetting, the longer time there is for the opponents of a member to collect evidence against him in order to apply it against his return.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, of course, my hon. friends laugh; but the conduct of every candidate will be investigated by his opponents in order to see if there is any case for a petition, and, if you give them plenty of time, they may find something against him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. And that is why we believe the right hon. member secured his being gazetted for Kingston at the earliest possible moment, while he postponed his being gazetted for Carleton to the latest moment. In Carleton he did not fear the result so much, and it did not matter very much, but having been unseated for Kingston before, he thought it might happen again, and therefore he secured that he should be gazetted for Kingston at the earliest date. If you take the time between the election and the gazetting, and add the thirty days, you will find it is a long purgatory through which every member will have to pass to expiate the consequence of his misdeeds.

Mr. BOWELL. Oh!

Mr. CASEY. I take that back. I know that word is not pleasing to the ears of the hon. Minister. I will say the period of probation. I withdraw the word purgatory. In this case, the right hon. gentleman has had to endure a much shorter period of probation than the hon. member for Halifax and many other hon. members of this House, and so he has reason to thank the returning officer, or the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery—I do not know which—perhaps both—who, perhaps without any instruction, shortened his period of probation in that very risky constituency of Kingston. I think, under all the circumstances, the motion of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is justified, and I hope the House will pass it.

Mr. IVES. I was disappointed that the hon. member in his speech did not take up the Quebec list. I should have been interested to hear him use the words Tory and Reformer in regard to a large number of the members from that Province. Is it possible that the hon. gentleman has not yet been able to come to an exact conclusion as to how some of the members from the Province of Quebec are to be classified, and is that the reason why he has not favored us with a classification. He might have been able to give a fairer parallel in that Province where the disparity between Tories and Reformers is not so great, unfortunately, as it is in Ontario, than he did. I do not think it is much to be wondered at that, in the Province of Ontario, where the difference is so great there should be so many more Conservatives gazetted than Liberals. If the hon. gentleman had classified the members from the Province of Quebec where there is less disparity, I think he would have found that the number of supporters of the hon. gentleman and those of the right hon. gentleman are more evenly divided in each issue of the Gazette. In almost all cases in that Province, as far as I know, the sheriffs and registrars were appointed returning officers. In my own constituency, one of the registrars was appointed returning officer. He is a friend of my party and a friend of my own, and, notwithstanding that fact, my name did not appear in the first list or in the second list. I was not gazetted until the 19th March, and it must be apparent to everyone that to have a friend in the returning officer did not ensure a prompt publication of my name in the Official Gazette.

Mr. BLAKE. It made an election.

Mr. IVES. The people decided who should be elected. Reference has been made to the partisan action in Nova Scotia and other Provinces. We have had an experience in the Province of Quebec which is something unique, and my object in rising is to give the House the benefit of an entirely new wrinkle, because I feel that it may be of use to hon. gentlemen opposite if they have to work the oracle again. The Premier of the Province of Quebec issued a circular to all office-holders instructing them to be perfectly impartial, and not to take part in any election for the Dominion. That was sent to every office-holder in the Province of Quebec, but, strange to say, partiality was shown in regard to a certain number of office-holders. When it was made to appear to Mr. Mercier that a second letter would be of use, informing certain office-holders that they might forget the previous letter, that letter was written, and those office-holders became the most efficient workers and canvassers in the constituency in which they lived. I had several of them in my own constituency, and they all received that letter. The friends of my hon. friends opposite said it would be well to advise Mr. Mercier to notify certain office-holders that they would not be discharged if they did interfere, and they did receive that notification. I thought it well to inform the House of this, because the Attorney General of Ontario may not have been in the habit of sending notices of this kind to one class of his officers and not to the other.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. I am surprised that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) should have referred to the list of members from Quebec, because, if it is looked into, it will be found to be more outrageous even than the Ontario list. On the 12th March the Gazette contained the names of eighteen supporters of the Government from that Province, and only four Opposition. On the 19th March it contained the names of nine supporters of the Government, and three gentlemen who have been acting in the past with the hon. gentlemen on the other side but have cut loose from them, Mr. Bergeron, Mr. Amyot and Mr. Gaudet. So that, out of thirty-four who are gazetted, we have twenty-seven supporting the Government straight, four Liberals and three Nationalists, and I would like to know if there is any fairness in that. On the 26th March fourteen Liberals were gazetted and two Conservatives; on the 2nd April we find eight Liberals and no Conservatives gazetted; on the 9th April one Conservative, Mr. Joncas, was gazetted. So those gentlemen had two weeks the start over their Liberal opponents to make the contestation. Now, Sir, I am not surprised that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) should be so pleased with the returning officer in his constituency. We know that there is a provision in the law that only one representative can hold a certificate and vote at one poll, and that one representative should be the bona fide agent of the candidate. It appears that the returning officer was pleased to give to the member for Richmond and Wolfe something over 200 blank certificates, so that 200 strangers were registered in two polls. Of course an officer so accommodating with the law cannot but be satisfactory to the member for Richmond and Wolfe. But I suppose that his opponent, Mr. Greenshields, who was deprived of his right, has no reason to be satisfied with the returning officer, nor the Government who appointed him. The hon. member says that the Local Government of Quebec interfered to a great extent with the Dominion elections. Well, Mr. Speaker, I happen to know a little more about that than the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, and I can state as a fact that the policy of the Quebec Government has been to prevent the interference of its officers with Dominion politics. I know for a fact that a gentleman holding office in the Quebec Legislative Assembly, and who ran as a candidate, against the order of his chief, was discharged. I know that during the last contest in Gaspé there was a pressing demand made upon Mr. Mercier to allow some of the officers of the Local Government to take part in the election against the present member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), and the answer was that they were not to interfere, that the rule was absolute, and applied to Liberals as well as Conservatives. Now, fault has been found with the returning officers who were registrars or sheriffs. In my county a Conservative registrar has been acting as returning officer for the last ten or fifteen years, and no complaint was made against him, but he was discharged and another gentleman appointed to his place who held no other public position. I do not complain, because I do not think that I was ill-treated. In the neighboring county of Richelieu, where the sheriff was also a Conservative, he was commissioned to act as returning officer and discharged his duty to the satisfaction of both parties. It is a wonder to me why the Government disregarded a good Conservative registrar in Berthier, who had experience, and who had given satisfaction to both parties, and took a man new to the duty, while they followed a different course in Richelieu. Certainly I think that gentlemen already holding official positions are better fitted to be returning officers, whatever may be their politics, than any partisan officer that the Government may select outside of a responsible public officer.

Mr. KENNY. My hon. friend, the senior member for the county of Halifax (Mr. Jones), referred to the recent elections in that constituency, and the appointment of the returning officer. I may say that he is much more familiar than I am with all that took place on that very interesting occasion. I only arrived in the constituency some three weeks before the elections, and was much surprised that I had been nominated as one of the candidates of the Liberal-Conservative party. As regards the arrangements which were made with the sheriff as returning officer, I do not know what they were. I can only say that I have no personal knowledge of any such arrangements as those referred to by my hon. colleague. As regards the returning officer, it is true he was a political friend of the hon. member opposite, but he was also one of the sheriffs who was appointed by the judge, as explained by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper). The hon. member for Halifax has also referred to the presence of certain members of the present Dominion Government in the local elections which took place in June last. My hon. friend must not forget that those gentlemen were electors of the Province of Nova Scotia, and that it was no ordinary question which the people of that Province had been called to pronounce upon. I think the gentlemen who surround my hon. friend will not be pleased when they find he attempted to associate them with a certain section of the party in Nova Scotia, or the whole party in Nova Scotia, which assailed the very integrity of our Dominion. When such a disloyal cry as repeal was raised, it was the duty of every man who had a vote in Nova Scotia, whether he was in the Dominion Cabinet or not, to go to his native Province and do what he could to quell that disloyal and dishonest cry. My hon. friend has intimated that on a later occasions he will instruct this House as to the cause which led to, at least, one member of the Liberal-Conservative party being returned for that constituency. I have no doubt it was a great surprise to my hon. friend—perhaps it was, to use another form of words, a bitter disappointment to him. But I must remind him that a few months previously, in June, in the Local elections, that constituency was carried—I will not say by the Reform party, I decline to associate them with the repeal party in Nova Scotia; it was carried by the party that supported my hon. friend by a large majority. Now, as regards the appeal to the people of the county of Halifax—and I will confine my remarks exclusively to a majority of over 1,000 of the county of Halifax, because I have not been so long in public life as my hon. friend, and I do not pretend to occupy the position in Nova Scotia politics that he does—but I would say this, that I owe my position here to-day to the popularity of, and the confidence which the people of Halifax have in, the present Dominion Government. I want no better cry for an electoral canvass in my constituency than that of the National Policy and opposition to repeal of the Union. I did not intend to address the House at this time, and I almost regret that on the first occasion I have the honor to address it I should be obliged to differ with my friend and colleague opposite, for, in Nova Scotia—I do not know how it is in the rest of Canada—we call each other friends although we differ politically, and we never allow political differences to interfere with private and personal friendship. Although my colleague and myself sit on different sides of the House, that is the position we occupy, and it is one which I hope will be maintained. But it would be doing an injustice to my constituency if I allowed the House to rise to-night without mentioning the cause to which I attribute my presence here—I attribute it to the fact of my being a supporter of the Liberal-Conservative Government of to-day.

Mr. MADILL. The action of the revising barrister for North Ontario gave great satisfaction, not only to the Conservatives, but also to the Reformers. So much was that the case, that after the various sittings for the revision of the voters' lists, counsel on the Reform side moved resolutions thanking the revising officer for his impartiality, making the statement that not a single decision given by Judge Dartnell had been questioned. So far as the appointment of the returning officer is concerned, that was deemed, not only by the press on both sides of politics, but also by the leader of the Reform party, to be a satisfactory one. I am one of those whose names were gazetted on 12th March, and yet my political opponents in the north riding have had every opportunity of ascertaining whether bribery was committed on our side or not. My opponents, during the thirty days that elapsed subsequent to my being gazetted, held no less than two conventions of the party in the riding, and after the second convention its chairman stated to me that they could find no evidence of bribery or corruption on the Conservative side in the riding; that if they protested the election it would simply be to refer the matter to the leaders of the Reform party in this House, because they imagined that the party might use a petition against me for the purpose of assisting the party in other constituencies, although there was nothing substantial against my action or that of my party. So both revising officer and returning officer were declared satisfactory by the Reformers.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The hon. member for Halifax, who has just spoken (Mr. Kenny), is somewhat in the position which I occupied in the last Parliament—his constituency is divided against itself. My hon. friend near me (Mr. Jones) is the senior member, he having obtained the largest number of votes. I am happy to say the anomaly which existed in regard to the constituency I have the honor to represent has now been removed, and the constituency possesses a solid Liberal representation in this House. Our returning officer was the sheriff of the county. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) spoke about the disfranchisement of Dominion officials. Possibly the enfranchisement of the Dominion officials in Dominion elections was the cause of the present junior member for Halifax possessing a seat in this House, for I believe every one connected with the Lower Provinces, and aware of the positions of Dominion officials there, knows that the pressure put upon them to support the Government is pushed to the greatest extreme, and that applies not only to ordinary Dominion officials, but to the large number of officials connected with the railways and the railway works belonging to the Dominion. So far as the Local Government is concerned, it is felt that Dominion officials should be disfranchised with respect to the Local elections, because they do not pay taxes but are relieved of a large portion of local taxation and have really no right to have a voice in provincial affairs. A good deal has been said about Local Governments and their interference in Dominion elections. I can say with respect to the Government of New Brunswick that its members occupy a peculiar position. As regards myself and my colleagues we had the support of some members of the Local Government, but the hon. member from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) had a member of that Government canvassing the county against him, and my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) no doubt owes his position to the assistance of members of the Local Government. In all of the sixteen districts of our Province, with the exception of three, the sheriffs were appointed returning officers, and I believe there has not been a breath of complaint against their conduct. In Westmoreland the sheriff was not appointed, but a gentleman who was a strong partisan was made returning officer. But I will say, in justice to that gentleman, that I have not heard any complaint as to the manner in which he conducted the election. In Sunbury the sheriff was passed over and a violent and bitter personal opponent of the late member was appointed returning officer in that county. In Queen's, of which I do not wish to speak further, because to a certain extent the case is under the judgment of the House, the gentleman appointed returning officer was secretary of the Liberal-Conservative Association. Wherever a person takes such an active part as to become the officer of a political association, I do not care whether it is Tory or Reform, he should not be appointed returning officer. In regard to the gazetting of members from our Province, we find some rather peculiar facts. The Gazette of March 12th contains the return of the Minister of Marine, whose county is in the interior of the Province; also those of the Minister of Inland Revenue, whose county is on the upper St. John, and at that time almost inaccessible from the state of the roads; also that of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Moffat), whose constituency is on the extreme border of the Province, near Gaspé, and that of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry). I am informed by the sheriff of my county that immediately on the expiration of the six days allowed he sent his return to Ottawa. The returns from King's could not have been sent earlier than was the return from St. John, and yet we find the return of the Minister of Marine gazetted on the 12th, while that of myself and colleagues was not gazetted until the 19th. We find that while the Minister of Inland Revenue was gazetted on the 12th March, the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., was not gazetted till the 2nd April, and the hon. member for Charlotte is in the same position. Again, we find the hon. member for Northumberland not gazetted till 26th March. The local position of the counties does not account for the discrepancy, and unless the returning officers held back the returns—and I do not believe those officers failed to do their duty—they must all have been mailed pretty nearly at the same time and arrived here on or about the same day. Then the question is, by what right were they withheld from the Gazette? It is the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, on receipt of the return, immediately to have the member elect gazetted. Every hon. member must feel that we are all mighty glad when the term of probation—as the hon. member for Elgin called it—is over, and the longer it continues the longer we remain in a state of anxiety. For that reason I think it is only fair that the returns should be gazetted as early as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as the hon. member for North Ontario is concerned, for my part I readily accept his statement—as I am bound to do—that he does not owe his return, at any rate, to any corrupt influences. My recollection of the mode in which that gentleman's return was secured is that, like not a few hon. members on that side of the House, he owes his return to a certain Act—facetiously entitled: An Act for the better representation of the people—passed in 1842, under which my constituency disappeared altogether, and many others, represented by members on this side, were altered in a very remarkable way. As for the kindness manifested by the right hon. gentleman towards the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) it speaks for itself, while as to the contention of his friend the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who does not appear to be able to understand that it is any detriment whatever to members of the Opposition that sixty days should be given to their opponents wherein to collect evidence against their return, as against thirty days, or thereabouts, in the case of favored members on the other side, all I can say is that the argument did not strike me as particularly logical. As I understand the intent of the law, it is this: that there should be thirty days and no more given fairly and equally, during which, if evidence of corruption or improper practices can be obtained against any member, a petition can be presented; and it is not just or right or fair play in any sense of the term that by some hocus-pocus, whether practiced by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or by partisan returning officers, under any instigation, that members on one side of the House should be subjected to a much longer period of scrutiny than members on the other side. Doubtless, Sir, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) can give wrinkles not merely to members of the Local Governments, but, I dare say, to members of the Government here, and if it be true as suggested by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beau-soleil) that he owes his election largely to intelligent American sympathisers who swarmed across the border on his behalf, I have no doubt we shall have an opportunity of deciding how far those worthy persons are entitled to act as agents for a Canadian member of Parliament. As to those Gazette returns the matter lies in a nutshell. Here are the facts in brief. On the 5th, 12th and 19th of March you have fifty Conservative members of Parliament from Ontario gazetted and nine members gazetted on the Opposition side. Pure accident, no doubt—a just proportion, no doubt. The other day—I suppose I may be pardoned for mentioning it—the hon. gentleman on the other side did not claim, I think, that he had a majority of more than some twelve or fourteen in Ontario, and I do not think that the proportion of fifty to nine, gazetted in three weeks, entirely corresponds to the majority which even he claims, no matter how obtained. On the other side, for the other three weeks—March 26th and April 2nd and 9th, the result was that twenty-nine Liberal members for Ontario were gazetted against four on the other side, which seems to me a rather extraordinary proportion. If this result has arisen from any act of the officer of the Government here—the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery—this House has abundant right to know and investigate the facts. Practically a very gross unfairness has been committed, as is apparent, I think, to every hon. gentleman in this House. I know perfectly well that it is a very serious injustice that one man should be kept for sixty days or more exposed to the penalties of an election petition, while another should only have thirty days. Why, Sir, my hon. friend who has just left his seat (Mr. Mackenzie) informs me that the return from the returning officer of East York was dated on the 3rd of March. My hon. friend was gazetted on the 9th of April, the return being in on the 3rd of March in the case of Alexander Mackenzie. At the same date was gazetted Mr. Dawson, of Algoma, whose recount, if my memory serves, was closed somewhere about the 2nd of April. At the same time was gazetted Mr. Cargill, of Bruce, who had time to run two elections and get gazetted twice while my hon. friend was being gazetted once. Now, these things may be the result of accident. It may have come to pass by some mysterious fatality these fifty returning officers appointed by the Government in these fifty constituencies were so much more expeditious than the twenty-nine returning officers who returned Liberal members in making their returns. If they did, it is a remarkable coincidence and it sheds some light on the desire of the First Minister to act impartially and to give us the benefit of returning officers who will do justice between man and man. The hon. gentleman declares that it was impossible for his Government to allow these officers to be appointed by hostile bodies. I would like to know if the Government of Quebec, until a recent date, was a hostile body? Was the Government of Manitoba, until a recent date, a hostile body? I do not know whether they are now or not; they are taking issue with the hon. gentleman on some questions. And then he, of all men in the world, declaims in bitter language against the hostility of the Local Government of Ontario. Why was he with his friends the Minister of Marine, the Minister of Interior the late Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Justice, travelling about Ontario in palatial style, from one end to the other, for a period of six months preceding the local elections? What were they doing? Unless I greatly misrecollect his statements, there was hardly an audience he addressed to whom he did not lay down the position, with great emphasis, that the interests of the country were bound up in the defeat of the Mowat Administration; he did his best to put them out, and if he did not succeed the reason was that the Mowat election was conducted under an honest voters' list, without a Gerrymander Act, without being bedeviled by partisan revising officers. If the truth were known it would be found to be this: that the difference between the votes recorded on behalf of my hon. friend here, and those recorded on behalf of the right hon. gentleman, does not represent honestly and fairly the balance of political opinion among the people of Ontario, but that they represent the extent to which, by means of the Gerrymander Act, the Franchise Bill and partisan returning officers, it was possible to disguise and conceal the true sentiments of the people of Canada. Why, Sir, I know of a case myself in which in one single county there was a difference of thirteen or fourteen hundred between the vote on which the election was conducted in Mr. Mowat's case, and the vote under which it was conducted in the Dominion elections; six hundred or seven hundred left off in one case and six hundred or seven hundred put on in the other. In the one case the voters' lists were made by the people, without the interference of Government, in the other case by men who were appointed at huge cost to us—a cost of many hundreds of thousands of dollars—for the purpose of producing a list which, rightly or wrongly, by fair means or foul, might enable those gentlemen to continue their career of misgovernment. Sir, there is another reason, and a very grave reason, why it is highly derogatory to Parliament and to the interests of the people that a longer time should be given in the case of making out the return for the one side or for the other. There is no doubt that the Government, when they appoint men who, as my hon. friend has said, have been in some instances officers of Liberal-Conservative Associations, are exposed to very great temptation to approach, or to cause to be approached, these men to induce them to do injustice to Liberal candidates when there is a doubt about the extent of the majority; and, Sir, unless I am greatly misinformed, nothing saved my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), although he had a majority of 354, from being most unjustly deprived of his seat, except the fortunate circumstance that among the supporters of the Government there were one or two hon. gentlemen who warned the Government that they would withdraw their support if that iniquity were perpetrated. Now, Sir, is it by accident that fifty men are returned in two or three weeks for the Government side and nine for this side? Is it also by accident that the Government cannot point to one single mishap which has befallen any one of their supporters by reason of the action of a returning officer? I think, Sir, the country will know how to judge both of the way in which these Gazette returns were made, and the reasons why they were made. They were delayed for the double purpose, as I judge, first, of giving an unfair advantage in the promotion of election petitions, and next, in the case of many parties, of giving time to manipulate the returns, which, according to the statements made to us, there is only too much reason to believe has been done in other cases than those referred to by my hon. friend. You might as well tell us that it was by pure accident, after we had been told on the floor of this House last Session that it was impossible for the Government to have an election for Haldimand because they had to see that it was held under the new voters' list, that within ten days, I believe, after the seat for Chambly was vacated by the then member, we found that same Government—which kept the Haldimand election back for six months or more, in order that the revising officer might do his work there, and include the Indians of that county in the list—hurrying on the election for Chambly without waiting for the revising officer there to complete his list at all. These are the reasons why we say gross injustice, if not deliberate fraud, has been attempted to be perpetrated by some parties in the Government interest; and these are the reasons which have, most justly, in my opinion, caused my hon. friend from Bothwell to bring this matter to the attention of the House, and demand that reasonable investigation should be had. Of course there can be no objection to the suggestion of the First Minister that this matter should be delayed until to-morrow; that will not interfere with the object of my hon. friend.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. Fiset. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that the hon. member who had the floor before recess would take part in the discussion which was raised by the hon. member sitting behind me. I think the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) has been rather unfortunate in the comparison which he has made between the Ontario members and the hon. members from the Province of Quebec, on the manner in which their names have been inserted in the Official Gazette. The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) furnished him with documentary evidence to the effect that if the Ontario members had been unfairly treated the members from the Province of Quebec were still more unfairly treated. With your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, I will give the names of the hon. members which were published at various times in the Official Gazette. To begin with, in the Province of Quebec, six members were elected by acclamation, and it is easy to understand why their names were the first published in the Official Gazette. I may be allowed to give their names, they are Messrs. Coursol, Dupont, Lagergne, Scriver, Béchard and Girault. Now, here are the names published on the 12th of March, we will see to which category they belong. They are Messrs. Buin, Hall, the Hon. Sir Hector Langevin, Messrs. Bryson, McGreevey, McMillan, Ouimet, Wright, Desaulniers, Guilbault, Audet, Daoust, Desjardins—here, Mr. Speaker, I may be in error, and I hope the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) will pardon me if I place him among the out-and-out supporters of the Administration; he is said to be a Nationalist—Montplaisir, Riopel, Pope, Girouard and the Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron. I may remark here, with regard to my hon. friend the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Riopel) that this hon. member represents a county which is further down than the county of Rimouski, and that consequently the report of the returning officer had to travel a longer distance from there to Ottawa, than the report of the returning officer of the county of Rimouski. Well, on the 12th of March, eighteen Conservatives, with the exception of the hon. member for Hochelaga—whom, although he is a Conservative, I would not dare to class among the Ministerialists, for he might be vexed at me if I should class him as belonging to that denomination—were published in the Official Gazette. In all, four Liberals, eighteen Ministerialists, and say one Nationalist. How many Liberals, or rather, how many members of the Opposition? Four; the Hon. Mr. Langelier, Mr. Holton, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, and Mr. Ste. Marie. Now, on the 19th of March, the names of Ministerialists published in the Official Gazette were the following: My hon. friend the member for Témiscouata, (Mr. Grandbois) will not be vexed with me for we have been friends for a long time. The county of Témiscouata is bordering upon the county of Rimouski, and we live at a short distance from one another, and I will explain in a few minutes how it comes that the name of my hon. friend from Témiscouata was published in the Official Gazette before the name of the member for Rimouski. Messrs. Grandbois, Labelle, Ives, Chapleau, Colby, Wilson, Curran, Smith and Vanasse. How many members of the Opposition here? I say members of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, but, although the Government will be very glad to-day to have the support of the Nationalists, when their names were to be published in the Official Gazette they were classed with the Liberals, and, accordingly, gazetted as late as we were. They are Messrs. Bergeron, Amyot, and Gaudet. In all nine Ministerialists and three Oppositionists. Who are those who were gazetted on the 26th of March? Here the Liberals are in greater number. Here are the names: Messrs. Préfontaine, Choquette, Langelier, Bernier, Turcotte, Des-saint, Doyon, Beausoleil, Claves, Gauthier, Geoffrion, Fiset, De St. Georges, Bourassa. In all, fourteen Liberals and two Ministerialists—Messrs. Thérien and Coulombe. On the 2nd of April, here are the names of the Oppositionists who were published in the Official Gazette: Messrs. Fisher, Rinfret, Cimon, Guay, Duchesnay, Godbout, Couture, Cas-grain, or eight Oppositionists. As to my hon. friend, the member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), who is a Conservative, I have no doubt, was the last whose name was published, and this is owing to the fact that his election took place a month after the others. Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to call your attention to a particular fact, which will enable the House to judge whether, as regards the publication of the names of hon. members in the Official Gazette, the Government have really wished to deal fairly with us. I refer to the publication of the election of the county of Témiscouata, and the hon. member for that county will allow me to use his county for the purpose of comparison with the county of Rimouski. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the elections took place on the 22nd of February throughout the Province, with the exception of the county of Gaspé. In the county of Témiscouata the votes were counted on the 2nd of March; a recount having been demanded before the judge, the votes were recounted on the 9th of March. Let us suppose that it took two days for the report of the returning officer to reach Ottawa. Well, for all that, eight or ten days after, my hon. friend was gazetted, for his name appears in the Official Gazette of the 19th of March. Far different from this was the case of the county of Rimouski. This county, which I represent, is situated between the counties of Bonaventure and Témiscouata. As I said before, the report from the county of Bonaventure was one of the first to reach Ottawa and the publication took place on the 12th of March. In the county of Rimouski the votes were counted on the 28th of February; suppose it took three days to send in the report; let us extend until the 2nd of March the delay in which it could reach Ottawa; at all events the report which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery must make before the House will give us the exact date of its reception at Ottawa. Be that as it may, my certificate bears the date of the 28th of February. How does it happen, if there has been no show of party feeling, if the intention has been to deal with us in all fairness, how does it happen that the name of one of my two hon. friends, who lives farther than me, appears first in the Official Gazette, and that the name of the other who lives as far as me and who had to go through the ordeal of a recount before the judge, is still published before mine? The poor member for Rimouski was only gazetted on the 26th of March. Well, Mr. Speaker, looking at it in the light of common sense, I cannot believe that there has been no partiality. As regards the election itself the Government have chosen as deputy returning officer the man who had acted as such during the preceding election. Personally I do not wish to complain of this, leaving all my complaints to my supporters—and I do not wish to ventilate mine here, but I may be allowed to say that out of forty-four polls held in thirty parishes in the county of Rimouski, not one deputy returning officer belongs to my party, and that good care was taken to choose them in the other party. This is no occasion, Mr. Speaker, to speak about the Franchise Act, but I think that when the proper time comes we will have occasion to point out that grave wrongs have been the result of the application of that Act in the county of Rimouski. For the present I will only state as the hon. members on this side of the House have stated with respect to other counties, that in this publication of our names in the Official Gazette the county of Rimouski has been treated in the same manner as all the other Liberal counties in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MADILL. I desire to make an explanation with reference to the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I was elected because of the Redistribution Bill. After the Re-distribution Bill was passed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman has any personal explanation to make on some point of his speech which has been misunderstood he has a right to make it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the explanation is simply this: The hon. member for South Oxford said my Mr. FISKE.

hon. friend owed his election to the Gerrymander. My hon. friend wishes to say it was not so.

Mr. MADILL. It is not so, because since the Redistribution Bill was passed, the ex-member for North Ontario was elected to support the Opposition by a majority of 59. There has been no change since and he has been defeated by 129, which shows that I was not elected by the Gerrymander, because I support the policy of the present Administration, and not the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LISTER. So far as the explanation of the hon. gentleman is concerned, I think no person will deny that if it were not for the Gerrymander he would not be here to-night.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If it were not for the Gerrymander the hon. Member for South Oxford would not be here to-night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If my constituency had not been destroyed in 1882, I would not be here to-night?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is most ungrateful of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very.

Mr. LISTER. It appears to me that many of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-night on the resolution of the hon. member for Bothwell have travelled out of the record. The question, I apprehend, is whether the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery properly gazetted the returns as they came in. If those returns were not gazetted as they were made by the returning officers, he did not properly perform his duty, and he must have had some motive for acting as he did. Whether he was guilty of a wrong to the hon. members of this House from his own motion, or whether he acted at the instance of the Administration or any member of it, is a matter we have to enquire into, and comes properly within the purview of the resolution before the House. The hon. leader of the Government, as he always does when he gets into a tight place, got up this evening for the purpose of exciting a feeling of sympathy in the minds of the members of this House by saying that everybody was attacking him. Why, Sir, the Government of Ontario has been attacking him; the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of New Brunswick have been attacking him; every Government in this Dominion has been attacking him, until he has to get up to-night and cry out for sympathy. What are the facts of this matter? That hon. gentleman, ever since Confederation took place, has been assailing the Provincial Governments from one end of this country to the other; he has disregarded every right the Provinces possess, and he has done all that man can do for the purpose of destroying the Confederation to which he professes to be so loyal. I would not give a pin for his loyalty if it stood in the way of his ambition. Now, let us go back a little, although it does not pertain to this issue. But the hon. gentleman, in order to get away from the real issue, tried to draw a herring across the path, and we will follow it up. Did he not travel this country from one end to the other trying to oust from office that little tyrant, Mowat? Did he not, surrounded by his friends, remain in the city of Toronto, waiting to receive news by wire of a glorious victory? And when the news came that Mowat was not defeated, but had gone out of the fight stronger than ever, where were he and his friends? They got away mighty quick. Where did we find him again in 1887? He was in the pay car "Jamaica," with his friends the Minister of the Interior (Mr. White), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Thompson), on his way into my constituency. Much good he did there. He gave me 250 extra of a majority. I did not ask for a better canvassers than the Minister of Interior and the leader of the Government himself, that old Tory of Tories, as he called himself in Sarnia, the other night—the father of all Tories. All I can say is, when another election comes on, let them come again into my county, even if it is at the expense of the country they travel. We had the Minister of Agriculture there also, telling us how the savings banks deposits had grown within the last few years. The hon. gentleman says we feel dejected. Not at all; we have come here to fight, and are going to fight; and we will see the day when the Government will be driven ignominiously out of office. That day may be nearer than the hon. gentlemen opposite think, for they cannot go on for all time doing as they have done in the past. The elections they have just gained is due mainly to their law for the appointing of partisan returning officers, as in 1882 they gained the elections by gerrymandering the Province from one end to the other. They would not have ventured to go to the country in 1887 had they not passed the Franchise Act, by which they took power to disfranchise thousands of voters.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. No doubt the hon. gentleman is traveling over a pretty wide range, but I suppose the example had been given him.

Mr. LISTER. The example has been given me by a very high authority, the leader of the Government. In conclusion I have to say that the simplicity of the First Minister is assumed and not real. No one could pretend to think for a moment that he is the Simple Simon he would have us believe he is. He knows very well that the sooner the Government members get gazetted, the less the chances will be of petitions being filed against them. But when the time has expired for petitions against their side, they will begin to send in their petitions against our side of the House. That is the little game, and it should receive the condemnation of every hon. member of this House.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The style of speech with which we have just been favored by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) is a fair specimen of the accuracy in dealing with political questions which the hon. gentlemen opposite have exhibited during some months past in the Province of Ontario, and the other Provinces as well. I do not intend to follow the example set by the hon. member. I do not see the object of importing the bitterness of a political contest into our methods of conducting public business in this House; and I think if we are to choose between the style of debate as set by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) and that of the junior member for Halifax, all men who desire to see public business conducted in this House in the proper spirit will prefer the spirit in which the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) dealt with the question before us to that which prompted the remarks of the hon. member for West Lambton. I cannot for the life of me understand why so great importance should be given this question. As regards the returning officers of Ontario, in my part of the country we have always employed either the registrars or sheriffs as returning officers, and although these officials are the appointees of the Ontario Government, I must do them the justice to say that they have always acted impartially, and I would be ashamed to recommend any other gentlemen in my section of the country than those officials for the position. There may be constituencies where returning officers have made themselves notorious by partisanship, but I do not know of any; and I am sure my hon. friend who moved the resolution does not complain of the conduct of the returning officer in his constituency during the recent election. He may have some recollection of bygone wrongs, but wrongs in the past should not cause him to do injustice to the gentleman who acted as returning officer in his constituency during the recent election. I know of no place throughout the whole of western Ontario where there is the slightest ground for complaint as regards the sending in of returns to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, though probably some hon. members did not give sufficient attention to the sending in of their election returns. As soon as the recount was made in my constituency I asked the returning officer to send in the returns, and he did so because I knew the sooner the papers would be sent in the sooner my election would be gazetted.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). In South Essex, as in other places, there was a recount, and this recount caused delay in that riding. In other places, as I have seen it stated in the press, the returning officers did not furnish the papers necessary to enable the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make his return. It is surprising to me that hon. gentlemen opposite should be so anxious to have their election speedily gazetted. It looks as if they had something to conceal, as if they were afraid of a free and full investigation. Surely, whatever others might have done, hon. gentlemen opposite have done nothing that they should wish to conceal from the country or from investigation before an election court. If they have nothing to fear, whence their complaints? They have raised a great tempest in a tea-pot this afternoon to no purpose, unless indeed they are favoring us with their first instalment of the Opposition commission, and the vigorous policy of attack to be exhibited by this commission, formed of leading gentlemen from the several Provinces. However much we may regret the cause which may have led to that arrangement for putting the Opposition leadership into commission, and I sincerely regret there should be any physical cause, on the part of the leader of the Opposition that compels him to relax his efforts and seek the aid of a commission, still I think if we are to have onsets from the various provincial deputy assistant leaders of the Opposition in the style of to-day, the sooner they are discontinued the better it will be for the country. I do not come here to attack and insult anybody, nor am I disposed to remain silent while such unfair and unjust attacks as the present are being made on the gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Although I have been read out by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as a Tory, I call myself an independent member of the House, and am ready to promote any measure in accord with the best interests of the country; but I do not understand how the hon. gentleman can use the word Tory as a term of reproach when the hon. member for St. John, the senior member for Halifax, and my hon. friend the gallant knight from Oxford are as finished specimens of the Tory gentleman as you can find in the country. The subject of the interference of the Provinces having been brought into this debate, I must say that I did not hear the Premier or any gentleman on this side find fault with the action of the Government of New Brunswick in reference to Dominion matters. I think the example set by the Provincial Government of New Brunswick is one which might be copied by all the other Provincial Governments with great advantage to the country. They combined for local purposes just in the same manner as the people of a county in Ontario would deal with affairs in a county council, but, in Dominion politics, those members who sat side by side in the Provincial Cabinet took their sides as they chose, and, when the fight was over, went back to attend to their provincial affairs again. Although the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), when he was leading the Government of Ontario, said he did not approve of the spirit of hostility, but that the spirit of neutrality was the one which should be indulged in towards the Dominion Government, still his satellite in that Government, the man whom he placed there as Premier, has followed out a policy of the bitterest hostility to the Dominion Government on each and every occasion. In the west, I know I was favored with many visitors during the late campaign, amongst others two or three officials of the Ontario Government who were sent to speak and to canvass against me, and to appeal to the passions and prejudice of the people of my riding, and to prejudice me with them by false representations. On every occasion, at every General election since the present Government obtained power in Ontario, they have unceasingly striven to persecute the Government of which the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald is the chief. I think that such conduct has been a more serious injury to Confederation, and to the interests of this country, than anything which has occurred in this Dominion since the establishment of the confederacy. One word more. I think the gentlemen who had their gazetting delayed are in a more favorable position than those who were gazetted earlier, because I think sober second thoughts may enable gentlemen to pull through when people find there is not all this ground for attack which there is sometimes rumored to be immediately after an election is over. Just after an election we find all sorts of rumors floating about in constituencies. In my own constituency the warden of the county is now awaiting his trial, but, although the warden is awaiting his trial for bribery on my behalf, they have done me the honor to refrain from petitioning against my return. I think that if the Premier or his friends had not been in such a hurry to have him gazetted, early for Kingston, possibly the sober second thoughts of the people of that borough might have saved them from perpetuating Kingston's shame, and that attack—particularly that personal attack—would not have been made upon a man who had served the city of Kingston for forty years, and had given his whole life to the service of the country. The bitterness which inspired the hon. gentlemen opposite during the campaign, which inspires them to-day, finds its foundation in this, that they had not one question of principle at stake when they went to the country; that there was not one great reform demanded and denied; that there was not one single section of the country suffering under any injustice, and, therefore, having no policy on which to go to the country, having accepted the policy of this Government in all its details and having nothing whatever to offer in exchange, they were compelled to fall back upon personal abuse and the slander of private character—slander in which defenceless women and invalid children were compelled to take their share. I think that is the secret, and, if these gentlemen think we are afraid of them, and that they can carry on the onslaught against us here, and that we will quietly sit down and let them put their feet upon our necks, they mistake our temper on this side towards them. We do not forget—I do not forget for one—the manner in which we have been treated by hon. gentlemen opposite, the way in which courtesy, fair play and gentlemanly good-feeling towards them have been reciprocated by them, but they must understand that, just as they deal out to us their attempts to intimidate us in carrying on the affairs of this House, we will deal with them and will give back blow for blow. This Government has deserved the confidence of this country, and possesses the confidence of the country, and while it deserves that confidence it will have our cordial support; but I may say for myself that I do not purpose supporting any measure or any transaction that I cannot be a party to and at the same time retain my self-respect. As far as my friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) is concerned, he generally, when he rises, makes himself particularly agreeable to the hon. the Premier. That shows the ingratitude of my friend from Elgin, because the Premier in 1871 or 1872 carved out a constituency for my friend, and, when, owing to his opposition to popular measures, there was a doubt of his success, he strengthened him again in 1882 and kept him there. I can understand my friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) not liking the way in which my hon. friend from Elgin was strengthened, but I cannot understand the ingratitude of my friend from Elgin towards the man who has kept him in public life. I may add that I think it is the duty of gentlemen, while making these indiscriminate charges, to point out the constituencies where partisan returning officers have been appointed and the constituencies where officials, such as registrars and sheriffs, could have been selected and were not. I do not know of such constituencies. In the west we had none such. These officials were chosen all through the west, and the elections were conducted in the fairest possible manner. I, for one, am perfectly satisfied that, when the matter comes to be investigated, it will be found that the whole affair was not worth wasting the afternoon over.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman should suppose that the afternoon was wasted. I want to know what else there was to do. We got through the Order paper, and we might just as well discuss this important question of public policy as for the hon. gentleman to go to his lodgings and amuse himself in whatever way he may be accustomed to amuse himself when the House is not in session. We are not wasting public time, because the time which has been devoted to this discussion would have been devoted to private affairs if it were not given to this important public question. The hon. gentleman has taken three different views with reference to this matter, and I prefer the view which he took under the influence of his own personal feelings in his own case. He told us at one time that it was really a matter of no consequence at all in what order the gazettes took place, that it was a tempest in a teapot, and that he was surprised that we said anything about it. In another part of his speech he told us that we were favored in being gazetted late, that it was the most advantageous course for us, because it was giving time for passions to cool and suspicions to vanish, and that thus petitions might be avoided. These were two of the opinions which he expressed; but he gave a third. What was it? It was the one which he acted upon himself when he went to the sheriff, when he went to the man whom he appointed returning officer and said: Please send down my return as soon as possible. There are the three opinions the hon. gentleman gave us his choice of. He chose the one which he vouched for and verified by having founded his own conduct upon it. What was the reason the hon. gentleman wanted the sheriff to get his return at once? Because he wanted to be gazetted early. Why? Because he knew that the period for the petition would elapse earlier, the earlier he was gazetted. Was there any other reason? If so, will the hon. gentleman tell us? If not, we understand perfectly that the hon. gentleman knew quite well what the advantage was which he would derive from the course he pursued. Ah! says the hon. gentleman, I understand how it is that you hon. gentlemen are so uneasy to be gazetted quickly. It must be because you are afraid. Let me retort his own action—let me retort his own conduct? What was the hon. gentleman afraid of? Was it consistent with a perfect confidence in his own return, that he should be anxious to hurry his gazetting? I do not say it was not, but if it was, why does he insinuate an improper motive and a consciousness of wrong, because we also desired our gazetting to be earlier? Is that the fair play which he has invoked on this occasion? Is that the candid, the even-handed justice, which he calls upon us to display at the peril of his displeasure, at the peril of his violating the law and the gospel, and returning blow for blow? If it is, we would like to see him give us some other sample of fair play upon which we should act. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman from Essex spoke in the line, a little bit, of the First Minister. He followed in his line when he charged the Local Government—and he repeated the old story in reference to the views that I took when I was a member of the Local Government—as to the relation I should desire to exist between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of the Province. I said that I desired the relations between the two Governments to be relations of neutrality. I desire it still. I heartily regret that circumstances have ever risen which make any other relations to exist between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of any Province, than relations of neutrality. But I never said, I never thought, I never suggested, that the relations between the Government of a Province and the Government of the Dominion ought to be those of a neutrality which should, in the slightest degree, compromise or interfere with the relations of the individuals who compose that Government as electors of the Province, to interfere with their liberty to vindicate the rights of their Province or to vindicate their politics. Why, at the very time I said so I was the First Minister of Ontario. And when I was a member of this House for the west riding of Durham, opposing the hon. gentleman, does he suppose that I purposed to sentence myself to neutrality as a representative of the west riding of Durham, when I declared that I thought the Local Government of Ontario, as a Local Government, ought to be neutral? Surely no. I intended to reserve, I did reserve, I was reserving, my full rights as an elector of Ontario, as a representative of a constituency of Ontario in the House of Commons, to act according to what my views of the interests of this country required in that capacity. Well, as Prime Minister of the Government of Ontario, I purposed to pursue a course of neutrality as far as the Dominion Government was concerned.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). What about coercion of the local officials?

Mr. BLAKE. I am going to touch coercion, which the hon. gentleman did not touch, but the First Minister did. I am going to touch it, and if the hon. gentleman will allow me I will deal with only one thing at a time. Now, the hon. gentleman declared—and here also he followed the lead of the First Minister—that the members of the Local Government whom, with that fresh instance of fair play, of moderate conduct, of the absence of vituperative epithets which he recommends to us, he called my satellites, have been engaged in the contest in Ontario. I suppose they were, I hope they were. As free men of Canada, as electors of the Province of Ontario, they had not merely the right, but the duty, to stand upon a platform and address to the people of Ontario their views as to what the interests of Canada were, although it happened to be the hon. gentleman's constituency which they invaded. But to call them my satellites is to call them by a name wholly inappropriate and wholly inaccurate. They are the members of a very strong Government, which, in despite of all the opposition of the hon. gentleman and his supporters, has succeeded in retaining the confidence of the people of Ontario for a period of fourteen or fifteen years. They are the satellites of no man, they are the trusted rulers of the Province of Ontario, to whom this power has been confided for that long period by the will of its people. Now, the First Minister has said that the members of the Local Government, from the Prime Minister to the last of them, threatened to coerce their officers to vote and work for the Opposition in the recent contest, and the observations of the member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) appeared to be in the same direction. I am not the vindicator or the defender of the Local Government, but I suppose it will be agreed by every member of this House that the honor and standing of the Local Government are subjects of concern to all the population of Canada. All I demand is, in the interest of justice and fair play, that charges so grave as these should not be uttered wholesale, without definition, without specification, without proof. If the hon. gentleman shall show that the Government of Ontario has, as he has charged them this night with doing, coerced and threatened its employes, its officers, into taking a course contrary to their conscience and wishes, politically, I shall join that hon. gentleman in condemning that Government; but I call upon him, as he has made this statement, to give particulars and to give proof. The hon. gentleman is excellent at wholesale and general charges, he is a master at enveloping a people, a party, a Government, a population, in one mass of declamatory invective and charge. Oftentime he has charged us in like terms. But let him now come down to particulars in reference to those whom he charges, and give them an opportunity to answer, and let us see whether he has this night done them justice. I agree with the hon. member for North Essex, who said that if there were persons appointed who ought not to have been appointed, some specification ought to be given, and as this charge has been made against the Local Government, I trust the hon. gentleman will agree with me that, here also, some specification should be given, and I shall answer the hon. gentleman's demands for specifications as to the returning officers very soon. Now, Sir, the First Minister said that it was necessary to make a change in the appointment of returning officers, because the local officers who, by law, held this appointment, were under the control of a hostile Government. I do not at all pretend that it is an infallible guarantee of the fitness for the office of returning officer, or for any other trust, of a man, that he should hold the situation of a sheriff or a registrar; but I do say that no better plan has been devised, nor can any better plan be devised, for securing, upon the whole, upon the mass, good appointments, than that the persons who are appointed to these responsible offices should, during good behavior, also be returning officers. They are officials of a quasi-judicial character; they are men who are appointed practically for life; they are appointed to offices which require some training, which require them to live in the community, and which require them, if they value at all what most of us value highly, the esteem and respect of those amongst whom they live, require them so to behave in the discharge of those duties as that they shall retain that esteem and respect. The hon. gentleman says, however, it was necessary to depart from this rule because these persons were no longer servants of this Government, but were servants of other Governments, and in order to secure impartiality, in order to secure right appointments, we must take the office into our own hands, and we found that injustice was done us when we did not do so. Now, I appeal to the fair play and candor of the hon. gentlemen who have watched the conduct of elections, as far as the returning officers were concerned, for a great many years past, to say in how many cases there has been misconduct by sheriffs or registrars when they held, by law, that office in the old days. There are other cases, there may be a case or two, I do not say there is not; I do not remember one at the moment, but it is quite possible. Considering the question broadly, I ask where are the cases? I say we had a guarantee in the standing of those men, and in the fact that they held their office as returning officers not by the gift of the Government, but by the law of the land, that they were so appointed and known, and every one was aware that they held that office to act fairly and impartially between both parties, which was the best guarantee we could possess. With what does the hon. gentleman replace that system? He gives the appointments in many cases to partisans of his own party. This is a very serious question. It is a question which comes before us, after what has been said, directly upon this motion, but it is one which must obviously interest the whole country and interest, at one time or another, both sides of this House. I say that partisans have been appointed. What is the function of the returning officer? The function is, it is said, partly judicial, partly ministerial. He has to choose the deputies; he has very important duties of various descriptions to discharge. He has very great powers, very great powers indeed. Is it reasonable that the man who is to exercise those discretionary, those executive, those judicial and those ministerial powers should be chosen because he is the known, the avowed partisan of one of the two sides who are engaged in the conflict? I say that such men have been chosen, and not infrequently chosen during the recent contest. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) said that in the great majority of cases in the Province of Quebec, the men chosen were sheriffs or registrars. Well, the answer is easy. Who appointed all those sheriffs or registrars? We know who they were and that they filled the bill of hon. gentlemen opposite; and that is the reason. It was not necessary to go further; in fact, hon. gentlemen might, perhaps, have gone further and fared worse. But it was not so in all respects, if I am rightly informed. At least it was not so as to the character of those officers everywhere. I will give an instance or two. Take the case of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Madill). The returning officer for the north riding of Ontario, if I am rightly informed, was secretary of the Conservative Association, and he also acted as clerk to the revising officer at the last revision, and he was very closely connected, before his appointment of course, with the Tory committee. That was the position of the returning officer of the north riding of Ontario. We know how this is done from the hon. member from North Essex (Mr. Patterson). He said: I would be ashamed to recommend any one but a sheriff. So we know who made the recommendations to the Government for returning officers. The hon. gentleman said: I recommended the sheriff and he was appointed. The returning officer owed his appointment to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I did not say that. I said I would be ashamed to make any recommendation except that of the sheriff or registrar.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; and the sheriff got the appointment. But there are hon. gentlemen who do not possess the same fortitude as the hon. member for Essex, because I find an hon. member recommended the secretary of the Conservative Association for returning officer. There is also the case of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Guilbault). In that case the returning officer had the additional qualification of being the brother-in-law of the Conservative candidate.

Mr. MADILL. Not at all.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) is not speaking of North Ontario but of Joliette.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for North Ontario had the secretary of the Conservative Association for returning officer and the hon. member for Joliette had his brother-in-law. Then there is the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Vanasse), who smiles upon me with the knowledge as to how these matters are worked. That hon. gentleman had a returning officer taken not from the county of Yamaska at all, but from Sorel.

Mr. VANASSE. He has lived for forty years in Yamaska.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that he was from Sorel latterly; he may have come from Yamaska originally.

Mr. VANASSE. He was out of it 16 years ago for a short time.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that the returning officer was a person entirely disqualified by his habits—which he exhibited during the election in the most open and disgraceful manner—from filling any office of trust whatever.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman goes rather far in attacking such persons. I have allowed the discussion on the general ground as covered by the resolution; but if hon. gentlemen, one after another, proceed to discuss the question of any particular returning officer, I must say it is out of order. I would advise the hon. gentleman to limit himself to the general ground on which I have allowed the discussion to proceed.

Mr. BLAKE. I am surprised at your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I submit. I have here some fifteen or twenty more cases, which I am prepared to particularise, and I have been challenged to do it; but I will put them by at this time.

An hon. MEMBER. We will get them again.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, you will get them again. On the general ground, as I cannot particularise, I say there are abundant cases in which the secretaries of Liberal Conservative Associations, in which the lawyers who had been employed by the Conservatives to attend the revision of the list, in which other persons holding positions openly, intimately and ardently connected with the Conservative party, were chosen to fill the positions of returning officers; and I say that they accomplish their appointed work in many cases. I could show cases in which such persons gave appointments of agencies. Why, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) spoke on this subject, and I was surprised at his indiscretion. There were ninety men who voted on agency certificates in the hon. gentleman's own election.

Mr. IVES. That was an election canard. There is not the slightest truth in that statement.

Mr. BLAKE. And sixty at another poll—

Mr. IVES. That is not true.

Mr. BLAKE—and sixty at another poll, according to the information I have received.

Mr. IVES. Your information is false, entirely false.

Mr. BLAKE. It may be so; I will give my information, and we will see presently. So in Provoncher (Manitoba) there were a very large number, and a very considerable number in the county of Selkirk; and in this and in other respects the elections were conducted in a most irregular manner. In many instances, also, of which I have particulars here, the old deputy returning officers, many of whom occupied the position for a great many years, who were familiar with the duties, who had the confidence of the people generally, were not appointed on this occasion, but others, unfamiliar with the duty and known only as Tory partisans, replaced them and did their appointed work. In other cases, of which I have the particulars here, partisan returning officers put the polls in isolated districts, at points extremely remote from and inconvenient to the Liberal electors who inhabited those districts, and to the direct advantage of the Tory candidates. In many cases the result happened that there were irregularities. I never heard of an election in which there were so many irregularities on the part of deputy returning officers as in this election, and it is largely due to the fact that there never was an election in which there were so many changes in the accustomed officers, in which there were so many replacements of these officers by men inexperienced in the past and animated only by a fervent zeal to serve the party with which they were connected. And, bear in mind, that those irregularities were availed of in some cases, and attempted to be availed of in others, to alter the absolute verdict which was obtained under such difficult circumstances. So it is that I say—when the hon. gentleman says it is quite reasonable that the Government should take this power—if it be so, I say that we ought to challenge earnestly and scrutinise diligently the manner in which this power has been exercised. It is a power the most delicate conceivable. Who are they? and what are they called upon to do? They are those in control of public affairs, appealing to the great jury of the people, and themselves making provision for the record of the verdict of that jury. They are appointing the officers who are to exercise those great powers. What more delicate position can men be placed in than that, and of what conduct ought there to be a more vigilant, determined and rigorous scrutiny than that? I am sorry that the order of the House, as interpreted by you, prevents me from entering, on this occasion, into further details as to the unhappy results of the actions, however excellently well intended by hon. gentlemen; but I think it will be shown, and I hope before very long, that their conduct in the discharge of this delicate power has not been what it ought to be, and has been directed to the maintenance of themselves in power by virtue of the exercise of the rights they have obtained from the people. The hon. gentleman says he is not at all surprised at the temper which my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) exhibited in dealing with this question. Well, I did not observe that the hon. member for Bothwell exhibited any particular temper; but the hon. gentleman whose temper is so angelic, said that my hon. friend's temper was bad, that the temper of all of us was bad because of the great majority by which he was returned to this house. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has analysed that return. I have analysed it to some extent. In the Provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island there were about 475,000 votes polled, and, as near as I can make out, out of those 475,000 the hon. gentleman succeeded in getting about four thousand more than the Liberal party, or about the return of one member. That was the popular verdict of those four great Provinces. It is quite true, that by operations which he has carried through this House, by powers which he has obtained from this House, and the exercise of those powers by his officers, that popular majority of one is represented by a Parliamentary majority of twenty-one. It is quite true that he has just twenty-one times the power in Parliament from those four Provinces that he got from the polls. But that is what the people said. It is true that one hundred and five votes turned out of those 475,000 would have taken away the hon. gentleman's twenty one; that it would have given a parliamentary return equivalent to the popular vote and balanced the return from those four Provinces. I have not so far analysed the returns from the other Provinces as to be able to speak with the same degree of positiveness as to them, but I believe the general return will represent something like three-quarters of a million, and I believe on that general return, if the popular voice were, as it ought to be, truly expressed according to its strength here, the parties would be found to be balanced, and that after all the influences which the hon. gentleman was able to avail himself of to produce a different result. The hon. gentleman has said that this particular question which has been brought forward is not one of any great consequence—that the state of things which has been alluded to might happen accidentally; and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) said, that considering the larger number of Conservatives who were returned from the Province of Ontario than Reformers, it was quite natural and reasonable that more Conservatives should be gazetted than Reformers. Why, of course it was. If there were more Conservatives returned than Reformers, there must be more Conservatives gazetted than Reformers; but it would be natural to expect that the different returns which came out at different times should bear something like the proportion of the gross returns. But when the hon. gentleman endeavors to induce this House to believe that it is a mere accidental and perfectly reasonable circumstance that the returns should be gazetted in the order in which they have been gazetted, I think he presumes on the simplicity of us young members of Parliament far more than he, with his large parliamentary experience ought to do. On the 5th of March, taking the Province of Ontario, there were eight Conservatives and one Reformer gazetted; on the 12th of March, twenty-eight Conservatives and five Reformers; on the 19th of March, fourteen Conservatives and three Reformers, so that the first three Gazettes after the election gave fifty Conservatives and nine Reformers. Then on the 26th of March there were two Conservatives to eighteen Reformers; on the 2nd of April, one Conservative to six Reformers; on the 9th of April, one Conservative to five Reformers, so that the three later Gazettes gave four Conservatives to twenty-nine Reformers. Is anybody simple enough to believe that that is an accident? We cannot tell yet where it happened, whether it was the returning officers that delayed them in some cases or that gentle pressure like that exerted by my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Patterson) expedited them in others; but that there was intentional delay in one case and expedition in the other who upon those figures can doubt, particularly when we learn that something like the same results—though I was not able to analyse them as definitely from the statements which hon. gentlemen made—happened in the other Provinces? The general result then is that the first three Gazettes after the election gave fifty Conservatives to nine Reformers, and the last three four Conservatives to twenty-nine Reformers. The hon. gentleman says, what is wrong about it—what does the matter amount to? You have thirty days, the hon. gentleman says, during which petitions can be filed, and we have thirty days during which petitions can be filed; and he actually expected his confiding followers to agree with him that it made no difference at all. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) knew better than that. All of us knew better than that. We know that the time for petitioning lasts from the 22nd of February, the day of the election, until thirty days after the Gazette, and we know that in some cases, therefore, there are forty days to petition and in others sixty and seventy days, and we know that those who expedite the Gazette as a rule have the advantage. This further we know, that what the motive may be or what the advantage or disadvantage may be, we may put to one side, because the law commands the returning officer at once to return his writ to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the law commands the clerk to gazette the return by the next Gazette after he receives the writ. Now, all these circumstances are such as must lead every man's mind to the conviction that, if that law has by one or other of these sets of officers been disobeyed, it is our duty to investigate it and ascertain why the law of the land, productive of those consequences, favorable to one side and unfavorable to the other side, has been disobeyed. That is the purpose of this motion, and I do not think it is at all a waste of time that we should discuss the evidence in order to get at the facts, and to ascertain how, practically, the laws the hon. gentleman has caused Parliament to pass, ostensibly to secure the freedom of election, are working, and what results they are really producing.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, commenced his speech by explaining an incident in the political history of this country which has been the subject of discussion on various occasions. We all remember that when he became the First Minister of the Province of Ontario he laid down a general principle with reference to the relation of the Provincial Governments to the Dominion Government. Before that time the late Hon. Sandfield Macdonald was Premier of the Province of Ontario, and the common expression that used to be made use of by the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends, in speaking of that late hon. gentleman and the leader of this Government was that they were in the habit of hunting in couples, and that was denounced by them as a great public wrong. Now, we learn that although the hon. gentleman denounced them at that time, and declared when he came into office in Ontario that he was thereafter to adopt a different principle, a principle of entire neutrality, he now asks us to believe that when he said that he did not in the slightest degree desire to restrict the independent action of members of either Government as citizens of the different Provinces of the Dominion in connection with the elections of either the Local or the Dominion Legislatures. The hon. gentleman forgets that the late Hon. Sandfield Macdonald was a member of this House—that he stood in precisely the same position the hon. gentleman stood in. He forgets that the moment the late Government of this Dominion came in, the hunting in couples went on between Mr. Mowat and Mr. Mackenzie. The position was precisely the same as it had been during the time the late Hon. Sandfield Macdonald was in office, and the present First Minister was First Minister of Canada. Nay, more than that, this very evening we have had from the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) an attack on two members of this Government who happened to be electors in the Province of Nova Scotia, because they ventured to take any part there in the election for the Local Legislature. Why does the hon. gentleman now lay down the principle that he has a right as an independent citizen of the Province of Ontario to take what interest he pleases in the Local elections there, while his joint leader from the Province of Nova Scotia, the member of the syndicate who has been appointed to lead the Opposition with the hon. gentleman, denounces members of this Government who happened to be electors, and prominent public men in Nova Scotia, for taking part in the elections of that Province? I think, Sir, the hon. gentleman, with all the skill he undoubtedly possesses, has utterly failed to explain how he could for four years denounce as a wrong against public and political morality, the joint action in public affairs of the leader of any Provincial Government and the leader of the Dominion Government who happened to think alike on political questions, and at the same time show that he was justified, as an independent member of this House and an independent citizen of the Province of Ontario, in taking an active part in the elections there. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman dealt with the general question, and that is the real question we have before us to-night. As to the appointment of returning officers, he laid down the principle that we ought, as a matter of duty and a matter of right, to appoint sheriffs and registrars as returning officers in Dominion elections. Well, that was not always the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite. If I remember rightly, they actually violated the law on one occasion in order to appoint a partisan returning officer. We know what occurred in the courts of the country. The records are there. We remember the somewhat famous Jacques Cartier election. We know that the returning officer in that election was not the official named in the statute, and he was appointed by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was, either then or before, a member—because he was so frequently in and out of that Government that one cannot say for certain whether he was in or out at that time. I do not for a moment say that the results which followed that appointment were due to it. I do not say that that remarkable effort to steal an election, which was commonly known as the Ste. Anne's cupboard or ballot box scheme, was a consequence of that appointment; but I do say, that gentlemen who violated the law to appoint a returning officer, who was not the official that the law said should be appointed, do not stand very well in telling us here that a wrong has been done when the law has been followed in appointing gentlemen other than those officials as returning officers. But what is the position the hon. gentleman takes? He says we ought not to appoint partisans as returning officers, and he was prepared to read a list of persons who, I suppose, he was prepared to show were active partisans of the Conservative party. Well, Sir, suppose we adopted the other principle, what would be the result? I can imagine a case like this: A prominent member of Parliament happens to be defeated at an election, and his friends are very anxious to have him back in Parliament. His friends happen to control the Government of one of the Provinces. There is a member sitting in this House whose seat would be a very safe one for this gentleman who had been expelled by the verdict of the constituency he should have represented. The Local Government purchase the seat of the member by granting him an office of sheriff in order to provide a seat here for the prominent member of their party. Immediately an election occurs, and this Government have to appoint this impartial person, this man without politics, as returning officer, because, forsooth, he has sold himself for a shrievalty in order to make room for an opponent of the Government. The Government are to appoint him in order to avoid the evil that might result from appointing a partisan. Why, Sir, everyone knows that these sheriffs and registrars are appointed because they are friends of the party that appoints them. Everyone knows that they are appointed because of active political services for the party that appoints them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Even in Ottawa.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes, even in Ottawa such things occur, and occur under very peculiar circumstances. Take, for instance, such a case as we have recently had, where a vacancy occurs in a registrarship, where it is kept open for more than a year, during which time there are a dozen applicants, all men who have strong claims for a position of that kind. But it happens that one particular partisan who would never be thought of but for his partisanship or for the partisanship he can bring to bear in favor of his appointment—he happens to have relatives who can do some service to the party—has to be provided for. The office is allowed to remain vacant until the Local elections are through, and when the last election is over and all the service is rendered that can be rendered by this non-partisan, he is immediately appointed to the registrarship. Then, because he becomes an impartial man by virtue of his having been made registrar, he is to be appointed returning officer. The injustice of the system is evident. On the other hand, the policy we have adopted is the best, for this reason, the Government returning officer is subject to the scrutiny of the courts. If we look at the elections through which we have just passed, I venture the opinion, despite what hon. gentlemen opposite have said, that few cases of complaint have occurred in the conduct of them as have occurred at any previous elections since 1867. Where are the complaints with regard to the conduct of returning officers? We have one which is under discussion. We may deal with it here, the courts may deal with it hereafter, but it is a case where the conduct of the returning officer is subject to the review of the court. More than that, the Government in the appointment of returning officers is subject to the control and censure of Parliament itself. The pretence that we will have less partisan men by the appointment of provincial officers is simply a pretence, as hon. gentlemen opposite know very well. Let me say one word more. This is a motion to bring a respected officer of Parliament before the bar of the House. He is asked to bring down papers to be submitted to the House. These papers, it is presumed, will give us the information on which a judgment can be formed; yet we have had hon. gentlemen opposite, one after the other, assuming, before the papers are brought down, and on the very motion asking for the papers, that some great wrong has been committed and that some one is bound to suffer censure. Would it not be better to wait until the papers are brought down before discussing the question whether wrong has been done at all? I do not believe, when we come to discuss the question as to the conduct of returning officers during the last election, that hon. gentlemen on this side will have any reason to regret the discussion. Take one case, and that is simply one of a number. Take the case of Kingston, where, it is said, the returning and the deputy returning officers were friends of the First Minister, who was a candidate, and what do we find. The judge who, if he had any politics, is not friendly to the Government, and we have no right to assume he has any politics at all, when he came to review the action of the returning officer found that the difference in the number of votes which ought to have been counted and the number which was counted, operated to the advantage of the First Minister. Twelve was the majority returned by the returning officer, this partisan and corrupt man who had been put in that position for the purpose of electing the Conservative candidate; yet when the judge went over the ballots he found the numbers should have been seventeen. I believe when the time comes to discuss the whole question or the election and all the incidents connected with it, it will not be hon. gentlemen on this side who will have any reason to regret that discussion.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil). I am grateful to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that he has given permission to the junior members of this House to test the acoustic properties of this Chamber, and at the same time air their eloquence. I had hoped to be spared my first speech until a better occasion offered than the present. I had hoped that something would be before the House more important than the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, on which I might exercise my oratory. But it must fall to the lot of every hon. gentleman, who represents a constituency in this House, at some time to have to speak for the constituency he represents. If he be a true man, he is attached to one party or the other, and when he finds his party maligned on any occasion, he is bound to stand up for it. I propose to do this in my humble way. I propose to show to this House that if the Government agent acted in my constituency, as these agents are said by hon. gentlemen opposite to have acted in other constituencies, the results in mine might have been very different. I may be allowed to say that in representing the county of Argenteuil, I represent not only the Conservatives but the Reformers as well. I am afraid many hon. gentlemen opposite are guilty of forgetting the fact that they are representatives of the Conservative party as well as the Reform party of their constituencies, and that in their malignment of Conservative partisanship on the part of the returning officers of their electoral districts, they are equally maligning the people they are sent here to represent. The county of Argenteuil has been represented for the last thirty years, with the exception of an interregnum of four years, by a Conservative in this House, the Hon. Mr. Abbott. On each occasion that electoral district returned a member to the House of Commons by a very small majority, and if any effort had been put forth by the Government to prevent the return of a Grit—I use the word advisedly, for the leader of the Opposition uses the word "Tory" without sparing this side—if the Government suspected as they had reason to suspect, that the county of Argenteuil was not a safe one, in view of the small majorities it always gave, they might have named a returning officer in the place of the one who exercised that function at the last elections. But the Government would not interfere with the usage of years gone by in that constituency. In it, the returning officer is a pronounced Grit, and yet he was allowed to retain his position. He was allowed to remain, despite the fact that he was a Grit, and despite the fact also that the district had been in the habit of returning a gentleman to this House by a narrow majority of between 4 and 100 in a total vote of 3,000. Did the Government act fraudulently in this case? No; they left the gentleman there who had been returning officer for years. Therefore, I must rebut the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in so far as Argenteuil is concerned. But there is a more forcible point to this question. It was well known to the Government that Mr. Abbott was about to resign his position as a member of the House of Commons, or, at least, that he was going to lay no claim upon the electors of Argenteuil. And that was well known to the Government, I am satisfied long before the appointment of a returning officer. Yet, forsooth, the Government did not see fit, nor did they act in that fraudulent manner, that base manner attributed to them by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side. Was it not well known to the Government that it was a very unwise and very unsafe thing to swap horses in crossing a stream? It certainly was, and they must have known that if any effort was to be put forth to reclaim the county of Argenteuil for the Grit party it could well have been put forth at this time. With all this, which they must have known, did they act in this base and fraudulent manner, did they place a partisan there to serve their purpose? No, they left that officer there, and they knew him to be a pronounced Grit. As to the statement made by the senior member for Halifax, and the fault found by him because he was not gazetted earlier, I can scarcely think that his claim that he was not fairly dealt with is well founded, because the returning officer for the constituency of Argenteuil made a return of my election on the 2nd March, and yet I was not gazetted until the 19th March although I was known to be a Tory. Now, if the senior member for Halifax was not gazetted until the 19th March and his return was made on the 4th March, what complaint has he more than I have? None whatever. But the position of the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House reminds me very much of the position of the party they represent in the constituency which I have the honor to represent, after the General election. They believed they were satisfied, and had made their calculations sure and fast, that the candidate who opposed me was to be returned by 450 majority, and I am satisfied that the disappointment of the man when he found I was returned by almost half that majority was not greater than the disappointment of the hon. gentlemen opposite in finding that they are not on the Treasury benches to day. I shall not forget when the hon. the leader of the Opposition took the chance to deliver an address here, whether by fair means or foul, on the day of the election of a Speaker. I have had the honor of representing a constituency in municipal matters, but I had not thought that such devices were introduced into the House of Commons. I had thought better of the conduct of members in the House of Commons. I thought, when I came here, that our time was to be devoted to legislation, and it is well for us that legislation is going on all the time, that we have clerks and servants working for us while we are playing, for, in this little sparring exhibition which we have had going on here from five o'clock this afternoon to the present moment, ten o'clock, I claim that we have been doing nothing but playing. We are talking against time. There is a court where this matter will be decided. It has been said by the leader of the Opposition that it might be as well for us to be here as to be sporting our time in the hotels and in our boarding houses. I question that very much, because if in our hotels and boarding houses we would not now be making objects of ourselves, objects of ridicule, the butts of the press of the whole Dominion. Now, if the Tory slogan that the hon. gentleman mentioned had gone forth against him in this election campaign, there was a no less forcible slogan which went forth against me in my election. I had a very ticklish question to deal with, and the slogan against me at one time was not the same as the slogan at another time. I had to fight the Riel matter, and that was introduced by the party of the hon. members from the Opposition. If the Riel matter had been left out of my county, I would have had a lesser fight, but that was introduced by whom? By the party of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. It was introduced there, but it had little effect, for the effect which it was thought would be produced in the front of the county, had its counter effect in the rear. I will not mention it further. The hon. the leader of the Opposition said that the slogan had gone forth, and that all sorts of cries had gone out,—

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to order. I have not interrupted the hon. gentleman as a new member when he violated your rule laid down a short time ago, when you declined to permit particulars in regard to returning officers to be stated, which I presume will apply to the good conduct of returning officers as well as to their bad conduct; nor did I interrupt him when he proceeded, contrary to order, to refer to a former debate in terms which could only be excused on the ground of his ignorance of parliamentary procedure; but when he misrepresents my observations I think I should rise to order, and call your attention to his remarks, and ask you to restrain him, unless I am allowed the opportunity to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman from Argenteuil will remember that it is not allowed, according to our rules in this House, to refer to a debate which has taken place on another motion which has already been tried, and I shall ask him not to refer to any of these debates which are now closed.

Mr. WILSON (Argenteuil). I am very happy indeed to be corrected. I supposed when I got up that I would be corrected two or three times before I took my seat. I am very fortunate indeed to have been corrected only once. I am satisfied that the conduct of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in this matter of bringing these election returns and the returning officers and their conduct before the bar of the House will not do them any good. It will fasten more strongly to this party many members who might be vacillating. Why? Because their question is so imbecile. It is an impossibility to find gentlemen on either side of politics that are impartial. Whom shall we appoint as returning officers? Shall we appoint men who are without an opinion of their own? Would they be fit men to put in a position of that kind, men who are not capable of taking one side or the other? I say no. We cannot find such men in the Dominion. They must be either Conservatives or Reformers. Would the party I belong to be guilty of such an act of suicide as to choose men to be returning officers who would be known to be favorable to hon. gentlemen opposite? I thank the House for having so patiently listened to my first speech here, when I have had the privilege of taking my first bath in Dominion politics.

Mr. DALY. Perhaps the House will permit me to make some observations in reply to one hon. gentleman who has referred to the question of certificates used in Selkirk. I was not aware, owing to the fact of the time having elapsed last Tuesday within which my election could be contested, that there was anything against me, or that anything had been done by myself or my agent, that would void my election; there is not the slightest doubt in the world that a petition would have been filed before last Tuesday if it could have been done. In reference to certificates, I can tell the hon. gentleman that at a place called Deloraine, in my district, where there was a majority of twenty-four against me, I was very much surprised because my committee told me there were only likely to be a majority of two. After the election I ascertained that the reason why I had a majority of twenty-four against me was, that my opponent had voted twenty-two persons at this poll upon certificates given to him by the returning officer; so that if votes were cast for me on certificates, similar votes were also cast for my opponent. But I understand from whom the hon. gentleman received his information upon this question, because my opponent has been in the city during these past few days; and although he had from the 12th of March, when I was gazetted, up to the 5th of April, when I left the city of Brandon, to petition against my election, he did not do so; but when he came here he apparently consulted with the leader of the Opposition and hon. gentlemen opposite, and he, no doubt, received some new light upon the subject. But, unfortunately for the leader of the Opposition, and unfortunately for my opponent, the time had elapsed, he was two days too late to file the petition. I have not the slightest doubt that he received new light from the leader of the Opposition, and in consequence I am pretty sure they would like to file a petition against me. Now, in reference to returning officers in the Province of Manitoba, I may state that the returning officer for the city of Winnipeg is the registrar for the county of Selkirk, not the electoral district of Selkirk, which I represent; and the returning officer for Lisgar was the registrar of one of the counties comprised within the limits of the electoral district of Lisgar; and I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite will enquire as to whether the election of the hon. member for Lisgar was carried improperly or not, seeing that he was elected by acclamation. The gentleman who acted as returning officer for Provencher was the clerk of the court, and, at the same time, he was a dyed-in-the-wool Grit. Now, the only electoral district, out of five in Manitoba, where that officer was not an officer of the court or registrar, was the district of Selkirk. In Marquette the returning officer was a sheriff of the central judicial district of Manitoba; so that out of the whole five, with the exception of the district I represent, these four gentlemen were officers of the court—one sheriff, two registrars and one clerk of the court. The returning officer in Selkirk was a gentleman who, I am sure, acted most impartially and discharged his duties well, because, if he had not done so, there is no doubt that a petition would have been filed against me before the 12th of this month.

Mr. WATSON. As my constituency has been mentioned by the last speaker, I will take the occasion of saying that I think it very unfortunate that the instructions given to the returning officers should have led to so much trouble. In my county, previous to the nomination and afterwards, the returning officer informed me that he would allow no voters to record their votes on certificate, except two at each poll. That was his interpretation of the Act, and I believe it was correct. But the day before the election, on returning to Portage la Prairie, the returning officer decided that he must do otherwise. The member for Lisgar captured an army of sixty-six certified voters who recorded their votes against me in the town of Portage la Prairie on certificates, as I believe, contrary to law, and contrary to the provision that only two certified voters are entitled to vote at each poll. There are five polling districts in that town, and sixty-six voters outside the town recorded their votes. I have no particular fault to find with that officer in the position he occupies. I know that it was his intention to carry out that election honorably and fairly, but he told me himself that such a pressure was brought to bear upon him by supporters of the Government that he was compelled, even two days before the election, to issue those certificates, which he believed to be a fraud himself. If it had not been for the use of those certified voters, I should have been returned by a much larger majority than I received. As regards the returns, I believe I might have been gazetted some two weeks earlier than I was. It is true, I live a little distance from here, although no further than the hon. gentleman for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), and it seems to me I ought to have been gazetted at the same date he was, instead of two weeks later. I do not know whether that was the fault of the returning officer or the fault of the officials in Ottawa. I think it is of the utmost importance that these documents should be laid before the House, because there is a wholesale charge made against all the returning officers. Some of them must be accused wrongfully. From the discussions I have heard to-night it appears that the returns have not been gazetted as received, but it is not right to accuse those returning officers who have done their duty and made their returns punctually, as the Grit returning officer from Hastings made his. My hon. friend from Hastings was the first gentleman gazetted, I believe, and it was done by a Grit returning officer. It is not right that this wholesale charge should stand against the returning officers, therefore I think the returns asked for by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should be brought down.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say with reference to the returning officer in my constituency, that previous to the last election he had acted as such for many years, and held the position of registrar. He was not by any means a Reformer or a Grit. He was appointed by the Government of Sandfield Macdonald, when my esteemed friend, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Carling) was a member of the Government. Undoubtedly he was an honest man, and he discharged the duties of returning officer ever since Confederation. I cannot understand for what reason he was jilted at the last election, and another man appointed in his place. I did hear, after the election was over, something about a cause dating since the election of 1882. I believe that at that time, when Senator Plumb was my opponent, he did not carry out what my opponent thought he should have done in connection with the declaration, and it was owing to that fact that a quiet hint was given to him that he would not be permitted to occupy the position any longer. The man that was appointed in his place performed the duties very creditably for a new man, and I have no fault to find, further than this, that I was not gazetted before the 3rd of April. Now, on the 4th of March, I received my certificate of having been duly elected member for North Wellington. I believe the returning officer sent forward his return at the proper period after the necessary number of days had elapsed that these papers should remain in his hands. He told me he would make his return just so soon as the time was up, and I believe he did so. If he did so, those papers would arrive at Ottawa on 10th March, and they were held by the official in whose charge they were until 3rd April. I cannot understand why that should have taken place. I simply say it appears singular it should have happened. With respect to the question of protest, on which a good deal has been said, and as to the probability of a protest being entered against those members last gazetted, I would say this: It will be no new thing for North Wellington to have a protest. There has not been an election in that riding, from Confederation to the present time, when a Reformer has been elected, at which a protest has not been entered. There has never been a protest in that riding entered against a Conservative, but all the Reformers returned have been protested against. So a protest will be nothing new or strange, and I do not feel at all anxious about it, for it is no use getting excited, but it is better to take it coolly. I desire to offer these remarks in vindication of the gentleman who discharged the duties of returning officer from 1867 down to a recent day, and I believe if anything tended to add to my majority it was the dismissal of that officer from his position and the appointment of a stranger. He was well known and well liked and many of his friends felt deeply aggrieved at his removal; and this action, no doubt, added largely also to the majority of my friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), because that officer lived in Peel, and friends sympathised with him and manifested their condemnation of the action of the Government in removing him from the position he had occupied for so many years and the duties of which he had discharged so efficiently, and appointing a stranger, although I frankly admit that the recent returning officer endeavored to discharge his duties faithfully and to the best of his ability, and I believe he did so on every occasion, even up to forwarding the returns.

Mr. PLATT. It is pleasing to know that in the general and sweeping charge made against the action of the returning officers there are, here and there, instances where we are able to exonerate them from the charge made. I wish to add to the list of those against whom no charge, so far as I know, can be laid, the returning officer of the county which I represent. My grievance in the matter under discussion, is perhaps as great as that of any hon. member, still I am not able to lay any charge at the door of the returning officer, notwithstanding the fact that that officer was, and is to-day, the secretary of the Liberal-Conservative Association of the county and was solicitor for the Conservative party during the revision of the lists. It seems, however, that where the evil instrument could not be found in the constituency such instrument was found at the Capital. I have made some enquiry, and I trust the papers connected with the matter will be brought down. I know that the return from the county of Prince Edward was forwarded to Ottawa on 9th March. I know that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery acknowledged the receipt of that return on 11th March. I know that no correspondence took place between that officer and the returning officer of that county between that time and the time of the gazetted. I have further to state that the officer found time, on 11th March, to acknowledge the receipt of the return, but he did not find time to send a message to the printer of the Gazette for the issue of the 12th, nor did he find time to send the message by the 19th, nor by the 26th, nor by 2nd April, and it was not till 9th April that my return was gazetted. I trust the papers will be brought down in order that we may ascertain the reason of the delay. I make no charge. It may be that in some instances correspondence was necessary between the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and the returning officer, but in my case no such correspondence took place, and no such correspondence was necessary. As has been said the law directs and commands that that officer shall publish the returns in the next Gazette. This return was acknowledged on 11th March, and not published till 9th April.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the House to what has been done in the North-West Territories, though the leader of the Opposition has not alluded to what has been done there, because if the same principles guided the Administration in the appointment of returning officers in other parts of the Dominion as guided them in the North-West Territories, then they must have acted with conspicuous fairness. We had in the constituency for the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Perley) Mr. Hugel as returning officer, an old supporter, and I believe still a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. MEMBER. No; he is a Tory.

Mr. DAVIN. Is he a Tory now? I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is in a position to say whether Mr.

Hugel is a Tory or not. If he is I am glad to hear it, because I am glad to know there are so many supporters of good government in the country. Mr. Fitzgerald was also a Reformer, and so far as I know he is a supporter of the Reform party still. He was returning officer at Calgary. In the constituency I have the honor to represent, Mr. Watson, clerk of the court, was appointed, and he was certainly the person who would naturally be appointed the returning officer. Mr. Sproat was also the person, I suppose, who would naturally be fixed on for Saskatchewan. It seems to me we have had a fight, and the party which the hon. member for West Durham leads has been beaten along the whole line. This discussion is also very natural, because I never knew a case in which two contestants measured their strength at anything, whether fisticuffs, billiards or other sports, when the beaten man did not try to explain that if something had not occurred he would have won. In billiards the man who is beaten will be very careful to explain that if he had only chalked his cue he would certainly have scored a triumph. I remember once passing down the main street of Winnipeg and seeing a little boy weeping. On enquiring of the boys in the crowd, one of them said with great contempt: He is not able to take a licking like a gentleman. I have here a paper, the London Advertiser, which is a supporter of the leader of the Opposition. There is, in the first article, a reference to the North-West representation which I might have brought up as a matter of privilege, but which I think I may properly allude to as showing the same tendency that has been shown here this evening, to try and pare down the result of the victory which places parties in their present position in this House. This article, which deals with North-West representation, deals with it in precisely the same spirit as that in which this debate has been conducted by the Opposition. It states that the North-West representatives in the House of Commons are representatives rather of the Ministry than of the people. That they were elected by open voting, so that every voter might be made to feel that the eyes of Government officials were upon him. Now, Sir, that is precisely in the same spirit as those remarks which have been made about the appointment of returning officers; the object in both cases is to try to lessen the effect of the victory which was achieved. My hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Perley) and myself were returned with such overwhelming majorities that those attempts to lessen the effect of these victories by the stories we have heard about the influence of officials, the distribution of seed grain, and so on, are worse than contemptible. Let me say that there is not a particle of foundation for the statements made about the influence of officials in these elections. If any hon. member following the leader of the Opposition will put the matter in such a way that we can bring it before the House, I will undertake to show him that the number of votes cast by the officials was in the aggregate contemptible, and that the large proportion of them were cast against us. The strongest opposition I got myself in West Assiniboia came from prominent officials who happened to be friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and so far as I am concerned one hair of their heads will not be touched.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not mean to appropriate it; that was a figurative expression. Prominent officials on the day of election went and voted against me, and it did not make the least difference with me. Sir, we heard the statement that we had something to do with distributing seed grain. Mr. Speaker, you had as much to do with distributing seed grain as I had, and when the statement first came up I asked my opponent, who was on the platform, if he had anything to do with it, and he came forward and told the people that there was not a word of truth in such statements, that he and I were members of the same committee, and that he had as much to do with the matter as I had. Why, Sir, the man who distributed seed grain at Maple Creek was chairman of my opponent's committee, and two of my strongest opponents in West Assiniboia were appointed deputy returning officers. In East Assiniboia one-half the deputy returning officers were followers of the hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition. Sir, I call the attention of the House to this, not because I want to go into the questions which have been discussed with regard to eastern constituencies, but I reason from analogy that if the charges with regard to eastern constituencies are as foundationless, as contemptible, as those which have been made in regard to that part of Canada with which I am familiar, and as to which I can speak with authority, then, Sir, they are unworthy the hon. gentleman, unworthy of a man of his talents to make.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE. I just want to bring to the notice of the House the question as it stands in the motion now before us. The meaning of the motion is to the effect that there shall be laid before this House the returns made by the different returning officers to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in order that information may be afforded to this House, as to whether that officer has done his duty or not. The law, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the hon. members on the other side of the House, is very plain, and if you will allow me I will read a section or two of the law. Section 65 says:

"Returning officers shall, immediately after the sixth day after the final addition by him, unless before that time he receives notice that he is required to attend before a judge, &c., transmit his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been duly elected, and shall forward to each of the respective candidates a duplicate or copy thereof and such return shall be in the form, &c."

Sub-section 3 says:

"The returning officer shall also transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery with his return, the ballot papers, the original statements of the several deputy returning officers, &c."

What, then, is the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery? It is explained by section 66:

"The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall, on receiving the return of any member elected to the House of Commons, give notice in the next ordinary issue of the Canada Gazette of the name of the candidate so elected."

Well, is this our law? If it is our law, hon. gentlemen opposite explain it apparently by holding that it is the law for the other side of the House, but not for this. There is evidently in this matter, as in many other instances, two laws—one for the Tories and one for the Liberals. Take, for instance, my own case. I do not want to go into the details of the two elections I had to run before taking my seat; it would probably be too long a story. I may say, however, that the returning officer in my county made his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 7th of March. The papers were in perfect order, because the returning officer had the experience gained in the former election in July, in which he made all sorts of blunders; but he performed his duty tolerably well at the last election. His return was received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the 7th of March, having been sent a day or two previously. I was gazetted on the 26th of March. I do not mention that fact because I am afraid of a contestation or petition. I stand in the same position as the hon. member for North Wellington. In the county I represent it is customary to have petitions; there is never any election without a petition, especially if a Liberal or a Nationalist is elected, so I expect a petition, and the anxiety under which I labor at the present moment is not very great. It would have been just as bad if the petition had been served on me, or if I had been waiting for it. But by the papers which have been filed here by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, I suppose we shall discover that in many instances he acted in the same way. If he did not act under special instructions, there is no doubt that he did not carry out the law as contained in the Statute-book, and the sooner we know it the better, so that such amendments can be made in it as will make it bear equally on the members on both sides of this House. If we were allowed to refer to the Local elections which took place in the Province of Quebec, on the 14th of October, 1886, and to the returns as they were published in the Official Gazette, we might discover that this plan of publishing the returns of the greater portion of the members on one side first, and the greater portion on the other side last, so as to allow a longer delay in the one case than in the other to contest the election, has not been invented by this Government or this Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, but was invented in the Province of Quebec after the last Local election. Certain members of the Local House were threatened with election petitions because their returns were not made until after a great delay. Well, that course had no great effect after all, as everyone knows by the result. This matter, so far as it concerns the members of the House of Commons, is one of the greatest importance. I do not stand here to lecture anybody, but rather as a new member to be lectured; but my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Wilson), with whom I sat as a member of the city council of Montreal for many years, will allow me to remark that he departed widely from the subject when he brought the Riel question into the discussion, for it has no bearing whatever upon this simple motion of the hon. member for Bothwell. What concerns this House to-night is whether the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who is under the control of this House and not of the Government, and is bound to carry out the law, acted upon the advice of someone else, or whether he acted on his own authority. If he acted on his own authority, it will be for this House to declare whether he acted according to law. Before I take my seat, I wish to mention a fact in connection with the elections in my county. Another proof that there is not one law for everybody in this House or every citizen of this country, was given by the first election that took place in the county of Chambly after last Session. It had been stated in the press, and on the floor of this House, that the election in the county of Haldimand could not take place until the new lists were in force. My friends in the county of Chambly were aware that the former member for the county was about to secure an office, and to a certain extent we depended on this declaration of the Government, although we had no great confidence in them, and therefore folded our hands and waited until the new lists should be completed. Well, in the county of Chambly the application of the law was different from that in the county of Haldimand. In Haldimand the election could not take place until the new lists were in force; in Chambly the Government were bound to have the elections under the old lists, and the polling day was fixed just the day before the new lists came into force. The election took place on the 30th of July, and the new lists were to come into force on the 1st of August. We tried to get an explanation of the matter from the Government candidate, but could not get any. Perhaps we may get one during the course of the Session. At any rate this is another fact showing how the law has been administered in different cases.

Mr. BRIEN. At this late hour I will not detain this House any great length of time. Somebody is to blame in this matter, either the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or the returning officer. But I rise especially in defence of the gentleman who occupied the position of returning officer in my constituency. He has occupied that position for sometime, and is a man who is perfectly conversant with his duty, and I have evidence here to show that he made my return on the 12th of March, while I was not gazetted until the 2nd of April, so that the blame does not lie at his door. The hon. member who represents West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says the hon. leader of the Opposition failed because he did not chalk his cue properly. I presume he had not the right kind of chalk for his cue. I understand the game of billiards somewhat, and presume that had the leader of the Opposition good seed grain to chalk his political cue with, he would have been more successful. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is so sympathetic with the officials of that country that although they voted against him he will not see one hair of their head injured, for he knows the difficulty of the lack of that same material himself. The right hon. the First Minister found a great deal of fault with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), because he thought fit to call the attention of the House to this matter. The First Minister pooh-poohed the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell, but no one knows better than he the value of these things. The Mail once said, when the notorious Gerrymandering Act was passed, that, if four or five, or seven or eight, Grits perished it did not matter; and so the First Minister can afford to say that if the naming of partial returning officers would have the effect of cutting off a few Grits, that was not any great matter. The hon. member for North Essex said the Government were not afraid of the Opposition; but if we look over the record we cannot fail to see clearly that they must be afraid of the Opposition or at least of the people, because they are never willing to go fairly and squarely before the people on political issues, they must always have the Grit party tied hand and foot in some way or other. I have no objection to being called a Grit myself, although I presume it is an equivalent to Tory. This is the first time I have heard that the Conservative party were ashamed of that name, but I presume there are many things connected with that name in history of which they may well be ashamed. I believe if we had an opportunity of going before the people without any Franchise Bill, and without any Gerrymander Act, without seed grain and open voting, the leader of the Opposition would return with the majority of votes in his favor. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) referred to the religious cry brought against him. I am sorry to see there are any parties in this country who would raise such a cry, but hon. gentlemen opposite are the men who must bear the responsibility. As the evening is now late, I may say, in conclusion, that I have evidence showing distinctly that in my case the returning officer is not to blame for the fact of my not being gazetted for nearly three weeks; but there must be some one to blame, and this motion is made in order that we might find out where the blame lies.

Mr. MILLS. I understood the leader of the Government to say he agrees in this motion, substituting the word "tomorrow" for "forthwith." I am quite ready to accept that amendment. I will not detain the House by any observations in reply to what was said by hon. gentlemen opposite, further than to call the First Minister's attention to the fact that, notwithstanding the extreme charge he made against the Local Government of Ontario, that it so controlled, bullied, and coerced its officers that neither the sheriff nor registrar could be trusted with the duties of returning officer in the elections, he himself selected sheriffs and registrars for the discharge of these duties. I think the hon. gentleman will have some difficulty in reconciling his charge against the Administration that has long had control in this matter, with the fact that he selected officials of the Local Government to be returning officers, which he would not have done had he not felt assured they would act in a manner, at all events, not detrimental to the party he leads. The hon. gentleman, in making the selection of certain officials of the Local Government, certain sheriffs and registrars, to be returning officers, has clearly disposed of the charge which he himself made against the Local Administration. I alluded to the fact that there was misconduct on the part of the returning officers in many instances, that the law was disregarded, that there was one rule and one measure of justice for hon. gentlemen on that side, and another rule and another measure, not of justice, but of injustice, for hon. gentlemen on this side. Now, the First Minister said that it really made no difference whether we were gazetted immediately after the election or one month later, and yet the whole conduct of the hon. gentleman and his friends shows that he himself did not subscribe to the doctrine he had put forward in this House. Here are the Official Gazettes. In those Gazettes the hon. gentleman and his supporters are nearly all gazetted before any hon. member on this side. Has the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or the returning officer been doing the hon. gentleman wrong? How came the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to act in this way? It is perfectly clear that the law has not been complied with; it is clear that some gentlemen, either the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or those whom the Government appointed returning officers, have neglected to comply with the law of the land. They have not discharged the duty imposed upon them. Either they have not given in their returns of members within the time required by law, or the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has not gazetted them as soon as he received the returns. We are entitled to know who has violated the law in this particular, and to see that just punishment is meted out to the party who has been guilty of dereliction of duty.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In rising to move the adjournment of the House, I may say to the hon. member for Bothwell, that if it will ease his mind we will keep Mr. Hudspeth on the gridiron on the next sixty days. He has just been elected by 50 of a majority.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope the hon. gentleman will not be so unmerciful to Mr. Hudspeth. The hon. gentleman procured the revising officer from one county to stand contrary to law. He then used his power for an improper purpose, while a petition was capable of being filed against him, to give the equivalent of a resignation by appointing him a landing-waiter. Mr. Hudspeth was made revising officer, then elected for Victoria, then appointed landing-waiter, and re-elected by a small majority. The hon. gentleman now proposes, after all these violations of the law, to violate it still further in favor of this person. I trust, in obedience to the law, if not out of consideration for the suffering person, he will gazette him as soon as possible, and I dare say that, even with the early gazetting, there will be time enough to file a petition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When do the Government propose to lay the papers connected with the census returns of Manitoba on the Table? That was taken in August last and ought to be in readiness now.

Mr. CARLING. They are preparing them as fast as possible, and I am informed that to-morrow they will be brought down.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

Report of Department of the Secretary of State for the year ending June 30th, 1886.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

Report of the Board of Examiners for the Civil Service of Canada, for the year ending 31st December, 1886.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 9) for the discharge of insolvent debtors whose assets have been distributed rateably among their creditors.—(Mr. Edgar.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY EXTENSION TO QUEBEC HARBOR.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the sum of $960,000 voted in 1884 (47 Victoria, chapter 8) for the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the harbor of Quebec, has been in whole, or in part, paid to any person; and if so, to what amount, to whom and when has the same been paid?

Mr. POPE. I would say that the sum mentioned by the hon. gentleman was invested in bonds of the railway, the interest on which is held liable, according to agreement, to pay any deficiency that may arise in running the road.

PROTECTION OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN BEHRING'S SEA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Whether the Government have represented to the Imperial Government the necessity of taking such steps as will protect the rights and liberties of British subjects in the waters of Behring's Sea? If so, with what result?

Mr. FOSTER. Representations have been made to the Imperial Government, and the papers, so far as they can be brought down, will be laid on the Table of the House at an early day.

LIFE SAVING STATION ON VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Whether the Government intend establishing a life-saving station on the south-west coast of Vancouver Island?

Mr. FOSTER. This subject is now engaging the attention of the Department.

HIGH COMMISSIONER AT LONDON.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Who is now acting as High Commissioner for Canada at London? Has Sir Charles Tupper continued to act since his return to Canada, and is he still acting as such ad interim or otherwise?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Sir Charles Tupper has consented to act as High Commissioner without salary or emolument of any kind. While he is here Mr. Colmer, Secretary of the Department, in London, acts as Chargé d'Affaires and Secretary of Legation.

REVISING OFFICER FOR MONTMORENCY.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. LANGELIER, Montmorency) asked, On what date did J. A. Charlebois, Esq., revising officer for the county of Montmorency, resign his office, and when was his resignation accepted by the Government?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The letter of resignation bears date the 3rd of February, 1887. It was submitted to Council on the 14th. The Order in Council accepting his resignation was signed on the 2nd of March. A letter informing Mr. Charlebois of the fact was sent to him a few days afterwards.

EXAMINING WAREHOUSE IN OTTAWA.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. EDWARDS) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to proceed at once with the construction of the new Customs Examining Warehouse in Ottawa, for which tenders were called some time ago?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention to build a new Custom House and Examining Warehouse in Ottawa. The time of beginning the same is not yet fixed.

POST OFFICE IN THE TOWN OF MONTMAGNY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates this year a sum of money sufficient for the building of a post office in the town of Montmagny, in the county of Montmagny?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I beg to say, in answer to the hon. member, that it is not the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates this year a sum of money for the building of a post office in the town of Montmagny.

WARRANT FOR ARREST OF EDMUND E. SHEPPARD.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE asked, Whether the Government or the Minister of Justice has been informed that Mr.

Geo. T. Denison, police magistrate for the city of Toronto, in the Province of Ontario, has refused, contrary to the Act, chapter 174 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 49, to endorse a warrant signed and issued by one of the Judges of the Sessions of the Peace for the Province of Quebec, for the District of Montreal, M. C. Desnoyers, Esq., one of the police magistrates for the city of Montreal, for the arrest of one Edmund E. Sheppard, the said warrant bearing upon its face a criminal charge against the said Sheppard, for having libelled certain of the officers of the 65th Battalion, of Montreal, in relation to the expedition to the North-West in 1885; and if so, was it by the instructions of the Department of Justice such endorsement was refused, and if not, what position do the Government intend to assume in relation to the matter?

Mr. THOMPSON. We have no information on the subject other than what has appeared in the newspapers. No instructions whatever were given by the Department of Justice in relation to the subject, and as to any action that may be taken it will be necessary to make application to the Government of the Province of Ontario, whose officer Mr. Denison is.

IMMIGRATION INTO THE DOMINION IN 1886.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, What was the total number of immigrants arriving in the Dominion during the year 1886, as reported to the Department of Agriculture; the total number as far as known remaining in the Dominion, and the total number settling in the North West Territories and British Columbia?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That information will be found in the report which was laid before the House yesterday, or the day before, by the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

MAIL CONTRACTS IN LÉVIS COUNTY.

Mr. GUAY asked, To whom were the two contracts for the mail between the town of Lévis and village of Etchemin, county of Lévis, granted? Were tenders called for in relation to each of said contracts? If so, who were the parties who tendered and what was the amount of each tender?

Mr. McLELAN. The first contract was given to the lowest tenderer, Mr. Eloiard Leclerc, for $245. The second was let by the Post Office Inspector at Quebec, for the sum of $100, to P. E. Bourassa, the arrangement to be terminable at the pleasure of the Postmaster General.

CLERK OF THE CROWN IN CHANCERY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that, in accordance with the Order of the House of yesterday, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is in attendance at the Table with the several papers he was directed to produce.

Mr. MILLS. I move that, in obedience to the Order of yesterday, the papers having been brought down by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, they be now read.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that the returns should be put in the Votes and Proceedings, so that we could all read them.

Mr. BLAKE. But the only way it can be done is by a motion that they be now read. The formal reading can be dispensed with; but it requires the motion to get them in the Votes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well; so be it. Motion agreed to.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

Mr. CURRAN moved the following resolutions:—

That the Parliament of Canada in the year 1882 adopted a humble Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen expressing the hope that a just measure of Home Rule would be granted to the people of Ireland; and

That in the year 1886, by Resolution of the House of Commons, the sentiments of said Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty were earnestly reiterated and the hope again expressed that a measure of Home Rule satisfactory to the people of Ireland would be passed by the Imperial Parliament; and

That such measure of Home Rule has not been granted to the Irish people, but, on the contrary, there has been introduced into the Imperial House of Commons by Her Majesty's Government a Bill enacting the most stringent coercive measures for Ireland, by which the Irish people will be deprived of rights most dear to all British subjects.

That this House has learned with profound regret of the introduction into the Imperial House of Commons of the Coercion Bill above mentioned, and protests against its adoption, as being subversive of the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland.

That this House again expresses the hope that there may speedily be granted to Ireland such a measure of Home Rule as is enjoyed in the Dominion of Canada, which, whilst satisfying the national aspirations of the people of Ireland for self-government, shall also be consistent with the integrity of the Empire as a whole.

That the granting of Home Rule to Ireland will fittingly crown the already glorious reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty as a constitutional sovereign, will come with special appropriateness in this her jubilee year and, if possible, render Her Majesty more dear to the hearts of her already devoted and loyal subjects.

That the present resolutions be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, Prime Minister, to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., and Charles Stewart Parnell, M.P.

He said: Mr Speaker, The motion I have now the honor to lay before this House is one of very considerable importance, if we are to judge by the extended comment it has caused in the public press of the country since it first appeared on the Order paper. No doubt there have been very many opinions expressed as to the appropriateness or desirability or otherwise of bringing this question before our Parliament for discussion; but there is one thing that is exceedingly gratifying to me, and must be gratifying to all those who feel as I do on the question, that is, that throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion there has not been found one single paper that has come under my notice, no matter to what political party it belongs, or belonging to no political party at all, that has expressed anything but a desire that Home Rule should be granted to Ireland, and that at a very early date. Certain writers in the press have, no doubt, expressed themselves in very forcible terms against this motion. Some have gone so far as to call this motion a wild and insensate one. I think I shall recover very speedily from the effects of the strictures of such writers. For my part, I feel that I have no other apology to offer to this honorable House for bringing this subject forward than my own inability to deal with it in the manner in which it deserves. I feel that, in proposing this motion to-day, I am speaking the sentiments of at least 80 per cent. of the people of Canada. I make this appeal, Sir, not only in the name of an ancient race that has been oppressed for years, I may say for centuries, but I make it in the name of our common humanity; for, after all, as was said only a very few hours ago by a distinguished clergyman speaking at a public meeting on this subject, we are all members of the human family, and when one section of the family is oppressed or sought to be oppressed, the whole must feel a pang of suffering at witnessing such a sight. In the few observations I have to make to-day I shall not attempt any rhetorical effort. If eloquence could have saved the ancient Parliament of Ireland, the eloquence of Grattan certainly would have saved it from destruction. If eloquence could have revived that Parliament, the eloquence of O'Connell would have done so many years ago. But, Sir, that cause, the cause of a great nation, the cause of an ancient people, the cause of a people who have given to the world an exemplification of the truth, that the spirit of a nation never dieth—that cause has been spoken, and sung, and written of by the genius of Ireland's sons; and I feel that those great efforts having failed so far, although they have kept the spirit alive, although they have enabled the people to go on hoping almost against hope, it will be my duty to-day to confine myself principally to facts, to speak in the language of the greatest moderation, and to induce as many members of this honorable House as I can secure to wait across the Atlantic, to those who are favoring coercion and to those who are opposing it, the sentiments of the Canadian people upon this important subject. Now, Sir, I may be asked, how do I know what are the sentiments of the Canadian people on this question? I may be asked, can you rely upon the newspapers—can you take the press of this country as your guide in this matter? I say we have that already, but we have still more. The city of Montreal first gave the example of calling a large and unanimous meeting on this subject. Speaking of that meeting, a leading journal said:

"A great demonstration was held in the Queen's Hall to protest against coercion in Ireland. The meeting was one of the largest ever held in the city, and citizens of all classes attended. The proceedings were most enthusiastic. A prominent feature of the demonstration was that in addition to members of the Federal and Local Parliaments and leading gentlemen present, three ex-Mayors of the city, the Hon. Mr. Coursol, M.P., Dr. Hingston and Mr. Beaugrand spoke on the occasion."

On that occasion there was something more done than to protest against the measure of coercion that the Imperial Ministry now propose to impose on the Irish people. This resolution was passed:

"That as citizens of Montreal we call upon our representatives in the Parliament of Canada, the Legislature of Quebec, and the City Council of Montreal, to give fitting expression to the indignant feelings of the people of the Dominion, the Province and the city against the proposed measure, and their unwavering sympathy for Ireland in her aspirations for Home Rule."

Now, Sir, what was the expression of opinion with regard to that meeting by the leading English journal of the Province of Quebec? It said the next morning:

"If anything that can be said or done in Canada would advance the cause of Home Rule for Ireland, or stay the enactment of the very stringent Coercion Bill now under consideration in the British Parliament, it would be the moral force of such meetings as that held in the Queen's Hall last night. The unanimity in sentiment of the addresses delivered, and the manner of their reception, left no doubt of the earnest desire of the Irish people in Montreal to see their native land placed in a position towards the United Kingdom in which it would be a strength instead of a weakness to the Empire; when its own people would control its own affairs, and the cause of dissatisfaction being removed the excuse for coercion would cease. There was uttered no word to which the most loyal Imperialist could with reason object. What was desired was that Ireland should receive the same treatment, and the same rights of self-government, as have been accorded to Canada. If the people of Canada could grant this, or even aid in securing it, their voice and sympathy would be heartily accorded. As it is they can hope that before long the cause that has the past few years made such wonderfully rapid progress will soon be successful, and that a new era will open for the country that so many of their number remember with reverence as the home of their fathers."

That is the article of the Montreal Gazette. Now, Sir, in obedience to the instructions of that meeting, the City Council of Montreal met a few days afterwards—the day before the opening of this Parliament—and at that meeting it was proposed, not by an Irishman or the descendant of an Irishman, but by Mr. Grenier, a French Canadian of high social standing in Montreal and the leading member of the board of aldermen, and the resolution was adopted that:

"At the meeting of the City Council this afternoon Ald. Grenier and Donovan introduced the following resolution:—

"Whereas there has been introduced into the Imperial House of Commons by Her Majesty's Government a Bill enacting a most stringent coercive measure for Ireland:

"Whereas, the said Bill is calculated to deprive the Irish people of the rights most dear to all British subjects:

"Whereas, a public meeting of citizens of Montreal held on the sixth of April, instant, has protested against such legislation and called upon this council to express the feeling of the citizens against the proposed measure:

"Be it, therefore, resolved that this council has witnessed with regret the introduction in the Imperial House of Commons of the Bill above-mentioned, and desires, as representing the citizens of Montreal, to place on record its protest against the adoption of the measure so servient of the liberties of a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects.

"That this council renews its already expressed opinion that the most effective means of securing the prosperity and loyalty of the Irish people, and thereby assuring the stability of the Empire, will be found in granting to that people such a measure of Home Rule as Canadians enjoy, and as, while gratifying the national aspirations of Ireland, will also be consistent with the integrity of the Empire, that His Worship the Mayor be instructed to forward the present resolution to the Right Hon. Lord Salisbury, as a protest against the proposed measure of coercion, and to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and Mr. Parnell, as an assurance of the unwavering sympathy of Montreal's citizens with the cause of Home Rule for Ireland."

I based my present resolutions upon the opinion of the city of Montreal thus expressed. I followed those resolutions as closely as I could, making such additions as I thought appropriate. But the movement did not stop there. It reached the city of Quebec, and there in the ancient capital of Canada, we find the Hon. John Hearn moving in the city corporation, seconded by Councillor Duquet, a French Canadian, the following resolution:—

Hon. John Hearn moved, seconded by Councillor Duquet:—"That this corporation avails itself of the present meeting, the first since the announcement of yet another Coercion Bill for Ireland, to declare its abhorrence of the Draconian measure of the Government of Lord Salisbury, termed the 'Irish Crimes Act Amendment Bill' and, as faithful subjects of Her Majesty, desirous of contributing at all times, but particularly in this year of Her Majesty's Jubilee, to the prevention of everything calculated to create feuds and heartburnings amongst her people, protest against its becoming law. That this body heartily falls into line with the many municipal and legislative bodies in the Dominion of Canada, the United States and elsewhere, who sympathise with the people of Ireland in the sufferings brought on them, through their conflicts with the rack-renting oppressors of their country, and it desires to join in the widespread encouragement given to that sorely tried people to persist in their patriotic determination to be ruled, in all matters, properly and exclusively Ireland's, only in accordance with their own constitutionally expressed wishes. That a copy of these resolutions be cabled by His Worship the Mayor, to Parnell, Gladstone and Morley, and that they be assured that not even in Ireland are the prayers offered for the success of their Irish policy more fervent, than are those that ascend, for that object, from the good old city of Quebec." In speaking to his motion, Ald. Hearn said he would not take up the time of the council long, but would simply congratulate it in advance upon the unanimity with which he believed the resolution would pass. In no city was there more sympathy, he believed, with the people of Ireland than in Quebec, which was inhabited by a people whose forefathers had risked their lives for the principles for which Ireland was to-day contending and against the rule of Downing Street.

Ald. Rheame made a lengthy and eloquent speech in support of the resolution, referring to the struggle and leaders of the French-Canadian party of 1837 and 1838.

The resolution was then adopted.

Well, Sir, the movement went on, and we find the citizens of Halifax also meeting under the auspices of the Irish Charitable Society of that city. At that meeting we find present the leading citizens of Halifax; amongst others:

CHARITABLE IRISH SOCIETY CONDEMN TORY COERCION, AND PASS RESOLUTIONS ON THE SUBJECT.—A special meeting of the Charitable Irish Society was held last evening for the purpose of expressing their feelings regarding the proposed Coercion Act in Ireland. Hon. James Butler presided, and there was a large gathering of the members—Dr. Farrell, M. B. Daly, Hon. A. J. White, J. J. O'Brien, J. M. Inglis, D. F. Power and others.

Dr. Farrell moved the following resolution, seconded by M. B. Daly, which passed unanimously, and the secretary instructed to cable it to the gentlemen named in the resolution—the Premier of Great Britain, Gladstone and Parnell:—

Whereas, during the past few months the people of Ireland, gratified and encouraged by the disposition shown by a portion of the people, and of the parliamentary representatives of Great Britain, to assist them in their legitimate aspirations for an improvement in their constitutional and material position, have conducted their agitation in a peaceful and constitutional manner with great apparent prospect of an early success;

And whereas, the policy of coercion—at no time a proper remedy for Irish grievances—has been adopted by the recent introduction of a measure in the Imperial Parliament, which proposes, in the absence of grave crime of any kind in Ireland, or of any other sufficient reason, to deprive the people for an indefinite time of the most essential rights of British subjects;

And whereas, the Charitable Irish Society, ever loyal to the Queen and country, as its history for over one hundred years in Nova Scotia will show, desires to record its most earnest protest against this Coercion Bill, as a cruel and unnecessary effort to make a spirited and liberty-loving nation a nation of slaves;

And whereas, in the opinion of this society, the occasion of Her Gracious Majesty's Jubilee, in the celebration of which this society has cordially united with their fellow-citizens, would be darkened and degraded by a return of her Government to the barbarous methods of governing Ireland, adopted in what are known as penal times;

Be it, therefore, resolved, that in the opinion of this society the Dominion and Local Parliaments, representing the large numbers of Irishmen and their descendants, and called upon to administer the affairs of a population to whom the goodwill of the Irish people is of great material value, and deeply interested in the unity and harmony of the various sections of the Empire—should express their strong disapproval of the coercion measure now before the Imperial Parliament.

Also resolved, that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Premier of England, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. C. S. Parnell, M. P.; Right Hon. the Premier of Canada, and the Hon. the Premier of Nova Scotia, with a respectful request to the last named hon. gentlemen that the foregoing resolution should receive their favorable consideration and also that they take prompt action in accordance with the views therein expressed.

Halifax was not the last place in which anti-coercion meetings were held. In Toronto, only a few evenings ago, an anti-coercion meeting was held, and the Temperance Hall of that city, according to reports in the press, was literally packed with citizens who had gone there to protest against the Coercion Bill and express their opinion in favor of Home Rule; and amongst those who spoke were gentlemen of all creeds and of every nationality in this Dominion. Again, last night, in this city of Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion, another anti-coercion meeting was held, at which clergymen and others spoke in eloquent terms against the proposed measure now sought to be imposed on the people of Ireland, and there again the resolutions moved were unanimously carried. I have not seen or heard of a meeting being held anywhere in the Dominion in favor of Coercion or against Home Rule for Ireland; and, therefore, in so far as public meetings are concerned, and I have not gone through all those that have been held,—so far as public men can express the sentiments of the people of Canada, those sentiments are diametrically opposed to the legislation now sought to be imposed on Ireland. But it is not merely at public meetings we hear those sentiments expressed. Only a few nights ago the Legislature of the Province of Quebec unanimously adopted resolutions in almost the same terms as those I lay before you; and we have on the file of the proceedings of the Parliament of Ontario a resolution there to be proposed by the Premier of that Province, in which he calls upon the Legislative Assembly to express its sentiments against Coercion and in favor of a measure of Home Rule for Ireland. But having gone through those evidences of sympathy with the Old Land, I find still other evidence which speaks volumes as to the opinions of the public men of this country. Only a short time ago I had the pleasure of assisting at a magnificent banquet tendered to the hon. the Secretary of State for the Dominion, in Montreal, and there that hon. gentleman, in answer to the toast of his health, after having dealt exhaustively with the subject of Canadian politics, made an outburst of eloquence which will be long remembered by those who had the pleasure of listening to him, in favor of fair play and justice to Ireland and against this coercive measure. I shall read the report of the hon. gentleman's remarks as they were summarised in one of the city papers, but the report is but a feeble reflex of the magnificent periods which elicited the rousing cheers of every gentleman present, and there were present representative men of all races and nationalities in this Dominion. The hon. the Secretary of State is reported to have said: He asked "What is to be the end of the exciting and tragic drama which is now being played in the United Kingdom, a drama where the plot is the subject of the liberation of a nation. I feel with Ireland in her aspirations. (Great applause) I weep with her in the agony of her sufferings, I plead with her for justice, for pity, for humanity. (Hear, hear and cheers) Born, brought up and educated with proud notions of the British constitution, that sublime charter of free humanity; breathing that atmosphere of independence which surrounds and permeates this free land of America, I cannot realise that a nation in the world can be condemned and put in bondage. (Cheers.) I regret the necessity, if it is a necessity; I detest and I condemn the device, if it is the only opportunity that justifies the most extraordinary legislation which the British people are now called upon to sanction."

These were the words of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State; and, at the opening of this present Parliament, in the first address delivered by the hon. the leader of the Opposition in this House, he re-echoed those sentiments, and expressed his detestation of coercive measures for the land of his forefathers. I may be asked, why should this Parliament be called upon to give expression to this opinion, why should the voice of our people be raised against this coercion measure? Because coercion in its most detestable form has been employed over and over again in Ireland, and has utterly failed in the past as it is doomed to utter failure in the present instance. I will refer this honorable House for a very few moments to a list of Coercion Acts which have been passed in Ireland since the date of the unfortunate union eighty-seven years ago. Now, it would seem to the impartial observer, it would seem to the mind of anyone who has read the history of Ireland, written by no matter whom, when we find that every historian who has written upon this subject has denounced the manner in which the people of Ireland were deprived of their national Legislature, in view of the means of bribery and corruption which were used upon that occasion, that the people of England or the Government of England would have endeavored, by a policy of conciliation, to win the affections of the people whom they had thus deprived of their national Parliament, that they would have endeavored, by some means or other, to convince them that their interests lay in having one Parliament for the two kingdoms, and that, though they were deprived of their national Parliament, although the voice of Ireland's patriots and statesmen was no longer heard in College Green, at all events they would get justice and fair play in the British Parliament; but, instead of that, since the first year of the alliance there has been only an interval of some five or six years, I believe, during which no Coercion Act was in force in Ireland. From that day to this, every year has brought forth new measures of coercion, new devices for depriving the people of their liberty, and in this year of grace 1887—eighty-seven years after the Union was consummated—we find the Government of England again coming forward and asking from the Parliament of the Empire new powers to suppress and repress the Irish people, and if possible to choke out the last spark of their national aspirations. I say that such a state of things cannot be tolerated. I say that such a state of things is not one which we should expect to find in any Christian country. In 1848 an Act consolidating all previous Coercion Acts was passed. On 28th July, 1843, Mr. Sherman Crawford proposed a motion to the effect that the state of Ireland demanded instant attention of Parliament, to improve the condition, redress grievances, establish just rights, &c., and thereby promote the good order and prosperity of that part of the United Kingdom and give increased security to Her Majesty's Crown and Government. Mr. Crawford pointed out that bad government was the cause of distress and discontent in Ireland. The people were treated by the Government as a race of slaves. He stated the people were allowed to be exterminated, while there were 5,000,000 of acres of improvable land in Ireland, and all the authority of the State was given to aid the landlords to produce the extermination. Whenever the Government was asked to do aught to ameliorate the condition of Ireland, the answer was that they had no means nor time—but they had means and time to push on a Coercion Act at that moment. Vainly they have attempted to govern by coercion. It failed, it will fail, it can never succeed and will only widen the gap between England and Ireland and sap the support of the United Kingdom. And the longer we live, and the further we move from the days of ignorance, barbarism and slavery, the more dangerous will coercion be to England and the less effective will it be in Ireland. In the same debate, Mr. Fagan, a member of the Imperial Parliament, spoke as follows:—

“That the Chief Minister referred (Lord John Russell) to the grievances of Ireland, but that he took no steps to ameliorate the country's condition—rather he wished to goad her on by adding insult to injury. The First Minister said that in due time Ireland would get measures to improve her condition,—but Mr. Fagan asked, had the Irish to die in the meantime? What were they to do? At the rate the Government was proceeding forty years would pass and still they would cling to coercion as the old slave driver—played out and dying—would still wish to wield the lash, forgetting that his slaves had been freed and his strength was gone.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask if the words of Mr. Fagan have not proved to be a true prophecy? The period of time which he then indicated has elapsed, and to-day we find a Government, not a strong Government, not a Government able to control the affairs of the country by the votes of the party to which it belongs, but a Government supported by Liberal and Radical coercionists, endeavoring to wield the lash again, and only wielding it by the grace of those men who have joined in the pressing of this measure. Now, we find that Ireland is not alone in this conflict. She has been joined by Scotland and Wales, she has been joined by the people of Canada and by the other possessions of Her Majesty in all parts of the world. This brings me to another branch of the subject. We have seen it stated in the press, as having been urged in the English Parliament, that the Protestants of Ireland are against Home Rule, and in favor of coercive measures. Well, I hold in my hand a report of a meeting of Protestant Home Rulers in the city of Dublin, only a short time ago, in connection with this very Coercion Act. The report states:

"Upon the motion of Mr. C. H. Oldham, the chair was taken amidst applause by Mr. James Johnstone, of Belfast. There was a large attendance. Amongst those present were:—

"Thomas A. Dickson, J.P.; Rev. Prof. Galbraith, F.T.C.D.; J. Johnstone, J.P.; Alfred Webb, Alderman Winstanley, Surgeon-Gen. King, T. H. Webb, Richard Ashe King, J. F. Keatinge, T.C.; R. Gregg, T. C.; James Walker, C. H. Oldham, Edward Purser, Surgeon Myles, F. J. Gregg, Amos Varian, Henry E. Brown, A. Andrews, Thomas Mason, &c.

"Mr. Thomas Dickson, J.P., on coming forward, was greeted with loud applause. He said it was a pleasure for him to come to that meeting to-night, and to see it presided over by an Ulster man, a Gladstonian Liberal like himself (applause), a gentleman who was not afraid of applying Liberal principles to Ireland at the present time. (Hear, hear.) They met there to-night, he need not say, at another very important crisis of the history of their country, to consider and discuss the policy of Lord Salisbury—(hisses)—to consider the policy of coercion, as again announced by his Government in connection with the introduction of fresh coercive legislation for Ireland. Again the Tory party and an English party bring forward coercion as a remedy for Irish grievances and discontent. He had been asked, in view of this crisis, to propose the following resolutions:

And then he read the resolution, which was very much in the tone of those that I have the honor to lay before the House to-day, and he went on to speak as follows, as an Irish Protestant, to the Irish Protestants there assembled:—

"He could only say, and he was sure they all agreed with him, that if the Tory Government expect to succeed in a policy of coercion in Ireland—a policy that had failed in the strong hands of Earl Spencer and Mr. Forster—that that policy would never succeed in the hands of Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Balfour (cries of 'Never'). Never was a Coercion Act more vigorously administered than it was administered by Lord Spencer, but the policy ignominiously failed; and yet when Lord Spencer was in Dublin Castle administering this Act, he was backed up by the whole Liberal party, and that party was now as much opposed to the renewal of such a Coercion Act as Lord Spencer was (applause). But then they were told that remedial legislation was to accompany Coercion. Now, this was only repeating the old blunder over again. One Government goes out and another Government comes in, and these Governments never seem to learn a lesson from their predecessors (hear, hear). Coercion failed with one of the strongest Governments which ever existed, and the Tory party helped to discard it when administered by the Liberal party, and yet with the light of the past before them the Conservatives ventured to try another oppressive measure for Ireland. What happened in 1881, when Mr. Gladstone brought forward his Land Act? There was then a strong cry from the landlords and Dublin Castle that coercion was wanted, and Mr. Gladstone then, as he now admits, erred in listening to the advice which reached him from Dublin Castle, and his Government pushed forward side by side the two measures. What was the result of the Coercion Act? It discredited the Land Act, and placed serious difficulties in the way of the Act being administered. Coercion, which had failed in the hands of Mr. Gladstone, will never succeed in the hands of Lord Salisbury (applause)."

Now, Sir, we are told in some quarters that the people of this country are talking about what they really do not understand. That they know nothing at all about the nature of this Coercion Act; that they have not the text of this Act before them, and consequently are not able to express an opinion upon it. Well, I think it will not be out of place, as the Act is a very short one, to read the text of it to the House. I give it as published in United Ireland:

1. Magistrates may examine witnesses on oath, even in cases where no person is charged before them with the committal of the crime which is the subject of enquiry.

2. The jury system is abolished altogether for certain classes of crime, punishable by a limited term of imprisonment. In other words, two stipendiary magistrates are to have summary jurisdiction, and may impose sentences not exceeding six months hard labor for any of the following offences: Criminal conspiracy, boycotting, rioting, offences under the Whiteboy Acts; assaulting officers of the law, taking forcible possession or inciting to any of the foregoing offences.

3. In jury trials the venue may be changed on the certificate of the Attorney General that a fairer trial can be had in some other place in Ireland. A prisoner, however, is to have a right to appeal against any proposed change of venue.

4. In jury trials either the Attorney General or the prisoner may demand a special jury.

5. In cases of murder, attempt to murder, aggravated crimes of violence, arson, or breaking or firing into dwellings, the Attorney Generals for England and Ireland together may certify that a fair trial can be had in England, the State to pay expenses of carrying prisoner, his witnesses, solicitor and counsel to England.

6. These enactments are only to apply to such districts of Ireland as may be proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant.

7. The Lord Lieutenant in Council will have power to declare it an offence against the Act to have anything to do with an association formed for the purpose of commission of crimes or of inciting or enabling persons to commit crime, or of inciting to intimidation, or of interfering with the administration of the law or the maintenance of order.

8. The Act is to be permanent.

Now, Sir, anyone knowing, as I said before, the history of Ireland, anyone knowing what has occurred there and the unfortunate circumstances that have surrounded the trials of prisoners for each and every offence enumerated in this Act, will realise the full import of this legislation. In the first section magistrates are empowered to examine on oath witnesses in cases where no person is charged with the committal of the crime which is the subject of enquiry. Those gentlemen are to have a roving commission, they are to be authorised to fish about for evidence; and the country is to be made, what? Why, it is to be made a regular elysium for the informer, a regular elysium for those who will first of all induce poor, unfortunate and misguided men into secret societies and conspiracies against the Government, that those informers and traitors may hand them over to the authorities and receive the reward for their noble and disinterested services. That is one of the effects of this first clause. It will make Ireland a land where no man who values liberty, no man who hopes to call his soul his own, can live for a day. He will be at the mercy of every traitor, every spy and every scoundrel who wishes to induce poor men to become his victims. We now take the last section, and we find that this Act is to be permanent. And thus we are told that after all those years of Union, after all those Coercion Acts I have enumerated have been passed and have failed to produce the effect desired, the people of Ireland are told that this document which I hold in my hand is to be the charter of their liberties for ever, that the Act is to be permanent, the light shut out for ever. And this is the result of coercion as practiced during the last 87 years. I shall not trust myself to speak on the other clauses of this Act; I shall quote the words of Mr. Gladstone's speech on the subject at the time the measure was introduced into Parliament, in answer to Mr. Balfour's explanation of the Bill. He said:

"It is an extreme measure, in my opinion; to grant that demand would be one of the most formidable breaches of trust that any popular assembly could perpetuate. In my opinion, one of the greatest and grossest breaches of trust will be committed by this House if it relaxes the conditions on which it has been its rule to give its sanction to changes in the criminal law for the purpose of giving it increased stringency against a portion of Her Majesty's subjects (cheers). No case, I must say, has been made out for such a demand, not even a shadow of a cause to justify the demand, and none has, by candid confession on the other side, been made on account of the extreme crime and offences which exist in Ireland (hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman the Chief Secretary, has been good enough to explain to us the provisions of the Bill. One proposal, however, would have to be carefully examined. I refer to the Irish trials which are to be heard here in London by English juries (laughter). There have been sinister predictions in the newspapers of a proposal of this kind; but I thought it my duty to the Government not to believe it (cheers). I did not believe that I should live to see the day when a proposal so wanton, so insulting, so exasperating, so utterly in contrast with the whole of the lessons of Irish history, would ever have been submitted to the British House of Commons (loud cheers). I shall have an opportunity of saying more than this when the exact provisions are before me; but this I must say—this I always understood—that trial by jury meant trial by our peers—trial, as nearly as possible, by persons as near as may be in the same circumstances. But the enforcement of such a proposal as this would be an exact reversal of the fundamental principle of trial by jury (hear, hear). Whenever we do interfere with trial by jury it is well that you should avoid the capital and fatal error of discarding the substance while you keep only the form, as seems to me to be at the bottom of the cruel and grievous proposal of the Government. Another provision on which I would say a word, or rather the absence of provision, is in relation to the duration of time. That, I must say, makes our blood run cold (hear, and cheers). It is a very sad state of things if, after our eighty-seven years of legislation, which was, no doubt, intended by many, even of those who used such discreditable means of promoting the union, to be the harbinger and certain hope of peace and goodwill between the countries—after going through three generations of men cobbling at the business of coercion, struggling as we could with good intentions here and there at intervals, hoping the sun of liberty might rise unclouded on Ireland, at least for a time—that now all that we propose is that a temporary remedy shall become the rule for the government of a people, that the brand of inferiority is to be placed on them forever, and they, with the full enjoyment of the representative system, are expected to acquiesce, to welcome, to embrace, and to hug that law (cheers).

I shall not say one word myself in addition to what has been so admirably stated in the extract from that great speech which I have just read. But it has been whispered about that we in this House have no right to interfere in this matter; that we have no right to have our say upon this subject; that we, as British subjects, as men living under the same Sovereign, under the same flag, and under the same institutions, in a great measure, have not the right to say one word upon this subject; that we should pass it by in silence, and while we enjoy our own liberty and prosperity and witness our own progress, we should turn a deaf ear to the piteous wail of our fellow-subjects in another section of the Empire, and turn away our eyes altogether from the painful scene that is there sought to be enacted. I need not insult the intelligence of this House by quoting authorities on the subject; but I will say that if precedents, which find so much favor in the eyes of Englishmen everywhere, are of any value, we have two precedents, owing to the proceedings had by this House. In 1832 the first Home Rule resolutions were introduced here. In 1886 the sentiments of those resolutions were reaffirmed, and upon both occasions the resolutions were transmitted to the Old Country. The first time it was done in the shape of an Address to Her Majesty; and I will just say a few words upon that subject. If anyone desires to find upon what authority we can proceed in this matter, let him refer to the speech of the present Minister of Inland Revenue on that occasion; let him refer to the eloquent appeal of the leader of the Opposition on that branch of the subject; let him refer, still further, to the words of the leader of the present Government, without whose goodwill, without whose good word no Home Rule resolution could have gone from this Parliament to the Old Land. There is something more. The first resolution passed by this House, the resolution of 1832, was more than a Home Rule resolution. It was more than a Home Rule resolution in this sense, that it went beyond the mere expression by the House that it believed Home Rule would bring peace and prosperity to Ireland and create harmony in that country. It was virtually a protest against coercion, because at that time there were lingering in prison in Ireland under the effects of a Coercion Act men who had no prospect of being tried, who perhaps hardly knew the offence with which they had been charged; and upon that occasion my hon. friend included in his motion an appeal to the authorities that those men would be liberated, that they would be accorded fair play. I shall now read in that connection the words of the First Minister of the present Government. He said:

“The hon. member for Victoria expresses the hope that the time has come when persons charged with political offences, whether rightly or wrongly, may be released, enjoying the inestimable blessings of personal freedom. The hon. gentleman will, I hope, succeed in having his resolutions adopted by the House; I hope they will receive the votes of a majority of the House. This is not a Government question, although it was moved as an amendment to go into Committee of Supply. But it is certainly not a Government question, and I, as First Minister, and I believe speaking with some influence, would ask all my hon. friends in the House who can conscientiously do so,—I ask no man to vote against his conscience,—to support the resolutions. And it is only by the support of the Ministerial majority in the House that these resolutions can be carried.”

We have, therefore, these high authorities I have mentioned to justify us in our present proceeding, not merely as pronouncing an opinion in favor of Home Rule for Ireland, but in the protest that is implied by the request that those men who were lingering under the penalty of a Coercion Act should be liberated or brought to trial in the usual way. But, Sir, there is more than that. If we look across the Atlantic to the course which has been followed on more than one occasion by the Imperial Government there, we will find that English Ministers, speaking on behalf of the nation, have not been at all reluctant to interfere, but, on the contrary, have with great alacrity interfered in behalf of oppressed nationalities in various parts of the world. I will quote one or two brief extracts from the English Hansard to convince the House of that fact, or rather to refresh the memories of hon. gentlemen, most of whom have lived through the period to which I intend to refer. I will first allude to the question brought before the House of Commons on the motion of Mr. Pope Hennessy with regard to the affairs of Naples. Lord John Russell, speaking on behalf of the Government in answer to a statement made by that hon. gentleman, said:

“The hon. member is mistaken in supposing that I made any appeal to nationalities. I stated what were then the views of the Government with regard to Italy, and especially with regard to Naples and Sicily, and I was induced to do so because Russia and Prussia had already pronounced their opinions, and because there must sooner or later arise a question, which has arisen, whether the Government which superseded that of the late King of Naples, was such a Government that we could acknowledge it as a regular Government in Europe. It was on that account necessary to give some opinion with reference to what was taking place in Italy. I gave that opinion. I stated that, since the year 1821, the people in both the Roman and Neapolitan States had suffered mis-government, which I believed was worse than that which existed in any other country in Europe—a good deal worse than that existing in Turkey—”

I am sorry he did not give us his opinion about the state of affairs in Ireland—

“and that after suffering so long I could not wonder that they had joined the invaders who had overthrown the authorities who had mis-governed them. I think I should be attributing more to that despatch than it really deserves if I were to suppose that either Poland or Hungary had become discontented and disturbed in consequence of its contents.”

Thus we find the leader of the Government stating that it was perfectly justifiable for him, not merely to make a speech but to issue a manifesto, stating the views of the Government, not upon any international question, but upon the internal arrangements of another Government, upon the mode in which that Government and other Governments were treating their subjects, and drawing comparisons not very flattering to these Governments between the mode in which their subjects were treated and the manner in which they were treated in the country which was supposed to have the most uncivilised Government in the world. Again, Mr. Pope Hennessy brought up the question of Poland before the Imperial Parliament, and after speaking at considerable length he said:

“Sir, in this story of English connivance at Polish oppression there is an instructing moral. I commend it to the consideration of what is called the Liberal party. Hon. members who have comprehended the guilty action of England may fairly ask what pretension have British statesmen to style themselves the champions of freedom. If the noble lords opposite (Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell) have done so much to maintain Russia against Poland, and in doing this have deluded Europe, and mystified their country with all the specious cant of Liberalism, surely their foreign policy to-day should not be exempt from scrutiny; and when they call the loyal peasants of South Italy ‘brigands,’ and when they publicly approve of the barbarous conduct of Cialdini and Rivelli, we may be pardoned for remembering that the English statesmen who now support Piedmontese oppression in Italy, are the same English statesmen who supported Russian tyranny in Poland.”

Under that attack Lord John Russell stated what were the views of the Government on that subject and Sir Harry Verney said:

“The speech to which the House had just listened was the most hopeful sign for Poland which he remembered in the course of a long parliamentary experience. The statement of the noble lord would give hope to the Polish nation, without exciting them to forcible attempts to obtain their rights. He was most anxious that nothing should be said in that House which would give rise to the expectation that England was likely to interfere by force of arms for the restoration to the Polish nation of their rights; but it was at the same time of great importance that they should state calmly and dispassionately their opinion that those rights had been violated, and that the events which had recently occurred were the consequence of that violation."

Viscount Palmerston, speaking in the same debate, laid down this doctrine:

"I agree with my noble friend that it is impossible for anybody who has any admiration for high national qualities, for patriotism, endurance, love of liberty, not to admire the Polish character. And it is equally impossible for anybody who had any sense of wrong not to lament those misfortunes which have befallen the Poles from the time of the first partition of Poland down to the present moment. That partition was a gross violation of national right. The stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna were broken almost as soon as concluded. The British Government, upon every occasion on which it was called on to pronounce an opinion, or on which it thought it could pronounce an opinion usefully, declared that to be its due, and when the hon. gentleman (Mr. White) says that the English Government interferes in some cases by opinion and advice, and does not interfere in others, I must tell him that the English Government interferes in proportion as it thinks it can do so usefully; that when it thinks its opinion may prevail it expresses it in a form which it believes the most likely to prevail."

That is to say, it interferes with the condition of the subjects of a foreign Government, interferes with the character of that Government, expresses opinions as to the modes in which they deal with their subjects; and yet we who are fellow subjects of Britain with the people of Ireland are to be told that we are not entitled to express our views on this important subject which is engaging the attention of the whole civilised world to-day. If we wish to know the state of affairs which exists on the other side of the Atlantic, of the wretched condition in which those who seek to impose coercion on Ireland now find themselves, we have it in the gross and infamous attempt that is being made to bolster up the Government cause by making an outrageous charge against Charles Stewart Parnell, the trusted leader of the Irish people the world over on this question. I say that is an insult to the whole Irish race; it is one which no words of mine can sufficiently condemn. And, Sir, I contend that if there is a man in the British Empire to whom the Government of England are indebted it is Charles Stewart Parnell. He has done more than any other man since the days of O'Connell, to lead the people of Ireland into constitutional ways. He has done a great deal for Ireland, but he has not done less for England. We all remember that the people of Ireland and their compatriots, more especially in the neighboring Republic, had lost all hope of ever obtaining any constitutional reform from the Parliament of Great Britain. We remember the last unfortunate outbreak that threatened the peace of England and the peace of Ireland, and the peace of this country also, in 1866, when the Fenian organisation was in force. After the failure of that movement, the late lamented Isaac Butt took up once more the direction of the Constitutional party of Ireland. He struggled manfully, and poured forth the eloquence of his race into the ears of the British Parliament; but his arguments were not heard by a full House. Most frequently the benches were empty. But he struggled on. His movement was looked upon in most places as a milk-and-water affair which would not satisfy the people of Ireland. After his demise the present trusted leader of the Irish people took the management of the affairs of the Irish party, and he infused new life and new aspirations into the people. He gave them to understand that they might look forward to a day when the whole people of Ireland would be united and would send a strong contingent to the British Parliament who would knock effectively at its doors in the name of the Irish race. He had done that with 86 members at his back; and, Sir, he has done more. He has satisfied the aspirations of those who had gone out of Ireland, many men who had gone away with vengeance in their hearts against the British Government and against those who were taking advantage of the laws as they existed. And we are told to-day that this man, who has lived down all the calumnies that were hurled against him in days gone by, should go before a jury in England or Scotland or elsewhere and vindicate his character. We find the greatest newspaper in England saying that, having made the charge against him, it is not for it to prove that charge, but it is for Mr. Parnell and his friends to disprove it. The old maxim, onus probandi qui dicit, is entirely ignored by that paper, and we find lords and statesmen standing by its allegation. Well, I feel that the great leader of the Irish people can afford to trust himself to the hearts of that people and the common sense and common justice of the world. It would be a pitiful affair for him to appeal to a jury on this subject. We know very well that the very mild and dove-like Government that corruptly expended millions of dollars in order to corrupt and bribe a Parliament to deprive a nation of its liberties, would hardly hesitate at the peccadillo of either packing or bribing a jury for the purpose of destroying the reputation and influence of the man who is now trying to restore to Ireland the rights of which she was deprived. I leave this branch of the subject without further comment. I now appeal to my friends in this House that in addition to these resolutions, if they be carried, as I have no doubt they will be, one more hope may be expressed, that the advice tendered by O'Connell and by Parnell to the people of Ireland may be followed in this hour of their trial, and that they may not be seduced away from the right path by the terrible oppression imposed upon them to violate the law in the slightest degree. There are some misguided persons, without judgment and devoid of the true sense that ought to inspire men on occasions of this kind, who say that the only way to obtain liberty and justice for Ireland is to have recourse to outrages which would bring discredit and disgrace upon the name of an honored race. We find in the February number of the Nineteenth Century an article written by the Hon. Mr. Gladstone, in which he states that it is not the case that upon all occasions England has given way to fears in making concessions to Ireland. He says:

"It is sometimes said that when Ireland has obtained anything that she deemed good from England it has been through fear. I admit this to be true in most cases; but it is not in all. In 1845, for example, Ireland desired, or appeared to desire, and she obtained, three boons from Parliament from the wise forethought of Sir Robert Peel. They were, the better endowment of Maynooth; the foundation of the Queen's, yielded by Sir Robert Inglis the goddess, Colleges; and the Charitable Bequests Act. No one would assert that these measures were passed through fear, unless indeed it were that 'early and provident fear,' which, says Burke, 'is the mother of security,' and which may attend upon, but does not disparage, any good act of any person for any purpose. If it be said that the instance is de minimis, then I quote three other measures, two given and one offered by Great Britain, to which this objection will not apply. They are: (1.) The Disestablishment of the Irish Church; (2.) the Land Act of 1870; (3.) the Education Bill of 1879, approved on the second reading by a majority of British, but rejected by the votes of Irish members. It still appears to me little short of ludicrous to assert that these measures were the product of slavish fear, or that a couple of local outrages are to be compared with the case of the Emancipation Act, of which the Duke of Wellington said he adopted the policy as being preferable to civil war. In a somewhat sluggish state of the public mind, those two outrages, at Manchester and Clerkenwell just made it possible, by exciting general attention, for a powerful political party to give the Irish question precedence over other pending questions; and they did no more. I remember a case of a small timid spaniel frightened by a hare; Great Britain is not to be frightened even by a couple of hares."

These are the words of this eminent statesman who, for some two years past, has appeared himself anxious to bring this great question to a consummation; and we trust and hope that wherever Irishmen are found sympathising with the national cause, their endeavor will be to influence those over whom they can exercise any control in the direction of restraining men from those outrages which the unadvised oppression imposed upon them might incite them to. I speak here, in the presence of the Parliament of the Dominion, where men have enjoyed for years past the glorious privilege of Home Rule; I speak here in the presence of French Canadians to whom—no matter what may be said, though we may admire, as was said by the First Minister, the motives of those who took part on both sides in the conflict of 1837—we must do the justice of saying that the blood of their forefathers, shed on the battle field and on the scaffold, nurtured the roots of constitutional liberty in this our country. What has been the result to that people of giving them the rights for which they agitated? Have they not prospered and progressed since then? What a change has been since then effected in their sentiments, when one of the noblest of their sons declared that the last shot fired on the continent of America for British connection would be fired by a French Canadian. I appeal to the representatives of that race, as to the representatives of all sections, to support my motion. We have had in the history of our country instances of how Irishmen and Irish Catholics were ready to fight for our country in its days of trouble. In 1866, the first regiment called out to oppose the Fenian organisation that threatened to invade our territories, which never would have been invaded had it not been for the unfortunate state of affairs in Ireland, was the Prince of Wales regiment, which was commanded at the time by a distinguished fellow-countryman of mine, the late lamented Bernard Devlin, formerly member of this House. Later on, we had another little trouble in this country, the rebellion in the North-West, and Canadians, without distinction, sent forth their sons to fight for the integrity of their Dominion. Amongst those who went out the first that comes to my mind is a young Irish Catholic, the President of the Junior Conservative Club in Montreal, the President of the Irish Land League in Montreal, and an officer in the 65th regiment, who left his sick-bed to join his regiment rather than have it said he would hold back one moment from showing that in this country, where we enjoy all the glorious privileges which free men love in their hearts, no Irish Catholic, wearing Her Majesty's uniform in the volunteers, would be found holding back in the moment of danger. I speak of Mr. C. J. Doherty, Q. C., of Montreal. He was but one, and I mention him as a notable instance among many others of the fact that where we enjoy Home Rule, Irishmen are as loyal and devoted to the British constitution as men of any other race. We are going to have, in a very short time throughout this Empire, a celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, in which all the nations and all the peoples that live beneath the British flag will be called to take a joyous part. Shall it be said that among all these peoples who are called upon to congratulate our august Sovereign upon her auspicious reign, the only victim, the only disconsolate one in all that scene of rejoicing, will be poor old Ireland? Shall it be said that our ancient race will alone appear in the rags of poverty, the sullenness of discontent, in the chains of coercion? I hope not, and for that reason I ask this honorable House to permit me to present this resolution:

That the Parliament of Canada in the year 1882 adopted a humble Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen expressing the hope that a just measure of Home Rule would be granted to the people of Ireland; and

That in the year 1886, by a Resolution of the House of Commons, the sentiments of said Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty were earnestly reiterated and the hope again expressed that a measure of Home Rule satisfactory to the people of Ireland would be passed by the Imperial Parliament; and

That such measure of Home Rule has not been granted to the Irish people, but, on the contrary, there has been introduced into the Imperial House of Commons by Her Majesty's Government a Bill enacting the most stringent coercive measures for Ireland, by which the Irish people will be deprived of rights most dear to all British subjects.

That this House has learned with profound regret of the introduction into the Imperial House of Commons of the Coercion Bill above mentioned, and protests against its adoption, as being subversive of the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland.

That this House again expresses the hope that there may speedily be granted to Ireland such a measure of Home Rule as is enjoyed in the Dominion of Canada, which, whilst satisfying the National aspirations of the people of Ireland for self-government, shall also be consistent with the integrity of the Empire as a whole.

That the granting of Home Rule to Ireland will fittingly crown the already glorious reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty as a constitutional sovereign, will come with special appropriateness in this Her Jubilee year and, if possible, render Her Majesty more dear to the hearts of Her already devoted and loyal subjects.

That the present resolutions be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, Prime Minister, to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M. P., and Charles Stewart Parnell, M. P.

Mr. McNEILL. I very much regret, as I regretted last Session when the hon. the leader of the Opposition introduced a resolution in reference to this question, that my hon. friend (Mr. Curran) has deemed it to be his duty to introduce resolutions at this time in this House on the same subject. I very much admire the ability of my hon. friend. I am fully convinced of the depth of his devotion, of his heartfelt devotion, to the cause of the Irish people; I am fully persuaded that nothing could be to him a source of purer pleasure than the conviction and the consciousness that he had been able to do something to effect a settlement of the difficult and complicated questions which convulse unhappy Ireland to day. I will go further, and say that I believe most sincerely that if any sacrifice of his own convenience or interest would, in his opinion, benefit Ireland, if any such sacrifice would carry peace to her people and prosperity and contentment to her homes, that sacrifice on the part of my hon. friend would be willingly made. But I believe that the very warmth of his sentiments and generosity of his nature have impelled him to assume an attitude in these resolutions with reference to the Imperial Parliament and the people of the Mother Country, that I do not believe this House will or can approve. It is perfectly true that the Canadian House of Commons has, on two occasions, passed resolutions in favor of a measure of Home Rule for Ireland, but not unconditionally. Only last year we affirmed the principle that no measure of Home Rule for Ireland would be satisfactory which was not compatible with the unity and integrity of the Empire, and with the safe-guarding of the rights and status of the minority. At that time Mr. Gladstone's measure of Home Rule was under consideration in England, and the hon. gentleman opposite, with that dove-like simplicity and singleness of purpose which are so eminently characteristic of his political actions, moved in the House a resolution virtually committing this House to an unquestioning approval of Mr. Gladstone's course. I presume that he was impelled to do this from a heartfelt conviction that the vote of this House would have an enormous effect upon the vote then to be taken in the Imperial House of Commons, and that his own action in the matter was not likely, in any degree, to affect the Irish Catholic vote in Canada. However, this House wisely refused to pledge itself to the unquestioning approval of a policy with the details of which it was unfamiliar, and which had resulted in driving from Mr. Gladstone's side almost every Liberal statesman of eminence in the House of Commons, and which had driven from his side also a full dozen of the ablest and most experienced Ministers that had ever adorned his Cabinet. Since then, the conditions connected with this question have very much changed. Since then, the English House of Commons has condemned Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule policy, and there has been an appeal from the House of Commons, from the Parliament to the people, and the people at the polls have also condemned, unhesitatingly and unequivocally, Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule policy, and they have returned a majority of over one hundred in a new House of Commons pledged to oppose any such measure of Home Rule for Ireland as is advocated by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell. It is admitted by all his political opponents that Mr. Gladstone is a statesman of transcendent ability and of almost infinite fertility of resource. His Irish policy has been the leading feature of his political career. No man has studied the Irish question more profoundly than he, and yet, when, with all the advantages of matured study and vast experience and transcendent ability and infinite fertility of resource, he endeavors to frame a Home Rule scheme for Ireland, it is pronounced by a majority of the ablest of his own supporters, by the Imperial House of Commons and by the English people, to be absolutely impracticable and hopelessly a failure. Now, under these circumstances, what is it that my hon. friend asks us to do in these resolutions? He asks us, in the first place, to complain that no measure of Home Rule has yet been granted for Ireland. Would it not, in view of the notorious facts to which I have referred, be only fair and reasonable that we should make some allowance for the difficulty of the task that we have asked the Imperial Government to undertake, and is it altogether fair and reasonable, or is it not rather unfair and unreasonable, to complain that a task so difficult has not already been accomplished? I venture to think it is, and I venture to think this House will agree with me. Is this Home Rule so very light a thing that it can be dealt with in a haphazard and perfunctory manner? Is it not now very well understood, are we not all of us very well aware, that, in some quarters at least, this agitation in favor of Home Rule is closely connected with a dangerous conspiracy aimed at the very existence of our Empire? Is it not very well known that this agitation in favor of Home Rule is largely fanned and fomented by men who are the avowed enemies of the British race, by men who have declared that nothing will satisfy them short of the severing of the last link which binds Ireland to the Empire? Is not the British Government bound to take cognizance of these things, and do not these facts add enormously to the difficulty of the situation? Ought we not also to consider these matters? How will our conduct in this matter, if we pass these resolutions, be regarded in the Mother Country in the hour of her difficulty and her sorrow? Will it not be regarded, very likely, as an unpardonable impertinence, if not as a deliberate affront? Should not we regard it in that light if the Mother Country were to act in such a manner in regard to us? If she were to do so, a score of members here would rise in condemnation of and indignant protest against such conduct on the part of the Mother Country, and is it to be supposed that she will not take the same view with regard to us? Is it, then, so very desirable, just at the present juncture of affairs, that we should endeavor to stifle that warm sympathy which has been so strongly developed in the Mother Country towards the Dominion of Canada? Is that very desirable at this juncture? If not, might it, be altogether undesirable that we should endeavor to treat the Mother Country with some slight degree of that courteous consideration that she invariably extends to us? But my hon. friend says that while there is no Home Rule measure introduced, a measure of coercion, or what he calls a measure of coercion, has been introduced into the Imperial Parliament. I think it would be well, I think it would be interesting to members of this House that they should be in possession of some reliable evidence as to the condition of things which has called forth this action on the part of the Government of the Mother Country, and with that object I will read you some evidence which will be as brief as possible. The evidence I am about to submit to the House is not that of political partisans nor enthusiasts on one side or the other, nor is it the evidence of men who know not well whereof they speak, but it is the evidence of men who are, of necessity, able men, of men who are trained in impartiality, of men who, by reason of their acquaintance with the facts, are peculiarly able to speak with authority on the subject. It is the evidence of Her Majesty's judges in Ireland and is contained in their charges to the grand juries at assizes. After having read this the House can form its own opinion on the subject. Mr. Justice Lawson, in Mayo, says on the 10th of March:

"The present state of things was morally unsatisfactory and according to the reports made to him approached as nearly to rebellion against the authority of the country as has anything short of civil war could be."

Mr. Justice Murphy, in Galway, said:

"From the reports made to him by the inspectors of the Crown and the officers of the county, there appears to be a complete paralysis of law, that it is unable to protect many of the inhabitants in the exercise of their most ordinary rights, and that lawlessness is perfectly triumphant."

Mr. Justice O'Brien, in Clare, said:

"All these returns which I have before me and the information which has reached me from other quarters of an unquestionably authentic character, lead me to the conclusion that law, to a great extent, has ceased to exist in this country; the common rule of obedience which must exist in every civilised state, and which every honest and well disposed citizen is expected to perform and must yield if unwillingly, is abrogated for the present by an influence, and replaced by an influence fatal to industry, fatal to prosperity, fatal to every interest connected with the welfare of the community,—"

And I beg hon. gentlemen to remark these words—

"and an influence that I still cannot but be persuaded is becoming dominant here and elsewhere through want of courage and firmness in meeting it."

Mr. Justice Johnson, in Limerick, said:

"I find here that in no less than nine cases parties of armed men, frequently disguised and all under circumstances which enable them to avoid detection and be made amenable, have gone deliberately roaming about through the country for the purpose of wreaking vengeance or committing injury on unfortunate inmates of peaceable homes, sometimes to the large number of thirty, sometimes being smaller—varying from two persons to thirty—sometimes their visits being accompanied with acts of brutal violence."

He then instances two cases, of one of which he says:

"A peaceable family were dragged from their beds and the women cruelly beaten, in the other a son was shot in the thigh because he endeavored to protect his father."

Mr. Justice O'Brien, in Kerry, said:

"The law is defeated—perhaps I should rather say has ceased to exist, houses are attacked by night and day, even the midnight terror yielding to the noon-day audacity of crime, persons and life are assailed; the terrified inmates are wholly unable to do anything to protect themselves, and a state of terror and lawlessness prevails every where."

And he again says:

"Experience and observation teach every day in all the forms of social life, that there is a system of unseen terrorism, a system of terror and tyranny."

Mr. Justice Johnson, in Cork, said:

"People who live in remote and isolated districts are subject to violence, alarm, plunder, by day and by night—principally by night—from gangs of armed men, disguised, who rove through the country seizing arms, plundering sometimes property, always with a show of violence, often accompanied by threats, and sometimes with assaults of the meanest and most dastardly character, and sometimes with grave results."

And he mentions one case of a most horrible character, where a man's daughters were dragged from their beds by ruffians, who poured pitch on their heads and cut off their hair with shears. He ends by saying:

"So long as there is no security there is no order; so long as there is no order there can be no peace, and so long as there is no peace there can be no prosperity."

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I had at one time the pleasure of being personally acquainted with Mr. Justice Lawson, and although that is, perhaps, a matter which ought not to be referred to in this connection, still, it might be as well that I should say that I know him to be a Liberal in politics and a nominee of Mr. Gladstone's own, as, in point of fact, a large majority of the Irish judges are. Now, hon. gentlemen can decide for themselves whether they are prepared to condemn the Imperial Government who, with these solemn words of the custodians of justice ringing in their ears, have deemed it their duty to increase the efficiency of the criminal law in Ireland. Hon. gentlemen can also come to the conclusion for themselves as to whether anything could be well imagined more fatal to the well-being of that country than the triumph of this organised terrorism which has been so vividly and terribly depicted by the judges of the land. Hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves.

whether anything could be more unfortunate for Ireland than the triumph of a pitiless policy of coercion, not by Act of Parliament, directed against criminals, but by boycott and bludgeon, by maiming and murder, by calculated, slow, remorseless persecution, by sudden midnight attack upon peaceful and happy homes. Hon. gentlemen can form their own opinion with regard to that question. My hon. friend protests against the Coercion Bill which has been introduced into the Imperial House of Commons. Has he no word of protest for this other coercion which is directed, not against criminals, but against the peaceful, law-abiding peasantry of Ireland? It is, I admit, a very unfortunate thing, a thing very much to be deplored, that this Coercion Bill has been introduced into the Imperial Parliament. It is a thing much to be deplored, Mr. Speaker, that we have any criminal law at all; it is all coercion. But I am afraid that, so long as we have crime, criminal law, which is coercion, will be an unfortunate necessity. My hon. friend, however, objects to this process of coercion, but I think this House will believe that when ordinary law is insufficient for the protection of life and property, it is the bounden duty of the Government to implement that law by further coercive powers. It is the first duty of a Government to protect life and property. For this object Governments primarily exist, and no British Government dare stand idly by and see in Ireland property destroyed, men maimed and murdered, and women outraged in the manner described by the judges of the land. If they did do so they would be derelict to their duty and traitors to their trust. My hon. friend in his resolution complains that some of the people of Ireland will, by the Coercion Bill, be deprived of some of those liberties which, as British subjects, we all prize so much. Mr. Speaker, that is, unfortunately, one of the little inconveniences attaching to an indulgence in criminal proclivities, and unfortunately it is necessary that those persons who do those things should be deprived of just so much of their liberties as British subjects as is necessary also to deprive them of the power to commit such atrocities. But my hon. friend objects to that, and he asks this House to condemn the Imperial Government because they endeavor to grapple with this condition of things, because they endeavor to protect the law-abiding, peaceful subjects of the Queen against the assaults of bodies of murderous miscreants who, with arms in their hands, blackened faces and every accompaniment of barbaric terrorism, scour the country by night, destroy property, mutilate dumb animals, fire volleys of bullets into peaceful homes, drag men and women from their beds, sometimes to murder, sometimes to maim, but always to coerce—always to coerce the law-abiding into being breakers of the law; always to coerce those who are peaceful, and to force them to be turbulent. I venture to think that this House will not adopt that course, and will not make any such protest. My hon. friend has spoken about the number of times in which it has been necessary to implement the criminal law in Ireland. If it had been necessary to do so, not the number of times the hon. gentleman has mentioned, but that number of times multiplied by itself, it would have been none the less inexcusable if the Government of the Queen, who are responsible for the protection and life and property in that country, had not again resorted to those measures which were necessary for the protection of life and property in Ireland. My hon. friend has said that the last Coercion Act was a miserable failure. I do not know upon what authority he bases that statement. All I can say is, that the public records do not show it to have been so; that statistics of crime do not show it to have been so; but they proved the very reverse; and if there is one thing better established than another, it is that when the ordinary criminal law has been supplemented, it has had the effect of restoring, in a great measure, law and order in Ireland.

Mr. McNEILL.

But really, Mr. Speaker, the matter simply resolves itself into this. The Imperial Government believe that it is necessary to take immediate steps for the protection of the law-abiding, peaceful subjects of the Queen in Ireland, that it is necessary to supplement the existing criminal law for that object; and what we have to decide is, whether we are prepared to take the altogether unprecedented course of passing resolutions of condemnation upon the Imperial Government because they are going to act in accordance with that belief; whether, in other words, we are going in this jubilee year of the Queen to vary our ordinary procedure in this House by insulting the Mother Country and the Imperial Government, because these resolutions are not merely a suggestion as to the advisability of Home Rule such as was contained in the resolutions introduced into this House before, but they are a direct condemnation of the course of conduct pursued by the Government of the Queen. I venture to think that this House will adopt no such course; but, on the contrary, that hon. members will be inclined to think that there is a good deal to be said in favor of this coercive measure, which, although it has been introduced by a Conservative Government, is being supported by men of such eminent Liberal reputation as Lord Hartington, formerly leader of the Liberal party; Mr. Goschen, often spoken of as the probable leader of that party; John Bright, the world-renowned champion of popular rights and the life-long friend of the Irish people; Mr. Chamberlain, the most conspicuous figure in the Radical ranks; Sir Henry James, Mr. Gladstone's own Attorney General, and Lord Selbourne, the famous Roundell Palmer, his own Lord Chancellor. I think that, in view of these facts, when hon. gentlemen know that men of such eminence, statesmen of such experience and of such well-known liberal sentiments, have felt constrained to support their political opponents, their own life-long political opponents, in carrying this measure into effect, this House will pause before it solemnly declares that it is better able to form an opinion on the subject than are those eminent statesmen and proven good friends of Ireland, who are so much better informed of the facts than we can possibly be. But, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, in asking us to support these resolutions, asks us not only to pass a vote of censure on the Imperial Government for its conduct of Imperial affairs, but he asks us to pass a vote of censure on the Government of Great Britain and Ireland in respect of matters which are purely local to Ireland. The protection of life and property in Cork, Limerick or Mayo, is a question as purely local to Ireland, as the protection of life in the valley of the Ottawa is a question local to Canada. I am one of those who believe that it would be of immense value, not only to the colonies but to the Mother Country, if the colonies possessed a greater influence in Imperial affairs than they do to-day. I believe the time is rapidly approaching when the colonies will possess that greater influence. I believe it is almost impossible to exaggerate the advantages that would accrue to the Empire by the better organisation of the forces making for greatness that are so richly at our disposal and by a closer and more intimate union of the different parts of the Empire. But while I hold those views, I hold, in common with all who endorse those views, the belief that it is essential that the rights and privileges of Local Parliaments in local affairs should be maintained; and it does seem to me that the Legislature of Ontario have as good a right to pass a vote of censure with respect to the Government of Québec in regard to matters pertaining to Québec, and we have as good a right to pass a vote of censure on the Government of New South Wales in respect of matters pertaining to that colony, as we have to pass a vote of censure on the Government of Great Britain and Ireland in regard to matters pertaining exclusively to Ireland. Mr. Speaker, let us remember also that in asking this House to pass these resolutions my hon. friend is not only asking us to pass a vote of censure upon the Imperial Government and Parliament, but he asks us to pass a vote of censure also upon the people of the Mother Country. For that Parliament is fresh from the people, charged with a mandate from the people, commanded by the people of the Mother Country to grant no such measure of Home Rule as that demanded by Parnell; charged also with a mandate—a special mandate—to take instant means for the better protection of life and property in Ireland. Let us remember also, Mr. Speaker, that this question of Home Rule is one of the most difficult and complicated that we could possibly approach. Let us remember that the people of Ireland themselves are divided on this question, and that, while no doubt a majority of those people are in favor of such a measure of Home Rule as has been suggested by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell, there is a very great minority of that people—a majority of the weight and intellect of the country—who are altogether opposed to any such measure, who are permeated with the conviction that any measure of Home Rule, unsurrounded by ample safeguards, would result in the ruin of their country and be a death-blow to their own peace and happiness. There is not a man who is acquainted with the character and the sympathies of these men who does not know thoroughly well that, if occasion should arise, they would fight to the last gasp in defence of their property, their homes and their religion. There is no doubt whatsoever that any measure of Home Rule unsurrounded by ample safeguards, is a measure for civil war in Ireland; and he must be an able man indeed, and a far seeing man indeed, who can tell us what that would ultimately involve. This question is fraught with momentous issues; it is surrounded by dangers which, perhaps, many of us here in Canada can but dimly discern. We have on two former occasions pronounced our opinion on this question. Would not we act the part of wise men at this crisis by leaving the question in the hands of those who are, of necessity, better informed as to the facts connected with it than we can possibly be, and who are directly responsible for the manner in which they may deal with it. And above all things let us take care, let us beware lest while my hon. friend is asking us to support these resolutions, he is not all unconsciously, all unwittingly, asking us to support something which will not so much benefit the poor, warm-hearted, generous, suffering peasantry of Ireland as it will strengthen and encourage those who are the foreign enemies of our Empire and Fenian traitors to our Queen. I have to thank you, Sir, and the House for the very patient attention you have accorded me during the time I have addressed you. I fear I have occupied too much time; but I will now, with the permission of the House, move an amendment to these resolutions which is as follows:—

That all the words after "that" be struck out, and the following words substituted therefor: This House desires to repeat the expressions of its deep and abiding interest in the prosperity and happiness of the people of Ireland and its adhesion to the sentiments on the subject of Home Rule, enunciated in the joint Address to Her Majesty from both Houses of the Canadian Parliament, passed in the Session of 1882, and in the resolution adopted by this House in 1886. This House is, however, unable to form or express an opinion as to the merits or demerits of the Bill for the amendment of the criminal law with respect to Ireland, now before the Imperial Parliament, in the absence of the measure itself and of the papers and evidence on which it is based.

Mr. KENNY. I consider it fortunate that on this, almost the first, occasion on which I have had the honor of addressing the Parliament of Canada, I have to refer in terms of eulogy to the institutions of our own country; that I have to express the hope that a part of the great Empire to which we are all so proud to belong should be permitted to enjoy some such measure of self-government as we possess in this country and which has been a fruitful source of so much happiness to the people of Canada. In no part of the Empire is our illustrious Queen more beloved, or the people more attached to her throne than they are in this Dominion of Canada; and none of us Canadians are more loyal than those of Irish birth or descent. Every Irishman knows that here, in common with all our people, he enjoys the fullest measure of civil and religious liberty, that his position in this country is exactly what he makes it for himself by his conduct, his industry or his abilities. The cordial reception which has ever been given to the mention of Her Majesty's name at every festive gathering of Irishmen that I have attended in Canada is that expression of affection and loyalty which freemen are ever ready to accord to the representative of the Government under which they live. We know that the advocates of self-government for Ireland have ever pointed to Canada as the happiest illustration that could be found of a people of different creeds and races living harmoniously and prosperously under a form of Home Rule. And now, for one moment, I will refer to some of the arguments that have been used by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). He spoke of the desire—what appears to me, Sir, the very natural desire—of the Irish people to have some form of self-government, as a conspiracy against the Empire. Now, Sir, are we Canadians prepared to admit that our form of Home Rule is any conspiracy against the Empire? If it is not a conspiracy in Canada, why should it be a conspiracy in Ireland? The hon. member has referred to certain crimes that have been committed in Ireland. Every man who listened to him must have deplored them; but does he mean to tell hon. gentlemen sitting around these benches that the extent of crime is greater in Ireland than it is in any other country in the world of the same population? Every hon. gentleman here knows that that is not the case; that crime in Ireland assumes only one form, which is the result of centuries of misrule. The hon. gentleman also referred to the feelings of the minority in Ireland if Home Rule were granted to that country. Does he not know that the advocates of that measure have always insisted that the rights of the minorities would and should be protected? Why, Sir, it seems to me as if every Canadian must be a Home Ruler, for that is the form of government which prevails in our own country. Living in this free land, where the people rule, and the voice of the majority is absolute, the state of things in Ireland to-day is thoroughly incomprehensible to us; it is an unfathomable mystery. The condition of the people of that country is a sad caricature upon the boasted civilisation of the nineteenth century. Enjoying all the blessings which we do under our advanced form of popular government, we feel warranted in expressing the opinion that it would be a wise, a prudent and a gracious act to grant the Irish people that form of government which works so advantageously for us. Last year, Sir, some amongst us had the pleasure of welcoming to Canada one of the most distinguished members of the Imperial Parliament, and a prominent member of the Irish parliamentary party. I refer to Mr. Justin McCarthy, the celebrated historian and journalist. That gentleman told us publicly from the platform, and privately in our homes, that what he desired for Ireland was some such measure of self-government as we possess in Canada. I believe that granting self-government to Ireland would lead to the contentment, and consequently to the prosperity of the people of that country, and add to the honor and dignity of the Empire. It seems to me, Sir, that the heart of every lover of freedom, and especially the heart of every Irishman, must throb with dismay whenever and wherever the Coercion Bill is named. It seems to me that that is the most sadly retrogressive piece of legislation which has ever been proposed in our day. Who, Sir, can read a description of the present state of Ireland and the Irish people, and not feel a desire to have it, if possible, ameliorated? We desire that amelioration, not alone in the interest of the people of Ireland, but in the interest of our common Christianity and in the interest of the great Empire to which we belong. I know, Mr. Speaker, that we are sent here to deliberate upon the affairs of our own country, and to legislate upon all that concerns the welfare of Canada; and if a young member might be permitted to express an opinion upon such a matter, I would say that I do not consider it wise that we should encumber our deliberations with the consideration of extraneous matters. But, I must remember, too, that we are loyal subjects of Queen Victoria, and all that concerns any part of her domain interests us. Believing, then, Sir, as I do, that granting a form of self-government to Ireland would be a benefit to that country, and that the Coercion Bill should be suppressed, I have very much pleasure in supporting the resolution of my hon. friend, the member for Montreal Centre. I have, Sir, every faith in the high sense of justice which usually actuates the Parliament and the people of Great Britain; but I know that there, as indeed in all old countries, prejudices are strong, and that changes, especially changes in the forms of government, are wrought slowly. Yet, I do believe that sooner perhaps than many of us imagine, some form of self-government will be granted to the people of Ireland which will satisfy their natural national aspirations. Appearances indicate that the long night of Ireland's misery and humiliation is drawing to a close, and that the dawn of a brighter day is breaking; and when that day comes, when peace and contentment reign throughout the British Isles, nowhere will the glad tidings be received with greater joy than among the liberty-loving people of Canada. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the motion made by my hon. friend the member for Montreal Centre will receive a generous support from the members on both sides of this House.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FLYNN. I feel it my duty to offer a few observations on the resolutions introduced by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). In 1882, when I had the honor of a seat in this House, similar measures were introduced by the hon. gentleman who occupies the position of Minister of Inland Revenue, and I had then the pleasure of voting for those resolutions, as I will have to-day the pleasure of voting for those proposed by the hon. member for Montreal Centre. We were then told from Downing Street that the question was one in which we had no concern, that it was purely an Imperial question in which we had no right to interfere. From that doctrine I then dissented, as I do now. I believed then we had the right to interfere, as I believe now we have that right. I believed then it was the duty of the Parliament of that day to present an humble Address to Her Majesty, asking for a measure of Home Rule to be granted to Ireland similar to that we enjoy in the Dominion, and which we believed, if granted by the Imperial Legislature, would be the means of restoring quiet to that country and peace to the Empire. If we believe that still to be the case, it is clearly our duty to present an humble Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty, as proposed in the resolutions before the House. But there is another reason why we should do so. On the borders of this country, in the neighboring Republic, there is now a large body of Irishmen, numbering, I believe, nearly fourteen millions. These men left their native country filled with strong feelings against the British Government. They will continue to be governed by these so long as the British Government continues to treat Ireland unfairly by denying her a fair measure of Home Rule, and while these people are on our borders, imbued with these sentiments, they are a standing menace to Canada. Therefore, if from no higher motive than self-interest, we have the right to humbly ask the Imperial Government to grant Home Rule to Ireland.

Mr. KENNY.

Already bodies of these men have revenged themselves on England through Canada, and we do not want to suffer a repetition of their revenge. In Canada we have nearly a million of Irishmen and their descendants, who naturally sympathise with their friends at home struggling for self-government, and if they can, through their representatives in Parliament, give expression to their views, they have the right to do so. We do not arrogate to ourselves any authority over the British Parliament, but only come here as the representatives of five millions of people in humble supplication to the Throne, asking the Imperial Government to give to the people of Ireland what the people of Canada enjoy, what gives us peace and happiness, and what we believe would give to Ireland the same measure of prosperity and happiness, namely, the control of their own domestic affairs. It must be quite clear to every student of history that the means hitherto adopted by the English Government and the Imperial Parliament to govern Ireland have been failures, and why? Simply because Ireland has been governed, not as England and Scotland have been governed, but in a different manner altogether. When any one of her grievances has been redressed, it has not been redressed in a graceful manner, through a spirit of fair play and a sense of justice, but rather from a sense of fear. History confirms this assertion. We know that not even the smallest concession has been made to Ireland, either political or religious, except through a sense of danger and fear, rather than from any desire to do justice to that unhappy country. To my mind there are two questions connected with Ireland, on the speedy settlement of which depend in a great measure the happiness of Ireland and the restoration of social harmony and peace in that country. These are: the settlement of the land question and Home Rule. It is high time that the civilised world should cease to be shocked by the repeated evictions of human beings, thrown out in every stage of sickness and infirmity on the roadside. Ireland has long submitted to the system which produces such results, but will do so no longer. The spirit of the people is roused against it, and they will no longer submit to a system which sends her children either to the workhouse or the pestilential emigrant ship. Is there any wonder that a system such as this should produce violent agitation and social disorder, and drive men to become rebels, bringing in its train those periodical famines which have shocked and at the same time called forth the charity of the world? There is no country of the extent so fertile as Ireland, no country of equal area so capable of producing agricultural produce to as large an extent. Yet, notwithstanding that fact, time and again has the civilised world been shocked by these famines, and its charity been invoked to keep the Irish people from starvation. To what can we attribute these famines occurring periodically in a country so fertile and purely agricultural? I unhesitatingly say, and history bears me out, that it is due to the bad system of laws which governs them. It is due to these laws which, in the language of one of her gifted sons, "compels her children to perish in a climate soft as a mother's smile and on a soil fruitful as God's love." It has been often said by people who know nothing of the history of that unhappy country that the Irish are turbulent naturally, but what better answer can be given to that assertion than to point to the record and career of Irishmen in Canada. We find in Canada Irishmen emulating their neighbors of other extractions in building up the country, and vying with the men of other nationalities in works of benevolence and charity, as well as in enterprises of commerce. To what must we attribute this change in the character of Irishmen in Canada, as compared with that attributed by many people to them in their own country? Is there something in this invigorating northern clime that drives treason out of the Irishman's head? And is it only in the moist climate and green hills of his native land that with him treason flourishes? No, it is due to the fact that in the land he is forced to leave, he suffers from tyranny and oppression, while in this country he lives under a system of equal laws for all, and enjoys, in common with every Canadian, the fullest measure of human liberty. You will find the Irishmen here as loyal and faithful to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, as any subject in her vast Dominions. I believe, that the land question is one of the greatest evils and troubles, and will be so until that question is settled. We in this Dominion have had our landlords. In Prince Edward Island, that little Province down by the sea, they have had their landlords. In the early history of that country that island was parcelled out to the retainers and followers of the Crown, and the immigrant who came there and settled in that island and tilled the soil, and by the sweat of his brow reclaimed the land from the forest, had to pay rent to a landlord and to suffer all the evils incident to that state of affairs. But he would not submit to it, and the result was that in that island they had their Land League as they had in Ireland. They opposed the administration of the law. In order to carry out the civil law, in order to collect those rents, the military power had to be invoked, and they had to get a company of soldiers from Halifax to enforce that collection. When the Government of Prince Edward Island found that it was necessary to aid the civil law by the military power, they found it necessary to take steps to cure that state of things. They saw that the only remedy was to convert the tenant farmer into a proprietor in fee simple, and they saw that the only remedy that could be applied was to put their hands into the Provincial exchequer and buy out the landlords; and the result has been that from that hour to the present you have had peace, prosperity and contentment in that fertile and productive little island. Let the Imperial Government do the same in reference to Ireland. It is much easier for them to pay the amount required to buy out the landlords of Ireland than it was for the Government of the small Province of Prince Edward Island at that time, twenty odd years ago, to pay the amount required for the purpose there. I see no reason, therefore, why the Imperial Government should not pursue that course and restore order in Ireland. But, instead of grappling with these difficulties, instead of meeting the Irish people in their just demands for Home Rule and for the settlement of this land question, we find that the Imperial Government have introduced a coercive measure, a Crimes Act. They are now endeavoring to pass, and I have no doubt will pass, another coercive measure, which will make eighty-seven since the commencement of the union. This measure is directed against the expression of public opinion, against the freedom of speech, against the right of public meeting, and against the freedom of the press. All these great constitutional privileges were the foundations of English liberty, because the English people enjoyed these privileges long before they obtained the constitutional rights they have to day, and these were the means by which they obtained their great constitutional privileges. Freedom of debate, liberty of the press, and freedom in the expression of opinion were the means by which our forefathers obtained, in England at all events, the great constitutional privileges they now enjoy, but which Ireland has been persistently denied, and now for the eighty-seventh time in eighty-seven years they are again to be deprived of these means. An eminent historian has said, that we recognise in the fierce contention of our ancestors the conflict of great principles and final triumph of freedom. By argument and discussion truth is discovered, public opinion is expressed, and a free people are trained to the science of government. These great powers which were given to the English people, enabling them to agitate for the reforms they thought necessary and to have their grievances redressed, have been systematically denied to the Irish people; and, now, in the latter part of the nineteenth century, when British subjects all over the world are invited this year to celebrate Her Majesty's Jubilee, when joy and gladness are supposed to prevail all over her vast dominions, there is one spot in which, if this coercive measure that is now before the Imperial Parliament is carried, sadness will prevail in place of joy. On that account, if on no other, this is to be regretted. Whenever measures of this description were introduced into the Imperial Parliament before, the Government of the day, when they introduced them and invited discussion upon them and asked a majority of Parliament to pass them, at least gave some statistical information which warranted them in stating to the British House of Commons that a coercive measure of that description was necessary for the government of Ireland. But in this case they did not do that; in this case it has been shown by incontrovertible statistics that crime in Ireland was never less than it is to-day, that, so far from its being a case requiring a coercive measure, it is the very reverse. Let me here read a comparative statement taken from a speech of Mr. Gladstone's, comparing the year 1832 with the year 1885, extending over a period of fifty-three years. You will find from that comparative statement what a diminution there has been in crime, and what little justification there is in this year of grace 1887 for a coercive measure. In 1832, the homicides were 248; in 1885, they were 65. The cases of attempts to kill were, in 1832, 209; in 1885, they were 37. The serious offences of all other kinds in Ireland, in 1832, were 6,014; in 1885, they were 1,057. The whole of the criminal offences in Ireland were, in 1832, 14,000; in 1885, they were 2,683. Here, during a period of fifty-three years these figures show a very marked diminution of crime. There is, I believe, a slight allowance to be made for the difference in population, for unfortunately the population of that country in 1832 was greater than it is to-day, and that is one of the greatest proofs of the misgovernment of the country—misgovernment which has driven the sons of that land to every part of the world, because they could not submit to the laws which were forced upon them there. Since 1885, since Mr. Gladstone and the great bulk of the Liberal party have taken a stand in favor of Home Rule, we find that the mind of Ireland is very much quieted and that crime has almost disappeared from that country; so there is absolutely no justification for the introduction of this coercive measure. What was given to every Parliament before as a justification for the passage of a coercive measure does not exist in Ireland to-day, but the reverse is the case. During all this time when Ireland has had to suffer so much from the want of a domestic Legislature and from a bad system of landlordism, she has had to pay much more than her share of taxes into the Imperial Treasury in proportion to her population. Here is a statement from the London Daily News quoted by the Montreal Herald:

"In 1884-85 the contributions of the three countries were:—

	Contributions.	Population.	Amount per Head.
Ireland.....	£7,755,001	4,962,693	£1 11 3
Scotland ..	8,825,941	3,866,521	2 5 7
England & Wales	57,327,686	27,132,449	2 2 3

"According to this Ireland seems to pay less. But the total value of property and income assessed in 1885 was as follows:—

England.	Scotland.	Ireland.
£53,429,560.	£61,125,422.	£23,912,150.

"In this connection the Daily News publishes the following comparison:—

	Contribution.	Population.	Incidence.
1851.....	£4,006,711	6,552,785	£0 12 2
1861.....	6,420,378	5,798,664	1 2 1
1871.....	7,086,593	5,412,377	1 6 2
1885.....	7,755,000	4,962,693	1 11 3

"Whilst taxation has increased in Ireland since 1861 from 12s. 2d. per capita to £1 11s. 3d., the Imperial taxation of Great Britain has diminished by more than 3s. per head.

"The same authority estimates that in the 32 years since 1853 this poor country has paid £100,000,000 beyond her fair contribution to the Imperial Treasury. While this has been going on—that is to say, while her population has been reduced to one-half of its former numbers, and the total taxation has increased on the reduced population—it was to be expected that pauperism would show a great increase. The figures are certainly startling. The Daily News supplies the following tables:—

"The admissions to the Irish workhouses were, during the year ended September, 1884, in comparison with admissions during different periods in the last twenty-five years—

	Total No. admitted in sickness.	No. admitted who were not sick.	Total No. admitted.	Total No. relieved.
1874	49,540	131,490
1884	53,106	200,237
1859	118,594	153,706
1871	181,032	225,510
1884	253,342	299,953

"No of persons who received poor relief during the years ended September, 1885 and 1886—

	In Workhouses.	Out-door.	Total.
1886	357,621	348,295	705,826

"In three years the paupers have much more than doubled. They now number 1 in every 7 of the population. In Connaught, with a population in round numbers of 800,000, 247,184 persons received poor relief last year, or 309 in every 1,000. In England and Wales the ratio of paupers per 1,000 in the same year only fractionally exceeded 28."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out that Ireland believes that nothing can remedy the evils existing within her borders but a Local Parliament. She believes that the only remedy for these evils is local self-government—Home Rule. The Imperial Government also know the troubles they have had with Ireland, the cost of maintaining the police force and constabulary there, and the Imperial Government also know that during the last fifty years, since Canada enjoyed Home Rule, the people of this country have been contented. An hon. member of this House, when speaking on the Address, said that so long as the people of Canada had not complete control of our domestic affairs, a feeling of discontent existed. The same spirit and the same feeling existed in the Maritime Provinces, and, Sir, if there was no revolt, if there was no direct appeal to arms there—for we were on the very verge of it, so far as the agitation of public orators could carry us—it was because we were granted responsible government and control of our own affairs. We now control our own affairs, and peace reigns within our borders. Now, why does not England, instead of coercion, try these means with Ireland? Mr. Gladstone pointed out, in introducing his Home Rule Bill, that for nearly a century England had been trying to govern Ireland by coercion, and it was now time to try other measures. Why does she not grant Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule measure if she wishes to secure peace and happiness for Ireland? To Irishmen and their descendants the world over, to all true friends of the freedom of the human race, the rapid change that has taken place in English public opinion in reference to Home Rule, must be very cheering. We know that a majority in Scotland and Wales are in sympathy with the Irish people, we know that the democracy of England are in sympathy with Ireland, we know that the greatest statesman that England ever produced (Mr. Gladstone) is now in sympathy with Home Rule. For eighty-seven eventful years, ever since the Union, Ireland has been struggling for her freedom, and it is folly now, it is madness of the worst kind, for the English Government to refuse a just measure of Home Rule. Even in the darkest hours of her history, she never abated one jot of her demands for local self-government. Now, when she never stood better than to-day, when her sons, scattered all over the world, are aiding and assisting her, the present Government of England must try some other means for the pacification of Ireland, for the restoration of social order in that country, besides coercion. Let them do away with the Crimes Act, let them treat the Irish kindly, let them manifest an earnest and honest desire to lift Ireland up to the level of their own contentment and prosperity, let them earnestly and honestly obliterate the bitter memories which centuries of cruel wrongs and oppressions have left in the Irish heart—let them do that and they will no longer require a Crimes' Act or coercive measures. In place of the discontent and discord that exists in that country to-day, they will find contentment and peace reigning. If they attempt to govern Ireland according to the well-understood wishes of the Irish people, to meet the Irish people on fair grounds, instead of discontent, they will find a loyal, contented and happy people.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think it is very much to be regretted that this question has been again brought before this Parliament. It is to be regretted for the reason already stated that it is a matter not coming within our jurisdiction, and I think it a very improper position for this country to occupy that our Parliament, year after year, should express an opinion which, so far as its effects on the Home Government is concerned, is just as idle as the wind. But there is another reason why we should not deal with this question, in the fact that we are called upon, with very slight knowledge of the facts, to give an opinion upon a question which has puzzled the brains of the wisest and ablest statesmen, and I say it is presumptuous in us to express an opinion upon a question of such vast magnitude, and I say it with all due respect to the members of this House, when a large majority of them know very little of its merits. Now, Sir, I would ask the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) what would he think if the Imperial Parliament were to pass a resolution saying that it would not be for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada that the Province of Quebec should pass an Act to incorporate the Society of Jesuits, how would he like such a resolution as that to be passed in the Imperial Parliament? Yet it would be no more preposterous for them to pass such a resolution than it is for us to pass a resolution affecting, not the whole of Ireland, nor the Irish people, as we are told so often to-day, but affecting the administration of justice in some particular localities where the existing state of the law is not found sufficient to repress lawlessness. Now, with regard to another thing; I think any one who listens to this debate, must have been struck with the very broad assumptions upon which the supporters of this resolution base their arguments. We hear over and over again the old hackneyed story of oppression and misgovernment in Ireland, as though every ill to which Ireland has ever been subjected, as though every misfortune the Irish people have ever undergone, was inevitably due to misgovernment and want of knowledge of her interests. One would imagine that Ireland was a Province governed as Poland has been by the Czar of Russia. One would hardly believe that Ireland has a large share of representation in the Imperial Parliament and in the affairs of the Imperial Government—I believe a larger share than any other part of the British Empire. One would think that Irishmen were excluded from the Imperial service; one would think they had not the same opportunity as men of any other part of the Empire to rise to the highest places in the Government of the Empire, and to enjoy every possible right and constitutional privilege which every Englishman enjoys. It is also assumed for the purpose of this argument that the Irish are a homogeneous people, that the whole people are suffering from misgovernment, that there is a unanimous expression of opinion in favor of this measure of Home Rule. Now, those who make these statements ignore—for they must know better—that there are a million and a-half of people in Ireland who will not submit to such a measure as Mr. Gladstone has sought to introduce. There is no statesman in England, at the present day at any rate, who is not willing to give to any part of the British Empire, Scotland and Wales as well as Ireland, a measure of Home Rule for the purpose of controlling its own domestic affairs; but if the English Parliament and people voted against Mr. Gladstone's measure last year, it was expressly because the terms of that measure were such that, if the Irish people had been willing to accept it as the ultimate object of their desires, then they were utterly unfit to be a free people. Was it to be supposed that a free people would consent to Mr. Gladstone's proposal to give up absolutely the right of self-government so far as the Empire is concerned—for this was contemplated in proposing that the Irish people should abandon the great constitutional privilege of having representatives in proportion to the taxes they were called upon to pay. They were called upon to contribute to the Imperial revenues, and yet they were to have no representation and no voice in the Imperial Councils, and in many other respects Ireland was placed in a position far inferior to what she had occupied since the conquest. In every way the Imperial service would be shut against the Irish people. The argument is clear, that Mr. Parnell never intended to accept the measure as a final settlement of the question, and his supporters among the people would never have been ready to accept it. Fortunately, we are not left in any doubt as to what Mr. Parnell's intentions were or the intentions of his party, because the view was expressed in the clearest language, time and time again, that nothing but separation and absolute independence would be acceptable to them. It was because of that position, that the Home Rule measure was rejected, not only by the House of Commons, but by the people of England and the Empire at large. I have this fault to find with the resolutions moved by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), namely, that in reciting the resolution passed last Session he would lead the House to believe that the last Parliament expressed an opinion in favor of Mr. Gladstone's Bill. His language conveys that impression, which is an erroneous one; and in reciting the resolution, not only should the actual words be quoted, but it should be made clear as to what was the actual intention of Parliament at that time. There are a great many other assumptions on which the argument for Home Rule is based, and the most preposterous assumption of all is one that appears to be the most reasonable proposition until due consideration is given to the subject. We are told that because we have Home Rule in Canada, therefore the people of Ireland should have Home Rule too; that because Home Rule has succeeded in Canada, and succeeded as we hope it may continue to succeed in all the Provinces of the Dominion, as well as regards the Dominion at large, the same measure should be applied to Ireland, and because it has been successful here it would prove successful there. Those who lay down such a proposition entirely ignore the difference of circumstances. There is no analogy whatever between the two cases; the people are different, the circumstances are different, the relations between the two countries are geographically different, and when hon. gentlemen, as did the last speaker, speak about the emancipation of this country from the rule of Downing Street, they must be aware that there is no sort of analogy between our position towards Downing Street and that existing between Ireland and England. Ireland is an integral part of the Empire and shares to the fullest extent its glory and responsibilities, and whatever position is obtainable or can be enjoyed by any subject of the Empire, no matter from what part he may come, is attainable by an Irishman. I say any analogy is absolutely wanting. It is an assumption that is likely to appeal to the people, but if examined the case utterly fails. In the first place, self-government in this country was, in the beginning at any rate, an absolute necessity, and it must be remembered also that government by the Colonial Office was as different a thing as there could possibly be from the government of Ireland by the British. Ireland has her own representatives in the Imperial Parliament; they are present to submit her grievances and to assist in shaping legislation, and they possess all the powers to which other members are entitled. In every other way the assumption on which this argument is based is entirely fallacious. Hon. gentlemen who are to speak and vote on this question should not pass over these matters too lightly. The assumption is also made that the Irish are a most oppressed people, that the country is tramped under foot by foreign power, that it is governed as Poland may have been governed in the past or is governed at this moment by the Czar of Russia, utterly forgetting the representative institutions that prevail. The way in which it was proposed to effect a remedy was, as I have said, by making Ireland a mere province, and by abandoning all the advantages which it possess as an integral portion of the Empire. Another assumption, and it is equally a fallacious one, and indeed it is more than a fallacious one, it is an assumption which is a most dangerous one to present to this House and the country, is that the British Government have been treating the Irish people without mercy. I say the assumption of those who are agitating in favor of Home Rule is that the Irish are a long-suffering, down-trodden people, and are entitled to the sympathy of subjects in all parts of the Empire. What are the facts? Who is carrying on the agitation? Why, it is the National League, successors to the Land League. And what is the National League? The National League is composed of men who, with all respect to their ability, and the ability of several of them is unquestioned, have set themselves, deliberately and avowedly, to render all government in Ireland impossible. That is their avowed declaration; that is what they say they intend to do. What are the means they adopt? They have adopted the most terrible system of coercion and tyranny ever established? Talk of coercion by law! The law generally, as administered by British courts, is more or less tempered with mercy. The law of the National League knows no mercy and no consideration. It tramples on the innocent laborer, and shoots him down if he disobeys their behests; it treats every one who disobeys without mercy or consideration; and yet those are the men with whom we are asked to express sympathy in the present resolutions. Every one who has read the debates in the Imperial House of Commons will see that the assumption to which I have alluded, that this agitation is one which should create sympathy in this House is entirely without foundation; and hon. gentlemen who wish to give intelligent votes on this question should inform themselves in that regard, and a very slight perusal even of the debates of the last few days in the Imperial Parliament will convince them that there are two sides to this question, as there are two sides to every other question; and the Home Secretary brought a mass of evidence in favor of the proposed measure, improperly called the Coercion Bill, which it is impossible to the Government or people of England to resist. The hon. gentleman who last spoke endeavored to show by statistics that crime in Ireland is less than for years past. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the course of the speech in which he introduced the Crimes Bill, expressly declared that he did not rest his case on the number of crimes committed or on the criminal statistics quoted, but upon the fact, which was established by the most incontrovertible evidence, established by quotations from the charges of the judges, that in certain portions of Ireland there is no such thing as law, that it is impossible to successfully prosecute, that it is impossible to obtain a conviction even when the case is a most glaring one and the evidence most conclusive. A further difficulty was that, in most cases, evidence could not be obtained, so complete was the terrorism established by the National League over men who came forward to give evidence. If a man came forward he did so at the risk of the loss of his property and the destruction of his family as well. The Chief Secretary rested his case not on the criminal statistics but on the fact established beyond controversy; that the law in Ireland, or rather, I should say, the law in certain portions of that country, had become practically a thing of the past. The case of coercion was well and fairly argued by the hon. member from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and this Bill instead of being called a Coercion Bill should properly and strictly be called an Anti-Coercion Bill, because it is intended to relieve those suffering under the tyranny of the Land League from the attacks and cruelty to which they are subjected. The consequence of this state of terror which prevails in the disturbed districts, not over the whole of Ireland fortunately, but over a considerable portion of it, is that when a crime has been committed, when the perpetrators have been arrested and when the witnesses have come forward, a jury will not convict. If anyone will read the speech of the Chief Secretary—I do not like to occupy the time of the House by quoting facts and figures within the reach of hon. members—they will find it stated that it is impossible to carry on government in some portions of Ireland under the existing state of the law. If such is the case, and it is proved beyond all question, then the Government are bound to step in and pass such measures as are necessary to cover the difficulties that have arisen. Now take the Coercion Bill as it is called. Why it is not nearly so severe as the one which was introduced by the Gladstone Government a few years ago; and if any one will read the debates he will find that when the last Act was put in force crime was sensibly diminished, and when that effect has been produced by the measure now before the English Parliament the Government will then be in a position to proceed with remedial legislation. But it is necessary in the meantime that measures should be adopted which will enable the process of the courts to be respected and carried out. There is another point which is clearly brought out by speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which was that the matter had gone far beyond a mere question of agrarian crime; that a man may commit any outrage altogether apart from matters connected with the land agitation and if he is a member of the League or has influence with it he is as safe from prosecution as though his crime was exactly of an agrarian nature. Now the National League has brought about this state of things. As the Chief Secretary stated: "it strikes at every relation of life, it does not spare the relatives of those who have offended, and its influence extends even beyond the grave." Those who have read anything of what has gone on in Ireland for the last few months will understand the Chief Secretary's allusions, when he used the language I have quoted. Now it is against those men and such as these that the Coercion Bill is intended to act—not against peaceable, law-abiding subjects, but against those who would, in the name of liberty, deprive the subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland of those rights which are enjoyed by British subjects in every part of the world except in Ireland itself. Who are these men and what is this National League? Who are the men who are dictating to the people of England, and are now turning round and attempting to dictate to the people of Canada? The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) alluded to the charges which were made against Mr. Parnell and his followers. Now those charges rest on evidence which is far too conclusive to be met by a simple denial, and appeal so strongly to public opinion that they cannot be disregarded. What is charged against them by the London Times? Hon. gentlemen who have not looked into the subject are not perhaps aware of the real state of the case; they are not aware of the position which those men occupy, the ends and aims which they have in view, and the means which they use to carry out those ends. I read the charge made by the London Times—the charge which is now hanging over the League and its leader—men with whom, and with whose methods, I am very certain the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), and other hon. members on the floor of this House are too generous and too right-minded to have any sympathy; and it is a misfortune that, if their cause is a good one, it should be carried on by men who resort to such nefarious schemes and such infamous methods as the National League has adopted within the last few months. Before quoting the London Times, however, I would just like to give the opinion which that heaven-born statesman, as they now regard him—Mr. Gladstone—expressed about them a little while ago, and I think it would be difficult to imagine a more terrible charge to be brought against any body of men or political agitators than that which was brought against the leaders of the League by Mr. Gladstone himself. Mr. Gladstone said of them before his alliance with them: that the Land League relied upon boycotting and murder, by which in the long run can boycotting be made thoroughly effective. That charge included the great majority of those who in Parliament and elsewhere are carrying on the agitation which has caused disquiet and trouble throughout the Empire. With regard to the charge which is made in the London Times, it is a serious charge; and any charge which is made on the responsibility of that paper is no light matter. There is no business concern, no institution, I suppose in the British Empire, which has better means of obtaining information upon such a subject, or which is less likely to make a false or frivolous charge than the London Times. That paper says:

"We charge that the Land League chiefs based their movement on a scheme of assassination, carefully calculated and coolly applied. Be the ultimate goal of these men what it will, they are content to make towards it in company of murderers. Murderers provide their funds, murderers share their inmost counsels, murderers have gone forth from the League offices to set their bloody work afoot, and have presently returned to consult the constitutional leaders on the advancement of the cause."

Now that charge is not brought forward without evidence; it is not put forward without any substantial ground to support it; and if any one will take the trouble to read the series of articles in the London Times on which the charge is based he will find that it is made on evidence which no man can afford to disregard. I say nothing about the last letter which the Times attributes to Mr. Parnell; that charge may or may not be true; but I speak of the evidence which connects Mr. Parnell directly with Ford, of New York, with the men who were the means of obtaining the principal funds by which the agitation is carried on, and that connection is traced down to the men and women who provided the knives by which those two men Burke and Cavendish were murdered in Phoenix Park. And these are the men with whom by these resolutions we are practically called upon to express sympathy to-day. I put it to the hon. gentlemen, let their sentiments with regard to Home Rule be what they may, let them think what they please about the rights and the wrongs of Ireland, are they prepared to express sympathy with men who are convicted, — yes, I say convicted, because the evidence admits of no possibility of doubt—of using such means for accomplishing their ends, as are mentioned in the charges I have referred to, charges which have been made time and again on several occasions, in public prints as well as in the House of Commons. Now, if any further evidence is wanted of the character of those men and the means to which they are prepared to resort, I need only refer to the fact that the National League has declared its intention of sending one of its emissaries to this country, and for what? To dog the footsteps of the Governor General, the Queen's representative, because, in the capacity of a landlord in Ireland, he has chosen to do something which his tenants did not approve of. What was the language used by that emissary on the occasion to which I have referred? I have not the extract at hand, but hon. gentlemen have seen it, and they know it is a direct incentive to the Irish population of this country, who are in favor of Home Rule, to rise up and dog the footsteps of His Excellency, to insult him, to hoot and jeer him, to deride him from one end of the country to the other. That is the avowed object of the mission of the League's emissary to Canada. I saw a statement in one of the papers that this Government were asked whether they were going to have this emissary put under police surveillance. I take the liberty of telling him and those who sympathise with him that if he comes to this country, and does what he says he will do, it will not be police surveillance that he will require, but something more in the nature of police protection. I venture to tell him that if he comes to Canada and endeavors to carry out the programme he has announced, there are men enough in every town and village of this country to teach him that he comes to the wrong place for such a purpose, and that it is not here that such traitorous doctrines are to be talked or listened to. If further evidence is wanted of how this National League is working, I need only recall your attention to one of the facts stated by the hon. member for Montreal; and I confess I was astonished that he had the hardihood to stand up and refer to the vote in the Quebec Legislature a few days ago. Has it come to this, in a Province of this Dominion, supposed to be under British law and governed by the British constitution, and where the people have lived long enough to imbibe a sense of British fair play, that an hon. member of that House could not be allowed to express the opinion in the most mild terms that the Coercion Bill was not a proper subject for that House to deal with? Yet he was jeered and insulted and hooted down, not only by the members of the House, but by the people in the galleries, and neither the Speaker nor any member of the Government had the manliness to get up and defend him; and the only man who had the courage to do so was a French gentleman named Casgrain. If that is a specimen of the way in which Home Rule is to be carried out, God help the unfortunate Protestant minority who would be placed at the mercy of the National League. Now, Sir, I will venture to refer to another circumstance which is fresh in the recollection of any hon. member of this House who has paid any attention to what has been going on in connection with this question. I was surprised to find that a prelate like Archbishop Lynch, of Toronto, could write such a letter as he did to a public meeting, in which he used the most insulting language towards Her Majesty's representative—in which, to use a vulgar expression, he told the boys "Don't nail his ears to the pump." That was practically the substance of Archbishop Lynch's letter—inciting the people to do all they could to insult the Governor General. All these things are very good evidence of the character of the men who sympathise with the objects of the National League, and the means by which they propose to carry out the scheme they have in hand; and I think it would ill-become the members of this House, whatever their sentiments on the subject of Home Rule may be, to sanction the proceedings of men who are guilty of acts which have not only been charged, but proved, against the leaders of the National League. Now, what about this Coercion Bill? It is a very terrible thing that a magistrate should have the power of instituting an investigation even where there is no charge laid. I believe the reason why this Crimes Amendment Bill is so objected to and resisted by the National League is just because they know it will have the effect which it is intended to have, that is, to put an end to their nefarious agitation, and enable the people of Ireland to pursue their various industries without interruption; and then the Government will be in a position to go on with the remedial measures which are already being prepared in the Parliament of the Empire. The last speaker alluded to another subject which I must say I was surprised to hear mentioned by any hon. member of this House, and I was still more surprised when in his speech at the opening of this House the hon. leader of the Opposition used language precisely to the same effect. Both of these hon. gentlemen referred to an Irish element on the other side of the border which is hostile to the British power; and the legislation of this country, whether it has reference to the fisheries or is a resolution in favor of Home Rule, is to be influenced by threats made on the other side of the border. Well, I think the people of this country will come to a very different conclusion from that intended to be drawn by the references made. I think that we will not shape our legislation either with regard to the fisheries or anything else, according to the threats of the Fenian element on the other side of the border; and if anything could induce us to take a bold and independent course and throw out such a resolution as this, it would be just such a threat as that. Now, the hon. gentleman who spoke last must be strangely ignorant of the condition of the country to which he referred. He talks about the necessity of the Imperial Government allowing the Irish tenants to have the same opportunity to purchase their lands and become owners of the soil as tenants have in the Island of Prince Edward. Is the hon. gentleman not aware that such a law now exists on the Statute book, and that there is now before the House of Lords a measure intended to carry that law still further. Is he not aware that it is the expressed intention of the present Administration to pass an Act by which the state will assist the tenant with money at a low rate of interest to purchase his holding, so that in a few years he may become its owner? Therefore, it is idle for him to say that some measure ought to be introduced which is already bearing very satisfactory results, and which would bear still more satisfactory results if it were not that the National League would like to prevent it as far as they could from being carried into effect. The hon. gentleman who spoke last said that this was Her Majesty's year of Jubilee, and that there was only one spot in the Empire where that Jubilee could not be celebrated if the Coercion Bill was passed, and that was Ireland. I venture to say that there will be far more people ready and willing to celebrate Her Majesty's Jubilee if this so-called Coercion Bill is passed than there will be if the tyranny of the National League is permitted to exist during the next few months; and if anything is likely to make those people loyal it will be the passage of that Bill. I do not look for much loyalty from men who openly proclaim their intention to sever the connection of Ireland with the British Empire and make it an absolutely independent State. The hon. gentleman, when he speaks about the condition of the tenants, ought to be aware that there is no tenantry in any part of the British Empire or anywhere else who have the same peculiar rights and privileges as the tenantry of Ireland—neither the tenantry of Scotland nor of Wales, nor of any other part of the British Empire, not even of the Province of Ontario. They have obtained the three F's. The Irish tenant can sell his improvements or compel the landlord to pay him for his improvements. Everything that a landlord can give a tenant to place him in a free and unfettered position the Irish tenant is now in the enjoyment of; and the Bill at present before the House of Lords, which is going on pari passu with this Coercion Bill, is likely to place the tenant in a far better position than he would have been in under

Mr. Gladstone's Bill. The Tory House of Lords intends to include in the class of tenants those whom Mr. Gladstone's Bill did not include, the leaseholders, who form, I believe, one-third of the tenants of Ireland, and place them in the same position as ordinary tenants. When the Imperial Government has done so much, and is doing still more to-day—when it is trying to relieve the peaceable people of Ireland from the intolerable oppression and tyranny of the Land League, is it the proper time for us to indulge in the sentiments expressed by some hon. gentlemen? That may be all very well in public meetings, but it is hardly consistent with the dignity of an assembly like this to follow the example set at public meetings. I do not like to impute any motives to the hon. members who have spoken in support of this resolution, but I may say that were it not for their desire to conciliate a certain class of voters in their constituencies, we should hear now and for ever, in this House, the last of Home Rule for Ireland.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has treated us to a very violent attack upon the unfairness and virulence and bitterness of those who object to the Crimes Bill, which he will not allow us to call the Coercion Bill, and he has given us also a glowing illustration of the impartiality and fair mindedness and absolute absence of bias with which hon. gentlemen who favor the Coercion Bill can regard the question of Home Rule and the character of Irishmen as individuals or citizens. After hearing the hon. gentleman's denunciation of the National League as a band of traitors, in league with murderers and conspirators, after hearing him tell us that the evidence given of the complicity of Mr. Parnell, and the other Home Rule leaders, with the authors of the Phoenix Park outrage is so convincing and irrefragable, that it leaves no further room for doubt—after hearing a statement of that kind from the hon. gentleman, who is a specimen of the fine old Irish gentleman, what Irishman would hesitate to leave his fate in the hands of two stipendiary magistrates chosen from that class to replace the jury in Ireland? I do not intend to cast the slightest imputation on the hon. gentleman's desire to be fair and impartial, or on the clearness of his intellect, but I ask the House to take notice how far from anything like impartiality or fitness to conduct judicial investigation, without the check of a jury, men of that kind are, and to what extremes they may be led by the bitterness of partisan spirit. I am glad the hon. gentleman has taken the tone he did, for in so doing he has given us a particular proof, if any were needed, of the strength of our argument against allowing any two individuals, especially two Irishmen, from whatever particular class you may take them, to be made sole judge of the guilt of a party opponent. The hon. gentleman has given us that proof unintentionally, and therefore it is all the more convincing. But let us come back to the question itself and the arguments that have been advanced. I hope it will be possible for us, even after what we have heard in this bitter strain against the Irish National leaders, and against Irishmen as individuals, to consider this question in something like a judicial spirit, and try to come to some conclusion on the two points now before the House. Those two points are: in the first place, have we any business to interfere and express any opinion about matters such as this? In the second place, is this the proper time to interfere by expressing an opinion, and should we express the opinion the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) wishes us to express? This House has shown already on two occasions—more strongly on the first but to some extent also, on the second—its conviction that we have the right to interfere, and to tender our views to the Government of the Empire, in regard to its treatment of Ireland. I need not go into all the arguments, as they have been very ably dealt with already. I would simply say, in the first place, that if we were snubbed by Mr. Gladstone in 1882, as we are told we were, when we presumed to address Her Majesty, we would be less than Canadians, less than free men, if we would sit down smilingly accepting that snub, and allow it to be taken as the conclusion of the whole affair. In the second place I claim that, whether snubbed or not, we have the right, as Canadians, as representatives in the Canadian Parliament, to express any opinion we think fit as to the conduct of the Government of Great Britain, and to address that opinion either to Her Majesty in Council, or to the leader of the Government in England, or to anybody else. We have even the right to send it to our own agent in London, as was done last year, and I think that was the weakest and most inefficient way of making known our opinion on the subject to the people in England that we could have adopted. I believe we would be unfaithful to our duty as Canadian citizens if we allowed the statement, that it would be preposterous for us to interfere in matters of this kind, to pass unchallenged and unanswered in the most effectual way in which it can be answered, namely, by doing the very thing we are told not to do. We would be allowing the right we have to approach the Throne with whatever we considered a grievance to fall into abeyance and disuse, if we did not exercise it. Especially in the present case have we the right to interfere. As you have been told already, this is not a question which merely affects Ireland. It affects Canada as well. We have two reasons for our right to interfere in regard to the treatment of Ireland. Those two reasons are, the loss of immigration to Canada, caused by the discontented state of Ireland, and risk of invasion in Canada, caused by the irritation of Irishmen in the United States, who are in sympathy with their friends in the old land. Allusion has been made already to the Fenian raid of 1866. Why was that raid made? Because Ireland was discontented. Why was Ireland discontented? Because then, as now, Ireland was misgoverned. It is perfectly absurd to beg the question by assuming, as some hon. gentlemen have assumed, that Irishmen have been disloyal and discontented simply out of pure natural wickedness—there is a slang word which expresses clearly what I mean, but it would not do to use it on the floor of the House. It is absurd to assume that Irishmen are discontented on account of some natural defect in themselves. No nation has ever been discontented for the number of years Ireland has been without some cause. The failure of eighty-six years of coercion to remove that discontent is sufficiently strong proof that grievances do exist in that country, and the existence of those grievances was the cause of the invasion of Canada in 1866. Who knows but that the same cause may produce another invasion? We all remember what that invasion cost us in blood and treasure. Suppose such a thing were to happen again, we would have to spend the blood of our best citizens and our treasure to repel the invasion, and would my hon. friend, who would be the first to put himself in peril, then come here and say we have no right to utter a word as to the treatment of Ireland by England? These are two reasons for our having a special right, as I contend, to interfere and give advice as to the treatment of Ireland by England. Of course there is the other reason that we have tried Home Rule and that we have a right to give our experience of it, and that is entitled to great weight, although, as my friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has pointed out, there are some differences between the two cases, and it does not necessarily follow that because Home Rule is good for Canada it is therefore good for Ireland in this particular form. The principle, however, remains the same. Having therefore, as I contend, the right to interfere and the right to give our opinion on the matter, and to urge upon the people and the Government of England that they should do simple justice to the people of Ireland, the question is whether the present case is one for that interference, and whether the present resolution is a fit and proper one for us to adopt. As to part of the resolution, I hardly feel like entering into an argument on the question of Home Rule. I think this House has sufficiently committed itself on that question, or rather two successive Parliaments of Canada have unanimously committed themselves to the support of Home Rule in the last Session and in the Session of 1882, so that there can hardly be any doubt that the present Parliament will commit itself almost as unanimously to the same principle. Two Parliaments have affirmed the principle, and this, the third Parliament, elected after those two endorsements of the principle, is not likely to go back on that declaration of opinion. As to the second part of the resolution, the most important part of it I believe at present, for it is something new, the protest against the Coercion Bill, I think we have a special right to speak upon it. My hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said that an Irishman had all the rights and all the constitutional privileges of an Englishman. To a certain extent, that is true now, but how true will it be when this so-called Bill to amend the criminal law of Ireland becomes law? Is it consistent with the rights and privileges of a Briton that he should be tried for a serious offence before two stipendiary magistrates without a jury in certain classes of crimes, and that in regard to certain other crimes he may be taken out of the country in which the crimes are alleged to have been committed, and taken into a hostile country and tried before a hostile jury? I do not think that can be held to be consistent with the rights and privileges of Britons. If it were proposed that an Englishman accused of certain crimes should be taken over to Ireland or up into Scotland to be tried, especially in the case of crimes where he was likely to find a prejudice existing against himself and against his people in the country where he was to be tried, is there an Englishman or an Irishman in this House who would say that that was consistent with the rights and privileges of a Briton? No, there is not. The same thing is true in regard to an Irishman. Of course it is true that the Bill provides that he may have Irish lawyers to plead his case before the English jury. I do not know that it would be any great benefit to a man who was accused before an English jury to have an Irish lawyer to plead his case. I know, of course, that the Irish lawyers are more witty, and more eloquent, and more learned in the law than any others, because that is the nature of the nation, but, as an advocate before an English jury, I would rather have an old-fashioned, thick-headed John Bull of a lawyer to plead my cause than the best that could be brought from across the channel. See the prejudices that exist. Take a jury of average clod-hoppers in any part of England, and put the cleverest lawyer in Ireland before them to defend some man for agrarian or socialistic crime, and what chance would he have with that jury of Englishmen? Certainly no favor is shown to an Irishman by enabling him to import an Irish lawyer to plead his case. By this Bill he is to be subjected, at the will of the Attorney General for Ireland, to be taken away from his own country and into a foreign country—into what is practically a foreign country to him, a country, perhaps, that he never visited before and in which he finds prejudices existing against him—and to be tried before any jury the Attorney General might choose, because the Attorney General has the right to fix the place in England in which the trial is to be held, and he may just as easily fix it in a place where it is impossible for an Irishman to get fair play as not. He may do that unintentionally, and, after hearing some of the attacks which have been made against Irishmen—I do not mean in this House merely, but here and elsewhere—I think it is not impossible that the Attorney General might do it intentionally and send a man to be tried where he would know that he would have no chance but for conviction. Mr. Balfour, the Secretary for Ireland, in explaining this Bill to the House of Commons, gave as a reason for requiring the enactment of this extraordinary machinery, that the existing machinery of the law had failed entirely, that you could not get witnesses to give evidence in Ireland, or juries to convict when witnesses did give evidence, and that consequently it was impossible to convict a man of any offence, no matter how clearly it might be proven or how well he might be known to be guilty. This new machinery is intended to correct this failure of justice. How is it going to do it? Mr. Balfour proposes to do away with juries, because he says they will not convict, but there is the other difficulty. He says you cannot get witnesses to give evidence. That is one of his reasons for taking the cases over to England, because he says if you take the witnesses across the channel, they might be less afraid to give evidence. That, however, does not apply to cases of trial before stipendiary magistrates, and there is no provision to make the witnesses give evidence. There is nothing to prevent a man perjuring himself under this Bill more than there is under the existing law. How then, will a stipendiary magistrate be able to do justice better than a judge acting with a jury? I do not see how he will be better able to obtain a conviction unless it is part of the plan that he is to convict without evidence. Barring that—and I do not suppose even Mr. Balfour meant to go so far as that—I do not see how the abolition of the jury is to place the magistrate in a better position to secure the conviction of a man accused of agrarian crime than now. Then, as to the change of venue to England. I have touched upon that, partly in showing what a prejudiced jury an Irishman is likely to meet in England, but I may ask if anything is gained by it? Would witnesses brought across the sea be more likely to testify than they would in Ireland? I do not think so. Mr. Balfour says there is terrorism exercised to prevent their testifying. Well, unless it is intended to locate them permanently in England and keep them under police protection for the rest of their lives, I do not see how they will escape the terrorism by being taken across the channel. If they are afraid now to give evidence affecting their neighbors, because their neighbors may shoot them from behind a hedge, they will be afraid to do so when taken across the channel for fear of being shot when they return to Ireland. Now, I do not believe that this system of terrorism is anything like so wide-spread as Mr. Balfour pretends it is. It may exist to a certain extent, but I wish to point out that Mr. Balfour's supposed remedies for terrorism will not meet the case; that the provisions of this Act do not put him in any better position to obtain convictions against persons accused of crime, than those which exist now, unless, indeed, the new courts were to convict upon insufficient evidence. Now, I think the fact that this is a new and irritating change in the law, which does not seem likely to attain its object, would be sufficient to condemn it, and is sufficient to justify us in protesting against it. But there is something more; there is a provision in the latter part of the law that the Lord Lieutenant in Council may issue a proclamation against associations for political purposes which he may consider dangerous to the commonwealth. Well, Sir, after the discussion here to-night, it is quite clear that this is a clause of the Bill not intended to enforce existing laws at all, but intended to create new crimes, intended to put in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to declare certain associations to be criminal, to prohibit their meetings and to outlaw them, practically, whenever he chooses to say that the association is dangerous to the peace of the country. It is quite clear that if my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) happened to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland he would consider the National League dangerous to the peace and welfare of the country, and that upon the evidence already before the public, that is to say, upon the unsupported assertions of certain newspapers, and the unproven assertions of certain men opposed to its leaders in politics, upon such evidence as that he would consider it proven that the National League was a dangerous association, and he would outlaw them and practically deprive them of the rights of citizens. That is precisely what is likely to happen in the case of some other statesmen of England who are no more free from prejudice than the hon. member for Muskoka would be, if he were chosen to fill the high position I have mentioned. I say it is unwise, unconstitutional, and un-British to put such unlimited power in the hands of one man, and that man almost sure to be a prejudiced party politician. For that reason alone, apart from the two others that I have named, I think it will be proper for us, more than that, it would be our duty, to protest against the passing of this Coercion Bill, because it seems to me, and I believe it will seem to the majority in this Chamber, to be more conformable to the institutions of Russia than to those under which Britons are supposed to live. In regard to crimes charged against Irishmen, I think it has been clearly shown to-night that the total amount of crime in Ireland is not so very remarkable after all, and as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has pointed out, the only direction which Irish crime appears to take is in agrarian outrages. Well, then, what is the proper cure for this sort of crime? Is it to bring in an un-British, unconstitutional, untried, unheard of means of enforcing the laws which have been found unworkable for so many years past? Is it to create new crimes, to entrust the creation of those crimes to prejudiced party politicians? I think not. I think the only remedy for agrarian crimes is to remove the grievance. Of course we may be told that it is the duty of a good citizen to abstain from agrarian crimes, no matter what the provocation may be. No doubt it is. But, Sir, you and I, and every member in this House, and every citizen of Canada, have reason to thank a higher power than the Queen or Government of Great Britain, that we are not exposed to the same temptations to violate the law by agrarian crimes that the people of Ireland are exposed to. My hon. friend who spoke recently told us that the tenants of Ireland possessed peculiar rights and privileges, and I think they do—extremely peculiar rights and privileges. One of them is the privilege of being turned out on the roadside in mid-winter, perhaps with a sick wife and children. That is one of the peculiar privileges of the Irish peasants. But, Sir, I do not want to excite my feelings nor those of hon. members by going into the horrors of this question. I merely wish to point out, that if the Irish peasant is guilty of agrarian crime, he does no more than, perhaps, you or I, or the member for Muskoka, or, perhaps the leader of the Government himself, or my own leader, might do, if they were placed in similar circumstances. Human nature is human nature, and we who believe ourselves to be a moral and respectable people have reason to be thankful that we are not subjected to the temptations which beset the Irish peasantry, otherwise we do not know what we might do ourselves. We are not sitting here in judgment upon the Irish peasants; we are here to-night to express our opinion as to the best means by which this agrarian crime may be avoided. I believe it to be our duty as loyalists, our duty as men who wish to see the unity of the Empire maintained, to point out and to urge that the only means of preserving the unity of the Empire, the only means of removing that weakness that will always exist as long as Ireland is discontented, is not to try to enforce unfair laws, but to remove the grievances from which the people suffer. They talk of making changes in the land laws, and they say, before we make these changes, before we amend the laws so as to make them tolerable to you, we must force you by all sorts of unconstitutional, unheard of means, to obey the bad laws which now exist, and after we have forced you to do that, then we will amend the laws and make them a little easier for you. That is the meaning of the cry about enforcing the law before amending it. Now, there is one thing in which my hon. friend from Muskoka and my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) appeared to be agreed, because their utterances were remarkably alike, and both those hon. gentlemen are well known and declared loyalists. The hon. member for North Bruce told us that Home Rule would mean civil war, that the people of the north of Ireland would not submit to Home Rule, would not submit to be governed by the majority from the south.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend will pardon me. I did not say any measure of Home Rule, Home Rule unsurrounded by ample safeguards; I spoke of a crude measure of Home Rule, hurried upon the people.

Mr. CASEY. I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill. If he chooses to consider that a crude measure, very well.

Mr. McNEILL. I do indeed.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon. gentleman's remarks apply to Mr. Gladstone's Bill, and they were to the effect that if that Bill were carried the people of the north of Ireland would not have submitted but would have taken up arms, a sentiment expressed not only by the hon. gentleman but by some members of the British House of Commons and by loyalists and others of the same stripe. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) put it in very similar terms. He stated it more briefly but very much to the same effect—that the Protestant minority in Ireland would not stand Home Rule, that they had shown themselves able to defend themselves in the past and would do so again. These remarks amount to distinct threats. These two hon. gentlemen speaking in the name of the Protestant population of Ireland, for they are both Protestants from Ireland, and I suppose are acquainted with the feeling of that portion of the population with whom they were acquainted there, make these threats, and I do not doubt that they express the feeling of that particular class of the Irish population—the higher class of the Protestant, Tory landlord population of Ireland. Those members evidently speak for that class, because we find the very same words expressed by representatives of that class in the British House of Commons and on different platforms in Ireland and England. What does it mean? It means a threat—that if Great Britain exercises its undoubted right to pass such legislation, the minority in Ireland will resort to bloodshed rather than be governed by the majority. If that is thought to be a proper argument to use in order to influence the votes of members, well and good; but I am sure most of us will be influenced the other way; and we will be only strengthened in our opposition to this measure, which we will still insist on calling the Coercion Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to say that I was speaking of an attempt to coerce Great Britain by the hon. gentleman, and those who agree with him, into passing a measure of Home Rule which the British people do not approve.

Mr. CASEY. I do not quite understand how we are going to force Great Britain to pass a measure which the people do not approve.

Mr. McNEILL. We know that the British people have pronounced against the attempt to pass a measure of Home Rule.

Mr. CASEY. There is no danger whatever of our coercing Great Britain into passing such a measure. No one wishes to coerce the Imperial Parliament, and no one thinks of such a thing; but we deem it proper to give our advice from our experience in the working of Home Rule in this country. Before this little conversation commenced, I was referring to the tone of certain people in regard to Ireland, and I am sure it will be remarked that all the violence of language in this debate has come from those who profess to be the friends of law and order in Ireland, and I will not say that all the violence of language used in the British Parliament, but most of it has come from those who profess to take the side of law and order, and that most of the violent language used throughout the discussion everywhere has come from those who profess to be the loyalists. This is true here to-night. The assumption of loyalty and the threats as to what would happen have all come from one side, and that is from the loyal side. It is a peculiar state of things, and I am sure the lesson will not be wasted upon the House. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) also stated that the British people had practically given a mandate to the present Parliament of England to pass the present Bill, or to pass some measure to further secure life and property in Ireland. Of course, it is always the duty of a Government to secure life and property, but to say that the people of England gave a mandate to the present Parliament to pass a Coercion Act is to state what the facts do not bear out. The people of England elected a majority in support of Lord Salisbury's Government, but nearly every one, if not every one, of the so-called Liberal-Unionists, by whose votes alone Lord Salisbury's Government maintains power, declared himself at the polls as distinctly opposed to any Coercion Bill for Ireland. If the people had known that the Liberal-Unionists were going to vote for coercion, they would not have sent those members to Parliament, Lord Salisbury would not have had a majority, and he would never have had an opportunity to introduce that Bill. The people of England clearly did not give a mandate in favor of coercion; they returned a majority of members pledged against it. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) told us we could not speak intelligently on this question and form a correct opinion on the merits of the case as we had not the Bill before us, or the information and papers on which the Bill was founded. We have not a copy of the Bill, but we are pretty well informed as to what is the Bill from reading English, American and the Canadian papers, for no newspaper of any importance has failed to publish a summary of its provisions. But that hon. gentleman went on to show that we had sufficient information on this point by quoting from Mr. Balfour's speech the very facts and the information on which the Bill was based. The hon. gentleman showed that we had the facts before us by quoting them, and he is thus condemned out of his own mouth. Mr. Balfour's speech, which was very fully reported, contains sufficient information as to what the Bill is and what it is intended to effect. One thing we know, and that is, that it was intended to secure the paternal care of newspapers. The hon. gentleman said he "was not going to interfere with the liberty of the press, but hoped that the power of summary conviction given to magistrates would prevent newspapers from sharing in these crimes." What would appear to magistrates entertaining the feelings and prejudices of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), or the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), to be sentiments instigating the commission of offences? I am afraid many innocent utterances in our newspapers during a Parliamentary campaign would appear to those gentlemen to be treasonable utterances if published in Irish newspapers, and such power in their hands would be practically that which it is intended to be by the Government introducing the Bill, the means of introducing a Russian censorship of the press and cutting off freedom of discussion in the press, in the same way as the Lord Lieutenant can shut off free discussion at public meetings throughout Ireland. I think the convictions with which many of us, including the hon.

member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) and myself, entered upon this debate have not been shaken, and that nothing has passed in the course of the debate to shake those convictions, but that, on the contrary, every argument used by those opposing the resolutions tended to strengthen our desire that such a protest should be adopted by the House and should tend to induce other hon. members to concur in that view. I might criticise the wording of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). It would have pleased me a great deal better if it had been in the form of a direct Address to Her Majesty instead of a mere resolution of the House. But leaving that aside, if it remains in its present shape, I shall vote for it in preference to the resolution of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I hope the House will show again by a large and practically unanimous vote, as they have shown before, the sympathy they feel with the people of Ireland and their determination to protest against any unconstitutional methods of coercion.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know what may be the fate of the resolutions proposed by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), but I am satisfied that a large portion of them do not express the opinions of the majority of the people of this country. I am myself in favor of a measure of Home Rule. I have taken occasion in previous Parliaments to express my conviction that a just and equitable measure of Home Rule would be a great benefit to Ireland, and perhaps to England and Scotland as well. We, who enjoy the great benefits of local governments and county councils, we, who have local control of our school system, no doubt feel that if those same powers were granted to the people of Ireland, the complete control of their local affairs, so that they might regulate their local matters in any way they might choose, it would conduce to the harmony and peace of that portion of the British Empire. But while, during the last Session of Parliament, we expressed our conviction that a measure of Home Rule should be granted to the people of Ireland, we at the same time dissented from the position that the Home Rule Bill of Mr. Gladstone was a proper one for that country. I think that, perhaps, we have been going a little out of our way in past years, in attempting to dictate to the Government and the people of England as to how they shall manage their affairs. At least Mr. Gladstone thought so in 1882, when he snubbed the sympathisers with Ireland in Canada, and politely told them to mind their own business—that the Government of England were capable of attending to its affairs. For that reason I think we should be a little careful in addressing the Government of the British Islands. But the resolutions of the hon. gentleman go a good deal further than any previous resolutions brought before the House of Commons. It proposed that we shall protest against the adoption of the Coercion Bill which is now before the British House of Commons. Well, it has been stated before in this House by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that this was not a Coercion Bill. Our idea of a Coercion Bill, I think, is that it is a Bill intended more for the punishment of political offences than anything else. This Bill, so far as I can learn its provisions, is one for the repression of crime—for punishing those who commit the ordinary crimes which are committed in the country, but whom the law has hitherto failed to reach. I approve of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Bruce—that we have not sufficient information before this House to guide it to a decision, and that we have not the evidence upon which the decision of the Government was founded when they brought that Bill before the House of Commons of Great Britain, and that, therefore, we should take no action in the matter. I have much pleasure in supporting that amendment. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) told us he thought we were quite justified in interfering in this matter, in making our representations to the Government of Great Britain, because that Government had on many occasions interfered in the affairs of other countries; because on many continental questions, which had disturbed the different Governments of Europe, representations had been sent by the Government of England to those Governments. This is one of those questions upon which the people of Canada to-day are divided. In my opinion the majority of the people—most of those with whom I have met—consider that we have nearly as much as we can do to attend to our own business successfully, and that we will be best fulfilling our duty by attending to that business. Besides, I believe that the elections recently held in Great Britain have demonstrated that the people of the British Islands are largely in favor of the present Government in England. We see by the divisions in the House of Commons that they have a majority of from one hundred to one hundred and twenty. They are fresh from the people; they represent the feeling of the people of England, more particularly on this one question of Home Rule, because that was almost the sole issue before the people at the last general election. Now, a great deal has been said about this Coercion Bill—a Bill which is for the repression of crime and which, so far as I am informed, does not create any new crimes, but proposes to punish crimes that have been committed, and which the laws, as hitherto carried into effect, have failed to reach. We were told last fall and during a portion of this winter that it was impossible for the people of Great Britain to govern Ireland. Those who said this pointed to the crimes and disorder in various parts of Ireland, and said that that condition of things showed the impossibility of the British Government ruling Ireland and that therefore Ireland should be granted a Government of her own, with complete control not only over her local affairs but over the entire affairs of the country. To-day we are told a different story. To-day it is said there is no need for a Crimes Bill because Ireland is not in a state of disorder; that the people are obeying the laws tolerably well, that you do not see there as much crime as you did some years ago; that the condition of affairs there compares favorably with that of the other portions of the British Empire. There is certainly a little contradiction and inconsistency in these statements. I think the Government who have control over the matter, who have the responsibility for carrying out the law, and seeing that peace and order are maintained in every portion of the British Islands, who have information which we have not got, are better able to judge than we are, and that we should not hastily force our opinions on them, when we have not the Bill before us, when we have not the evidence on which that Government founded their Bill and know not the reasons for which they are pressing it before the country. I read the speech of a distinguished statesman not long ago, Lord Randolph Churchill. I think there is no man in England to-day whose opinion, perhaps, would be more impartial than his. He is not a member of the Government nor is he a member of the Opposition; he occupies, perhaps, to-day the most independent position in the House. In making a speech to his constituents he expressed the following opinion of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill:—

"It is quite absurd to call that a Coercion Bill. It is a Bill to enable the Government to carry on the elementary—what I call the alphabetical duties of government. Well, I support that Bill. I consider that the Bill is admirably conceived and admirably constructed. I support every provision of it. I go for the whole Bill. But I go further than that and I say that that whole Bill, in its entirety, must be passed if you wish to preserve the union between Great Britain and Ireland."

He says further:

"Within a month or two months from the passing of that Bill, Ireland will be, as far as law and order and the protection of life and property are concerned, as quiet as this Philharmonic Hall. Then will be the moment to push forward rapidly and boldly your remedial legislation. Then will be the moment to show the Irish people practically that you can do more for them than any National League."

Now, I think the words of an eminent British statesman, a man who is destined to occupy perhaps the most important position in England at no distant day, a man who at the present time stands in an independent and impartial position, should have very great weight with us in the consideration of this question. More than that, what is proposed that we should do? It is proposed that we should strengthen the hands of Mr. Parnell. There is a cloud hanging over Mr. Parnell and the National League, and I think that cloud should be dispersed before we fully endorse, as the resolutions proposed by the hon. member for Montreal Centre do, the actions and the policy of that League. A letter appeared in the London Times a few days ago, dated 15th May, 1882, without any address, and signed "Yours, truly, Charles S. Parnell."

Mr. MILLS. As valuable as your forged telegrams.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Bothwell had better be called on to withdraw that expression.

Mr. MILLS. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to forged telegrams which the hon. gentleman read in this House at the last Session—telegrams which purported to come from my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and which the hon. gentleman must have known he had never sent.

Mr. WALLACE. No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what he said. He said, "Your forged telegrams," accusing me of forging telegrams, and I have to say to that hon. gentleman that his assertion is baseless, unfounded and untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER. If such an accusation was made against the hon. gentleman, I do not think it is parliamentary. Of course no member of this House can be accused of having forged telegrams, and if the expression has been used it should be withdrawn.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for Bothwell, in referring to the telegrams which were uttered in this House last Session by the hon. member opposite, I think properly referred to them as forged telegrams. They were not real telegrams; they were issued in the public press, and the hon. gentleman was the utterer of those telegrams in this House; they were uttered here for a purpose, and he persistently refused to withdraw them or acknowledge that they were spurious. The representations made in this House regarding them were used in the country, and I hold that the hon. member for Bothwell is justified in referring to them in the language in which he has done by the facts of the case and the attitude assumed by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is not whether the hon. gentleman has been justified in using the words. I am not going to hear any discussion as to that. If the words "your forged telegrams" have been used they are unparliamentary and must be withdrawn.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman was reading here a letter which he said had appeared in the London Times, and which he said was signed by Mr. Parnell, and I referred to the telegrams the hon. gentleman had read as purporting to come from the leader of the Opposition in this House. I used the words "your forged telegrams," not in the sense of their being forged by him, but as being uttered by him on the floor of this House. If the hon. gentleman says he did not utter those telegrams—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. MILLS. I am bowing to the Chair. I say I did not pretend to accuse the hon. gentleman of having written those telegrams. I referred to the fact that he had uttered them on the floor of the House. That is a fact, Mr. Speaker, and I do not suppose you ask me to deny a fact that is known to everybody in the House. But certainly I withdraw the expression in the sense of his having written them. I do not know who wrote them. I know that the hon. gentleman uttered them on the floor of this House and that they were forged.

Mr. WALLACE. I am forcibly reminded of a little anecdote told by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) last evening. A gentleman met two boys on the street, one of whom was crying and whining. He asked what was the matter? The other boy replied: "He can't take a licking like a gentleman." The subject of these telegrams was brought up in the House during the last Session on several occasions. I stated then, and I repeat the statement to-night, that I took those telegrams from the public press of the city of Ottawa, that I read them in this House in the presence of the two gentlemen who were more immediately interested, and they made no objection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. At least three or four weeks afterwards one of them took occasion to do so, but not at the time they were first read. I have nothing further to say about them.

An hon. MEMBER. The less you say about them the better.

Mr. WALLACE. I will just say this further about them, that they were used against me in my election, and that my majority in 1882 was 237, and my majority in the last election, in spite of those telegrams, was 528. The people of West York know all about them. Now, when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Bothwell, I was referring to a letter which appeared in the London Times a day or two ago. The letter, according to the statement of the Times, was signed, "Yours very truly, Charles S. Parnell," in Mr. Parnell's writing on the top of the leaf opposite that on which the letter was written. The letter was as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—I am not surprised at your friend's anger, but he and you should know that to denounce the murders was the only course open to us. To do that promptly was plainly our best policy. But you can tell him and all others concerned that though I regret the accident of Lord F. Cavendish's death I cannot refuse to admit that Burke got no more than his deserts. You are at liberty to shew him this and others whom you can trust also, but let not my address be known. He can write to the House of Commons."

I do not say whether this is true or not, because I do not know; but the responsibility of saying that it is true has been assumed by the London Times, the greatest newspaper, perhaps, in the world, and the greatest exponent of public opinion in England. That wealthy and powerful organ has taken the full and entire responsibility of making the assertion, and while this cloud is hanging over the heads of the Land League party we should hesitate before passing a resolution strengthening Mr. Parnell's hands and endorsing his policy. I have nothing further to say except that it will give me much pleasure to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill).

Mr. BURNS. So far as we have heard during this discussion, there seems to be very little, if any, difference of opinion on the question of Home Rule itself. Even my very bellicose friend, the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), has not attempted to advance one argument in opposition to the principle of Home Rule. His whole discourse seemed to be directed to the paragraph in the resolution which has special reference to the Crimes Bill. I am quite in accord with those who believe that, as a general principle, the policy of non-interference by the Canadian Parliament with the Acts of the Imperial Government, especially so far as these Acts affect the United Kingdom, is a correct policy; but this I do say, that the case of Ireland stands out boldly as a particular case, and is one that should be dealt with and spoken of by every Irishman and descendant of Irishmen, and every lover of Ireland and freedom the world over. Especially do I think it the province of Irishmen occupying representative positions to speak out boldly on an occasion of this kind. One of the hon. gentlemen who preceded me, said that this Parliament would occupy a humiliating position if it were to deal with this resolution. I hold that this Parliament, composed as it is of free men, the descendants of different nationalities, would occupy a very humiliating position indeed, if it did not, at this critical time in the history of Ireland, speak out openly our sentiments, as regards the matters now at issue between the Imperial Legislature and the people of Ireland. Some hon. gentlemen have said, forsooth, that a discussion of this question in the Dominion Parliament would alienate from us English sympathy. I do not think we have anything to fear on that score. English sympathy has been, and is outspoken to day in favor of remedying the wrongs that Ireland has been suffering under for generations. Whether or not the majority of the people of England are in favor of Home Rule, we do not yet know, but we do know that a large minority is, and I need only instance the case of the recent election in the important city of Liverpool—when Mr. Goschen, who recently went into the Salisbury Administration, was a candidate—as a case in point. There we find English sentiment expressed in very decided terms by his rejection. While we may not have a majority of Englishmen on our side to day, I trust that with the information that is being diffused among them, I trust that with the enlightenment being brought about in England, we will have, in a very short time, a majority with us there. But if we have not the majority of the people of England, we have the majority of the people of Scotland and the people of Wales; and beyond question we have the majority of the people of that country which is more interested than any of the others—Ireland. The majority of the people of Ireland at the recent election pronounced in unmistakable terms in favor of Home Rule. My hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said that the majority of the intellect of the people of Ireland was opposed to Home Rule. I take exception to that statement. We have no proofs of that assertion. On the contrary, we find to day the brightest minds in Ireland, her cleverest men, her greatest orators and most patriotic men, proclaiming to the world their country's wrongs. Do we see any evidence to bear out the statement of the hon. gentleman? Do we not rather see on the other side an array of talent, patriotism and ability? If there be a majority of intellect on the other side, I fail to see it, but I cannot fail to see that the people of Ireland sent a majority of representatives to ask for their country Home Rule. We are told that we would insult the Mother Country by discussing this question. It is not an insult to the Mother Country to tell her what we think of her policy, especially when that policy has an indirect bearing upon the well-being of this country. One of the principal arguments used by hon. members, and also by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), in support of their contention that this Parliament should not deal with this question, was that this measure of Home Rule is supported by the National League, composed, as they say, of men enemies of England and of conspirators. They accuse the members of the National League of being in sympathy with crime, of having, as one hon. gentleman said, shot down an innocent man. My opinion is that, owing to the discontent in Ireland, discontent brought about by centuries of misrule, it is well that such a body as the National League is in existence. I believe the National League in Ireland to-day are as good conservators of law and order in that country as is the Government of the day. The hon.

gentleman has also repeated the statements made with regard to Mr. Parnell, and they have brought before this House the charge made against Mr. Parnell in the London Times. Well, I think Mr. Parnell's record warrants me in saying and in believing that that charge is as false and as infamous as other charges of a similar character which have been made against Mr. Parnell. Mr. Parnell has denied it, and denied it in the most emphatic terms, and he has gone further and has said that, if the opportunity were offered him, he would have stood between the assassin's knife and the assassin's victim; and yet we are told, on the authority of the London Times, that Mr. Parnell sympathised with crime, and not only that but approved of the act by which two distinguished gentlemen lost their lives. These are the statements and the slanders that, year after year, generation after generation, nay, century after century, have been levelled against Irishmen; these are the charges and statements that have infused into the English mind that prejudice with which it is now so saturated and which fails to see in Irishmen or in Ireland any good whatever. The hon. gentleman from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has spoken of the proposed mission of Mr. O'Brien to this country. I will not here express an opinion as to the advisability or inadvisability of Mr. O'Brien coming to this country, but this I will say, that I think it is quite out of place, but quite in keeping with the character of those who are called, and justly called, anti-Irishmen, for the hon. member for Muskoka to say that, when Mr. O'Brien comes to this country, he will not require police surveillance but he will require police protection. Is that the kind of language that is calculated to promote harmony and goodwill in this country? The hon. gentleman must know that language of that kind is calculated to inflame the minds of perhaps unthinking people, and I think that the hon. gentleman should have hesitated before he used it. However, coming from him, I do not attach to it as much weight as I would if it had come from any other source. We all know that hon. gentleman's impulsive character. We all know his warlike spirit. In fact, like the typical Irishman, he has always a shillelagh in his hand. The hon. gentleman, I think, has gone out of his way in introducing into this discussion the name of the Archbishop of Toronto, and in parading to the House something that he says occurred in Toronto or in Ontario. That, I think, also was in bad taste on the part of the hon. gentleman. Archbishop Lynch needs no defender, but, if he should need any defence at all, I, as a member from New Brunswick, will leave that defence to a member from Ontario. Now, with regard to this question of Home Rule, what does Ireland ask? Does she ask, as has been stated by the hon. gentleman who spoke a few moments ago, entire separation? Does she seek to break up, if I may use the expression, the unity of the Empire? No, Sir. On the contrary, so far as I know, so far as my reading has given me information, all that Ireland asks is a Parliament of her own, all that Ireland asks is to be allowed to legislate on Irish matters, and that she shall not be compelled, as she is now, and has been for sometime back, to go to the Imperial Parliament to have Irish questions discussed and to have Irish legislation enacted. Ireland asks only that she may be permitted to manage her own affairs. As to the particulars of any measure or as to the form of any particular measure, this House is not called upon to give any opinion. If I were allowed to give an expression of opinion, I would say that I believe that the best form of Government for Ireland, the best shape that Home Rule could take for Ireland, would be to give her such a Parliament as New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec, and the other Provinces have with relation to the Dominion of Canada. While that may be my opinion, and I am strongly of that opinion, it is not for me to set up my judgment against those who are on the spot and who know better than I do what suits them best. There is an impression in the mind of the average English statesman and the average English politician that, once grant Home Rule to Ireland, once give to Ireland a Parliament of her own, and you lead to separation. A very few months ago, when on the other side of the water, I was travelling with a gentleman who occupied rather a high position in Ireland. The conversation turned upon this question of Home Rule. I found, after a very few words with him, that though he was an Irishman he was opposed to Home Rule, and what do you think were the grounds of his opposition? They were these. He said: Once you give a Parliament to Ireland you place weapons in the hands of Irishmen, and with these weapons they will fight for entire separation from the United Kingdom. I asked him how he attempted to prove that. He said: Why, once you give Ireland a Parliament of her own, you give her the control of the militia or of the military; you give her control of the revenues, and she will at once use the control she gets in the way indicated, that is, in attempting to secure entire separation. I asked him if it had ever occurred to him that the giving of a Parliament to Ireland to deal with Irish questions solely did not necessarily mean giving to Ireland the control of the militia or of the revenues. Why, he said, it follows as a matter of course, does it not? I said: The best way I can show you that you are wrong is by giving you information as regards our Federal system in Canada; and I pointed out to him the relations the Provinces bear to the Dominion as a whole, and how the Dominion controls the militia and controls the revenues, giving to the Provinces a subsidy, and I then pointed out to him that his fears were entirely groundless, and that if these were the only fears he had, he could rest easy. He acknowledged to me immediately that if Ireland could get a Parliament of that kind, he and others would be perfectly satisfied. My hon. friend from Muskoka has spoken of the tenantry of Ireland as occupying a better position than that of any other tenantry in the world. Well, if that is so, there certainly must be something very wrong about them. Any person who travels through Ireland, who has read of the distress in Ireland, must come to the conclusion that the tenantry in that country are in a very impoverished condition indeed. Now, why is it that Irishmen in Canada and other portions of the British Empire are contented, while discontent prevails in Ireland? It is because, as was pointed out by a speaker who preceded me, they enjoy the blessings and the privileges of Home Rule. We find that the men who were, in years gone by, most pronounced against English rule, who were, in fact, in arms against the Imperial authorities in Ireland, not only became loyal subjects of the Crown, but in a short time attained to some of the highest positions in the gift of the Crown—I need only mention the names of the late D'Arcy McGee, in Canada, and Charles Gavin Duffy, in Australia. That shows that Irishmen have no innate disloyalty, but when they are treated fairly they are as loyal as the men in any other portion of the Empire. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Carran), in introducing these resolutions, has so exhausted the subject that very little remains to be said. He has pointed out the great number of coercive measures introduced in the Imperial Parliament since the beginning of this century. Surely after all these coercive measures, the fact that they have not been able to allay discontent and disloyalty among the people of Ireland, proves conclusively that some other measure must be tried. If the Imperial Parliament give to the people of Ireland what they ask within reason, they will find that the Irish people in a short time will become the strong right arm of the Empire, and instead of having to keep an army of regular troops and thousands of police patrolling the whole of Ireland, England will find that in a very few years, Ireland will become a source of strength; she will find that Irishmen the world over, whether in the United States or Ireland, will become better disposed towards her, and she will find in the future a force and a body that she can rely upon whenever dangers threaten the Empire. In days past, Irishmen have freely shed their blood and spent their treasure in building up and preserving the greatness of the Empire, and now there is no reason at all why Irishmen should attempt to cut loose from the Empire, which is as much their creation as it is the creation of Englishmen. Why is it that the Irishmen of Canada and Australia are perfectly contented, while those who live in the United States, or, at all events, some of them, nourish a bitter feeling against everything British? It is because the latter were driven from their homes, and because they have still rankling in their hearts memories of the sufferings they and their people have undergone for centuries, while their hard earnings have to go back to Ireland to support friends whom they left behind, unable to come here, perhaps, on account of their poverty. I say, in conclusion, that this Parliament has a perfect right to pronounce upon the policy of the English Government, because that policy affects us very materially indeed on account of the large Irish population to the south of us. Here in Canada we have a large loyal population, whose sympathies for their native country ought to be recognised by the Parliament of Canada. The Irish people never got from the Imperial Government anything in the shape of remedial legislation except after long agitation. For instance, the Penal Code and the disestablishment of the Irish Church were only brought about after long agitation, and so I believe in the case of Home Rule, the agitation will ultimately prevail, because the Irish people in Canada are a unit with the Irish people at home, and these are supported by a large minority, at least, of the people of England, and by a majority of the people of Scotland and Wales, indeed the whole civilised world sympathises with Ireland in her effort to obtain Home Rule. I cannot but believe that the opinion of the Canadian Parliament will have some weight with the Imperial Government towards granting to Ireland Home Rule, and therefore support the resolutions.

Mr. BERGIN. I move that the debate be adjourned and made the First order of the day for Tuesday next.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh no, it is too early.

Mr. BERGIN. The question before the House involves Home Rule for Ireland, and a protest to the amendment to the Crimes Act known as the Coercion Bill now before the Imperial Parliament, and we are asked in this Parliament to pronounce once again an opinion in favor of Home Rule and to protest against coercion. We are told by the hon. gentlemen who oppose these resolutions that it is no business of ours here in Canada to interfere in any way either by protest, by resolution or by petition in the matter. We are told that it is an impertinence, that those questions concern the Imperial Parliament alone. Well, I do not agree with hon. gentlemen who hold those views. I believe that we, as the fellow-subjects of the Irish people, have a right to express our opinion in this Parliament, and that it is our duty to say to the people of England that our fellow-countrymen in Ireland are entitled to the same ratio of liberty we in this country possess. I believe we ought on every occasion, in season and out of season, to lay at the foot of the Throne the feelings we entertain towards our fellow-countrymen in Ireland, and the opinions we hold as to the legislation of the Imperial Parliament as regards Ireland. We, in this country, who have studied the history of the Irish people, who have looked into its legislation, who have seen the effect of that legislation, who know what the suffering of that country has been, who know how discontent and misery reign there, would be less than human if we did not express upon an occasion like this—when that country is again threatened with a Coercion Bill—our opinions, and express them strongly, too. We, who have studied this question, know that the legislation of the Imperial Parliament towards Ireland has been largely in the interest of a class. We know that it has not been in the interest of the masses of the Irish people. We know that the people of Ireland are the most misery-cursed upon the face of the globe. We know that instead of giving self-government to Ireland, instead of giving the people a Parliament of their own, instead of giving them good laws, or the power to make good laws, the British Government have meted out to them, year after year since the Union, everything but that which the people of Ireland desire. The Habeas Corpus Act has been suspended, jury trials have been taken away, martial law has been enforced, the militia, the police, the bayonet have been the means used to make the people obedient to the law. And why have they not been obedient to the law? Because the laws were such that it was impossible the people could obey them. If the people had been entrusted with the making of their own laws there would have been no discontent in Ireland. I have often met with the statement that the Irish people were incapable of self-government, and that they could not be entrusted to make laws for themselves. Why, the history of this Dominion, the history of every Province in the Dominion, the history of every Colony in the British Empire, the history of the Empire itself and of the United States, go to show that among the brightest and ablest men the Empire has produced are the sons of that despised island. The greatest soldiers of the British Empire have been Irishmen; her greatest orators, statesmen and poets have been Irishmen. Why, the very fact that Charles Stewart Parnell, who only a few years ago made his entrance into the Imperial Parliament without a follower at his back, has compelled that Parliament to take the position it takes today; that he has compelled the greatest statesman England has seen, during the past two centuries at least, to be practically his follower, is a proof that Irishmen are fit, not only to govern themselves, but to govern any country in the world. We have been told here tonight that the men who have accomplished such legislative wonders within the past few years in the British Parliament are murderers. We have been told they are not fit to associate with Christians. This is the sort of language which has been applied to them. The same old stale trick, which for years and years was made to do duty in Ireland, when the constable and the soldier were sent to find papers under the thatch, has been employed towards Charles Stewart Parnell, and a clumsy forgery has been made to do duty in this House and in Great Britain against him. The signature upon which these men rely is not placed even at the foot of the awkward forgery they produced, but it is upon the top of another page; and we are asked upon such a statement as that to find Mr. Parnell guilty of a crime that would disgrace humanity. Is it to be believed by us who have watched that man's career since the time he entered public life, that a public man, who has conducted himself with such prudence and care, who has avoided giving offence, who has shown himself gentle as a woman, should have been guilty of writing such a document as that which is placed at his door? And more extraordinary than all, the leader of the Imperial Government says that until Mr. Parnell has gone into the witness box and sworn that he did not write the letter he must be deemed to be guilty. This is a novel doctrine to be laid down by British statesmen to the British Parliament and the British people. I, in my innocence, have always believed that until a man had been proved guilty we were bound to believe him to be innocent. But one law for an

Irishman and another law for the rest of the world. That which would be a bad law against the Premier of this country or any member of this Parliament is good law as against Charles Stewart Parnell or any man who advocates the cause of Ireland. And we are told that regarding this Coercion Bill, against which we are about to protest to-night, we are not able to speak because we know nothing about it, except that which has reached us through the telegraph, and that none of the papers are before us; and yet the hon. gentlemen who made the statement must have known, if they had gone to the library, that the Coercion Bill, every line and every letter of it, has been for days and days in the reading room of the House and also a full report of the discussion upon its first reading. We have before us all the information necessary to enable us to deal with this measure, and we have before us information, unfortunately, which shows that the Government in introducing that Bill was unable to produce to Parliament any justification for that measure. They were challenged to show to the House of Commons that there had been an increase of crime in Ireland. Were they able to show it? No; but they replied that the National League has assumed the place of law in Ireland. Well, if you take the two statements together, that crime has decreased since the law has been displaced as they allege by the National League, you must admit that the National League has been a blessing to Ireland and has done for it what the Parliament of England has failed to do. It shows that the efforts of the National League have been directed in the interest of law and order, and when we have before us the practical results of eighty-seven years of legislation for Ireland by the British Parliament, and observe that year after year the British Government have asked for extraordinary powers to enable them to enforce the law, we cannot help asking ourselves whether it would not have been well, even if only for a change and for a single year, to have tried conciliatory measures. Is it necessary always that men should be persecuted and hounded to the death? Is it necessary always that men should not be able to walk abroad in the noon-day without being shadowed by detectives or feeling that they may be at any moment in the hands of the myrmidons of the law. Would it not be well for once that men should have a feeling of security? Would it not be well for once that the Government should see that the landlord class, living upon the peasantry should not be allowed to exact from them one single cent of rent more than the land was able to produce. This, Sir, is the secret of the terrible difficulties in Ireland. The landlord class have had no bowels. If you believe that the landlord class in Ireland are different from what I state them to be, let me read to you what the London Times has said of that class, and I ask you—with the knowledge that it is as the London Times has depicted it—how can we have any hope for Ireland while legislation is directed in their interest? Speaking of the landlord class the London Times said:

“It is no earthly use to go on abusing the Irish landlords. Their names stink already to the ends of the earth. We might as well go on forever on the vices of tigers and wolves as to be saying every day what we think of a class who for selfishness and cruelty has no parallel, and never had a parallel, in the civilized world.”

This is the class of people for whom legislation is sought to-day. This is the class of people in whose interests the Coercion Bill is urged to-day. This is the class of people against whom we protest to-day. It is because of their cruelty, their heartlessness to the people of Ireland that the necessity for this Coercion Bill arises. Sir, I was somewhat astonished upon reading the Bill, and reading the report of some of the speeches made by prominent men in England, in connection with this Bill the other day, to find that one of the strongest excuses given by them for this Bill was, that they must enforce the law and afterwards they would consider what measures of relief they would give to the people of Ireland. Enforce the law first! Why, Sir, they have been enforcing the law in its most terrible forms for eighty odd years, and, Sir, they are no nearer to the pacification of Ireland than they were upon the first day. During all these years the people of Ireland have been suffering. It is not many years ago that Ireland numbered nearly nine millions of people, and under the influence of these laws to-day she does not number five millions of people. This ought, I think, to cause every man, no matter what prejudices he may have in favor of a class, or against a class, to give careful thought to this question, and ask himself whether legislation which has lessened the population of a country in a little over one-quarter of a century over four millions of people, or nearly four-fifths, is legislation which ought to be encouraged. I say to the members of this House that if we refrain from expressing an opinion on this question, we shall not be doing our duty to our country, we shall not be doing our duty to our fellow-subjects in Ireland, we shall not be doing our duty to the Empire. Why, Sir, the great thorn in the side of the Empire to-day is Ireland, and because of the legislation at Westminster. If Ireland were given that which she asks—a proper measure of Home Rule—instead of being a thorn in the side of Britain, she would be the brightest jewel in her Crown; the Irish people would in the future be the most loyal people to the Crown. Even in the past, despite all her misery, despite all the persecutions, despite the poverty, despite the bad laws, she has, upon every occasion when England was in the hour of trial, stood loyal and true to the Empire, and where the battle was thickest there were to be found Irishmen fighting in defence of the flag of the Empire. Is it not worth while, to retain the loyalty and affection of so brave, so generous a people, to do them simple justice? Why, Sir, persecute them? Why should Great Britain, which claims to be the mother of civilisation, which claims to have given liberty to the greater portion of the globe, refuse to give it to the suffering sister at her side? Why, Sir, we say, should not we join our voices to those of the people of Ireland in asking from the Imperial Parliament that which we have to-day ourselves? We experience here in these Provinces the benefits of Home Rule; and we sometimes say to ourselves, when considering this question, that perhaps we would not have this same measure of Home Rule that we now enjoy if we were as near Great Britain and as far from the United States as Ireland is to-day. Sir, it may not be so, but unfortunately the sons of Ireland who are living in the United States think so, and because of that, they have gone to that land instead of coming here. Canada was their natural home, because Irishmen are naturally Imperialists; Irishmen are not naturally Republicans; Irishmen would prefer to live in Canada to living in the United States; but with the experience they had at home they went to the United States to escape the thralldom they suffered from, and they and their children after them have been sending money and advice to the people of Ireland, asking them to come to the United States, with the result that Canada has not had her share of those who left Ireland for foreign soil. Is it not worth our while to do what we can, by saying to Irishmen that we sympathise with them in their trouble, to direct immigration to these shores? Is it not worth while also to consider—the question was proposed here to-night—whether we ought not to endeavor to make them friendly to us in a greater degree than they have ever been before? We are alongside a nation which to-day is friendly, but to-morrow may be strongly inimical, which to-morrow may be ready to measure swords with us. When I read the letter of President Cleveland the other day, it struck me, reading between the lines, that President Cleveland would not be at all averse, should it be necessary in what he believed to be his interest and the interest of the United States, to take issue with us in a way we should not at all desire. And, Sir, should that day ever come, are we not building up in the United States by such laws, a hostile people, who, under other circumstances, would be our friends? And, Sir, we will regret the day, should this thing continue, that we have sent the bravest, best, and most loyal of our sons to a country, where, in the time of trial, they can be of no aid or assistance to us. Amongst the arguments offered to-night—if I may call them arguments—on behalf of the gentlemen who opposed those resolutions, was the statement, made I think by the member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that there were 1,500,000 people in Ireland who, if Home Rule were granted to that unhappy country, would not submit to it. That is the sort of language I would expect from such loyalists as he. Just such men as he are the men who would be entrusted with the administration of this Coercion Act in Ireland—men who tell you that if Home Rule were granted by the Imperial Parliament, a million and a half of the Irish people would not submit to it. This I think affords a perfect answer to the claim of loyalty made by them. We have been told, Sir, that it is very probable that if we send resolutions of this kind to the Imperial Parliament, this Parliament will be snubbed again, as it was in 1882. Well, Sir, in a good cause we can afford to be snubbed; and if these resolutions are sent to England and laid at the foot of the Throne, there can be no doubt, I think, that they will produce a very great effect. It cannot be that England will be insensible year after year to the expressions of the people of Canada upon this subject. We know that since the Home Rule question was first agitated, an immense change has taken place in public opinion. We know that since this Coercion Bill was introduced a vast change also has taken place in public opinion; and, Sir, I venture to say without fear of contradiction, that if there were a new election to-morrow, the Liberal-Unionists who are associated with the Government to-day would not be returned to assist them again. Why, Sir, these men were all returned to Parliament, even including Lord Randolph Churchill and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, by protesting that they would oppose coercion, and yet to-day they are found advocating and supporting it. I heard a gentleman to-night giving the opinion of Lord Randolph Churchill in support of one of his views. Why, Sir, Lord Randolph Churchill has held opinions on both sides of every question, and it is hard to say on which side of any question he is to be found now, and he is the kind of authority the people of this country are asked to accept. Now, in closing, I will say that I am convinced not only that it is the duty of this Parliament upon an occasion like this to show its sympathy with our fellow-subjects, but to speak out emphatically. It is our duty to show by no uncertain sound the position we take on a great question like this. For this reason I not only support the resolutions of my hon. friend from Montreal Centre, but I support them as strongly as I know how. I believe that impertinent as some hon. gentlemen say we are in urging our views, still there are men in the Imperial Parliament who will look into the debates of this Chamber, and will pay some attention to the utterances of the members of this House.

Mr. JONES. The resolution moved by the hon. member for Montreal Centre contains sentiments which I think may fairly be supported and endorsed by every well-wisher of his country. The resolution traces the action of this House from 1882 to 1886, and goes on to point out the course pursued and the policy recommended on several occasions during that period. It then goes on to express the hope—

“That there may speedily be granted to Ireland such a measure of Home Rule as is enjoyed in the Dominion of Canada, which, whilst satisfying the national aspirations of the people of Ireland for self-government, shall also be consistent with the integrity of the Empire as a whole.”

Now, I do not see in that sentiment anything that can be taken exception to by any hon. gentleman who, surveying the field of politics in England, the United States and Canada, perceives the position which this question has assumed. We have seen during many years past the efforts which the people of Ireland have been making for self-government. We have seen the efforts which have been made by Mr. Gladstone and his friends year after year, under difficult and trying circumstances, to go as far as they could carry the people of England with them in endeavoring to meet the just aspirations of the people of Ireland. We have seen the difficulties that have been thrown in the way of that right hon. gentleman, and we see to-day that he is still following in the line which he laid out for himself, and is conducting the people of England up to the realisation of the fact that a measure of Home Rule of some kind is a necessity for the peace of the country. During the last elections, when the Government of that right hon. gentleman was on trial, it received an emphatic endorsement from Scotland and Wales; and, so far as we can judge from the increased interest that is taken in England in this question, and the education which is going on among them with reference to it, we may reasonably hope that at no distant day the electors of England will follow the course which the people of Scotland and Wales have already taken on that question. Such being the case, it is the duty of every good citizen, here and elsewhere, to endeavor, by his counsel and influence, to contribute as far as he can to bring about a settlement of this question. There is another reason why I think at the present time it is particularly opportune that this measure should be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Reference has been made to the condition of public opinion in the United States, with the people of which we are so closely allied. Looking at the action taken by those people in the United States who have come from the Old Country, I say it would be of the greatest importance that that element, so numerous and influential in the neighboring Republic, instead of being, as they are to-day, a standing menace against Great Britain and her colonies, should be brought into a position to acknowledge that Great Britain and her colonies have made an honest effort to place the people of Ireland in the position which they and we think they should occupy. No doubt it is a very difficult problem to solve. No doubt that, unaccustomed as we are to the land restriction and other restrictions from which the people of Ireland have so long suffered, it is almost impossible for us to realise to its fullest extent the difficulties under which those people suffer. Therefore we can make great allowance for the excitement at times which characterises their efforts and those of their representatives in Parliament. We must all regret the excitement which has led to crimes and outrages of the most serious character, but we can sympathise nevertheless with the people in all constitutional agitation, and we can say to them that here, in this Parliament of the British Empire, we are watching their efforts with great anxiety and hope that they may be crowned with success. We may, perhaps not unjustly, point to the Dominion of Canada as an illustration of the benefits of Home Rule, and say that the Home Rule which we enjoy in the Dominion has been satisfactory to the majority of the people; but if there are people in this Dominion who take exception to the present position of affairs, and who think, like the people of Ireland, that a larger measure of Home Rule should be extended to them under the British Crown, I do not know that we, any more than the people of Ireland, lay ourselves open to the charge made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) the other night. He charged that any one who sought, as people in a certain part of the Dominion have been seeking, for constitutional changes in a constitutional way, would lay themselves open to the charge of disloyalty or dishonesty in their public character. I was rather surprised when I heard those words fall from my worthy colleague during the discussion last night. Fortunately the opinion of my hon. friend, worthy as it may be of acceptance here and elsewhere on many public questions, does not alter the case, and I think that when the hon. gentleman comes to recollect that when there were people in the Province of Nova Scotia, equally prominent as himself in all the various positions of life, social, commercial and political, he will, in his sober moments, admit that it was, if not unparliamentary language, language which he in his calmer moments will regret. The position of the Irish people in this country is one that we may point to with the greatest satisfaction. I come from the city of Halifax where one-half of our population are natives or descendants of the old land, and I can point to that city as an illustration of a city where the various elements work together and co-operate in every public enterprise, social and commercial. I can point to the fact that the Irish Catholics and Protestants live there in good fellowship, side by side; but I do not forget the day, a long time ago, when that same happy feeling did not exist. The city of Halifax, thanks, however, to that great and eminent and ever-to-be-regretted Bishop Connelly, and the eminent men who have succeeded him, we have been able to preserve in Halifax the cordial and friendly relations between the Catholics and Protestants which characterises that city to day. If, under these circumstances, Irishmen and the descendants of Irishmen can live and flourish in this country, there surely must be something wrong why in the Old Country they cannot attain the same positions or the same prosperity as they do here. I think we could have no stronger illustration as to the necessity of some important change, than that great fact that when Irishmen leave the Old Country and go to the United States or British America, they speedily become among the most prominent figures in political and commercial life. The question, therefore, on the present occasion, is one which I consider eminently in the interest of the Empire at large; and it is for this reason that I have always raised my voice, whenever I had the occasion, in favor of some measure of Home Rule, which, while it would preserve the integrity of the Empire, would be satisfactory to the Irish people at large. A measure of Home Rule of some kind is admitted to be a necessity. No one can suppose at present that the question of Home Rule is decided in the negative forever. On the contrary, no matter with whom we may be discussing this question, be he for or against the principle of Home Rule, he will always admit, before he closes the conversation, that the only question is the extent of Home Rule to be granted. It is our duty, therefore, to assist the British Government, so far as we are able, to show our sympathy with these people. It is our duty to show that the people of this country, who are already alive to the position which the Irish occupy on this continent, ask the British Government to endeavor, so far as is consistent with the integrity of the Empire, to have that question settled at once and forever. We think it is necessary for another reason. It has been the proud boast of England that she has not only been the mother of civilisation, but of political and religious liberty, and it is a blot, as has been most properly said, on the civilisation of the 19th century, that any one from any other part of the world may be able to say to England, when she tenders advice, as she has done on other occasions, as quoted by the hon. member to-night: You had better look at home, you had better settle your own domestic affairs, you had better reconcile the difficulties in Ireland and make your people contented with their condition there before you venture to mix yourself in our European politics, or advise us with reference to the Government of our people here. It would remove a blot from the

British honor to day if the Government were in a position to say and to realise the great fact that their people at home and abroad were not only prosperous but were happy, and above all, were contented. It has been said, that at this jubilee celebration of Her Majesty's glorious reign, it would be a happy occasion if these changes could be made, and it does seem as if the opportunity was thrown in the way, and that the great events which have been going on for a number of years past, were about to receive their fulfilment in this year of the jubilee, and I have no doubt that the Government of Great Britain, charged with the administration of public affairs, will make a supreme effort to bring about such a change if it is possible. They cannot bring it about by the means which they have proposed—that is quite certain. They will have to change their policy very much from that indicated up to the present time, but there is time yet for a change, and I hope and believe that there still is among the people of England, as a whole, that sincere desire for a settlement of this great question, which will speedily bring about a desirable change and a more wholesome tone in public opinion in that country. On many occasions throughout this Dominion and throughout this continent expressions of sympathy have gone forth towards the people of Ireland. They have been encouraged by messages and by resolutions from this House, and from the various Legislatures of the Dominion, to persist in their constitutional efforts, and if this is brought about, as we hope it speedily may be, we shall feel a proud satisfaction in knowing that the opinion which has gone from this Legislature on many occasions, and from the various Legislatures of the Dominion, has been in some way a factor in such a desirable consummation. It is with such a desire that I express my cordial opinion in favor of the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). I can understand some of the objections which were taken by the hon. gentleman from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who certainly placed his arguments in a very fair and gentlemanly tone, but they were from a standpoint which is among the things of the past. We have to recognise the condition of affairs to-day, and, whatever may have existed in past years, we have to deal with a condition of affairs in Ireland which cannot be ignored, and, therefore, under those circumstances, it is in the interests of the British race all over the world, in the Old Country and in her colonies, that the people of the colonies of Irish extraction, as well as those of us who are accustomed to a large measure of home government, should see this question settled and see it speedily disposed of. Under those circumstances, I shall most cordially support the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre.

Mr. WELSH. I am a new member—I was going to say a young member, but that would not be the truth—but I cannot let this resolution pass without saying a few words on it. I have heard it discussed from various standpoints to-night, but the speech of my hon. friend, the member for Halifax, pleased me the best of any yet. His speech tallies with my sentiments to the letter. I am an advocate for Home Rule. I was always an advocate for repeal in the O'Connell time, and I think he put the principle very justly. His advice was—agitation, but without a drop of bloodshed, and that is my view. The only thing I deprecate is the shedding of blood. I am opposed to assassinations or anything of that kind, but I can heartily vote for the measure before the House, because I find it sympathising with the people of Ireland in the state they are in, and recommending that a measure of Home Rule be granted as far as possible maintaining the integrity of the Empire. I admire that in the resolution, and, if that was not in the resolution, I should not support it. As I have said before, I quite agree with the sentiments of my hon. friend the member for Halifax, but this matter which has been brought before the House has reminded me of what took place in Prince Edward Island some years ago. Prince Edward Island was a small colony of some sixty-seven townships. It was granted in the time of King George III to servants of the Crown for services performed, and on certain conditions. Those proprietors, as they were then called, were bound to settle the land and perform certain other conditions. They failed to perform those conditions, and immigrants came to the island, 3,000 or 4,000 from the Highlands of Scotland were located in the backwoods, and granted twenty-year leases, and by the time they cleared the land and got little houses built the landlord came down and said: You must pay double rent. This sort of thing went on with the Irish and English immigrants until every fall you would find, if you went into the country, the landlord's agent going around with a lot of bailiffs distraining and seizing the people's stuff for rent. It became intolerable, and the people would not put up with it. They formed tenants' leagues and they agitated and refused to pay those rents. The population was small at that time, I think only 88,000 or 90,000. It was then a Crown colony. We were governed by England altogether. We had not the boon of responsible government at that time, and the officials were sent out from England, and everything was under the control of the British Government, and we considered the Government almost in the light of an alien government. Then the people agitated for the boon of responsible government. I heard the other night here the honored name of Joseph Howe spoken of as a patriot and a friend of Nova Scotia. I may well couple with his name that of the Hon. George Coles, and the Hon. Edward Whalan, also an Irishman, who at that time agitated for responsible government, and after considerable difficulty we obtained the boon, we obtained self-government such as, I take it, we now ask to be granted to Ireland. Well, as soon as responsible government was granted to Prince Edward Island, the Government at once said: This country cannot prosper under this system of landlordism and tyranny, for it was no better than tyranny and oppression. They agitated to purchase the landlords out, and without any help they voted a certain sum of money and voted the Land Purchase Act, whereby they were authorised to purchase the land from the proprietors by voluntary agreement between them, and re-selling to the tenant, giving him time to pay the money. That was very satisfactory and worked well, and we obtained a great portion of the land under that system. After we entered Confederation the people were opposed to the landlords and their schemes; they turned to, and they got well educated to that, both Conservatives and Liberals joined together, and by a unanimous vote of the House we passed the compulsory Land Purchase Bill, and purchased all the land of the proprietors by an honorable and equitable arrangement. We appointed arbitrators, one for the Island, the proprietors appointed another, and the Dominion Government appointed a third, who was the Hon. Hugh Childers. He came out to this country and settled that question. He valued the land, and capitalised the rents, and gave them an amount equal to 5 per cent. interest, and now Prince Edward Island is enjoying free land. There is no such thing as landlordism there, and we have peace and contentment throughout our borders. I wonder that any man living in this free Dominion—I would be astonished if there was an Irishman on the floor of this House who would stand up and vote against these resolutions. An hon. gentleman spoke to-night—I am not quite certain that I heard him correctly—but I think he stated that there were a million and a half of people in Ireland who are opposed to this scheme. Well, now, if three million and a-half of the people of Canada voted for a certain measure, and a million and a-half were opposed to it, which side do you think ought to carry? The minority does not reign here, they would object to it. Now, when Parnell commenced this agitation he had only three or four supporters, but now we find that he has some eighty-five members at his back in the English House of Commons. Well, how many members are returned from Ireland opposed to that? Not very many; there has been a cry got up that the North of Ireland objects to this scheme, but we see by the elections that the North of Ireland is coming round to Home Rule almost as much as the other parts. Londonderry is represented by the celebrated historian Justin McCarthy. We see that Belfast is represented also by a Home Ruler. A change is gradually coming over the people, and they are becoming almost unanimous. It was a new thing for the people of England when Mr. Gladstone brought forward his measure. But we already see that the people of Scotland, Wales and Ireland are in favor of it, and I venture to say that in less than two or three years we will find Home Rule an accomplished fact. Now, I shall support the resolutions. I noticed that one hon. gentleman said, if I heard him aright—and I do not hear very well from my desk—that some one had moved a resolution of this kind to catch votes. I am not standing here to catch votes, anyhow, because the district I represent is mostly composed of Scotchmen and Englishmen, and all the meetings I held I took good very care to give them my views on Home Rule, to tell them I was a Home Ruler—in fact that I was an Irishman. I was not born in Ireland, but I have been there time and again for fifty years. I was taken home when I was a boy, and I suppose I have been fifty times through Ireland and I know it well. They are a warm-hearted people—we are a warm-hearted people, rather we are a little impulsive and all that sort of thing, but at bottom we will compare favorably with our neighbors. I will not occupy your attention any longer, but there are some Irishmen in Prince Edward Island, and we naturally sympathise with the country of our forefathers, and we would like to see a happy and united people. Now, I am certain of this much, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, that if it was put to a vote there, three-fifths of the people, English and Scotch, would vote for Home Rule, and I will tell you more than that Mr. Speaker—if you were just to put Prince Edward Island back in the same position it was forty years ago, and to put the landlords around the county again—click!!

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If it is the desire of the House to adjourn I will not oppose it, but I will suggest that at the end of this motion it should be added that this debate be adjourned until to-morrow, to be then the First Order of the Day.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—THE FISHERY PAPERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to call the attention of the Ministry to the fact that the fishery papers have not yet been laid upon the Table, though I observe by to-day's papers that very important additional papers have been presented to the Imperial House of Commons, containing communications from the Government of the United States and also from the Government of Canada, giving the joint views of the British and Canadian Governments. This question, however deeply it affects the Empire, affects more deeply that part of the Empire which we are particularly acting for, and I think we ought to receive, at any rate as soon as they receive in their Parliament, the news of the papers which so momentarily affect our own interests. I therefore hope that there will be no further delay in laying the papers on our Table also.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated yesterday, I believe, that the papers would be brought down probably to-morrow, but at the furthest on Monday next. Of course, that will be done.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask if any report has been received from the Commissioner sent to the West Indies, and if so when it will be laid before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in reply to the hon. member, that a report has not yet been received, but I expect the Commissioner will return to Ottawa in a few days and complete his report, when it will be laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. JONES. Without any motion?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Without any motion, of course.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11:35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved :

That the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Friday the 13th May next, and that the time for presenting Private Bills be extended to Friday, the 20th May next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

ADDITIONS TO STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By arrangement with the hon. gentlemen opposite, I move :

That Messrs. McCulla, Daly and Rinfret be added to the Standing Committee on Railways, Mr. Borden to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and Messrs. Guillet and Sutherland to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonisation.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 16) intituled : "An Act respecting the Banff National Park." He said : This is a Bill fixing the boundaries of the park, and giving power to the Government to adopt rules and regulations for proper order in the park after it is established.

Mr. BLAKE.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

N. W. T.—SENATE REPRESENTATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the Senate. He said : This is simply to give two members of the Senate to the North-West Territories.

Mr. BLAKE. On what authority does the hon. gentleman ask this Parliament so to alter the constitution of the Senate?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Imperial Act provides power to this Parliament to give representation in the Senate or the House of Commons to the North-West Territories.

Mr. BLAKE. That is the late Act. Did our Address cover it? My impression is that the Address which we passed merely invited the Imperial Government to deal with the question of representation in the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot say, but I am almost positive the Imperial Act gives us this power.

Motion agreed to; and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) to amend the Act respecting the Supreme and Exchequer Courts. He said : The object of this Bill is to enable appeals to be brought to the Supreme Court from those cases originating in the County Courts, where there is concurrent jurisdiction in the County Court and the Supreme Court of the Province. In some of the Provinces, the Supreme and County Courts have concurrent jurisdiction in certain cases, and at present, while appeal will lie from the Supreme Court of the Province to the Supreme Court of Canada in cases first instituted in the Supreme Court of the Province, no appeal will lie in such cases which are first instituted in the County Court of the Province.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed Resolution of Mr. Curran (p. 46) on the subject of Home Rule in Ireland, and the proposed motion of Mr. McNeill (p. 54) in amendment thereto.

Mr. LAURIER. As this House has already twice expressed its sympathy with Ireland in the cause of Home Rule, there would not be, under ordinary circumstances, any occasion for additional expression of views and wishes already well known. But the circumstances to-day are not ordinary; they are even more painful and deplorable than the ordinary circumstances of that unhappy land. A new calamity menaces it, a calamity of so grave a character that it calls for an additional expression of the sympathy, not only of those who love Ireland, but of those as well who love England and fair play and are proud of her name. It must be admitted that it is a most evil day indeed, not only for Ireland but for England as well, when in this Jubilee year, in any part of the British Empire, a civilised people is to be subjected to laws so cruel as those contemplated to be imposed upon the people of Ireland. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who addressed the House yesterday, concluded an able and moderate speech which was directed mostly to establish the proposition that coercion in Ireland was necessary, by proposing a resolution to the effect that the Parliament of Canada should not express any opinion as to the course of Imperial legislation, because our Parliament had not the requisite information upon which to offer an opinion; but the hon. gentleman himself must have thought we had sufficient information, since he came to the conclusion, in his speech if not in his motion, that coercion was necessary for Ireland. On the other hand, the friends of Ireland, with the same information at their command as the hon. gentleman has, may come to a different conclusion, and believe that the true course to be followed is not the course of coercion, but that of freedom. But, moreover, Mr. Gladstone, fighting on behalf of the Irish people, invites all those who sympathise with Ireland to record their sympathy with the struggle now being made. In a late letter he speaks as follows:—

“I attach very high value and importance to the manifestations, now incessant, of American as well as Colonial sympathy with the Irish people in the crisis created by the causeless, insulting and insidious Bill at present before Parliament.”

Well, if the advice of the friends of Ireland may be of value to those who are now engaged in fighting her battle, it seems to me that the advice of all those subjects of Her Majesty, who have enjoyed the benefits of Home Rule for fifty years, may be of still greater value from their experience of the blessings of Home Rule; and in that view I say emphatically that the suggestions of no class of Her Majesty's colonial subjects, as to the blessings of Home Rule, may be more profitable than the suggestions of Her Majesty's subjects of French origin. And, speaking as a French Canadian, I cannot help comparing the history of my own country with the history of Ireland to-day. I see much similitude between the situation of Ireland to-day and the situation of Canada, and especially Lower Canada, fifty years ago. It seems to me that the public men who to-day have to deal with the cause of Ireland are hampered by a distrust of the Irish people in the same way as the public men who had to deal with the cause of Canada fifty years ago were hampered by a distrust of the people of Canada. There are only two ways of governing men—by despotism, or coercion if you choose to call it by that name, or by freedom. You can coerce an inferior and an uncivilised race, but never a proud and self-respecting people. Coercion has been tried, not once or twice, but times almost without number, in Ireland, and it has failed every time; and, if tried again, it must fail as it did before. The Irish people would not be the proud people that they are, if they were to be cowered by coercion into abandoning one single iota of what they deem to be their just rights. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said yesterday that coercion had been successful. At least I understood him to say so in regard to the last Coercion Bill, that it suppressed crime. How can such language be held? If coercion had been successful in Ireland, how is it that the fate of Ireland is what it is to-day? The hon. gentleman himself devoted the greater part of his speech to demonstrate that crime to-day is rampant in Ireland. Coercion can punish crime, it can crush out all expressions of public opinion, it can choke in the throat even before they are uttered all words of complaint or remonstrance, but it cannot breed contentment and affection in the hearts of the people for the Government, it cannot induce that cheerfulness and allegiance which should be the aim towards which every Government should tend. What is wanted to-day in Ireland is not a law to punish crime, but a state of things which will suppress crime by suppressing the motive for crime, the motive for agrarian crime, which is the only crime existing in Ireland. What is wanted is a state of things which will bring contentment to the hearts of the people, a state of things which will make the people happy and proud of their allegiance. This is what is wanted to-day in Ireland, and, since it is proved, and proved, it seems to me, beyond dispute, that coercion has failed as often as it has been tried, I ask of those who to-day support coercion, not only in this Parliament but out of this Parliament, if it would not be well to try the other method of governing men, the method of freedom? Strange to say, all those who to-day oppose Home Rule, whether on this continent or on the other continent, all those who to-day advocate coercion must admit, and they do admit with more or less reluctance, that some kind of local government should be granted to Ireland. Even the hon. gentleman who placed in your hands the amendment you now have, though his speech was devoted to the proposition that coercion was necessary, still in his amendment adhered to the resolutions in favor of Home Rule which were passed by this House. This is not unusual. All these statesmen, as far as my knowledge goes, in England or out of England, who have treated that subject and have come to the conclusion that coercion was necessary, at the same time have said that, after all, the present state of things was intolerable, and that some kind of local government should be devised for Ireland. At the same time they are misty in their views. While stating that in one breath, they stifle it in the next; whilst admitting that Ireland should have some kind of local administration, still they all conclude their utterances by stating that, after all, the Imperial Parliament should have absolute control even over local matters. And what is the secret of it all? The secret is that the men who deal with that question and oppose Mr. Gladstone at this moment, distrust the people of Ireland, and one and all believe that, if anything like legislative independence were given to the people of Ireland, the people of Ireland would simply make it a stepping stone towards effecting complete separation from the Empire. As far as that goes, I am reminded of the history of my own country, of the history of Canada, and especially of Lower Canada. The hon. gentleman who seconded the Address the other day, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), in an able and well-tempered speech, referred to the fact, that in the first year of Her Majesty's reign there was rebellion in these Provinces. He took some pride in saying that there had been no rebellion in the Maritime Provinces. That is so. There was no rebellion in the Maritime Provinces, but there was discontent in the Maritime Provinces, there was agitation in the Maritime Provinces, and what was the cause of it? The discontent and the agitation arose from the fact that the people of the Maritime Provinces, in common with the people of all the British Provinces, demanded at that time more extended local liberty. There was the same discontent throughout the length and breadth of Upper Canada. There was even rebellion in Upper Canada, though it was restricted within narrow limits. But there was rebellion throughout Lower Canada, rebellion which was profound, bitter and deep-rooted. We have heard of late that rebellion may exist without cause, that it may exist out of sheer malice, and mere wantonness; but the Government of England did not believe so. The Government of England thought that, since the people of the British colonies had risen in arms against the Government, there must be some cause for that uprising, and they sent out one of the most eminent men of his day, Lord Durham, to investigate the cause of that rebellion. Lord Durham came here, he did his work, and he did it well, he investigated the causes which had led to the rebellion in Lower Canada, and to the rebellion in Upper Canada, and which had spread discontent all over British territory in America, and he reported to his Government. It is not my duty to-day to review the report of Lord Durham at length. If that were my duty,

I should have to take most serious exception to some of the conclusions at which he arrived, especially as they affected my own countrymen, of French origin; but I am speaking to-day only of the general causes, which, in the opinion of Lord Durham, led to rebellion in two of the Provinces, and to general discontent all over the Provinces, and to the remedy which he then suggested. Lord Durham laid down as the cause of that rebellion and discontent the fact that the aspirations of the people for freedom of local government were continually checked by the conduct of the Colonial Office, and he suggested as a remedy that the Provinces should be allowed the most complete legislative independence. He said that legislative independence should be even given to those colonies which, at that time, were in the throes of civil war. His idea was that, if the aspirations of the people for absolute, untrammelled freedom of local government continued to be checked by the Colonial Office, the irritation produced by that course would lead the people to ask not only for local freedom, but for absolute severance from the Empire. Whereas if the wishes of the people for local government were granted, if they had absolute legislative independence in their local affairs, their local interests and their Imperial pride would be at once gratified, and the flag which protected their local liberties, and recalled to them so many glorious associations, would be made all the dearer to their hearts. It was a bold conclusion, so bold, indeed, that the most liberal-minded statesman of the day in England shrank from it, in the same manner that to-day the most liberal-minded men in England shrink from applying the same doctrine to the government of Ireland. Lord John Russell, who was at that time Colonial Secretary, and one of the most liberal-minded men of his day, had to review the report made by Lord Durham. He agreed in almost everything that Lord Durham had said, except in the particular of giving free and independent legislatures to the colonies. Upon that subject he spoke as follows:—

"It does not appear to me that you can subject the Executive Council of Canada to the responsibility which is fairly demanded of the Ministers of the Executive Power in this country.

And after having dilated at length upon this idea, he concluded as follows:—

"I know no reason why the Legislative Assembly, whether of each, separately, or of both Provinces united, should not be listened to with deference; but I am not prepared to lay down a principle, and a new principle, for the future government of the colonies, that we ought to subject the Executive there to the same restrictions which prevail in this country."

Speaking of the impossibility which existed in his mind of granting the same amount of legislative independence to the colonies that existed in the Mother Country, he made these other remarks:

"But the Governor of Canada is acting not in that high and unassailable position in which the Sovereign of this country is placed. He is a governor receiving instructions from the Crown on the responsibility of a Secretary of State. Here, then, at once, is an obvious and complete difference between the Executive of this country and the Executive of a colony. The Governor might ask the Executive Council to propose a certain measure. They might say they could not propose it unless the members of the House of Assembly would adopt it. But the Governor might reply that he had received instructions from home commanding him to propose that measure. How, in that case, is he to proceed? Either one power or the other must be set aside. Either the Government must control the House of Assembly, or else the governor must become a mere cipher in the hands of the Assembly, and not attempt to carry into effect the measures commanded by the Home Government."

So, then, such a liberal-minded man as Lord John Russell could not see his way to adopt the conclusion of Lord Durham, and to grant absolute legislative independence and responsible government to a colony. To him the obstacles seemed to be insurmountable. We are aware that those views of Lord John Russell prevailed for some years. The government of the colonies was attempted to be carried on for some time upon the lines here traced by Lord John Russell, that is to say, upon the old line, not upon the lines traced by Lord Durham; not upon the view that responsible government should be granted to the colony. It is a well-known fact that during those years this country had no peace; it is a well-known fact that during all that time an agitation was constantly kept up, and the country led a miserable life and made no progress. But at last a master-mind came to this country in the person of Lord Elgin, and he did not shrink from giving us the absolute legislative independence for which the country had been asking, and which had been recommended to the statesmen of Great Britain, but which they deemed to be inconsistent with the interest of the Empire to grant. Lord Elgin did not hesitate to subject the Ministry of the country to the same responsibilities and the same restrictions that prevailed in England. We know that he did this in spite of all the reports of the Tory party in England, who at that time fought against Canadian freedom with the same bitterness and violence with which they are now fighting against Irish freedom. But notwithstanding all these efforts Lord Elgin's view prevailed. England granted the most complete legislative independence, and responsible government was introduced into the Provinces as absolutely and as completely as it is carried out in England. Did any of the dangers which were expected to follow from this course, arise? Did the Imperial interests suffer from that course? On the contrary, no Imperial interest suffered, and the agitation which had been going on for local freedom, immediately ceased; immediately contentment prevailed where there had been discontent, and loyalty followed where there had been disloyalty before. And to-day, Mr. Speaker, as you well know, in this, the Jubilee year of Her Majesty's reign, there is not in this broad Empire an inch of ground where there is a more dutiful and more loving allegiance than in this very country where fifty years ago rebellion was bitter and deep-rooted. That is the effect of liberty, that is the effect of local freedom granted to Canada. What would be the condition of Canada to-day if this course had not been followed, if the old practice had been followed of keeping the people under subjection, of refusing them those local liberties for which they were clamoring? Our condition to-day would be the condition of Ireland to-day, that of sullen discontent and agitation, a constant praying for reforms which were never granted. Sir, there is no rebellion to-day in Ireland, it is true but is there contentment? Is there cheerfulness of heart in the allegiance which they owe to the Crown of England? Sir, the condition of the Irish people to-day is about the most miserable of any people in Europe. Must this last for ever? Is there no remedy to such a state of things? It has lasted already for seven long years, and shall we be told to-day that there is no remedy for the evil? I say, in view of our own experience, there is a remedy, and that remedy is not coercion, but freedom. Let the English Government treat the Irish people as they have treated the Canadian people. Let them trust the Irish people as they have trusted the Canadian people. Let them appeal to their hearts, to their gratitude, to their nobler sentiments. Let them loosen the grip in which they now hold that unfortunate land, let them give them some measure of local liberty, let them restore the Parliament on College Green, and I venture to say that this long accumulated bitterness caused by ages of oppression will melt away in a very few years; I venture to say that after that, the bond of union between England and Ireland will be stronger than it ever was before. It will not be a bond of union based upon physical force, but it will be a bond of union based upon mutual affection and respect. Sir, we will be told, perhaps, "Oh, but there are demagogues in Ireland who would prevent such a course." There may be demagogues in Ireland; but demagogues in a free and happy country are not dangerous, it is the tyranny of a Government that makes demagogues dangerous and powerful. We will be told again, "But there are men in Ireland who would not be content with local liberty, who would aspire to a complete separation of Ireland from the Empire." That may be true; I dare say it is true. But I say again that if there are such men, and I believe there are such men, their power would not last one minute after Ireland had obtained that local liberty which she now asks; yes, their power would not last, because either they would themselves have to be reconciled to the existing state of things, or their power would be gone. Just take the example of Papineau in Lower Canada. There was never a man in any nation who commanded a greater sway over the hearts and minds of his fellow-countrymen than did Papineau before the years of the rebellion of 1837. Yet after the rebellion, after we had been granted responsible government, Papineau attempted an agitation with the people of Lower Canada to induce them to repeal the Act of Union, and that agitation fell perfectly flat; the same men who a few years before would have shed their blood at his command were no longer responsive to his voice. What was the reason? The simple reason was, that the people had obtained local liberties which secured and protected them, and they were reconciled and satisfied with their condition. Such would be the result, I venture to say, if the same policy were followed in Ireland that was followed in Lower Canada; and such being the case it behoves us, not only does it behove us but it seems to me it is our duty, our bounden duty, as members of this great Empire, to strain every nerve in order to strengthen the hands of those struggling in the cause of Ireland, and to show by our living experience that in order to make the Government of Ireland strong it is necessary simply to make the people free.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The discussion of the resolution proposed by the hon. member from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), has been one of a very instructive and entertaining character. We have had some admirable speeches on this question, and the question certainly from its importance should call for the best abilities of members of this House. The question as to the right or as to the propriety of introducing matters of this character in this House has been discussed over and over again. In 1882 the present Minister of Inland Revenue thought it his duty to introduce into this House resolutions, not exactly similar in character to the resolution before the House at the present time, but he introduced resolutions, and members of this House at that time, not only on the side to which I belong, but on the other side, concurred in the soundness of the views he then held. It was not charged against the hon. gentleman then that he introduced the resolutions for the purpose of making political capital, but that he introduced them with a view of striving, as far as this Parliament could strive, to ameliorate the condition of affairs in Ireland. It is true that on that occasion he was ably supported by the present leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman delivered a speech on that occasion which was exhaustive, and which gave a full and complete review of the situation of Ireland and showed it was the duty of every man, whether he sprung from England, Ireland or Scotland or from Canada, to extend his sympathies to the down-trodden and oppressed people of Ireland. The present Prime Minister on that occasion supported the resolution, and it was adopted in the House without question. It was regarded by the friends of Ireland and by the people of Ireland as a wholesome indication that the Irish people living in Canada had not forgotten the land of their birth, and looked upon the condition of the people of Ireland with the greatest degree of interest. It is impossible for a country to flourish without contentment, and unless measures are devised for the purpose of securing contentment in Ireland it is impossible for that country to flourish. It is sad to contemplate the condition of affairs in Ireland; to reflect that its population is not as great, and certainly not greater than it was fifty or a hundred years ago. Witness the famine that has prevailed in Ireland, in a land beautiful, with a climate good, with a soil productive, and you can be led to no other conclusion than that the law governing Ireland has not been a right law. It was, therefore, not to be wondered at that in this House of Commons in the most important dependency of the Empire, resolutions were introduced by the Minister of Inland Revenue. But what do we find? Time passes. The condition of Ireland is changed. One of the great parties in England takes up this question of Home Rule for Ireland, and makes an attempt to strike off the fetters that have bound down the people for many centuries; and at a time when the measure was on its trial before the Imperial Parliament, and when the nations of the world were watching the great struggle going on, it was but natural that the leader of the Opposition should rise in this House and propose a resolution calculated to strengthen the leader of the Imperial Government, Mr. Gladstone, who had introduced the Home Rule measure into the Imperial Parliament. It is sad to contemplate the acrimony of party in this country. The hon. gentleman was maligned and abused in every conceivable manner, although he had introduced a resolution similar in character and import, and having for its object the same glorious result, as the resolution previously introduced by the Minister of Inland Revenue. It was thought the resolution was rather out of place, and motives were assigned to him anything but honorable with respect to its introduction. What did the majority in this House at that time do? They endeavored to weaken the power and force of that resolution. The supporters of the Government stated it here in this House; they declared that such was their intention. Now, I have here a copy of a newspaper that supported the Government at that time, and that supports it at the present time—the Toronto Week—and in speaking of the resolution which was introduced by the leader of the Opposition, on that occasion it said this:

"We are sure that the Ministers would gladly have shelved it had it been possible. As it was not possible they did their best to nullify it, and they succeeded admirably. This strategy has been made a ground of censure; it is, in fact, a reason for admiration and approval."

That is to say, the influence of the resolution moved by the leader of the Opposition on that occasion was nullified by the amendment proposed by the Minister of Inland Revenue, who himself, a few years before, had proposed a similar resolution. Did we not also find that every enemy of Ireland, not only on this side but on the other side of the Atlantic, rejoiced when the resolutions proposed by the leader of the Opposition were defeated in this House. Yet this same gentleman—the Minister of Inland Revenue—only four years before had supported resolutions similar in import and character, and couched in almost the same language. As to the propriety of introducing these resolutions, we have the authority of the Minister of Justice himself, who, in speaking of this question, new as he was to this House, and probably new to the condition of affairs in Ireland, in his new found zeal for those friends with whom he is now allied, spoke as follows:—

"Let me ask this House where were the friends of liberty and freedom, who are so boastfully declaring this evening that only within their ranks are true Liberals to be found—where they were when those sentiments were pressed on this House, and why did they not meet, as now, and put forth their leader to ask the House to proclaim that the sentiments of liberty and freedom they are so proud to advance to-night should then be advanced in favor of the cause which had few friends, and of the men who were actually immured in dungeons in Ireland in 1882."

I am astonished at the Minister of Justice, who is supposed to hold fair play and right of action as a perfect jewel, who is administering the Department in which justice is supposed to preside, making a statement of that character after the eloquent and convincing speech made by the leader of the Opposition in 1882. He then imagined that the Liberals thought that the measure was sure of being carried at that time, and that they would go with the current. Now, it appears the measure has failed: the Bill which was proposed by Mr. Gladstone has not been carried, and here you find the friends of Ireland, those who are willing to aid her to strike off her shackles, laboring and sending up their voices and passing resolutions in favor of Ireland still. He went on to say:

"The position in which that cause stands to-day is very different. It is the hour of success, notwithstanding that some hon. members on this side of the House doubt the immediate and perhaps the eventual success of the cause in favor of which this struggle has taken place. This much at least has been achieved, that the principle of some liberal measure of Home Rule for Ireland has received far wider acceptance in the United Kingdom than any one anticipated in 1882. The friends of that cause, who were then imprisoned, are leading a most influential party which actually holds the balance of power in the British Parliament; and it is only when the cause may be said to have triumphed—when, at any rate, it has advanced so far that the success of some such a measure, consistent with the safety of the Empire, and the rights of all classes, is assured—then it is that those friends of freedom, who combine within their own ranks and caucus alone sentiments of liberty, are willing to come forward and ask this House to adopt resolutions in sympathy with the cause which has achieved such triumph."

But while speaking on that question the Minister of Justice in his love for Ireland was willing to vote against the resolution of my hon. friend, and vote for the amendment which, the Week says, had a tendency to minimise the influence which it was intended to possess, vote for a resolution which these hon. gentlemen expected was calculated to destroy the cause not only here but on the other side of the Atlantic, and which had that effect. Now, I would just like to show the Minister of Justice and other members of this House the position which was taken by the leader of the Opposition in 1882 on that question.—

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I will probably speak loud enough to make you hear, and I am not ashamed to speak on behalf of this cause. I find there are many members in this House either ashamed or afraid to speak on it. I find that not a member of the Government has said a word on these resolutions. Why is this? I will read you some extracts from the speech of Mr. Blake to which I have referred—I will not read the whole speech:

"Now, Sir, there is another reason why we should interfere—we can speak with authority on this subject; we are Federalists ourselves; we are experienced in the benefits of Home Rule; we know what it means; we know that it is our most precious possession; we know that there is nothing that we will part with with greater reluctance or greater difficulty than our portion of Home Rule; we know that there is nothing we would sacrifice to retain our portion of Home Rule, whether you revert to that portion which the Dominion has in relation to the Empire, or that portion which the Provinces have in relation to the Dominion."

Speaking again in relation to the subject he said:

"We have no idea that the rights and interests of the minority will be other than fully protected and secured. I believe that its best security is to be found in a united Irish people managing their own affairs. I say that the possession of such a measure is essential to the maintenance of the Empire. There ought to be no if's or and's in the expression of the views of the Canadian people on this most important subject. It is only upon the theory, only upon the strong view that the possession of such a law is essential to the integrity of the Empire, that we can agitate or act with effect in dealing with this matter."

He said further:

"I should like the Canadian people, through their representatives in Parliament, to say to the Imperial Government, politely, that, in their opinion, as 4,000,000 of British subjects, they believe that the integrity of the Empire demands self-government for Ireland. So with reference to the clause that speaks of those men being deprived of the constitutional right of trial by jury, I do not understand them to invite the clemency of the Crown, I do not understand them to be charged with political offences. I understand them to be imprisoned under a law which does not call on the Government to charge them with any crime whatever. What we ought to have asked for those gentlemen is the restoration of the habeas corpus and a trial by their peers of any charge which the Government in England may think fit to make against them. It is not an application for clemency and mercy that they demand and that we should express, but a hope that the ordinary constitutional right of every British subject may be extended to these particular British subjects—namely, the right of habeas corpus and of trial by their peers for any offence with which they may be charged against the law of the land to which they belong."

That was the spirit of the resolution which the leader of the Opposition proposed in 1886; that was the spirit of the resolution which was voted down by the majority of this House at that time. It was voted down by the assistance of the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Justice, although I believe both claim to be either Irish or of Irish descent. Speaking about our rights to discuss this question, the leader of the Opposition said:

"We have a right respectfully to approach our Sovereign and strengthen the hands of her Prime Minister, whose sentiments are not hostile to reform. We have a right to give the influence of 4,000,000 of British subjects to the redress of grievances too long maintained, to attainment of rights too long denied, and so to enlarge the strength and increase the unity of the mighty Empire of which we form a part."

Now, we find in the Hansard of the period the views of parties in this House. We find that while the Minister of Inland Revenue introduced resolutions to this effect, the friends of liberty on this side of the House voted unanimously in support of them; but when that hon. gentleman got into the Cabinet, when the shadows of the castle fell upon him, whether he was timid or whatever was the cause, we find him turning around and introducing an amendment which we believe had the effect of lessening the power and force of the action of this House which would have been secured by the resolutions of the hon. leader of the Opposition. On that occasion I think we heard the voice of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt). Why is he so silent on this question now? The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when up in his riding gave a powerful utterance against measures such as that proposed by my hon. friend for Montreal Centre. When he comes to this House, and is surrounded by representatives from all portions of the country, why has he not the courage of his convictions?

Mr. McCARTHY. I would ask the hon. gentleman to specify when and where.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Haldimand, for example.

Mr. McCARTHY. There was nothing about Home Rule at Haldimand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A good deal, I think.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is certainly a poser. If I do the hon. gentleman any wrong, I do not do it intentionally. If the hon. gentleman's speech was not against Home Rule in Ireland, it was certainly against French rule in Quebec; but if the hon. gentleman has anything in addition to his eminent qualities, he has it from the rapidity with which he has ridden this Protestant horse throughout the country. He did that in Haldimand, but did not do it very successfully. It is said he was unhorsed there. It is said the First Minister also fell from his horse there, and the record shows where he fell. Now, if this question is ripe we should support it, irrespective of the political consequences that may follow. I believe the course I take does not conduce so much to my political advantage as would the opposite course; but while a British subject languishes by reason of bad law, I believe it to be my duty as a Liberal, in this House and everywhere else, to raise my voice against oppression. We sometimes hear the taunt thrown out that the Irish people are not capable of self-government. I do not agree with that statement. If you make the Irish people responsible for order, they will be orderly; if you give them local self-government, they will govern themselves. I think it was the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) who said that the people of Ireland possess the same liberties as the people of England—that they have the same tenant-right laws as the people of England. I deny this on a very eminent authority; I deny further that Ulster has the same tenant law as Munster; I deny it on the authority of Joseph Cowen, the member for Newcastle. If there are inequalities in the laws governing Ireland, if there is one law for one portion of the people and another for another portion, it is not to be wondered that there is discontent, although crime is not more prevalent in Ireland to-day than in any other portion of the British Empire. The laws which govern the people of Ireland are a disgrace to civilisation. They are given coercion law after coercion law. Since the union of Ireland with England there have been, I believe, eighty-seven coercion laws; and what do these coercion laws mean? They mean the suspension of the ordinary laws. They mean that a subject may be thrown into prison and tried how and when and where the Government see fit to try him. To show you some of the effects produced by the system prevailing in Ireland, I will just read a short extract from the history of Ireland by T. P. O'Connor. Speaking of the power the landlords held over their tenantry under the protection of the strong arm of the law, he says:

"There was in connection with most of the properties a code for the regulation of the tenantry which went under the name of 'office rules.' These rules dogged every action of the tenant's life. A minute system of fines existed. Take these for instances: William Bewley, a tenant on one of the estates of Lord Leitrim, was fined £11 because he sold hay contrary to the rules of the estate; Lord Leitrim himself visited this man's house in order to find fault with him, and the sight of this dreaded landlord and his brutal language drove Bewley's daughter insane. The widowed mother of the Rev. Mr. Lavelle, a well-known Catholic priest, was evicted because, contrary to the rules of the estate, she took in her son-in-law and daughter for companionship. A tenant on Lord Lucan's estate was fined 10s. for being three days late in the paying of his rent, and another tenant was fined 14s. 8d. for receiving a tenant's daughter into his house while her husband was in England. On the Ormsby estate in County Mayo this system of petty fining reached its highest development. Thus, a woman named Ann Cassidy could recall the infliction of the following fines upon her husband: 5s. for being absent from duty work one day; 10s. for a similar offence; 2s. 6d. for being absent from duty work on the day of his child's burial; 2s. 6d. because a pig rooted part of his land; 2s. 6d. for allowing an ass to stray on the road; 10s. 6d. because the top stone of a gable was not rightly whitewashed. James Sheering, formerly a tenant on the Ormsby estate, was fined 10s. for cutting a branch from an ash tree which he himself had planted; 5s. because a pig strayed back into a house from which he had been evicted, and 1s. 6d. because a horse was allowed out on the road. Margaret Conlon described how, on the same estate, her husband was fined 7s. 6d. for not making a drain at a time when he was engaged in mowing for the landlord; 12s. 6d. for changing a window from one side of the house to the other in order to get more light, and 2s. 6d. for being too late at his work."

I might go on reading of similar instances to show that we must necessarily feel an interest in the people of Ireland who are so down-trodden. It is not to be wondered that so strong a sympathy exists for Mr. Gladstone, who is endeavoring, in spite of prejudice and superstition, to strike off the shackles which have bound the Irish people so long. Now, speaking about the troubles of Irishmen, Mr. Joseph Cowen says:

"The Irishman's troubles are not listened to, and his miseries have not infrequently been mocked. The unsympathetic snarl with which the English press usually receives Irish proposals for a reform tends much to embitter the relations between the two people. Our illustrated papers seldom portray an Irish peasant in any other character except that of a scoundrel, a skulk, or a coward. Yet, amongst the people thus so shamefully lampooned, there is less crime—as crime is commonly counted—than amongst any other people in Christendom. There is no race whose daughters are so virtuous, or whose sons are more valiant. The annals of France, and Spain, and Austria, of England and America, are crowded with the achievements of brilliant captains who have sprung from Irish stock. No people are more prosperous away from their own country, and few have a higher sense of veneration. And yet a race with all these fine qualities, we cannot manage. Our fundamental error, in my judgment, is our reluctance to realise the difference between the two people. We treat peculiarities that to the Irish are dear and sacred, with contempt, and sometimes with scorn. We concede their demands from necessity, not from justice. They appeal only to our fears, and we yield only to their force."

Speaking to a number of tenants in Ireland, he said:

"The standing complaint of the Irish farmer is his sense of insecurity. There are 800,000 tenants-at-will in Ireland, and they are in daily fear either of their rents being raised or of being evicted. This stops improvement, paralyses effort, and stereotypes a bad system of agriculture, from which both the nation and the occupier suffer. The compensation for eviction got under the Land Act is little relief to a cottier. It may help him to emigrate, but nothing more. To remove the feeling of distrust, it is proposed to extend some form of the Ulster custom to the rest of Ireland."

Speaking about the difference between the Ulster and Munster system, he said:

"Whether Ulster prosperity is the result of the system, or the system is the outcome of the prosperity, certain it is that prosperity and tenant-right in Ireland are nearly conterminous. There is the exception of Donegal, it is true, but that county is peculiarly placed. An agent of the Marquis of Londonderry, being asked before the Devon Commission what would be the effect of treating the tenantry in Ulster as the tenantry of Munster were treated, replied: 'You would soon have a Tipperary in Down.' The agent of Lord Lurgan said before the same Commission he did not believe that there was a force at the disposal of the Horse Guards sufficient to keep the peace in Protestant and Tory Ulster if any disturbance of the Ulster custom should be attempted. If tenant-right secures peace in Down, and if the absence of tenant-right produces disturbance in Kerry, it is not unreasonable to try the specific in the south that cures the troubles in the north."

When we find these things existing in Ireland; when we, in this British Parliament, feel constrained to introduce resolutions of sympathy with the Irish people, we are pained and grieved to find that a number of members of this House should endeavor to minimise the force and effect and influence of those resolutions, as was done during the late Session. Speaking about the laws that have been given to Ireland, he said:

"All our changes, notwithstanding, the mass of the Irish people are as much outside the ruling pale as they were in the days of the avowed ascendancy. We have never incorporated them. It is not their positive suffering, but the sense of exclusion and injustice, that is so insufferable. We do not trust them, and they do not trust us. Time has not drawn his oblivious veil over a dishonoring and disastrous past. Seven-tenths of the Irish people are of one race, religion, and order of politics. Three-tenths are of another. The three-tenths monopolise the places of trust and authority, and the seven-tenths protest and agitate, and would rebel if they could. This is the political grievance. All our concessions have come too late. They have either been extorted by embarrassment or by fear. They have allayed no resentment, or evoked no friendship. The social difficulty springs from imperfect sympathy. We live under a bourgeois oligarchy, tempered by aristocratic influences and prepossessions."

Having given some attention to this question of Home Rule, having given some attention to the coercive measures employed by the British Parliament against Ireland, it was only natural that, when the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) introduced his resolutions, I should venture to say a few words on the subject. I regret we have not had some expression of the views of leading members of the House, on the Government side, in regard to this question. They should let us know what stand they intend to take, whether or not they will vote in favor of striking off the shackles of the Irish people. I hope that before the debate closes the Government will define its position in regard to this question, and we will ascertain whether or not they sympathise with the people of Ireland and the people of Britain, or with Mr. Gladstone who, we hope, will in a not very distant day succeed in giving to Ireland a measure of Home Rule that will be just and fair to all classes in Ireland, that will strike off the burdens and the shackles that have been imposed on the Irish people, and make them a free people, living in a free land, enjoying the happiness and prosperity which has been denied them under the system that has prevailed there so long. I am prepared to support the motion of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), and I regret that the hon. gentleman's zeal at the present time did not also exist during last Session. I regret that then he had not greater regard for the condition of Ireland, because otherwise he would not have striven as he did to minimise the effect of the resolution introduced by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BLAKE. When the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, arose, I rose at the same time to ask for some expression from the Treasury benches as to the course the Government intended to take. Will the hon. the leader of the Government kindly enlighten us as to the course he proposes to take, as I may be led into error for want of that light? I am sorry that those who are charged by the majority of the House with the conduct of affairs, should not have thought fit to give to the House any expression of opinion as to the course they think fit to take on this occasion. I make this appeal in no hostile spirit, but in recognition of the duties of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and I think I might better be answered than by the scornful nod of negation with which the First Minister chooses to honor me, in reply. I do not intend to embarrass or accentuate any of the phases of this discussion with anything which approaches to censure, or incrimination, or misrepresentation of motive. I was not insensible to the even-handed justice which the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) dealt out to the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) and myself. To the hon. member for Montreal Centre he paid a well-deserved compliment; against myself he levelled an ill-deserved insinuation. I suppose the hon. member for Montreal was very much elated by the compliment; I can assure the hon. gentleman that I was not very much depressed by the insinuation, and I pass it by. I am sorry that we should resume at this time this discussion under the circumstances in which the question stands. I very well remember last Session when we were told, as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has said, by the Minister of Justice that, in the hour of distress and of difficulty, we had not been anxious to assist in securing relief, but that in the day of triumph, when light had dawned, when the full sun was about to appear, when the battle had been fought, when the victory was almost won, we were indeed ardent and active. I took a different, and I am sorry to say a truer view of the situation as it stood. I felt that the battle had not been fought, I felt that the victory had not been won, I felt that the situation was an extremely critical one. My earnest desire was, not that the measure in its precise terms and in all its details which, at that time, was hanging in the balance in the Imperial Parliament should pass—no, I declared then, as I now repeat, that I regarded that measure in more than one detail, and notably with reference to some of the distributions of power, as defective—but my desire was that, in the view which Mr. Gladstone had at that time put forward, that the vote upon the second reading of that Bill should be taken only as an affirmation by the House of Commons of their adoption of the principle of a measure of Home Rule for Ireland, every thing that we could do should be done, in order to further an affirmative result upon that division; knowing that, according to the pledge of the First Minister, the Bill would proceed no further; knowing that the interval would be devoted to further discussion and to familiarisation of the mind of the country with the whole question; knowing that, in the fall Session which he proposed in that event to hold, the Bill, with such alterations as further discussion and further consideration would produce, would be re-submitted; knowing that at that time, with all that advantage, there would be that further discussion in the House, and that then perhaps, after all—and I should not have at all regretted it—then, after that period of preparation for dealing with the measure, an appeal would be made to the people. But the consequences which I dreaded were that the First Minister's Bill might not even receive, in the sense in which he asked it should receive, a second reading, and that the result of that would be a precipitate and premature dissolution and a submission of that great question to the judgment of the people of the United Kingdom before there was that opportunity of enlightening and instructing them, and while the measure was in a position, as it obviously was in a position, less favorable than a few months of time might have made it for a judgment in favor of the views of the Minister. Those provisions of mine, which made me so anxious that our voice should speak in support of the principle of the Bill, have been unhappily verified, and, instead of being able to-day to congratulate ourselves upon that bright sunshine which the hon. the Minister of Justice told us we were to see over Ireland, we find ourselves face to face with a situation much more deplorable than existed upon the former occasion, and we find now that all that we could do, all that we could say, to promote the second reading of that Bill would have been things done and things said which not merely might be, but most certainly would have been, essential and important to the attainment of the end which to the great majority of us was held dear. Now, in this new Parliament, I think it quite fitting that we should ascertain, coming as we do fresh from the people, the sense of the representatives of the Canadian people upon the question—not only upon the question accentuated as it is by the measure now before the Imperial Parliament, but upon the question of the remedy and relief to which we have directed our attention in the year 1882 and in the year 1886. The Parliament which acted in the year 1882 was a moribund Parliament; the Parliament which acted in the year 1886 was a moribund Parliament; the Parliament which is now called to speak is a Parliament fresh from the constituencies of Canada, and I hope that, fresh as it comes from the constituencies of Canada, just fresh from contact with the people and somewhat freer than in four years hence it may be in some quarters from apprehensions of a resumption of that contact, that voice will be as clear and as decided and as nearly approaching unanimity as on former occasions, in the direction of relief to the people of Ireland and to the Empire of which Ireland and Canada form part. I do not disguise from you that nothing which has occurred has in the slightest degree altered my own opinion that the Parliament of Canada took the appropriate course in the year 1882, when, with the advice and assent of the gentlemen on the Treasury benches, we assumed and acted upon our right respectfully to address the Executive head of the Empire upon this subject. You may say this is a question of form. It is not a question of form only. La forme c'est la forme. If it be a form, there is in it a large measure of substance. I regard it as a respectful but firm assertion on our side, in the imperfect condition of the organisation of the Empire, of our right respectfully to tender to the supreme and central authorities our opinions upon those questions which are connected with the well-being of the Empire in which we may be said to have a direct and an indirect interest sufficiently important and material to justify such intervention; and for my part I very much prefer the language of representation, the language of hope, the language of request, to the language of resolution, of remonstrance, and of protest. I prefer the recognition that we are, according as we may choose to call ourselves, children of the same family addressing the parent, members of the same family addressing our connections, subjects of the same Empire communicating in that more intimate, direct course in which such a relation entitles us to communicate with the Executive head upon the affairs of the Empire, occupying towards the central authority and the Executive head of that Empire a closer relation, a director power, a responsibility as well as a right extremely different from those which are occupied by any foreign community, from the position of the State of Maine or the State of Massachusetts, for example. I do not think that, in so far as the vindication of such our right is concerned, it depends in the slightest degree upon my word or my opinion. It was the solemn, and apparently the unanimous, determination of this House and of the Senate of Canada, that we had that right and that we should act upon it. But what I say is, that it is to be deplored that the judgment of a Colonial Secretary, which directly or indirectly seemed to indicate that this was none or little concern of ours, should be accepted as a bar against our assuming to ourselves the exercise of that right on all fitting occasions. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend upon this occasion—although I think the adoption of the different form which was used last Session has its inconveniences made plain in the resolutions which are before you—further to insist upon that question, whether you call it one of form or one of substance. But I say that that altered form has been the occasion, if not the cause, of some of the criticism which, from unfriendly lips, has proceeded with reference to the language of the hon. gentleman's resolutions. Now, I desire to attract the attention of the hon. gentleman to some of those criticisms in the hope that we may find him, and those who sympathise with him, disposed to address themselves, as I think all who favor this cause ought to address themselves, to the earnest effort to minimise all cause of objection and to produce as nearly as possible unanimity. In that sense and with that object, it is not my intention to move at this time any amendment to the hon. gentleman's motion, but rather simply to state across the floor the difficulties, more or less serious, which have been suggested from several quarters, and in which there appear to be some merit, in the hope that the hon. gentleman will find it consistent with the attitude which I am taking towards his motion, to seek with me some remedy for such of these objections as may be removed, and to make this resolution as accurate and as effective as possible. The statement which is made in the second paragraph of the resolution as to the character of the measure of Home Rule to which we gave our adhesion last Session, has been pointed out not to be, in its present form, accurate. It is so. The statement is that we ask for a measure of Home Rule satisfactory to the people of Ireland. That phrase is used in the resolution of last Session, but, as the hon. gentleman who made the criticism remarked, it is used with certain qualifications which are deemed to be of very considerable significance. Now, I think that in a historical statement of facts, it is our duty to attend to a criticism of that description, and to take care that the statement of facts is correct, which may be done by either omitting one of the descriptions of the character of the measure of Home Rule, that one which the hon. gentleman has given, or by inserting the whole of the description which was given in our resolution, so that it may just reappear here what we did agree to last Session. Then the language which is used in that portion of the resolution, the fourth paragraph, which deals with the question of the Coercion Bill, is the language of protest, and more than one hon. gentleman, I think, has pointed out to the hon. member that this is language which implies censure and condemnation. I myself am of opinion that it is language not the best calculated to promote the object which we both have at heart. I am of opinion that it would be much more suitable to adopt the language of hope and request, than the language of protest. You may protest against an accomplished wrong, but you are dealing with that which you deem to be a wrong, and which you hope to avert, and I think the expression of hope would be much more suitable to the occasion, and much less obnoxious to the criticisms, of some degree of weight, which have proceeded from the benches opposite. I, therefore, invite the hon. gentleman, in the spirit which I hope I have made sufficiently plain to him, to make a modification in that respect, and to indicate our hope with reference to the non-adoption of this Bill, rather than our protest against the measure. The hon. gentleman, when he proceeds to deal with the character of the measure of Home Rule, which he asks us to express a hope shall be granted to Ireland, as expressed in the fifth paragraph—that also is open to the criticism which was made from the opposite benches. We have heretofore, and I think wisely, rather dealt in generalities with reference to the description of the measure of Home Rule to which we address our sympathies, and the proposal of the hon. gentleman is one which I do think,—I have no doubt, without intention—but which I do think is calculated to overload, and embarrass, and render difficult the acceptance of the resolution he asks us to adopt. The hon. gentleman proposes that by a single word, a single phrase, we should invite the Imperial Parliament to give a particular description of constitution to Ireland, namely, the Canadian Constitution. He says we should give the same measure of Home Rule, such a measure of Home Rule as is enjoyed in the Dominion of Canada. Well, now, it would take a long time, and I am sure it would be very needless, to engage in the discussion of what the difficulties are in applying the Canadian constitution to Ireland. But I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that one of the greatest difficulties which the measure of Mr. Gladstone met last Session was this: That it did not provide for continued representation in the Imperial Parliament of the Irish people, in respect of Imperial concerns. Looking at it from an English and Scotch point of view, it was not a question so much of what was given to the people of Ireland to be dealt with by the Parliament at Dublin, as it was the fact that large Imperial concerns were taken over to be dealt with absolutely by a Parliament, no longer of the United Kingdom, but by a Parliament of Great Britain, without any voice of the Irish people in the management of those concerns. The question, for instance, of the Customs and Excise, the question of the fiscal policy, all the questions of foreign relations, the question of defence both by sea and land—all these questions were to be disposed of for the Irish people, but not in any sense by the Irish people. And it was felt, too, that the danger was being run of a further separatist tendency in the ultimate development of that scheme, and that was one of the very great difficulties in the way of the adoption of the scheme by leading English and Scotch Liberals, and by the constituencies of Great Britain. Well, now, we are not here called upon to determine whether that was wise, or whether it was foolish, but is it wise for us—I appeal to the hon. gentleman, whether it is wise for us to undertake by a stroke of our pen, by three words of the English language—to define the precise character of the measure of Home Rule we desire to be given to the people of Ireland? I think not, and therefore I would propose to the hon. gentleman, rather to use once again some of the phrases which we have used before, or equipollent phrases, and not to engage in an excursion in this definition of terms as to the character of the measure of Home Rule which we think ought to be given. Sir, I feel that the Canadian Parliament intervening in this matter acts under a very grave responsibility, and I am anxious that we should not say a word in debate—I am still more anxious that we should record no solemn judgment—which we cannot defend before the Empire and before the world; and therefore I wish that we should be extremely careful as to the language in which we put our deliberate judgment upon this subject. If it were clear that we could cut and dry a constitution for Ireland, none would be better pleased than myself that we should undertake the task. But I do not think it is to be done in the brief deliberation and in the short space of words in which the hon. gentleman has attempted to do it by this short cut of proposing the Canadian scheme. Now, as I have said, if this had been an ordinary occasion, if we had been dealing with a question which is to be disposed of according to the ordinary method of parliamentary tactics, if even I had been adopting the position which was adopted towards myself last Session, I would have proposed before I sat down an amendment to the amendment, proposing changes in this resolution to meet the suggestions which I have made, and proposing also that the whole resolution so changed should be not adopted, but referred at once to a Committee of the Whole House, and that that should be an initiatory step in order that, if there were any other suggestion as to the form and language, it might be freely debated, and that the result of our labors might be as near unanimous as possible. Such is the suggestion which I venture to make to the hon. gentleman, such is the suggestion I have prepared here; but such is the suggestion I make only across the floor, and do not emphasise it by placing it in your hands, Mr. Speaker, because I am exceedingly anxious to leave to the hon. gentleman all that is to be gained by his having taken the first step in this matter, and rather to invite him to pursue the necessary steps to secure the best measure of success than myself to interpose by proposing any different resolution than that which he has brought down. Having said so much I will say this: that I propose myself to adopt the course on this question which I have adopted on two former occasions. Upon each occasion I invited the consideration of the House to what I thought the best thing; upon each occasion I endeavoured to secure the assent of the House to what I thought the best thing; upon each occasion I failed, and, having failed, I accepted in the end what was procurable so long as it was at all consistent with my own view of what was right. I shall continue, therefore, in the course I have followed on former occasions, and if this resolution as it is ultimately framed shall not prove such as wholly to command my assent, I shall yet hope to be able to support it, feeling that anything which is not absolutely wrong will be preferable to a division of opinion on this occasion. Sir, I now turn to a few of the other arguments which were used by those who support the amendment. I was desirous, in the first place, to remove as far as I could the force of such of their arguments as I believed were capable of being eliminated by a fair consideration of the language of the resolution. There are others which are to be dealt with only by argument, but which we cannot remove, I am afraid, by any changes we can make in the terms of the resolution. One hon. gentleman said: "Why are you interfering? this is only a local affair, and it deals only with the administration of justice in Ireland; what have you got to do with it?" Well, we have precedents in that respect, too. There were a few men confined in Kilmainham jail in 1832. That was a local affair. The Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended, and they were in jail. But we all agreed upon that occasion that, notwithstanding it was particularly local, confined to the precincts of Kilmainham, that should not prevent our intervention and our doing what we could to procure the release of the prisoners in that jail. Why is it we interfere? Those of us who think interference or intervention should take place, justify it, because the universal principles of British justice are, as we believe, being violated in that particular locality, and because those who believe in the sacredness and the universal application of those principles of British justice feel that no wound can be inflicted upon them in any part of the Empire without that wound more or less affecting us and affecting the glory of the Empire to which we belong. We feel that every lover of British freedom all over the world is entitled to express an opinion, when he believes the universal principles of British justice are to be abrogated or impaired. Another hon. gentleman said: "But you miscall the Bill: it is not a Coercion Bill, it is only a Bill to change the criminal law." What is in a name? What is the substance of the Bill? Of course, it is a Bill to change the criminal law, but it is in its essence and spirit not merely a Coercion Bill, but a deadly Coercion Bill. It is first of all—and remember that, because it is an important circumstance

Mr. BLAKE.

—a Bill which upon the face of it is designed to be permanent. The declaration of the Secretary of Ireland, in introducing the Bill, was that the Bill was a set purpose of the Government of the day. They propose to make this a permanent record, a permanent institution. It is to answer no temporary exigency, but it is to be the law of the land for Ireland for an indefinite period. Now, what is to be the law of the land for Ireland for an indefinite period? In the first place, a very large number of offences—and some are made offences, as I understand, by this Act—are to be disposed of by two magistrates without a jury, those two magistrates having the power of sentencing to six months' imprisonment with hard labor. The range of offences which is prescribed by that authority is a very wide one. It covers a great many of those classes of offences capable of almost infinite degrees in their seriousness which unfortunately exist in the island of Ireland. It includes criminal conspiracies, boycotting, rioting, offences under the Whiteboy Acts, assaulting officers of the law, taking unlawful possession, and inciting to the above offences. I do not know much about the magistrates who are to try these cases, but I was very much amused, within a day or two, to read some of the letters of application of highly-placed personages for positions of this description for friends and relatives. One was from a former Governor General of Canada, another was from the Knight of Kerry; and those applications for a nephew, or a brother, or a son-in-law. In the description they gave of the qualifications of the individual, of his previous career, of the reasons for seeking the appointment, were not highly calculated, I think, to induce anyone who considered the subject, and supposed that men were appointed upon such recommendations, to hand over so large a part of the liberty of the subject to two magistrates drawn from society by influences such as those. They belong, as we all know, to one class—to that class which is, as a rule, not in sympathy with, but in bitter hostility to the demands of the Irish people. They belong to a class, they are largely scions of, or related to, or influenced by a class which is divided bitterly, not merely by political, but also by the agrarian question itself, from the very persons whom they are called upon to try. They hold office, as I understand, not during good behavior. They are appointees of the Castle; and to hand over to these persons, without a jury, the power to convict and to sentence to six months' imprisonment with hard labor, for all these classes of offences, is, to a very large extent, to actually obliterate the securities for trial which consist in trial by jury. And there are added offences, as I have said. You add the offence of inciting to any of the above offences. Well, now, what does that mean? What may it mean? Why, Sir, an article in a newspaper, a speech, a word in private conversation, a private letter, may be construed into an incitement to enter into conspiracy—an incitement to take unlawful possession. There is no language which can be devised by the wit of man which can be wider; there is no net you can make that is more ample than those words—incitement to commit offences. I am not surprised that Mr. Balfour—as was said here yesterday—should have said that he hoped to prevent the press from participating in these offences by the operation of the Act, though the Act was not directed against the press. Of course, if they know that two magistrates can commit them to jail for six months with hard labor; if it is found that they are inciting to these offences, they do not exactly know how little or how much—the suggestion of a grievance—the suggestion of the necessity of even an innocent organisation—they do not know what language shall be construed into an incitement—they hardly know at what moment, hardly any man who is interested in a popular cause knows at what moment he may not be summoned and find himself confined for six months in jail with hard labor. Then they deal with very grave offences, some of them the gravest known to the law. There are provisions that if the Irish Attorney General certifies that a fairer trial can be obtained elsewhere than in the locality, he can obtain that change of venue, with the right of appeal, I suppose, against his decision to the court. They go farther, and thus provide that if the Irish and the English Attorney Generals concur that a fairer trial can be had in England than in the locality, the trial is to take place there. That does seem to me a most objectionable provision. It seems to me a dreadful thing to say that, after all these years, it should be possible for any Government to propose that the people of the Kingdom of Ireland should be dragged from their own soil across the channel and tried before English jurors for these offences. It is true, I think, that if it be necessary, in order that justice shall be done—I was going to say, in Ireland—if it be necessary that justice shall be done that trials for these offences shall be had outside of the whole of Ireland, then there is there a dissolution of society; then the law has there no force; then the bands of the law are there broken and dissolved. And if this is the condition of things how has it happened? And is it by measures like these that we are going to produce once again a happier condition? There is still more. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland may by proclamation make it the law that it is an offence against this Act to have anything to do—wide words again; they may not be the exact words of the Act but they are the language of the Chief Secretary in describing it—anything to do with an association formed for numerous purposes, such as promoting or inciting to acts of violence, interfering with the administration of the law, or disturbing the maintenance of law or order; and it is distinctly stated to be the intention of this proclamation—although when it is proclaimed it shall have some sort of force through the whole kingdom—that it may be limited from time to time so as to affect particular localities, because, says the Chief Secretary, an organisation such as the Land League, which is harmful in one locality may be harmless in another, and therefore it is to be a crime, an offence against the Act, in one part of the island to have anything to do with the association, while it is not to be a crime, or an offence against the Act in another part of the island. Now, this language once again is language of so wide a character as to render the liberty of the subject entirely at the disposition and the particular view and idea of two magistrates, or of any set of two magistrates that may be selected. So that I think these provisions, which do not merely add to the former categories of crime, but which deprive the people of the securities for the administration of justice which they value highly, which we value here so highly, and which leaves the whole matter in such a position that it is more in the discretion of individuals than arranged according to the certainty of the law—these provisions may properly be called a most stringent and extraordinary Coercion Act; and, therefore, it is that I feel that those who objected to this Bill on the ground that it is only an Act about the criminal law have very imperfectly apprehended what are its real bearing and effect. In truth, in the practical operation of it, as you can see by what I have told you, and as you can see also when you reflect that the Chief Secretary who introduced it admitted that ordinary crime was rather at a low ebb than otherwise, and that the difficulty was the power and influence of the organisation against which he contends, it is in truth directed against not merely illegal and criminal acts but also acts of concert and organisation of a political or quasi-political character. And I believe that the almost immediate results of a measure so calamitous will be, as in former times and in other countries they have been, to substitute for open organisation, with all the advantages that dealing with a case in the open light of day gives, the resumption of secret and still more dangerous, still more obnoxious, still more hurtful, still more difficult methods than those which exist to-day. It is because I believe that the condition of things will be aggravated—enormously aggravated—in the practical working of affairs by the passage of this Act, that I feel so strongly as to its introduction. Then it is said—it was said here—that the situation demands this law. It is admitted that there is less crime than usual, but I quite agree that the conditions of things in Ireland is lamentable. I quite agree that it is most regrettable. I agree that there is some evidence, that there are some cases of conduct which no man can speak of except in terms of the severest condemnation. I agree that there is proof—some proof at any rate—that there are cases in which the organisation which has been effective—as I shall presently point out—for other and more laudable purposes, has been used for purposes which are not so laudable, and under circumstances which did not justify its use. These, Mr. Speaker, are regrettable, but they are also inevitable results from a situation such as that which for a long time has existed in Ireland. You will not find a country condemned to deal with a social condition, with a condition with reference to property and natural rights such as exists in Ireland, condemned to attempt to deal with it by mutual organisation, as they have been dealing with it there, without such excesses being extremely likely and almost inevitable. The people had organised, and any man who considers the situation must recognise the fact that without that organisation on the part of the tenants, there was for them no reasonable hope. You could not hope that, taking each man by himself, the process of law, the process of resistance, the process of declinature, would produce an effect which would remedy the admitted evils under which the people labored. Now, we have evidence on this subject which I think comes from a source most unimpeachable. Sir Redvers Buller, an Englishman, was sent to Ireland especially in order to grapple with this question. He went over very large parts of the country, and familiarised himself with the condition, and the feelings, and the line of action of the people. He made many efforts to compromise difficulties, and to induce reasonable arrangements between landlords and tenants, and he expresses the opinion, which I have declared it appears to me reasonable should be entertained from some of the evidence I have read, that there are cases in which the action of the League is coercive. There are such cases, and let us so deal with them; but what is the general action of the League? Sir Redvers Buller says:

“I think this, and I feel it very strongly, that in this part of the country you will never have peace unless you create some legal equipoise or legal equivalent that will supply the want of freedom of contract now existing between landlord and tenant.”

Even to-day, he declares, it is at the root of the difficulty that no matter what we may say there is not real freedom of contract between the landlord and tenant. Again he says:

“You have got a very ignorant and very poor people, and the law should look to them, instead of which it has looked only to the rich. * * * What we want is a court that would have a certain amount of coercive power over a bad tenant, and a very strong coercive power over bad landlords. * * * The rents are too high. I think it was the pressure of a high rent which produced the agitation and consequent intimidation as to the payment of rent.”

There you have from Sir Redvers Buller himself the source of the agitation and the intimidation. The rents were too high, and that circumstance afforded the cause and lent the strength which was necessary to the agitation, and the intimidation which is a regrettable part of that agitation supervened as a remedy. He was asked:

“Is there any general sympathy with the action of the League among the people?”

“Yes, I think there is sympathy, because they think it has been their salvation.”

That is Sir Redvers Buller's statement, although he says there are cases in which the League has itself intimidated and coerced.

"Nobody did anything for the tenants till the League, and when the landlords could not let their farms, then they were forced to consider the question of reduction."

Organisation amongst the people in a case in which the rents were intolerably high prevented the landlord from being able profitably to evict, because he could not let again, and obliged him to reduce; and when you remember that up to the latest period at which we have returns the cumbersome machinery of the courts established under the recent Act had actually lowered the rents of no less than 187,000 distinct tenancies in Ireland, which must represent at least 1,000,000 souls, apart altogether from voluntary reductions, who can doubt for an instant that that substratum, that moving cause, to which Sir Redvers Buller alludes, an intolerably high rent, subsisted? I do not mean to say that all the land of Ireland is let too high—not at all. It would be grossly unjust to say that there are not in Ireland liberal, just, devoted landlords. I do not mean to say that there does not exist in many cases a relation between landlord and tenant which is enviable and admirable. But you are dealing with the general condition of the whole people; and if there be those difficulties with the great bulk, it is obvious that there is the greater justification for such methods being adopted, though out of the course of the ordinary law, which seem necessary to protect those who have no other protection. Defenceless each poor cottier is by himself in his unorganised action, and the disorders and injustices which have grown out of this effort are not to be a reason for summary condemnations of that system which Sir Redvers Buller tells us the Irish people think has been their salvation. An hon. gentleman said: Oh! we want to have the law obeyed; the law is dissolved; let us procure this obedience to the law, and then let it be amended. I say: No, in the condition of Ireland it is a fatal mistake to propose to enter upon a period of coercion in the hope to reduce the people to absolute submission, and then propound remedial measures. This is not a new mistake, it is the mistake that has been made long ago, and very often. Everybody remembers, I suppose, about the time that Catholic Emancipation was in agitation, the Duke of Wellington wrote, I forget whether to the Chief Secretary or the Viceroy, some suggestion which unhappily for the Duke became public—to the effect that if it could only be agreed between all the world, the people of Ireland included, that the question should be left in oblivion for a generation or a long series of years, a solution might be arrived at. You will never reach a solution by saying we must banish all open signs of discontent and then amend the law. Let us give the rights that ought to be given, and then seek that obedience, that cheerful obedience, which should be expected, and which will be rendered to a just law by a people holding their just rights. After this discussion, in which the hon. gentlemen criticised our proposed action on the ground that this was not a Crimes Act, on the ground that the circumstances justified a Crimes Act, and on the ground that it was a local matter, they proceeded to argue that we do not know enough about the subject to act. There were some gentlemen who brought forward this argument who did seem to exemplify in their own utterances the proof of it. But I do not think we are so ignorant of the general principles and provisions of the Coercion Act or the condition of Ireland, as to disable us from offering some judgment, and perhaps a calmer judgment than those engaged in the heat of this conflict, upon that question. The hon. gentleman says we have not the evidence; but we have the evidence which the Chief Secretary gave and the explanations of that evidence. On that evidence the English House of Commons was asked to act, and we have that evidence here as well.

MR. BLAKE.

I think that, with the exception of those who have raised this point, we do know enough to act. Now, it is suggested that there are those who are interested in this question who are violent enemies of the Empire, and the attempt was made, which I was sorry to hear made, to prejudice a candid and fair discussion of this question by introducing that element. I deplore that there are to-day violent enemies in the Empire of the Irish race. I deeply regret it. It is, I think, one of the signs and marks of humiliation of the British Empire that such should be; but the circumstance that men, owing to events which have transpired for so many years in Ireland, have left her shores, not with feelings of amity or concord, but with feelings of despair and hate—the circumstance that those feelings of despair and hate have received still further accentuation and development, and that even to-day when a large portion of the English people, alive at last to the cause of justice and generosity, is deeply engaged in the effort to do that long-delayed justice, rancor and hate have not ceased to glow in those bosoms—that circumstance, regrettable as it is, must not be suffered to confound in one common mass the whole Irish population abroad and at home, and to mark them with the condemnation which we give to these persistent haters. We must recognise the fact, and hope that even they who have resorted to methods which we abhor, and transactions which we condemn, with every breath of our voices, every pulse of our hearts, and every nerve of our intellects—we must hope that even they will be subdued to a better and clearer sense of public affairs by the persistent efforts now being made to do justice to Ireland. But, surely, the course of justice is not to be delayed, the cause of generosity is not to be impeded because of these unhappy circumstances which have their origin and cause in the past misgovernment of Ireland. Well, if the hon. gentlemen want to increase the area of disaffection and hostility, if they want that these sentiments should grow and be fostered, if they desire that they should assume still larger proportions, let them, so far as their voices have strength, speak the sentiments of the Canadian people, hostile to justice to Ireland, hostile to generosity to Ireland. Let them speak the sentiments of the Canadian people in favor of coercive laws and against remedial laws, let them speak the sentiments of a harsh judgment against the people now dwelling in Ireland, and I can tell them they will very rapidly create an unhappy crop of discontent and disaffection. Other words and other sentiments than these are those we must utter, if we would help and heal instead of increasing the wound or aggravating the difficulty. Then the hon. gentleman brought up the letter attributed to Mr. Parnell, and he declared that the circumstance of that letter being produced was the reason why we ought not to act just now. I have no hesitation in saying that from the moment I read that letter, as well from the general circumstances as from the intrinsic evidence, and from all I know and have learned on the subject, I was convinced that Mr. Parnell never wrote that letter. I do not propose to justify or declare free from absolute suspicion all the course that Mr. Parnell and his friends may, in past times, have taken; but I have ever believed, and I have some opportunities of forming a judgment, derived from sources very remote from Mr. Parnell himself, but still highly authoritative, I have believed for years that there was no man under the control of the British Throne who felt so deep a wound as Mr. Parnell did upon the occasion of the massacre of those two gentlemen in Phoenix Park. It is perfectly obvious that just at that moment there was a crisis in the sentiment of England as to Irish affairs, destined, as far as we could see, to be propitious; it is obvious that the aims and objects of which Mr. Parnell had been tending were apparently approaching some measure of consummation, and who, with the slightest grain of common sense, could doubt that the effect of that dreadful and horrid murder, that awful tragedy, would be to blight all those fair prospects and to replace them by a fresh and stringent Coercion Act? Who is there who does not know that the obstacle to the remedy and to the relief for Ireland for many years has been the block of public opinion in England and Scotland? And who could not tell such a transaction was the very thing to shock such opinion and render, perhaps, a Coercion Act the only Act you could propose to the Imperial Legislature. Therefore, altogether apart from those feelings of head and heart, which, I am convinced, would have caused Mr. Parnell to shun, and deprecate, and dread, and have nought to do with such a dreadful deed, those who charge him with the slightest complicity in, or favor of, this deed must give him very little credit indeed for the qualities he possesses, in a very uncommon measure, of shrewdness, steadiness, sound judgment, far-sightedness, and a persistent, steady, but not impulsive determination. Therefore, the whole thing is, I think, unworthy of the great journal in which it appeared, and very much more unworthy to be repeated here as a reason why we should stay our hands to seek relief for the Irish people. But another name, after all, is concerned than Mr. Parnell's, in the effort to stay the hand of the Imperial Parliament in passing this Bill—the great name of Gladstone. Therefore, from that point of view, we are to remember that it is not merely the chief of the Irish parliamentary party who is posing, but the chief of the great body of English Liberals, the man whose illustrious life, if it be but prolonged some few years, we may hope will be crowned by a grand measure of justice to Ireland. Then the hon. gentleman dragged into the controversy, the question of the announced visit of Mr. O'Brien here, to discuss some particular cases of eviction. I do not really see that that has anything to do with the question. I regret, if it be the case, that that particular visit, with that particular purpose is to take place. I think it would be a mistake on the part of those in Canada, who desire, as all true friends of Ireland must desire, to avoid any circumstance which may chill the sympathies of the other classes of the population—I say they would act wisely if they would defer or end that visit. I am not here to enter, I think it would be hardly decent to enter, into the slightest discussion of the transactions concerning the tenantry of the illustrious nobleman, with whose case Mr. O'Brien proposes to deal. He is here in a representative capacity. He is the representative of our Sovereign, and I think that if there be examples of evil-dealings on the part of landlords with tenants, those examples which might be presented with the best proof, and with least possible difficulty resulting to the Canadian people, would be examples drawn from other estates than those drawn from those of the Governor General. While I say that, I regretted to hear the observation of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He said, alluding to a statement which I observe in the papers, that the Government of the day has cabled that Mr. O'Brien will be under police surveillance if he should come here, that he would be more in need of police protection. I do not believe that, if Mr. O'Brien came here, he would require either police surveillance or police protection. I am delighted to be able to say that we have been able to discuss this exciting question, in communities in which there is a very great difference of opinion upon it, in the most satisfactory way, without one particle of disturbance. We have had great meetings in the city from which I come on both sides of the question. The views which have been brought forward on each side have been heard without disturbance, without any attempt to prevent the free utterance and expression of the views of each side. The people have been informed of what the views of each side were, and a great step has been gained in the way of tolerant discussion and proper handling of exciting questions. I have no doubt that, in whatever taste we may consider the visit of Mr. O'Brien and his discussion of the affairs of one particular landlord to be, he will have in Canada—I hope so, at any rate—freedom of speech; he will not be, in the first place, under police surveillance, and, in the next place, that he will require no police protection to enable him to say his say, whatever that say may be. I hope that we shall not import anything of that description which is suggested by the hon. gentleman into our dealing with this matter; but it is of a piece with some other suggestions. We are told by the hon. gentleman, dealing with the question of Home Rule, that Home Rule such as is indicated cannot be obtained without civil war. The advocates of peace, of law, of order declare by their spokesman here that they will not obey a law of the Imperial Parliament should such a law be passed, and the reason is, forsooth, that the Irish are not a homogeneous people. No, they are not a homogeneous people, but a people not homogeneous has lived in peace and amity, in personal, in cordial, in political relations as one country often before; and although I am not here to deny that the bitternesses of this long controversy, complicated as it has been by differences of race, by differences of creed, more and most of all by the land question, and the fact that you have a minority of one race and of one creed very largely the possessors of the soil, and a majority of another race and another creed who are tenants of theirs under very exceptional circumstances, still we have to trust to the Irish people to manage this matter. I do not speak of the Irish people in the sense of the Irish Roman Catholics—I say the whole Irish people. I regard them as one people after all, and I have no doubt, for my part, that an example of tolerance, of generosity, of magnanimity will be set by the numerical majority, and that their natural measure of ascendancy due, not to their possessions, but to their intelligence, their education and their power, will be awarded with a liberal hand to the minority when the measure of Home Rule takes place. These prophets of civil war said something of the same kind when the Church Disestablishment question was in vogue. We were told that the waters of the Boyne were to be reddened with blood; but the Church was disestablished and there was not a shot fired; all was peace, and I believe the cause of Protestantism and the cause of religion benefited greatly. They say that separation is the goal. You may make separation the goal if you persist. It may be that the Irish people may at last despair, as many of them have despaired in the past, and that despair may produce the feeling to which hon. gentlemen referred when they spoke of that feeling of hostility. But I say that separation is not now the goal of the mass of the Irish people. They are simply making a demand for those rights which are their due and for a fair share of self-government and a tolerable condition of existence upon the soil upon which they were born and on which they desire to live. I ask you to listen to the eloquent words in which Mr. Gladstone combatted this argument, because I know it is a plausible and specious one, and I believe that to agree in it would be fatal to the cause it would be designed to serve. If we shrink on this ground, we will be sure to precipitate some effort, abortive it may be, but hardly less calamitous, towards the separation which you dread. Mr. Gladstone says:

“What is there in separation that would tend to make it advantageous to Ireland? As an island with many hundreds of miles of coasts, with a weak marine, and a people far more military than nautical in its habits, of small population and limited in her present resources; why should she expose herself to the risks of invasion and to the certainty of enormous cost in the creation and maintenance of a navy for defence, rather than remain under the shield of the greatest maritime power in the world, bound by every consideration of honor and of interest to guard her? Why should she be supposed desirous to forego the advantage of an absolute community of trade with the greatest among all commercial countries, to become an alien to the market which consumes, say nine-tenths of her produce, and instead of using the broad and universal paths of enterprise now open to her, to carve out for herself new and narrow ways as a third rate state? Why, when her children have now, man by man, the free run of the vast British Empire, upon terms of absolute equality with every native of Great Britain, should she be deemed so blind as to intend cutting them away from the greatest of all the marts in the world for human enterprise, energy and talent, and to doom them to be strangers among nearly 300,000,000 men with whom they have now a common citizenship? Why is she to be insensible to all the indications nature herself has given of the destiny of Ireland to be our partner in weal and woe, and why should she be ready to enter upon a desperate contest of strength with a people of six times her number, of twelve times her wealth, inferior to her in no single element of courage or tenacity? This people, to whom even justice itself has never yet enabled her to offer an effective military resistance, are now to be frightened out of their propriety lest Ireland should offer them violence, to tear herself away, unattracted to any foreign centre (for there is none), unwarmed by sympathy beyond her shores (for she would have none), unblest by Heaven, and quarrelling suicidally with all that could minister to her material or her political welfare? No; the truth is, and history proves it, England has been strong enough to be, even through a course of generations, unjust to Ireland; and now it is not want of strength that will put a stop to such injustice, but her better will, her better knowledge, the action of the nation substituted for the action of the few, and an improved and improving moral sense in public affairs. What reason here indicates, history proves; for never did separation become a substantive idea in Ireland until the one unhappy period when the warlike instincts of France coincided with that infatuation of the British Government which in Ireland raised tyranny and sanguinary oppression, as well as the basest corruption, to their climax. Only superlative iniquity led Ireland even for a moment to dream of separating. Even then, the remedy would have been worse than the disease. None but the few fanatics of crime dream now of such a thing; and they who imputed to the Irish nation treat it as a nation made up of men who are at once and equally traitors, knaves and fools."

So I say that those considerations which do most deeply affect us all, which affect us all, as I pointed out the other day, in our material condition, which affect our own relations to the power adjoining us, the maintenance of amity and cordiality which ought to be one of the highest objects, as long as it can be honorably obtained, of Canadian statesmanship, which affect us as citizens of the Empire in respect to which we are partners in its prosperity and sharers in its shame, those considerations do justify, nay, I will add that they demand, our action now in such sort as may further the cause which stands in such a critical position to-day. I believe that, if this ill-omened measure which we reprobate should become the law of the land, a period of difficulty and distress for Ireland and for all of us hardly exemplified before will supervene. Let us then do our feeble best to avert it. I believe that the postponement for any long period of a measure of Home Rule will make that measure much less valuable for the great and chief purpose for which we hope to see it accomplished, for the restoration of the bonds of affection, and concord, and amity, and friendship between the two islands; and, therefore, let us do what we can to avert the ill, let us do what in us lies to procure the good.

After Recess.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Speaker: It affords me great pleasure to rise on this occasion and to say a few words to endorse the motion placed in your hands by my hon. friend for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). It affords me also very sincere pleasure, as it must afford pleasure to every friend of Home Rule, to be able to congratulate the House and the speakers who have preceded me upon the tone of the discussion up to the present time. With the exception of a few remarks the discussion has been of a character to strengthen the resolutions placed in your hands, without giving offence to persons in this House or out of it. To these resolutions the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has proposed an amendment, and that amendment which I cannot support, is, however, in one sense gratifying to me, because, while it halts at that portion of the resolutions which deal with the question of coercion, it reiterates the warm expression of the Parliament of Canada uttered on two former occasions in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. All through the discussion I have noticed that every speaker who opposed the resolutions based his objections to that feature which deals with the question of coercion, but every one has taken advantage of the opportunity to express his warm sympathies with a measure of Home Rule for Ireland. The hon. leader of the Opposition has referred to this House as coming fresh from the country, and it is gratifying to all friends of the measure now under discussion to feel that so far as indications go to show, the representatives coming fresh from the people have, so far as they have spoken, expressed their warm approval of a measure of Home Rule for Ireland. As I have remarked, the amendment objects to that portion of the original motion which deals with the question of coercion; and for the alleged reason, as stated in the amendment, as well as by the hon. mover of the amendment in his speech, that we have not sufficient acquaintance with the facts upon which the Coercion Bill is based, that consequently we ought not to pronounce an opinion upon it, and that we are not in a position to deal intelligently with the question. Now I think that objection can be fairly met in this way: We have within our reach in the reading room and in the library, sufficient particulars of the Bill to enable us to form an idea of its probable effects. But even in the absence of such information, I hold that the motion now in your hands is a proper one, and is entitled to the support of every hon. member in this House. It is not upon the details of the measure that the House is called upon to pronounce an opinion. If I understand it we are called upon here to pronounce an opinion as to the principle of coercion itself, and for that purpose we need not go to the reading room nor the library, nor need we refer to papers to form an opinion upon that subject. All that is necessary to establish our right to pronounce against that measure, is to quote leading statesmen on both sides of the House in the British Parliament, who have over and over again declared that every system of coercion which has been tried for nearly a century in Ireland, has proved an utter and miserable failure. They have gone further, and have said that not only had they failed in the past, but they must miserably fail in the future, and that some other means must be found to pacify Ireland and to restore peace and harmony in that country. Now, we all regret that Mr. Gladstone failed in his efforts to carry the measure of Home Rule which he introduced into Parliament. I think very few people in this country, who have made themselves acquainted with the terms of that Bill, as introduced in the Imperial Parliament, could approve of it for many reasons. The most objectionable feature of the Bill was that part of it which provided that the Imperial Parliament should have the power of imposing taxation in Ireland without the Irish people having a voice or representative in the Parliament imposing that taxation. That was not the only objection to the exclusion of Irish representatives in the Imperial Parliament. Besides, we know a portion of the English people look with suspicion upon any measure of Home Rule, because they say it is the entering wedge, that the ultimate desire of the Irish people is separation from the British Crown. This is an unfair argument to use against the advocates of Home Rule in this country, who are as loyal as those who differ from us on this subject. It is unfair to the people of this country who advocate Home Rule and who are loyal to the Mother Country and desire to maintain the integrity of the Empire with as much sincerity as do those who speak loudly against the principle of Home Rule. The exclusion of Irish representatives from the British Parliament was objectionable, because I consider that if the Bill had been carried in that shape one of the most important links calculated to bind Ireland to the Mother Country would have been severed. We, of course, understand that Mr. Gladstone did not directly commit himself to the clauses of the Bill as they then stood, and that his expectation was that the vote on the second reading was to affirm the principle of the Bill.

while the details were to be modified at a later period. In this country we are told by public speakers and by the press that Mr. Gladstone, as leader of the Liberal party, did all he could to carry a measure of Home Rule for Ireland. Although I hold that the Liberal party, and the Conservative party, until a very recent date, were equally responsible for the misgovernment of Ireland, I am pleased to confess that Mr. Gladstone, in taking the stand he did and becoming the advocate of Home Rule, endeared himself to every man in Ireland, and he received from the Irish people all the credit he could reasonably expect, not only for his great efforts in placing that measure before the British Parliament, but for the great ability and energy he has displayed in seeking to effect the amelioration of the condition of Ireland. But while he is entitled, as leader of that great party, to the thanks of the Irish people for his honest, able and sincere efforts in that direction, I must say at the same time that a portion of the Liberal party, that portion which severed connection with Mr. Gladstone, and refused any longer to follow him as leader—that that is the political party and the political element in the Imperial Parliament which is responsible for the failure of Mr. Gladstone's measure, and are responsible to-day, owing to the support they gave to the present Government, for the absence of a Home Rule measure in the present Parliament. So, in speaking on this question, I think it only fair to put it in that way. I speak no more as a Conservative than as a Liberal, and without reference to any political position I hold in this country, but thinking only as to what will best promote the cause we are advocating, and I am bound to say that up to a recent period both political parties in England were equally responsible for the misgovernment of Ireland. To Mr. Gladstone is due the credit of having broken the ice, and introduced a measure of Home Rule for which he is entitled to the gratitude of Irishmen; but the portion of the Liberal party which deserted his ranks must be held responsible for the failure of that measure at that time. I say further that they are still responsible, while occupying their present position, for the absence of a Home Rule measure, and perhaps for the presence of this coercion measure now before the English Parliament. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), in stating his views upon that question, gave expression to them, as he generally does, with vigor and with warmth, and he perhaps used expressions that had better not have been used. If the hon. gentleman failed to establish his argument in favor of coercion, if he failed to convince this House that they ought to vote against the motion now before it, he certainly did not fail to convince me that he is a believer in coercion, because in alluding to Mr. Parnell, the leader of the Irish party in the English Parliament, and the Irishmen who form the Land League, he said they were convicted of complicity in the Phoenix Park murders, because the London Times said so, and he condemned that body, notwithstanding that the League, under the leadership of Mr. Parnell, has rendered as much service, and more service, in maintaining order and keeping the peace than all the police force sent to Ireland. The course urged by Mr. Parnell and his followers has been to advise the people to patiently endure their wrongs and to keep within constitutional bounds, and if they did so they were bound to ultimately succeed. And that idea has been acted on very generally by the Irish people. But the mover of the amendment, in order to show the necessity of coercion in Ireland, in order to prove what a deplorable condition the country was in and that the Government of England was justified in bringing that coercive measure before Parliament, quoted reports of certain judges in Ireland to show that the measure was absolutely necessary. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, by accident hit upon the reports of certain judges which were very strong in that direction and were not at all favorable to the Irish people. I have a few extracts here; I have the report of other Irish judges of equal eminence to those quoted by the mover of the amendment, and they show a very different state of things from that presented by the hon. member. Their reports establish different facts entirely. I will read a few of them. Lord Justice Fitzgerald, at Meath, in addressing the jury at the Assizes, said:

"Gentlemen of the Grand Jury of the county of Meath:—The Crown solicitor's list for the present Assizes contains only four cases, one of which has laid over from the previous Assizes, and of the remaining three one was for larceny and receiving, and two for violent assault. In fact your county, as I am led to believe, is in its usual condition, that is to say, there is an absence of anything of the character of serious crime throughout the county, and that is the only subject with which we are at the present time dealing."

The report of that large county does not show a very bad state of affairs there. I have also the report respecting King's county from Judge Lawson, who was one of the judges quoted by the hon. gentleman, and who gave the very strongest report as to the existence of crime in different parts of Ireland. But this said Judge Lawson at the Assizes of King's county, though the reporter does not seem to have been able to follow his words clearly, gives the following:—

"Judge Lawson was heard with difficulty in his brief address to the grand jury. He was understood to say the business to go before them was extremely light. There were but five bills from the entire county, and none of them were of an important character. The county inspector had also reported that the county was in a satisfactory condition; so he had nothing more to do than congratulate them on the lightness of their work."

Sir Michael Morris, Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, opened the Assizes for Westmeath. Here is the verbatim report of the proceedings:

"The Lord Chief Justice, in addressing the Grand Jury, said: Mr. Hancock and gentlemen of the Grand Jury of the county of Westmeath, I am informed that there is but one bill to go before you, which will, I am sure, detain you for a very short time indeed. As there is one absent from your number, the majority of you will have to sign the bill. The grand jury then retired, and returned into court, finding 'no bill' in the only case submitted, which was a case of rape against a private soldier in the Royal Dublin Fusiliers, and the prisoner was accordingly discharged."

Then, in the county of Roscommon:

"The assizes for the county of Roscommon were opened by Judge Murphy. The grand jury having been called and re-sworn, his lordship congratulated them on the condition of their county, and said the bills to go before them were very few in number, and none of them calling for any comment from him."

In Sligo, where he was presented with a pair of white gloves, Judge Lawson addressed the grand jury as follows:—

"The business they had to discharge was exceedingly light. There were only three bills in all to go before them. The only case of any importance was a charge of stabbing, but in investigating that charge they would not require any assistance from him."

These are a few reports taken from the public press, and I dare say others might be added to their number, showing what the opinions of the judges were as to the state of the country, and they convey a very different impression from the reports which were quoted by the mover of the amendment. The arguments of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), who on this occasion, as on former occasions, has expressed his deep and warm sympathy with the Irish people, with the Home Rule movement, and with the motion which is now in your hands, would have been quite as strong if he could have refrained from throwing an insult across the floor of the House to myself, which can affect the question in no way, which can add no strength to his arguments or do any good in promoting the question which is now under discussion. If it pleases the hon. gentleman to take that line towards me, I consider it has done me no harm, and, as far as it personally affects myself, I am not going to intrude my own case before the consideration of this House when a question of such importance is under discussion. But I must refer to his remarks when dealing with the action of this House during last Session upon this same question, because that it is not a personal question at all, and because I do not wish that he should place the action of this House in any other than its true light. For that reason I would just say a few words with regard to the amendment which was moved by myself and which he criticised so severely and condemned so unreservedly. I prefer using the evidence of those who are known to sympathise as strongly as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) with the question of Home Rule, to anything that I could myself say on the subject. The hon. gentleman stated that, because the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition had been voted down by the passage of the amendment moved by myself, it was hailed in the Old Country as a victory by the enemies of Home Rule, and used, for that purpose, to the detriment of the cause of Home Rule. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman, I think, did not read the press, and the Irish press especially, upon that question. I am not now going to discuss the merits of the resolution introduced by the leader of the Opposition as compared with the amendment which I moved myself, but I am going to give the opinion of that portion of the Irish press most devoted to the Irish cause, showing their appreciation of the relative value of the two motions submitted to this House. United Ireland of the 15th May, 1886, had the following article:—

“Great capital is sought to be made by a couple of English Tory papers out of the fact that the Dominion House of Parliament has by a large majority rejected the resolution of Mr. Blake, leader of the Opposition, in favour of self-government.”

I could easily understand that if that were the whole story telegraphed across the Atlantic, the enemies of the Home Rule in the British Parliament would have used that fact against the movement in Ireland and in the Imperial House of Commons. They would have declared that public opinion in Canada in 1886 was not the same as it had been in 1882, when my resolutions were carried by the unanimous vote of this House and the almost unanimous vote of the Senate. But United Ireland goes on to say:

“On looking at the telegraphed report of the debate on the question we are opaque enough to fail to discern any particular ground for Tory delight. The debate, we perceive, lasted until five o'clock in the morning, and in the result an amendment of Mr. Costigan, a member of the Ministry, was adopted. The amendment differed very little in substance, though it did in construction, from the proposed resolution. It expressed a cordial interest in the welfare and prosperity of the Irish people, and adhered to the sentiments expressed in the former address to the Crown on the subject of granting a measure of self-government to Ireland. While declining to forward any fresh address, having regard to the snub then administered by the Tory Government—”

But we know that it was under Mr. Gladstone's Government that the Colonial Secretary sent the despatch he did. This article proceeds:

—“the Canadian Parliament reiterates its good wishes for Ireland, and earnestly hopes that some measure satisfactory to its people may be passed. Now, where is the cause of our contemporaries' unholy joy? Between amendment and resolution it is all but a case of tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. The advantage, if any, is on the side of Irish liberty; for it is from the responsible Ministry these good wishes emanate, not from the irresponsible Opposition.”

There is the appreciation of the two resolutions by the leading Irish organ in Ireland on that question; and I am satisfied to leave the matter there and let that decide as to the merits of the two resolutions. I make no pretension to claim that the amendment I moved was more useful, that it was stronger or went further in favor of Home Rule than the resolution moved by the leader of the Opposition. All that I claim is this—that in reiterating the sentiments expressed by this House on a former occasion, it became more consistent with the action of that House, more acceptable to the House, and more likely to secure the votes of hon. members. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) alluded to one fact to which I desire also to allude. He alluded to the great number of Irishmen living in the Republic to the south of us, and to the warm sympathy which they felt towards Ireland, and he expressed the fear that a continuance of the present unhappy state of affairs in Ireland might produce a discontent among our countrymen in the United States which might in time produce serious consequences to us in Canada. Now, I hold that there is no difference of opinion between the Irishmen in the United States and those in Canada on the broad question of Home Rule and justice to Ireland. I believe the Irishmen in both countries are looking forward with an equally earnest hope to the time when some measure of self-government shall be given to Ireland. There is just this difference, however, between them: The Irishmen who have gone to the United States to make it their home, and to contribute to the prosperity and progress of that country, in leaving their native land, severed all connection with the British Government and British institutions. On that account they entertain feelings of resentment, and having severed that connection, there was nothing to prevent that feeling from growing in intensity and becoming evident whenever occasion presented itself for giving expression to it. On the other hand, Irishmen who left the motherland and came to Canada to cast in their lot with us here, assumed a different attitude, and for good reasons. They have not severed their connection with the British flag or British institutions; but in this country, although a portion of the British Empire, they found that freedom and protection which they did not possess in the land from which they came. There was no reason, therefore, why they should entertain any feeling of hostility towards the British Empire such as was felt by those who went to the United States. Having taken up their residence in Canada, and become Canadian citizens, they felt it a duty, which they have always discharged, to be as true to the country of their adoption as the Irishmen of the United States are to the Stars and Stripes. I say this because I do not apprehend the same degree of danger of aggression from Irishmen in the United States that some men believe to exist. Those who have watched the course of things among the Irishmen in the United States know that they have nothing but feelings of warm gratitude to the people and Parliament of Canada for the action they have taken in dealing with this question. When American Irishmen consider that this Parliament, at a trying time, when famine visited the land of their forefathers, gave out of the public treasury of this country, with a willing hand and with the approval of the Canadian people, a very liberal sum for the relief of distress at that time; when they remember that the Irish minority came to this Parliament and asked it to express sympathy with the Irish people in their demand for Home Rule, and the Canadian Parliament voted that sympathy with the unanimous vote of this Chamber, as well as with the vote of the other Chamber, they must accept those acts as proofs of our sympathy and as strong claims on their gratitude. The question came up again in 1886, when this Parliament was ready again to reiterate its expression of sympathy. All these things must establish a kindly feeling in the breasts of the Irishmen of America towards the people of this country. I believe, Sir, that the motion which has been placed in your hands by my hon. friend, the member for Montreal, will carry, and will receive a large and generous support from the members of this House. Like the hon. leader of the Opposition, I have noticed in the papers criticisms of the motion, and also of the mover. Now, I hold that the resolutions come very appropriately from my hon. friend representing Montreal Centre, the largest Irish constituency in the Dominion. That constituency took the first move in entering a protest against the measure of coercion now before the Imperial Parliament, and my hon. friend is following up its action in making this motion. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who has, with his usual ability, spoken on this question, has called the attention of my hon. friend to what seemed to him certain defects in the resolutions now before you. Instead of moving an amendment, he said he threw out suggestions to my hon. friend of certain changes in the wording of the resolution. I quite agree with the remarks of that hon. gentleman, so far as they apply to that clause of the resolution which defines the system of government proposed to be given to Ireland. I think it is rather a departure from the former action of this Parliament, and being rather definite in its character it might subject us to unfavorable criticisms. I trust the suggestion made, therefore, will be accepted, and that the clause will be modified so as to reiterate the opinion expressed by previous Parliaments. The hon. gentleman took exception to another feature—not strong exception, if I understood him, for I think he expressed a willingness to support the resolution, even if the changes which he suggested were not made. The other change is as the term used in connection with the Coercion Act, now before the British Parliament, and the question is whether the word "protest" should be in it or not. Well, we all have, I trust, the same desire in dealing with this question, so far as the question of principle is concerned, if we can maintain that, it is not of very great importance what words may be used and if by the re-wording of the resolution, my hon. friend, the mover of the resolution, may secure a larger measure of support, I would advise him to make that change, especially as the hon. the leader of the Opposition having advised it. The motives of the hon. member for Montreal Centre could not be questioned if he yielded to the suggestion. I would, however, advise the mover, before making this second change with regard to the wording of the protest, to assure himself that in making that change, he is going to promote the principle at stake, by adding materially to the support he would otherwise get. Otherwise, I would be against the change suggested. I am not in the habit of detaining the House at any great length. I feel that I have discharged a duty incumbent upon myself in saying a few words on this question, not, as is frequently said by hon. members, that I require to say anything in explanation of the vote I intend to give, because the vote requires no explanation. It explains itself. The remarks I have made were intended to express my continued deep and heartfelt sympathy with any movement calculated to assist in the amelioration of the unhappy condition of Ireland, and if by making any appeal to this House, I can contribute to add to the support of the motion of my hon. friend from Montreal Centre, I consider that in doing so I discharge a duty incumbent upon me and accomplish some good. Therefore, I would earnestly ask our friends on both sides to give this motion the favorable, patient consideration they have given previous motions in the same sense, and to give it, what is more important still, the support of their vote. I thank you, Sir, and this honorable House, for the attention with which you have listened to my remarks.

Mr. McMULLEN. I had no intention of detaining the House in the discussion of this important question, had it not been for some remark of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Referring to the discussion in this House, in 1886, over the resolution then passed, he arrogated to himself all the credit for those resolutions. Now, it will be no harm to refer shortly to the events connected with the introduction of those resolutions. It is well known that people in Ottawa, and possibly throughout the Dominion, who were anxious to get resolutions of sympathy with Home Rule adopted by this House, appealed strongly to the hon. gentleman himself and other hon. gentlemen on that side to introduce resolutions for the purpose of taking the sense of this House in regard to the question of Home Rule. In the first place, these hon. gentlemen said, in answer to these appeals, that they had felt the pulse of the House with regard to the probability of carrying such resolutions, and declared it would be imprudent to introduce any at all. But on their own responsibility, claiming to speak in the name of the Irish people of the Dominion, they sent instead a cable despatch to the Old Country stating that the Irish population of Canada were in perfect sympathy with Home Rule. That was all that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and those associated with him were disposed to do. After the leader of the Opposition and other hon. gentlemen on this side had waited six or eight weeks after the House had met for the purpose of giving hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity of moving in the matter, the hon. the leader of the Opposition moved in the question himself. Then those hon. gentlemen opposite appeared to be extremely anxious to do a great deal in the same direction, but until then they were very unwilling to move at all, and the course they took was to thwart if possible, or at any rate interfere, with the action taken by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) tried to show that the resolution which the leader of the Opposition had prepared was, in his opinion, not just the thing suited to the occasion. There are times, we know, in the history of every cause when it is well to act, and there are times when action will be of very little avail. So I say, if the hon. gentleman had seen his way last Session to take the action he proposes to take to-day, if he had seen his way then to give the leader of the Opposition the assistance he justly deserved, the weight of his little finger would then have been worth more than the weight of his whole body at present. Changes have since taken place in England. A Government that sympathised with the wrongs of Ireland, led by Mr. Gladstone, was then in power, and anxious to do everything possible; whereas now another Government is in power, which is not inclined at all to sympathise with the demand for Home Rule. The hon. gentleman, who then was very backward in acting, is now prepared to act, and I am glad to say hon. gentlemen on this side are willing to act under any circumstances. They were willing to act last year and supported resolutions which did not meet with the entire approbation of this side, rather than prevent a unanimous expression of opinion, and they are equally prepared to vote on this occasion in support of the principle of Home Rule. Had the hon. gentleman to-day persisted in the course he laid out himself, had he persisted in holding to the wording of the resolution, no doubt he would receive the active co-operation of hon. members on this side. I give the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) credit for the course he has taken in acceding to the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, by adopting the words suggested as better than those embodied in the resolution itself. In accepting largely the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition, he has shown a desire to co-operate with my hon. friend. For my part I have always sympathised with Home Rule. I believe that Ireland is entitled to a measure of Home Rule. I believe that the question of Home Rule also embodies the question of protection to the minority, and I am satisfied that the English House of Commons will never pass a measure that will allow of any injustice to the minority. I think that this question of the risks which the minority will have to run, if a measure of this kind be granted, is simply a bugbear got up for the purpose of frightening people into the idea that injustice will be done. I do not think there is any possibility of injustice being done, but still to remove suspicion from the minds of the people I believe the measure will be so framed that the rights of the minority will be strictly protected. We are aware that landlordism in Ireland has been the great trouble ever since that country became part of the Empire of Great Britain. There are in Ireland about 650,000 tenant farmers. There are 538,000 of these who pay an annual rent ranging from £1 up to £20. There are 121,000 who pay an average rent of £56 a year or about $280. The entire rent collected from the tenant farmers of Ireland is in the neighborhood of £10,417,000 sterling, or about $52,000,000 annually. This is a very large sum of money, and, when we consider that the average sum has been collected from those people in the shape of rents for the last eighty years, we may well wonder how the resources, the frugality and the struggling efforts of those people have been equal to the task of producing such an amount annually. Is it to be wondered at that there is poverty and wretchedness in that country to a degree not found in many others? It is evident that the very large amount collected in the way of exorbitant rents is what is crushing those people down, keeping them in a condition of poverty and wretchedness, and causing a great deal of the trouble, the uneasiness and the disloyalty which have been exhibited from year to year. In the introductory remarks made by the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), he said he was glad to notice that none of the press of Canada was opposed to Home Rule, that the united press of the country was in favor of that principle. The hon. gentleman surely had not read the Ottawa Citizen of the day on which he made his speech, or he would have found a very pointed article in that paper in opposition to Home Rule. I do not think there is in the Dominion a Reform journal in opposition to Home Rule. I do not know of one, but the hon. gentleman will find a very pointed article in opposition to Home Rule in the columns of the Ottawa Citizen. We have a system of Home Rule in Canada, and I believe that, if Ireland had such a system as we have, a Government to control her own local affairs, but amenable to the powers held in London by the Queen, it would be a system under which they would conduct their affairs quietly and peaceably. We conduct our own affairs in the several Provinces, and, of course, we are responsible to the Federal Head for the laws we pass, which can be disallowed by the Federal Head. We have got along pretty fairly under that system. We have had some jarring, but we have got along pretty fairly after all, and I think that if Ireland had such a system it would be, at all events, more suitable for her than to continue in the position she is in at present. We know that when we got Home Rule in Canada some members of the English Parliament were pointedly opposed to any such system as we have now. Lord Derby declared that if Canada was granted the measure of self-government she asked, it would lead to one of two things, either total separation of the colony from the Mother Country, or the establishment of another Republic on the Continent of America. We have had Home Rule here, and have carried it on very successfully, and I do not think the people of this Dominion are getting more disloyal because they enjoy that Home Rule. I believe we are just as loyal as any colony belonging to the British Empire, so that the prognostications of Lord Derby were no more fulfilled than would be the ideas expressed with regard to the separation of Ireland from Great Britain if she obtained Home Rule. It has been said during this discussion that Mr. Gladstone's Bill was very objectionable, that it did not contain the necessary provision to protect the rights of the minority, that there were some things in that Bill that could not be accepted. Well, Mr. Gladstone, when he introduced that Bill, and during the discussion of the measure, stated that only the principle of the measure was at issue and invited suggestions from both sides of the House in regard to details. When he went before the country he said he was prepared, in the spirit of fair play, to accept from anyone that wished to make suggestions anything that might be thought of advantage to complete that Bill. That was his position and it was a very creditable position. So, when any person attempts to show that that Bill was decidedly objectionable and should be rejected on that account, it is hardly fair, in view of what Mr. Gladstone stated, to say that he brought forward a cast-iron measure which must be accepted in the shape in which he presented it, for it was rather a measure in regard to the details of which he was prepared to consider the views of those who were disposed to differ with him on that question. I cannot close my remarks without saying something in regard to the course the hon. the leader of the Opposition has taken on this occasion. If he had followed out the course that hon. gentlemen opposite who have been taking an active part in this matter took in 1886, he might have moved an amendment which might have seriously interfered with the unanimous decision of this House in regard to this question. He has not done that, but has shown his earnest and honest desire to meet the case fairly and honorably, and to do what he can in the cause of Home Rule for Ireland. If the hon. gentleman opposite had taken the same course in 1886, I have not the slightest doubt that possibly we might have been able to send home a unanimous resolution, and under the very advantageous circumstances in which the country was then placed in being governed by Mr. Gladstone, placed it in his hands, and asked that Home Rule should be granted to Ireland; but, simply because they thought it might be a means of his securing part of the laurels they were anxious to secure, they interfered and tried to cripple and destroy the effect of that resolution by amendments. I remember that on that occasion the leader of the Opposition invited the Minister of Inland Revenue to interview him and to give him an opportunity of meeting him fairly and agreeing upon the wording and the shape of the resolution. It was understood, when the leader of the Government appointed a day for the discussion, that Mr. Blake invited anyone who took an interest in the question to suggest any change that might be made in order as far as possible to have unanimous action upon it, but in the time that elapsed from the introduction of the question until it was finally disposed of, instead of meeting the honorable and candid invitation extended by the leader of the Opposition, they took advantage of the time to move an amendment and, if possible, to interfere with the united action he was anxious should be secured. I think, had they taken the course which they should have taken upon that occasion, we might have been able very materially to strengthen the hands of Mr. Gladstone, who was then struggling to carry this measure through Parliament. Now, on this occasion the hon. leader of the Opposition has shown that he is not disposed to interfere with the hon. mover in his course, but he has suggested certain things which, I believe, the House as a whole will endorse, and these suggestions, I am glad to know, have been largely accepted, and I hope that this House will come to a unanimous decision in favor of the resolutions. Any person who has travelled through Ireland and has seen the circumstances of the people, the poverty and wretchedness that he meets on every hand, must feel that there is something wrong in the condition of that country. He sees that although the soil is so rich, the climate so salubrious, and the population so evidently healthy, there must be something wrong in the government of that country, or the condition of the people would be better than it is. He sees on all hands evidences of ancient greatness that are being obliterated from year to year, and the country is becoming more pauperised every year. Now, I think when we come to consider all these facts, it is our duty, while we enjoy all the advantages of self government, humbly to express, in a courteous manner, our sincere desire that those across the waters with whom we sympathise should be granted the same measure of self-government which we enjoy. When I was home in Ireland a few years ago, I was quite surprised to find the amount of ignorance that prevails in that country with regard to England and English affairs. I believe that in this country there are more men, in proportion to the population, who have been to London and travelled through England, than there are in Ireland who have crossed the channel. You will meet men fifty, sixty and seventy years of age, who have never been outside of Ireland, and who know very little about what transpires beyond their own neighborhood. Very few of them know anything about England. They are just as ignorant about English life and affairs as they are of the people of the United States, and perhaps far more so. Now, Sir, I would not have said anything at all on the subject, had it not been for the remarks dropped by the last speaker, who seemed anxious to remove blame that rested upon him for the course he took in 1886. However, I am not going into this now. I suppose, seeing that we have not the prospect of going before the country in a few months, the hon. gentleman is willing that the suggestions made as to the wording of the resolution by the leader of the Opposition should be accepted, and that his advice should be taken in what we do now in order that we may send home a unanimous resolution in favor of Home Rule. Now, there is one thing which I believe tends largely to produce an unfortunate condition of things in Ireland, that I have not referred to, and that is fixing the rents for fifteen years. I think that is generally admitted to have been a mistake. No doubt at the time it was done it was thought to be for the advantage of the tenants, but I think it is admitted today that the period was altogether too long to fix the rent at a certain sum. We know that the facilities for the shipment of produce from this continent to Great Britain are becoming greater every year, and I believe that the enormous shipment of produce from this country has tended greatly to reduce the value of the products of Ireland, and, as a result, tends to prevent these tenants from paying rents, simply because they cannot reap the same prices they did some years ago; and just in proportion as the value of what they raise is reduced, in that proportion the landlords should be willing to reduce the rents. If they adopted a system similar to that which prevails here, of renting on shares, or taking a certain percentage of the crops in place of certain fixed rents, they would have no trouble; but having fixed the rents for fifteen years, whether the crops are good or bad, whether the prices are high or low, the landlords expect to receive their rents just the same. I think that is a wrong system, and they should be willing to share with these poor, unfortunate, struggling creatures a fair share of the loss they have to sustain when prices are low.

Mr. COURSOL. At this late hour of the debate I shall say but very few words. I could not give a silent vote on this question, and I feel it my duty to say a few words inasmuch as I represent, with my colleagues from Montreal, a population containing a very large, influential and wealthy Irish element. As an old Home Ruler myself, I feel at home when I am with them. When I have to speak of the wrongs of Ireland and the way Ireland has been treated, they are accustomed to my voice. The views and opinions of the Irish people in this country have found expressions on many occasions in a very forcible manner, and at last they have been brought before the Parliament of Canada in the shape of resolutions from the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). They are the real echo of the sentiments of that large population I represent, and, therefore it is my duty, on the present occasion, to give them an unqualified support. When, years ago, Mr. Speaker, we were struggling for popular government in this Dominion of ours, now so prosperous, now so attractive to immigrants from other nations, I remember how comforted and encouraged we were by the expressions of sympathy that we received from all parts of the world, and of hope for success in the cause we had undertaken. I think I have a peculiar right to say we, as I was a very young man then and supported with all my energy the men who risked their lives on the battlefields, and their heads on the gallows, for the success of the great cause of constitutional government. Therefore, I feel that it is a peculiar duty and a privilege for me to express my sympathies on this occasion with the Irish people in their effort to obtain Home Rule. It is one of the privileges of a country occupying a position like that of Ireland to elicit sympathy and feelings of fraternity. It is natural that the world should sympathise with an oppressed nation; it is natural that other nations should tender sympathy with a nation which has been so oppressed as Ireland. It cannot be matter for surprise, therefore, that we should seek to interfere? And why should we not interfere? It is said that these resolutions might offend the Parliament of England. And why should they offend? Surely they do not offend England. England herself has shown the example of interfering in favor of oppressed people. She has glorified herself upon being the friend of the oppressed. History has recorded her appeals in behalf of Poland, Hungary and Italy. We have, therefore, the example of the English people before us, and we should not hesitate for a moment to extend to the Irish people our sympathy, for the conduct of England on various occasions is a guarantee that we may properly do so. The introduction of this Coercion Bill, which is an un-British measure, would have the effect of destroying a great British institution, trial by jury. The foundation of the trial by jury is, that every man in England, or under the British Crown, shall have the right to be tried by his peers. But when an offence or a supposed offence is committed under this Bill, what will be the course pursued towards the alleged offender? He will be taken from the city of Dublin, or from any part of Ireland across the channel, and will be sent before an English jury to be tried. And by whom will he be tried? By men who must necessarily, in the present struggle, be prejudiced by religion and blinded by partisanship against the prisoner. We would not call that British justice and trial by peers, and such a system must bring into contempt the whole system of trial by jury. The trial should take place in the country where the offence is committed. If there is not sufficient force at the present time to protect the courts and satisfactorily conduct the trials it should be provided, but the trial should take place where the crime was committed. The venue might be changed to some other place in the country, but prisoners should not be sent across the channel and tried among a population who must be more or less prejudiced against them. The time has arrived when the people of England should decide that something must be done to remedy the grievances of Ireland. If the English people would only decide that something must be done they would speedily find a way of doing it. It is impossible to say that in England statesmen cannot be found to settle the Irish question satisfactorily to the Irish people and to the landlords. There must be something behind the scenes which prevents such a settlement being effected. I dare say in this country we could find statesmen who could settle the Irish question, if it was left to them to settle, in a fair way. I heard yesterday, to my great surprise, a member of this House state that the resolution should not be adopted by the House because Mr. Parnell had signed a certain letter, which was read. But I ask what proof was there that Mr. Parnell ever signed that letter? The hon. gentleman ought to have read from another portion of the same paper the denial of Mr. Parnell and his friends. That is not the proper way to administer justice impartially and seek to secure support. Surely a little more respect is due to the words of a public man like Mr. Parnell, one of the ablest members of the British Parliament, and a Protestant. It was absurd to say that Ireland should not obtain Home Rule because her people could not conduct her own affairs in a constitutional manner. Why, there are men like Mr. Parnell, Justin McCarthy, Sexton, and hundreds of others I could name, who were fully competent to administer the affairs of any country. The idea is puerile, and I am sure very shortly other ideas will prevail. When England, through her rulers, gives Ireland fair play and a government like ours, and secures a settlement of the difficulties between tenants and landlords, it will be a bright day for the British Crown. I am sure the granting of Home Rule in this year of Her Majesty's Jubilee would be a monument remembered by the world more than all the public and charitable institutions that would be founded. It would be the greatest event of the reign of our glorious Queen, and I hope it will be accomplished in order that Queen Victoria may be able to say she has freed a people who have been oppressed for so many years.

Mr. McCARTHY. The discussion has taken so wide a range, it may be well, perhaps, to recall the attention of the House to the matter upon which we shall by-and-bye, and before very long I trust, have to vote. I desire, in the statement I am about to make, to be as free as possible from making any imputation upon the motives of any hon. gentleman who has addressed the House. I desire to treat this matter in as calm and judicial a spirit as under the circumstances it can be dealt with, and I ask that the House shall be recalled to the position in which we stand here, and the powers with which we are invested and the rights we possess here as representatives of the Canadian people. We have been on other occasions invited to vote, and on one occasion we almost unanimously did vote, in favor of the general principle of the establishment of Home Rule for Ireland, and on a more recent occasion, though perhaps not with such unanimity, we also recorded and reaffirmed our former opinion in favor of that general principle. But it has always been to me a matter of some doubt, and that doubt was not lessened by the rebuke with which our first resolutions were received, whether we had not stepped beyond our sphere, whether we had not gone beyond our right and function as a Parliament or as an Assembly to advise Her Majesty as to how this question between Great Britain and Ireland should be dealt with. Now, we sit here as a Parliament it is true—as I believe, the greatest Parliament under the British Empire, except the Imperial Parliament itself, and with larger and wider powers, with that exception, than any other legislative body under the Crown of England. But after all we hold here but a delegated power. We have but the right which is conferred upon us under the charter enabling us as a Canadian people to govern ourselves, in the distribution of that power between the local legislative assemblies and this Parliament of Canada; and it is merely within that power and as far as that power goes, that, as it appears to me, we are sent here by the people of Canada to express their opinions. For my own part, I do not know and I do not feel that I have any right here to express the opinions of my constituents on this question of Home Rule—upon the question of how any particular measure should be decided or disposed of in the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland. I do not know that my constituents, in honoring me with the position which I hold in this House, gave me any mandate to express their opinions, to represent them or to bind their views with my own upon this question. I do not deny that we have all got the right of petition to the throne; that is a right belonging to every British subject. But it is one thing to meet in our public halls and exercise the right of petition, and it is quite another and a different thing to pretend, as representatives of the people, to express opinions which are not merely the opinions of the individual members who record their votes, but purport to be—and to have any value should be—a representation of the opinions of those who sent us here. Now I may be met, and properly met, by the answer that this opinion of mine is not in accordance with the votes which I have given on two occasions, in support of the general principle of Home Rule. But we see where we are now being led. In 1882, I do not suppose there was any member of this House—I do not suppose that to-day there is any member of this House, no matter upon what side of the Chair he may sit—who does not feel a desire that the difficulties which have occurred, and which are still unfortunately existing in Ireland, should be done away with by means of some measure of legislation or other, whatever means may be found of accomplishing that object. I do not suppose, therefore, that, in according to the general principle of Home Rule our hearty concurrence, as a means to that end, we went very far astray. But where are we now being led? One thing it was to express that general opinion; one thing it was to say that we believe, judging by the way in which we have found the measure of self-government which had been accorded to us had resulted in this country, and that it would probably produce a like result in Ireland—that, I say, was one thing, but we are now proposing to deal with a specific and particular measure submitted to the British Parliament and upon which that Parliament has the responsibility of deciding. That, I take it, is the point of the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). It is not merely to reiterate our former opinion on Home Rule that this resolution is moved. The hon. gentleman has told us candidly—or rather, so I infer from his address—that the reason this matter was brought before this assembly was that the Coercion Bill, as it is called, had been introduced by the Government of England, and that large and important meetings had been held throughout this country petitioning—as their right was and is to petition against that or any other matter which they thought affected their individual interest—petitioning against this measure. In that view the hon. gentleman thought proper to bring the matter up in this House, and ask us as a legislative body to express by this constitutional means our opinion upon this important question. If you eliminate from these resolutions the important paragraph relating to the question of the Coercion Bill, I do not suppose that the other part of them would have occupied, to any great extent, the attention of this House as this matter has occupied it. To that, therefore, I desire to take exception—not from any feeling of hostility to the Irish race, of which I am proud to be a member; not from any desire to prevent that race getting such a measure of freedom or self-government, such constitutional redress as they may be able to get in a proper way; I take this position from no such feeling, and I trust that no word of mine can possibly be used in support of the supposition that I entertain any such feeling. It is not for any such reason as that, that I take this view, but because I believe that we had better leave with the proper constituted Imperial authorities the questions which belong to them, and we will find we have quite enough to do here in Canada with the management of our own affairs. We are proud, Sir, to know that since 1840 we have had what is called responsible government in this country. We have won the right from the British Crown to govern ourselves, according to the well understood rules of constitutional government, and we have found, as a whole, that we have prospered in that way. But while that is so, are we not pretending to go a little too far? Are we not pretending to do too much when, not content with the liberty which we enjoy ourselves, we propose to dictate to the Imperial Parliament which has delegated to us these powers, what they should do under circumstances where they have great responsibility and full knowledge, whereas we have neither the knowledge nor the responsibility which belongs to that great body? What is this Coercion Bill, so called, and why has it been introduced? I am not going to argue to-night in favor of that measure, nor am I going to argue against it. I humbly admit differing altogether from hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, for whom their leader spoke, that my acquaintance with the subject is not sufficient to enable me to discuss it in that way on my own account and form a competent opinion upon it, much less to bind those whom

I represent in this House. The hon. gentleman opposite sneered at my two hon. friends who expressed an opinion to that effect, and said their speeches demonstrated their ignorance. Perhaps if he were candid he would have said,—and I think I will point out before I am done—that his knowledge on the subject is not quite so accurate as to enable him to cast a slur on hon. members on this side. I think hon. members on both sides of the House, if they are honest, will say that the percentage of members of this House who are prepared to assert that they know enough of this question to speak intelligently upon it, and to speak with the responsibility of members of Parliament, is very small indeed, though I do not suppose we are to be blamed for that. We have enough, as I have said before, to do in governing our own land, and we cannot pretend to grasp the whole world of politics and understand the minutiae of the different questions which, at one time or other, may arise in the Parliament of Great Britain. Now, if the Coercion Bill, so-called, is for the purpose of enabling the home authorities, the government of the Queen, to enforce the laws of the land, it is not, as the hon. leader of the Opposition said, effecting any change in the criminal law. It does, it is true, effect important changes in the procedure of that law. But there is nothing in the Act of Parliament, of which I have a copy—and I think the hon. gentleman spoke as if he had only read the statement of the Chief Secretary on the subject—there is nothing which, so far as I understand the criminal law, in the slightest degree creates offences, though, undoubtedly it creates changes in the procedure for the suppression of the crimes which, by the common law of England, and by various statutes passed from time to time have been created offences against which they are perhaps necessary if the bonds of civilised society are not to be altogether unloosened. We know that there was a Coercion Bill in 1880 for a limited period of time, and another in 1881, again for a limited period of time. We know that the latter was caused by a terrible tragedy which occurred in Phoenix Park, which the hon. leader of the Opposition has characterised as a massacre; and certainly we can all speak of it as the most diabolical murder of modern days. We are told that these Coercion Bills have only added to the difficulties instead of removing them; and we were told this afternoon by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) that that will always be so—that the attempt to have the laws of the land enforced must always be followed by meetings, by secret associations, by fresh and greater breaches of the criminal code. Well, Sir, that has not been found to be the result of these enforcements of the criminal law. I hold in my hand a small history of the English Parliament during the last five years, in which, speaking about coercion, the author tells us this fact, which I commend to the attention of this House:

“The improvement was very limited, it must be allowed; too slowly it developed; but eventually brightened considerably, and really another era had dawned for Ireland; if we consider the decrease in the number of agrarian outrages alone. In 1881 there were 4,431. The year following the passage of the Crimes Act saw 762 only, and murders having decreased from twenty-six in 1881 to none in 1884.”

That was the effect of the passage of the Crimes Bill in 1881. And when the period came for that Crimes Bill to be renewed we know the difficulties that were supposed to have occurred in Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet; and it was said by some that it was owing to dissensions with regard to the renewal of that Bill that that Cabinet shortly afterwards fell. We know, too, as a matter of history, that Lord Salisbury's first Administration refused to renew the Crimes Bill, and from that time to this the Government of England has endeavored to govern Ireland by the ordinary law of the land. What has been the result? The result cannot be known to all; but when the Minister comes before the House of Commons and makes the statement to that House which I am about to read, and asks for powers in order to secure respect for the law of the land, I do not know very well how we, sitting 4,000 miles away, have a right to criticise, much less to censure, that Government. Mr. W. H. Smith, in bringing this matter to the notice of the House of Commons used this language, after quoting Mr. Gladstone's own words used in 1881:

“Is that the state of Ireland—Is one in which the administration of justice has failed, and in which to a very considerable extent the influence of terror places in abeyance the discharge of civil duties and the exercise of civil rights. The powers we ask for are necessary to maintain social order. They are necessary to maintain the very existence of society upon the conditions in force and recognised by every civilised community.”

When the responsible Minister of the Crown, who has information not open to us here, comes down to the House of Commons and uses language like that, I do not know very well how even in the House of Commons the powers they ask are to be denied to them. They went further and said:

“So serious do we find the condition of affairs in Ireland to-day that we tell the House of Commons that if they refuse to give us the powers which we as a Government desire, after having for two years tried to govern the country by the ordinary laws of the land, we will surrender to others the responsibility of advising Her Majesty in the government of the country.”

The Government made that statement, and fortified it by facts in their information, some of which I have here and might mention, although I am not going to make anything like an exhaustive argument on this question. When I find the statement made by the Chief Secretary that out of over one thousand cases of crimes committed during the preceding year there had been only in the neighborhood of sixty convictions—and the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition establishes it; when we know that the people in the different parts of the country have joined associations for the purpose of compelling the landlords to come down to their terms; when we know that sometimes, growing out of those associations, crimes are committed, and sometimes crimes are committed not growing out of them, because the bonds of civilised society are relaxed; and when we know that the jurors who are to try those people belong to those various associations, I want to know how it is possible to expect the criminal law to be enforced without special powers. Now, these are facts which induced the authorities charged with the responsibility of governing that country to say that they must have additional powers; and in the face of these facts we are asked here, in our ignorance of the position of affairs there, to practically vote against the principle of the Bill which has received its second reading recently by a majority of over 100 in the House of Commons of England. Are we the people to take such a position? Are we so negligent of law and order in this country? Are we so careful of liberty, as it is called, as to entitle us to tell the people and Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland that the laws which the responsible advisers of the Crown say are requisite for the maintenance of society should not be passed? Do you remember the strike on the Grand Trunk Railway service which occurred, I think, in the year 1877. Do you remember, Sir, the difficulty that occurred when the Grand Trunk servants refused to do the bidding of their master and struck, having combined, as it was their right to combine, for the purpose of advancing their own interests and getting better terms from their employers. But the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) who thinks it so wrong to make the Irish people obey the laws of the land, not merely created a new crime and altered the procedure, but brought down an Act of Parliament and backed by the whole strength of the party then in power, including the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier), said that a breach of civil contract under the circumstances detailed in this Act, should be a crime. A new difficulty had arisen, the people of Canada found themselves strong enough to cope with it, and the Government of the day came down—I do not think it was the Government, if my recollection serves me a right, so much as the hon. member for West Durham—and proposed, not being competent enough for the emergency, not being Irish enough to understand how to frame the Bill, that it should be given to a commission to frame; and the hon. member for West Durham brought down the Bill and carried it through. I find in that measure that breaches of contract with railway companies, under certain circumstances which caused public inconvenience, were to be made criminal. But that is not the worst feature. Why, they were to be tried summarily—not by a court and jury. The great right of trial by jury was ignored by the hon. gentleman, and the trial was to take place before two magistrates who had power to send the accused to prison. That was the way we acted in circumstances of that kind. I voted against that measure, and I believe those associated on the Opposition side of the House with me almost unanimously voted against it. We did not so vote on the ground that we had not the power to pass legislation of that kind, but we denied that there was any occasion for so stringent an amendment to the law. That was the Coercion Bill of that day, which remains from that day to this on our Statutes. We may call it the Coercion Bill of the hon. member for West Durham, for he is certainly entitled to the credit of it more than any other hon. member.

Mr. MILLS. Why do you not repeal it?

Mr. McCARTHY. There is another matter. Let me investigate the Bill which has been brought before the British Parliament, whether necessary or unnecessary, it is not for me to offer an opinion. I am merely endeavoring to point out to this House that we will be assuming very dangerous responsibility, if these resolutions are intended to affect any purpose except the purpose which I do not propose to mention, if they are intended in the slightest degree to affect the passage of the Bill in the English Parliament,—in asking this Parliament to send home resolutions of that kind. What is the measure about which so much has been said here? Listening to what has been uttered on the floor of this House one would suppose the Irish people have no liberties;—

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY—one would suppose they were a down-trodden race;—

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY—one would suppose they were in the position in which we were before responsible government was granted to us.—

Mr. MILLS. Worse.

Mr. McCARTHY. Worse. They have a larger representation proportionately than have the people of England and Scotland in the United Parliament of Great Britain. They have to-day 87 members; and in the last Parliament they held the balance of power between the two great political parties in the Imperial Parliament. They boasted they could make or unmake governments, as we know they did. They have to-day a band of able representatives in that Parliament; prepared and willing to support their views, and it may be said that by-and-bye they will successfully, perhaps, have their views carried by means of the perseverance and power of that compact body directed by Mr. Parnell. It is not correct to compare the situation of the people in this country before responsible government was granted to us, with that of the Irish people to-day. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) told us this afternoon that since we had been granted responsible government sullenness had disappeared from our midst, and peace, happiness and loyalty to the Crown prevailed throughout the land; but does not the hon. member forget that the Bill which gave him that right was forced upon the people of Lower Canada against their wishes?

Mr. LAURIER. It was the Act of Union they opposed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; and it is by the Act of Union that the hon. member got responsible government and the liberty to govern himself of which he has boasted, and which he says, has enabled his people to live happily and prosperously under the British flag. That Act was passed in the British Parliament, against the will of the people of Lower Canada, and yet that union with the people of Upper Canada, which lasted until the time of Confederation, was found, as my hon. friend has had to admit, to confer happiness and peace and prosperity upon us all. Now, the first thing I find in this Act is what, perhaps, may appear to be a terrible wrong, and that is the right to make preliminary investigation—the right, although no particular man may be charged with crime, to hold, as it were, an inquisition for the purpose of discovering who the criminal may be when a crime is committed. We have for some time past adopted that principle with much effect. If a fire takes place, we have the right to hold an enquiry and take evidence for the purpose of discovering who it was that committed the arson. Does any hon. member say that, so far as that is concerned, there is anything so far astray or wrong? We will pass to the next provision of the Bill, the one concerning summary jurisdiction. It does, as has been correctly stated, in certain misdemeanors, not in matters of felony, but in the minor descriptions of crime, enable people who are charged with the offences to be tried before two magistrates, who may commit to gaol for a period not exceeding six months. We are a down-trodden race, for have we not been living under the Canada Temperance Act for some years, and that is the power we find within the four corners of that Act. There are many offences which can be tried under our criminal law before magistrates, most of them, I admit, by the consent of the accused; and if my hon. friends will look at our criminal statistics, they will find that, in the greater number of cases, that tribunal is chosen in preference to going before a jury; but in some cases, not all, the accused are compelled to be tried before a stipendiary magistrate, or a police magistrate, whether they will or not. What is to be done, will hon. members say? If juries will not convict, if out of a thousand crimes the convictions are only sixty-two, if judges in assize town after assize town have to adjourn the courts or to adjourn the trials of the criminal cases, because in the face of the plainest evidence, juries will not convict, I ask hon. gentlemen, who say that this measure should not have been passed, to tell us what should be done. I point to the Act of 1877 to show what we would have done under similar circumstances. I point to the range of our criminal laws to show what we have done from time to time, and I think it hardly lies with the representatives of the people of Canada in this Chamber, which enacts the criminal law, to find fault with the Government of Great Britain and Ireland who have thought proper, under these circumstances, to ask for these powers. Then there is the power to move for a change of venue, but every hon. member at all familiar with our criminal law knows that that power—I am not now speaking of the trial in England; I will come to that later; I am speaking of the other power to move for a change of venue from one part of Ireland to the other—that that is a power to be found on our criminal law. I do not know when it was passed, but it has been there certainly ever since I have been practising law. And it is there now. It is really more fenced. It is more difficult under this Bill to have a change of venue than it is under the Canadian criminal code to-day, because it is only on the representation of the Attorney General himself—not a mere Crown prosecutor—that the motion can be entertained by the court, and the defendant has power to appeal against the decision of any court of first instance that so decides.

Mr. MILLS. From one Province to another?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am speaking of Ireland. I will deal with the other matter in a moment. The hon. member will allow me to get at it step by step. I am not going to attempt to speak of it all at once. So far, at all events, is there anything so very serious in what is called a Coercion Bill? Is it proper and right, in regard to men who live in the Emerald Isle, under laws which their representatives have had an act and part in making, which are not tyrannical laws, which are fair laws, which are the same laws practically that we have here in this country, some means should be found of enforcing them? Would it be said, would it be admitted, that the English people were fit to govern themselves, or that the Irish people were fit to govern themselves, if they were not equal to emergencies such as these. A free people, freely governed, governed by its own representatives, must in some way endeavor to enforce its laws, and we know that at times the Habeas Corpus Act has been suspended. The thought occurs to me that the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in this country, if I remember aright. Surely it is one of the attributes of free men, dealing through the representatives of the people, to so adjust their laws that law itself shall not be brought into absolute contempt. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in reading from the statement of the Chief Secretary on the introduction of the Bill—not that I at all impute the blame to the hon. member himself, as it is much more likely to have been the inaccurate statement of the Chief Secretary—spoke of the power of proclamation, the power to proclaim. There is the power to proclaim, and why? Because over the great portion of Ireland the law is obeyed. It is only in parts, in the south and southwest, that the law is set at defiance, and it is only in these portions of Ireland that the magisterial powers which have been so objected to are to be enforced. It is not a law for the whole of Ireland. It is not a law for more than the districts where the ordinary law, according to the machinery and with the ordinary means, cannot be enforced. There and there alone, upon the proclamation of the advisers of the Crown, can this special procedure obtain. Now, I come to another power which this Crimes Bill gives, and that power is this: If, in any of the following cases—and to be accurate, if the House will bear with me, I will read the particular cases—if in these cases the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied that any association is formed for the commission of crime—that is one; or, carrying on operations for or by the commission of crimes—that is two; or, encouraging or aiding persons to commit crimes—that is three; or, promoting or inciting to acts of violence or intimidation—that is four; or, interfering with the administration of the law, or disturbing the maintenance of law and of order. Now, if a society is either formed or carried on for any of these purposes, and if there be such a society, would any hon. member in this House; would my hon. friend from Montreal Centre, or my hon. friend who last addressed the House, pretend to say that such a society as that should not be put down? If there be such societies in Ireland, formed for the express purpose of committing crime, then by proclamation those societies may be inhibited. It does not create a new offence. The offence of joining together to commit a crime, is an offence of common law. All it does is—if the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland, upon the advice of those who are responsible to Parliament, says that the circumstances exist, there is a presumption that these societies do exist for that purpose—they may be suppressed; but even that power is limited and guarded, because that proclamation has to be submitted to Parliament within seven days after it is passed, if Parliament is then in Session, or within seven days after the House meets, if it is not then sitting, and if it is disapproved of by the House the proclamation ceases. There is but to my mind—granting there is sufficient cause, as to which I have already said I am not to be the judge—and I do not pretend to state any opinion—there is to my mind only the objectionable feature to which the hon. member who last addressed the House referred. But this Bill is not yet law. The principle of this Bill, it is true, has been assented to upon the second reading; but the details of the measure have yet to undergo the scrutiny which no doubt they will receive in the Committee of the Whole; and how it may emerge from that committee, and finally pass the House of Commons, we do not know. That provision is that, if there cannot be, upon the opinion of both the Attorneys Generals of Ireland and England, a fair trial by a jury in Ireland—and, remember, that does not apply to political offences, but to murder, and offences of that class—if there be offences of that kind, if political feeling runs so high, if, in point of fact, the whole neighborhood are mixed up, as it were, with the men who are accused of the crime, if it be agrarian in character, where it is believed to be a virtue and not a crime by those who have committed it and those who abet it, then in such a case there is power to do what? In the case of murder, arson and breaking and firing into dwelling-houses, to have the trial take place in England. That is the proposition of Lord Salisbury's Government, and what was the proposition of Mr. Gladstone's Government? Mr. Gladstone's proposition was that these men should be tried, not by a jury in England, but by a bench of Irish judges. Which is the better of the two? And I noticed the other day that the Home Secretary for England, Mr. Matthews, thought it might be a good amendment to say that the prisoner should have his choice, either take a bench of Irish judges, or take his trial in England, just as he pleased. But is it so certain that fair play cannot be had before a jury at the Old Bailey? Are the people of England so united anywhere against Irishmen, when we are told that 150,000 of them went out the other day to Hyde Park to protest against this Bill—are they all so unanimously of the opinion that Irishmen ought to be hanged at all events, that there is no hope of fair play to be found before an English jury? I ask again, not venturing an opinion myself, what are the responsible advisers of the Crown to do? What happened the other day in Dublin? What happened at the Assizes referred to by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill)? Simply, no contradiction of facts, no dispute as to the law. I have an extract here of the charge that was given by Mr. Justice Murphy, and perhaps it may be taken as a sample of the whole. The judge stated to the jury: The case is clear, you are privileged, you can do as you please, the evidence is perfectly uncontradicted, but the privilege is yours of disregarding the evidence. After half-an-hour's deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. "Gentlemen," said the judge, "your verdict is contrary to the evidence, but it is your privilege to disregard your evidence and your oaths." Now, if that is anything like what is happening in various parts of Ireland, owing to these political agitations and this agrarian feeling, then the law is paralysed, the ordinary means of convicting those who have been guilty of crime are found not to be effectual, and some other means must be discovered, that means is to offer them a trial in England, or before a commission or bench of Irish judges. There is the Bill which is called a Coercion Bill. But what is it a Coercion Bill for? It is a Bill altering, speaking generally, the procedure in criminal cases for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law of the land. That is undoubtedly one means of doing it. Another means is, give them what they want, give them all they desire, give them, it is said, Home Rule, and then you will not require the Coercion Bill, the ordinary criminal law would be sufficient for the suppression of crime. I have only to point out—I am not standing here as the justifier of Lord Salisbury's Government, but it is only fair that it should be mentioned—that at the same time that a Bill for the enforcement of criminal law is passing through the House of Commons, in the House of Lords there is a Bill to relieve the over-burdened, as some would call them, the rack-rented tenants. But here again, when we look at statistics what do we find? We are astonished to find how much is made of the rack-rented tenants. Sir, there are over half a million tenants in Ireland, and I am speaking by authority when I say that in the last quarter of last year the number of evictions were 522. What percentage is 522 evictions out of half a million tenants? Out of those we have the heartrending picture of the Glenbigh evictions, we have those about which we are to hear more from the emissary who is now on his way here to enlighten the people of Canada. But if we will only look at home have we no sympathy for our overburdened farmers, those men, who, sometimes, have been paying to building societies out of which some hon. members have grown wealthy, 15, 16 and 17 per cent. for money, borrowing at 10 per cent, with fines added on, until it has grown, as we have known in some cases, to 15, 16 and 17 per cent.? We know that would have been impossible in Ireland, and we know that it was only the increase in the value of property in Canada that enabled the farmers to pay these exorbitant rates. Well, is it to be said that we would countenance them in banding together, the honest yeomanry of this country, to resist such payment? It is true, it may be said, that they had promised to pay this interest. That was their contract, and although the rise in the value of the property has enabled them to pay it, would we justify them in banding together and refusing to pay? I think we ought, under these circumstances, to be careful what we are about to do. Now, the position I ask this House to adopt, and the proposition I propose, before I sit down, to place formally in the Speaker's hand, is on the lines of the observations I have endeavored to make. But, I desire it to be perfectly well understood that I am not taking a position for or against this Coercion Bill. I have stated one side, because there have been a number of the members of this House who have told us the other. I have pointed out what this law is. If we are told to deal with the law, if we are to offer an opinion about it, certainly it is only right that we should consider it well, and clearly understand what we are doing. Now, we have obtained our own freedom and our right to govern ourselves, and it behooves us not to invite, by meddling with the affairs of other people, interference in our own concerns. I want to know how any hon. member in this House can undertake to pass such a resolution as this, saying that a particular measure submitted to the British Parliament ought not to be passed—I would like to know what that hon. member will by-and-by say if the British Parliament, with greater power and authority, pass a resolution which will affect our dearest interests and interfere with our local concerns. Surely, if we have a right, with our delegated power under the British North America Act, to say to them: You are wrong in passing that Bill, can we with any consistency deny to the British Parliament the right to deal with our affairs when they think proper? Surely what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; surely it is a poor rule that will not work both ways; surely we will find ourselves in a difficult position. But this is to be said: While our resolution is practically ineffective, while our resolution sent home to Lord Salisbury, if you are going to send it, and to Mr. Parnell and to Mr. Gladstone, will get into the papers and be read and possibly thrown into the paper basket, their resolutions will have practically the effect of law.

Mr. CURRAN. No, no.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is wrong, if he will allow me to say so, when he says "no, no," to that statement. What the Parliament of Great Britain enacts overrides the laws passed by this Parliament. They could determine by statute what our Customs law should be.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to see them try it,

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think they will.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think so.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree that they will not try it, but if they were to try it, I do not know very much what we could say—

Mr. MITCHELL. We are remonstrating.

Mr. McCARTHY. We are doing a little more. We are asked to say by this resolution:

"That this House has learned, with profound regret, of the introduction into the Imperial House of Commons of the Coercion Bill above mentioned, and protests against its adoption, as being subversive of the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland."

That is what we are asked here to vote upon.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will alter that.

Mr. McCARTHY. There has been no suggestion of alteration.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, there has.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the way the matter stands before us now. No matter how we alter it, we shall all find ourselves in this difficulty: You have the right to govern yourselves, nobody is interfering with it; but you are not satisfied with that, you want to govern somebody else to whom you are not responsible.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then this means nothing. It is no good, and it is not intended to effect any result. Is it for the people out of doors? Are we passing these resolutions, are we making these speeches about liberty and right and freedom for Ireland and all the rest of it, for the people out of doors here, and not with any intention of doing the people of Ireland any good? It must be one way or the other, and the hon. member can accept either horn of the dilemma he pleases.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How about yourself?

Mr. McCARTHY. I say we should not interfere. I am making what the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) perfectly well knows is not a popular speech.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. What the hon. gentleman with his knowledge of the constituencies of Ontario from which we both come, would not make, though, perhaps, I am speaking his sentiments. But I say this, that I will not stand here as the representative of my constituency under any false colors or false representations. While I have a large Irish population in my constituency, the confidence of many of whom I have the honor to enjoy, I am not afraid to speak to those men and argue this question fairly and squarely before them, and I think they will agree that the course I propose to ask the House to adopt is after all the best one in the interest of this Dominion. A word has been said against the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), a rebuke has been administered to him for the language used by him with respect to Mr. William O'Brien who is about to come to talk to us and tell us of the iniquities of His Excellency the Governor General. Sir, if the hon. member for Muskoka used strong language, I think perhaps it did credit, if not to his head, certainly to his heart. His Excellency the Governor General is to a certain extent, if not altogether, in the position of a man who cannot defend himself in this country. He is in the position of a man who cannot take the platform and answer William O'Brien, or state his side of the case, and it is on a subject with which we are unfamiliar, and about which the people of this country are not perhaps very well capable of forming a correct judgment. And what will William O'Brien say when he gets here? When we have heard what has to be said, perhaps he will find that the atmosphere of free Canada recognises the rights of both sides, and does not wholly disregard the rights of a man because he happens to occupy a position of authority. Speaking of Lord Lansdowne these were his words:

"Lord Lansdowne thinks he can safely snap his fingers at you because he is 4000 miles away Governor General of Canada. I tell you here to-day that the voice of the Irish nation is loud enough and strong enough to reach him in his palace gates in Ottawa, aye, or if he were to go into the deepest backwoods of an English settlement to hide himself. I warn them here to-day that if French dare to lay a robber hand upon any house of the honest man in the Queen's county, we will carry the war into Canada, we will meet him at his palace gate, and we will make the air ring with his fame as an evictor and an exterminator. We will teach him night and day the wide world over, and from one end of that Dominion of Canada to the other I promise him on the part of the Irish in Canada that wherever he goes he will find Irish hearts and Irish throats that will hoot him and boycott him and hunt him with execrations out of that great and free land."

Is there an hon. member in this House who has read that speech and can say, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has said to-night, that he hopes he will have a patient hearing, and will not be disturbed. I confess I am not able to understand from whence that hope springs. I think that such a statement as that was calculated to arouse the blood of every honest member of this House and of every man who reads it in this country. But, perhaps it is only a specimen of the manner in which the war is being conducted on the other side of the Atlantic; and if that be so, we may not wonder so much at the way in which the law requires amendment. I have endeavored to give the grounds for the conclusion to which I invite this House to arrive. I have only to say now that I have not made an attempt to emulate my hon. friend the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) in his able address; I have not made any attempt to follow the hon. member for North Bruce, (Mr. McNeill), whose speech was an ornament to this House, and a credit to the hon. member himself; I have endeavored to lay down what I believe to be safe principles for our guidance and governance, and I think this House will find that if we depart from the principle of self-government we enjoy, if we invade the rights of other representations, if we undertake to do more than govern ourselves, we shall be bringing trouble on ourselves which, by-and-bye we may have cause to regret. Do we remember—and it is the last observation I propose to make on this subject—that those rents which are so much complained about were fixed by and under the Gladstone Bill in 1881, or could have been fixed. Do we not remember that the judicial settlement, as it were, of the rents is what is now complained of? Do we not know that these tenants enjoy more and better rights and greater privileges than any other tenantry in the world? Do we not know that their tenant right is made as fixed and certain and definite as the landlord's right is, and in many cases is more valuable? Do we not know that, while I admit that that rent, owing to the fall of prices, is higher now than possibly in some cases can be paid, in most instances the landlords are willing, and are bound of necessity, to meet the tenants half way? Then where are the great grievances of which we hear? The contracts were made and I acknowledge that these poor peasants were not in a position to make free contracts with their landlords. I acknowledge that, from their land hunger, as it may be called, their bidding against one another to such an extent in the desire to acquire land, they were agreeing to pay rents which had become impossible to pay. But do we not know that that was the reform effected by Mr. Gladstone's Bill? Do we not know that Mr. Gladstone said, since this is so the courts will settle a fair rent, and they were settled on what was supposed to be a fair basis? To-day it is said that the rents are too high, but so are the rents of every man in this country who made his bargain five or six years ago, because if prices fell there prices have fallen here, and perhaps to a still greater extent. But does that form an excuse for crime? because that and that only is the pertinent point, so far as the present position of affairs is concerned. Now we are asked to send these resolutions, not to our Gracious Sovereign, because we have been told by Mr. Gladstone himself in very plain and unmistakable language, that he wants none of our advice. I saw a statement in a newspaper the other day that Mr. Gladstone invited the opinion of Americans upon this question of Home Rule. But we know that Mr. Gladstone sometimes speaks with greater freedom and with less responsibility than at others. We know he has had to excuse his statements and utterances in that way, but we have a formal statement, not as the hon. member for West Durham said, of a Colonial Secretary merely, but the formal statement of the Government of Mr. Gladstone, telling us in answer to the most respectful resolutions which it was possible for a Parliament to frame or pass on the question of Home Rule, or any other matter, that:

"Her Majesty will always gladly receive the advice of the Parliament of Canada on all matters relating to the Dominion and the administration of its affairs; but with respect to the questions referred to in the Address Her Majesty will, in accordance with the constitution of this country, have regard to the advice of the Imperial Parliament and Ministers, to whom all matters relating to the affairs of the United Kingdom exclusively appertain."

We have taken that hint. We do not address Her Majesty any longer, but like respectful subjects, we get around it and address the Prime Minister. But we propose not only to address the Prime Minister, but to address also the leader of the Opposition and, as there is another minor opposition, Mr. Parnell is to have our opinions as well. I do not know why it is that Lord Hartington, whose following is quite as large as that of Mr. Parnell, is not to be favored with our views on this question; perhaps he is to be put in too. I think we hardly have regard to our own position. I think the great Parliament of this free country, if not at liberty to address the Crown, ought not to be called on to pass an address to any particular individual. I think it better behooves our dignity to omit that last passage. If we must pass an address, if we know so much about this question, if we are so full of burning zeal and knowledge as to press our views on the Parliament of Great Britain, I think we had better allow them to reach the persons for whom they are intended in some other way than this. But for my part, to whomsoever else it may be sent, I shall most certainly vote against sending it to Mr. Parnell. I am not going to say that Mr. Parnell is the associate of murderers, as we are told he is. I am not going to accuse him of having written that letter which, if he did write it, must always make him the most contemptible of all mankind; because we are told that he came down to the House of Commons arrayed in mourning to express his regret for the assassinations in Phoenix Park. And if at that moment he was in communication with the society which had done these men to death, no language I can use, or that any member of this House can use, would be too strong to condemn Mr. Parnell from whatever point of view he may be looked at. But I do say that it hardly agrees with the position we hold to send an address of this kind to Mr. Parnell, who has not taken, up to the last intelligence we have received, the means of freeing himself from the stain which has been cast upon him. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) have already decided in Mr. Parnell's favor. They have already pronounced that he is not the author of that letter, and various reasons are given for coming to that conclusion. I never understood that that letter implied or meant that Mr. Parnell had actually directed the assassination of these men. I apprehend that all that letter means is that Mr. Parnell was in communication with those who had done Lord Cavendish and Mr. Burke to death in Phoenix Park. I would like to know what Mr. Parnell's course is. The London Times has, with care and deliberation, published reasons for coming to the conclusion that Mr. Parnell and his associates—but I will read the deliberate words of the Times published in the early part of March:

"Be the ultimate goal of these men what it will, they are content to march towards it in the company of murderers; murderers provide their funds; murderers share their inmost councils; murderers have gone forth from the league offices to set their bloody work afoot and have presently returned to consult the constitutional leaders on the advancement of the cause."

This statement was made with deliberation; the conclusion was argued out for every man to read for himself—proved, so to speak, from the writings and speeches of these men themselves; the day and date and place of publication given to those who choose to study it. Mr. Parnell has been challenged, and there is no other way open to a man thus assailed than to bring the so-called libeller to justice; and finally these words—emphatic enough in all conscience, deliberate enough, clear enough, unmistakable in their meaning—have been followed up by the publication of the letter. And when Mr. Parnell gets up in the House of Commons and denies being the author of it, he is told by the great Thunderer: Mr. Parnell, your big words do not frighten us; we have not published this statement without care and without examination, and we challenge you to come into a place and give us your oath on the subject and undergo a cross-examination which will enable the people of England and the people of the world, no matter what the jury may do, to decide as to your guilt or innocence. And it has been pointed out to Mr. Parnell that he can bring that matter before an Irish jury, as we know that he can, before a Scotch jury or before an English jury, but Mr. Parnell refuses the ordeal. Then, Sir, if Mr. Parnell continues to refuse that, what will be the verdict of mankind? The hon. gentleman pronounced in advance in favor of his innocence; and certainly if Mr. Parnell took the course which I venture to say an honorable man ought to take, we ought to esteem him innocent until he is proved to be guilty; but if Mr. Parnell denies to his character the only means of its justification, the verdict of mankind and the verdict of posterity will be in favor of the charge being true. Under these circumstances ought we to send this document to Mr. Parnell? Ought we to show that we accept the ipse dixit of one or two gentlemen who seem to think they know all about this matter? Ought we not, at any rate, to obliterate his name from the resolution, even if we think proper to send it to the Prime Minister and to Mr. Gladstone? I think, perhaps, we would be doing more justice to ourselves if, in the event of the resolution receiving the assent of the House, that course should be adopted. I will therefore move, in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" in the main motion be struck out, and the following added instead thereof:—"this House, while justly jealous of any interference in the local affairs of Canada within the jurisdiction of this Parliament or of the Legislative Assemblies of the several Provinces of the Dominion, either by the Imperial Parliament or other Legislative body of the British Empire, cannot without inviting such interference fail to recognise it as within the exclusive right of the Imperial Parliament to legislate respecting matters solely appertaining to the domestic affairs of the United Kingdom; than which none can be more absolutely of local concern than the due and proper administration of the law within the bounds of Great Britain and Ireland.

"That, therefore, it is inexpedient and unwise for this House to express any opinion or in anywise to interfere with the Imperial Parliament as to the course to be adopted by it respecting the Bill now before the House of Commons for the amendment of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland)"

Mr. CLAYES. Just one word I desire to say in reply to the hon. member for North Simcoe. He opened his remarks by speaking of our duty and our relations to the Empire and the Home Government. Now, the hon. gentleman represents a political party which owes its strength and power largely to sentiments which have their origin in Imperial memories—sentiments which have to do with the honor of the Empire. I am not one of those who believe that that party dominates in this country because alone of the superior skill of its leader or because of the questionable influences which are said to be used and which I believe are used to move and determine the action of individuals; but I believe it dominates because the country as a whole believes that that party, being the Tory party and devoted to the past, is opposed to movement and to change, and distrust the Liberals because it is the party of progress, and progress involves change. It is because of that that the party is strong, and that the right hon. gentleman stands here representing, as he does with great ability, the Tory party. If that be true, and if a question comes up which involves the honor and integrity of the Empire, its peace and security, then I ask you, being a part of the Empire and being a people moved by sentiment, when sentiment has so much to do with our political action and opinions, whether it is not proper for us to approach the Home Government and ask them to consider what our experience has been in the way of Home Rule, and whether the history of the past is not such as to induce them to pause and question the propriety of passing another measure of coercion. I would ask them to pause before taking such action, in view of the fact that for 700 or 800 years Ireland has been treated to repeated policies of coercion, and time has repeatedly told the story of her people trodden down, outraged, their loyalty destroyed by virtue of that very policy which the present British Government proposes again to adopt. Is it not proper that we should approach the Government at home and say that we, like themselves, as citizens of the Empire, men capable of comprehending a question like this, appeal to them, from our own experience of the blessings of Home Rule, to adopt that policy which, in our opinion, would result in making a disloyal people loyal as it has done to the same people here. The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Mc Carthy) said he did not believe we had the right to express our views upon this question. He said we had enough to do to mind our own affairs. He did not know enough about the question. Well, there is a certain knowledge of this question in which I think the hon. gentleman is wanting. He shows a knowledge of the technicalities of this question; he has stated them with great ability as a lawyer; but there is another knowledge which he does not possess, there is an ignorance for which there is no cure. It is the ignorance of heart. Now, Mr. Speaker, coercion has had its influence upon the character of Irishmen, and the hon. gentleman has given us an exhibition of that influence. He spoke as a representative of the oppressors of Ireland. He is a representative of the little minority of Irishmen who have been sustained in their oppression by the power of England, and who in a great measure have inspired the action of England in all its coercive measures. The hon. gentleman has expressed honestly and ably opinions thoroughly opposed to the welfare of the country as a whole. The hon. gentleman is one of those who perpetuate in this country the quarrels of the old? Why is it that these quarrels should be imported here? Why is it that we should have established here a powerful organisation, the organisation which I presume he represents, the Orange lodge? What ground is there here for such an institution—an institution that simply exists by virtue of ages of experience in Ireland, ages of opposition and ages of oppression to a great and powerful Church, which, in Ireland, has been subjected to the greatest suffering. These men come here and keep up their organisation, because they must have something to remind them of the state of things that existed at home. The question before us is whether we ought not to send our voices over to England, asking the people of that country to adopt a policy for Ireland, which in this country has operated so admirably in making Irishmen the most loyal people in the Empire. Some of them, in fact, have not only become loyal to the Empire, but have completely forgotten the authors of the wrongs their country has suffered. They have forgotten the fact that the Tory party in England—of which the Tory party in this country has inherited all the traditions—has been the instrument of all the wrongs from which Ireland has suffered. They not only become loyal and bow the head, but they forget the old story and become of Tories the best in the land. Three or four of them have spoken here to-day. We have had the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), and an hon. gentleman from away over on the Pacific, and an hon. gentleman from half way there—all of whom have joined the Tory party and all of whom are Irishmen, and Celts and Catholics. Why, their memory of the wrongs their country has suffered has completely faded away. Not only have they become loyal to the Empire, but they have become loyal to the party of oppression. Surely after that experience, we ought more than ever to feel it to be our duty to go to England and tell the people of that country what a wonderful transformation Home Rule in Canada has effected.

Mr. DAVIN. I had hoped not to have addressed the House on this question. I had hoped that we should have reached a division half-an-hour ago; but, after the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I find myself compelled to make a remark or two; and, as I have risen to my feet, I may possibly venture to ask the indulgence of the House while I enter into the question which has been already discussed at some length. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down is laboring under a complete delusion. He begins by identifying in many respects the Liberal-Conservative party here with the Tory party in England, and he is also under a historical mistake in supposing that all the oppression he deplors as having been dealt out to Ireland was dealt out to it by the Tory party, because the Whig party, which I suppose he would identify himself with, was in power in England at the time most of the Coercion Acts were passed. I rather think that the speech of the hon. gentleman, and indeed, if I may be bold enough to say so, many of the speeches which have been made on this question, seem to me to show a complete misapprehension of what is the disease from which Ireland suffers. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that if a Home Rule Bill were passed, if Home Rule were given to Ireland, you would then minister to her diseased mind and pluck from her memory its rooted sorrow; but if you had Home Rule in Ireland to-morrow, you would have there the same number of tenants as exist to-day, you would have about the same number of landlords. By merely passing a Home Rule Bill, you could not execute a transformation scene, and change the whole political and social condition of Ireland. Does any man suppose that the mere fact of having Home Rule would make the peasant who is now discontented, contented, would make the peasant who now thinks he ought not to pay his rent, pay it?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Bothwell says yes; but I notice that when my hon. friend says yes to anything, it generally turns out that facts do not justify his affirmation. The disease in Ireland is a complicated one. It is inherited from successive confiscations; it is inherited from a state of things by which men, different in religion, different in race and different in social instincts, were placed by an unhappy fate to govern a country, a large portion of the population divided from them by this triple wall, and, if the condition of Ireland is to be dealt with in such a way as to make that country peaceful, as to make it happy, as to make it prosperous, then you must go deeper into the evils than by merely passing a Home Rule measure. I think it is not undesirable to make remarks like these, because it is hardly creditable to this Dominion of Canada, and to a great Parliament such as this, a Parliament which my hon. friend the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) very properly described as the first Parliament after the Imperial Parliament itself, it is not creditable that we should discuss a question like this large Irish question and not go deeper than the surface, and think, like people orating in a debating society, that, by passing a measure like this, all the ills that afflict Ireland would be swept away. I am of opinion that it is desirable that a measure of local self-government should be given to Ireland, but I think, before any local self-government is given to the country, the Imperial Parliament should pass such measures as would help to get rid of the real causes of the discontent, because, if it be left to the local government—supposing you had a constitution there which would leave it to the local government to deal with these evils between landlord and tenant, of which we hear so much—then I am afraid that there would not be that measure of justice dealt out to the one side which would be desirable. Therefore, it would be, in my opinion, very improper to pass a Home Rule measure, unless you also have a measure dealing with the land. A comprehensive measure dealing with the land should accompany any measure of Home Rule, and, of course, I think that any measure which should be passed, dealing with Home Rule, ought carefully to guard the rights and liberties of the minority, so that when we are asked to send a message across the water to have a Home Rule measure passed, we are asking a thing to be done that is complicated, difficult, onerous, and requiring the greatest reflection and care.—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. member will pardon my interrupting him, I believe that a number of members on both sides of the House are anxious to leave to-night on the 11 o'clock train. That being the case, I do not think there is any chance of this debate being finished to night, unless those gentlemen were obliged to remain. I would, therefore, if my hon. friend will pardon the suggestion, ask him to allow the debate to be adjourned, and to stand over till Monday, and be the first Order of the Day, if that meets the view of the House.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned, to stand the first Order for Monday.

PAPERS IN REGARD TO THE FISHERY QUESTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the house. He said: I may say that my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries promised the papers relating to the fisheries question to-day, or on Monday at the latest. We have only to-day obtained permission to bring down the last papers which we have. We have obtained that permission to-day, so that all the papers will be laid on the Table on Monday.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 25th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—QUEEN'S, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. SKINNER. On motion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) it was ordered, on the 15th inst, that the returning officer for the county of Queen's, N.B., be ordered to transmit forthwith to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the poll books and other papers connected with the late election in that district. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has now the papers, and only awaits the order of the House to produce them. I would, therefore, move :

That the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery be ordered to attend at the Table forthwith, with the poll books, certificate of returns, ballots and all other papers used and connected with the late election for the electoral district of Queen's, New Brunswick, and returned to him by John R. Dunn, the returning officer for said district at said election, pursuant to the Order of this House made on the 15th instant.

Motion agreed to, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery ordered to attend with the papers.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) respecting procedure in criminal cases. He said : The Bill is intended to regulate the law respecting appeals in criminal cases. The principal feature is that no appeal will be had to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from the courts of last resort in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC STORES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 20) respecting public stores. He said : The object is to enable stores which belong to the different Departments to be marked in such a way that they can be identified ; also to establish the principle that the marks to be put on Government stores are prima facie evidence that they are the property of the Government, and to provide penalties for counterfeiting or obliterating the marks or improperly marking goods. The same provision exists with regard to naval and military stores.

Mr. BLAKE. If this Bill is introduced in consequence of defalcations we should have some account of their character and extent.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not introduced so much with regard to that, as in connection with missing articles belonging to the public departments, more especially the Department of Railways. It is extremely difficult to prove such articles which are scattered over the country.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC MORALS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 21) respecting offences against public morals and public convenience. He said : The object of the Bill is to add to the provisions of chapter 52, 49 Victoria. It consists of adding to the clause of dealing with idiots and imbecile women, the words " insane women." A Bill of that character has recently passed the Ontario Legislature. It is one of an excellent character, and I hope the House will see fit to adopt it. It also provides for restoring the provisions of the previous Bill, as it left this House, in regard to seduction under promise of marriage, making the age of the woman who may have recourse to law in this respect, twenty-one, while the male is liable at the age of eighteen. This was changed in the Senate so as to make the age of the man twenty-one, while no woman could have recourse after the age of eighteen. This is the provision of the Bill, with the addition of the insane woman to those protected by the law.

Mr. DAVIN.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUEEN'S, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have now the honor to inform the House that, in obedience to the order of the House of this day, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is in attendance with the poll-books, certificates, &c., connected with the late election for the electoral district of the county of Queen's, N.B.

Mr. SKINNER moved that the papers produced by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery concerning the late election and poll held in and for the electoral district of the county of Queen's, N.B., be now read, saving the poll-books and ballots.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. We desire everything except the poll-books and the ballots. The other things, I presume, will be the returns from the deputy returning officers to the returning officer. It is not necessary actually to read them. We only want to get them on the Votes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Take them as read ?

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to enquire of the Minister of Finance whether he is in a position to give the House any information as to when he will bring down the Estimates and deliver his Budget Speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman that information at present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose we may assume that the hon. gentleman cannot do it this week.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly not.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest that we should dispose of the Private Bills, so as to allow them to go to the several committees. I observe that they are all printed in both languages.

Mr. BLAKE. I noticed that these were marked as printed, but, as I have none of them on my file, I have just sent for them with a view to agree to some arrangement of this kind, but I have not seen them in print.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not seen any of them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest that we should go through the unopposed orders on the paper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Unopposed questions ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not mean the questions, because, of course, you can answer them if you like. I mean the unopposed notices. The hon. gentleman will see that Monday is the only possible day for getting through those notices for a week, because on other private days we stop at six o'clock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By the unanimous consent of the House and for the purpose of forwarding the business, I shall have no objection to do that. Of course, any one hon. member can object.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see all the private Bills are railway Bills. Perhaps the leader of the Opposition would allow them to be passed, and to go before the Railway Committee. They will require to be posted up for eight days.

Mr. BLAKE. The difficulty is that, if these Bills are to take the second reading without being printed, it is a pure formality. We have not the slightest opportunity of forming a judgment upon them, and it does not appear that we are at a stage of the Session where there is any great necessity for such a course.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then we will take the questions by members, and then the unopposed motions, and then go on with the debate.

SUBWAY TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to construct a subway from Prince Edward Island to the mainland, in order to secure fulfilment of the terms of union between Canada and the Island of Prince Edward?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must ask the hon. gentleman to let that question stand, as I have not my papers here. I will point out, however, that the hon. gentleman must strike out all after the word "mainland."

WHARF AT KAMOURASKA.

Mr. DESSAINT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed this year with the works already commenced for the building of a wharf at Kamouraska?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No decision has yet been taken on this question.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KENTVILLE, N.S.

Mr. BORDEN asked, What steps have been taken toward the construction of a public building at Kentville, Nova Scotia, for which Parliament voted the sum of four thousand dollars last Session? If nothing has yet been done, what is the intention of the Government regarding the matter?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. An officer was sent down there to look at certain sites that were pointed out as likely to be proper ones. The officer came back, and afterwards a representation was made by a number of residents in favor of another lot, but negotiations have not yet been completed on the subject.

HOOP NETS ON THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to change the present fishery regulations so as to allow hoop nets to be used in the River St. Lawrence from the foot of Wolf and Howe Islands to Montreal for the capture of sturgeon, catfish, dogfish, bull-heads, eels, &c., between the 1st of September and the 1st of June in each year?

Mr. FOSTER. A numerously-signed petition has been presented asking for the change referred to, and it is at present engaging the attention of the Government?

SUBSTITUTES FOR BUTTER.

Mr. BAIN, in the absence of Mr. FISHER, asked, Whether any oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter prohibited by the Act 49 Vic., chap. 42, has been seized or confiscated, and whether any person has been prosecuted or punished under that Act?

Mr. BOWELL. No seizures of butterine or oleomargarine having been made by the Department, no one could have been prosecuted or punished under that Act?

STATION-HOUSE BETWEEN ST. CHARLES AND ST. JOSEPH DE LÉVIS.

Mr. GUAY asked, Whether tenders were called for the building of the station-house on the Branch Railway from St. Charles to St. Joseph de Lévis? If so, what were the names of the parties who tendered and the amounts of the several tenders? To whom was the contract for the building of the said station house awarded?

Mr. POPE. Tenders were called for. The names of the tenderers were: E. T. Nesbit, Quebec; D. Roy & Frère, Lévis; and Philibert Ouellette, Lévis. The amount of the tenders were: $1,473, $1,375, and $1,260. The contract was awarded to Philibert Ouellette, Lévis, at $1,260.

FLOODS AT MONTREAL AND ITS VICINITY.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether the Government have received one of the Reports of the Commission of Engineers appointed to enquire as to the periodical floods at Montreal and its vicinity? Were the Commissioners instructed to extend their enquiries to other localities which suffer in like manner from such floods, such as the town and parish of Berthier, St. Bartholomy, Laprairie, St. Lambert, Longueuil, Boucherville, &c.? If the Government have received the said report, when will the same be laid before this House? If not as yet received, is it the intention of the Government to order a report to be made of operations up to date, and to submit the same to this House?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A report dated the 31st of July, 1886, was received from the Commissioners appointed to enquire as to the cause of the floods at Montreal, concerning the building of a pier for the protection of the district lying south of the Lachine canal, the cost to be $120,000. On the 28th of October the Commissioners suggested to keep the River St. Lawrence free from ice from Sorel to Three Rivers by means of tug-boats specially adapted to such service, but the season being too far advanced it was impossible to attempt the experiment. The Commissioners are not limited in the extent of their powers.

BAGGAGE PASSING THROUGH THE CUSTOMS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, in the absence of Mr. MITCHELL, asked, Whether the Government have rescinded in whole or in part the Customs regulation recently issued in relation to the examination of the baggage of passengers coming into Canada? If so, to what extent?

Mr. BOWELL. The order referred to by the question has been withdrawn.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM IN MANITOBA.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. WATSON, asked, Is it the intention of the Government to establish and put into active operation an experimental farm, during this season, in the Province of Manitoba?

Mr. CARLING. The question of establishing an experimental farm in Manitoba is now under the consideration of the Government.

IMPROVEMENTS ON WHITE MUD RIVER, MANITOBA.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. WATSON, asked, Is it the intention of the Government to continue the improvements on White Mud River and Lake Manitoba during the coming season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The dredge which was purchased by the Department has been placed at Westbourne, on White Mud River, and is available for the work, should such be ordered. The order has not yet been given.

THE JUDGE OF EAST ASSINIBOIA.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia) asked, For what reasons the residence of the Judge of East Assiniboia has been removed from the centre of the district at Whitewood, to the western boundary of Manitoba?

Mr. THOMPSON. The residence of the Judge was not removed, but before the Judge had time to take up his residence at Whitewood, in accordance with the Order in Council fixing that as the residence, it was ascertained that by his residing at Moosomin a larger number of people in the judicial district would be served than by his living at Whitewood; for that reason the place of residence was changed.

FRAUDS ON THE CUSTOMS.

Mr. GUAY asked, Whether the Government are aware that the Customs officers have found, in a manufactory near Quebec, whiskey put up in casks marked as containing vinegar, and ready for delivery to the trade; that the said whiskey had been passed free of duty, under pretence that it was to be used for the making of vinegar? How long has this fraudulent system been carried on with the knowledge of the officials? What steps do the Government intend to take in the matter?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Government is aware that a quantity of whiskey in barrels, marked as vinegar, was found in a factory near Quebec. The next portion of the question, asking how long this fraudulent system has been carried on with the knowledge of the officials, is an improper question, to which, as it implies guilty knowledge on the part of the officials, I would not be obliged to answer. But, for the information of the hon. gentleman, I may say that two of the present officers in the service have been looking into this matter, and after full enquiry they exonerate the officers there from any knowledge of or participation in this fraud. With regard to the steps the Government have taken in the matter, of course the quantity of liquor found has been seized, and another quantity that was supposed to come from there has been seized in Montreal, and the plant in connection with the manufacture is also under seizure; and the Government will take such further steps for the protection of the revenue as may be indicated by the Act.

FORTIFICATIONS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Has the Government received a copy of the report of Colonel O'Brien, of the Royal Engineers, on the fortifications of British Columbia? If so, will it be laid on the Table of the House at an early date?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Department of Militia and Defence has not yet received a copy of the report of Colonel O'Brien on the defences of British Columbia.

Mr. CARLING.

CAPITAL ACCOUNT OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the sum charged to capital account of the Intercolonial Railway up to date of 20th April, 1887?

Mr. POPE. $44,197,451. Of the above, $11,171,894 was expended prior to 30th June, 1887.

EXPLORATION OF THE YUKON RIVER REGION.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to despatch an exploring expedition up the Yukon River this season; if so, whether any practical gold miners will be selected to accompany the expedition, with a view of testing the value of the auriferous deposit in the regions to be explored?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The Government have despatched an expedition for the exploration of the Yukon River country. The chief of the expedition is Dr. George Dawson, Assistant Director of the Geological Survey, than whom no one in America is more competent to test the value of auriferous deposits.

DEEP SEA FISHERIES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to continue, this year, the exploration of the deep sea fisheries on the coast of British Columbia?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the intention of the Government, this year, to renew the exploration of the deep sea fisheries on the coast of British Columbia.

TELEGRAPH SIGNAL SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to extend the telegraph signal service to Johnstone Straits, Alberni, Cape Real and Port San Juan? If so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

LIGHTING THE STRAITS OF JUAN DE FUCA.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a lighthouse at the entrance to the Straits of Juan de Fuca, either at Bouilla Point or Port San Juan? If so, when?

Mr. FOSTER. The matter is at present under the consideration of the Government.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT PORT SAN JUAN.

Mr. GORDON asked, Whether the Government have considered the necessity of constructing a harbor of refuge at Port San Juan, for the safety of sealers, tug boats and other vessels and steamers engaged in the commerce of the Dominion on the Pacific coast?

Mr. FOSTER. This matter is also under the consideration of the Government.

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND MONTREAL COTTON COMPANY.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) asked, Has there been any dispute between the Department of Customs and the manager of the Montreal Cotton Company with regard to duties on goods imported by said company?

Mr. BOWELL. I scarcely understand what the hon. gentleman means by the word "dispute." There has been no "dispute" between the manager of the Montreal Cotton Company and the Department of Customs. There have been some irregularities, to which I have called the attention, not of the manager, but of the directors, and they have promised to put the matter right. What the decision of the Department will be, I am not at present able to say, as I have not received all the papers.

STATION HOUSE IN THE PARISH OF CAP ST. IGNACE.

Mr. DESSAINT, in the absence of Mr. CHOQUETTE, moved for :

Copies of tenders received by the Department of Railways for the building of a station house on the Intercolonial Railway, in the Parish of Cap St. Ignace, County of Montmagny.

Mr. POPE. There is no need for this return. There were tenders received, but the specifications were misunderstood, the tenders being from $4,000 to $6,000. New specifications are being prepared, and tenders will be invited in a few days. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Curran (p. 46) on the subject of Home Rule for Ireland, the proposed motion of Mr. McNeill (p. 55) in amendment thereto, and the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy (p. 98) in amendment to the said amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker : It is with great unwillingness that I intrude myself on the House on any question not connected with North-West affairs; but there are a number of hon. gentlemen listening to me who will easily understand that when a question like this comes before the House, I having taken a deep interest in the general question to which it belongs, it would be very hard, and would cause some misunderstanding, if I did not express my opinion upon it; and, therefore, I will crave the indulgence of hon. gentlemen while I make a few remarks on the resolution and the amendments thereto now before the House. When I rose, Sir, on Friday night, I was led to speak on a topic raised by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Claves), who, asserting that the Tory party in England had dealt out nothing but cruelty to Ireland, gave the House the idea that all the Coercion Acts passed were passed by the Tory party. I knew that that was not the case, and, on the impulse of the moment, I questioned it. I have since analysed the Coercion Acts passed since the year 1800, and I find that in that period the number passed by the Liberal party nearly double the number passed by the Tory party; and I may say this, that the beneficent legislation of Mr. Gladstone, with regard to the land, was anticipated by Mr. Disraeli in 1852, when he laid plans on the Table of the House embodying the recommendations of the Devon Commission; and one of the most useful measures passed in regard to Ireland was Lord Ashbourne's Act, under which something like $5,000,000 has been lent to the people of Ireland, as much more is about to be lent, and there are applications for as much again. The House is aware that Lord Ashbourne was Mr. Disraeli's Attorney General. So the hon. member for Missisquoi may feel a little more charitable towards the Conservative or Tory party, either in Canada or in England. In fact, Sir, the most liberal-minded Minister that ever led the House of Commons in England, the man who had the most enlightened views of Ireland, the man who, if he had had his way would, I believe, have settled the Irish question something like eighty-seven years ago, was Mr. Pitt. Now, Sir, during this debate we have had many able speeches, and two remarkable speeches: I allude to the very able speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and the cold, clear, logical utterance of my hon. friend the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). But, Sir, I should like to call the attention of the House to what I was about to point out on Friday night, the fact that there are difficulties in Ireland with which, to deal effectively, will require years, and more than one, probably more than two or three Acts of Parliament. At the same time, in the sense in which the word grievances has been used from the time of the first protest against Poyning's Law to the time of O'Connell's agitation for Catholic Emancipation, and from that time to the time of Mr. Gladstone's legislation, there is no such thing at present in Ireland. At the present time in Ireland there is not a vestige of disability; yet how comes it that we have agrarian crimes? How comes it that the people are discontented? From the time of Strongbow and Fitzstephen the Irish Celt has fought in one fashion or another with the powerful intruders for the land, and those who were not and are not Celts, but Celtised, have taken up the struggle in the same spirit. When the Norman went into Ireland he found him there in the agrarian partnership of the clan, and that sense of property of dubious value still lingers in the mind of the Irish peasant. When we read in Irish history of chiefs and leading men having been forced to transplant and move westward, the reader generally thinks, probably, that the leading man only felt the sense of dispossession. The fact is that all his followers felt that they too were dispossessed. I will call the attention of the House for a moment to the language of Mr. Froude, because it is the language of a man who writes very adversely of Ireland, but still the language of a very well-informed historian. Speaking of an opportunity for Wentworth, Charles I's great Minister, to do a little plundering, he says :

"The state of tenures created an opportunity. The Commission was appointed to survey the lands, and to trace and enquire into the titles of their professing owners. In strict construction, four-fifths of Connaught was found to belong to the Crown; and Wentworth meditated taking advantage of the situation to make a new plantation. The intention, scarcely concealed, following so soon on the confiscation of the six counties, flung the Irish of the old blood into a frenzy of rage. Religious indulgence might satisfy the Anglo-Norman Catholics of the old settlements. The passions of the true Irishman were for the land, and he saw the land in large slices passing away from him to the stranger. What to him was King or Parliament, Calvinism, or Anglicanism. The one fact, to which all else was nothing, was coming home to his heart, that the Englishman, by force or fraud, was filching from him the inheritance of his fathers."

And if we turn to page 217 of the first volume of Mr. Froude, we find him writing as follows :—

"When the State sold lands to raise money, or allowed men to sell to one another, it became necessarily more indulgent to neglect. But if, on the one hand, London speculators, or Crown favorites, could not be prevented from acquiring large estates in Ireland, or the other, the entire object of the confiscation was defeated if the population were left unshepherded; or if, for the landlords' convenience, the sons and grandsons of the old owners were left in possession as tenants retaining their local influence, still, to all intents and purposes, the practical rulers; and of the conquest, no result was left but the annual exasperation of the returning rent-day. An ownership, which consisted merely in robbing a poor country of a percentage of the fruits of its industry, was no benefit but a curse; and, although it might have been impossible to revive the laws of Henry VIII, a wise settlement of Ireland would have included a tax so heavy on all rents sent out of the kingdom, as would have compelled proprietors to sell their lands to others who would make their estates their own."

The first quotation refers to the time of Charles I, and the second to the time of the Revolution; but this state of things was going on all the time, and the tradition of it has lingered in the minds of the people, a people of great longevity and tenacious of tradition. Cromwell's war was followed by the war of William. William was an enlightened statesman who desired to carry on that war with as much consideration as possible, and if the ascendancy party in the Irish Parliament had allowed him he would, at a later time, have dealt out a beneficent policy; but although he was strong and victorious, he was unable to carry out the stipulations of the Treaty of Limerick, and the result of the violation of that treaty was that the Celtic gentry went over to France and Spain and the armies of the continent, and won, and their descendants have won, the very highest places in diplomacy and in the career of arms. The great French general, whose name is so dear to France, Marshal McMahon, is the descendant of one of these men who thus went out of the country after that unhappy transaction; and I remember—and it will probably interest those gentlemen from Lower Canada whom I see around me, to learn—that when, during the Franco-Germanic war, I had the pleasure of seeing Marshal McMahon, his face strongly reminded me of the face of an Irish gentleman. He had all the facial characteristics of an Irishman. The result was that the more Celtic portion of the people were deprived of their natural leaders. The legislation of Mr. Gladstone, as I have said, was beneficent legislation, but it must be confessed that it has not had a chance. When that legislation was passed, as much was given to Ireland as some of her strongest friends who had fought unselfishly for that country had hoped for; and if that legislation had had a chance, if the people had, under it, set about their work with patience, industry, and steadiness, if they had availed themselves of an instrument, which, I believe, they had, under these Acts, to become landed proprietors, there is not the slightest doubt that there would be a very much more prosperous state of things in Ireland than exists at present. But if the statistics are looked at, it will be found a great mistake to suppose that Ireland has receded. On the contrary, she has, and is progressing. Although she has had some bad years, there is no doubt that in the past quarter of a century she has made steady progress; but on the heels of the Gladstone legislation, what happened? There sprang up another agitation, as the result of which the people are being educated into carrying on a kind of war; they are being educated to make struggling and agitating a necessity to their existence; and if you were to give them Home Rule, how do you suppose these people would become at once denuded of their habits, and settle down into ways of peaceful and quiet industry? So that, with regard to the agitation that is going on at present, it is desirable that it should be stopped by rendering it unnecessary. I said I am in favor of local government for Ireland—I mean a system of local government which would leave her connection with the Empire intact, and I believe that a local government which would give an opportunity to her aspiring spirits to have the direction of their country's local affairs—a local government such as our Provinces have here—would, I believe, terminate this agitation. Nor would there be any difficulty in now ceding local government to Ireland. That government would have been granted to her long ago, if some of her leaders, who have brought themselves into prominence on this Home Rule question, had not used language that alarmed, not only Englishmen and Scotchmen, but the best friends of Ireland the world over. Had they shown themselves perfectly loyal to the Empire in word and action, there is not an Englishman, from one end of England to the other, who would not have been ready to do all in his power to secure to Ireland local self-government. Let me say one word about the schemes of independence that I sometimes see sketched. For dark decades Ireland's soil has been wet with blood and tears; she has had a fearful baptism of sorrow for centuries, but no bloody era through which she has passed would be equal to the disastrous results that would follow any attempt to bring about independence in that country. What is meant by this phrase Home Rule?—because my hon. friend who moved the motion did not explain to us either the meaning of Home Rule or his plan. Is it meant that the people are to be governed by their own representatives in the country to which they belong—in the country for which their forefathers fought and toiled, and in which their forefathers distinguished themselves? If so, Ireland has Home Rule at present. I consider that Ireland is governed by a Parliament that is her own Parliament, as much as it is the Parliament of England or Scotland. I consider that the Empire belongs as much to Irishmen as it does to Englishmen or Scotchmen. England is an old country, so is Ireland, so is Scotland, but the British Empire is but of yesterday. Go back a couple of hundred years, and where is the British Empire? The British Empire has been built during the past two centuries by Irishmen, Scotchmen and Englishmen, and if you go to India and the battle-fields of the continent, you will find Irishmen fighting side by side with Englishmen and Scotchmen, and not distinguishing themselves less than their brothers in arms. You will find them in every walk of life, active and fruitful—as statesmen, as literary men, as barristers, as mechanics, as laborers. In every walk of life you find the Irishman doing his part in building up the Empire during these two centuries. There is not a quarry from which a stone has been taken to build up that grandiose structure, where you will not find Irishmen working side by side with Englishmen and Scotchmen; there is not a stone in the majestic edifices of the British Empire in which there is not the mark of an Irish chisel. The man who would try to make an Irishman feel that he is an alien in the British Empire is either an ignoramus or a scoundrel. Therefore, if you want Home Rule you cannot want it in contradistinction to alien rule, because you have Home Rule already, and for that reason I prefer the phrase local government. Now, pursuing the line of thought that I was on a moment ago, let me take the words Celt and Saxon. I saw in a newspaper I was reading awhile ago the phrase "The Saxons must go." Why, if you were to go into Ireland at the present minute, and try to find out the Saxons in order to get rid of them, it would be a very difficult piece of work; it would be a piece of work very much like Shylock had to perform when he was told to take his pound of flesh; it would be a very difficult job indeed, just as difficult a job as it would be if you were to go into England in order to get rid of the Celts in England. England is largely Celtic. Long before the recent infusions, England, as Matthew Arnold points out, was largely Celtic; and in Ireland, as Froude says, the races are so mixed—Saxon, Norman, Dane, and so on—that it is very hard indeed to find a pure Celt. So there is no ethnological base for those hatreds that are sought to be fanned as between Saxon and Celt. So early as the fourteenth century, there was a statute of Kilkenny passed forbidding Englishmen, English settlers, that is, Norman settlers, to assume Irish names. Therefore, names are no guide. A name may show that a man must infallibly have other blood than that of a Celt in him—as for instance, we have the name of the distinguished leader of the Opposition. That is not an Irish name; it is a Norman name. But many Irishmen who have Irish names, really Celtic names, are actually the descendants of men who assumed those names and became, according to a Latin proverb, more Irish than the Irish themselves. Then, religion is no test, although I saw that a late mayor of Dublin put out the banner "Faith and Fatherland." Of course, if that is put out, they ought to expel Mr. Parnell right away, and they will have to get rid of the Floods and the Grattans and the Currans, and a great number of their distinguished men. But I want to emphasise this still more. Tipperary is supposed to be the most characteristically Irish county in Ireland. What are the facts? The fact is that Tipperary was colonised by Cromwell's Ironsides. How are they Catholic to-day? I will tell you. The miserable and abominable way in which the English Church was exploited—men taking orders in it and not doing any duties in connection therewith—left that county as it left other parts of Ireland, to the charge entirely of the more zealous Catholic priest, and the more zealous Catholic priest took an interest in education, and, in the course of two or three generations, the descendants of those Ironsides had lapsed into the faith against which their forefathers had fought so bitterly and so strenuously. Thus neither name nor religion will prove that a man is a Celt, and there is consequently no historical and no ethnological base for these unchristian, and I will say, unnational hatreds that I have seen advocated and expressed in various quarters. Therefore, on sentimental grounds, although that is the ground I find some people put it on, there is no reason whatever for granting a local Government or Home Rule to Ireland. Is there on practical grounds? Yes, Sir, on practical grounds it would be useful. I will give an instance to the House. There is a railway from Cork to Bandon. It is a little one-horse railway, something like a railway would be from Ottawa to Pembroke. I was assured by one of the promoters of that railway that it cost as much to get that railway Bill through the committees in London as it cost to build the line. That is a thing that ought to be got rid of. Can there be any objection to having an Assembly to deal with a matter like that in Ireland? Besides, I think that, although the Imperial Parliament is taking many measures for the development of the material resources of that country, a local Assembly would have more time to devote to those matters. What a local Assembly could do was shown in the eighteenth century, when they had a Parliament, emasculated indeed, but still a local Parliament. In the middle of the eighteenth century Ireland was a country of all but limitless pasture. At the time of Arthur Young's visit, about a century ago:

"A change had set in. Yet he found one grass farm of ten thousand acres, and not a few sheep walks of five or six thousand acres. It is important to note that it was not natural adaptability which brought about this state of things. One cause was the scarcity of labor, consequent on the incessant wars of the seventeenth century. But there followed on the Treaty of Limerick three-quarters of a century of repose. Population increased, but still cattle farming was continued. The penal laws prohibited Catholics from buying or leasing lands. Competition between tenants was kept down. Thus the breaking up of farms was prevented. The markets of England and the Colonies were closed against the Irish farmer, and he had no motive for increasing production. Besides, the disqualification of Catholics lulled the Protestants into a lethargic confidence. Complaints at last arose that there was not enough food grown for the population which had greatly increased. The Irish Parliament offered a bounty for all corn imported from the inland rural districts into Dublin. The effect was immediate. Arthur Young noticed in 1776 that the richest pasturages of Tipperary and Limerick were being broken up. The outbreak of the American war gave a new impulse to this movement."

So that we have an historical fact to show us what might be done by a local Assembly. Not only that, but there is a certain impulse of life given by contact, close contact, with a Government, and to-day, if you go through Dublin, you will find that it wears a widowed appearance; there is a venerable dinge over everything, and the people are entirely without that sense of being able to deal directly and rapidly with their local affairs that you find, for instance, here. Take Ontario. Suppose you were to take the local Assembly away from Ontario, there would at once be a great diminution of life in that great Province, and so in all our Provinces; and what I desire to see is such a local Assembly as would do for Ireland what the local Assemblies do for our various Provinces; and, if there were a local Assembly to do the same thing for England, and a local Assembly to do the same thing for Scotland, I do not think it would be a bad thing, because the weary Titan of the Imperial Parliament already staggers under the load she has to carry, "the too vast orb of her fate." From 1782 to 1798 the Irish Parliament had been relieved of those shackles which were placed upon her by one Act after another, and by one usurpation after another, from the Poyning's Act down; and what do we find as the truth about the state of things between 1782 and 1798? Lord Clare, who was the leader of the ascendancy party, says, in a pamphlet published in 1798,—and his testimony, remember, was the testimony of a man opposed to the existence of an Irish Parliament:

"There is no nation on the habitable globe which has advanced in cultivation and commerce, in agriculture and manufactures, with the same rapidity in the same period."

Mr. Plunket, afterwards Lord Plunket, in January, 1800, said:

"Her revenues, her trade, her manufactures, thriving beyond the hope or the example of any other country of her extent; within these few years advancing with a rapidity astonishing even to herself; not complaining of deficiency in any of these respects, but enjoying and acknowledging her prosperity."

In December, 1798, the bankers of Dublin had a meeting at which they resolved:

"That since the renunciation of the power of Great Britain, in 1782, to legislate for Ireland, the commerce and prosperity of the country have eminently increased."

And, Sir, it stands to reason that if there is an Assembly whose sole business would be to deal with the material development of a country, on the very principle of division of labor, the work would be better done. Now, in regard to the union itself, two objects rose before the minds of the men who were engaged in bringing that union about. George III declared, when the union was brought about, that he consented to it because it "finished him with the Catholics." He thought he would never again be bothered with any Catholic claim. Well, that, of course, failed, because in 1829 Catholic Emancipation was passed in order to avoid a civil war. Mr. Pitt said, when the union was brought about, that he looked at it as a great means for tranquillising and pacifying Ireland. Well, that, of course, has failed. We keep there at present an armed police force such as is kept in no other part of the Empire, and that police force is supplemented by an army which, on the authority of an English Cabinet Minister, I can say is as large as the army with which we fought Napoleon. Now, Sir, that is a state of things that must be faced by English statesmen, and it must be faced by those among us who take an interest in Imperial questions—and it is palpable that we take a deep interest in Imperial questions, because we are turning from our legitimate business here to discuss this great question. It is very properly said that there should be some anxiety on the score of the minority. It is said that the minority would suffer. I have heard people talk about arming. Why, Sir, there would be no necessity of arming. Of course, no Imperial Act would be passed that would not make provision for the protection of the minority; and I suppose the Catholics of Ireland would no more be able to act together than the Catholics of Quebec, or the Protestants of Ontario. I suppose the same laws which divide the Catholics of Quebec and the Protestants in Ontario, would divide the Catholics in Ireland. The same ambitions, the differences of view, all those mental and moral causes which divide the Protestants in Ontario and the Catholics in Quebec, would divide the large Catholic population in Ireland; and what should we see then? Why, we should see a Protestant vote in Ireland; and from what we see of the Catholic vote in Ontario, I suppose the Protestant vote in Ireland would be able to make itself felt. So, Sir, I do not think there is a danger of the minority suffering. As I said before, I doubt very much if there would be any danger of separation, although we read certain wild statements from the more ebullient spirits. There are many reasons why there would be no danger, in my opinion, of an agitation for separation. In the first place, the rebellion of 1793 was not caused by the fact that they had a separate Parliament. That rebellion was an echo of the French revolution—the French revolution was in the air everywhere; the Irish mind took fire at the French revolution, and that was the main cause of the rebellion. Any man who reads the history of the rebellion of 1798, will see how close was the correspondence between the Irish leaders of that day and the Directory in France. Then, again, if you give her a local Government her material interests are bound up with those of England. She exports at the present moment to the extent of £20,000,000 sterling, about $100,000,000 worth. And how much of that goes to England? £19,250,000. So that if she wanted to separate, what would she have to do? She has not got a ship, she cannot become a naval power; and she would have to make a navy to destroy her best customer, and to destroy the navy of the greatest naval power in the world. So, Sir, I think we need not be alarmed on that score. Now, let me say one word in regard to the Coercion Bill. But for the word "exciting," but for the provision in regard to exciting in the Coercion Bill, I do not see there is much to object to. And the two magistrates—that is a thing, I confess, knowing Ireland as I do, to make one pause; because these two magistrates, would, in nine cases out of ten, belong to the landlord class, and we know the state of mind that class is in at present. I am afraid that, under these circumstances, a man accused, to use an expressive though not very elegant phrase, might be "going to law with the devil in the court of hell." But, Sir, there is crime in Ireland. In the telegram that arrived this morning, which tells us that Mr. O'Brien is not coming here—and I think he does very well not to come here—there is a statement that persons will not be allowed to take a certain course. A circular is sent around Ireland telling the rack-renters to beware of sharpshooters. Well, Sir, of course the state of things in which crime, menace and threatening obtain, is not a state of liberty. The moment the law is paralysed the people are under a tyranny. I have here a few words from Lord Littleton on this subject, which, with the permission of the House, I will read. Remember, that at the present time freedom in all parts of the British Empire is no longer in danger from the encroachments of the Crown; it is in danger, if anything, from the people themselves. Lord Littleton says:

"In order to preserve the independence of Parliament against any future violation on the part of the Crown, it will be necessary to preserve the reputation of Parliament in the minds of the people, and the love of it in their hearts. How, my Lords, can this be done if they find it an obstacle to their equal justice, which is their birth-right and their safety? Upon the whole I am confident your Lordships will, on no account, depart from that maxim, which is the corner stone of all Government, that justice should have its course without stop or impediment. Jus, fas, lex, potentissima sint. This, my Lords, is the very soul and essence of freedom. Obstruct this, and you immediately open a door to all violence and confusion; to all iniquity and all the cruelties of private revenge; to the destruction of private peace, the dissolution of public order, and in the end, to an unlimited and despotic authority which we must be forced to submit to as a remedy against such intolerable evils. The dominion of law is the dominion of liberty. Privilege against law in matters of high concernment to the public is oppression, is tyranny, wheresoever it exists."

And, Sir, any secret society threatening people, any system or state of society in which crimes such as we hear of are perpetrated, that is a condition in which the people are subjected to the worst of all possible tyrannies. I confess it is very hard to resist the clear, cold logic of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). If the Imperial Parliament, a Parliament under which we live and move and have our being, were to lecture us on our legislation in this House we should kick like an overfed steer. If we should regard it as impertinent on their part to interfere with us, a fortiori it is impertinent on our part to play the legislative pedagogue to them. They are responsible; they know all the facts. It is a serious thing to interfere with a Government dealing with the suppression of crime. It is a very serious thing to take any course under such circumstances which will weaken the Executive. I have in my hand a few sentences from Mr. Justin McCarthy's work, "The History of our own Time," on this point. Speaking of the interference of England with the Chinese Government, he says:

Mr. DAVIN.

"It was no business of ours to ask ourselves whether the Chinese Government were perfectly sincere in their professions of lofty morality, or whether they, unlike all other Governments that have ever been known, were influenced by one sole motive in the making of their regulations. All that had nothing to do with the question. States are not at liberty to help the subjects of other States to break the laws of their own Governments. Especially when these laws profess to concern questions of morals, is it the duty of foreign States not to interfere with the regulations which a Government sees it necessary to impose for the protection of its people."

So that, Sir, we take a very grave responsibility upon us. I find, on reading the debates of the English Parliament, from time to time—and I have an instance of it in my hands in Hansard—that speakers in that Parliament constantly refer to opinions in the States, and here and make arguments from those opinions; and if a Cabinet Minister—and I have here an instance where a Cabinet Minister actually made an argument from the opinion of the States and Canada—so acts, then it may be, after all, a proper and right thing for us to give our opinion in regard to the Coercion Bill and Home Rule, notwithstanding Mr. Gladstone's snub as quoted by the hon. member for Simcoe. There are a large number of Irishmen and their descendants in Canada, and it is to their credit that they take a deep interest in the rock whence they were hewn, provided they do not allow their interest in Ireland to override their duty to Canada, provided they keep intact their interest and devote the necessary portion of their time to Canadian affairs—it is to their credit that they do not forget Ireland and still take an interest in her affairs. And, therefore, under these circumstances it may be not inappropriate that we in this House should do what many hon. members and many people outside think is wasting the time of Canada. But, as I say, the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is, in my opinion, unanswerable as a piece of logic. If we were dealing with a matter of law, if we were dealing with anything but human beings, the speech of that hon. gentleman is unanswerable. But brilliant, logical, clear, strong as it was, it had one defect. It was defective in sympathy; and being defective in sympathy, I could not go with him and with his motion. But, Sir, we cannot afford—I speak now as an Irishman—Irishmen here and in the States cannot afford to do otherwise than to protest in the strongest possible manner against such crimes as are taking place in Ireland. An Englishman, a Scotchman, a Frenchman, may philosophise an excuse, if he likes, for such crimes; but there is one man that cannot do so, and that is an Irishman who is jealous for the honor of Ireland and for his own. He can find no excuse for these crimes, and the men that perpetrate them are the greatest enemies to the local government of Ireland and to Ireland's prosperity, for they are driving capital away from the country; and I learn there is great depression in Dublin in consequence of these matters. And, therefore, while I cannot sympathise with the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), yet in his attitude that those crimes must be denounced and put down I entirely agree. As to giving advice to English statesmen, I think, from one point of view, we are in a good position to do so. We live in a new country which emancipates us from Old World prejudices. In England and Ireland feudal structures anomalously linger in luxurious pomp or proud decay and prejudices cling round them like ivy round the long disused battlement. Under those circumstances a statesman like Lord Salisbury, or any English statesman, may actually not have so good a standpoint from which to arrive at a just conclusion on political questions, as have the people who breathe the broader and freer air of this continent. I confess, from what we know English statesmen have done for Canada, we cannot feel they are above the possibility of error; and looking back, as far as my reading of history goes, to the great names, as I suppose they will be called, the great statesmen who have ruled England, only three or four really understood how to deal with Ireland. Mr. Burke, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox had a clear grasp of the way to deal with Ireland, but the Nottinghams and Norths and such men were utterly incapable of dealing either with Ireland or with the Empire generally. I have here a telegram which I saw yesterday in the newspaper, and I was sorry to read that Lord Salisbury spoke as follows:—

"He denied that the Cowper Commission gave the fall in prices as the sole reason for the tenants' inability to pay their rents. If the rents were revised now there would be no argument with which to resist the constant demands that would be made for revision upon the slightest grounds. Why should a tenant who entered into a bargain which turned out unprofitable be differently treated from a person in any other business? When able to pay their debts they should do so. When it was impossible to pay, society recognised the case and provided relief for the insolvent. He thought the precedent applied amply to the present case."

Now, Sir, it may seem presumption on my part, but I have often heard Lord Salisbury speak, I have studied that eminent statesman a little, and I venture to say that that is a very unsympathetic and very unstatesmanlike way of regarding this question. I think, moreover, that the present situation, the present opportunity, emphasises the great loss which England and the Empire sustained—to say nothing of the great loss the Conservative party in England sustained, in the death of Lord Beaconsfield. They were keeping his Primrose Day a few days ago, and that is only another instance, to which I could add hundreds, that you may build monuments to the prophets but you cannot catch their inspiration. Now, what is the meaning of our debating this question here to-day? I believe it was not before our constituents during the late election. What is the meaning of the Ontario Legislature discussing it? What is the meaning of the Quebec Legislature discussing it? What is the meaning of resolutions being passed in various assemblies, a large portion of those assemblies hardly caring one pin about Ireland? The fact is—and that fact had better be faced, if we are to understand the situation, and if we are to assume that attitude which is wise under the circumstances—the fact is that the poor, despised, down-trodden Irish Celt of half a century ago has triumphed. Beaten on the battle-field now by more skilful forces, now by larger numbers, treated now cruelly and now a little kindly by England—if he had been treated as cruelly as some desired he might have been exterminated, and if he had been treated more kindly he might have been reconciled; but treated as he has been he has remained unreconciled, and meanwhile what has happened? The battle has been transferred from the battle-field to the cradle, and the pure and therefore fruitful Irish woman has conquered. The cradle has won, and there is now a greater Ireland here. A Cabinet Minister has used the phrase that you have not only outside Britain a greater Britain, but you have outside Ireland a greater Ireland; and the significance of this debate, if it has any genuine significance that it is desirable we should lay to heart—I am not talking about looking after a vote here and a vote there—the genuine significance of this debate lies in that fact. I want to know if there is any general moral that an earnest man can take from this debate. Sir, there is, and it is this: to see and acknowledge the fact that while hon. members dislike the question, while some would like to see it kicked from the floor of the House, nevertheless the question is discussed, although it does not belong in any way to our business. What is the meaning of this fact? Its meaning is this: that this man that thirty, forty or fifty years ago was despised and trodden under foot, has become a power; it means that he insists on being considered, and that you have to consider him. Mr. Froude points out how the effort was made from time to time to decelticise Ireland, and points out also that it always failed. At the time Lord John Russell's Encumbered Estates Bill was passed—a measure which though I do not say it was an unwise measure, was certainly, passed at that particular time, a cruel and short-sighted act—at that time I find that the London Times, the Thunderer, was writing about what that Act would do. It said this Act would give you Scotch and English tenants instead of Irish tenants; it would give you Scotch and English landlords instead of Irish landlords, and in a few years a Celtic Irishman would be as rare in Connemara as on the banks of the Manhattan. They were going to decelticise Ireland by means of the law of supply and demand. I remember that in 1882 I had a conversation with one of the most eminent men of the United States, whom I met on a train, and who was then aspiring to a high office. He told me his plans for annexing Canada to the United States, and his chief plan was that he had a millionaire, a man of English manners, one who had lived largely on the continent of Europe, and he said, I am going to send him to Ottawa, as a sort of diplomatist, and my directions to him will be to out-dinner Rideau Hall—he must beat the Governor General hollow in the matter of dinners. I said to him: Are you going to annex five millions of people with a gridiron? So these people were going to decelticise Ireland by the law of supply and demand. I need hardly say that experiment failed, and we are now face to face with the fact that we have, outside Ireland, a greater Ireland taking a deep interest in her affairs, though I am bound to say, not always a wise interest. But you must remember what I have shown you happened; and remember also that laws existed almost within living memory which kept the people of Ireland in ignorance. Remember all that, and remember too as this same eminent writer, Mr. Froude, lays down, you cannot, whether as a nation or an individual, commit a crime but you become a debtor—he puts it—a debtor to nature; I prefer to go higher than nature, and say that you become a debtor to the Power that rules this world, and the time will come sooner or later when the bill will have to be paid. Any such policy as was pursued towards Ireland would have been all right if you could have trammelled up the consequences. If the blow then given could have been the be-all and the end-all. But in these cases you teach bloody instructions which, being taught, return to plague the inventors, and by investigating and brooding on those wrongs, many of these wilder spirits in the United States have been inflamed. When I read what they say and do I feel humiliated as an Irishman. But we must remember what were the circumstances which are responsible for this result. And in this relation I believe it would be a good thing to have a local Assembly, I believe it would be a good thing to have a local Assembly that would give the Irish people the excitement of local politics, and would help to develop the country. In that way I believe a blow would be struck at an agitation which is educating the rising generation in Ireland to be unfit for everything like peaceful and industrial life. The hon. Member for North Simcoe said he was making an unpopular speech. I do not know whether I have been making a popular or an unpopular speech. I have not been aiming at making a popular or an unpopular speech. I have often spoken to my countrymen on questions affecting Ireland, and they know well that I have never flattered them, for they know that I love them too much to flatter them. I prefer to tell them their faults, and for my part I do not care one straw whether my speech is popular or unpopular, provided I tell the truth. As the great Florentine says:

"Pur che mia coscienza non mi garra, Che alla fortuna, come vuol, son presto."

The meaning of which in plain words is this, that provided I satisfy my conscience, provided I have the self-approving hour, I care very little; I think that is above applause, and it is a barrier against disapproval. In case the amendment should not be carried, I will, should I have an opportunity, present an amendment to the House that will express more nearly my own views than either of the amendments now before it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I crave the indulgence of this honorable House for a short time while I express my opinion on the great question now under discussion. I am not an Irishman, but I sympathise very largely with the Irish people in their present and past distress. I feel as a Canadian as if I could wish that all people in the world could have that form of government that we have, and could enjoy the same rights to manage their own affairs that we enjoy. I was very highly gratified when the hon. member for Montreal Centre brought forward this resolution, and made, in my opinion, a very excellent speech, setting forth the claims Irishmen had on the sympathy and influence of this country. I was not so well pleased with the speech of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) when he spoke of the political parties from whom Coercion Bills came. It matters very little to us as Canadians, and less to the Irish people, from what sources the Coercion Bills came. They suffered largely and long under those Coercion Bills, and it did not matter whether a Liberal Government or a Conservative Government in England was the author of them. It is our duty, and our privilege, to express our sympathy and give our aid, as far as we possibly can, to those who are in distress. My hon. friend from Assiniboia thought we were departing from the business of this country when we engaged the attention of this large House for so long a time in the consideration of Irish affairs. The Irish people look across the ocean to us as people enjoying the privileges of constitutional government, and they say to us: "Come over and help us." If we cannot go over personally to help them, we can at least place on paper the sympathy of the great Canadian people with them in their present difficulties. In that way we can not only help them to gain what they desire, but we can strengthen the hands of the great Liberal party in England which is attempting to extend to Ireland the right of constitutional government. When we consider the number of Coercion Bills passed since the union, it is perfectly astonishing that the Irish people have remained as loyal as they have. From the time of the union in 1800 to 1833, there were eleven years during which the Statute books of England were free from Coercion Bills, and twenty-one years during which Coercion Bills were imposed upon the Irish people. During the last fifty-three years there were only two years in which the Statute-books of England did not contain some measure of a repressive character in regard to Ireland. Need we expect anything else than the hearts of the Irish people will be alienated, to a great extent, from that loyalty and respect to the British Crown that we should like them to possess? Need we wonder that the population of that country has decreased from 8,000,000 in 1832 to 5,000,000 at the present time? Need we wonder that hundreds of thousands of the Irish people, driven from their own country by those harsh laws, and now living in foreign countries enjoying the liberties of constitutional government, will entertain a rancorous feeling in their hearts against the Government whose laws have driven them from their fair land and salubrious climate? I do not know that crimes are so rampant in Ireland that the present Coercion Bill is absolutely necessary for peace and harmony there. If we contrast the criminal statistics of the year 1832 with those of 1885, we find that in 1832 there were 248 homicides and in 1885 there were only 65; in 1832 there were 209 attempts to kill, and in 1885 there were only 65; in 1832 the total number of serious crimes committed was 6,014, and in 1885 there were only 1,057; and in the criminal calendar of the country the total number of criminal cases in 1832 is given as 14,000, and in 1885 only 2,644. Now, it is said that these Coercion Bills are highly necessary, and

Mr. DAVIN.

I agree with those who said it is important that as much order should be restored in that country as possible. But when they are putting into force Coercion Acts for the purpose of suppressing disorder, why do not the British Government at the same time bring forward some measure of Home Rule which we believe will be found a bulwark against disturbance and crime in that unhappy island? We, as others, regret those crimes. We are not here for the purpose of defending them. But we say that the British Government has tried coercion for the last 87 years, and that it is a failure, and we ask, why not give those people that measure of Home Rule which will before many years restore order in the country? As Canadians, we can deeply sympathise with these people, because we, ourselves, at one time were almost in the same position as they. Our fathers remember well the time when we had not responsible government, and when those who were working in the cause of responsible government were pointed out as opposed to British connection, as disloyal and disobedient to the Throne. We were said to be rebels, we were said to be agitating for the separation of this country from the Mother Country, we were charged with seeking to dismember the Empire. But our claims were granted, and what has been the result? The sequel proves that all those charges were false, that we became more loyal, that we esteemed our Queen in a higher degree, that our allegiance to the Throne became deeper and broader than ever before. We received responsible government, we legislated for ourselves, and the result was that, in appreciation of that gift, our love for our Queen and our loyalty to the Throne became vastly increased. So it will be with Ireland when she obtains her Home Rule. In having the right to manage her own affairs, to establish her own schools and universities, to build her own railways and bridges, and to do everything relating to her own local wants, Ireland will become as loyal and devoted to the Crown as the most enthusiastic lover of the British Empire could desire. The sentiments of her children, who, for years, have been forced to leave her shores, would become changed. Do you suppose it at all probable that these men who have been driven to the United States and elsewhere can, when their thoughts revert to their own land, harbor any feeling of friendship for the system that drove them away; but grant Ireland Home Rule, and I will warrant the assertion that in the future the Irish people who leave their country will look back longingly to their own green isle, with its beautiful climate and fertile soil, and instead of seeing her shores through the haze of enmity will view them with feelings of love and loyalty to the Empire. These people are now menacing Canada, because they are trying to strike Great Britain through Canada; but only accede to their just demands, and we will have peace, order and prosperity both here and at home. Therefore, it is our duty, even if in doing it we depart from the business of the day, to consider this great question, and assist as far as we can by our influence and our talents, if necessary, this long-suffering people to acquire what they are entitled to, the management of their own affairs. We are told by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that the minority in Ireland would not submit to Home Rule. Surely the hon. gentleman is wrong. Surely the minority in Ireland are not rebels. Surely these supra-loyal men would not rebel against the British Throne because the majority in Ireland rule. Why, the majority in every country must rule. No; I have a higher appreciation of the minority. I know that the Protestant minority would not rebel, but would fall into line, and I am sure the majority would show the tolerant spirit that was shown by the Protestant minority in the old Irish Parliament when they extended to Irish Catholics the right to hold office under the Crown. The Irish Catholics were emancipated in Ireland even before the English emancipated them. The Roman Catholies, under the system of local self-government, would be placed on their good behaviour, they would remember the concession of the Government of Ireland, when Lord Fitzwilliam was Viceroy, extended to the Catholics of that day, and they would, in return, extend to the Protestant minority corresponding blessings and advantages. Again, when these parties would be brought together in legislation, they would forget their difference, each would allow the other to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and all would unite shoulder to shoulder, mental capabilities to mental capabilities, for the purpose of developing the interest of the country, and thus they would combine to establish a condition of public affairs in consonance with the general interests of the country, making fair Ireland prosperous and happy. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) quoted the words of Judge Johnstone, of Cork: "We must give Ireland security," and he quoted them as an argument in favor of coercion. If Ireland gets security, then comes order, and when Ireland gets order, then comes peace, and when Ireland gets peace, then comes prosperity. Let us apply that axiom. Give Ireland security by allowing her to make her own laws, to control her own local affairs, to build her own railways, to manage everything pertaining to her own locality, and then comes order, and not until then; when order comes, then comes peace, and when peace comes all will be united for the purpose of making the country prosperous and happy. The day is not far distant when Ireland will begin to prosper. Do we expect the past to be wiped out the very moment Ireland gets Home Rule? Not at all. Suppose a person who has been sick of a fever becomes convalescent, he must still remain with traces of the sickness until he becomes restored to his former health and vigor. In his convalescence he is only ascending the ladder of health, which he will continue to ascend until he reaches the state of health and vigor. So, when Ireland obtains Home Rule, we must look for some disorder and want of harmony for a time; but all these conflicting elements will end by the people of all classes combining, and step by step the country will go on until she will have passed the final stage of convalescence and will stand forth prosperous and peaceful. It is said also that Home Rule will lead to the dismemberment of the Empire. That cry has been raised in our own country. In 1837, we were told that if we obtained responsible government, our connection with the Mother Country would cease; but the sequel has shown that responsible government did not, with us, lead to dismemberment. On the contrary, the bonds of affection and loyalty between the colonies and the Mother Country became strengthened. Again, in 1859, when we sought to have these Provinces confederated into one grand union, similar to that of to-day, what were we told by those who opposed that scheme? Ah, they said, the Reformers are taking another step to dismember the Empire. But the sequel has proved that Confederation did not lead to dismemberment, but to the binding together into one whole, the Empire and its Colonies, and in giving a strength and influence in the world. As the Colonies gain strength, influence and power, so were strength, influence and power added to the Empire. Again, when we agitated for the management of local interests in our western municipal government, we were told that we were seeking a republic. Again they said, these Reformers are trying to introduce a republican system; and their ulterior object is the dismemberment of the Empire. But, on the contrary, we became more loyal to the Crown, and loved, esteemed, and venerated our Queen more than ever before. We were told, two years ago, when the leader of the Opposition stood upon the floor of Parliament and asked that we should apply to the British Government for power to make our own commercial treaties with foreign powers, that to do so would be disrespectful to the British Empire. Why, it would help the Empire, because it would add to the consolidation of the Empire, did we send our agents into foreign countries. In that way we enlarge our boundaries and increase our trade and commerce, we not only continue to be a portion of the Empire but we are at the same time extending the power and influence of the Empire, making the Empire stronger and helping to prevent disintegration and dismemberment. We are told that Ireland would separate from England. Grattan at one time, when discussing the question of the union of parliaments, said: "Looking across the St. George's Channel, it is too wide for union of parliaments, but, looking across the ocean, it is too wide for separation;" and this is just the position. Ireland cannot separate and conduct her Government with the same advantages she now obtains. Her market is in England. She sells her manufactured goods to England, she sends her linens there, she sends her cattle and the produce of her farms to England. It is a home market, and, if Ireland were separated from that country, would this trade be carried on so advantageously to the Irish people? No country is so advantageously situated for Ireland as England is. We were told to-day by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that the exportation from Ireland to England amounted to something over £19,000,000 sterling. You will see what great interests are affected in connection with that, when I call your attention to the fact that out of exportations exceeding £19,500,000 to England, £10,617,000 sterling is paid by the tenants of Ireland into the pockets of the land owners of England. Over one half of the entire exports of Ireland passes into the hands of non resident land owners. This is another fact I desire to press upon this House and upon this country, that a large proportion of this £19,000,000, more than half consists of manufactured goods; and, when we consider that more than all the natural products of that land are required to pay the landlords for the use of the land, it must be a sad position for Ireland in this enlightened nineteenth century. We were also told that, by this agitation, Gladstone, the great leader of the Liberal party in England, had driven from his side no less than twelve of his most able and strong supporters. That is no argument against the agitation for Home Rule. When we were granted responsible government in this country, a large number of the party that gave it to us were opposed to its being granted to this country. Did that show that we were not entitled to the power we asked for to govern ourselves according to constitutional rules, and is that any reason why the Irish people should not ask for this power from the Government of England, simply because twelve of these men did not agree with Mr. Gladstone in his Irish Home Rule Bill? Allow me to point out another fact, which shows the hold that this question has taken upon the people of England. Gladstone went to the country not only with the influence and ability of these former followers of his against him, but with the influence of the aristocracy and the landed gentry, with all their millions of money, also on the other side. Notwithstanding all this, Mr. Gladstone went before the country and pleaded as no other living man could plead, for the Irish people, and what was the result? Out of 3,000,000 people who voted at that election, Mr. Gladstone's opponents had only a majority of 75,000 votes. Does not that show that this question has taken root in the English heart? The delay is only for a short time. No matter what we may do here, the time for Home Rule is not far in the future, and I hope Mr. Gladstone will live to see that day arrive and to see his noble efforts crowned with the fullest success. It is our duty, enjoying the privileges of constitutional government, enjoying full and ample scope to develop our own resources largely attending to our own trade interests, to give our sympathy and support, as far as resolutions of this kind can give them, to the people in Ireland who are asking for like privileges, and to hold up the hands of those noble men in England who are standing forth as men should in the interests of humanity, and trying to give to the Irish people that Home Rule which they should possess; and when that Home Rule comes, there will be in Ireland security, and following on the footsteps of security there will be order in that country, and following up that order and peace there will be hopes for the future. Every individual in this country—I, for one—will hail the day when the Irish people will be put in full possession of constitutional government, to enable them to control their own affairs and develop their own resources.

Mr. FREEMAN. After the very able addresses we have been given on this subject by hon. members who seem to understand fully this great Irish question—a question which seems to have baffled the ablest minds in Great Britain, not only the present Prime Minister but the Grand Old Man—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend to allow me to interrupt him for a moment. I was going to propose that the debate be adjourned. I know a great many members in the House are called away to-night by other duties, and a number of members went away on Friday and Saturday who are not here and will not be here to-day. It is of great importance that this vote should be taken fully, and to enable the hon. gentlemen who are in the House now, and are called away by paramount duties elsewhere, to vote, and to allow the debate to be resumed when the other members return, I move the adjournment of the debate, to be the First Order of the Day to-morrow.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood the adjournment of this debate to be proposed on Friday evening because some hon. members desired to go away, and now it is proposed to adjourn it again because some other hon. members desire to go away: I do not know how much longer the debate is to continue, because it seems to me that the longer it takes the more there is of it. I fully expected, when the debate was adjourned on Friday, that there would have been no further interruption of it to-day, but that the discussion would be closed and the vote would be taken this evening. I am still of opinion that it would be for the convenience of the House if another whole day were not needlessly consumed in this discussion, but, if the general opinion of the House is that we should adjourn at six o'clock to-night, I do not propose to oppose the motion or divide the House upon the question.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned, to stand the First Order for Tuesday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to enquire of the First Minister if he proposes that this debate shall close to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Considering the fact that there is a great deal of business, and a considerable number of discussions to come on, I think that the House is throwing away very valuable time by adjourning in this way.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to request the hon. members, whenever a motion is made to adjourn, that they refrain from noise and confusion until after the motion is carried, as I think such conduct is not dignified.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

PUBLIC BILL—MORTGAGES.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce a Bill respecting the payment of mortgages.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is a public Bill, and notice must be given.

QUEEN'S, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. SKINNER. I beg to give notice, that, as a question of privilege, I will, on Thursday next, draw attention to the papers in connection with the Queen's county return, and will move that the return be amended by the insertion of the name of G. G. King instead of that of Geo. F. Baird. I give this notice in order that the attention of hon. members may be called to it, and that they may be ready when the question comes up. I also give the notice because it might be said that it should have been pressed earlier, but, on consideration, I thought we would bring it up on Thursday.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 30) to amend the Canada Joint Stock Companies' Act. He said: The Bill is for the purpose of giving power to loan companies to borrow money upon debenture stock. Several companies have that power now by special Act, but this is to confer the power generally upon all companies which come under the Companies' Act, and are loan companies, to borrow money upon debenture stock.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—ALLOWANCE TO THE EX-WARDEN.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:—

That in view of the valuable services rendered by Godefroi Laviolette, late Warden of the Penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, on the occasion of an outbreak among the convicts therein confined, and of the fact that in consequence of his energy and intrepidity on that occasion he received injuries resulting in permanent infirmity and incapacity to continue the performance of the duties of Warden as aforesaid, it is expedient that, as an exceptional case, there should be granted to the said Godefroi Laviolette an allowance for life at the rate of $2,800 a year, to date from the 31st January, 1887, and also a further sum of $1,000 compensation for removal expenses, such sums to be payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and such annual allowance to stand instead of any other superannuation allowance to which the said Godefroi Laviolette might be entitled.

Mr. LAURIER. May I ask the Minister if any enquiry has been made into the outbreak and the causes of the outbreak which took place at St. Vincent de Paul some time last spring?

Mr. THOMPSON. An enquiry has been made into the causes of the outbreak.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman cause the result to be laid on the Table before this motion is taken up? It will be very important for us to have that information, as at present we have no data to go upon.

Mr. THOMPSON. What papers I can bring down I will.

Motion agreed to.

THE DEATH OF MR. MOFFAT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sure the whole of the House will agree with me in sentiments of the greatest regret at the unexpected death of the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Moffat). To those gentlemen who sat in Parliament with him it is not requisite that I should say anything. He was, I believe, a man who was liked and esteemed by both sides of the House. Of a retiring nature, not at all apt to press unduly his own position in Parliament or elsewhere, yet he enjoyed the confidence of his constituents in a marked degree. He succeeded his father, who before him held that county for some Parliaments, and ever since then, ever since he succeeded his father, he has generally been acceptable as a colleague in this House. I do not think it requires me to say more with reference to this lamented gentleman. Young in years, he has been out off suddenly and unexpectedly. When he arrived here he was apparently in better and stronger health than he had been for some years before, and everything about him promised a long and useful life. Such is the uncertainty, however, of mundane affairs that we were informed suddenly that he was found in his bed dead, and all we can do is to regret the loss of a worthy, honest and upright colleague.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to add my mite of sympathy to the statements given utterance to by the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. I am sure that those who sat in this House with the late Mr. Moffat for years past and who knew him as intimately as I did, will feel his loss as keenly as they would feel the loss of a member of their own family. A more honorable and straightforward man does not sit in this House to-day; a man who more tried to discharge his duties as a representative of the people and to promote the interests of the county he was elected to represent, does not remain behind him. I have known Mr. Moffat since childhood. I believe I was the principal means of bringing him out in 1882, and it was with great reluctance that he came out to redeem the county and to restore the prestige of his father, who had represented it before. His course since his election has been such as to recommend him to every member who had the honor of his acquaintance, and we were all taken by surprise when we heard of his death, which no one in this House regrets more than I do myself. As an honorable man, he had a reputation not alone here, but in the county where he was born, and which he represented with so much honor to himself and advantage to the county. I am sure that we all join with the right hon. gentleman in expressions of the deepest regret for the loss of Mr. Moffat, and of sympathy for the family and the friends whom he has left behind him.

Mr. BURNS. I also desire to join in the expressions of sorrow and regret for the death of Mr. Moffat. For a quarter of a century Mr. Moffat was my dear friend, and I can truly say that where he was best known he was most honored and respected. As representative of his county he was always faithful and keenly alive to the interest of his constituents. His death will cast a deep gloom over that county in which he and his family had great interests, and not only in that county but wherever he was known; and in no county in New Brunswick will his loss be more keenly regretted than in the county I have the honor to represent.

PAPERS IN REGARD TO THE FISHERY QUESTION.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that on Friday last he said:

"I may say that my hon. friend, the Minister of Fisheries, promised the papers relating to the Fisheries Question to-day, or on Monday at the latest. We have only to-day obtained permission to bring down the last papers which we have. We have obtained that permission to-day, so that all the papers will be laid on the Table on Monday."

Monday has passed, and the papers are not yet laid on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry that the papers are not yet ready to be laid on the Table. As was explained by the leader of the Government, permission was only obtained on Friday last to bring down the latter portion of the papers, which portion was very large. They have been put into the printers' hands, and all available force is engaged on them. They will be before the House in printed form and for the use of members just as soon as they can possibly be prepared.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think that statement is at all satisfactory, Sir. I think that those papers which are printed—I presume the earlier ones have been printed—might be placed before us; or we might, at any rate, have the manuscript copy of the papers, to present which permission has been obtained. These papers have been laid on the Table of the Imperial House of Commons a number of days ago, but we do not see them yet. One copy would enable us to get the information within a few moments—all the substance of them; and through the press we will get them, perhaps, before the hon. gentleman's printers are able to prepare them. After having promised us on Friday last that we should get them on Monday at the latest, the hon. gentleman now, on Tuesday, makes a further delay, an indefinite delay, in order that they may be printed, which is neither in the spirit or in the letter of the pledge which was made to the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I quite concur in these statements of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I think that there is no question more important to the country than the Fishery question. Now, we have seen a statement in the press coming from English sources, and coming also from American sources, endorsing the statement that the Government of this country have proposed to give up our exclusive fishery rights, and renew the attitude we held under the old Washington Treaty. I am informed that the paper controlled by the present Minister of Fisheries—inspired, rather, by him—declares that that statement is untrue, that there is not a word of truth in it. Now, it is well that the country should be satisfied on that point. I do think that at the very earliest possible moment we ought to have these papers laid before us.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Curran (p. 46) on the subject of Home Rule for Ireland, the proposed motion of Mr. McNeill (p. 55) in amendment thereto, and the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy (p. 98) in amendment to the said amendment.

Mr. FREEMAN. In the moment or two during which I had the floor yesterday, I said that, after the very able and eloquent addresses we had heard on the subject under discussion, from the statesmen of this House and other hon. members who seemed to be well acquainted with this subject, understanding not only the politics of this country, but those of the United Kingdom, it might be thought presumption in me, having no parliamentary experience, and supposed, I presume, to know very little about Irish affairs, to pretend to address this House. Sir, I propose to take up the attention of this House but a very few moments, and the only excuse I can offer for doing so is, that I have an inalienable right to an opinion, and a parliamentary right to express it within parliamentary rules. The resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) means, I think, that we shall express our sympathy with our fellow-subjects in Ireland, sympathy for them in their trouble and distress, and pledge our desire—for I suppose it can only be a desire—to lift them out of their trouble into a situation of contentment and happiness. Well, Sir, I conceive that the honest, benevolent, and kindly disposed members of this House will all join in this expression of sympathy and in this desire. We all feel, as well as people generally throughout this Dominion, a sympathy for the Irish people, and we all desire that they should be happy and contented, as we Canadians are. I think, therefore, we can all join in supporting the resolution of the hon. member, after he has amended it by accepting the very excellent suggestions, in my opinion, made by the leader of the Opposition. I was much pleased at the proposal of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I hope that his suggestions will be received and adopted, and that we shall have a resolution in which we can all join, and for which we can all conscientiously vote. Now, Sir, I am not an Irishman—I am not the son of an Irishman, even. After the Anglo-Saxon, all my race affinities are Teutonic rather than Celtic. But I hold that all the higher and nobler impulses of the soul belong to our common humanity. They are not limited or circumscribed by nationality, and, therefore, as a Canadian, I do most heartily unite in this feeling of sympathy for Ireland. I unite with her sons who have spoken here, I unite with her foremost friends who have spoken here, in expressing these generous sympathies for the people of Ireland. Ireland deserves well of every part of the British Empire. In the highest councils of the nation, in the difficult work of diplomacy, in the halls of legislation, and in the ranks of those great battalions which have fought on so many battle-fields, under the red cross flag, Irishmen have supported and been loyal to the Crown and have won for themselves position and honor second to none. And, therefore, I say, for these and other reasons, Ireland deserves our sympathy. But while I am in full agreement with the mover of the resolution with respect to this part of the motion, I do not so fully agree with him as to the remedy which he proposes, as to the remedial measure which he says is going to lift from Ireland that dark cloud which has hung over her for so many years. I hold that the evils which affect Ireland are of a different character from any that Home Rule can remedy. I hold that the evils of Ireland are commercial, social and industrial. This is the nature of the evils that affect Ireland, and they cannot be remedied by any measure that any Parliament may devise. The crime of Ireland is called agrarian crime. It arises out of discontent on the part of the peasant. That discontent grows up out of a feeling of oppression by the landlord, and the landlord thus oppresses the tenants because the tenants cannot pay their rents, and the tenants cannot pay their rents because the little patches of ground they cultivate yield barely a subsistence to keep their families from starvation, and during the six months in which they do not engage in the cultivation of their patches of ground there is no employment for the peasants, and they cannot earn money to pay their landlords. If this is the case—and it will not be disputed—I should like to ask, where is the point of contact between the Home Rule Bill and the necessitous condition of the people? I should like to know how a Parliament in Dublin could provide money to pay the rent of those peasants any more than the Parliament of Westminster? I should like to know whether this Dublin Parliament can so affect the sun that shines and the rain that falls so that they shall come just at the right time and bring forth crops for the Irish people? I should like to know whether this Dublin Parliament will so affect the markets that any little produce Irish peasants may have to sell over and above their necessities shall bring a better price than it has been bringing for some years past? I should like to know whether this Dublin Parliament is going to revive the industries of Ireland? I should like to know whether this Dublin Parliament is going to bring capital into the country; and whether, before it brings in capital, it is going to establish peace and quiet in that country so as to secure the confidence of capitalists and encourage industry? I think that a Dublin Parliament is not any more likely to do so than is the Parliament of Westminster to which the Irish people send representatives? I will answer my own question and say, no, emphatically, no. There is nothing in this Home Rule question, there is nothing in any Home Rule measure, there can be nothing in any Home Rule measure which can affect Ireland in this way, and I am satisfied that the remedial measure which so many seem to think is going to remove the difficulties regarding Ireland will have no effect of that kind whatever. And I here beg it to be understood, clearly and distinctly, that I am in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. I believe the Irish people should have the privilege of managing their own local affairs. I believe they should have all the privileges in that respect we Canadians possess, considering the different circumstances of the country, and I for one would be willing to do anything in my power, to render any service possible that would in any way facilitate the granting of Home Rule to Ireland, such a measure of Home Rule as the wisdom of the legislators of Great Britain, such as the people of the United Kingdom are willing to approve, such a measure as might be thought best suited to the circumstances of the Irish people. Forty-eight years ago Ireland supported, we are told, eight millions of people. To-day we hear that she gives a bare subsistence to less than five millions. I may fairly ask this question: Has the absence of Home Rule depopulated Ireland, has the want of a Home Rule measure been the cause of the people leaving Ireland? I think not; I think that no such proposition can be affirmed and sustained. We next ask, What is it that has depopulated Ireland? The question may, to some extent, be answered by the experience of this our own Canada. What is it that sends our people out of the country, out of Canada which is as dear to our people as is Ireland to the Irish people? My own experience, and I have conversed with many who have left Nova Scotia for the United States and afterwards returned to that Province temporarily, is, that it was because they were unable to obtain employment they crossed the line, and they say that, notwithstanding all the advantages the United States possess, there are many things in our own country which are so dear to them that if they could obtain employment in Canada they would willingly come back and bid good-bye to the States. It is therefore, the want of employment which, in a very large measure, leads our people to emigrate. I know there is a feeling and a desire to see the world, and I would not give much for a young man who is willing to confine himself to any particular country all his lifetime. I have felt that myself, and I rejoice when I see a young man desirous of going over the world and of ascertaining what other people are doing, mixing up with people of other nationalities, and seeking to ascertain whether he cannot possibly make a name for himself in some other part of the world. But, Sir, in the main our people after having gone abroad desire again to return to their own country, and Irishmen love their country so well that they have only left it because they have not had employment at home. And why have they not that employment at home which they had at one time? There was a time when Ireland had industries—when she had commerce and manufactures, but where are they now? They have gone, and that is the real trouble that affects Ireland. People are very apt to say that Ireland has no industrial resources, that all she is fit for is to raise potatoes. On that point I wish to quote from a writer who understood, I presume, what he was writing about—I refer to Sir Robert Kain, who, in his work on the Industrial Resources of Ireland, says:

“The constitution of the rocks and soil of Ireland, its extent of ores and fuel, its supply of water, its extent of lakes and rivers, its harbors, all fit it for industry in agriculture, in manufactures, and in commerce in a degree which, although not entitling it like England to grasp at the commercial and manufacturing supremacy of the world, should certainly enable it to be the source of employment and comfort to its own people.”

I know that various reasons have been given for the decay of Irish manufactures, and whatever the true reason may be, it is the one which makes this problem so difficult to solve, especially to the Parliament of England. I should be very sorry to be accused of any pretence whatever to lay down any rule by which this problem can be solved. But I hold to this, that the methods that some of us imagine are going to solve the problem will never solve it; Home Rule never will solve it. I trust, however, that there will arise some man among the friends of Ireland who will meet the difficulty and remove it. I feel satisfied that the gentlemen who are now at the head of the Irish party, however deserving they may be of credit, are not the men who are going to lead Ireland up to a state of peace and prosperity such as she enjoyed at one time. We want some other person possessing different views of the matter from those which are held by the men who now lead Ireland. There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of this House. An hon. member said yesterday that of the large value of the exports of Ireland one-half the amount was paid out as rent to the landlords, and he characterised that condition of things in a very strong manner. I forget the exact words he used, but they were to the effect that it was something like a blot on the civilisation of the country that the peasants of Ireland should be required to pay such a large amount of money, received for the exports of the country, by way of rent to their landlords. Why, Sir, a very good authority tells us that the Irish people pay a very much larger sum for something that is of less value to them than the land for which they pay rent. A statistician of some note informs us that the drink bill of Ireland for the ten years preceding 1880, amounted to an annual average of $65,000,000, being $11,000,000 more than the rent paid for the land. Now, Sir, I say that any country of less than five millions of population which will pay $65,000,000 in the shape of a drink bill, for something that does them no good, something that does them injury every time and continually, something which is degrading to the people of the country, something which is destroying their moral sentiment and feeling—I say any such people as that are making a grand mistake, and are themselves placing obstructions in the way of their prosperity. Give us another Father Matthew, another regenerator of Ireland like him—one who will say to the people of Ireland, You must get rid of this tremendous tax; and if he should fortunately succeed in prevailing on them to do so he would confer a far greater boon on that distressed country than a Home Rule measure after Mr. Parnell's own pattern could confer. And this particular form of tax is not only a tremendous burden in Ireland, but in England and Canada. It is a tax which, I trust, we will some day throw off our shoulders; and as regards Ireland, at any rate, before she can become regenerated she must get rid of it, for it is one of the difficulties which stand in the way of the settlement of this great Irish question. Now, Sir, I do not desire in any way to detract from the honor of those patriots who are endeavoring to lift up Ireland. I have no doubt they are honorable and patriotic men—just such men as Ireland wishes to see leading her. But, from a Canadian stand-point, I confess that I would be much more inclined to give them credit for patriotism if, out of those large sums of money they are receiving from the United States and otherwise, they would contribute just a small amount to those poor people who are suffering for want of bread to eat. If they contributed something out of those funds for the relief of the people for whom they work so well, and agitate so strongly, I, at least, would be disposed to give them a little more credit for that feeling which we Canadians possess—a feeling of sympathy and love for our fellow-subjects in Ireland. It must have been very gratifying to Mr. Davitt when he took his beautiful bride from the United States to that unfortunate country—as it is sometimes called—to find that his friends in Ireland had so much practical consideration for him and for her, that they had provided him with an elegant mansion, and that their generosity enabled him to usher her into a house where her artistic tastes would be gratified, and she could enjoy herself. That was perfectly right. That young woman who was attaching herself to the Irish leader, and placing her fortunes in his hands, deserved something of that kind, and I say it was very right and proper that she should have a home provided for her. But, Sir, what about these poor, houseless and homeless Irish women and children, whom the cruelty and the want of consideration of these Irish landlords—mark you, Irish landlords—had turned out upon the streets? I have no doubt Mr. Davitt pitied them greatly; but when you and I are hungry, does pity satisfy that hunger? When you and I have been in distress, has pity lifted us out of that distress? No, Sir, we want something better than pity; and we should give the Irish people that something—give them the opportunity of feeding and clothing themselves and living in a little better way than in the hovels in which they now live. Give them a chance to restore the industries of Ireland to the position they were in at the time of the Union, and the Irish people will be happy and contented. Give to the Irish people their Home Rule—they deserve it; and if by any word this Dominion Parliament can influence the English House of Commons to eliminate from that Coercion Bill some of its objectionable features, let us say that word. Oh, Sir, I feel sad when I read some portions of that Coercion Bill. We have been told in this House that in Canada there is a Coercion Bill as severe as that. I am not prepared to contradict that statement; but if there is, Sir, we are not afraid of it—and why? Let every man answer the question for himself. Place Ireland in the position she ought to occupy, and then she will be no more afraid of a Coercion Bill than we are. Give the laboring people, the peasants of Ireland, a fair day's wage for a fair day's work, and my word for it, Sir, they will be as loyal as any people in the world. The Irishman loves to be loyal. We have been told that when an Irishman just landed in the United States was asked by his friend which party he would support, "I am," he said, "agin' the Government every time." That is a burlesque on Irishmen. They love to be loyal; they are always loyal to their friends; and let them understand that the Government is their friend, and they will be as loyal as any people in the world. Let such measures be carried into law, and let such measures be devised and put into operation as will give peace to Ireland, attract capital to the country, revive her industries, develop her resources, and call into action the latent capabilities of the people, and there will be no lack of loyalty or manifestation of discontent. I beg to thank this House for the kindness with which they have listened to my desultory and feeble remarks.

Mr. MILLS. It is worth while to notice how large a number of hon. gentlemen have expressed themselves in favor of Home Rule. Every one who has spoken, whether on that side of the House or this, has declared that he is in favor of Home Rule, though it is worthy of remark that those who have supported the amendment of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy), are ready to concede to the Irish people only such a plan of local self-government as they would be quite certain to reject. It is not many years since the vast majority of hon. gentlemen opposite were opposed to Home Rule altogether. They were then of opinion that a legislative union was preferable. They said that we, in Canada, were governed too much—that it would have been better had we but one Parliament and one centre of Executive authority; and, in their opinion, it would be a retrograde step were the present legislative union broken up and the power distributed. The zeal and earnestness with which the Irish electors of this country have supported the principle of local self-government in Ireland, have made many converts, and, it is to be hoped that those who have recently received new light, will give up the practice of encroachment upon provincial autonomy. If I rightly understand the hon. members from Muskoka and West York, they believe the Irish Home Rulers to be advocates of independence in disguise; they are disloyal, and will use any concession made to them as a basis for further demands. Were the Irish people loyal and law-abiding, they would concede a measure of Home Rule, but the present demand they will stoutly resist. They regard existing discontent as the necessary outcome of lawless perversity and incorrigible wickedness among the great mass of the Irish people. Every attempt to secure peace and goodwill, will only lead to more marked exhibitions of lawlessness and treason; every attempt to conciliate will only breed fresh disasters, and new crimes, born of innate perversity of mind, and imperishable rancor against the English race. If the hon. gentlemen were right, constitutional reforms would indeed be acts of folly. If they are right, there is no middle ground between giving Ireland absolute independence and giving her a military despotism. The hon. member for North Simcoe is very much alarmed lest this Parliament should exceed its authority, and encroach upon the legislative and administrative domain of the Imperial Parliament and ministry. The hon. member said it was our duty to consider our powers—that we have here only a delegated authority, and that the government of Ireland was not one of the matters entrusted to us. I do not know in what way the hon. member holds our powers to be delegated powers. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Queen vs. Hodge, expressly decided that the power exercised by a Colonial Legislature was not a delegated power, but original authority. The same doctrine was laid down by Lord Chief Justice Vaughan more than two centuries ago. There is no principle better established than this: that an Englishman, into whatever portion of the Empire he may go with the view of colonising and making settlement, not only carries with him the ordinary common law of the country, but the right of representation as well; and it is upon this ground that representative government exists in the colonies. But it is not necessary, in the consideration of this question, to further discuss this particular observation of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I readily admit that our constitution is a limited one; I admit that the powers we exercise are defined in the British North America Act; I admit that we have no authority to administer Irish affairs or to legislate for the Irish people; but I deny altogether that because we have not such power it is improper on our part to express any opinion with regard to the government of that country. Why, one sovereign State has no authority to administer the affairs or control the act on of another. If it had, the State over which it exercised such control would not be sovereign, but there is no fact better established than the fact that one State often does undertake to advise, does criticise, in its representative Assembly, the conduct of another State, and does, sometimes, go so far as to exercise active interference, when the manner in which the government of that other State is conducted is such as to disturb mutual relations, or create difficulties, or give rise to any danger. The principle we recognise in this matter is exactly the same as that which we recognise when one of us undertakes to deal with his own property as he thinks proper. No one claims the right to interfere with him unless he undertakes to manage his property in such a way that he endangers the rights of the owners of other property. My neighbor has the right to destroy his own house, provided in so doing he does not endanger the safety of mine. It is clear as noon-day that one State has the same right to express an opinion upon the actions of another as one man has, under certain circumstances, to remonstrate against the conduct of his neighbor. It is not necessary that a State should be independent to possess this right. In expressing an opinion on this Irish question we are not exceeding our authority a whit more than is a sovereign State when it expresses an opinion upon the action and conduct of another sovereign State. Now, when the hon. member for North Simcoe assumes that, because we have not the power to legislate, we have, therefore, no right to speak, I utterly dissent from that proposition. Were that doctrine to be acted upon, what would be our position with regard to the Fishery question. We have no immediate connection with the United States, we have no sovereign authority to deal with them with the view of settling the difficulty; but upon what grounds do we claim to possess the right to express an opinion? We do so because our interests are concerned, because we feel that we have a practical interest in the question; and in proportion as our interests are at stake, in the same proportion do we claim the moral right to impress our views upon that sovereign authority which acts on our behalf with regard to whatever negotiations may be had. The hon. gentleman thinks we ought to express no opinion; that whatever our views may be we ought to conceal them. We had better leave this question to those who are authorised to deal with it. We have twice spoken upon this subject before. The hon. member says we only expressed an opinion upon a general principle, but now we are called upon to pronounce upon a specific measure. The hon. member is mistaken. We were quite as specific in 1882 as we are asked to be on this occasion. Does the hon. gentleman forget that we expressed then an opinion on the Kilmainham imprisonment? I agree with the hon. gentleman when he says that we had better proceed by Address, but I do not agree with him when he thinks that it would be better still not to proceed at all. The hon. gentleman, both in his speech and in his motion, assumes that this House has no right to express to the Crown an opinion upon any subject upon which it has not the power to legislate; and that we are, in reason and in the fitness of things, as completely excluded from interfering with all Imperial concerns as the Governments and Legislatures of the Provinces are from interfering with the work which we here undertake. I deny that proposition. We are here as representatives from the same people who return members to the different Provincial Legislatures. These members sit in the Provincial Parliaments for the purpose of discharging certain defined duties within the limits of the constitution. They may exercise the ordinary powers of rational beings upon the general policy and conduct of their own affairs, and if our course in this Parliament were outrageous, if it encroached on the rights of the Provinces, they would equally have a right to remonstrate with regard to our conduct. But we speak here for the same population, we act on behalf of the same people as do the legislators of the Provinces, while in the Imperial Parliament we have not such representation as they have in the Dominion Parliament. The Imperial Parliament holds in this respect a position different altogether in relation to the outlying portions of the Empire from that which we hold towards the Legislatures of the Provinces within the limits of the Dominion. As we speak on the subject of Fisheries, so we may speak upon every other subject of Imperial concern that may in any way affect us, or in which humanity may prompt us to speak. Take, for instance, the case of the slave trade. The Imperial Parliament and Government sent a large force to the African coast for the purpose of suppressing the slave trade, and they entered into negotiations with other States for that purpose. What interest had the people of the United Kingdom in that particular question? What right had they to interfere with those of other States engaged in piratical enterprises of that kind, any more than we have the right to engage in the discussion of the Irish question? There is no difference between the two in principle. We know that their conduct in that matter is justified on the grounds of humanity, and upon those grounds, as well as upon the grounds of our political and material interest, we may justify our expressing an opinion on the Irish question. There are Imperial interests concerned. There is a large Irish population in Canada, and there is also a large Irish population in the United States. We know how hostile the latter are to the United Kingdom; we know how a portion of them were armed, drilled and organised, and how this country was by them hostilely invaded. We know to what expense this country was put by that invasion. Well, responsibility and authority are commensurate in the nature of things. Where we have duties imposed upon us, we have also the right of expressing our opinion. We have the right to say to the Imperial Parliament that, in consequence of your misgovernment of Ireland, you have imposed upon us larger burdens than we would otherwise have been called upon to bear, you have affected our material prosperity by affecting our relations with the neighboring Republic, and we call on you to remove the difficulty by dealing with this Irish question in the way the people demand. Give to the people of Ireland that local self-government which they seek; you will conciliate not only the Irish people residing in Ireland, but you will conciliate the people of that greater Ireland, to whom the hon. member referred, who has his bright home in the setting sun. That being the case, we are exercising the ordinary right of a legislative body in expressing an opinion upon this Irish question, and in pressing the Imperial Government to settle it in such a way as to conciliate the Irish population, so as to minimise our difficulties and increase our opportunities of establishing more intimate and more favorable commercial relations with the neighboring Republic. We all remember, those of us who have read something of mental pathology, the inhuman manner in which the insane were treated fifty years ago. At that day nothing was thought of but strait-jackets, manacles and the lash. Men whom we would suppose to be rational beings, capable of exercising sound judgment in regard to affairs, seemed to think it was the proper thing to subject to severe punishment those who were deprived of their reason, with the hope that, by exercising such control over them, they would restore them to the possession of their faculties. It seems to me that the Government of the United Kingdom has been equally barbarous, and is open to an objection of precisely the same character. There is a want of rational adaptation of means to the end, and that irritation and all the evils which arise from irritation and misgovernment, are attributed to the mental defects of the population, instead of to the obvious fact that the people are being misgoverned. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said in his speech that he did not know whether the Coercion Bill was wise or otherwise, and he was sure that every hon. member who had spoken on that subject knew even less on that subject than he did. Were it a Canadian statute, he could construe it and criticise it, but, being an Imperial Act, and dealing with a high question of State, he did not think himself competent to express an opinion upon it, and he thought the House would be acting wisely to abstain altogether from a discussion of the question; in fact, the hon. gentleman reminded us that we were all colonists, and that, being colonists, it was no part of our business to deal with any question of this sort. The hon. gentleman, it seemed to me, had brought himself to a proper state of loyal humility. It reminded me of the story told by Mr. Tims of an Irishman who was on trial, and was asked by the magistrate: "Don't you think you deserve to be hanged?" He said: "Your honor knows best; it is not for the likes of me to express an opinion upon so important a question;" and so the hon. gentleman thinks it is not for this House to express an opinion upon so important a subject as the question of local self-government in Ireland. I remember that, in the life of Sir John Eliot, by a distinguished writer, Mr. Forster, tells us a story of the towering passion into which King James I was put by a deputation of the House of Commons waiting upon him to remonstrate against the Spanish marriage. The King ordered stools to be brought in, he told the deputation to take seats, he recommended that dunce caps should be furnished them, he wanted to know at what sovereign's feet they had learned statecraft; and the hon. gentleman seems to think that, because here we are not possessed of sovereign authority, because in this country we have not the power to deal with the question of local self-government in Ireland and have not within our reach the legal remedies, we ought not to express any opinion on the subject. These views are not suited to this age. I do not think we are disqualified from doing what England did in the case of Denmark, in the case of Poland, in the case of Turkey, what she did in regard to the unification of Italy. I do not think we are precluded from expressing an opinion on a matter which affects the well-being of the Empire of which we form a part, when one sovereign State is not precluded from expressing an opinion and remonstrating against the conduct of another sovereign State. But the hon. gentleman said also that this Bill, called a Coercion Bill, was not a Coercion Bill, or, at least, in his opinion it was rather a Bill relating to criminal procedure, and that even such a Bill was not one with which we ought to interfere, that we had not the means of forming an opinion, and that we ought not to increase the difficulties of the parent State by expressing any opinion on the subject. He told us that the law in this case was aimed, not at the innocent, but at the guilty. Why, there never was an instance in which an arbitrary Government admitted that its conduct was intended to affect the innocent. There never was an instance in which those who exercised arbitrary authority admitted that they desired to do otherwise than to maintain law and order and to uphold legitimate authority. In fact, the most hateful acts of tyranny are acts having their origin in these principles of procedure of which the hon. gentleman has spoken. Does the hon.

gentleman not know that this Bill of Mr. Balfour's, if carried, will seriously interfere with the liberty of the subject? Does he not know that it will seriously imperil free discussion? The hon. gentleman says that this is simply procedure, and therefore it is not a matter which specially concerns us. The observation of the hon. gentleman reminds me of a Boston literary man who, thirty years ago, was spending a few weeks in North Carolina. The people in the place where he was stopping were anxious to pay him some attentions and do him some honor. A deputation waited upon him and invited him to come to the town hall, where a public address would be presented to him. They waited upon him to accompany him there. On the way they were met by a southern fire-eater, who said, "Why, you are honoring an abolitionist; this man I met at an abolitionist meeting in Boston, and there I saw him and heard him speak against the return of a slave to his master; he is a man who would rob us of our property, and deprive us of what rightfully belongs to us." After a few moments' discussion, the mayor, who was leading the procession, said, "We will make a slight change in the programme; I think, instead of going to the town hall, we had better go to Col. Johnson's tar-kilns." There was only a slight change in the procedure, but it made all the difference in the world to the unfortunate man who was the subject of these attentions; and so the hon. gentleman, when he says that this Bill makes a slight change in the procedure, admits that it makes a change which is of immense consequence to the Irish people. It takes from him the ordinary means of trial which the common law gives him; it gives to his landlord an opportunity of exacting the last shilling that he can wring from him without his having an opportunity to combine with his fellows with a view to agitate for amelioration or reform. It means that all the minor securities which the law gives will be taken away. It means that what is not now a crime, may be made a crime, and that what is now a constitutional means of redress, may become a crime. It means that neither platform nor press may be used for the purpose of agitation, or for the purpose of securing the necessary reforms, except in so far as those who possess a controlling interest in the direction of public affairs, and whose interest it is to maintain things as they are, choose to permit him to do so. The hon. member says that there is nothing novel in this proposition, that there is a summary trial before two magistrates, that the right of trial by jury is taken away. Oh, but, he says, the hon. leader of the Opposition, in 1877, at the time of the strike on the Grand Trunk Railway, introduced a Bill doing precisely the same thing; he says that he introduced a Bill taking away the right of trial by jury and establishing a summary trial before two magistrates. The hon. gentleman referred to the Act. Now, I beg to say that the hon. gentleman misled the House, whether intentionally or not, upon that question. The hon. gentleman knows that the party who is accused and arrested under that law, cannot be tried by two magistrates without his consent. If he asks for a trial in the ordinary way, he is entitled to have it. The Act was not intended to promote the interest of a railway corporation, or any other powerful corporation; it was intended to furnish facilities for an innocent man to regain his freedom at an early day. The ordinary sittings of the court may have passed but a short time before. The man is arrested; he is a stranger; he may be a locomotive driver who came but a few weeks before from the continent of Europe, from the United Kingdom, or from the United States. He may have no acquaintances or friends, and be unable to get bail. If he was subjected to trial in the ordinary way, he might be compelled to remain in gaol for months. Now, the Bill of my hon. friend gave him an opportunity of being tried summarily and immediately before two magistrates, giving him an opportunity to regain his freedom. It was not intended to furnish facilities to any one to hold an arbitrary trial, or exercise arbitrary authority over him. It was not because there was any distrust of the ordinary tribunals of the country, it was not because any one claimed that justice could not be done, it was not because any one said that the people sympathised with the offenders and that it was impossible for the law to be administered through the ordinary channels. The position was entirely different. There is no analogy between the Act proposed by Mr. Balfour and the Act on the Statute-book. The hon. gentleman knew, he must have known, that such was the provision of the law. Why, then, did he conceal the fact that the party was not compelled to be tried summarily by two magistrates, but he had the option of being so tried if he thought proper to seek a trial in that way in order to obtain an early discharge? Why, Sir, there is an instance, an ancient Roman precedent, of trial by two magistrates. We have an account of a trial on one occasion by two magistrates in Judea. They did not sit together; Herod and Pilate sat separately, but their sitting separately, and sitting as judges in the same case, seemed to have had the effect of making them friends, and the necessary inference would be that these gentlemen afterwards sat together. And so the hon. gentleman might have found in sacred writ an instance of the summary trial of an innocent man by two magistrates, and he might have found in that instance a better illustration of that Bill, upon which he asks us to abstain from expressing an opinion, than in the Act of my hon. friend which he misrepresented and misquoted in this House. Now, we know what the intention of the Imperial Government is in introducing this Bill. Lord Salisbury has not left us in the dark, for more than a year ago he declared that arbitrary government established in Ireland for a period of twenty years might so educate and discipline the Irish people, that they would be fit for the ordinary government of a civilised community. Lord Salisbury proposed to revive the ancient system of "Thorough" in Ireland, and this Bill, it is clear, is simply carrying out the exact intention of his lordship. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said in his speech that the Irish are better off than any other portion of the people of the British Isles, so far as their government is concerned. They are more favored. The hon. gentleman says that the Irish tenant is protected by the court from exorbitant charges. He admits that a man occupying the position of an ordinary Irish tenant, is not free to make a contract with his landlord; he admits that Mr. Gladstone, in his measure, properly interfered with the authority of the landlord; but the hon. gentleman says, having so interfered in carrying this measure, the Irish tenant is better off than a tenant either in England or Scotland. Now, the hon. gentleman seemed to forget that a very large portion of the Irish tenantry are not holders under Mr. Gladstone's Bill. It is only those who have complained and gone before the Land Courts and had their case adjudicated upon, that are so placed. Then, further than that, we know that there has been such a fall in the prices of agricultural produce that the tenant who has secured a reduction based upon prices as they were, is now no better, or little better off than he was before the Court interfered. The hon. gentleman has forgotten the opposition with which this measure was met. He has forgotten that men high in place denounced it as a robbery of the landlord. He seems to have forgotten the views that were expressed by the Duke of Argyle, by Lord Salisbury and other noblemen, who interfered on behalf of the landlord, and who altered and changed the Bill, and who made it a very much less beneficial measure than it was as it passed the House of Commons. He knows that they have exercised sleepless vigilance with a view to protecting what they claim to be their interests, against any possible concession to the vast majority of the Irish people; and knowing such to be the case, I think the hon. gentleman would have been warranted in coming to the conclusion that the Irish people had not been legislated for in their interests, and in the interests of the Empire, but their interests have been subordinated to those of the small minority who have long exercised a controlling and mischievous influence in the government of the country. The hon. gentleman said: Mr. Parnell and his associates are rebels, and the associates of assassins; that Mr. Parnell has sympathised with assassination; that a letter appears over his signature showing that to be the case; and that, until he purges himself of that accusation, this House ought not to express an opinion upon the question of Home Rule, nor our disapprobation of Mr. Balfour's Bill. How is Mr. Parnell to vindicate himself? The Times publishes a letter; that letter is in the possession of the Times. It is asserted, and I dare say, correctly so, that every expert in handwriting has been retained in the interest of the Times. Well, where will Mr. Parnell have this matter tried? Wherever he may go those paid witnesses will appear in court against him. There is not a place he can go where jurymen who have strong political feelings and prejudices might not be had. Although there might be eleven out of the twelve to pronounce him guiltless and hold the letter to be a forgery, one jurymen would be sufficient to damn his reputation under the existing circumstances. We know with what fierce animosity Mr. Parnell is pursued by a very considerable portion of the people of the United Kingdom. The publication of the article in the Times, the challenge that has been put forward, all indicate the very strong feeling of animosity that actuates those who are attacking Mr. Parnell in this matter. But suppose Mr. Parnell were guilty, suppose it was true that he had written this letter and had associated himself with persons who were criminals, who were of as vile a character as the Times has asserted, is that any reason why the Irish people should be misgoverned and oppressed and deprived of local self government? Is that any reason why we should abstain from expressing an opinion upon the question? Everyone remembers the charge made against Mazzini, that he was accused of plotting the assassination of King Bomba and other petty tyrants in Italy, and yet the people of England did not abstain on that account from sympathising with the cause of Italian nationality. Take the case of Louis Napoleon. He was elected President of the French Republic, and swore to uphold and maintain the Republican Government in France. He, however, conspired to overturn that Government, and he did it by shooting down men, women and children in the streets of Paris and wading through the blood of those whom he ought to have protected to the throne; and when he got there Lord Palmerston sent him a letter of congratulation. It is true Lord Palmerston was dismissed from office. It was not, however, on account of the moral turpitude of his act, but because he did not agree with Baron Stockmar and Prince Albert. Afterwards the Government of Lord Aberdeen entered into an alliance with Napoleon and carried on the war with Russia. Did any public man in England, did any portion of the press denounce that alliance because of Napoleon's character. Napoleon was an ally of Count Cavour when he was seeking to secure the unification of Italy in 1859. We find when public men are dealing with important public questions, they do not stop to consider whether there may be men of bad reputation taking the same side. Why, if Christianity itself had been subjected to such a trial it could not have succeeded. That is not the rule. During the American war General Hooker was, for a short time, commander of the army of the Potomac, and General Jackson was a very prominent officer on the Confederate side. Hooker had the reputation of being a very profane man, and Jackson that of a man of very great piety and of unsullied private character. What would be thought if a northern man had proposed to desert Hooker because of his profanity and join the Confederate side because of Jackson's piety? Everyone knew there was something more than the private character of the leaders on each side involved. There was some other issue than that of the private worth of men who came to the front on each side. The Almighty had heard the cry of the slave and came down to deliver him. Every one, whether belonging to the northern army or southern army, knew that the struggle was respecting slavery, and that if a man deserted the northern army to join the south he was not only a traitor to his cause but a traitor to the great cause of freedom and modern civilisation. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that the people of Ireland are not oppressed, because they have in proportion to their population a larger measure of representation in the House of Commons than the people of England or Scotland. That is no doubt true, thanks to Mr. Gladstone's efforts. But we know right well that Lord Randolph Churchill, Lord Salisbury and others who now control the Government, complained that the franchise was given to 400,000 Irish people living in mud huts, who were thereby placed on a footing equal to those in better circumstances. We know right well that, notwithstanding there is a large representation, its members are overborne by those who have prejudices against them, who are not willing to concede them the rights which they believe to be essential to the peace, well-being and prosperity of Ireland. What part in the government of Ireland has any one of its leaders ever had; what part had any prominent Irishman seeking to bring about Irish reform ever had in the direction of affairs of the United Kingdom? We know that O'Connell, although the ablest man of his day from Ireland, was never invited to be a member of any Administration. We know that the vast majority of those who now rule the United Kingdom would no more think of inviting a member of the Home Rule party to become a member of the Government and assist in the direction of its affairs, than would the President of the United States think of inviting a freed man to become a member of his Cabinet. We know the outcry raised when Lord Melbourne made two or three Roman Catholics members of the Privy Council, although it was simply an honor; we know that his Government was materially shaken because certain gentlemen high in social position were made members of the Privy Council. There is a tide in the affairs of nations, as well as in those of individuals, which, taken at the flood, may lead to general prosperity and general contentment. Such opportunities have occurred in the history of Ireland more than once. Such an opportunity occurred at the time the Treaty of Limerick was negotiated. Such an opportunity occurred in Ireland again when the Union was brought about. If the people who had suffered for a century under misgovernment in Ireland, who had been degraded, persecuted, impoverished, and beggared, had been fairly dealt with at the time the Union was established on the plan which Mr. Burke and Mr. Pitt contemplated, there is no doubt that the Irish people would have been content. But, as far as Ireland was concerned, the Union was the only portion of that determination which was carried into effect. The moment the Union was carried every other necessary reform was neglected, and Castle government continued, as far as Ireland was concerned, during the eighty-seven years which have elapsed since the Union as it had continued during the one hundred and five years between the Treaty of Limerick and the Union. If the Union had been carried out upon the plans which had been originally contemplated by the statesmen who proposed it there is little room to doubt that the people of Ireland would have accepted the union with England, as the people of Scotland did their union with that country in the time of Queen Anne. But it was because those plans were not carried out, because the Government was still left in the hands of those who had before abused their authority, because the minority—the persecuting and intolerant minority who had inflicted such greivous wrong on the country—were allowed to continue their course, that Ireland has been discontented with the Union, as she was discontented with the system of government which prevailed before the Union was established. I have stated that since the revolution there have been two opportunities—I might say three opportunities—for reconciling the Irish people with the other portions of the United Kingdom. The first of these was in the negotiations for the Treaty of Limerick. Under that treaty the Irish nobility were to have been restored to their rights, notwithstanding that the cause for which they had fought was lost, and the Irish disabilities, which were then few in number, were to have been removed. But the moment that General Sarsfield surrendered an intolerant faction insisted on the treaty being disregarded, and its provisions being limited to those who had been confined within the walls of Limerick. The men who were the natural leaders of the people were driven into exile; they sought the service which—denied to them at home—their bravery and their genius secured for them in Spain, France and Austria. The necessary bond by which the great mass of the people would have been united to the Government of the Empire was driven out, and the people were in a great measure left without leaders. We know the kind of intolerant legislation which existed at that time; we know the disabilities which were imposed. We know that there was legislation during the century which preceded the Union, such as that which is to be found on the Statute-book of no other country in Christendom. We know that there were laws forbidding Roman Catholics to be educated at home or abroad; laws providing that if property were lost at sea, during a war with any continental power, by any Protestant in any portion of Ireland, it should be made good to him by a tax imposed on the Roman Catholics in the county in which he lived. There were laws disfranchising the Roman Catholic population; laws forbidding any private gentleman to engage an Irish Catholic as a gamekeeper; laws forbidding Roman Catholics from practising as solicitors, barristers or medical men; laws prohibiting them from engaging in teaching. They were not even permitted to serve as private tutors, without a license from the Protestant Bishop of the diocese in which they resided. This was the kind of legislation which that minority that hon. gentlemen are so anxious to protect, inflicted on the Irish people during the century that the government was in their hands. It is true that during the seventeen years in which Grattan's Parliament, as it is called, existed, some remedial measures were proposed. It is true that Roman Catholic Irishmen and Non-conformists were allowed to hold certain civil and military offices. It is true that they were, in a better position for a time than they were before. But we know it was the influence of Lord Rockingham, Lord Grey, and other gentlemen pressing upon them for the time being, and controlling the placemen, as they were called, who numbered one hundred and twenty out of three hundred Irishmen, that enabled them to carry out these measures. We know that the moment that these Liberal statesmen were driven from office in England the old system was revived, even in Grattan's Parliament. We know the extraordinary persecutions that took place after the rebellion of 1798: how men were shot and hanged, pitch-capped and cropped; their scalps covered with powder which was then set fire to. We know that General Abercrombie declared that the soldiers who were let loose to butcher the Irish population were dangerous to everybody but the enemy. We know that Lord Cornwallis declared that even at his own table the murder of the peasant population was a common topic of conversation, and the principal pastime of the military. These men knew that they ran no risk in taking the life of an Irish peasant because the House of Commons would not interfere in his behalf. This was the condition of things which existed when the Union was established, and it is because Irishmen had been so ground down, persecuted, oppressed and wronged that they were ready to accept the Union, if it had carried with it the freedom which was intended when Pitt proposed the measure. I say, then, that an opportunity existed at that time by which the people of Ireland might have been united to the other portion of the United Kingdom, as the people of Scotland and Wales are at this moment. Why was it not done? It was because the same system of intolerance, though perhaps milder in form, was perpetuated under the government of the Union, as it had been under the Government which preceded it. We know, Sir, that when Lord Granville's Government, in 1807, proposed that certain offices in the army and navy and in the civil service might be held by Roman Catholics, he was driven from power; that the vast majority of those in authority were against him; that a new Government was organised which laid down, as a maxim of its policy: "The King, the Church, and no Popery,"—two positive and one negative plank in its platform. It was on that line that the government of Ireland and the United Kingdom was conducted down until Mr. O'Connell secured Catholic emancipation in 1829. Everybody knows that the effort put forward by O'Connell secured emancipation. He adopted a course that the people were ready to pursue, because they were devoted to him and regarded his advice as wise. But we know that the Government who granted that concession declared that they did so, not because they thought it was right or just, but because they said that otherwise there would have been civil war. It is not surprising, therefore, that this concession, made after thirty years of denied justice and hopes deferred, the people of Ireland refused to credit to their enemies the victory due to their own exertions and to the patience, perseverance and eloquence of their leader. Now, let me call the attention of the House to the circumstances surrounding that concession. Mr. O'Connell had been elected for Clare. Because he was Roman Catholic he could not take the Oath of Supremacy, and he was not allowed to take his seat. The measure of Catholic Emancipation having been carried, it would have been a gracious act to provide in the same Bill that he should be entitled to take his seat. But the Government was hostile to him because he had forced the measure upon them, and they compelled him again to seek election after the measure became law. Before emancipation was granted the qualification of the Irish voter was a freehold of the annual value of £2, which was at once increased to £10; so that while Emancipation was granted, the vast majority of the Irish voters were disfranchised; and that continued to be the law until 1884, when Mr. Gladstone put the people of Ireland in this respect upon a footing of equality with those of other parts of the United Kingdom. But let me turn for a moment to the legislation had since the time of the Union regulating the relation between landlord and tenant. In 1816 a measure was carried in the British Parliament to enable the landlord, in anticipation of a loss of rent, to take possession of the crops and the estate of his tenant—to put a caretaker in charge and harvest the crop if he chose, at the expense of the tenant,—not because the tenant had been guilty of any forfeiture or failure in the performance of his portion of the contract, but as security against such failure. Then, by the Act of 1818, the landlord could bring an action of ejectment against the tenant, against which the tenant could make no defence until he first gave security for costs; and as many of the tenants could not give such security, they were deprived by Act of Parliament of means of defending their rights. And yet we are told that the people of Ireland ought to be contented with the general policy of the Government since the Union. I might, Sir, give other instances to show the way in which the government of Ireland has been administered; but I think I have cited sufficient to show this House that General Buller did not express himself too strongly when he said that the law was in the interest of the landlord and against the tenant; and that has always been the policy of legislation for Ireland until remedial measures were proposed by Mr. Gladstone. Now, let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the measure of 1870, for that was the first measure in a period of seventy years in the interest of the peasant population of Ireland. One of the provisions of that Act is that a tenant, if he is evicted, may recover from the landlord compensation for his improvements to a limited extent, but that compensation cannot exceed the rental value for a certain number of years. Under that measure the landlord had the power of indefinitely increasing the rents, but the tenant had no power to collect any portion of the moneys he expended in improving his landlord's property so long as he was not disturbed in his possession. It was only when he was evicted that he could obtain any compensation. A provision was inserted in that measure in the House of Lords, providing that if the tenant was evicted for non-payment of rent, then he could collect nothing, even though his improvements might have exceeded in value seven-fold the amount of rent due. That is the measure which has been spoken of as a measure for robbing the landlord of his rights. Are men who are so prejudiced by their interests and by a long course of legislation in their favor, capable of dealing fairly with the great mass of the peasant population of Ireland? Sir, we are told that the Irish people are lawless and discontented, that they set law at defiance, and are therefore not entitled to our sympathy or moral support. I hold in my hand the Nineteenth Century for 1886. Among the articles in it is one upon the subject of Home Rule, by Mr. Godkin, the very able editor of the New York Nation, a man who has given a great deal of attention to this subject, and whose observations are worthy of all consideration. He describes the condition of the southern States during the period that the carpet-bag governments existed there, when the Freedmen's Bureau was established, and when the state governments set up by the people of the north exercised a controlling influence over the affairs of the south. The Ku-Klux Klan was called into existence. This secret society committed depredations far more outrageous and numerous than those committed upon the landholders in Ireland. The governments of those States were practically powerless. When one reads the report, of which Mr. Godkin gives a summary, that was made in the Committee of Congress on the subject, one imagines he is reading a report of the condition of things in Ireland, as described by the present Irish Secretary. This is what the committee state in their report:

"There is a remarkable concurrence of testimony to the effect that, in those of the late rebellious States into whose condition we have examined, the courts and juries administer justice between man and man in all ordinary cases, civil and criminal; and while there is this concurrence on this point, the evidence is equally decisive that redress cannot be obtained against those who commit crimes in disguise and at night. The reasons assigned are that identification is difficult, almost impossible; that, when this is attempted, the combinations and oaths of the order come in and release the culprit by perjury, either upon the witness-stand or in the jury-box; and that the terror inspired by their acts, as well as the public sentiment in their favor in many localities, paralyses the arm of civil power.

"The murders and outrages which have been perpetrated in many counties of Middle and West Tennessee, during the past few months, have been so numerous, and of such an aggravated character, as almost baffles investigation. In these counties a reign of terror exists which is so absolute in its nature that the best of citizens are unable or unwilling to give free expression to their opinions. The terror inspired by the secret organisation known as the Ku-Klux Klan is so great, that the officers of the law are powerless to execute its provisions, to discharge their duties, or to bring the guilty perpetrators of these outrages to the punishment they deserve. Their stealthy movements are generally made under cover of night, and under masks and disguises, which render their identification difficult, if not impossible. To add to the secrecy which envelops their operations, is the fact that no information of their murderous acts can be obtained without the greatest difficulty and danger in the localities where they are committed. No one dares to inform upon them, or take any measures to bring them to punishment, because no one can tell but that he may be the next victim of their hostility or animosity. The members of this organisation, with their friends, aiders and abettors, take especial pains to conceal all their operations."

And so on. The committee report as to the condition of things that existed in the southern States. In 1876 Mr. Hays withdrew the military from the south. The carpet-baggers were compelled to follow. The Government passed into the hands of the natural leaders of the population, and what was the effect? All difficulties disappeared, and the law is as effectually administered in the southern States at this hour as it is in any other portion of the North American continent. All these crimes have disappeared, all these political offences are matters of history and no longer matters of actual occurrence. Mr. Godkin goes on to say:

"What I seek to show is that the Irish are not peculiar in their manner of expressing their discontent of a Government directed or controlled by the public opinion of another indifferent or semi-hostile community which it is impossible to resist in open warfare; that Anglo-Saxons resort to somewhat the same methods under similar circumstances, and that lawlessness and cruelty, considered as expressions of political animosity, do not necessarily argue any incapacity for the conduct of an orderly and efficient government, although I admit freely that they do argue a low state of civilisation."

Everything Mr. Godkin there said with regard to the condition of things in the south has been said with regard to the condition of things in Ireland. Those who have examined into the question know that crime was manifold greater in the south under this secret organisation than it ever was in Ireland by her resisting the arbitrary exercise of authority on the part of the landlord. I believe it is wholly impossible at this day for the people of Ireland to be fairly governed, so far as all their local affairs are concerned, by any other than themselves. No one who has examined into the administration of justice there can be ignorant of the fact that there is no justice administered as between one class of the community and the other. While the ordinary magistrate may act fairly between one peasant and another peasant, and as between one landholder and another, he does not act fairly between the landholder and the ordinary peasant. The great mass of the population have been subjected to and governed by regulations that are no part of the law of the land. On nine-tenths of the estates a peasant cannot permit his son or daughter to marry without a license, or certificate from the agent. He cannot harbor anybody over night, he cannot exercise ordinary hospitality without a license from the agent. More than that, we find that the peasant is subjected to extraordinary charges, sometimes amounting to very much more than even the amount of his rent, which is exorbitant. I hold in my hand the account of one Irish agent, who, in the course of a few years, in addition to his salary as agent, managed to save £7,600, which he had arbitrarily wrung from the peasants of the estate of which he was agent. He is a magistrate, his landlord is absent, and provided he collects and remits the rent, his landlord cares nothing further. The cases in which he sits are practically between himself and the tenants, and he imposes such fines and makes such charges as he pleases. True, the tenant might appeal, but if in arrears, he is at once evicted so that he must choose between submitting to regulations of this sort and being driven out on the highway. Let me read one or two extracts to show how some of the estates are managed. In one case, reported by Mr. Crosbie, he says:

"An old man, Peter Shea, of Ardea, lived to the age of eighty-eight years as tenant on the estate. He was one of those persons whom philosophers would call benefactors to mankind, for he made many a blade of grass grow where none ever grew before. In his young days he entered upon a barren waste, built a house. With two out-houses, he subsoiled a great part of the land, erected a thousand perches of double fence, and made such other improvements as his skill enabled him on that patch of mountain. During his lifetime he did well. But he lived too long. For at the advanced age I have mentioned he violated the matrimonial regulations by allowing his son to marry a widow possessed of some means. The obnoxious couple were satisfied to emigrate to America, and did in fact go, like the rest of the expatriated, at the expense of the estate. But the poor old man of eighty-eight, with his wife, eighty years of age, was ejected from his little holding."

He reports another case equally outrageous, in which the wife of a man who had been ejected, was given, while ill of fever, shelter. The tenant who gave her shelter was fined a gale of rent. Driven out, and with every tenant on the estate afraid to afford her a refuge, the miserable woman went about two miles up the mountain, and, sick as she was, and so situated, took shelter in a dry cavern, in which she lived for several days. The cave was the common possession of those tenants, and when it was found the woman had taken refuge there, they were each mulcted in a gale of rent. Let me take an instance of the manner in which the agents who are magistrates conduct the affairs of the realm. I take the case of one Mr. Quill who is an agent on an estate. There is a tenancy of fourteen acres at £14. A lease is given, and Mr. Quill draws the lease and charges £3 less 2s. Then his wife demands pin money, and he gives £2 as pin money. Mind, the total amount of the rent is only £14. He had borrowed the amount of £2 18s. to pay for drawing the lease and £2 as pin money for the wife. She says: It is not enough; and so sells his cow in order to pay her £3 more. This is a fair illustration of the way in which many of the Irish estates are managed. I would like to know what justice the great mass of the population are likely to receive at the hands of magistrates so appointed, and whose interests point in such a direction. What confidence can the people have in the law when they find that the law is made an instrument of oppression to the advantage of the class who are practically their masters? It is only when the Government passes into the hands of the great mass of the population that this evil can be remedied. The minority in Ireland have had an opportunity of governing the country for nearly two hundred years, and they have signally failed, and I think it is high time that the majority should now have their turn. I think that this House would be wanting in its duty to itself and to humanity if it failed to express an opinion disapproving of the Coercion Bill, and recommending to the Imperial Parliament a measure of Home Rule such as the Irish people are themselves willing to accept.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I had not intended to offer any observations on the resolutions now before the House, but I think, from the opening remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, it is perhaps necessary for persons occupying the position I do, to define our position in regard to this question. That hon. gentleman seemed to infer that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), in moving their amendments, were opposed to the system of Home Rule for Ireland. I cannot remember his language exactly, but I think the purport of it was that they had expressed the view that there was a deep-seated hatred in the people of Ireland towards English rule, and that they would be satisfied with nothing less than entire separation from Great Britain. I do not think that the remarks made by those hon. gentlemen justify that inference. At all events, I do not wish it to be inferred that because I support the amendment which has been moved, I entertain views hostile to a system of Home Rule for Ireland. I am one of those that regret that this discussion has been again forced upon the attention of this House. I sympathise with the view that it is entirely outside of our line of duty as representing the people of this Dominion. It is certainly a question over which we have no power to legislate, and, whatever may be our rights in regard to this matter—this question has been ably discussed by the member who has just sat down and the hon. member for Simcoe—whatever may be our rights in regard to it, I cannot see how the discussion which has taken place here during the last few days, or any resolution which we may pass, can be of any permanent good either to the Irish cause or the Irish people; and I feel that, so far as my own constituents are concerned, and I believe the greater portion of the electors of this Dominion, they would prefer that the time of this Parliament should not be spent in discussing questions of this character, in which we are not directly interested and the discussion of which we cannot influence. While, therefore, I support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Simcoe, and shall vote for it, I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to a just measure of Home Rule for Ireland. This term "Home Rule," however, appears to be a sort of ambiguous or indefinite term. From the majority of the speeches which have been delivered here, I believe, it is generally understood in this House that Home Rule for Ireland means giving them a constitution somewhat similar to the one which we enjoy in the Dominion of Canada at the present time. If by that we mean that Home Rule for Ireland places Ireland in the same relation to Great Britain that the Dominion of Canada stands in to-day in relation to the British Empire, I believe that such a scheme is utterly impossible. I cannot conceive it possible that the people of Ireland in the position in which they are placed, could occupy such a relation, that they could have the same character of a Parliament, that they could have the same legislative powers that we as a Dominion enjoy to-day. But, if, on the other hand, it is meant by Home Rule for Ireland that they should stand in the same relation to Great Britain that the different Provinces of this Dominion occupy towards the general Government, I can conceive that such a scheme may be practicable. I am quite prepared to advocate some such scheme as that, or at all events to support it. Indeed, Home Rule as I understand it means giving to the people of Ireland control of their local matters, matters which are purely Irish matters as distinguished from subjects affecting the welfare of the United Kingdom; and I may say that, if that is the meaning of the term, I for one sympathise with the advocates of Home Rule, and I am further in favor of extending the same principle not only to Ireland, but to England, and Scotland, and to every other section of the British Empire. The resolution which was moved by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) goes much farther than expressing our approval of such a measure of Home Rule. The most objectionable feature in this resolution is its reference to the measure, the Crimes Bill or the Coercion Bill, or whatever we may choose to call it, which is at the present time being discussed in the British Parliament, and which, since this resolution has been introduced, has passed the House of Commons, I believe, by a majority of about one hundred. I fully sympathise with the view which has been expressed that we are not in a position here to pass an intelligent judgment upon this measure. We have not the necessary information. We have not that measure before us, and we are not acquainted with the circumstances under which the British Government may consider that measure necessary, or the evidence which has led them to introduce it in the British Parliament. I rather incline to the opinion, from such evidence as we have before us, from the light which we have been able to obtain on this measure during this discussion, that it is not so very stringent a coercive measure, as the hon. mover of this resolution would lead us to believe. I rather incline to the opinion that it is a reasonable measure, and, perhaps, a necessary measure for the preservation of order and the protection of life and property under the state of things existing in Ireland at the present time. But, however that may be, the greatest objection I see to introducing such a clause as that in any resolution we may pass, is that to my mind it offers a direct encouragement to violence and crime. Whatever may be the views which we, sitting in this Parliament, entertain with regard to Home Rule for Ireland, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that a large number of those who are engaged in this agitation consider Home Rule for Ireland synonymous with the entire separation of that island from Great Britain, with the establishment of an entirely separate and independent people. We cannot, either, close our eyes to the fact that the more violent among those who are engaged in the agitation, are openly advocating assassination and the use of dynamite; that they are continually inciting the people of Ireland to murder and crime, and other forms of violence, in order to secure their object. Now, the objection which I think can be urged against the resolution as it was originally introduced is this, that while it can be of no practical good to the Irish people, by influencing the British Parliament and Government, it would be a direct encouragement to the class of people to whom I have just referred as being engaged in promoting this agitation by acts of violence. I do not mean to say that such is the intention of the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution; I do not believe it is the intention of any of the hon. gentlemen who support that resolution that it should have this effect; but, nevertheless, this will be the practical effect of it; it will be interpreted by the more violent class of agitators, both in the Old Country and in America, as an endorsement of the course which they have pursued in the past, and an encouragement for them to pursue the same course in the future. Under these circumstances I think it is not wise that this Parliament should pass the resolution. The expressions which are used in this resolution, I think, fully justify the inference, or the statement, I have just made. It refers to the present Bill in the British Parliament as a most stringent coercive measure by which the Irish people will be deprived of rights most dear to British subjects. It expresses regret that this measure has been introduced, and asks us to protest against it. In speaking of the measure of Home Rule, which we wish the people of Ireland to enjoy, it says a measure similar to that of the Dominion of Canada, one which shall satisfy the national aspirations of the people of Ireland. I think these are sentiments which, if expressed in a resolution by this Parliament, would justify the class of agitators to which I have referred, in regarding it as an endorsement of the views which they entertain, and an endorsement of the policy which they are pursuing. It is for this reason that I, for one, while quite favorable to granting to the people of Ireland a just measure of Home Rule, which will give them control of their local affairs, cannot support that resolution in its present form, therefore I shall have pleasure in voting for the amendment introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); if that fails I shall cast my vote in favor of the amendment of the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill).

Mr. GIGAULT. The propriety of passing resolutions like those now before the House has been already admitted, and I do not think any more discussion upon that point is necessary. We have, I think, only to examine whether the measure of Home Rule proposed by the resolution is calculated to do good to Ireland and England. The hon. member for Queen's, N. S. (Mr. Freeman) who spoke this afternoon, said: What will a Dublin Parliament do for Ireland? If he does not know what a Dublin Parliament will do for Ireland, we know what the Imperial Parliament has done to destroy the happiness and prosperity of Ireland. Mr. Froude, a most eminent historian says:

"England governed Ireland for her own interest, as if right and wrong had been blotted out of the Statute-book of the universe."

I can also quote another high authority, Lord Dufferin, who, in speaking of Ireland, says :

"One by one each of her nascent industries was either strangled in its birth, or bound to the jealous custody of the rival interest in England, until at last every fountain of wealth was hermetically sealed."

Is local self-government a good thing? The best authorities who wrote on that subject all say, that when a country is inhabited by men of different creeds and different origins, we must resort to local self-government to secure the peace and tranquillity of such a country. Here is what De Maistre says of the constitution and of the laws which should be adopted to secure the welfare and prosperity of a people :

"Qu'est-ce qu'une constitution? N'est-ce pas la solution du problème suivant: Etant données la population, les mœurs, la religion, la situation géographique, les relations politiques, les bonnes et mauvaises qualités d'une certaine nation, trouver les lois qui lui conviennent?"

That is the reason why local self-government is necessary in order to have a good government. Every time that legislators have departed from the principles propounded by De Maistre, the nation thus legislated for has been unhappy. As long as the Hungarians were deprived of local self-governments there was no happiness for them. The Poles and the Irishmen have been unhappy because they had no local self-government. Moreover, the argumentation of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) proves that local self-government is absolutely necessary in Ireland. He says that if Mr. Gladstone's scheme is adopted the Protestant minority, as to their religion and institutions, will have to suffer. Well, if that hon. gentleman thinks it is a bad thing to leave the Protestant minority of Ireland at the mercy of the Catholic majority of that country, yet he wishes to leave the Catholics of Ireland at the mercy of the Protestant majority of England. Such is the logic of the hon. member for North Bruce. If such reasoning was adopted by every legislator, I would despair seeing justice reigning in any country. But the hon. member for North Bruce said he was willing to grant some form of Home Rule for Ireland, and he spoke in favor of the Imperial federation scheme. I think that by that scheme we would give to the Imperial Parliament much more than we would receive from it. For my part I am completely opposed to that scheme, and to deprive ourselves of any powers we now possess. When we see how the present Ministers of England are treating Ireland—that they are adopting a Coercion Bill in order to force upon that country laws that do not suit it, I do not want Canadians to be ruled by the Imperial Parliament and to be exposed to any Coercion Act. I was not surprised to see the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) oppose the present Home Rule resolution. In pursuance of his antecedents, when we remember that he is the chief promoter in this country of the Imperial federation scheme, we might easily come to the conclusion that he was opposed to the passing of the resolutions proposed by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). We know that the member for North Simcoe is not very friendly to minorities, for we remember he said in his speech at Barrie that French Canadians would be a danger to the confederacy so long as they would remain French. What does that mean? The hon. gentleman wants French Canadians to forget their past, to give up the use of their language, to abandon their institutions, for otherwise, according to his opinion, they would be a danger to Confederation. I hope the present resolutions will have the good effect of assisting Irishmen in procuring Home Rule and self-government; but if they have not that good effect they will have had, at least, the advantage of making known the principles of certain members of this House. The merit or demerit of a political man or party consists of the principles proposed and supported by that man or by that political party, and we must trust or mistrust that man or that party according to the nature of those principles. I always understood that to be a Conservative it was not necessary to be a Tory; because, if I had thought that to be a Conservative it was necessary to be a Tory, I would never have followed the Conservative party. I hate toryism as much as I hate demagogism and radicalism. I know that fifty years ago Conservatives were Tories, that they then refused the minority the right to administer their own affairs, and to have its legitimate share in the administration of public affairs. I had thought that toryism could not be found any more in the ranks of the Conservative party; but I am sorry to see that some members of the Conservative party from Ontario have decided to be yet Tory and to follow a Tory policy. In his speech the other night, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), did violence to historical truth. He contended that the French Canadians were opposed to the Act of Union because they were opposed to responsible government.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, the hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me. I was answering the hon. member from Quebec Centre (Mr. Laurier), who said that they rejoiced in responsible government. My argument was that they obtained that responsible government by that Act of Union to which they were opposed.

Mr. GIGAULT. If we opposed the Act of Union it was not because it was granting us responsible government, but because it contained some unjust and arbitrary clauses; it was because, as Mr. O'Connell said in his speech in the House of Commons, the French Canadians were not put upon a footing of exact equality with the other inhabitants of the country, for they had not the number of representatives to which they were entitled by virtue of the number of their population, and the liabilities of Upper Canada were to be paid in such a way as to be an injustice to Lower Canada. I rejoice that Mr. O'Connell thought fit then to defend the French Canadians, and I am glad to say that almost all the French Canadians sympathise with the Irishmen in their efforts to obtain Home Rule. In doing so we are only paying a debt of gratitude to Mr. O'Connell, or rather to the people whom he represented; and I hope that sooner or later, we shall see local self-government in Ireland, that it will help to secure the satisfaction, the harmony and peace of that country, and will make the bonds between Ireland and England closer than they are to-day.

After Recess.

Mr. CURRAN. In making the few remarks which I intend to offer, after the debate which has gone on for the last three or four days, I may be permitted in the first place to express the satisfaction I feel that the debate should have been conducted in a spirit so free from acrimony, considering how exciting the question was that has been under our consideration. I desire to thank hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House for their kindly allusions to myself and the manner in which I presented the case I had in hand, and to state that the tone of the present debate is certainly something upon which we may congratulate ourselves, if we look back to some of the circumstances that have surrounded like discussions in the past. We have, Sir, before us not merely the main motion that has been presented to this House by myself, seconded by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), but we have presented to us two amendments, neither of which I believe can be acceptable to the vast majority of those who hold a seat in this Parliament. I may as well declare at the outset that it is my intention, with the permission of the House, to adopt the suggestions which have been made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and if this House should not consent to my doing so, then an hon. gentleman at the proper time will adopt those suggestions and present to the Chair a resolution in amended form. In passing briefly in review the speeches that have been made in opposition to the resolution I proposed, I think it my duty to do so in the kindest spirit, although a certain amount of violence of language was used, more particularly by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). It is not my intention to discuss the speech which that hon. gentleman has delivered on the floor of this House. I think that the hon. member is not altogether responsible for the speech that he has delivered here. In fact, in the most good natured manner I can possibly put it, I would say that I really believe that the hon. gentleman came into this world about eighty years after his time. He should have figured in the old days when "they were hanging men and women for the wearing of the green." Certainly I cannot say anything more severe of him, because I actually prefer that he should give me the blunt, direct opposition he has given me on the present occasion to the peculiarly unfortunate support he gave myself and friends at the time the Home Rule question was before the House last Session. I now proceed to allude briefly to the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) who moved the amendment. I certainly cannot complain of the tone in which he discussed this question; in fact, I ought to be grateful for the exceedingly complimentary manner in which he alluded to myself and the observations I made. However, if he is not with us, if he has a strong love, as he says he has, for the old land; if he be an Irishman—and no doubt he is—and loves Ireland, I think there is one thing pretty clear, and that is that he loves England and the British Government, of the present day, a great deal better. He will not be convinced by what has convinced the whole civilised world. He would not be convinced by what has drawn forth the blame and censure of nearly every journal you take in your hands, from either the neighboring Republic or the Dominion of Canada. He will not say that the system of coercion should be changed. He cannot find it in his heart to express even a regret that that system should not be changed. On the contrary, he absolutely refrains from saying one word in connection with this drastic measure, which has been foreshadowed as something which would completely eclipse anything in the shape of coercion that has taken place for many years past; he cannot find it in his heart to blame that, or to say one word with reference to it in connection with the gentlemen who are now controlling affairs in the Imperial Parliament. But, Sir, I believe the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that he belongs to the Orange organisation, and that there is one thing at all events, as a newspaper said a short time ago, that we can feel a certain amount of pleasure in, and it is this: that even a member of that organisation, with its past history, having lived in this Canada of ours, having enjoyed Home Rule and seen its influence and its benefits in bringing men together of the most diverse opinions on other subjects, has brought forward a resolution, no doubt speaking in the name of those with whom he is associated, in which he has declared emphatically that he reiterates the good wishes for Home Rule that have been expressed in this House on two occasions, and that he himself would like to see, and those for whom he speaks would like to see, a measure of Home Rule which would satisfy the Irish people and at the same time give protection to the minority in Ireland. No man in this country, of any party, can object to such protection being given, to checks and guarantees in the constitution being given, to the minority in Ireland, just the same as we have checks and guarantees for the protection of the minority in each of the Provinces of the Dominion of Canada. And although in the Province of Ontario a howl was raised some time ago, and an attempt made to impress on the people the idea that those checks and guarantees and rights should be interfered with, one thing is certain, throughout the length and breadth of the land the cry went up from the Canadian people, not merely where that unfortunate and nefarious cry was raised, but everywhere throughout the length and breadth of Canada, that the crusade inaugurated on that occasion against the rights of the minority would not be tolerated, and the electorate of the Province where the cry was raised showed that they did not appreciate that attempt. For my own part I have no hesitation—Home Ruler as I am to day, and as I have been since I was a boy, taking an active part in support of Home Rule, as I have on the platform and in the press, and subscribing my money on every occasion when the call was made to advance that cause—I have no hesitation in saying that I trust that the greatest provision for such protection will be made in the Parliament of Ireland; and in the constitution which is to be given to Ireland within a brief space of time. I believe ample protection will be given to the Protestant minority there, and the same guarantees given to that section of people that are given to the minorities in the various Provinces in the Dominion. Now I leave the hon. gentleman I trust without any harsh feelings. I trust I have not said a word which will cause him to feel that I have spoken in any other than the most friendly spirit, and I shall allude for a few moments to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Simcoe which has been admirably answered this afternoon by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The latter gentleman has, indeed, relieved me from the greater part of the duty I had to perform. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), opened his speech with the declaration that he himself was a descendant of the Irish race, that he was proud to belong to that race, and that he did not hesitate to say so here or elsewhere; and, Sir, if he be proud of belonging to the Irish race, so far as his intellectual gifts, his eloquence, and his power of argumentation—even though it be of a sophisticated kind when he has a bad case—are concerned, Ireland has no reason but to be proud of him. But those who have the Irish cause at heart have reason to grieve that one so highly gifted as he is should be found delivering the oration that he did in this House against the proposition I have laid before you, designed to give expression to the sympathy of the people of Canada for Home Rule for Ireland, and their regret that such a measure as that now before the British Parliament should become law. I said a moment ago that the hon. gentleman's arguments, though brilliant, are mere sophistry. I say so with all respect to the hon. gentleman; but I think it will be admitted by any one who knows anything at all about law, or who has ever had a gown upon his back in the courts of this or any other country, that when he comes before this House and tells us that the law has not been changed, but merely that the procedure in courts has been interfered with, he intends to impose upon the credulity of people outside, who are not acquainted with the subject as fully as most gentlemen who occupy seats in this House. Why, Sir, does he pretend to say that because the law has not been changed, there can be no oppression? What is the procedure of our criminal law? Why, Sir, it is the prisoner's protection. It is that which has grown up after years and years of experience, hedging in the rights of the subject against oppression and injustice. If you take away the protection which is extended to the vilest criminal in our courts—the right to preliminary examination, the right to cross-examine witnesses, the right to be brought before the grand jury, and to be tried before a jury where he has his challenge preemptory, and for cause—all these safeguards which have been thrown about the citizen to protect him in his liberties—what will be the condition of those unfortunate men in Ireland who happen to be, not accused, but suspected, and dragged to gaol by a Star Chamber of magistrates not versed in the law? Because, when the question was asked if men versed in the law would be magistrates under this Coercion Act, the Minister answered no. My hon. friend would wish this Parliament to say that because there is no change in the definition of offences, the whole procedure might be done away with, all the rights of the prisoner might be swept away, and there would be nothing that this House could complain of or pronounce upon, and we have no knowledge that the rights of men in Ireland are to be invaded under the Bill. But there was something more. My hon. friend, in discussing the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), stated :

"It is not correct to compare the situation of the people in this country before responsible government was granted to us, with that of the Irish people to-day. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) told us this afternoon that since we had been granted responsible government sullenness had disappeared from our midst, and peace, happiness and loyalty to the Crown prevailed throughout the land; but does not the hon. member forget that the Bill which gave him the right was forced upon the people of Lower Canada against their wishes?"

"Mr. LAURIER. It was the Act of Union they opposed.

"Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, and it is by the Act of Union that the hon. member got responsible government and the liberty to govern himself of which he has boasted, and which he says, has enabled his people to live happily and prosperously under the British flag. That Act was passed in the British Parliament, against the will of the people of Lower Canada, and yet that union with the people of Upper Canada which lasted until the time of Confederation, was found, as my hon. friend has had to admit, to confer happiness and peace and prosperity upon all of us."

Without referring to arguments that have been adduced by other hon. members to show the inaccuracy of this statement, I would say this: Suppose it were true that this Act was imposed on the people against their will, and that it gave them peace and happiness and prosperity, and produced loyalty in their hearts, the very statement made by the hon. gentleman shows that the Government of England to-day is singularly at fault. Why do they not come forward in response to the appeal of the majority of the people of Ireland, backed up by the urgent request of this Parliament and of the civilised world, and impose upon the people of Ireland some kind of Home Rule, some measure of fair play and justice; and although it might not, perhaps, be acceptable to the leaders of the Irish people, yet, if it were a just and comprehensive measure, calculated to develop the industries of the country and to promote its prosperity, even though it be imposed on them against their will or the will of their leaders to-day, may we not expect a result in Ireland similar to that which was so eloquently pointed out by the hon. member for Quebec East as having taken place in Lower Canada? And should the leaders of the Irish people to-day not acquiesce in it, but attempt to raise their voices against it, their fate will be the same as that of the Hon. Louis Joseph Papineau in this country, who, when he sought to raise a cry against the measure of self-government which his fellow-countrymen received, found that his influence had faded away, and the people would no longer hearken to his eloquent appeals and fiery denunciations. The people of Ireland would be found to accept any just measure of Home Rule that would be granted to them to-day in the same spirit as the French-Canadian people of Lower Canada. Now, Sir, in the course of this discussion, which has been singularly free from any allusion to Canadian politics, there were one or two gentlemen who did venture, I think very unfortunately indeed, to drag into it the conduct of certain gentlemen on this side of the House on a former occasion, and to endeavor to make political capital out of a question which I can assure every man in this House and this country, and before God, I have sought to deal with without any political or party desire whatever, but in order to cement together all the friends of the old land in one phalanx on this particular question, and to bury, if possible, the animosities of the past. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) told us that in my introductory remarks, I had mentioned the fact, and it is a fact, that no newspaper in this country of any importance, on either side of politics, had ever, within the past few years, written a line of editorial against Home Rule. But, he said, I had made a mistake, since the Ottawa Citizen, only a few days ago, had an article against Home Rule, whilst no Reform journal had written anything of the kind. That I can assure the hon. gentleman is an entirely false impression on his part. There was no such article in the Citizen, but there was a correspondence in that paper signed by the gentleman who wrote it, and to that correspondence I very briefly alluded. I think it is a great mistake for any man who professes to be a friend of Ireland in Canada and who wishes to strengthen the cause of Home Rule in Ireland, to go about searching for a journal opposed to Home Rule. It would seem to cast suspicion upon his own honesty in his advocacy of the Irish cause, because I, for one, am always prepared, and, I believe, the friends of Home Rule are everywhere prepared, to extend the right hand of friendship and fellowship to every one who labors for the cause. It is not friendly to point out that here, there or elsewhere, there is a weak spot or an attempt on the part of any person of influence to belittle the cause or deprive it of recruits. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) also alluded to this matter in the same connection, and I think in so doing he also made a great mistake. A proposition was laid down to-day by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), which I think, no one can contradict, which, I think, every member of this House may study with a great deal of profit and perhaps no man more than the hon. gentleman who so eloquently laid it down. In discussing a public question he said, we do not stop to enquire into the opinions on other subjects of those who happen to be on the same side as ourselves. That is a sound doctrine. When men go together to vote on any particular question, it is the value of the cause itself, the value of the question at stake, the value of the proposition that is laid before the people, that should be discussed, and not the value of the man who casts his vote. One should not turn round at the poll and say to his neighbor: Sir, I must decline your assistance, although I desire that this cause should triumph, I beg of you, on account of your antecedents or opinions or on some other particular account, to abstain from voting, and let me carry this cause to success alone. In asking this House for permission to alter a few of the words of the resolutions I have proposed, I desire to say that I accept, in the spirit in which it was tendered, the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. He bears an Irish name, and so do I. Upon this question I hope that we shall always be found acting in unison, and that if in the past there has been anything done calculated to drive the friends of Ireland asunder, such things will be avoided in the future. I hope that no imputations will be made, and that such a line will be adopted as will enable us, to use the hon. gentleman's own words, to act together to secure the greatest unanimity. I make this allusion on account of what has taken place since we last met in this House, and I may be pardoned, having been the principal victim of a sort of conspiracy, as it were, of a systematic persecution, to say a few words as to what has taken place. In the second paragraph of this resolution, after reciting that in 1882 we passed resolutions favorable to Home Rule for Ireland, it is stated that in 1886 we passed a similar resolution, reiterating a hope that a measure of Home Rule will be given. I regret to say that, whatever may have been the opinions, whatever may have been the expressions of Reform journals in this country with regard to the cause of Home Rule, from the biggest down to the smallest in importance, there was not one that did not hound down the Minister of Inland Revenue and myself as having voted against Home Rule. This proposition which I bring forward to-day, and which I have no doubt will receive the assent of the vast majority of the House, will be sufficient answer to that slander, which was sent forth, no doubt, merely for electioneering purposes, but there was something still more. My hon. friends the Irish Catholic members on this side came in for their share of misrepresentation. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue and other hon. gentlemen were by them pointed out as those who had betrayed the cause of Ireland. But there was a special emissary engaged, a special personage employed more particularly to hound me down in a very special manner. I believe and I know in my heart, and I said all through the campaign, that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House, is a sincere Home Ruler, a sincere friend of Ireland, because, no matter what might be the consequence, I was determined the Home Rule cause should not suffer by having it stated that any man who upheld it was not sincere in his advocacy. Whilst I am proud to think that his great gifts, gifts that are given to so few, those high intellectual qualities and the magnificent accomplishments by which they have been brought to such perfection, are always, when required, at the service of the land of his forefathers. I believe, and I know as a fact, that although the Minister of Inland Revenue may not have the same brilliant talents to lay on the altar of his country, there is one thing every Irishman in this country will admit he would be ready to do at a moment's notice, and that is to lay down his life for the cause of Ireland. What was the course pursued against myself? Down to a day or two before the close of the election contest, we found this language circulated in a journal supposed to be published in the interests of Catholicity, and edited by a personage drawn from God knows what purlieu of journalism—a man without any faith whatsoever, an apostate from the old faith, an apostate against christianity itself, a man whose private character is as vile as vile can be. What did this man call me? He declared in the columns of this so-called Catholic paper, on the 28th January, that I was a traitor to the cause of Home Rule, that I was as bad as any "scurvy sneak, informer, spy and traitor, ever employed by the British Government to bring Irish patriots to the gallows." "If I should be elected," he said, "every trimmer, time-server, place-hunter, apostate, renegade, traitor and mercenary would find every villainy he might contemplate justified in advance." Benedict Arnold was a saint in comparison; Judas Iscariot and his thirty pieces of silver were made to do service as the only illustration suitable for the occasion. I was to be buried out of sight beneath the ballots of Montreal Centre. What I regret is that no member of the party on the other side, high or low, ever felt it to be his duty to raise his voice against such a system of moral assassination as this. A leading journal of the Dominion—I may say the leading evening journal of the Dominion—felt constrained to say that writing such as that had caused the death of the most brilliant Irishman ever in the Dominion of Canada. I trust we have seen for the last time in the public press of our country any such vile and slanderous writings as that I have just referred to. Can we not, we who profess to love Ireland, love Ireland without hating one another? For myself, as I said a moment ago, I am prepared on all occasions to work with gentlemen on the other side or upon any side of the House in favor of the cause we all have so much at heart, and if I have alluded to this matter to-day it is for the last time, because I trust we shall never have a resurrection of such writings as I have alluded to. Now, a few words in conclusion in regard to the moral to be drawn from the maxim laid down by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). In the past it has been sought to introduce into this country an Orange and Green war, which has, in its time, desolated Ireland and been the cause of a great deal of its misery. We have had attempts made to arouse the vilest passions, to arouse the worst prejudices, to set man against man in this country, and all for the purpose of furthering the interests of political parties in this country. In this land we see the Catholic and the Orangeman going to the polls together to vote for those things which they consider are for the material interests of our Dominion, and I can say fearlessly that such a state of things is what the patriots and poets of Ireland and every man who has loved Ireland have sighed for and prayed for in the past. If that state of things could exist in Ireland, if the Irish Catholic and the Irish Orangemen could go to the polls together and vote as they do here for the material interests of the country, if we could see there as we do here that, under the benign influences of our liberal and free institutions, those people could labor in common and side by side for the advancement and progress of their common country, then we would see the triumphs dawning for the national cause there. It has been for years and years the complaint, and the saddest complaint of the best men in Ireland, that the people would not come together and join hands. They are doing it to-day. When we take up any Irish paper, we find the Irish Catholic and the Irish Protestant ranging side by side in this great movement; we see the old prejudices disappearing; and are we in this country going to revive the old war, are we going to make it a crime for an Irish Catholic to join hands with an Irish Protestant, whether Orangeman or not, for the advancement of the material interests of his country? To do such a thing would be to inaugurate a war here which has produced such disastrous results in the land we have been discussing for the last four days, and whose interests we have been seeking to advance as far as we can. Whilst thanking this honorable House for the favor they have done me in thus listening to these observations, I trust there will be no dissenting voice, and that I shall be allowed to make such alterations in this document as have been suggested by the hon. the leader of the Opposition. I do that in the spirit in which he extended it to me, because I feel I am acting in such a way as will secure greater unanimity. Members from both sides of the House have come to me and asked me to eliminate those words of protest against the adoption of the law, and to express the hope that such a measure will not become law. I do that with pleasure, and I also take out the section which refers to the adoption of a system similar to that in the Dominion of Canada, and substitute, as the leader of the Opposition has suggested, a substantial measure of Home Rule for Ireland. The resolution, in that shape, I think will meet the wishes and views of every man in this country, who desires to send across the Atlantic an expression of sympathy to the old land, an expression that will have its effect, if not upon the rulers of Great Britain to-day, at all events upon the people of Great Britain who, after all, are to be the ultimate judges of this matter. When the people of England, the people of Scotland, and the people of Wales, see that in this Home Rule country there is such a love of Ireland, such a desire that the privileges we enjoy should be extended to them, then those who have been laboring for the past few years to give to Ireland those great benefits, will be encouraged and cheered on in their course; and those who have been opposing a just measure of Home Rule for Ireland will feel, at all events, that it is time for them to stand and think; think over the course they have been pursuing, and to place in office those who will be willing to endeavor to rule that country by some system different from that which has prevailed for the last eighty-seven years, and that has produced such results amongst the people of those two great countries, who are destined by God and by nature to be bound together, who should be bound together in the bonds of brotherly love and common citizenship, but who have been driven apart, who have been made to hate one another, not by nature but by bad laws, laws which we trust to see repealed, laws which, not being enforced to-day, having been enforced in the past, we hope never to see re-enacted. I thank this honorable House for the kind hearing they have given me, and I trust this resolution will be carried by such an overwhelming majority as to bring joy and gladness to every part of the old land, to every part of England, of Ireland, and of Scotland, where the love of liberty exists. I will read the resolution in the form in which I propose to amend it :

That the Parliament of Canada in the year 1882 adopted an humble Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, expressing the hope that a just measure of Home Rule would be granted to the people of Ireland ; and

That in the year 1886, by Resolution of the House of Commons, the sentiments of said Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty were earnestly reiterated and the hope again expressed that such a measure of Home Rule would be passed by the Imperial Parliament ; and

That such measure of Home Rule has not been granted to the Irish people, but, on the contrary, there has been introduced into the Imperial House of Commons by Her Majesty's Government a Bill enacting the most stringent coercive measures for Ireland, by which the Irish people will be deprived of rights most dear to all British subjects.

That this House has learned with profound regret of the introduction into the Imperial House of Commons of the Coercion Bill above mentioned, and earnestly hopes that a measure so subversive of the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland may not become law.

That this House again expresses the hope that there may speedily be granted to Ireland a substantial measure of Home Rule which, whilst satisfying the National aspirations of the people of Ireland for self-government, shall also be consistent with the integrity of the Empire as a whole.

That the granting of Home Rule to Ireland will fittingly crown the already glorious reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty as a constitutional sovereign, will come with special appropriateness in this Her Jubilee year, and, if possible, render Her Majesty more dear to the hearts of Her already devoted and loyal subjects.

That the present Resolutions be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, Prime Minister, to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., and Charles Stuart Parnell, M.P.

Dupont,

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

Mr. INNES. I noticed that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has not voted ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Has the hon. member for Russell voted ?

Mr. EDWARDS. I have not voted for the reason that I paired a short time ago, and the time has not yet expired. Had I the opportunity of voting, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish now to move the amendment that I would have moved last night if the Rules of Procedure had permitted me to do so. I beg, therefore, to move in amendment to the amendment that all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and the following added instead thereof:—

This House learns with regret that it is considered necessary to pass a coercive measure for Ireland, and it re-affirms its convictions as expressed in the Resolutions of 1882 and 1886, that a plan of local government for Ireland which would leave unimpaired the links connecting Ireland with the British Empire and guard the rights of the minority, would be conducive to the prosperity of Ireland and the stability of the Empire.

That a copy of this Resolution be sent to the Marquis of Salisbury.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before you put that amendment, I claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments. Our position, it appears to me, is rather unfortunate to-night. We are deprived of the guidance of those to whom many of us have been accustomed to look for instruction in constitutional matters ; and it is of the more importance, seeing that one, at least, of those hon. gentlemen recently twice moved the adjournment of the House in order that the vote might be as large as possible. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a good deal of late in and out of this House touching a certain party known under the name of Bolters, but I did not expect to see so large and early and important an accession to their numbers.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It is increasing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no doubt of it. But I must say that it does strike me as rather odd that on a question which undoubtedly does involve issues of great importance to the British Empire, the Premier in esse, and, shall I say, the Premier in posse, are both depriving us of the light of their countenance and their assistance on this occasion ; not to speak of the valuable information the House might have derived from the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who is also absent on this interesting occasion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Another Premier in posse.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And there is the hon. member for Terrebonne, the Secretary of State, who has delivered himself very eloquently and very impressively on more than one occasion in reference to the rights of Ireland also absent. I must say that while I compliment the other members of the Ministry on the courage with which they have stuck to their guns on this occasion, I think we have some right to express our regret that my hon. friend's invitation was not accepted and some information was not given to us by the leader of the House on this important question. For my own part I may take occasion to say that I have always felt that primd facie there was a very great deal to be said for the contention of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and for the contention of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). There can be no doubt that primd facie we here in Canada need to justify ourselves before we undertake to interfere or advise the Empire at large as to matters more particularly affecting a portion of the United Kingdom. But however it may appear to the House that that view is justified at first sight, I think that a later consideration will show that that after all is but a superficial way of looking at this question, that there are much larger and more important issues involved, and that not only in our capacity as citizens of the British Empire, but in our capacity of citizens of Canada, we have every right respectfully, but firmly, to advise the British Government on this question. Sir, if this House wants to understand thoroughly the grounds on which that right depends, they will have to carry their recollections back for a period of some two and twenty years, when a gang of murderous miscreants availed themselves of our hospitality to attempt a raid into the United States, with a view to embroil these two countries in war. I refer to the occasion of the St. Albans raid. And I may call the attention of those members of the House and the Government who were in the old Parliament of Canada at that time, to the fact that the moment that outrage took place, every possible exertion was used by the people of Canada to put a stop to such outrages for the future, that extraordinary powers were given to the Government of the day, and a large sum of money was voted by the Canadian Parliament to indemnify our American neighbors for the wrongs committed on them and for the injury done to their property. Sir, about twelve or fifteen months later another murderous outrage was committed in Canada, this time coming from the other side. Gangs of miscreants were enrolled and drilled on American territory, with the full approval and assistance of prominent American citizens, and they made raids into Canada; Canadian citizens were shot down defending their homes, and much injury and damage then and afterwards resulted to the people of Canada. When about three or four years afterwards questions of great importance arose between the two countries, when it was proposed that a settlement should be made between Great Britain and the United States of all matters then in dispute between them, it is also in the recollection, I dare say, of many of the members of this House that the question of the compensation be granted to Canada for the wrongs then committed upon her people was brought up for consideration, and, as the British Government had granted to us the right of having a Commissioner, and that Commissioner the Premier of Canada, amongst the gentlemen appointed to negotiate the Washington Treaty, we had certainly some right to suppose that after we at our own cost and charge had compensated the American people for wrongs and outrages, committed from our territory upon their citizens, they, in turn, would willingly compensate us for wrongs and outrages committed on Canadian territory by American citizens. I need not remind the House of the terms of the capitulation, for such it was, that was then entered into. I need not remind the House how the just claims of Canada were passed over and ignored, apparently with the full consent of the Canadian Commissioner for the time being. But if there be any gentleman here who desires to know why it is that the people of Canada claim for themselves the right to advise Her Majesty with respect to the conduct of Irish affairs I have to tell them that it was the action of British statesmen gave them that right, and it cannot be taken away. What was the reason assigned by the English press, and assigned too by English statesmen of repute, for not entertaining the just demands of Canada on that occasion, when Britain was prepared to compensate the United States for the piratical outrages committed by cruisers fitted out in her ports. We were then told that it was not possible, in view of the hostility of the Irish element in the United States, to obtain redress for the wrongs that Canada had sustained. From that day, a new departure took place in our affairs; new relations were established as between Canada and the Empire, at all events in regard to all Irish matters. So long as British statesmen tell us they cannot claim compensation for outrages committed on Canada, because it would be likely to bring American statesmen into collision with the Irish element in the United States, so long as that is said, and what is more, is done, so long Canada has a perfect right under those circumstances to advise the people of Great Britain as to conducting themselves in all matters pertaining to the good government of Ireland, so as to remove from us and from our fellow-countrymen the danger of being exposed to the hostility of the Irish people of the United States. That is a painful subject, and I do not wish to prolong it too far. I desire to say, however, that I hold that as between the sovereign state and dependencies there is perfect reciprocity of rights and duties. I would not have supported a motion to interfere with Great Britain in matters pertaining to Ireland had not British statesmen first seen fit to declare to us that they could not obtain redress for our manifest wrongs because in so doing they would come into collision with a powerful portion of the people of the United States. Then, Sir, there is another good reason why the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) should have brought in this motion now. I am sure he regrets as sincerely as I do, or as any on this side of the House can do, that the amendment which was made last year to the motion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) had, whether it was intended so or not, a very prejudicial effect indeed on the debate in favor of granting Ireland a measure of Home Rule, and I say it is highly desirable that the earliest possible moment should be taken for repairing and redressing the injury which, no doubt unwittingly, the hon. gentleman and many of his friends were parties to committing on the rights of the Irish people. I may add that there is another reason yet, as those who took part in the late political discussion know. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake) was denounced without stint and without measure as a traitor to the Empire and the accomplice of those who want to rend the Empire asunder, because he brought forward that motion, and it is highly desirable, therefore, that an early opportunity should be given to all and sundry to affirm what their sentiments are on this measure, and to demand that the Parliament of Canada declares whether it does or does not endorse the views submitted by my hon. friend then, and practically re-endorsed by the hon. member for Montreal Centre now. This is a question on which it is right and proper that hon. gentlemen should announce their real sentiments. I was glad to hear the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), come out squarely and fairly and state their views on this matter. Having taken the stand they did in the recent elections, having spoken as they did on the question, having expressed the opinion they did about my hon. friend and other gentlemen who opposed their view, they could do no less, but it was equally creditable to them I think that they did so, and I have only to regret that other hon. members of this House, still more highly placed than they, have not seen fit, directly or indirectly, to express any opinion on the subject. Now, Sir, in the absence of the hon. the First Minister I shall not proceed with some remarks I had intended to make, called forth by certain statements made during last election. An opportunity for investigating those matters may perhaps occur again. But for myself I say—and I think I am as sincerely concerned in promoting the interests of the British Empire as any man on the floor—I say, and I believe, that it is in the very highest degree in the interests of the people of Great Britain and Ireland, it is in the very highest degree in the interest of every English-speaking man in the British Empire to see that the claims of Ireland are satisfied in a rational and reasonable way. Sir, if ground were wanting for the action we are taking, or are going to take this night in this House, it may be found in the fact that our own census returns show that there are 957,000 persons of Irish origin in the Dominion of Canada—a larger number, let me tell the House, than have reported themselves as of either English or Scottish origin; while, Sir, in the United States of America, of Irish origin, I believe there are to be found to-day at least ten times that number—probably nine or ten millions in all. Now, we know that for a very long time back a very large number, though not all of these persons, have been to all intents and purposes hostile to the British Empire. Sir, I have always hoped to see a better state of things brought about, and I say that no true statesman, either in England or Canada, can render a greater service to the Empire at large than by promoting measures which are calculated to remove any just grievances that may exist in those people's minds. I say that when a statesman rises in England who understands, as I think Mr. Gladstone does, how important that is to the welfare of the Empire and the welfare of our whole race, such a statesman may do very great things indeed for England. And I say, Sir, that when that hostility is removed very much greater things are possible to be done for the welfare of the Empire than can be done by either or any of the schemes now on foot for promoting what is called Imperial Federation. But I may say this, that I do not believe that the passage of the eighty-seventh Coercion Bill is at all likely to pave the way to harmony. There are two ways, and there have been for hundreds of years two ways, in which Ireland can be governed. I admit that the mode—I will not say foreshadowed by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but I think partially foreshadowed by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), is one way. You have your choice. On the one side is Lord Salisbury and his Coercion Bill—the Cromwellian settlement of Ireland, as it used to be called—and martial law, and on the other there is Mr. Gladstone's proposal to allow Irishmen to manage Irish affairs. For my part I heartily concur with the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) and the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on that side. I believe the true way to pacify Ireland, and to remove those grievances to which I have alluded—the true way, in my opinion, to bring about such a state of things as will remove one of the greatest stumbling-blocks which has existed for these many years to the cordial alliance and good will which ought to prevail between the two great branches of the English race—is to grant such a measure of Home Rule to the Irish as will enable them completely and entirely to manage their own affairs at least as fully as we, in the various Provinces, are able to manage our local affairs. And as the hon. gentleman has consented to accept the wise suggestion of my hon. friend for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I have to say that I will have great pleasure in supporting his motion, as amended.

Mr. IVES. I think it is much to be regretted, indeed, that within a moment after this House has, by a majority of nearly one hundred votes, adopted a resolution which is supposed to be in the interests of Home Rule, when irrespective of party both sides of the House, with practical unanimity, with as great unanimity as can be expected on any question of this character, have voted in favor of this message from the Parliament of Canada to the Parliament of England—I say I think it is very much to be regretted that within a moment after the recording of that enormous majority the hon. member who has just spoken should rise with a view of seizing some petty party advantage from the fact of the absence of one or two members of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Four of them.

Mr. IVES. It only shows that the hon. gentleman and those who have voted with him in the division which has just been taken have been actuated by the same motives on this occasion that, as far as we can judge from the ground they took on the occasion of the last general election, actuated them with reference to the conduct they pursued in this House at the last Session. I have stood up in my place and have recorded my vote in favor of Home Rule for Ireland on every occasion when a proposition of that kind has been made since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. But notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding that my course has been consistent from first to last, I was charged during the late election with being an enemy to Ireland, with being opposed to any measure of Home Rule, charged with being an Orangeman; and other false accusations were brought against me, in the endeavor to satisfy the people that, so far from being a friend of Ireland, I was an enemy of Ireland. Friends of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat went so far as to obtain the subornation of perjury to defeat me at the last election, notwithstanding the fact that I have been as consistent a supporter of Home Rule as my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), or my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake.) The hon. gentleman has seen fit to refer to those Ministers who were not present when the last vote was taken as bolters. Now it seems to me that the member of Parliament who can properly be charged with being a bolter is not the one who was absent when the question was read, and remains absent during the division, but the name rather applies to one who is here when the motion is read from the Chair and then runs out to escape the division. Now in my experience in this House, before the leadership of the Opposition was put in the hands of a syndicate, before it was put in commission, I have seen the leader of the Opposition act the part of a bolter by leaving the House after the question was read. Now that the Opposition is lead by a syndicate, now that the leadership has been put in commission, I have been curious—seeing that the charge was made that members of the Government were absent—to see how many of the syndicate were absent. I find that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) has bolted, if the term is a proper one in such connection; the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) was absent; the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) is absent; and if members of the Government are to be called bolters who were not in their seats when the question was put, then in the same fairness these hon. gentlemen deserve that term. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies)—another member of the commission—has not come to the House at all this Session, and I have as much right to say that he has remained out of Parliament altogether until the question was disposed of as the hon. member has to say that the Premier or the Minister of Finance left the House, or did not come to the House, for the sake of avoiding this vote. We are discussing a question which ought not to be a party question, which is not a party question, when we are stretching our powers so far in order to lend a helping hand to the people of Ireland, I do think it is a very inappropriate occasion for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to endeavor to gain a party advantage, the first occasion which has presented itself during this discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. I certainly must express my surprise that in a debate of this kind, the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, should undertake to make the criticisms he has done upon gentlemen upon this side of the House in their absence. I have no right to speak for anybody on this side of the House, except myself, unless I may be classed among the bolters, as I sometimes am; and I shall only be too happy to speak for them, or to have them speak for me, when occasion calls for it. But I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should attempt to make a comparison between the cases of the gentlemen on his side of the House and those of the gentlemen to whom he referred, from the Maritime Provinces. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the hon. member for St John (Mr. Weldon) left in a legal capacity, on a most important matter, which has occupied the city of St. John many a day—the failure of one of the great banking institutions—and that he has been away for several days? Does the hon. gentleman not know that the hon. gentleman from the city of Quebec, whose absence he commented upon, is detained from his place in this House by the sickness, almost unto death, of his wife? And I must say, I think it extremely bad taste for him to make the reference he has done. Does he not also know that it is a matter of current rumor that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) is only kept away by the fact that his wife is in a delicate and critical condition, which has prevented him from being present during the present Session. Well, Sir, I think it adds to the bad taste of the hon. gentleman that he should lead in laughter at what I have said about the very improper remarks he made in regard to that gentleman. No one who knows Mr. Davies will deny that if travelling night and day could bring him here to vote on this question he would come, and there is no man on either side of the House less liable to shirk his vote than he. I have no right to speak for these gentlemen, but in their absence I think it my duty to express my disapproval of the remarks the hon. gentleman has made. Is there any similarity between their absence and the absence of the members of the Cabinet? Where is the Premier of the Dominion when a matter is under discussion that affects the interest of the whole Empire? Why is he not in his place to give the House his opinion upon it, and to advise them what course they ought to take on a question to which the hon. gentleman says there is no partyism? If there is not, why is not the Premier here to give his assistance in a matter affecting the political relations not alone of Canada, but of an integral portion of the Empire, and one affecting the social relations with the great nation to the south of us, which contains many millions of Irishmen and Irish descendants. If there ever was a question before this House demanding the calmest and coolest consideration of its members, it is the question we are considering to-night. Why is the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) not in his place? Why is the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) not in his place? And why is not the hon. Secretary of State? Everyone of these gentlemen knew that this vote was coming on. They knew that it was postponed last night. Was it postponed to give them an opportunity of being absent? I am not prepared to say that such is the case, but the matter certainly looks a little suspicious. I am not going to take up much of the time of the House, after this question has been so fully discussed on both sides; but it is a matter of too much importance for me to give a silent vote upon it. My sympathies are in favor of giving self-government to every section of the Empire capable of it; and will any man here say that with the intelligence, the valor and the talents the Irish people have shown in all positions they have occupied in the Empire and out of it, they are not entitled to the fullest measure of Home Rule? I think no man will say it. Then why not give it to them? The British Government have tried coercion; they have tried suppression of liberty and public speech; they have adopted every course to bring about quietness and peace in Ireland, except conciliation and have failed. Now that the Premier and the hon. Minister, of the Interior have come into the House, I may repeat what I said in their absence, that I was surprised that they were not present on such an important occasion to direct this House what course it ought to pursue. If they were absent under circumstances which they could not control, they can perhaps explain that. I was about to repeat the words of an eloquent English statesman: "We have tried everything but kindness, let us try kindness [now]." What does this Coercion Bill propose to do? If the House will bear with me for a few moments, I will read from a paper a description of it given more succinctly than I can do it. It says:

"But few persons living in this age know anything about the 'Whiteboy Acts' passed by Irish Parliaments of last century, for the violation of which men are to be tried before a court of summary jurisdiction if the Coercion Bill of the present British Government becomes a law, and yet it is by the reviving of these Acts, or rather by making them a part of the Coercion Bill, that the extraordinary temper of the Government toward Ireland is most clearly shown. By the terms of the Act of 1776, to which the Coercion Bill particularly refers, any person who, armed with any offensive weapon, or disguised, or wearing any particular badge, dress, or uniform not usually worn by him, or assuming any particular name or denomination not usually assumed by his Majesty's subjects, shall rise, assemble, or appear by day or night to the terror of his Majesty's subjects, was guilty of a misdemeanor. This was the clause which gave rise to the famous line in the ballad:

'They're hanging men and women there for the wearing o' the green.'

"This clause was subsequently repealed, but the penalty of hanging still remains for the sending of threatening letters, for attempting to rescue a prisoner committed on a capital charge, and for a variety of other misdemeanors.

"The Act of 27 George III, chapter 5, which is also made a part of the Coercion Bill, makes death the penalty for unlawful meeting, and for the printing of any document tending to incite a riot. Sundry amendments have been made to the Acts since their original passage, but the number of offences for which indictments may be found under them has by no means decreased. Under the Whiteboy code sending a threatening letter, compelling another man to leave his farm, habitation, or lawful employment, maliciously causing any door to be opened by threats or menaces, rescuing a prisoner, and imposing an unlawful oath, are all criminal offences, and if the coercion law passes they may all be passed upon by courts of summary jurisdiction completely under the control of the Government at Dublin Castle. These are all serious offences and worthy of severe punishment, but they cannot, except in a spirit of pure tyranny, or without wrenching justice very materially, be taken from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of the land in which the offences are committed.

"Under the Whiteboy Acts the Government may, if it chooses, make a criminal offence of almost any act committed by an opposing political party. Under the Act of 27 George III, chapter 15, which is expressly included in the Coercion Bill, twelve persons meeting together and not dispersing on the proclamation of the magistrate, or not dispersing when the magistrate has been prevented from making such proclamation, are guilty of felony and may be sentenced to death. This Act puts an end to all meetings of the opposition should a magistrate be found bold enough to enforce it. But the most oppressive of the Whiteboy Acts is section 3, chapter 44 of 1 and 2 William IV, which practically muzzles the press of Great Britain. This section is worthy of reproduction, as showing the extent to which the enemies of Home Rule are willing to go in the way of coercion. It reads:

"And be it enacted, that if any person or persons shall knowingly print, write, post, publish, circulate, send or deliver, or cause or procure to be printed, written, posted, published, circulated, sent or delivered, any notice, letter or message exciting or tending to excite any riot, tumultuous or unlawful meeting or assembly, or unlawful combination or confederacy, or threatening any violence, injury or damage upon any condition or in any event or otherwise, to the person or property, real and personal, of any person whatsoever, or demanding any money, arms, weapons or weapon, ammunition or other matter or thing whatsoever (for example, asking reduction of rent), or directing or requiring any person to do or not to do any act, or to quit the service or employment of any person, or to set or to give out any land, every person so offending shall be liable to be transported beyond the seas."

"These are but samples of the provisions of the Whiteboy Acts which the coercionists intend to place within the jurisdiction of summary courts of procedure. They are the laws of Great Britain to-day. But many of them have been looked upon as obsolete, especially the clause just quoted. The Coercion Bill, if it becomes law, will revive them in all their original force, and with them will revive the spirit of lawlessness which first prompted their passage."

Now, I ask this House if it were proposed to legislate in that sense in Canada, how long would we stand it? Is it possible to believe that any legislature within the bounds of a free country like Canada would tolerate such legislation? Yet we are informed that is the legislation intended to be imposed by means of the Coercion Bill. Can it be wondered at that Irishmen and their descendants throughout the British territories, and in foreign lands, should attempt to prevent legislation of that kind being forced upon their friends and relations and co-nationalists at home? I am not surprised that they should, but I am surprised that as much toleration has been shown as has been in the discussion of the question. I am not going to take up the time of the House further, for I feel this subject has, at this stage of the debate, passed beyond the period of discussion, the House having already declared by nearly three to one that this House has the power and the right to address the Throne upon the subject of legislation, which they consider likely to lead to great trouble and to the disturbance of the peace of the Empire. Therefore, I think we are quite justified in the course we have pursued, and I shall be happy to support the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran).

Sir DONALD SMITH. I do not desire to detain the House beyond a few moments. The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake), the other evening, twitted the Right Hon. the First Minister with contemptuous indifference with regard to this momentous question, and this evening the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as well as my friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), complained that several members of the Government were not present. I certainly am not the apologist of these gentlemen; but I do think that rather than find fault with them for not taking control of the House on this question, we have cause for congratulation that it has been left an open one. While outside this House, as Englishmen, as Irishmen, Scotchmen or Frenchmen, as men of any nationality, we have the right to give our opinion with regard to what is passing on the other side, in the Imperial Parliament, yet since we are here in this House as Canadians, since it is only as such we are here forming this portion of the Parliament of Canada, it is far better for us that we should leave those who know all the circumstances intimately to deal with the Irish question in the Parliament of Great Britain. Will the hon. gentlemen who voted for this resolution of my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), assume that with them alone rests sympathy and feeling for the oppressed, whether in Ireland or in any other part of the Empire? Do we not feel equally with them for those who may be oppressed and for those who are certainly suffering great misery in Ireland as well as in Scotland and England? For do we not know that the condition of affairs is such, in the United Kingdom as well, that at present many who were in comfortable, aye, and affluent circumstances a short time ago, are now suffering very much. No, I am sure that those hon. gentlemen who will vote against the measure of the hon. member for Montreal Centre will feel as deeply for our Irish fellow-subjects as those who may express themselves averse to his measure in this House. What we all wish is I am sure that there should be a measure of Local Legislature given Ireland, that, call it Home Rule or anything you will, there should be given to them, so soon as, in the opinion of those who are responsible for the government of the Empire, it can be properly conceded, some measure of local government or Home Rule which will enable them to conduct their local affairs and leave the Imperial Parliament all its vitality and all its power, and we must believe that the only guarantee we have for the unity of the Empire is that the Central Government should remain with all its dignity. I desired to say these few words to justify the vote I have given and the vote I may give this evening.

Mr. BRIEN. This question has been so fully discussed, not only in this House, but in the public press and on the public platform, and has been especially so ably and eloquently treated by the leader of the Opposition, that it would seem very little more remained to be said. However, I think I would be derelict in my duty, as a descendant of the people of that Emerald Isle, as a member of this House, and as a citizen of the country in which Home Rule has had such a happy result, if I did not, by my voice as well as by my vote, support the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), as it has for its object the strengthening of the hands of those noble statesmen who are trying to relieve Ireland from that state of bondage from which she has long, and I may say so patiently, suffered. Neither would I be acting in accordance with the policy of the Liberal party, or as a true Liberal, if I did not support any measure, and add whatever strength I could to any measure which would have the effect of relieving suffering humanity, which would have for its effect the relief of the oppressed and the aid of the needy. For a long time past, in centuries past, the great difficulty seems to have been the same as it is now. It is the democracy against the aristocracy, the weak against the strong, the poor against the rich. The prayer of the Liberal party has ever been: "God bless the poor and the rich can help themselves." It is true that the Imperial Government have intimated, through Her Majesty's Colonial Secretary, that she will be guided by Imperial advice alone, but this should not deter us from doing our duty in this matter. With all due deference to the wisdom of the Imperial Parliament, we are aware that the institution is a human one, and therefore liable to err. Surely it cannot be successfully denied, that while we remain part and parcel of this great Empire, we have a right to tender our advice in this case. I say it is clear that we have in an advisory, though I would not say in a dictatorial, manner. You cannot affect one part of the Empire without in one way or the other affecting the whole, and I assure you that this is already affecting Canada as far as immigration is concerned. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said we had not the papers or the necessary information before us. I think we do not require much information in relation to this matter. It is simply a question of principle, and the main question is whether Ireland shall be governed by military rule, by force, or by the freely expressed will of her people through her own representatives by a large majority. It may be perhaps a delicate question, but it is one that should be approached in a calm and judicial spirit, free from any religious or political prejudice. It has been fairly and truly said, by previous speakers, that the land question is the great trouble, but we believe there are other contributing causes to this trouble, and it had its origin at the Union, at the unhal- lowed and unholy Union in 1800. Rather than give merely an opinion of my own, I will give the opinion of statesmen who were, at the time, conversant with the whole affair. Mr. Fox, in 1806, characterised the Union as "atrocious in its principle and abominable in its means." "It was," he said, "a measure, the most disgraceful to the Government of the country that was ever carried or proposed." Mr. Gladstone is of a similar opinion. "I know," he says, "no blacker or fouler transaction in the history of man, than the making of the Union between England and Ireland." The view of the historian coincides, in this matter, with the view of the statesman. "There are," says Mr. Lecky, "indeed, few things more discredit- able to English political literature, than the tone of palliation or even of eulogy that is usually adopted towards the authors of this transaction. Scarcely any element or aggravation of political immorality was wanting; and the term honor, if it be applied to such men as Castlereagh or Pitt, ceases to have any real meaning in politics. Whatever may be thought of the abstract merits of the arrangement, the Union as it was carried was a crime of the deepest turpitude, a crime which, by imposing with every circumstance of infamy a new form of government on a reluctant and protesting nation, has vitiated the whole course of Irish opinion." We believe that much of the discontent has had its origin there, that Ireland was deprived of her Legislature against her own will at that particular time and through means which were unfair. Is it to be wondered at that the memories of bye-gone wrongs and the recollection of former greatness should be a constant source of humiliation and irritation to a people who are imbued with a strong feeling of national pride? In legislating for any people, it is the duty of the statesmen to take into consideration the character of the people for whom the legislation is proposed, and we believe that Ireland has been governed since that time by English ideas and without a proper study of the Irish character. There have been so many quarrels on this account in Ireland, that her people have obtained a reputation abroad as a quarrelsome nation. This reminds me of the Irishman who landed in New York about the time of a political campaign, and who, when asked what his politics were, said: "I am agin the Government anyhow, and I have no politics." That does not apply to the people generally. We find that everyone is ready to acknowledge—and Irishmen are pretty well represented on this side of the House as well as on the other, and we wish they were more on this side of the House—that the Irish character is that of a most genial spirit and nature, accompanied with the tenderest of passions, but as the plant of delicate and luxurious growth nipped by the frost completely dies, so in this case whatever loyalty may have existed in the hearts of Irishmen may possibly be destroyed by this kind of oppression. When Ireland has asked for freedom she has received a tightening of the chains; when coercion has failed it was said to be because the measure was not coercive enough. An objection is raised on the question of the separation of Ireland, but that has been already answered. I do not think that anyone in this House would believe that the Irish people would wish to be separated from England. Their interests are with the Mother Country, and they hope to remain in connection with it. Another great objection, and the strongest, seems to be Catholic domination. In other Catholic countries, in France and in Austria, where Catholics predominate, we see there is no such thing. Why then should this predominance of Catholics affect Irishmen more than any others? We notice that the domination of catholicism and the downfall of protestantism seems to have a peculiar history. The ebb and flow of this cry seems to accord with the vicissitudes of the great Tory party. We are aware that the Conservative or Tory party in England at present owe their term of office to this feeling and this fear which exists, with the support of a few traitors who have deserted their post and swallowed their principles and betrayed their party in order to gratify an insatiable ambition. Lord Hartington also accuses Mr. Gladstone of frequently changing his mind. Sir, I admire a man who changes his mind according to his own convictions, and so expresses himself. It is said that a wise man changes his mind once in a while, but a fool never. Lord Hartington says again, that there is a revolutionary party which must first be overthrown. Well, all the speeches which we have heard from hon. gentlemen who oppose the resolution of the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) seem to take it for granted, as was stated by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), that the minority would not submit to Home Rule if it were granted. Then it is the minority which is the revolutionary party; which is to become disloyal. Those who are in favor of Home Rule have never yet said that they would not continue loyal to the British Crown, although it may be doubtful—the time may come when patience ceases to be a virtue. I think that the Irish people have exercised a vast amount of patience. They have been more peaceable than we could have hoped, and I trust that in the future they will be obedient and submissive and avoid any bloodshed or rebellion. It is said by an eminent historian that rebellion is never raised for motives of aggression, but it has always arisen from long and unendurable oppression. It is quite consistent for the Tory party, especially in this country, to maintain that there is no possibility of anyone being loyal except themselves. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy) in speaking on this question referred amidst the lively cheering of his friends, to the legislation of 1877, by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and the object of which has been fully explained to-night, and fully defended. I will not discuss the merits of that legislation, but I must say that the hon. member for North Simcoe, in bringing that forward, had recourse to a far-fetched argument. He said what was fair for the goose was fair for the gander, and I presume you will allow me to use the same argument. But I will not go back any farther than 1882. He is referring to that legislation as radical and objectionable. Why, Sir, we will take the Gerrymander Act of 1882, the Franchise Bill of 1885, and I say there is no act on the Statute-book that is so tyrannical in principle and so cowardly in purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BRIEN. I presume that those hon. gentlemen find my remarks distasteful. You know that if you give food to children which they are not accustomed to, it is liable to make them sick. These hon. gentlemen seem to be displeased, I presume, because I am a new member with not much parliamentary experience, and I am very likely to tell the truth, and the whole truth, and that is what they do not like. But I wish to notice a remark made the other day by the Minister of Inland Revenue who was trying to conciliate the action of himself and his friends last year, and make it in accordance with the feeling of those who are anxious for Home Rule. The hon. gentleman was referring to his vote last Session on the Home Rule resolutions. Well, I have an article here from the Irish Canadian newspaper, supposed to be written by the editor of that paper. The article, by which he tried to show that his action was in accordance with the Irish people, was not an editorial which appeared before the true state of affairs were made known. A letter had appeared in the Irish Canadian by Mr. Jas. Brady, in which the writer stated that Mr. O'Brien, when passing through St. Thomas, Ont., on his way to the Chicago Convention, had told Father Flannery that it was a great misfortune that Mr. Blake's resolution, as first introduced, had not passed. The veracity of this statement having been in question, Mr. Brady wrote to Father Flannery. Here is the latter's on testimony:

"St. THOMAS, 18th September.

"JAMES BRADY, Esq.,
"Ingersoll.

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to yours of the 14th inst., requesting me to state in writing what I told you of the conversation I had with Mr. Wm. O'Brien, ex-M.P., of Tyrone, on the railway platform here, I have merely to reiterate the statement that, in my presence and the hearing of Dr. Wilson, M.P., and of many others, Mr. O'Brien said: 'It was a very great pity and misfortune the resolution, as introduced by Mr. Edward Blake, did not pass the House of Commons of Canada, as it would have strengthened our hands very materially in the Home Rule debate.'

"I am, dear Sir,

"Yours very respectfully,
"W. F. FLANNERY, P.P."

Justin McCarthy, speaking at Toronto on 24th November last, said:

"I thank my friend, Mr. Blake, for the manner in which he has spoken out for Home Rule, and we know that this is not the first time he has given his eloquence and his earnestness and his influence to champion that cause, and that at a time when it had far fewer supporters than it is lucky enough to have at present."

Mr. Michael Davitt, speaking at Montreal on 26th November last, said:

"You will understand that I stand here on non-political grounds, recognising neither parties (hear, hear), but I can assure you that the people of Ireland have appreciated fully the great services rendered by the Hon. Edward Blake to the cause of Home Rule. (Tremendous applause.) I hope that his political opponents will follow his good example on the subject, and realize that we only want the same just rights accorded the Irish as are granted to the English and Canadian people."

Before taking my seat I wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) for the great and labored efforts which they put forth in making their speeches in such manner as would not have any tendency to catch votes. Innocent fellows! they do not care for votes;—no, not they!

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me in the name of the House, to congratulate you (Mr. Haggart in the Chair) on your elevation, which I trust is only an omen of good things in the good time coming. I had not intended to make any remarks on this occasion, but as I came in from my country home on Monday, an old Irish friend of mine who, in season and out of season, in sunshine and in storm, had been my supporter, said to me: "Will you not speak one word for the good Old Land?" I said: "I had not intended to speak, but as you wish me to do so, I will say a few words," which I now propose to do. I think, Sir, that we may congratulate the House on the tone of this entire debate. I think the mover of these resolutions, my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), deserves the thanks of the House for the moderation and the eloquence and the ability he has manifested throughout the conduct of this somewhat trying debate. I think, also, he has been followed in the same spirit by almost every other member of the House. For my own part, as the House well knows, I have always sympathised with every movement in favor of Home Rule for Ireland. It has, as my hon. friend for Montreal West has said, been the dream of my life. My relations and connections with the Irish people of this country and in my own county have always been of a very particularly interesting character, as have been my political and social relations, and they have always given me a most generous, warm and hearty support, and therefore to-night it affords me the greatest pleasure to state that I shall vote heart and soul for the resolutions of the hon. member for Montreal Centre. If he could have made them a little stronger it would have afforded me very great pleasure to have voted for them in that form. But I understand perfectly well the feeling that animates a great number of hon. members. I listened with great attention to the able and scholarly address of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), which I am sure commended itself to every hon. member for its kindness, moderation and the strength of the argument adduced. But for all that, to me it had a melancholy ring; it had the sound of the bugle which rang out when Sarsfield and his exiles sailed away from Ireland and carried with them the hopes of the people. It was a great speech; but to my mind it conveyed the idea of disunion, of difference, which has driven Protestant and Catholic Irishmen alike from their native land, to fight most gallantly the battles of other nations. That disunion which has abased Ireland in the dust, and made her gallant sons as weak as water when they stand face to face with the awful problem of the deliverance of their native land. If Irishmen would only forget the traditions of the past, if in the supreme crisis of her nation's destiny they would join hands together and work for their common good, the triumph would be achieved and the hour of her deliverance would be at hand. As it is, notwithstanding the terrible odds, I have no doubt of her ultimate triumph. I have no doubt but that the dark night will soon be passed and the light dawn upon that unhappy land. But to my mind no measure of Home Rule will be complete which does not give the Irish land to the Irish people. I trust that some measure will be introduced which, while it might remunrate the landlords for their property fairly, will convey to the Irish people their old heritage. In this way happiness and peace will be secured. I do not speak in the interest of any party, or any class, but I consider the interest of the great body of the Irish people. It would be an appropriate inauguration of the jubilee year that the reign of our glorious Queen should be consecrated by such an event, and would be the proudest monument that could be erected to her. In this way Ireland would, instead of being a menace, be a source of benefit to the Empire. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) used what was to my mind a strong argument in favor of our intervention. We are told that we have no right to interfere, that it is impertinent on our part to do so; but, after all, we have to hold this lone outpost of the Empire, and we must hold it against all odds. Is it not of interest to us that every ship arriving at our ports should be freighted with happy and generous friends instead of with dark and dangerous foes? That is of the utmost importance; and, therefore, I shall give my vote very cheerfully for the resolution favoring a measure for the pacification of that most unhappy land. And I agree most cordially with the suggestion that in this year of Her Majesty's Jubilee, it would constitute the highest monument that could be reared to build up in the hearts of the people of Ireland that love and reverence for our great and glorious Queen which animates the rest of the nation. I have always felt very strongly on this subject, and I trust this House, by a very large majority, will vote for the resolutions of the hon. member for Montreal Centre; and, I repeat, if they were made stronger I would still vote for them with extreme pleasure. For my part, in season and out of season, whenever I have occasion and opportunity to raise my voice in favor of the Irish, Protestant and Catholic alike, many of whom have been hunted like partridges on the mountains, who have been driven from their lands, and if I can do anything to aid them here and their people at home, it will afford me the greatest pleasure to do so.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Before the amendment to the amendment is submitted I desire to say on behalf of the hon. member for Montreal Centre and myself as the seconder of the motion that we have accepted the modifications suggested by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in his very conciliatory speech of a day or two ago; that is, instead of recommending a particular measure of Home Rule, it is simply stated "a measure that will be satisfactory to the hopes of the people of Ireland," not specifying what sort of local self-government should be bestowed upon them, which would be a matter for the Imperial Parliament to decide. Again, instead of using the word "protest," in order to secure the largest possible vote in this House, and the greatest unanimity, the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham is accepted, and that part of the resolutions will read in this way: "and earnestly hopes that a measure so subversive of the rights and liberties of the people may not become law." As so modified, the resolution merely reiterates the Address to Her Majesty which was passed unanimously or almost unanimously by this House in 1832. In that year the House in its Address suggested a measure of Home Rule, and it also expressed the hope that the persons who were then languishing in Irish prisons without trials, a great majority of them not knowing for what reason they were imprisoned, might be given their liberty. In that resolution we asked that the persons deprived of their liberty as a consequence of a Coercion Act which was then in force might be released. Now we ask that a new Coercion Act be not passed, an Act which would produce similar consequences. So I think the House, having almost unanimously, in 1832, passed an Address, can, without stultifying itself, still pass a resolution which embodies so moderately all the sentiments and nothing more expressed in that Address. I do not see, for my part, how we can accept the amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and I do not see how that hon. gentleman can consistently vote for his own amendment. The hon. gentleman has assured the House, by his vote, that he thinks this is a subject on which we have no right to interfere. Having satisfied himself on that point, I do not think we are to be led in this matter by him, and I trust the hon. members who acted with us in this matter, and voted down the amendment, will continue to support the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre, as modified according to the suggestions of the hon. member for West Durham.

Mr. DAVIN. The remarks of the hon. member for Essex call for a few observations.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has already spoken.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that in my absence considerable interest was shown in the fact that my seat was vacant. I was more pleasantly and quite as profitably engaged elsewhere.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, as profitably as this debate will result. It has been said that we are bound by our previous resolutions of 1882 and 1886 to follow in the same course and to support the resolution of the hon. member for Montreal Centre. I do not think so. And, moreover, I think considering the fact that the resolution of 1882 has caused a recurrence of the discussion of the subject in 1886, and again in 1887, that it is almost unfortunate that that resolution—or that Address—was carried in 1882. I would have been well pleased if in 1832 that Address had not been moved; but moved as it was by my hon. friend and present colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Costigan), it was one I could not refuse my assent to. It was expressed in the most loyal terms. It said—and said truly—that under our system of Home Rule in Canada we had been prosperous and happy, and the statement that the Irish population who were unhappy and discontented when they remained in Ireland, under the changed circumstances in which they found themselves when they came to Canada had become happy and contented was a truism so true that one could not refuse to vote for it. It was guarded and loyally guarded. It said we hope that circumstances would allow the Imperial Parliament to pass such a measure as would convey the same content, the same prosperity, to the people in Ireland as was enjoyed by their countrymen who came to Canada, provided always that it was consistent with the integrity of the Empire. That resolution, I believe, we had a right to pass. I quite agree with all those hon. gentlemen who said it was within our competence to express our opinion on that subject, or on any subject really of public interest. However, that was denied by Her Majesty's Government. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) entered into an elaborate argument to show that we had the right to do so as we did in 1882. It was not necessary, it seems to me, to have addressed that argument to this House. The country had received with approbation our course in 1882, and therefore, there was no necessity, I think, for that argument having been gone into. Who raised the point that we had no right? It was not the people of Canada; it was not the Parliament of Canada; it was Mr. Gladstone—Mr. Gladstone's Government. One hon. member stated—I do not know whether it was in the present debate or not—that it was merely a letter from the Colonial Secretary. It was much more than that. It was a solemn answer by Her Majesty's Government to the respectful and loyal Address the contents of which I have just spoken of;

and we were told that while any representations which were made concerning the interests of Canada would be listened to with great interest and respect, so far as regarded the subject of our Address in 1882 it was the exclusive province of Her Majesty's Government to deal with, and Her Majesty would only listen to her Imperial advisers. That statement was one that I do not at all concur in. But it was not the mere statement of Lord Kimberley, because if you look in the English Hansard you will find that, in answer to a question, Mr. Gladstone used language literally so nearly approaching the language of that despatch that it is quite clear he dictated the despatch and was personally responsible for it. He had then a different line of policy, and therefore he snubbed Canada for pursuing a course which to-day he will, perhaps, thank us for and be very grateful for. Mr. Speaker, the recurrence of subjects of this kind is greatly to be regretted. It is greatly to be regretted that we do not confine ourselves to matters which are strictly within our competence and within the interests of the people of Canada, and we should as seldom as possible stray away from that course into subjects so foreign or so far from being of direct interest, or direct subjects of consideration, for the Canadian Parliament. If we could suppose that this resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Centre Montreal (Mr. Curran), and pressed upon the consideration of this House with so much ability and so much moderation and courtesy, would do any good to the people of Ireland I would for one, strain a great point to go with it. But it can be of not the slightest service to the people of Ireland. It cannot have the slightest effect on the measure before the Parliament of England. We know that the second reading of that Bill—after the measure with all its details was before the people of England; we know it was discussed in the public press of England; we know it was of burning interest in England, Scotland and Ireland; we know that every possible argument was used in the press of one side and the other—and yet at the end of the discussion the second reading was carried by a majority of one hundred and one. So it is quite certain that this Bill—be it good or be it bad, be its results unfortunate or beneficial—is to become the law of that land and, therefore, if this resolution is introduced and voted for in this House with the idea that it will be of any benefit in amending that Bill, in obstructing its passage or preventing its being the law of that land, then you might go beyond our legitimate sphere and vote for it in the hope that it would be of service to Ireland. But that measure is going to be the law of the land in a few days; it will be passed by the House of Commons in a few days; afterwards it will be passed by the House of Lords, and I have no doubt the Royal Assent will be given almost immediately afterwards. So, then, it can be of no benefit to the people of Ireland in any way whatever. It cannot prevent the evils which have been so strongly pressed in England and Ireland and reiterated here. The people of Ireland will be under that law for good or for evil; it will be put in force for good or for evil, and our resolution will be of no benefit or advantage in relieving or alleviating any of the unfavorable or disastrous consequences which are prophesied to result from that Bill. But while it can be of no good to the people of Ireland, is it not of great mischief to the people of Canada that this subject of discord should be introduced here? We have people here of different opinions. We have people in Canada who are as strongly in favor of this Bill, as the majority in this House are as opposed to it. It is setting neighbor against neighbor in Canada; it is making this a matter of political difference, whereas we should be joined together, when we can be joined together, in developing this young country. We should all apply our minds, and, without respect to party, should endeavor to elevate our country, to promote its interests, and remove from it as far as we can every element of social, religious or political discord. Let us agree to differ, when we do differ, conscientiously on the various subjects which affect Canada itself. Let us join together when we can agree upon what is best for the country, and when we differ let us do so conscientiously. Let us vote like men according to our consciences, and according to what we think is best for the interests of Canada. But let us endeavor as much as possible to keep out of the political arena, and keep ourselves free from questions which are calculated to arouse the hostile feeling of people who should otherwise be friendly. Let us try to reduce to a minimum the number of questions that are the cause of irritation and ill-feeling, socially and individually, as well as among classes, of our people in Canada. If I had been here, I would have voted for the amendment moved by my hon. friend for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I reiterate what I have already stated, that I believe it is perfectly within our competence to deal with this subject as far as to express our opinion. I believe we had a right to send the Address we did in 1882; I believe we had a right to reiterate our opinion in 1886; and I believe we have a right now to express our opinion on this question. But at the same time, seeing that it can produce no good results, that it cannot help Ireland or the Irish people in any way whatever, I believe, in the language of my hon. friend's resolution, that it is unwise and inexpedient that we should concern ourselves in a subject so purely a matter for Imperial consideration and legislation as the amendment to the criminal law so far as it relates to Ireland. Now, Sir, I wish to keep myself perfectly free and colorless as to an expression of opinion whether that Coercion Act is right or wrong. I quite agree with the amendment of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). We have not the Bill itself before us. Before this discussion took place in Parliament I had not even read the Bill, and I certainly have neither read nor seen nor considered the evidence on which that legislation is based; and I venture to say that the majority of the members of this House have not read either the debates arising on the measure or the arguments used by the Government in introducing it, or the papers and blue-books laid before Parliament, as the justification and the basis for it. We are not in a position to say whether that legislation is right or wrong, or whether the state of Ireland is such as to require it. There has been a great deal of confusion in this debate resulting from mixing up the question of Home Rule with the question of criminal legislation. The questions are quite different. I am strongly in favor of Home Rule, guarded as it was proposed to be by the resolution of 1882, and yet I cannot understand or believe that because the Imperial Parliament does not agree with me, or with the majority of the people of Ireland, on that subject, therefore there may not be such a state of lawlessness and outrage in Ireland as to call for and justify stringent criminal measures. Mr. Gladstone's Administration introduced and carried into law coercive measures more stringent than the present one, and more than that, enforced it, in the opinion of all Irishmen, in the most oppressive style. With regard to the measure now before Parliament, how can we know, unless we have applied our minds to the study of the whole evidence, and to the consideration of the actual state of Ireland, whether there has not been such an absence of all law and order as to require an increase in the stringency of the criminal law? I am not prepared, and I do not believe the majority of this House are prepared, to decide without full knowledge and cognisance of the facts, whether this coercive measure is right or wrong, whether it has been called for or not, or whether it is oppressively forced on the people of Ireland without any necessity for it. Therefore, Sir, while the introduction and discussion of this subject is not calculated to do Ireland any good, I say again—I cannot repeat it too often—that, in my opinion, it is disastrous to the best interests of the people of

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,

Canada—it is disastrous to the good feeling that ought to exist among the people of Canada—to have this question thrown upon us. I draw a great distinction between Irishmen in Parliament, who, full of sentiment and feeling for their own country, are wrapped in the consideration of the wrongs of Ireland. I can quite understand and appreciate and justify the course of my hon. friend from Montreal, and of the gentlemen of Irish birth or Irish parentage who, thinking only of their country, are led away from the consideration of the fact that the expression of these views will not do their country any good. I can draw a great distinction between them and other members of this House who are pressing this subject, not because it is going to do any good to Ireland or to Canada, but because, for political reasons, it is going to split the people of Canada. Then, Sir, there is another consideration. I believe it is not only the duty, but it is the interest of the people of Canada and their representatives, to avoid all matters of difference between the Imperial Government and Canada. We are connected with England so closely, our interests are so interwoven, England can do so much for us, that it is of the very greatest importance that, unless any right of privilege of ours is infringed upon, we should avoid all difference of opinion between Canada and the Imperial Government, no matter what party may be in power in England. Thank God, of late years, and ever since I have had anything to do with colonial affairs, I have found it made very little difference to Canada whether the Liberal or the Conservative party was in power in England. I am proud to say that during my time at least—and I can look back at forty years of public life—England has always been kind and good to the people of Canada; that whenever we went to the foot of the Throne we found the Imperial Government and the representatives of the English people in the Imperial Parliament ready to meet us fairly, to give us their support and countenance, and ready to aid us in many and most of the schemes and enterprises that have been undertaken by Canada for her own development; and even when we did not receive all the assistance we asked for—and sometimes we asked for a good deal more than we expected to get—during the whole of that long period, never has there been a single step taken by Her Majesty's Government or the people of England as represented in the Imperial Parliament, which affected or impaired a single right or privilege of the people of Canada, either as colonists, as British subjects or as free men. Therefore, it is of the very greatest importance that we should avoid, as much as possible, coming into collision, whether the Government be Liberal, extreme Tory or Conservative—my good friend opposite from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) drew a distinction between the Conservative and the Tory party—with the Home Government. We have got one burning question, the fishery question, upon which the interests of Canada—I merely quote this as an instance—are greatly interested. It is a matter in which a powerful nation close to us is taking a course antagonistic to what we consider not only our interests, but our rights. Her Majesty's Government is giving us that support which we have the right to expect; Her Majesty's Government believes that Canada has certain rights, and that Canada has acted rightly within the law and within the bonds of the treaty with the United States in asserting those rights. It is of some little importance, therefore, that we who are looking for this support from Her Majesty's Government, that we who are expecting to get, in the course of the negotiations now going on, a continuance of that support—it is important that we should not, with the imperfect evidence before us, with the want of evidence, and when it can do no good to the people we desire to serve, snub the Government, if I may use that expression. It is important we should not cast into the teeth of the Government whose support we are asking that they are altogether wrong, that they are acting oppressively, that they are crushing a portion of Her Majesty's subjects and a great portion of the Empire in the Kingdom of Ireland. I would not hesitate, notwithstanding it might injure or prejudice our Canadian interests, to risk injuring or prejudice those interests, if we were called upon to do so with the hope and expectation and belief that our course would be beneficial to Ireland; but, as I have already, perhaps ad nauseum stated, it cannot be benefited, and therefore, without any evidence whatever, or with evidence so imperfect that it amounts to no evidence, we are actually quarrelling with Her Majesty's Government, as it were, and injuring ourselves without doing good to anybody else. Before sitting down, I would say, in consequence of a remark from my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) who drew a distinction between Conservatives and Tories, that whether the party was Conservative or Tory—and I think Conservative and Tory mean pretty much the same thing—I would say to that hon. gentleman that he quite misunderstood the line of argument followed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). My hon. friend stated that because a measure might be adopted by force or by fraud it did not at all follow that that measure was not good in itself and might not produce beneficial results, and he quoted the instance of the Union between Upper and Lower Canada in 1841. That measure was passed without the consent of the people of Lower Canada, and everybody knew that the whole population, or at least the vast majority of Lower Canada, was against the Union. In Upper Canada it was equally unpopular. The hon. gentleman says that the Bill was opposed in Lower Canada because its provisions were unfair and because of the special unfairness in the distribution of representation. Sir, it was most fortunate for the Province of Lower Canada that the provision in that Act, to which they so much objected, was in the Act, and that was that the representation in each Province in the united Parliament should be equal. Then the Province of Lower Canada had a larger population than Upper Canada. No doubt there was, in the first place, opposition against the whole Bill. The majority of Lower Canada was against any union on any terms with the Province of Upper Canada, and they specially objected to the clause providing that the representation of each Province should be equal. But that has been the salvation of Lower Canada. In the course of a few years the population of Upper Canada equalled that of Lower Canada. This was all right, the representation was as it ought to be, but, by-and-bye, the Province of Upper Canada gained on the sister Province; by-and-bye her population became largely in excess of that in Lower Canada, and then the whole Liberal party of Upper Canada, as one man, joined to insist that there should be a majority of representatives from Lower Canada, and the object of that pressure was avowed. It was not secret, it was not hidden. The great leader of the Liberal party of that day, the Hon. George Brown, announced that they insisted upon having a majority of representatives in the united Parliament, because they had a majority of the population, and they declared that it was for the purpose of making French Canada English; for the purpose of forcing English institutions upon their French fellow-subjects; for the purpose of pressing Protestantism upon the people of Upper Canada; for the purpose of doing away with the use of the French language, as the official state language of that part of the country. The whole aim, and end, and object of the whole of the Liberal party, headed by the Hon. George Brown, was to crush out the institutions, the language and the religion of the people of Lower Canada. The people of Lower Canada were protected from this great wrong, this great outrage. Who were they protected by? By the Tories of whom the hon. gentleman has spoken so unfavorably. Why, I, as the exponent of the Conservative Tory minority in Upper Canada, stood in the breach. Year after year we opposed the wishes of the majority of the people of Canada. We said, no, we will not do so; we accepted with every complacency the Constitution of 1841, when we were inferior in population. We had then an equality in representation, now that we are in a majority we must deal the same mode of justice, we must follow the same system that we claimed for ourselves, and obtained for ourselves, when we were in a minority. Year after year I was cried down, year after year we were in a minority, year after year were we insulted by being called slaves to French domination, year after year we were said to be priest-ridden and yielding to the pressure of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and, therefore, I think the hon. gentleman ought to feel a little more grateful on the part of his countrymen, when he looks back historically and finds that if representation by population was not carried, if there was not a majority of men of the Liberal party in the Parliament of old Canada, sworn as it were, to crush them out in all that they held dear, it was due altogether to the Conservative majority led by the humble individual who now addresses you. This, however, is perhaps an aside, but I thought it right I should speak to this subject as it was introduced by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault). Now, I have read with interest the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and I must say that it meets my views exactly. I will vote for it with great pleasure. The resolution is:

That this House learns with regret that it is considered necessary to pass a Coercive Bill for Ireland.

It does not state whether that consideration is right or wrong, but it states, what we must all regret, that it is considered necessary to pass a coercive measure for Ireland. Would to God there was no necessity for such legislation, if there be any necessity for any such legislation. Would to God that Ireland, England and Scotland could be governed by the same law, civil and criminal. We can all express our regret that it is considered necessary by Her Majesty's Government in England to pass a coercive measure for Ireland. Then it goes on:

And it reaffirms its conviction, as expressed in the resolutions of 1882 and 1886, that a plan of local government for Ireland which would leave unimpaired the links connecting Ireland with the British Empire and guard the rights of the minority, would be conducive to the prosperity and stability of the Empire.

That is a repetition of motions which I voted for with much pleasure in 1882 and 1886, and I should hope that this House will adopt this amendment. If, however, it is lost, I shall, for the reasons given by the mover, my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) vote for his amendment; and for the reasons I have given now I shall certainly vote against the resolution of my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran.)

Mr. MILLS. I wish to say a few words on the subject of this resolution which has now been proposed for the consideration of this House, and in reply to the very extraordinary speech addressed to the House by the leader of the Government. It will, I am sure, seem very extraordinary to many members of the House who remember the motion which was introduced here in 1882 and the motion which was introduced here in 1886, when they remember the course which the leader of the Government took upon both those motions, to listen to the extraordinary speech the hon. gentleman addressed to the House a few moments ago. In 1882 the hon. gentleman boasted that the resolution of the hon. member who is now Minister of Inland Revenue could not have been carried in the House without his support. He sought to impress upon the friends of Home Rule everywhere throughout the country that he was the friend of Home Rule, and that he had given it his cordial support on that occasion; and last year the hon. gentleman supported a resolution on the same subject in this House. If the hon. gentleman believed that we could do no possible good by voting for such a motion as that which has been submitted by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, why did not the hon. gentleman express in 1882 the sentiments which he has addressed to the House to-night? The hon. gentleman tells us that this is a measure of discord thrown in amongst the population of this country. Did the hon. gentleman not know what the views of the people of Canada, those who settled in this country from the North of Ireland, were in 1882 as well as he knows them to-day? What new light has the hon. gentleman received upon this question which has induced him at the present time to declare to the House and to the country that a motion recommending Home Rule for the people of Ireland will do serious damage to the interests of the people of this country? If the hon. gentleman was sincere in 1882, I must say that the position he has taken to-night was a most extraordinary one. But we know what the hon. gentleman's sentiments were. We know that when the measure of Confederation was carried, he declared that he was in favor of legislative union.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I did not.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has forgotten what he said; I remember it. The House will see that the hon. gentleman was opposed to the principle of a federal union, that he was opposed to a principle of provincial autonomy and local self government. These were the sentiments of the hon. gentleman; but, before the elections of 1882 and the elections of 1887, they were not prudent sentiments to give expression to in this country. The hon. gentleman knows that the elections are now over, and, having no confidence in the breed, it is easy to assume a position of independence and to give expression to that feeling of hostility which it is well known he has long entertained. The hon. gentleman says now that Mr. Gladstone has declared that this is none of our business. We know that Mr. Gladstone or his Government declared that, and I admit that Mr. Gladstone was responsible for the views communicated in Lord Kimberley's despatch. But that was known before the hon. gentleman supported a motion in favor of Home Rule last year. Why did he not at that time put forward the views which he has put forth to-night? He had the information last year as well as he has it to-night. What new light has the hon. gentleman received since then? Has Lord Salisbury communicated to the hon. gentleman his strong disapprobation of any measure of Home Rule, and is the hon. gentleman too much devoted to the Tory party in England and to their policy of coercion to permit this House to express any view hostile to that policy? He says that this measure which has been introduced by Mr. Balfour is one relating to the administration of the criminal law, and why should we express any view upon it? Why did the hon. gentleman express an opinion in 1882 in reference to the Kilmainham imprisonment? Where is the difference? Was not that a particular case under the criminal law? Was not that a case of the confinement of men upon the evidence of which he had no means of forming an opinion? And yet, knowing the drift of public opinion, knowing that the opinion of this country was in favor of conceding to the Irish self-government, and knowing well, as he does, that the disorder grew out of the want of Home Rule, he was prepared to recommend the release of those parties, as well as a measure of Home Rule, on that occasion. If the measure of Home Rule were conceded to the people of Ireland, if justice were done them, if the Government would concede to them what has been obtained by the people of Canada and has produced content out of disorder here, then this measure of coercion, this new law procedure, would have been altogether unnecessary, and it is because of the absence of Home Rule in Ireland that a measure of coercion has been found necessary. It is not necessary for us to consider whether the Irish people have been guilty of criminal conduct or not. We know well the origin of the misconduct, if there has been misconduct. We know that it originated in the maladministration of the Government. We know that maladministration will continue until the people of Ireland control their own affairs, and remove the cause of this bitterness, the cause of this misconduct, and then a measure of coercion will be altogether unnecessary. Now, I am opposed, I need not say, to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). That purports to be an amendment in favor of Home Rule. I would like to know what member here can be deluded into such a view after the speech of the leader of the Government. Was that a Home Rule speech? Was it in favor of the principle of conceding Home Rule to Ireland? Was it in favor of the interference on the part of this House in that direction? Not at all. The hon. gentleman knows that that measure if carried, will be quoted by the enemies of Home Rule as an evidence of the hostile sentiments of the people of Canada, and of their representatives in our Parliament, and therefore he can safely support such a proposition. There is no danger of offending Lord Salisbury or his Government. It is only necessary to examine that amendment to see that it admits in the first place, that coercion is necessary. We deny that proposition. In the next place it proposes that if Home Rule is granted, it shall be a minimum of Home Rule, not what the people of Ireland desire, but what the enemies of Ireland are ready to concede. Then it misrepresents the public opinion of this country by intimating that all these restrictions that Mr. Chamberlain and the Liberal dissentients in England have put forward are reasonable objections and ought to be considered before a measure of Home Rule is agreed to. In the last place, it ignores the friends and supporters of the principle of Home Rule altogether. To whom is it proposed to send this resolution? Why, to Lord Salisbury, to the man who declared that a measure of "Thorough" was necessary in the government of Ireland, that the people of Ireland ought to be arbitrarily governed for twenty years, and then, perhaps, they might be so disciplined under such a measure as that they might be entrusted with a larger share of self-government than they have had hitherto. There is no proposition to send this measure to Mr. Gladstone or to Mr. Parnell.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Gladstone was Prime Minister for England when we voted on the subject last year, and the hon. gentleman proposed to send it to Lord Salisbury as well as Mr. Gladstone. Now, Mr. Gladstone is leading the Opposition. Mr. Gladstone, it is well known, is an ardent advocate of the principle of Home Rule, and it is proposed to send it to the enemy of Home Rule and not to its friend. Why, Sir, if this proposition was favorable to the principle of Home Rule, the hon. gentleman would not attempt to offend Lord Salisbury by sending him a resolution of this sort. It is because he knows it may be quoted by those who are enemies of Home Rule that he has made the proposition which he has done. I dare say that the hon. gentleman was familiar with this resolution before he read it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What resolution?

Mr. MILLS. The resolution of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that he is much mistaken. I saw it first when I got it from the Speaker's hand.

Mr. MILLS. Well, Sir, it seems exactly in accord with the sentiments the hon. gentleman has expressed to-night. The hon. member for West Assiniboia is to be congratulated.

on the accuracy with which he has interpreted the sentiments of the First Minister. The hon. gentleman must be a kind of clairvoyant; he must have measured the intellectual and political capacities of the hon. gentleman, and prepared a resolution that is in exact accord with his views. Well, we know precisely what this resolution means. When we had a measure of a similar character presented to us last year, we had some difficulty in understanding it. The hon. gentleman declared that it meant Home Rule. Well, Sir, the commentary with which this amendment is accompanied in the speech of the hon. gentleman, will not permit any hon. member on this side of the House to fall into a mistake in regard to the matter.

Dupont,

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CURRAN. With the permission of the House I desire to alter two or three words in my motion, to make verbal changes.

Mr. SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House the hon. gentleman may make those alterations.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not rise to make any objections to the alterations mentioned by the hon. member for Montreal Centre, but I rise for the purpose of making a personal explanation in answer to the charge made across the floor of the House by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Certainly I am not going to inflict upon the House a defence of all my statements, or an answer to the arguments advanced in reply to those which I ventured to use the other night; but when an hon. member charges me across the floor of the House, as I understand him to do, with wilfully misstating the law, I think it is due to myself, certainly due to the House, that I should answer a charge of that kind. Now, if I misstated the law, I have got the authority of the Consolidated Statutes for my misstatement; for in the Statutes consolidated under the Act prepared by the hon. member for West Durham, I find that the offence is triable before two magistrates, just as I said. But I am inclined to think, upon further investigation, that it is not a correct consolidation; nevertheless, it is the authority upon which I made the statement. The clause in the Consolidated Act is, that for these offences the party shall:

"On summary conviction before two justices of the peace, or on indictment, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $100, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor."

That is the way it is consolidated. On looking back at the Act itself, I find that it refers to two other Statutes. It refers to an Act passed in 1872, to an amendment to that Statute passed in 1876. On reading these two Acts together—which I had not done, assuming that the consolidation was correct—I find that the earlier Act which permitted a trial before two magistrates, was repealed by a later Act, and gave the party the option or privilege of refusing to be tried before two magistrates. That was the change that was made. However, I think that statement is due to the hon. member for West Durham, but it does not at all affect my argument. My argument was this: That we in this Parliament permitted two magistrates to try and imprison without trial by jury. It was incorrect to say that the hon. member for West Durham was the author of this legislation; but in 1872, and from that to 1875, that was the law of this land—that two magistrates, for offences of violence, could try without a jury, without the party having an opportunity to elect to be tried by a jury, for offences similar to those which by the so-called Coercion Act in England, are to be tried by two magistrates, the difference being in the length of the term of punishment. That statement, I think, I ought to make, and that is all I propose to say in answer to what has been said in reply to my remarks the other day. I do not at all propose to follow the different charges made against myself. The hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Claves), spoke of me as being the leader of the Orange faction in the House, I think, and being an Orangeman, or something of that kind; the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) spoke of me as desiring to oppress minorities. What my opinions are in reference to those charges I do not suppose the House would care to listen to at this hour, but some other opportunity may be afforded for me to explain and to justify what I have said.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says that his argument was not at all affected by the correction made by the hon. member for Bothwell, and in some sort restated by himself; but his argument was an argumentum ad hominem—

Mr. McCARTHY. I deny that.

Mr. BLAKE. Specially directed to me.

Mr. McCARTHY. I deny that.

Mr. BLAKE. It was an indictment against me quite proper to be urged in respect to the impropriety of this Coercion Bill, inasmuch as I have been the author of a Coercion Bill in the Canadian Parliament. That was the position which the hon. gentleman took. To-night he has to admit that the Coercion Bill which, he says, did not affect his argument, was somebody else's act. It is quite true; it was the act of his leader. It was quite true that what the First Minister did in the laws with reference to certain acts of violence, provided that they should be tried before two justices. That was the state of things in 1872 under the Conservative Administration of that day. In the year 1876, when I was called upon to deal with the question, I altered that, and I caused to cease to exist the Canadian coercion law which the hon. gentleman—

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman will excuse me for one moment. Will the hon. gentleman say what he did in 1875? I think he was then in the Administration.

Mr. BLAKE. I was not.

Mr. McCARTHY. At all events his party was, and the law of 1872 was amended in 1875.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know at this moment what was done in 1875, I was not in the Administration. I am now speaking of what I did. I say that in 1876 I altered the law thus:

"Where a person is brought before a functionary or tribunal named in the second section of the said Act of the 35th year of Her Majesty's reign, cap 31, in respect to any offence under the provisions of the first section of the said Act as amended by the second section of this Act, the accused may on appearing before such functionary or tribunal declare that he objects to being tried for such offence by such functionary or tribunal, and thereupon such functionary or tribunal shall not proceed with such trial, but may deal with the case in all respects as if the accused were charged with an indictable offence and not with an offence punishable on summary conviction, and the accused may be prosecuted on indictment accordingly; and this section shall be read as part of the said Act."

So that I restored to those who were chargeable under the Act of 1872 their right, their absolute right to be tried by jury, leaving them the option of being tried summarily before two magistrates, if they did not object to that method of trial. Then in the Act of 1877 to which the hon. gentleman alluded, I made that provision under the Act in the form which I have just read—that the clause which I have just read should apply so that when that was made—I will not say it was made a part of the criminal law, for it was a part of the criminal law at that time—but when the new provision was made and that particular class remained under the criminal law, while the breach of contract was taken out of the category of criminal offences, I gave expressly to the subjects charged with the first named offences the right of trial by jury. So the argument ad hominem of the hon. gentleman was altogether wrong. I am very sorry that the application of the Revised and Consolidated Statutes should be productive of such painful results on this occasion.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps I may be allowed to say, that while I applied my argument, as I did very distinctly, to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that was not the argument, but it was the application. The hon. gentleman has reiterated the statement in defiance of my denial. My statement was this: I said, were we the parties to be finding fault with Her Majesty's Government for passing a law of this kind when we passed the law to which I refer; and, I added, least of all did that come with good grace from the hon. member for West Durham. That was the way I put it.

Mr. GIGAULT. I know I am far from possessing the knowledge, the intelligence and eloquence of the right hon. leader of this House, and that many people will consider it as boldness on my part to rise to answer some of the assertions made by him in reply to what I said this afternoon. But however feebly I may do so, I will endeavor to defend my convictions as well as I am able. He said that I was wrong when I criticised the Act of Union, because it did not give to the inhabitants of Lower Canada fair representation. I did not attack the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on that account only. As illustrating the Tory proclivity of that hon. member, I quoted his speech at Barrie. I said also that he was the chief promoter of the Imperial Federation scheme, and these facts I produced as proof of his Tory proclivities. The right hon. leader says, and says rightly, that he defended the French Canadians in bygone years, and that he opposed representation based upon population. I praise him for having done so; but when the Act of Union was proposed and adopted, I am of opinion it was proposed with a view of annihilating the French race in Quebec as a party. In a speech made by Mr. Hume on 3rd June, 1839, in the English House of Commons, when the Act of Union was discussed, he said:

"I have no objection to the resolution, but I do object to any principle of representation not founded upon the basis of population, and which was proposed with the view of giving the British population a preponderating influence. I cannot but regret to see a people so amiable as the French Canadians treated with so little justice or consideration."

So if I found the clauses of the Act of Union arbitrary with respect of the representation granted to the inhabitants of Lower Canada, I not only expressed my opinion but also that of Mr. Hume. There is another opinion similar to that expressed by Mr. Hume, and it is that of Mr. O'Connell, who, in the course of his speech in the English House of Commons, used the following language:—

"The avowed intention of the Act is nothing less than the annihilation of the French Canadians as a party, who have already been treated shamefully by the British Government. I enter my most solemn protest. There can be no real union of the Canadas unless the French Canadians are put upon a footing of exact equality with the other inhabitants. If we do not make the proposed union in that way, there are examples to show that the passing of a mere Act of Union is no corrective to long-existing evils."

If I understood rightly the right hon. leader of the Government, he said there was no difference between a Conservative and a Tory; that he was satisfied with the policy that was followed in 1841 and 1845, and that he approved it. In 1848, Sir George Cartier, Lafontaine and Baldwin were fighting the right hon. leader of the present House on account of his Tory proclivities, and because the policy pursued by the party of which he was one of the leading men was not friendly to Lower Canada. I am more inclined to think that Sir George E. Cartier, Lafontaine and Baldwin were right rather than the leader of the present Government. If I say so it is not because I think that the right hon. leader has not a brilliant past; but I believed that he had changed his principles after 1848 when he made an alliance with Sir George E. Cartier. Sir George E. Cartier and the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec never called themselves Tories. The position taken by the member for North Simcoe during the last two electoral campaigns, the crusade which the Mail undertook against the French race and its institutions, call for some explanations; and if I raise this question here, it is in order to ascertain if the leader of the present Conservative party approves of the position and principles which are advocated by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and by the Mail and its editors. I want to know if the present Conservatives of Ontario are going to adopt the same Tory policy which was followed in 1837, 1841, and 1848, and if that same Tory policy, inimical to minorities, is going to be followed to-day. It is time, I think, that we should know. If there is no difference between a Conservative and a Tory, is there any difference between the policy of the Premier and that of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)? He said that George Brown had tried to make Lower Canada English. He was right in saying so, but is not his declaration with respect to George Brown a condemnation of the attitude taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he said in his speech at Barrie that the French Canadians were a danger to the confederacy as long as they remained French? This speech means that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) wishes to continue what George Brown wanted to do—that is, to make Lower Canada English, to make her renounce her institutions. What I want to know is if the principles of the present Conservatives of Ontario are the same as those which guided the Tories of 1837. In the discussion on the Act of Union, the Earl of Gosford, who had been Governor of Canada in 1837, expressed the following opinion with respect to the Canadian Tory party:—

"I am aware, my Lords, of the existence of great alarm in Canada, which, indeed, does not surprise me, arising as it must do, so far as the French Canadians are concerned, from the apprehensions of a violent ultra-Tory British party, whose object is to monopolise as much as possible all the power and patronage of the colony, and to assume the ascendancy over all who do not participate in their arbitrary views. The whole conduct of this party, and the violence of the language made use of by many of those who belong to it, are quite enough to exasperate the French population and produce amongst them the alarm I have alluded to."

The Earl of Gosford says that the language used by the then Tory party was sufficient to create alarm among the French Canadians, and I think to-day that the attitude taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and by the Mail is sufficient to create alarm amongst us. We must know what are the principles of those men and whether the members of the present Cabinet condemn their attitude and the policy which they are following.

Mr. MILLS. Before the motion is put, I wish to say a word in reply to the observations made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He seemed to think that I did him an injustice in presuming that he was acquainted with the contents of the measure proposed by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

Mr. McCARTHY. No, I said you purposely charged me with misstating the law.

Mr. MILLS. I will read the precise words of the hon. gentleman, and he will see that he not only misstated the law, but that he also gave an erroneous reason for what he did at the time the law was proposed. After stating that the hon. member for West Durham was the author of this particular provision, the hon. gentleman says:

"But that is not the worst feature. Why, they were to be tried summarily—not by a court and jury. The great right of trial by jury was ignored by the hon. gentleman, and the trial was to take place before two magistrates who had power to send the accused to prison. That was the way we acted in circumstances of that kind."

The hon. gentleman then goes on:

"I voted against that measure, and I believe those associated on the Opposition side of the House with me almost unanimously voted against it. We did not so vote on the ground that we had not the power to pass legislation of that kind, but we denied that there was any occasion for so stringent amendment to the law."

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. He says this was part of the measure proposed by the hon. member for West Durham, and that he was so shocked at the time the measure was proposed that he opposed it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman, so far from having opposed the measure on that ground, opposed it, notwithstanding the existence of any such ground. There is no such ground in the law; that could not have been the reason for his opposition, and the hon. gentleman, relying on his imagination in the one case, has relied on it in the other. What am I to suppose with regard to the position of the hon. gentleman? His explanation, I think, quite justifies me in the observations which I made. The hon. gentleman said I was not acquainted with the actual provisions of the law which my hon. friend proposed in 1877. He was misled in looking at the Revised Statutes. I accept his statement, for I do not think he would seek to mislead the House in the matter, but it shows that he should be more particular about ascertaining the facts before making so positive an assertion as the one he made a few evenings ago. I now wish to call the attention of the First Minister to what he did say in 1865, and I think he will find that I did not misstate the views which he at that time entertained. He said :

"I have again and again stated in the House that, if practicable, I thought a legislative union would be preferable. I have always contended that if we could agree to have one Government and one Parliament, legislating for the whole of these peoples, it would be the best, the cheapest, the most vigorous and the strongest system of government we could adopt."

So the hon. gentleman is of opinion that legislative union would be preferable to a federal union, that it is better that the community should be governed by a single Parliament controlled by a single Executive.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this point up, because I have heard it stated before that, to use the language of the hon. gentleman, I hated and was opposed to a Federal Government and favored legislative union. I think the words were that I hated it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so. The hon. gentleman read the first part of what I said, but he did not read the whole of it. I have the report of my remarks before me, and I will read from it :

"The third and only means of solution for our difficulties was the junction of the Provinces either in a federal or a legislative union. Now as regards the comparative advantages of a legislative and a federal union, I never hesitated to state my own opinions. I have again and again stated in the House that, if practicable, I thought a legislative union would be preferable. I have always contended that if we could agree to have one Government and one Parliament, legislating for the whole of these people it would be the best, the cheapest, the most vigorous, and the strongest system of government we could adopt.

The hon. gentleman read that part.

"But on looking at the subject in the conference, and discussing the matter as we did, most unreservedly, and with a desire to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, we found that such a system was impracticable. In the first place—

And I would call the attention of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) to the reason why I gave up my opinion in favor of a legislative union and took up and adopted federal union heartily and unreservedly.

"In the first place it would not meet the assent of the people of Lower Canada, because they felt that in their peculiar position—being in a minority, with a different language, nationality and religion from the majority—in case of a junction with the other Provinces, their institutions and their laws might be assailed, and their ancestral associations, on which they prided themselves, attacked and prejudiced; it was found that any proposition which involved the absorption of the individuality of Lower Canada—if I may use the expression—would not be received with favor by her people. We found, too, that though their people speak the same language and enjoy the same system of law as the people of Upper Canada, a system founded on the common law of England, there was as great a disinclination on the part of the various Maritime Provinces to lose their individuality, as separate political organisations, as we observed in the case of Lower Canada herself. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, we were forced to the conclusion that we must either abandon the idea of union altogether, or devise a system of union in which the separate provincial organisations would be in some degree preserved. So that those who were, like myself, in favor of a legislative union, were obliged to modify their views and accept the project of a federal union as the only scheme practicable, even for the Maritime Provinces. Because, although the law of those Provinces is founded on the common-law of England, yet every one of them has a large amount of law of its own—colonial law framed by itself, and affecting every relation of life, such as the laws of property, municipal and assessment laws; laws relating to the liberty of the subject, and to all the great interests contemplated in legislation; we found, in short, that the statutory law of the different Provinces was so varied and diversified that it was almost impossible to weld them into a legislative union at once. Why, Sir, if you only consider the innumerable subjects of legislation peculiar to new countries, and that every one of those five colonies had particular laws of its own, to which its people have been accustomed and are attached, you will see the difficulty of effecting and working a legislative union, and bringing about an assimilation of the local as well as general laws of the whole of the Provinces. (Hear, hear.) We in Upper Canada understand from the nature and operation of our peculiar municipal laws, of which we know the value, the difficulty of framing a general system of legislation on local matters which would meet the wishes and fulfil the requirements of the several Provinces. Even the laws considered the least important, respecting private rights in timber, roads, fencing, and innumerable other matters, small in themselves, but in the aggregate of great interest to the agricultural class, who form the great body of the people, are regarded as of great value by the portion of the community affected by them. And when we consider that every one of the colonies has a body of law of this kind, and that it will take years before those laws can be assimilated, it was felt that at first, at all events, any united legislation would be almost impossible. I am happy to state—and indeed it appears on the face of the resolutions themselves—that as regards the Lower Provinces, a great desire was evinced for the final assimilation of our laws."

So that the hon. gentleman ought to have read the whole of what I have read, instead of quoting the first part and not the latter part, in which I stated that I had unreservedly abandoned my opinion because it was impossible, if we were going to have any union at all, to have a legislative union, and we could only have a federal union.

Mr. CASEY. And this, Mr. Speaker, is the father of Confederation—the right hon. gentleman who has been exhibited throughout the Dominion from one end to the other as the originator and proposer of Confederation, out of whose brain sprung the whole scheme, to whom principally, if not alone, is owing the existence and success of Confederation, and to-night he quotes his own words, and says he is sorry that the member for Bothwell did not read them before.

Mr. HAGGART. I rise to a point of order. The remarks of the hon. gentleman have not the slightest reference to the debate in hand.

Mr. CASEY. I contend that my remarks have as much to do with it as the hon. gentleman's reply, and I say the question of whether the hon. gentleman was originally in favor of legislative or a federative union is as much in order when discussed by me as when discussed by himself. I have just been trying to show that he was in the conference, as he stated himself, in favor of legislative union, and was obliged to modify his views.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has failed to convince me that what he was arguing was really on the question. He might argue that some others have been out of order, but it seems to me that it was the general wish of the House to hear the explanations which have been given, so that I did not choose to interfere. But the moment the House complains that the discussion is away from the question I must interfere.

Mr. BURNS. As it appears it would not be in order for the hon. member for Montreal Centre to change the wording of the resolution, I beg now, at his request, to move as an amendment, what would be his resolution if changed in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Essex.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is not the slightest objection to accepting the resolution if it can be done without the necessity of the hon. gentleman moving the amendment. I understand that that cannot be done, and there is no objection to this being substituted.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule is that the mover cannot amend his own motion, but, as I find it was often done at the suggestion of Mr. Speaker Brand, the original motion may be withdrawn, and then, with the unanimous consent of the House, it can be presented in a new form.

Mr. BLAKE. Let the hon. member for Montreal Centre withdraw the resolution and then present it in the new form. Then he will have his own motion in his own hands.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. CURRAN moved :

That the Parliament of Canada in the year 1882 adopted a humble Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen expressing the hope that a just measure of Home Rule would be granted to the people of Ireland; and

That in the year 1886, by Resolution of the House of Commons, the sentiments of said Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty were earnestly reiterated and the hope again expressed that such a measure of Home Rule would be passed by the Imperial Parliament; and

That such measure of Home Rule has not been granted to the Irish people, but, on the contrary, there has been introduced into the Imperial House of Commons by Her Majesty's Government a Bill enacting the most stringent coercive measures for Ireland, by which the Irish people will be deprived of rights most dear to all British subjects.

That this House has learned with profound regret of the introduction into the Imperial House of Commons of the Coercion Bill above mentioned, and earnestly hopes that a measure so subversive of the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland may not become law.

That this House again expresses the hope that there may speedily be granted to Ireland a substantial measure of Home Rule which, whilst satisfying the national aspirations of the people of Ireland for self-government, shall also be consistent with the integrity of the Empire as a whole.

That the granting of Home Rule to Ireland will fittingly crown the already glorious reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty as a constitutional sovereign, will come with special appropriateness in this Her Jubilee year, and, if possible, render Her Majesty more dear to the hearts of Her already devoted and loyal subjects.

That the present Resolutions be forwarded to the Right Hon. the Marquis of Salisbury, Prime Minister, to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., and Charles Stuart Parnell, M.P.

House divided on motion of Mr. Curran :

Motion agreed to.

Mr. TROW. I noticed the hon. member for Russell did not vote.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not vote for the reason I have already given, I have paired. Had I the opportunity I would have voted for the resolution.

THE FISHERY QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to know when we will get those fishery papers. It is about time we had them.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot add anything to what I stated this afternoon. All despatch is being used, and they will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it possible the hon. gentleman has made no enquiry as to how long it will take to bring them down? On Friday it was promised they would be brought down yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the hon. gentleman wishes me to set a definite time so as to have another opportunity of saying what he has already said, that I cannot keep a promise.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it possible the hon. gentleman has made no enquiry?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend has a perfect right, after the promise was made across the House by the Minister, that very important papers should be laid here yesterday, to know whether that Minister does or does not know, or has made any enquiries as to when they will be here. If he was in a position to promise them on Monday, the bulk of them at any rate might be in our hands to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I had promised that the papers would be brought down on Friday, or at the latest Monday, but, as the leader of the Opposition knows, permission was only obtained on Friday to bring down the second portion. Since then I have made no statement as to when the papers will be brought down. The leader of the Government told the House they would be brought down on Monday, but it was impossible to lay them on the Table on that day, except in manuscript, and in that case hon. gentlemen would have had 800 or 1,000 pages of manuscript before them for a few moments, of which no use could have been made, as they would have almost immediately to be sent to the printer. I thought it was better they should be printed before they were laid on the Table, when the whole House would have easy and instant access to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you any idea of the probable time when they will be ready.

Mr. FOSTER. I could not say definitely.

Mr. MITCHELL. Within a week?

Mr. FOSTER. I make enquiry every day, and the answer I get is that a certain number of folios are being printed each day, and they are going on with all possible despatch.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1:10 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 31) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This is the same Bill I had the honor to introduce last Session, which was referred to the Railway Commission to deal with. I do not know that it is necessary, as the Bill has been before the House, that I should take up time by further reference to it, but, if any hon. gentleman desire it, I will refer to the points. It has to do with the question of freight rates principally, and some other matters as well.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. AMYOT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 32) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act of 1874.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. member please to explain the object of this Bill?

Mr. AMYOT. The object of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, is to fix a uniform date for the contestation of Dominion elections, instead of having it reckoned from the day when the election is published in the Official Gazette. The delay shall be counted from the nomination day when the election is by acclamation and from the voting day when there is a poll. This delay must be uniform for everybody, and not be left to an arbitrary power.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PAYMENT OF MORTGAGES.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 33) to regulate proceedings in the collection of first and subsequent mortgages, and also to regulate the payment of the same. He said: The object of this Bill is to regulate the proceedings to be taken where there are more than one mortgage on property. Where there is a first and a second mortgage the intention of the Bill is to make certain provisions that the first mortgagee shall give the second mortgagee notice with regard to his intention to foreclose, and he has got to give thirty days' notice before he can incur any costs under the first mortgage; within thirty days the second mortgagee will be entitled to an assignment of the first mortgage on the payment of the principal and interest. It is to prevent properties from being squandered by the first mortgagee without giving the second mortgagee an opportunity of securing his rights. There are some other provisions in the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SUBWAY.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to construct a subway from Prince Edward Island to the mainland?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The examination which was undertaken by the Government has not extended to a sufficient degree to enable them to arrive at any conclusion on that subject.

WHARVES AT LONGUEUIL.

Mr. BERNIER, in the absence of Mr. Prefontaine, asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

the Estimates a sum sufficient to cover the expenditure required in order to increase the length of the wharves at Longueuil, county of Chambly, the first part whereof is now under contract and about to be commenced?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The work in question, as the hon gentleman knows, is now under contract. The work so given has been considered complete and sufficient by itself, and when it is completed we will have to see whether it will meet the requirements of trade or whether it must be lengthened. Therefore I am unable to give the hon. member another answer to-day.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA.

Mr. BERNIER, in the absence of Mr. Prefontaine, asked, Why the French edition of the Revised Statutes of Canada, which have been in force since the 1st March, have not, as yet, been distributed? Is it the intention of the Government to distribute the said Statutes for the use of Justices of the Peace and Magistrates in the several counties of the Dominion?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It has been very difficult, not to say impossible, for us to have both versions printed at the same time. The French edition is in the hands of the book-binder and will be ready within a few days. The distribution will take place in three or four days. The distribution of the English version is commenced. It is not the intention of the Government to distribute the Revised Statutes to the Justices of the Peace. A collection of all the criminal laws, making a very interesting and very useful volume, will be distributed to the Justices of the Peace of the Dominion.

WIDENING OF THE CHAMBLY CANAL

Mr. BERNIER, in the absence of Mr. Prefontaine, asked, Whether the Government intend to take the necessary steps to provide, at an early day, for the widening of the Chamby Canal?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of my colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals, I must say to the hon. member that it is not the intention of the Government.

BRITISH AMERICAN BANK NOTE COMPANY.

Mr. HOLTON asked, Has the Government, since last Session of Parliament, renewed its then existing contract, or entered into a new contract, with the British American Bank Note Company? If so, for what length of time and upon what terms has such contract or renewal been entered into? Were tenders called for? Was the opportunity afforded others or sought by them of tendering for the work, and did any other company or firm tender for it? Were such other tenders, if received, at a lower price than that allowed the British American Bank Note Company?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government, since last Session, has renewed its contract with the British American Bank Note Company for a period of five years from the 22nd of October, 1886. The principal terms of the contract are that the work shall be executed in the city of Ottawa, twelve months being given to the company to move their place of business from Montreal to Ottawa. The rates mentioned in the schedule to be subject to revision once each year at the option of the Minister of Finance, according to the current rate then charged for similar work in the city of New York; the work to be done for the Inland Revenue and Post Office Departments, to be subject to revision once each year by the Minister of Inland Revenue and Postmaster General, respectively; and the rates are 15 per cent. below the prices of the previous contract for the work performed for the Finance Department, about the same rate of reduction for the Inland Revenue Department, and about 30 per cent. below for the Post Office Department. Advertisements were not published calling for tenders. A tender was submitted by another company, but was not as favorable as that received by the British American Bank Note Company. It was considered that in consequence of the British American Bank Note Company having done the work for over twenty years, and on a whole in a satisfactory manner, the public interest would be best served by renewing the contract with them at the reduction of prices above mentioned.

HONORÉ ROY.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is true that Honoré Roy, of St. Valier, has been deprived of the situation which he held for several years on board the Government steam vessels? Has this been done after complaints made against his conduct or competency, and what were these complaints? By whom has he been replaced? By whom has his dismissal been required, and whether verbally or in writing?

Mr. FOSTER. One H. Roy—I suppose the same that is mentioned here—has been in the employ of the Government on the steamer Napoleon for some years. I find him on the pay-list up to January 26th. From January 1st to the present time his vessel has been laid up, and no sailors have been employed upon her.

MR. JEREMIAH TRAVIS.

Mr. WATSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint Mr. Jeremiah Travis, formerly Stipendiary Magistrate, as one of the Judges of the new Court for the North-West Territories?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not the intention.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether the Government has yet obtained the consent of the Imperial Government to lay before this House, the papers or any of them, relating to commercial treaties, in which Canada is interested, which are covered by the terms of the Address passed by this House on 28th January, 1884? And (if such consent has been obtained) when will the papers be brought down?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to allow that question to stand until to-morrow.

M. F. O'DONOGHUE.

Mr. BARRON asked. Has M. F. O'Donoghue, brother of the late W. B. O'Donoghue, been in the service of the Government? If so, in what capacity, and what was his position and salary? When was he first engaged? Is he still in the service of the Government; and if not, when did his employment cease?

Mr. COSTIGAN. M. F. O'Donoghue has been temporarily employed in the Inland Revenue Department—in June and July, and in October, November, December and January last. He was paid in accordance with the Civil Service Act, at the rate of $400 per annum, for 153 days, making a total sum of $168.11.

WHARVES AT ST. MARY'S BAY, STURGEON BAY AND GREEK RIVER.

Mr. ROBERTSON (King's) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repair, during the present season, the wharves at St. Mary's Bay, Sturgeon Bay and Greek River?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Department is not aware that repairs are required during the present season on the wharves at St. Mary's Bay and Sturgeon Bay, as they were repaired last year. The wharf at Greek River has not been taken over from the Local Government.

EXPORT OF SPIRITS FROM IMPORTED CORN.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether distillers are permitted to import corn in bond for manufacturing purposes, and export spirits or high wines as the product thereof? If not, what allowance (if any) is made to exporters of spirits manufactured out of imported grain?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Distillers have not the permission to import corn in bond for manufacturing purposes. Under the Inland Revenue Act if they manufacture spirits from imported corn, and export the same, they may claim a refund equal to Customs duties paid on such corn after satisfactory proof that the corn, from which such spirits was manufactured, actually paid the Customs duties.

COUNTY COURT OF ELGIN.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin) asked, Has the Government been asked to appoint a junior judge for the county of Elgin; if so, by whom and when? Is it the intention of the Government to make such appointment; if so, when, and who is to be appointed?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Government has been asked to appoint a junior judge for the county of Elgin. The memorial came principally from a number of the members of the bar. It was received a few months ago. The matter is still under the consideration of the Government, and I am, therefore, unable to answer the question further.

EXAMINATION UNDER THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. CASEY asked, 1. Was any special examination under the Civil Service Act held in the year 1887? 2. If so; when and where, and who conducted it? Why was it held? What was the cost of it? Who applied to be examined? And who passed?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. A special Civil Service promotion examination was held on 1st March last at Ottawa and Halifax, conducted at Ottawa by Mr. LeSueur, one of the members of the Commission, and at Halifax by Mr. Parsons. It was held to fill vacancies in the Post Office Department at Ottawa and an office in the Customs Department at Halifax. The cost of the examination at Halifax was $15, including the rent of room, and nothing at Ottawa. If the hon. gentleman requires further details, I am ready to bring down the papers, in response to an Order of the House.

Mr. CASEY. Who applied to be examined; and who passed?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There were a number of applicants; but I am ready to bring down all the papers.

INSPECTION OF FLOUR.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure to amend the law respecting the inspection of flour, in accordance with the recommendation of the Montreal Board of Trade?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The subject is now being considered by the Government.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT FATHER POINT.

Mr. FISET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates a sum of money for the purpose of commencing the harbour of refuge at Father Point, contemplated since 1870?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention to put in the Estimates this year a sum for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a copy of a despatch which he has received from the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, enclosing copy of a communication from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty showing the arrangements which have been adopted in order to meet the views of the Colonial Governments, in relation to the Imperial pay and pension and to the promotion in the Imperial service of Imperial naval and military officers employed by Colonial Governments.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, April, 1887.

PAINTING, &c., IN THE PARLIAMENTARY AND DEPARTMENTAL BUILDINGS.

Mr. HOLTON moved for :

Statement showing the various amounts paid to or claimed by William Howe and George Howe, or any other person on their behalf, for painting or other work in or about the Parliamentary or Departmental Buildings, Ottawa, since the 1st of January, 1884.

He said: Many of us who were familiar with the appearance of this building as it was at the close of the last Parliament, have been much astonished on our return here at the changes since then wrought in certain portions of its interior. We are, of course, all aware that the Minister of Public Works, who is primarily responsible for the so-called improvements, was not, when directing them, his usual æsthetic self. We have reason to know and believe that his mind was wandering, doubtless to certain localities in his native Province where coloring and gilding of another kind was so soon to require his serious attention and his artistic touch. But it is not to the style of decoration adopted, nor to the exquisite good taste displayed in painting and sanding handsome stone columns and carvings, to make them represent gingerbread or some other equally substantial material, that I desire specially to call attention. It has been broadly hinted to me that while these works were in progress, through all the odors of varnish and paint there was plainly discernible that of a job. It seems that no tenders were asked for this work, and that working under a carte blanche, these favored contractors laid on coat after coat of paint, merely to scrape them off again, at their own price and at the public expense. The suspicion, Mr. Speaker, is that this contract, which included similar work in other public buildings, was given to the parties whose names appear in my motion as a reward for services rendered or to be rendered in the trying times of election, to enable them to recoup themselves for their liberal subscriptions in aid of the grand old Conservative cause. The explanation of the Minister, however, and the production of the accounts, which I now ask for, will doubtless establish that I have been misinformed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has tried to be very sarcastic about this motion, and I do not complain of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is only facetious.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He says that no tenders were called for, for these works. Well, I am sure if he had Mr. COSTIGAN.

looked back to other times he would have seen that the same course has been followed under this Government as was followed under the preceding Government. These works were done in the same way under that regime, and that manner of doing the work was considered the best under the circumstances for the interests of the Government and for the interests of the public. The prices were fixed by the Chief Engineer; and with regard to the taste displayed and so on, that, of course, is not within my province, but it comes within that of the Chief Architect and his officers. Of course, if they have not proper taste for these things I am very sorry for it. The hon. gentleman spoke about painting carving, and columns, and so on; but perhaps, when the statement comes down, he will find that the paint had already been put on the carving of these columns, and that this was only following suit; that whilst they were dealing with the lobbies they had to deal with the capitals of the columns as well as other portions of the work in the same way that they had been dealt with previous to that. The hon. gentleman said it looked much like a job given to those mechanics as a reward for services rendered at elections past or prospective. Well, the hon. gentleman knows a great deal more about that than I do. I must say that all I know of the mechanics is that when they were employed they performed their duties perfectly well and showed themselves worthy of the encouragement of the Government as well as the other mechanics in the same line of business.

Motion agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved :

That the rule now in force requiring the withholding of blue-books and departmental reports till the assembling of Parliament—results in the suppression, often for periods of many months, of information relating to public affairs which the public interests require should be promptly made public. That the blue-books and departmental reports for each fiscal or calendar year should in future be made public as soon as practicable after the same are prepared, and that no unnecessary delay should be permitted to interfere with the issuing of the same. That monthly reports regarding the revenue, the expenditure, the public debt, and the exports and imports of the Dominion, should be issued respectively by the Departments of Finance and of Customs.

He said: It is hardly necessary to enter into any elaborate discussion as to the propriety of granting the request made by the resolution that I submit to the House—that is, that the blue-books and departmental reports be issued promptly and submitted to the public as soon as issued, and that monthly reports be given of the exports and imports, shipping, immigration, and also statements showing the gross and net public debt to the first of each month. It must have been assumed that this information could only be laid before the public by being first presented to Parliament while in Session. It strikes me that Parliament ought not to be treated in this respect as a privileged body or class. The information contained in these reports is information that belongs to the public; it is information relating to the public interests, information in which the public themselves are interested, and information which, in my humble opinion, ought to be given promptly to the public. We are sent here as representatives of our respective constituencies to look after their interests, to act in their behalf and in their interests, and I think the public have a right to know primarily, and at the earliest moment, what the state of public affairs is. The usual course has been to delay these reports for at least six months. Our reports are made to the end of the fiscal year, the 30th of June; Parliament usually meets in February, so that there is a lapse of seven months before the people are allowed to know what is contained in our Public Accounts, Auditor General's Report, Trade and Navigation Returns and the other reports issued by the various Departments of the Government. The last report was some nine months in reaching the public. The reports were brought down to the 30th of June, Parliament met on the 13th of April, and the reports were not brought down till some days afterwards. In the meantime we had a general election—an election which was fought to a great extent in the dark. There were many subjects of interest to the people upon which they ought to have been fully informed, that they were in ignorance of. We were unable to say what the public debt was, or what the balance of trade was. Various questions which should have been thoroughly discussed and made known to all the electors were locked up in the blue-books, not to be presented till a new Parliament was elected and assembled. Now, with reference to the public debt, we had a statement made, in answer to a question I asked on the 30th of April, that the net public debt on that date was $205,569,000. I asked the same question to be replied to on the 1st of June, but in the haste of the closing days of the Session the then Minister of Finance forgot to make reply; but afterwards, with great courtesy, he sent me the information and then I found that the net debt was about $206,000,000. The public were not apprised of the fact that the debt had suddenly swollen by $17,000,000 in thirty days, having stood at $223,159,000 on the 30th June. Now, I hold that it was improper to withhold this information from the people. It left those who were discussing public questions without data to discuss them intelligently, and it left the people in ignorance of the condition of the country. Therefore I think it is a perfectly reasonable request that our system should be changed, and that the departmental reports should be issued at the end of the fiscal year, and given to the press and through the press to the country, instead of waiting for months until Parliament assembles.

On examination I find that that is the practice in various countries. In England there is a monthly statement of trade and navigation made. I hold in my hand one for January, 1887, which gives the exports and imports, shipping, &c. A Board of Trade Journal is also issued monthly by the Government, containing a great variety of information such as quarantine notices, post office notices, notices as to the changes in the Customs relations and Customs tariff of various countries, miscellaneous trade notices, statistical notices, &c. In the United States also, the trade and navigation returns are issued quarterly, and a monthly debt statement is issued showing the condition of the finances. Now, I think it is reasonable that we should have, either monthly or quarterly, a statement showing our exports and imports, shipping, immigration, &c., and a monthly statement showing the amount of the net and the gross public debt. The issue of such monthly statement would enable the Government to issue the reports with greater punctuality and celerity when the time came to issue them. In moving this motion, I desire, if the Government will consent, to substitute the following for the last paragraph, in order to make the practice more explicit:—

“That the Finance Department cause to be inserted in the Canada Gazette at the close of each month, a statement of the revenue and expenditure for the month, and also for the expired portion of the fiscal year, distinguishing between expenditure on capital account and expenditure on account of consolidated fund, and giving a statement of the gross debt and net debt; and that the Customs Department cause to be inserted in the Canada Gazette at the close of each month, statements of the expenditure, imports, immigration and navigation for the month, and also for the expired portion of the fiscal year.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see much objection to altering the practice that has hitherto obtained, for the reasons given by the hon. member. He knows that the reports made by the various Departments go to the Governor General, and the Governor General orders them to be sent down to Parliament. The Statutes providing for the establishment of the different Departments, I think, enact that these reports must be sent down within a certain number of days after the meeting of Parliament, and I suppose that is the reason why they have always been kept until the time specified in the various Acts. I do not see why, however, they should not be published before. That is a matter for consideration, and I should like to see whether a short Act is not required for the purpose of altering the practice. The hon. gentleman has also moved some addition to the resolution, which I dare say is all right, but I should like it to be printed in the Votes and Proceedings before it is carried, and I should like my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to see it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that he proposes substantially to grant the request of my hon. friend. There is no doubt that in almost every country constituted like our own this information is given to the public at an earlier day. If I remember rightly, the present Minister of Finance deplored the lack of it from the place I occupy. Great contradictions arose on various points at the last election, as my hon. friend to my left knows, notably with regard to the amount of public debt. Now it appears my hon. friend, as is his custom, was several millions below the actual figure in his statement of the net amount of the public debt. However, as the hon. gentleman has kindly promised to take my hon. friend's request into consideration, I will not press the matter further.

Mr. BLAKE. It is of great consequence that this modification in our practice should take place. Now the accounts are submitted several months after the year is ended, and occasionally they are submitted at a much later date, and the continuance of this vicious practice of the accounts having relation to a period so very remote has, no doubt, resulted in the growth of the practice of public officers delaying the preparation of the accounts until the latest period. Public officials, as a rule, like other officials, are not anxious to anticipate the discharge of their duty, and, therefore, apart altogether from what the hon. gentleman proposes to enquire into and those modifications in the law, if there be any necessary, though, I think, there are none, because I think the mere requirement that the report shall be submitted does not prevent earlier submission—apart from anything of that kind, it is obvious the efficient discharge of the new practice may involve the very early, almost immediate, communication to the various Departments that the principal work of getting ready the public documents must anticipate the conclusion of the financial year, and the completion must follow as soon as possible the completion of the financial year. As to the statement the hon. gentleman proposes to be added to the monthly returns published in the Gazette, his suggestion is not merely unobjectionable, but of the very highest consequence, and has the sanction of the custom of other countries constitutionally governed. It is quite clear that any statement made with reference to the public expenditure which does not involve periodical announcement of expenditure on capital account, is not merely imperfect, but misleading, and such at present are the statements in some cases made. We are at a loss to know what the expense of capital account is as the year progresses. There is another point of importance in this connection. The practice of the Government in its capacity of manager of public enterprises should be assimilated to the practice pursued by managers of like public enterprises. I refer to the administration of Government railways. The great railways of the continent publish weekly returns of traffic, &c. It is quite absurd that the Intercolonial Railway, the traffic of which is not particularly lucrative nor very large, should be managed on such different terms, both with reference to our interests in that line, as a Government line, the property of the public, and to the general condition of trade and commerce of the community and the continent, as evidenced by this gauge, the railway traffic. I hold it important we should obtain in the Gazette such weekly and monthly returns with regard to the Intercolonial Railway as we find published by managers of similar, only very much larger, corporations of the same character.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt the Minister of Railways will consider the suggestions of the hon. gentleman.

Motion allowed to stand.

HARBOR OF PINETTE, P.E.I.

Mr. WELSH moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, departmental orders, reports and other papers relating to the dredging of the harbour of Pinette, P.E.I.

He said: I have been for the last forty years engaged doing business in Prince Edward Island, in almost every port, I may say in every navigable harbor or port there. We are peculiarly situated. We are surrounded with navigable waters, we have many more sea-ports, in proportion to our population, than either of the other Provinces; we are isolated for five months out of the year, and our time for shipping is very limited—in fact, in the fall of the year, our shipping is all done in the course of two months, and during those two months we want every facility we can obtain to export our produce. This harbor, respecting which I move for papers, is a very good harbor, with the exception of a bar of sand, which has only about ten feet of water over it at high water, and owing to that, it is very difficult for the farmers and merchants to get a vessel to charter in the fall for that port, it being then considered risky owing to the western wind, so that the ships want extra freight or refuse to go. In November last, the people wanted me to send a ship to take their grain to Great Britain or France. I could not completely load the vessel as there was not water enough in the bar, and the season was too late. The consequence was there was but one cargo of grain shipped from that port, where I have often shipped two or three in a year. The people had to store away their grain, and there it remains to this day. I should be very sorry to bring any matter connected with harbors, that would be the cause of public expenditure, before this House, unless I was certain it was absolutely necessary, and it was certain the expenditure would not be thrown away. I will never, while I have the honor of a seat in this House, move for any expenditure of public money on any harbor or other place that is not giving public service and will not be a benefit to the country. I have shipped, I suppose, thirty or forty cargoes out of this harbor of 400 or 500 tons each, and I know what I am talking about when I say it is necessary this place should be dredged. I can say further, that I was very doubtful whether I would undertake to speak in this House in favor of having a dredge sent there, and I decided that before doing so I would examine the harbor myself. About last March I wrote to get all the pilots and mariners—it is a great place for master mariners, and supplies more ship-masters, mates and seamen for the marine service of the Dominion than any other spot in the Dominion—there to meet me on this bar, and to cut holes in the ice every thirty yards. I went down and had forty holes cut in the ice. I put the bar of iron through, and found a bottom of hard sand, but after working the bar down a couple of feet, I found ten feet of mud beneath; and I am satisfied if the dredge was worked there three weeks or a month it would make an excellent harbor with fifteen or sixteen feet of water. Those people are far removed from a railway, and there is no other harbor handy; there is no other facility within I should say ten miles for getting their produce away in the fall. If I might range a little, sailor-like to tack about and have a cruise, I would go to the next harbor and bring it in connection in some way or the other. It is the harbor of Wood Island. A great deal of money has been spent on that in building a breakwater. Money has been spent I should say for the last thirty years, by the Local Government, first, and recently, by the Dominion Government. That breakwater is a very good work, and, as far as it goes, it is a good job, but the harbor has never been dredged. The breakwater lies there, and it may be a little convenience for very small craft that can get in there, but until the harbor is dredged out, which it was always purposed to do, it is not much use, and I believe the Government intended to send a dredge there before this. In fact, they did send her there for a day or two, and they took her away without performing the work. If they would send the dredge to Pinette, it is only about twelve miles to Wood Island, and then they would economise by doing the two things about the same time. I hope the Government will take this matter into consideration. I have heard several replies from the Government to questions which have been asked, and the answer always was—it is under consideration. I hope this matter will go a little further than consideration, and that we will have action on it. It is true the dredge is employed for this summer at the further end of the island, not in a harbor, but at what is called Tignish Run. I trust it is doing good service there, but I hope the Government will be able to promise me that, as soon as the dredge performs that work, she will be able to proceed to the harbor of Pinette, and then to Wood Island. I can well understand that the Government, having had so much on hand these last few years, have not been able to pay so much attention to the harbors of Prince Edward Island as we might expect. British Columbia has received a great deal of their attention.

Mr. BAKER. What did they get?

Mr. WELSH. Well, I believe there are some ten or fifteen thousand white people there, and my hon. friend is a good specimen. I told him the other day that we were as good as any other people, that we were as good as the people of British Columbia, that we could drink as much whiskey as they did. He said they drank twice as much whiskey in British Columbia as we did. I did not believe it, but I looked up the statistics, and the gentleman is right. The Government has had its attention taken up by the Canadian Pacific Railway and by serving these ten thousand white people in British Columbia. Now, we have 100,000 white men in Prince Edward Island, and, if they will only give us five cents in the dollar of what they have given the British Columbians, we will be pretty well satisfied. I know there are six hon. gentlemen on that side of the House from British Columbia. Well, for half the money, we will send you twelve, if you only give us the chance. I hope the Government will turn their attention to Prince Edward Island and give us good consideration. We want it. We are isolated and we are frozen up five months out of the twelve, and we want, while the season is open, the use of our harbors and all the facilities that we can get to remove our produce.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend said, a little while ago, that the Government were saying that they were taking everything into consideration, and he wanted action. Now, the hon. gentleman has thrown out for consideration the inducement that, if a certain thing is done for the Island, he will give us twelve supporters. I hope the hon. gentleman will not only take that into consideration, but that we will see some action.

Mr. WELSH. I put the other matter first. You perform your part, and we will do ours afterwards.

Motion agreed to.

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES moved for :

Return of correspondence between the Department of Railways and the Chamber of Commerce, Halifax, respecting the rights of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, under their agreement with the Government dated September, 1872, to use of Intercolonial Railway extension into the city of Halifax.

He said : With the consent of the House, I will ask to amend that motion so as to embrace correspondence with the Windsor and Annapolis Company as well. The principle involved in this motion is one not only of considerable interest to the people of Halifax, but to the people of the western counties in Nova Scotia. The Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company had, as they thought, by an agreement with the Government, the right of using the Windsor branch, that is to say the branch from the Windsor junction into the city of Halifax, with its extensions. In 1879, under the administration of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the House, an agreement was made between the Windsor and Annapolis Company and the Government, and, in the first or the second clause of that arrangement, it is proposed :

" So much of the Nova Scotia Railway, with the branches, appurtenances, buildings and conveniences thereto belonging or attached, as lies between the terminus at Halifax and the Windsor Junction, both inclusive, together with any extension to Halifax hereafter to be made."

Now, that is under the head of the signification or meaning of the agreement between the company referred to and the Government. Under this, it will be seen that, wherever the trunk line is referred to, the Windsor and Annapolis Company have the right under this arrangement to the use of the road with all its extensions into the city of Halifax. Subsequently in 1882, we find the following :—

" The Government will permit the company, as soon as they are entitled to the Windsor branch under this agreement, to use the trunk line of the Intercolonial Railway between the city of Halifax and the Windsor Junction, &c."

So the reference to this brings it under the parliamentary clause in the original agreement. In 1882, under the present Administration as well, action was taken between the company and the Government on this matter. During the time that intervened a question arose as to the ownership of that branch. The Government for a time resumed the possession of it, which was disputed on behalf of the Windsor and Annapolis Company, and that dispute was finally settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England in favor of this agreement of 1879, from which I have quoted :

" And whereas the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia at the time of the incorporation of the said company owned a branch line of railway extending from Windsor Junction to Windsor, hereinafter referred to as the Windsor Branch; and also a main line of railway (now part of the Intercolonial Railway) running past Windsor Junction into Halifax.

" And, whereas, one of the clauses of the said company's charter, in effect, provided that a traffic arrangement should be made between the said company and the said Government of Nova Scotia, for the mutual use and employment of their respective lines of railway between Halifax and Windsor, and Windsor and Annapolis, including running powers, for or the joint operation thereof on equitable terms."

Reciting again the understanding given them in the Act of incorporation, and given them in the arrangement of 1879, which has been confirmed by the Imperial Government; and again reciting that they had running powers over the trunk lines with an extension into the city of Halifax. Now, the Government have been asked by the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax—I am informed since I placed my motion on the paper, and it is what we might naturally expect—that the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company and the Chamber of Commerce have asked that the Government should concede the right which the Windsor and Annapolis Company claim they have by this Act. There was some correspondence between the Chamber of Commerce and the Government, and I hold in my hand a reply from the Department of Railways at Ottawa, dated 24th November, 1884, acknowledging the receipt from the Halifax Chamber of Commerce, and concluding with these words :

" The temporary agreement bearing date 20th November, 1879, makes no mention of a privilege of sharing with the Intercolonial the advantages of extension into the city."

Now, I can hardly see how the Department could interpret the Act in the manner which they appear to have done. The Act of 1879 was not a temporary agreement, because it was a permanent agreement for twenty-one years, and when that Act, as I say, was subsequently disputed by the Government who assumed possession of the branch for the Western Counties Railway, the Windsor and Annapolis Company maintained the validity of this agreement and obtained, as I have already stated, the decision of the Privy Council in favor of their view. Therefore, I think the Government will hardly be justified in saying it was a temporary Act in 1879, because, far from being that, it was a permanent Act for twenty-one years. Now, the only ground upon which I believe that they could or did dispute this, was that they had not room at the Richmond Station for the accommodation of the Windsor and Annapolis traffic. That may be true, but still it is a matter for themselves to consider; if they made an agreement with the Windsor and Annapolis Company involving the use of that road when they carried it into the city, they should have taken into consideration at that time that the Windsor and Annapolis Company would naturally look to the fulfilment of that contract. Moreover, if that was the difficulty it is one that could be easily obviated, because there is abundant land in that vicinity which the Government could acquire in the usual way, and by which they could give every accommodation to the Windsor and Annapolis Company. I may say that this is a question of so much importance that the people of Halifax have been agitating it from time to time. The distance from the city, I suppose, is about two miles and a half, perhaps more, and during certain seasons of the year when the roads are almost impassable, the hon. gentleman will perceive the expense attending the removal of freight from Halifax business centres to the Richmond junction where it meets the Windsor and Annapolis freight depot. There is almost as much expense at times in removing freight from Halifax business centres to the Richmond freight depot of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, as in bringing it from other places. There is also another very great difficulty regarding the removal of all the traffic, of all the produce, that goes over the Windsor and Annapolis line. Now, I will point out to the Minister of Railways the difficulties that we labor under there with reference to the shipment of western produce. There is a very large quantity of apples, say for one article, shipped from Halifax by the various steamers going to London and Liverpool. Those steamers loading for London or Liverpool usually take in their freight, and indeed they are obliged to take in their freight, as the hon. gentleman knows, at the deep-water terminus, and whenever it is necessary to ship grain or other freight, it is always shipped from what is called the deep-water terminus. We, ourselves, have been agents for various lines of steamers, and have frequently been in this position: we have had to take wheat from the elevator at the deep-water terminus, and while we were taking apples or other goods that came by the other line, we were obliged to pay $2.50 a car to the Intercolonial for shunting that property that came by the Windsor and Annapolis road down to the deep-water terminus. The hon. gentleman will see that a steamer could not be moved for taking in a thousand or two thousand barrels of produce when she was taking in the bulk of her cargo from another wharf, and, therefore, it is simply a tax on the shipment of freight from Halifax which is a very considerable impediment in the way of business. The hon. gentleman will also perceive that the only ground on which the Government could have taken exception to the fulfilment of what I hold to be their agreement with the Government, and ratified by the Government which succeeded them—the only ground on which they could refuse to carry out that arrangement, was on the ground of not having sufficient accommodation. That, as I have already said, they can remedy by securing more land. There is a proposal from the city of Halifax, now before the Department, which I hope most sincerely they will act upon. It is asked that they should acquire half of the block opposite the present railway terminus, so that the water street which has been obstructed, by having half of it taken possession of for reaching the deep water terminus, may be removed further up, and under the operation of such a purchase the Government would acquire about 250 feet of land all the way along the line of the water street, bordering on the present deep-water terminus property. If such should be the decision of the Government, as I hope and sincerely trust it may be, the company will be able to build warehouses on the property which they have acquired, and be able to run trains alongside those warehouses, and easily remove freight by carters. The great object we have in this matter is to save the people of Halifax the expense to which they are now put for all heavy freight, and this applies not only to produce coming from the west, but also to produce coming over the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial Railway property at the deep-water terminus is so limited, they are not able to bring to that section all the heavy freight, such as brick, lumber, hay, straw, machinery, &c., which come for the use of the city, and which are of very great importance in the way of freight. These goods have to be hauled from Richmond, whether they come by the Intercolonial or by the Windsor and Annapolis road; and so, under the circumstances, I trust the hon. gentleman at the head of the Department will see that it is to the interest of the Intercolonial Railway, as well as of the Windsor and Annapolis road, that more accommodation should be provided, and provided at once. According to my humble judgment there can be no doubt as to the right of the Windsor and Annapolis Company to the use of the line. I may be wrong, and I will submit with all deference to the hon. gentleman, who, no doubt, has given the subject every attention. Still I venture to ask him to refer to the various Acts, to the charter of the company, to the two agreements for the use of the road and its extension into the city, and I sincerely trust that when the subject is looked into carefully the hon. gentleman will arrive at a different conclusion from that given the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, and will consider that an agreement formally made by a Government and ratified by a subsequent Government, and confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, can hardly be regarded in the light of a temporary arrangement. I commend this matter, therefore, to the attention of the Government as one of very great importance, not only to the city of Halifax, but to all parties east and west who have traffic with the Intercolonial and with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway.

Mr. BORDEN. As I have the honor to represent a county which is affected by the regulations to which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has alluded, I desire to add a few words to what has been said. In order to understand this matter it must be remembered that thirteen miles of the Intercolonial Railway entering Halifax are common to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, that all the freight from the eastern and western portions of Nova Scotia goes into that city over the Intercolonial from Windsor Junction, a distance of thirteen miles. Some years ago an agreement was made between the Dominion Government and the Windsor and Annapolis Company for the carrying of traffic from the west over those thirteen miles of road. The member for Halifax has read the agreement. I shall simply refer to one or two words of it. I have here the Statutes of Canada for 1852, which contain the latest legislation upon this subject, and find the third clause of the agreement between the Government and the Windsor and Annapolis states as follows:—

“The company shall also use, to the extent required for its traffic, the trunk line with sidings, accommodations, &c.”

The words “trunk line” are explained as follows:—

“Trunk line shall mean so much of the railway, with the branches, appurtenances, buildings and conveniences thereto belonging or attached, as lie between the terminus at Halifax and Windsor Junction, both inclusive, together with any extension into Halifax hereafter to be made.”

Those are the words to which I desire to call the Minister's special attention—“any extension into Halifax.” The Intercolonial Railway has recently been extended into the city, and now we find that cars coming over this new extension into the city from the east over the Intercolonial are charged the sum of $1 per car, and Western Counties freight by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway is charged $2.50 per carload. We consider this an unfair discrimination against the Western Counties. I have here a letter from a constituent who is engaged in the business of brick-making. He writes me that on 1st March he had paid $60 for this extra charge on his freight for two months. A man engaged in the same kind of business in the eastern portion of Nova Scotia would have had to pay $24 for the same number of carloads, a direct discrimination as between the eastern and western man of $36 in two months, or about $18 a month, amounting to over $200 in this one instance as against a man living in the western part of the Province. And so it is with everything else. The fruit-growing industry is affected. There is a direct charge on all the carloads of apples shipped to Halifax. So it is with shipments of hay—there is a direct discrimination in favor of eastern as against western Nova Scotia. A person shipping hay from my county, from which a large quantity is shipped, is taxed very much more than is a producer shipping from the eastern portion. In view of the fact of this agreement, and in view of the statements I have made, it appears to me very clear that some explanation is required from the Government. It is not enough to say that there is insufficient accommodation. If that is the case, why does not the company announce that they will not receive carloads of freight from the west. They do not do so, but they charge each carload $2.50 and each car from the east $1. If there is not sufficient accommodation they should not receive the cars at all. There is no justification for making a discriminating charge, amounting to $1.50, for cars of the same kind of freight coming from the west and those coming from the east. I think, also, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax, that this is a direct injury to the trade of Halifax. Goods going to the west have to be carted two or three miles out to a place called Richmond Station, from which they are shipped on board the Windsor and Annapolis for the west, and consumers in the west have to pay more freight, and the result is that they will not order goods from Halifax but go somewhere else for them; so that it affects not only the Western Counties but it directly affects the trade of the city of Halifax. I would suggest, with the permission of the hon. member for Halifax, that these words be inserted in the main motion after the word Halifax: “And between said Department and the manager of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway.” That, I think, would give all the correspondence that there is on this subject. In conclusion, I would again desire to call the attention of the Minister to this important question. I think, if he will look into it carefully, he will see the injustice—no doubt, unintentional—which is being done to the western part of the Province of Nova Scotia in this matter.

Mr. KENNY. I am not familiar with the agreement which was entered into between the Western Counties Railway Company and the Government of Canada, and I will not, therefore, express an opinion on that subject. But I quite concur with my colleague in his statement that the distance of the present terminus of the Western Counties Railway Company from the city is exceedingly inconvenient to the citizens of Halifax. The distance from the city, over which goods transported by the railway have to be carted, is a great charge to the citizens, and must be very inconvenient to the shippers of produce over that road. I will also add—what I am sure my colleague would have mentioned, but it escaped his memory—that the accommodation in the North street freight sheds is quite insufficient for the large and increasing traffic of Halifax. I agree with the hon. gentleman who preceded me that it is in the public interest that, as early as possible, increased terminal facilities should be given not only to the Western Counties Railway, but to the Intercolonial, and that facilities should be granted for the transport to the port and city of Halifax of the heavy goods which are now only brought as far as Richmond.

Mr. POPE. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has brought this to the attention of the House; but I think that perhaps he has made a slight mistake about the date of the agreement. The agreement which I have is dated September, 1871, and that agreement I think is the only thing upon which the hon. gentleman based his argument. It is within the knowledge of the House and of everybody in the country that we have made very large expenditures already in the city of Halifax, as a terminus of the Intercolonial Railway. I may say that this matter is under the consideration of the Government, having been brought before to our attention on several occasions by the junior member for Halifax. I admit that it will perhaps be necessary in a short time to provide more accommodation; and I can only say that, if we had the means to accommodate the Windsor and Annapolis Railway at the deep-water terminus, I would be glad to do it. With respect to the warehouse, it is necessary that there should be a large warehouse, but up to this time they have largely used our stations and other auxiliaries as warehouses, and that has, perhaps, been one cause why we have not been able to give such accommodation as we should desire. However, the matter has been brought before the attention of the Government, not only by the able speech of my hon. friend opposite but also in conversation with his colleague, the junior member for Halifax, and we will give it early attention.

Mr. JONES. While my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways, receives my motion in a very agreeable manner, he has hardly gone to the root of the matter. I took the ground that the Government were bound under their agreement to provide accommodation for the Windsor and Annapolis Railway; and I venture to point out that, if I was right in that contention, the Government were bound to take immediate steps, and if they had to go into further expense to secure the accommodation, that was part of the responsibility thrown upon them by the agreement. My hon. friend has hardly answered that branch of my question.

Mr. POPE. I hardly admit that.

Mr. JONES. That is the point I wish to bring him to. I wish to hear from the hon. gentleman whether he still regarded the question in the same position as that in which he placed it in answer to the Chamber of Commerce, or whether he had not, in the light of subsequent information, altered his judgment in that matter. If the Government dispute the right of the Windsor and Annapolis road to the use of the extension into Halifax, that would settle the matter. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance—it is the germ of the whole matter—to know at once and emphatically whether the Government recognise that obligation or dispute it. Moreover, as was pointed out by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), they are charging now to the Windsor and Annapolis $2.50 a car for taking goods from the Richmond Junction down to deep-water. Had they any right to do that? Have we any assurance from the hon. gentleman that, until proper accommodation is provided, that charge will cease? Have we any assurance from the hon. gentleman that, until he investigates the whole subject and ascertains whether it is necessary in the public interest to acquire more land there for the Intercolonial Railway and the Windsor and Annapolis, in fulfilment of their agreement—whether until that time arrives the people in the western part of Nova Scotia are to be placed in the same position with regard to inward and outward freight as the people in the eastern part of Nova Scotia? The hon. member for King's pointed out the great difference to people having heavy traffic relations with the company between freight coming from the east and that from the west; so the hon. gentleman must see that it is a question he can hardly lay aside in such a summary manner. I think it is worthy of more consideration than he seems inclined to give it now, and I again urge on him that he should arrive at some decision in the matter, and decide promptly. The whole trade of the city is disorganised for the want of such terminal facilities. It is a question with the people in the interior of the Province whether they will send their orders for goods to Halifax or to some other part of the Dominion. An important factor in their cost is the carting of them from the centre of business in Halifax to the Richmond Station, so that that trade is diverted somewhere else. The hon. gentleman must see that this is a matter of the greatest importance to the people of Halifax and the people of the western part of Nova Scotia as well, as far as Annapolis. Therefore, the hon. gentleman should not avoid a decision respecting it. He should either recognise the obligation at once to provide terminal facilities or dispute it, so that the company may know what course to take. It has been said that 300,000 barrels of fruit came mostly from Annapolis to Richmond last year, and the Intercolonial Railway charges $2.50 a car for shunting that down to the steamer. The hon. gentleman must see that such a state of things cannot continue very long. People will not submit to it. His own friends there are feeling very strongly on the question, and I hope that, on reconsideration, he will before long be able to give us some more definite assurance that the matter will be attended to, and this grievance remedied.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA RAILWAY ACTS.

On the Order being called for:

Committee of the Whole to consider certain Resolutions on which to found an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will be graciously pleased to effectuate the altered policy stated to the House of Commons on the 5th February, 1884, and in pursuance thereof to leave to their operation any Acts of the Local Legislature, not otherwise objectionable, which have been or may be passed for the construction of railway lines within the original Province of Manitoba.—(Mr. Watson.)

Mr. SCARTH. I would ask the hon. member for Marquette to allow this matter to stand for a few days. From communications I have received from Winnipeg and from what has appeared in the Winnipeg papers, I understand that it is intended to send down a deputation from there to wait on the Government with reference to this question.

Mr. WATSON. I have no objection to let the motion stand, provided a day is fixed for the discussion. As the hon. member for Winnipeg states that he expects a deputation from there in the beginning of next week, I would suggest that the First Minister make this the First Order for next Wednesday after Questions, and that, if undisposed of at six o'clock, when the discussion on Motions stops for that day, it should be the First Order for Thursday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think perhaps the best plan would be to make it the First Order of the Day for Wednesday without a change of matter after six o'clock, and sit it out on Wednesday and Thursday until the motion is disposed of.

Mr. WATSON. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg will move that it be made the First Order for Wednesday, as the hon. member for Marquette, being the mover of the motion, cannot do so.

Mr. SCARTH. I have much pleasure in moving that the consideration of the motion be postponed to Wednesday next, and that it be made the First Order for that day after Questions.

Motion to postpone agreed to.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS.

On the Order being called for :

Motion for return showing the amounts (in detail) expended under warrants from the Governor General in each of the years from 1873 to 1886, both inclusive.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not sure that it will suit the convenience of the Government or the House that I should proceed with this motion. The question I desire to call the attention of the House to is one of considerable importance, and by some unfortunate oversight on the part of the Printing Committee the papers have not yet been printed. However, I do not want to let it drop, and I put myself in the hands of the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman had better leave it stand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will, but I will call the attention of the gentlemen of the Printing Committee to the fact, because it may save trouble in the future, that matters like the Governor General's warrants ought necessarily to be printed as a matter of course. It is quite clear there is no annual return laid on the Table, which it is more important should be full and placed in the hands of the members, than the statement of the amounts which the Government have been compelled to expend without the authority of Parliament. However, I will not say anything more on the point. Both of these motions can stand.

Motions allowed to stand.

COLONIAL CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Copy of the Commission or other document appointing Sir Alexander Campbell as representative of Canada at the Colonial Conference in London, and of any instructions given to him in such capacity.

He said: I find that in drawing the motion of which I have given notice, I omitted the name of one of the delegates appointed to attend the Colonial Conference in London, Mr. Sanford Fleming, C.M.G. If the House will allow me, I will add his name to the motion. I suppose it makes very little difference, for the commission and instructions issued to one of the delegates will, in all probability, be the same as those issued to the other. I do not propose in making this motion to discuss the general question of Imperial Federation. The subject is too large a one to discuss on a motion of this kind, but I wish to call attention to the fact that the Colonial Conference, which has been sitting in London, has been looked upon by the public at large as a sort of preliminary to the discussion, at all events, if not to the institution of some scheme of Imperial Federation. It is, therefore, very important that we should know what instructions were given to our representatives at that conference. I have always been one of those who believe that some sort of entente cordiale, if nothing more, between the different members of the British Empire, would be advantageous, not only to the colonies, but to the Empire itself. The precise form of the understanding among the different communities which form the Empire is a very important question, and one which should not be discussed without deliberation. It is one which no delegate should be authorised to discuss without full authority, not only from the Government of the day, but also from the people of the Dominion. I hope it will appear when the documents for which I move are brought down, that the Government have not assumed to speak for the people of Canada in regard to the question of Imperial Federation, without submitting that question to the people at the general elections. It is quite possible that such a conference as that which has been sitting in London should suggest ideas very useful to what we call the old country, the nucleus of the British Empire, as well as to the colonies in general. It is quite possible also, that such a conference should "put its foot in it," if I may use the phrase, by going beyond the powers delegated to the different representatives by the Governments which have accredited them to that conference. I wish, therefore, to ask for the commission or documents appointing Sir Alexander Campbell, and, if I may be allowed to make the correction, Mr. Fleming also, as representatives of Canada to the Colonial Conference at London, and of any instructions given to them in that capacity. When we have the documents before us, and can compare them with the discussions at the Colonial Conference, we will be able to see what scope the Government gave in their instructions to our representatives, and how fully the latter carried out those instructions. It would be interesting to know, in regard to the fisheries, what instructions, if any, were given; also in regard to the mail service between Vancouver and Australia; and until we have the papers before us and know exactly what we are talking about, I must postpone further discussion on the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Add to that, "all the papers respecting the said conference."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Return showing the time at which the steamer Northern Light commenced running between Prince Edward and Pictou, in the fall of 1886, how many trips were made by the said steamer, the date of each trip up to 15th April, instant, with number of passengers.

He said: This motion is for the purpose of ascertaining how long the people of Prince Edward Island have been without communication with the mainland. When I had the honor of occupying a seat here some years ago, I brought this question, year after year, before Parliament without any effect whatever in the direction of securing the carrying out of the terms entered into between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion. In 1873, when the Province entered Confederation, it was stipulated, and, I may say, that stipulation was the only reason why the people were induced to enter Confederation, that they should have continuous steam communication with the mainland in the carrying of mails and passengers. This agreement has never been carried out. Under the present Administration no improvement whatever has been made. Whatever improvement in communication we have had, was given us by the Mackenzie Administration. It was under that Administration the Northern Light was built, and she did very good work while the Mackenzie Government were in office, although during that time she was pronounced by the then Opposition as a failure and an imposition on the public. The moment, however, they came into office, she ceased performing the same amount of work, and let me say that the present Government have made no improvement upon the Northern Light in the nine or ten years they have been in power. True, they built a branch railway to Cape Traverse, a distance of ten or eleven miles, but when the passengers get to Cape Traverse they have to be strapped themselves to boats and get across in that way nine or ten miles over very rough ice, and at times through the water. A few days ago I had to cross, and it took me six hours to reach the other side. That is no small amount of labor. I would like to see some hon. gentlemen, some of those knights of the order, cross there in that way, and see how they would like it. It is also true that we were promised a subway, perhaps not very directly, but indirectly, and, if I understood aright, though I had not the honor of a seat here last Session, a Bill passed both Houses of this Legislature incorporating a company to construct that subway. So far, the operation of that Act is a failure, it is a dead letter. It is true that on the eve of the election, I think five or six days before the election, a gentleman who is well known in this community, Senator Howland, attended several meetings and read a letter which he said was written by the First Minister. At all events it bore the signature "John A. Macdonald," and that letter stated that, if the engineers showed that the work would not cost more than $5,000,000, the First Minister was prepared to ask Parliament to place in the estimates a sum of $5,000,000 to build that work. Whether that was intended to catch votes or not I do not know. At all events, it had not the effect of catching the votes. We talk about Ireland being dissatisfied, but I tell the Government and this House that the people of Prince Edward Island are dissatisfied, and the result of the election shows it. They have not been dealt with fairly, and until that subway is built or until the terms of Confederation are carried out, the people of Prince Edward Island are not to be considered in the Confederation; we are not united to Canada; we are disunited. The proper means of crossing over the ten miles of water which separates Prince Edward Island from the mainland are not provided for in the winter. It is well known that the people of the Island have complied with all the terms of Confederation as far as they are concerned, and, perhaps, a little more, in this way that, when we came into Confederation, we were told that the tariff would not exceed 15 per cent., and it exceeds that 15 per cent. by 50 per cent., and perhaps a little more. In that way we have probably paid over 100 per cent. to the Dominion of Canada more than Prince Edward Island is actually getting. The neglect to carry out the terms of Confederation by keeping up this continuous communication is a great drawback to the people of Prince Edward Island, because during the winter our speculating men are not able to take advantage of the outside market. We may have pork, or fresh fish in the article of smelts, to sell in the market, but we cannot do it. It was plainly shown by the papers which were laid before the Imperial Parliament, last winter, by the delegates from Prince Edward Island, that the year before sixty days elapsed without our having steam communication between the Island and the mainland. Is not that a great drawback? And then there are perhaps two months of communication only by small open boats which cross at the capes, and, therefore, it is impossible for our speculating men to get any article of produce to the market, while our merchants have to import very largely in the fall and pay a large amount of interest on the goods they import, and they must put an additional price on those goods which the consumer has to pay. That is one great reason why Prince Edward Island is dissatisfied. I hope and trust that the Government will take up this question fairly and properly, and will have another survey made. There was a survey last year, and I do not know whether there was any report made as to the result, whether it was said to be practicable or not, but I hope that the Government will during this summer have another survey, and that before long the Government will be able to pronounce whether it is practicable, and whether they are prepared or not to build this subway. If they are not prepared to carry out the terms of Confederation, the people of Prince Edward Island will consider themselves clear of Confederation, they will consider that they are not united with the mainland, and that the Government of the Dominion have failed to carry out their contract. When one party to a contract fails to carry out its terms, the contract is broken. I do not wish to be understood in the sense that there is any feeling of secession in Prince Edward Island, but there is a great feeling of discontent. The people of Prince Edward Island think the Government have not honestly and sincerely tried to carry out the terms of Confederation, although we have been made to pay a large part of the revenue. If we are one-fortieth part of the population, I suppose we should be considered as paying one-fortieth part of the revenue, and in that case we pay $800,000 a year. We do not receive $450,000, so that shows a balance due to the Island of something like $350,000 a year since the present tariff came into force. The people of Prince Edward Island know that, and they know that every dollar they have to make costs about 50 per cent. more than it does in the Province of Ontario or in the western part of Quebec. That is why our people are so much dissatisfied. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length on this question, because it will come up again, and I hope that, when the people of the Island ask the Government to have a commission appointed to take up the whole question between the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island, they will consent to it. Last winter, when the joint resolution of both branches of the Legislature of Prince Edward Island came up here, I remember that the Government appointed a sub-committee to enquire into this matter, and that sub-committee, I think, was composed of Sir Alexander Campbell, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Their report was very meagre; it was very unfavorable, it was very inconsiderate; and, more than that, the Government of Canada endorsed their report, and I am sorry to say they have acted upon that report, and I believe they are acting upon it. It appears to me as if they were taking no step whatever towards carrying out the terms of Confederation. Will I be told that, after nine or ten years of experience of the working of the Northern Light, they were not able to get any steamer built to do better work, or even, if necessary, were not able to put two steamers on in order to carry out the terms of Confederation with that portion of the Dominion which is called Prince Edward Island?

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AT MONTMAGNY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved for:

Copies of all papers, documents, correspondence, &c., in relation to the building of a post office in the town of Montmagny, in the county of Montmagny.

He said: (Translation) Mr. Speaker. I make the demand for the papers mentioned in this motion in order to find out whether any promise has been made by the Government in relation to the building of a post office in the town of Montmagny. The hon. Minister of Public Works, the other day, answered a question put by me in this House, by saying that it was not the intention of the Government to put a sum of money in the Estimates for the building of a post office at Montmagny. Now, Mr. Speaker, this was previously put before the House, and my predecessor here even presented, on behalf of the town of Montmagny and of the municipal council of the town of Montmagny, a petition praying that the Government should be pleased to grant a sum of money sufficient for the building of a post office. In answer to a question put by the hon. member for l'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) last year, the hon. Minister of Public Works answered that the Government had not yet decided to build a post office. At that time, Mr. Speaker, the reason given was that, before the Government came to a decision, the town of Montmagny should furnish the land for the building of the post office. Consequently, in order to get the post office, the municipal council met and adopted a resolution which must have been transmitted to the Government by the then hon. member for Montmagny, Mr. Landry. I was then one of the town councillors, and I seconded the motion made by Mr. Oliva, a good Conservative, to the effect that the council consented to give the necessary land for the building of the post office. During the last elections, Mr. Speaker, this question came before the public and my opponent declared that it was the intention of the Government to build the post office, and this promise—either false or true—was used as having been made by the Government. At all events the name of the Government was used to promise the post office, and of course it had some effect in the county. The population is quite considerable, the laboring class is numerous, and the promise of ten or twelve thousand dollars of public works during the election, when people remembered what had been said during the previous year, to the effect that the Government had not yet come to a decision, and when it was known that the town council of Montmagny had promised to give the required land, they came naturally to the conclusion that the Government, who were only waiting for that promise, would very shortly build the post office which was so necessary to the town of Montmagny. Well, Mr. Speaker at that time the post office was promised, and a few days ago when I enquired whether it was the intention of the Government to fulfil their promise, the answer was simply and solely that it was not the intention of the Government. Now, I ask this: if the town of Montmagny had a right to have a post office—and that right has been implicitly recognised by the Government, who required of us that we should take steps in order to aid them by giving them the necessary land, and we did so—I do not see why the same right should not exist to-day, and I do not see why the Government should refuse the county of Montmagny the building of a post office which was promised, to a certain extent, and which we have a right to have. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if some of the Ministers should pass through the town of Montmagny, and should see for themselves the post office which we have—an office doing a large business and which is the only office for a population of about five thousand souls, both in the town and in the parish, I believe that these gentlemen would at once consent to grant the necessary amount, because the post office which we have to-day is neither more nor less than a disgrace to the town of Montmagny. I am sure the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), who is like me a resident of the town of Montmagny, would corroborate what I have just said if he were here. The size of the post office is about twenty feet by twenty-five. It is utterly impossible for the transaction of business that we should remain longer in this position, and I hope the Government will not be so cruel as to not fulfil their promise in order to punish the county of Montmagny for not having deemed it expedient to re-elect the old member or to elect a member who would have given his support to the Government. If, last year the county of Montmagny had a right to have the post office, and if the town of Montmagny saw fit to give the required land to build this office, I repeat it, Mr. Speaker, I do not see why the position should have changed, nor how we could to-day transact our business, in a post office which is almost useless and which is a disgrace to the town of Montmagny. Consequently, I hope, Mr. Speaker, that, should it appear by the papers now moved for, that the promise has been made, I hope that the Government will do us justice, and will fulfil their promise by granting the amount required for the building of the post office. As regards the town of Montmagny, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that it is still ready to give the necessary land, and I believe that if other concessions were required to secure this post office, without venturing to speak for the council of Montmagny, I think I may say that we would be ready to make other sacrifices in order to aid the Government if they are too poor to undertake it themselves,—in giving to the town of Montmagny a post office worthy of that town and adequate to the amount of business transacted.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to bring down the papers moved for, and the hon. member will then see what has been done with regard to this intended construction. If the hon. member will refer to the answer I gave the other day he will see that it was not absolutely negative. I said that it was not the intention of the Government to put in the Estimates of this year an amount for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY CROSSING IN ST. CHARLES DE BELLE-CHASSE.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of the correspondence between the Government, or the Department of Railways, and the parish or the ratepayers of St. Charles de Bellechasse, respecting the appointment of a watchman at the place where the Intercolonial Railway crosses the public highway, between the snow sheds built there; and also respecting the change of position of the crossing; and the petitions forwarded in the matter.

He said: A snow shed has been built in the parish of St. Charles for a considerable length. It crosses the public highway and has made the place very dangerous. Already horses have been killed there, and people have narrowly escaped being killed. Since 1885 numerous petitions have been sent to the Department, in consequence of which an official was sent down there to examine the place and look at a plan prepared by order of the municipal council. He offered to change the highway providing the municipal council would buy the right of way, which, however, the municipal council declined to do. They say that it is not their fault that the snow shed has been built by the Railway Department, and they do not see why they should be bound to pay for another right of way. In the meantime nothing has been done to make the place less dangerous. At any moment an accident may occur; some person may be killed, as horses have already been killed there. But it is easier and quicker to cause a fatal accident at that place than it will be to secure compensation from the Department. I do not say that the Minister is not well disposed to the people of that parish, but I do say that when these accidents occur it is very hard to reach the Minister in order to obtain justice, and if people are killed there will be no way of obtaining redress at the hands of the Government. I hope the Minister will look into this matter at once, for human life is in danger at that spot, and if a fatal accident occurs through the negligence of the officials, the Government will regret that they did not sooner take steps to have a watchman appointed.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Government has no objection at all to bringing down the correspondence, but my hon. friend will see that there is no need of correspondence on this subject. The Government is thankful to my hon. friend for having brought this matter to our notice, and drawn our attention to the fact that this crossing is a dangerous place. I may state that the authorities of the Department of Railways have sent an officer to enquire into the facts. A watchman has been asked for, as my hon. friend states, but as the locality where the watchman was asked for was in the country, where the traffic is very small, it was not considered necessary to have a watchman appointed. The municipal council has also asked that the highway should be removed, and the Government replied that they had no objections at all to have the highway removed. It is within the power of the municipal council to do so. The Government offered, if the municipal council would give the right of way, to make the road, and I do not think that condition was a severe one. I hope my hon. friend, having drawn the attention of the Government to the matter, will not insist upon having any correspondence, because there is no other correspondence than what has been mentioned.

Mr. AMYOT. I will not insist further upon the motion; but I wish to say that the parish of St. Charles is a very large one, and this is a main road which leads into many other parishes, and as more than twenty trains sometimes pass this crossing during the twenty-four hours, it has become a very dangerous spot. It would cost $300 or $400 for the parish to buy the right of way, and I do not see why, in law or in justice, the Government should impose that expense upon the parish. The highway actually exists there now, and it suffices for the wants of the parish, and if the Government is under obligation to cause the danger to cease, they must be under obligation to incur the necessary expense. If the Government do not want the railway there, let them take it away and the parish will not ask for anything more; but the Government built the railway and the snow shed across the highway, thus creating a danger to the public, and I think it is their duty to cause the danger to cease at their own expense.

Motion withdrawn.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Chinook Belt and Peace River Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONISATION.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved that the Committee on Agriculture and Colonisation be authorised to employ a shorthand reporter to take down such evidence as the committee may deem necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved that the quorum of the Select Committee on Agriculture and Colonisation consist of fifteen members instead of nine members, as contained in the order of reference of the 19th April.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain for what reason he proposes to alter the Order of the House made at the instance of the First Minister a few days ago, and how it is that the motion is made without notice.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The motion made is in accordance with a resolution of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonisation. Of course, I presume it cannot be made without notice, unless with the consent of the House. The committee came to the conclusion that the quorum should be fifteen instead of nine members.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would submit to the hon. gentleman that, unless the committee is very large, this may tend very frequently to prevent their meeting or going on with business.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I have no special opinion in regard to the matter myself. I think it may be just as well to leave the committee at nine members. But it seemed to be the general feeling of the whole committee that the quorum should be increased from nine to fifteen. Of course it is for the House to say whether that opinion shall prevail.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) seconded the resolution in the committee. There were a great many members present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps it had better stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. HESSON. The committee is a very large one, and nine is too small a number, I think, to form a quorum. Usually there is a large attendance, and the committee should not be permitted to meet with a quorum of nine members, all the other members being held responsible for the action taken. The committee were unanimous in respect to the recommendation.

Mr. SPEAKER. This must stand as a notice of motion, because a notice is necessary in this case.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I will allow it to stand as a notice of motion.

Motion withdrawn.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that Messrs. Joncas and Campbell (Kent) be added to the Committee on Immigration.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether the Government has yet obtained the consent of the Imperial Government to lay before this House, the papers or any of them, relating to commercial treaties, in which Canada is interested, which are covered by the terms of the Address passed by this House on 28th January, 1884? And (if such consent has been obtained) when will the papers be brought down?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The consent of the Imperial Government has not been received, nor is it likely to be received, as they object to correspondence being submitted on a matter not brought to a conclusion; and I may add, I hope to be able at an early day to make a communication to the House upon the subject which I hope will be satisfactory.

PUBLIC BUILDING FOR LUNENBURG.

Mr. EISENHAEUER asked, Whether the Government have secured a site for a Public Building in the town of Lunenburg for which $4,000 was voted last Session; also whether it is the intention of the Government, this Session, to place in the Estimates a sum sufficient to put up and complete the building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To the first part of the question I answer yes, that a site has been secured; to the second portion I may say the matter is under the consideration of the Government.

CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION.

Mr. BARRON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to compensate J. C. Gilchrist, Esquire, of Woodville, father and legal representative of the late William Campbell Gilchrist, in his lifetime of Frog Lake, N.W.T., where he was killed by Indians on the 2nd April, 1885, during the rebellion, for the personal property of the deceased which was lost and destroyed as a result of the insurrection?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is not the intention of the Government to compensate persons whose relatives were lost during the troubles in the North-West. So far as Mr. Gilchrist is concerned, I have had some correspondence with him and have secured at the public expense proper sepulture for the deceased. As to the latter part of the question, I presume a claim has been laid before the North-West Commission, and whatever amount may be found to have been lost will be paid.

INSPECTION OF BUTTER.

Mr. HICKEY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to increase the duty on butter?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not competent for the Government to make any communication touching the tariff until the Budget is brought down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope there will be no duties added to the food of the people.

Mr. HICKEY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have all butter imported for home consumption subject to scientific inspection?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government, upon having any evidence furnished that butter imported is of an unwholesome or impure character, would take the necessary steps to have it subjected to scientific inspection.

RESIDENCE FOR THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Mr. ROBILLARD asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build a new residence for the Governor General? If so, where?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not the intention of the Government.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a personal explanation. It having appeared in the newspapers that I did not vote on the amendment of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and as I find on referring to the Votes and Proceedings of the House that my name is not recorded, I bring the matter before the House. I mentioned it to the Clerk, who said it was an omission and he would see it was corrected; but I deem it right to make this personal explanation, as it has appeared in the press that I shirked that vote. I did vote on the question, and I voted in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. As the Clerk states that there was really a mistake, a correction will be made by an erratum.

QUEEN'S, N. B., ELECTION.

Mr. SKINNER. I will first read the resolution which I propose to move:

That it be Resolved, That it appears by the poll-books and other papers transmitted by John R. Dunn, the returning officer appointed to conduct the last election of the electoral district of the county of Queen's, N. B., and laid upon the Table of this House by Richard Pope, Esq., Clerk of the Crown in Chancery;

That two candidates, George F. Baird, Esq., and George G. King, Esq., were nominated, that a poll was granted, and the names of the said George F. Baird and George G. King were posted as candidates in accordance with the provisions of the Election Act.

That on the twenty-second day of February last a poll was held and taken in the said electoral district and the returns made to the said returning officer by the deputy returning officers of the said several polling districts.

That the said John R. Dunn as such returning officer made a return certifying that the member elect for the said electoral district was Geo. F. Baird, of the city of Saint John, in the city and county of Saint John, barrister-at-law, no other candidate having been properly nominated, and also made a report of the proceedings, which is as follows:—

"REPORT of proceedings in the matter of the Election in the Electoral District of Queen's County, Province of New Brunswick.

"To the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery:

"The writ commanding me to hold an election was received by me January 28th, 1887. I took the oath required by law and appointed my election clerk. Proclamations were duly posted throughout the county within the time prescribed by the Act.

"On February 12th, Lemuel Currey deposited with me the nomination paper of George F. Baird, of the city of St. John, in the city and county of St. John, barrister-at-law, with the required deposit and his appointment as Mr. Baird's election agent.

"On February 15th, at 12 o'clock, I opened court for nomination of candidates for the House of Commons of Canada. T. Medley Wetmore handed me the nomination papers of George G. King, of Chipman, Queen's county, N.B., merchant, accompanied by the sum of $200. On my calling the attention of Mr. Wetmore to the fact that no election agent had been appointed by Mr. King, I was handed the appointment of John McLean McLean as election agent for Mr. King. At two o'clock I granted a poll and announced the names of the candidates, notices of poll being granted, and the names of candidates were then posted throughout the county.

"On Saturday, February 26th, the day appointed by notice for declaration, I opened court, but on account of the boxes for several parishes being delayed by snow-storm, I adjourned until March 5th. On Saturday, March 5th, I opened court for declaration, and summed up the votes given for each candidate.

"Lemuel A. Currey, barrister-at-law, on behalf of Mr. Baird, asked that all the ballots cast for Mr. King be rejected, since Mr. King's nomination paper was invalid on two grounds: 1st, That the names of the nominees had not been recited in the affidavit to nomination paper; 2nd, That the deposit made with Mr. King's nomination paper had not been legally made, since it was not made by his election agent. After hearing the arguments made on behalf of Mr. Baird by L. A. Currey, and on behalf of Mr. King by George F. Gregory, barrister-at-law, I overruled the first objection to the nomination paper, on the ground that it was covered by Section 80 of the Dominion Elections Act. I sustained the second objection, and declared the nomination paper of George G. King invalid, and that all votes cast for him were void and null.

"I then declared George F. Baird, of the city of St. John, in the city and county of St. John, barrister-at-law, elected to represent the electoral district of Queen's in the House of Commons of Canada, and adjourned the court sine die.

"JOHN R. DUNN,

"Returning Officer for the Electoral District of Queen's.

"GAGETOWN, QUEEN'S COUNTY,

"March 24th, 1887."

That by the said poll-book and returns of the said deputy returning officers, and the summing up of the votes, it appears that the said George G. King had 1,191 votes, and the said George F. Baird had 1,130 votes, the said George G. King having therefore a majority of the votes cast should have been declared by the said returning officer as member elect for the said electoral district, and that the return of the said returning officer should be amended.

That the said George G. King having a majority upon the summing up of the votes, should have been declared as the member elected to represent the said electoral district, and that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery do attend the House with the writ of election and return, and amend the said return by erasing the name of George F. Baird and substituting the name of George G. King as the member elected to represent the said electoral district of Queen's in this present Parliament; saving, however, to the said George F. Baird the right of contesting the said election if he thinks proper, in such manner as may appertain to law and justice, and according to the usage of Parliament and the laws of Canada.

Now, at the outset, it will be admitted that this is a very important question, and one that should receive full attention, because the rights of the people of that county are in question, and the decision of the case will serve as a precedent; and if their rights and privileges should not be protected by this Parliament, then the rights and privileges of other constituencies in Canada would also be brought into danger and hazard. To me it appears to be very plain what the duty of the returning officer is. He is simply to return the person having most votes. It will appear clear from the proceedings that Mr. King had the majority of the votes. In the report which the returning officer has sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery he states that he summed up the votes, but he does not declare the number that each candidate had, and he goes on then and gives his reasons for rejecting the majority which was given for Mr. King. But when we come to the returns which were sent in and were laid before the House on the 25th of April, we find that the returns of all the deputy returning officers in the election are contained therein, and they show that Mr. King and Mr. Baird had respectively the number of votes stated in the resolution, and that Mr. King's majority was, I think, sixty-one over the number of votes obtained by Mr. Baird. Now, section 69 of the Elections Act, chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes, is the one immediately governing this case, and I will read it to the House:

"The returning officer at the place, day and hour appointed by his proclamation, and after having received all the ballot boxes, shall proceed to open them in the presence of the election clerk, the candidates or their representatives, if present, or at least two electors, if the candidates or their representatives are not present, and to add together the number of votes given for each candidate from the statements contained in the several ballot boxes returned by the deputy returning officers of the ballot papers counted by them. The candidate who, on the summing up of the votes, is found to have a majority of votes, shall be then declared elected."

From this it is contended that the returning officer has no other duty to perform when the returns have been made to him than to sum up the votes, and return the candidate having the majority of votes polled. The returning officer in this case has seen fit to violate that plain duty, and has returned the minority candidate. That would be a violation of his duty, as a matter of justice, even if he were not acting under a Statute; but when he is acting under a Statute which is directory in its terms as to what he is to do, he should follow the directions of the Statute, and should not undertake to depart from them. It will be found on examining the authorities that they amply sustain the position I take. In the English Act, 35 and 36 Vic., called the Imperial Ballot Act, section 27, are the following words:—

"After the close of the poll the ballot boxes shall be sealed up so as to prevent the introduction of additional ballot papers, and shall be taken charge of by the returning officer; and that officer shall, in the presence of such agents of any of the candidates as may be in attendance, open the ballot boxes and ascertain the result of the poll by counting the votes given to each candidate, and shall forthwith declare to be elected the candidates or candidate to whom the majority of votes has been given, and return the names to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery."

The wording of this section may in some particulars differ from the wording of section 60 in our Act, but on the whole there is no difference. The duty of the returning officer under both of these sections is precisely the same, to sum up the votes and return the man receiving the majority of the votes cast. Under this section of the English Act, the case of the Queen vs. the Mayor of Bangor was decided. That case was cited before this House when my hon. colleague from St. John (Mr. Weldon) moved in this case the other day, and I mention it here lest it might be thought that as that case had reference to a municipal election, the rule might be different from what it is in the case of a parliamentary election. With these explanatory remarks, I shall proceed to read a few extracts from the judgments of the judges in that case. On page 359 of 18 Queen's Bench Division Law Reports, the Master of the Rolls uses these words:

"Whether he rejected any of them does not appear, but having counted those that were passed, he found that a majority of votes had been given for Roberts. The returning officer stated that fact at the time, but an objection having been taken that Roberts being an Alderman was not eligible for election, he stated the number of votes given to each candidate, and said that he should consider the question as to whom he should declare to be elected."

"Looking at the terms of section 2 of the Ballot Act of 1872, it is, I think, clear that the returning officer has no power to declare a person elect who has not obtained a majority of votes. It is the majority of votes which determines the election, and the returning officer is to declare that person to be elected to whom the majority of votes has been given. That declaration is to be made forthwith, and it is entirely distinct from the public notice to be given under rules 45 and 46, which provide that the returning officer shall give notice 'of the names of the candidates elected, not the names of the candidates declared to be elected. In the present case the returning officer gave public notice that a person was elected who had not been elected. He departed from the language of the Act instead of following it. He did not 'forthwith' declare any one to be elected, as the Act requires. I therefore come to the conclusion that Pritchard was not duly elected. It is said at any rate he filled the office de facto, and therefore is entitled to a mandamus to compel the council to respect him in that office until he is turned out by an election petition."

On page 368 it is said:

"It is admitted that he had a majority of votes. The material part of that section is the second part, which defines the duties and powers of the returning officer when the ballot boxes have been taken charge of by him after the close of the poll. After he has opened the ballot boxes and counted the votes, 'he shall forthwith declare to be elected the candidate to whom the majority of votes has been given.'"

I wish to emphasise that portion of the judgment :

"He has no power to enquire to whom the majority of legal votes has been given. I think that directly he has ascertained by counting to whom the majority of votes has been given, his simple duty is clearly and indisputably to declare that person elected. It cannot be that he has any power to declare with respect to the eligibility or ineligibility of any candidate. That would be a highly dangerous power to entrust to a returning officer. I am, therefore, of opinion that Roberts was duly elected."

The digest of the case, which will be shorter to read than any other portion of it, is as follows:—

(1) That the person returned was not by reason of his being an Alderman disqualified for election to the office of Councillor, and that by accepting the latter office he vacated the former; (2) That the returning officer had no power to decide whether R. was disqualified or not; (3) That by stating at the close of the poll the number of votes given to each candidate the returning officer had made a sufficient declaration under section 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872, that R. was elected, and that the effect of that declaration was not altered by reason of the public notice issued on the following day under R.R. 45 and 46 of the rules in the first schedule of that Act; and (4) That the office of councillor was not de facto filled by R. so as to entitle him to hold under it until dispossessed by an election petition or by quo warranto.

This case goes on further to decide that the duties of the returning officer are purely of a mathematical character: that is to say, to sum up the number of votes received. On page 363, it is said :

"No power is given to him were that candidate elected for whom the majority of votes has been legally given."

That covers that other branch :

"That is to say, he is not to consider the question of the legality of the matter at all, after he has exercised his power and performed his duties with regard to accepting the nomination papers, but is here simply to sum up the votes and return the candidate who received the majority."

Going back from that case, it will be found, not only in the election cases before the courts, but also in those before Parliament, that there is abundance of authority to sustain the position I am now taking. The first case that has come under my notice of the return of a minority candidate by a returning officer occurred in 1630, at the Leicestershire election and will be found in the 1 Commons Journals, page 511, more particularly referred to on page 515 :

"The Act Henry 8th, chap. 7, required that the members to be elected for counties should be 'dwelling and resident within the same counties.' At the election a resident and non-resident were nominated, but the non-resident obtained a majority of votes; the sheriff, however, returned the minority candidate on the ground that he was advised by counsel that the majority candidate was not eligible. The House immediately sent for the sheriff and under-sheriff 'as delinquents,' and caused them to kneel at the bar and make their confession. Mr Speaker then reprimanded them as great offenders. During the debate on the question Mr. Holt, a member, said the sheriff was a judge of the number of votes but not of the ability or disability of the candidates. Sir Edwin Coke seemed to hold similar views, and the House unanimously concurred."

"In the Liverpool case, 11 Com. J., page 202, the returning officer decided that a coroner was ineligible for election, and returned the minority candidate as duly elected. For so doing he was declared to have violated the rights of the Commons of England and broken the privileges of the House, and was committed to custody, where he remained until the dissolution of Parliament."

"In the Denbigh case, 24 Com. J., the returning officer returned the member 'contrary to the majority of votes received at the poll. The House then decided that the officer had acted partially, arbitrarily and illegally, in defiance of the laws, in manifest violation of the rights of the freeholders of the county and in breach of the privileges of the House."

Let me refer to another case, in the 9 Commons Journals, called the Monmouth Case :

"The Clerk of the Crown being called in amended the return of the Borough of Monmouth by erasing out the name of Charles Lord Hubert and inserting the name of John Arnold, Esquire, thereof."

I quote that case to establish the point that it is quite within the power of Parliament to summon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to appear with the return, and amend it according to this motion. As to the difference between judicial and ministerial duties of the returning officer, there is another case called the Cumberland Case, 32 C. J. 367. There the returning officer was committed to custody for returning a member "contrary to the majority of votes named by him upon the poll." Another case will be found in 33 C. J. 69 and 457, called the New Stoneham Case, in which a similar commitment was made of the returning officer for having at the last election returned as duly elected the candidate having a minority of votes. In Dalton on Sheriff, page 332, it is laid down that :

"Persons attainted of treason or felony being chosen to be Knights or Burgesses for the Parliament, it seemeth the Sheriff ought to return them, neither ought any man that is in execution for debt be chosen a Knight or Burgess for the Parliament; and yet such persons being chosen it seemeth the Sheriff ought to return their names"

That is to say, that although the persons were disqualified to be elected to Parliament, it was the duty of the sheriff to return them after they had been properly nominated; or rather, after the poll had been taken. By some it is contended that the duties of the returning officer are of a judicial character; by others that they are wholly of a ministerial character. Upon examination of precedents and authorities, it will be found that to some extent the returning officer has a judicial character or capacity when the nomination papers are brought to him and they are manifestly contrary to law, or some person is to be nominated who manifestly could not be a candidate. He may then have judicial powers to settle the question, but having then settled the question he cannot review his decision afterwards. On referring to these papers, it will be found this returning officer, by the acceptance of Mr. King's money, by the acceptance of Mr. King's nomination papers, by the sending of Mr. King's name out in the proclamation, by every step he took, he declared and decided that Mr. King was a legally qualified candidate at that election. Having once decided that, he cannot take the question up again and decide the contrary, after the result of the ballots has been ascertained, and after Mr. King has received a majority of the votes. Of course that argument is altogether outside of the Statute, which takes from the returning officer the judicial power in that respect. Though he may have a judicial power in the first instance in reference to the reception of the papers and the nomination of the candidate, if he even have the judicial power there, the Statute has taken it from him after the votes have been cast, by section 60 of our Act. That clearly declares his duty, which is to sum up the votes and return the candidate who has received the majority. Therefore, without further dwelling upon the case, it seems to me that the authorities, precedents, and principles amply sustain the course I have taken, and warrant me in moving this resolution, and the House in passing it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am sure that no hon. member of this House will disagree to any extent with the view which the mover of this resolution has expressed as to the importance of the question which it involves, inasmuch as it deals not only with the powers of returning officers and the rights of a constituency, but likewise with the conflicting claims of two gentlemen who assert their rights to a seat in this House. In a matter of so much importance, and which we are required by our duties as members of this House to approach in a spirit entirely free from political bias, I am sure the House will feel gratified at the presentation of the case which was made this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), which was entirely free from the slightest bias as to his statement of the facts, and was fair as to his statement of the authorities which he thought should govern the action of this House. I regret to say, however, that, while I appreciate the way in which the case was presented by the hon. gentleman, I do not quite agree with him as to the action which should be taken by this House.

The hon. gentleman has referred to a series of decisions which were made in the House of Commons in England—some five or six decisions—tending to confirm the view which he urged on the House, that the duty of a returning officer in a parliamentary election was not judicial but purely ministerial, and tending to confirm his contention that it was the right and duty of the House—when the returning officer usurped any other than ministerial functions—to correct his return and to seat the member having the majority of votes. It is quite true that a long course of decisions has established that line of procedure, not only in the Imperial Parliament, but also in the Parliament of Canada. But the hon. gentleman who made the motion and who cited those precedents to the House, requires to go back, to search for those precedents, to a period in respect of which the precedents have not by any means the force and weight, either in the Imperial Parliament or the Colonial Parliaments, which decisions of a subsequent period would have. Twenty years ago, in the Imperial Parliament, the gravity of questions connected with parliamentary elections, the necessity of having them adjudicated upon by an entirely impartial tribunal, led the Parliament in Great Britain to adopt an Act which relegated to the judiciary of the country the disposal of all questions connected with controverted elections. Upwards of ten years ago in the Dominion of Canada a similar Statute was not only adopted by the Parliament of Canada, but adopted by a number of the Provincial Legislatures. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has not cited to this House any precedents whatever subsequent to the adoption of that radical change in the law regulating the trial of controverted elections, which would sustain in the slightest degree the action which he proposes this House should take this afternoon. I desire, in the first place, to emphasise the point that the precedents which he has suggested to this House are precedents which were adopted at a time when the procedure in connection with controverted elections was regulated by a law entirely different from that which now prevails. The House will see the force of that position when I remind the hon. member that at that time, and under that procedure, there was no other course for the House to adopt. The House of Commons of Great Britain was the only tribunal by which the rights of its members to seats in that House could be adjudicated upon. But subsequently to that time, as I said before, by the change which transferred that litigation to the judiciary of the country, an entire alteration was made in the system of dealing with this question, and the very absence of any precedents subsequent to that change, is a strong argument against the action of the House which the hon. member proposes to be taken this afternoon, and by which the hon. gentleman asks this House to take back once more the power which it has transferred to the judiciary of the country, and to be seized again of the right to dispose of the controverted elections of its members. Now, I am sure that the hon. gentleman will find—doubtless he remembers without any research as to the question at all—that the questions which have arisen since that change in the law have been precisely analogous to those which have been presented to this House. It is not the first time that the House of Commons of Great Britain, or the House of Commons of Canada has been asked to deal with questions, or that the courts have dealt with the election of members of that House, in which it was claimed that the returning officers had usurped functions that did not properly belong to them, or that they had returned persons to the House who had not received the majority of the votes. But, as I reminded the hon. member at the outset, he will have to look from the change in 1867 down to the present time, in the records of the judiciary of the country, and not in the records of the House of Commons, for precedents to find where redress was given in such cases. Since the change which I have referred to, and by which Parliament has renounced its rights to deal with the matter of controverted elections, there has been fully recognised in the various discussions that have taken place in the Imperial House of Commons, this principle, that everything has been transferred to the judiciary in connection with controverted elections, excepting the one question of the disqualification of persons who have been returned to Parliament. As was said by Sir Henry James, in 1882, in the case of Michael Davitt, the only question which Parliament has reserved to itself to deal with is the question whether a proper person has been returned in obedience to the writ. As was explained by Lord Coleridge and Lord Selborne in a previous debate in 1870, that reservation is not in conflict with the Statute which says that the election shall only be contested by an election petition, because the House has to consider whether the writ has been obeyed which commanded the electors of the shire, or the county, to return a suitable person (one of the magis idoneos et discretos) to sit in that House. The House, therefore, is still seized of the right to decide whether the writ has been obeyed by the election of a person who is fit and proper to sit in that House. But as soon as the question has been decided as to the qualification of the person so returned, the conduct of the returning officer, or the number of votes which were received, the conduct of the candidates, and every other question connected with the election, or with the conduct of the returning officer, has been relegated to the judiciary, and the House has always declined to exercise its functions and its power to interfere. In 1870 there was, in the Imperial House of Commons, a practical illustration of the exercise of the power which the House of Commons still reserves to itself; that was, as I said before, the one question of whether a qualified person had been elected or not. On account of O'Donovan Rossa, a convicted felon, having been elected in the House in 1870, the House of Commons resolved that the election was void, and ordered a new writ to issue, thereby exercising the right to decide whether a fit and proper person had been returned to Parliament. But you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in that case, although they declared the election void and ordered a new writ to issue, there was no attempt to do what the hon. member asks the House to do this afternoon, namely, to seat the opposing candidate. Well, Sir, in 1875 the same right of supervision as to the obedience given to the writ was exercised in the House in the case of John Mitchell, and the same action was taken. The House of Commons resolved that inasmuch as the person returned under the writ was a convicted felon, the writ had not been obeyed. A person had, in point of fact, been returned by the sheriff to sit in Parliament who was civilly dead in the eyes of the law, and therefore incapable of sitting, and again a new writ was ordered to be issued. At the election, which came on in the same year, Mr. Mitchell's name was again presented to the constituency, and again he was returned to Parliament, and although in that year that person, who had already been adjudged incapable of sitting in Parliament, and incapable of being returned to Parliament, was re-elected, the action which the House, at the instance of Mr. Gladstone, took, was not to do what the hon. member proposes this afternoon, that is, to declare the person who had been returned, not lawfully returned, and seat the other person, but the House simply reiterated its determination that a fit and proper person had not been elected; it then stayed its hand, and the opposing candidate to Mr. John Mitchell in 1875 had to resort to the courts by election petition in order to get the seat, which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) moved that this House shall give Mr. King by vote this afternoon. In 1882 in the case of Michael Davitt, precisely the same procedure was followed, and hon. gentlemen will find, with the exception of two or three unimportant cases, in which the rights of the other party were not pressed either to discussion or to division in the House, the House of Commons of Great Britain exercised no powers in relation to any controverted election except that simple power of ascertaining whether the person who had been returned to Parliament was qualified or not. In the Parliament of Canada we had, in 1882, a question something like this presented to the House, in which it may be contended that the House undertook to declare the return of one person void and the return of another person good. Let me remind the House, however, that in 1882 the state of things in King's county, Prince Edward Island, was this: That the House was required to decide, upon that return, whether a fit and proper person had been returned to Parliament or not. It was alleged against the return of Mr. Robertson that he was a disqualified person, and, therefore, in 1882, while this House did take up this question and did decide who was entitled to the seat, the House was only acting as possessor of the power which, as I have said, the House of Commons of Great Britain reserved to itself, the right of saying whether a qualified person had been returned in obedience to its writ, or not. But let it not be supposed by anyone who has not a distinct recollection of that case, that the House on that occasion transgressed the rule which, as I have said, has been recognised in both Parliaments since the change of the election law, by ordering not only that the disqualified person should be unseated, but that the opposing candidate should be seated in his place. It is true that was the result of the action of the House, but it is not correct that the House, in taking that step, in any way reversed the return which had been made to it by the returning officer. The circumstances in that case were exceedingly peculiar, because both parties had been returned to Parliament, and, therefore, the House had only to say who was the disqualified person, and to leave the other not seated by the action of the House, but seated by the return of the returning officer, which the House did not require to touch or to amend. I have already shown the House that in the case of Mitchell, and in the case of Robertson in this House in 1882, while the House exercised the power to decide on the question of disqualification, it did not exercise the power of seating a person who claimed the seat. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Skinner) has referred this afternoon to a recent English authority on the question of the powers and rights of returning officers. I do not wish at all to be understood as minimising in any degree the weight of the authority in that case, or the force of the reasoning by which it is sustained. I do not pretend, this afternoon, to express any opinion whatever as to whether the conduct of the returning officer, Mr. Dunn, in this case was similar to the conduct of the returning officer as in the case of the Queen vs. the Mayor of Bangor, or whether he did right or wrong. But the hon. gentleman, I think, pressed that case a little beyond its legitimate length when he insisted that it was an authority for unseating the person returned and seating the person claiming the seat. The hon. gentleman will remember that that was a case of a municipal election, in regard to which the returning officer had no return to make. The returning officer had simply to sum up the vote; and it is mentioned by the Master of the Rolls that the returning officer had no return to make as a parliamentary returning officer would have, and for that reason it was that the court decided that it was unnecessary to proceed by election petition. The returning officer in that case had summed up the vote, he had declared who was entitled to the office, and his functions had entirely ceased; and having declared who had a majority of the votes, he had no other return to make. The Master of the Rolls, in discussing that objection, that the candidate not seated ought to have resorted to an election petition, made this statement:

Mr. THOMPSON.

"It is said that the returning officer having declared Pritchard duly elected and Pritchard having qualified and taken his place in the council, the office was filled by him de facto, and he could not be ousted, except upon petition. I have already said that the returning officer had no power to make that declaration and that it was void; if so, it is equally clear that what the town clerk, acting upon that declaration, did, was of no effect whatever; nor, if Pritchard was never properly elected either in form or substance can the fact that he assumed to qualify for the office make that which had gone before any less void."

I perfectly agree with the argument the hon. gentleman made, not only as to the importance of this case, but as to the right of the majority of the electors to have their candidate returned. In this case, however, whichever way the majority of votes was cast, the rights of other parties are concerned, and let not this House, in its zeal and haste to do justice to the majority, violate the rights of any other persons whomsoever. I am not going to propose that this resolution ought to be voted down; I am not going to urge the House to vote this afternoon that the argument I have endeavored to present as regards the propriety of leaving this case to the courts is one that this House ought to affirm. I have presented that view, first of all, because it is the view I honestly entertain; and, secondly, because I believe I have only to present to the House sufficient grounds for the House to conclude that at least it is an arguable case in order to induce the House to stay its hand from the measure which the hon. gentleman proposes, and by which he proposes to seat one of the candidates, and to enquire whether, without any hearing whatever, without any regard to his rights whatever, without ascertaining whether he has any rights whatever, it should unseat the gentleman who rightly or wrongly has acquired rights which cannot be taken from him without due and proper authority. Let us see for a moment whether it would not be more fair and more proper, in view of all the circumstances surrounding this case, and in view of its novelty, that the House should at least make some enquiry into the subject before taking this action. The House has a committee for the purpose of dealing with privileges and elections. It is a committee composed, to a large extent, of members having legal attainments, and it is a committee like that committee to which the case of King's county was referred in 1882. It is a committee which I am sure will command the confidence of the House, not only because its members have more opportunity of giving careful consideration to the matters connected with law and with parliamentary precedents than the House has, upon the spur of the moment, but because it is always recognised that this committee acts in relation to those elections with the same sense of responsibility as judges would do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand from the expressions of dissent which have come from the other side of the House, that that remark does not meet with the approval of some of my hon. friends.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. member for Bothwell says "hear, hear," but I may be able to convince him that I am not altogether mistaken in that matter, by reading to hon. members what an eminent member of this House said on that subject in 1882. The hon. member for West Durham then said:

"It has been my fortune when sitting among the majority in this House to have been concerned with the other hon. members in the settlement of two cases which affected the seats of the members of this House—one in which a member of their minority was concerned, the hon. member for Two Mountains, whose seat was attacked, and the other in which the right to sit here of an hon. gentleman, who at that time filled the chair, Mr. Speaker, you now occupy, was disputed. On those two occasions the matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and in both cases we were able to arrive at a unanimous deliverance, and to deal with them in a spirit which reflected, I think, no discredit on Parliament as a judiciary on those occasions."

I hope that those hon. gentlemen who express dissent from my remark will accept the authority of a gentleman for whose statements on that subject I, for one, entertain a very great respect. Now, Sir, on a former occasion, when a question like this was before the House, a good deal of use was made of the only authority that could be found in the debates of the Imperial House of Commons against a reference of this kind to a committee. In 1870 the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone was urged by an independent member of the House to refer the subject of the election of O'Donovan Rossa to a parliamentary committee, instead of dealing with it by resolution, and Mr. Gladstone's statement in reply to that view, in which he refused the proposition, is one which was repeatedly used on a former occasion to convince this House that it was undignified to take the step of referring questions of that kind to a parliamentary committee. It may possibly be that at a subsequent stage of this debate the same language of Mr. Gladstone will be used to convince the House that, on this occasion, it would be undignified to refer this matter to a committee; and I may be permitted, then, to express my humble opinion upon the reasons why the resistance of Mr. Gladstone should not induce this House to resist the motion which I intend to make on this occasion. The statement which I refer to, and which, as I said before, is the only authority to be found in the debates of the Imperial House of Commons for refusing a reference to a committee, is this:

"If this were a case in which, after the best investigation we can make, we thought that any good, fair, or reasonable doubt attached to the facts or the arguments of the case, or as to the course which the House ought to pursue, then I admit it might be the subject of a reference to a committee, especially if the question were one which involved the examination of a long and complicated series of precedents, such as it would be difficult to bring under the view of the House in debate. But Sir, in our view it is neither the one nor the other. The facts of the case are the fewest possible, and the principles applicable as clear as can be brought to bear on any question of parliamentary discussion, and I would submit that if that be the case, a proposal to enquire instead of a proposal to act, would not be becoming the dignity of this House."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON. I see by this assent to Mr. Gladstone's view that I do not unduly anticipate the use they will make of this extract, but I hope hon. gentlemen will not submit that statement to the House as an authority against the resolution I propose to move, without calling the attention of the House fairly to the surrounding circumstances. In that case Mr. Gladstone could fairly challenge any member of the House to say that there were any facts or precedents at all requiring examination. The only fact as respects which there could have been even an investigation, was the identity of the person returned with the person convicted; and the hon. member of the House of Commons who was urging that the matter should be referred to a committee, so far from disputing the identity of the person convicted with the person returned, urged that it would be unjust and uncivilised to reject the person convicted, because he was regarded by his constituents as a patriot whose presence would not disgrace the House of Commons. In the arguments presented to the House the single fact about which there could be any dispute was admitted by the gentleman urging the reference to a committee. All the precedents were on one side. In this case, as I have shown the House already, since the change in the system by which election petitions have to be tried, the hon. gentleman who presented the case so well this afternoon on behalf of the candidate not returned, has been unable to mention a single instance in which any such power was exercised, either by the Imperial or by the Canadian House of Commons. Now, Sir, let me call the attention of the House for a few moments to the difference likewise between the modes proposed for dealing with the two cases—the case in which Mr. Gladstone declared that a reference to a committee would be undignified and that the proposal should be to act and not to enquire, and the case we are dealing with this afternoon. Mr. Gladstone was proposing that nobody should be seated; he was asking the House simply to affirm that which the common law of England—as it was admitted on both sides of the House—distinctly declared, namely, that a felon, who had not finished his term of punishment, was not entitled to take his seat in the House of Commons, or be returned as a member of the House of Commons; and he might properly say that, inasmuch as it was merely inviting the House to affirm a general principle of law which was recognised all over the realm, it was undignified to refer so plain and simple a question to a committee—that it was undignified to hesitate to act in making that affirmation. The action which the House is asked to take this afternoon is very different. The House is asked to pronounce judgment on the rights, duties, and powers of returning officers, and not only that, but to do execution likewise, and say that one of the persons occupying a seat in this House is not entitled to this seat, and that without any enquiry whatever, without even the enquiry he is entitled to have in a court of law, if his seat should be attacked there, as to the right of the other gentleman to take his place in this House. Now, Sir, coming back to the point which I mentioned a few moments ago, that persons have acquired rights here other than the electors even, let me ask the attention of the House to the effect on those rights of the resolution which the hon. gentleman has proposed. Let us ask ourselves if, in this haste to do justice to the right of the majority of the electors in Queen's county, we are not taking away the rights of others. Let me ask the House if the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) is not moving that we should put the sitting member in a far worse position than he would have been if he had been petitioned against in the courts, and the election law, which we adopted ten years ago and upwards, carried out. Why, Sir, if that hon. gentleman were petitioned against in the courts, what would be his rights? He would have the right to retort against the gentleman whom the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) proposes at once to put in his place, and say: "If I am not entitled to the seat, you are not entitled to it either. You have been disqualified by corrupt practices; the election has been void in consequence of the corrupt practices of your agents. The election has been void in consequence of irregularities in connection with the conduct of the election; the election has been void in consequence of undue revision of the electoral lists, the want of jurisdiction, perhaps, of the reviser who revised them, and the want of the certification of the proper lists to the deputy returning officers." It would be his right, before his opponent should be put into the seat he occupies, to raise every one of these questions; and the hon. member for St. John proposes that we shall take away from him that right and put him in a far worse position than he would be in if Mr. King resorted to the procedure which the law of Canada lays down for a person who claims the seat. I mention that especially for the ears of the hon. gentlemen who cheered me ironically when I said that the rights of other parties than the majority of electors had to be considered. More than that, we have to consider this fact, that the hon. gentleman proposes that we should take away the right which any person has to petition against the sitting member. It may be that some elector of the county proposes to petition against him, and to disqualify him; and if this course of procedure can be followed—I am arguing the subject in an abstract way—the result will be that a member who is liable to disqualification can invite a friend in the House to move to unseat him and to seat his opponent, and thereby escape disqualification altogether. It may be thought that this is a very fanciful case, and yet in the Imperial House of Commons something like it was done only ten years ago. A member who was afraid that he was incurring penalties which it would not be very convenient for him to pay, got himself unseated; but in that case the House was not asked to go the length we are asked to go this afternoon, of seating his opponent. Therefore I say we may be taking away the right of some one who desires to petition. More than that, we may be infringing the right of some person who has already petitioned. I understand that in the case of the hon. member for Queen's the time has not yet expired for presenting a petition, and it may be that the court to which we have given jurisdiction, by the Statute of 1574, for the trial of controverted elections, is already exercising that jurisdiction. If the matter goes before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, this is a question that can be enquired into. But it is proposed by the motion not to enquire into a matter of that kind at all, but to deal with the case summarily and let the court go on and exercise that jurisdiction or not, just as it pleases. If it be the case that a petition has already been entered, we shall have the anomaly of two jurisdictions—the jurisdiction of this House unseating the sitting member, and that of the court under the petition, seating or unseating him as it may please; and the singular result may be that, after we have decided, in our zeal to do what we thought was right without any enquiry at all, that Mr. King was entitled to the seat, the tribunal, which proceeded more leisurely, thinking it consistent with justice to hear both parties, might decide that he was not entitled to the seat after all. For these reasons I move in amendment to the resolution the hon. gentleman has moved:

That all the words after the word "That" where it first appears, be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof: The return transmitted by John R. Dunn, the returning officer for Queen's county, in the Province of New Brunswick, at last election for said electoral district, together with all papers laid before the House by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and relating to said election, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, with power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to report thereon with all convenient speed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me, Sir, that the motion made by the hon. Minister of Justice is altogether at variance with the line of argument he has addressed to the House. He has given us an elaborate argument in which he has undertaken to show that this House has no jurisdiction in the matter, that it divested itself of any authority it had by the creation of courts for the trial of controverted elections, and that it could not properly deal with this matter. That was the hon. gentleman's proposition; and notwithstanding the fact that he has elaborately defended it, he has concluded his speech with a motion to refer this case to a committee of the House to enquire into the propriety of taking any proceedings in a matter with reference to which he has declared that it would be improper for the House to take action. Now, the hon. gentleman has made a statement which it seems to me is not borne out by the precedents. He has said that because the House has referred the trial of controverted elections to the courts, it ought not to deal with a matter of this kind. We must bear in mind that the jurisdiction which the ordinary tribunals of the country possess under our Controverted Elections Act is precisely the same as the jurisdiction which was formerly vested in special committees of the House. We formerly appointed committees for the trial of controverted elections, which committees sat and dealt with those cases. We did not divest ourselves of any of the extraordinary jurisdiction committees did not exercise; and we have to look to what was the practice of the House before the House established the courts for the trial of controverted elections, to see whether we have retained to ourselves such power as is proposed to be exercised on this occasion. We know well that long after the trial of controverted elections by committees existed, the House took direct action in all cases such as this—where the returning officer had acted in a way grossly irregular, where, instead of complying with the law, he had departed from it, and violated the principles which the law had laid down for his guidance in the conduct of the elections. The House of Commons, in such cases, did not refer the question to the committee with the view of contesting the election, but took action directly. Where there were no disputed facts, the House dealt directly with the matter. The first case in the history of this country was the case of the Beauharnois election, in which the member declared elected was excluded, and it was proposed to bring the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before the bar of the House, and to order the return to be amended accordingly. That was done in the case of the Kent election. The sheriff took exception to the qualification of the Hon. Malcolm Cameron, and made no return. The sheriff was brought to the bar of the House. The seat was given by the House to Mr. Cameron, and the officer who had acted irregularly was dismissed. In the Oxford case the returning officer returned, not the party having the majority of votes, but the candidate who had the minority of votes. The returning officer refused to return Sir Francis Hincks, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was brought to the bar of the House and ordered to amend the return so as to give to Sir Francis Hincks the seat. I need not go over the list of cases. In not one of them was there any attempt to deal with the question on the line laid down by the hon. the Minister of Justice. There were committees for the trial of controverted elections, these committees had the jurisdiction the courts have now, and no one seriously argued that the cases I have referred to were proper cases to bring before the committee for the trial of controverted elections. On the contrary, they were held to be gross and improper violations of the rights and privileges of Parliament, and the House corrected the returns accordingly. The hon. gentleman has referred to the Bangor case quoted by my hon. friend, and he says that in this case the returning officer was not required to make any declaration, and that his declaration was therefore ultra vires. He quoted the words of Lord Esher, the Master of the Rolls: "I have already said the returning officer had no power to make that declaration, and that it was void." But the hon. gentleman argued he had no power to make any declaration. Does the Master of the Rolls say so? Does he maintain any such proposition? On the contrary, he says that he had no power to make the declaration he did make, which returned the candidate in the minority, and the Master of the Rolls quotes the Statute to say it was his duty to make the return—

Mr. THOMPSON. Does not the Master of the Rolls say he had no return to make? He has no return to make to anybody as in the case of a parliamentary election.

Mr. MILLS. The Master of the Rolls quotes the words of the Statute:

"It is not, as in sec. 2 of the Ballot Act, 1872, that the returning officer shall forthwith declare 'to be elected' the candidate to whom the majority of votes has been given, but that he shall give public notice of the name of the candidate 'elected,' showing that the rule was intended to apply to an election which had been before completed."

These are the words, and the hon. gentleman's statements, if not calculated to mislead, nevertheless would have the effect of misleading the House. Now, the Master of the Rolls goes on to say, referring to the declaration, that the returning officer had a declaration to make, and that was to state the number of votes given, and declare the person who had the majority elected:

"I therefore say that the returning officer had no power whatever to declare Pritchard elected, and the declaration to that effect which he made in the placard issued the day after the election was ultra vires and void."

Why? Not because he had no declaration to make, but because he had no power to make the declaration stating the candidate of the minority should be returned, when the law expressly orders him to return the candidate of the majority. The same view was put forward by Mr. Justice Lindley. These eminent judges do not say that the returning officer has not judicial power, but they say if he had such power, the time to exercise it was when the candidates were before him for nomination. Having accepted the nomination, he already had passed judicially, if he had judicial power, upon the subject. Having accepted the nomination, he has no duty, says the Master of Rolls, other than the arithmetical one of summing up the number of votes and returning the candidate who had the majority. That is the position laid down in this judgment, a position wholly different to that taken by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, it seems to me, has not carefully looked at the judgments given in this case. If we examine the judgment of the Master of Rolls and of Mr. Justice Lindley, we will see that they assumed that, after the election has taken place, the act of the returning officer is a ministerial act, and that if he has a judicial power, the time has gone by when that power might have been fairly exercised. What did this returning officer, Mr. Dunn, do in this case? He accepted the nomination and the deposit. He gave a receipt for the deposit; he issued the proclamation; he named the polling places; he had the ballots printed upon which were printed the names of the candidates. The electors took these ballots and marked them for one candidate or the other. Now, what duty had the returning officer to discharge. Had he to go back and do what the eminent judges in this case say that the returning officer cannot do, namely, review his own act and set it aside? He had no other duty than to return the candidate who had the majority of votes. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who has any doubt on that question? and is he prepared to interfere with the liberties of Parliament and the rights of the people by keeping in his place a man whom the evidence shows conclusively was notoriously in the minority? The hon. gentleman has referred to the case of Mr. John Mitchel. Mr. Gladstone, if he had acted according to the hon. gentleman's view, ought to have allowed the courts to pass judgment on that case, and if there had been no provision, the House would have been helpless. But, the hon. gentleman says, although Mr. Gladstone excluded a man who was notoriously disqualified, he did not seat his opponent. No, because Mr. Gladstone did not propose to do that which is illegal, because he did not propose to give the seat to the man who was in the minority, against whom the majority of the legal votes of the constituency had been recorded. Why, what is the rule? It is well stated, in many judgments of the courts, that the candidate of the minority is not entitled to the seat unless the people voted perversely, unless it was brought clearly before them that the candidate for whom they proposed to vote was disqualified and that they would throw away their votes if they voted for him. The facts and the law must be clearly and specifically stated and brought home to the electors before the candidate of the minority is entitled to the seat. That is clearly shown, and upon that ground the hon. gentleman, who is returned to this House, was not entitled to the seat and was not entitled to be returned. The highest qualification is the receipt of a majority of the qualified votes that are cast in the election. Now, he does not possess that qualification. And the hon. gentleman, in the face of the law, which says that the returning officer shall return the candidate having the majority of votes, and when he knows that the returning officer did not return such candidate, but, on the contrary, disregarded the law and returned the candidate having the minority of votes, nevertheless asks this House to maintain that man in his position.

Mr. THOMPSON. I beg your pardon, I did not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does anyone doubt that fact when the hon. gentleman proposes to refer this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when the time is nearly expired for petitioning? The hon. gentleman has suggested a petition. Who has said that there is a petition against this man? We petition against a party who has apparently a right to the seat, but there is before this House evidence to show, as clearly as day itself, that the hon. gentleman who is returned from Queen's is not entitled to sit in this House, that the returning officer, to use the words of Mr. Justice Lopes in this case, instead of complying with the law, departed from the law, and that his return is no return at all. That is what the judge said in that case. Where is the difference? I think that the hon. gentleman has made out no ground. I have called the attention of the House to the fact that all cases of this class were referred not to the Committee on Controverted Elections, and are therefore not proper to be referred to the courts which took their place, but were regarded as proper cases to be dealt with by the House, and the rule is as valid to-day, and in this case, as it was in regard to any of the cases on which the House acted in former years. I again say that the highest qualification, the best right a man can have to sit in Parliament is the fact that he has obtained a majority of votes. That is a necessary qualification, paramount to all others, and of more consequence than all others. It is that by which the party is entitled to take the seat in the first instance. If Mr. King has been guilty of bribery, if he has acted in an improper manner, then it will be open to Mr. Baird or to any other party in the constituency to contest Mr. King's election. He will be exactly in the same position that he would have been in if the returning officer had done his duty. It is the interest of this House to see that the returning officers who act improperly have no countenance given to their misconduct, and that we shall not hesitate for a moment to do what is right and proper in the matter by giving the seat to the candidate having the majority of votes, leaving the other party to rely on the remedy which the law may give him.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). The importance of this subject which is now engaging the attention of the House has been alluded to by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), who addressed the House this afternoon, and I think, from the remarks he made, he fully appreciated the novelty of the proposition he has introduced into the House and brought before its consideration to-day. I cannot say so much for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I do not think he has shown any great desire to regard this matter solely from a judicial point of view, and entirely devoid of any political feeling or partisanship. I hope that in the debate which will be carried on, I have no doubt, for some time, all hon. gentlemen will approach this question as one purely of law, because no speaker in the debate has hitherto, and I venture to say no speaker yet will, deny that the proposition now before the House of Commons is purely a legal question. The resolution, as it stands, I venture to say, cannot possibly meet with the approval of either side of the House. As it reads it would stultify the House of Commons, and I have no doubt that, when I point out to the House the curious form in which it stands at present, very few hon. gentlemen will be as ready as the hon. member for Bothwell to agree to vote for it. The resolution, if carried, would say and would enact that Mr. King was the duly returned member for this House, no other candidate having been properly nominated. That would be untrue in fact and contradicted by the return itself and by the recitals of the resolution in which the return is set out. I might also say, that another important point comes up in consideration of the form of the resolution and of the proposition before the House in connection with the fifth section of chapter 9 of the Acts of 1886, because, in reference to the petition which could be presented by the person aggrieved or by the person considering that he was entitled to be returned, that petition must complain of an undue return or undue election of a member, and, as the House will see at once, if this resolution passed, we would be depriving Mr. Baird, the present member of this House, of the right to petition against the return of Mr. King. I venture to say that this resolution, in those two points, will require very careful and mature consideration before those gentlemen who, on the merits of the case, are disposed to decide in favor of Mr. King and against Mr. Baird, will support it. I think the House, having listened to the very able and very thorough argument of the Minister of Justice touching the practice of Parliament in the past, and touching the legislation of 1868 in the English House of Commons, and the legislation of 1874 in this House, must have been struck with the reply of the hon. member for Bothwell. He dwelt very considerably on the old cases, which, I think, most members will agree cannot affect the very important question touched upon by the Minister of Justice, since they were all parliamentary cases referred to by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution this afternoon. I think the whole question hinges upon the clause in the Controverted Elections Act, introduced, I may add, by the Reform party, by the party opposite, in the year 1874, in the Bill they brought down to the House dealing with controverted elections at that time. I think that that clause of the Act is the one to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in his argument paid the least attention, and I do not consider that the position taken by the Minister of Justice, upon the interpretation of that clause and its effect, has been considered by him. The Minister of Justice was twitted somewhat by the hon. member for Bothwell with having taken an inconsistent position on this question. I deny that entirely. I say the member for Bothwell could not have listened to the speech delivered to the House this afternoon and come to that conclusion, because, while the Minister of Justice mentioned the very important matters which were to be considered in connection with this important step which the House was asked to take, he pointed out that there was no authority for the course the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) wishes the House to pursue, while, on the other hand, there were many cases which pointed to the House not having the right to consider the case at all. And under all these circumstances, and as it is a case of great importance, bringing the question here for the first time for our consideration, the Minister of Justice was willing that this matter should be carefully considered and carefully threshed out in the regular way before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The two positions were not inconsistent. The Privileges and Elections Committee, if they agree with the views of the Minister of Justice, may very properly report to this House that, having investigated these cases, having looked into the legislation, having compared, for instance, the sections of the Ballot Act, on which so much stress is laid, with the sections of our Controverted Election Act, they have come to the conclusion that the matter should not be entertained, nor be dealt with in the House of Commons. Therefore, if that be so, it was not only consistent, but, from many points of view, highly proper, that this course should be taken. I, myself, having looked into this subject, with, I hope, a judicial spirit, have come to the conclusion that perhaps, if the Minister of Justice had taken the course which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) desires, that the position of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) should be directly challenged and the matter discussed here—I, myself, should have thought that course a proper one, because I believe that the matter is not properly before this House, and I propose to show that before I sit down. I wish now to refer to the allusion made by the hon. member for Bothwell, to the Mitchel case, and his claim that if the contention of the Minister of Justice was sound, that would have been sent to the courts. That case was sent to the courts and dealt with by them, and Mr. Gladstone took no such course, and no such course was taken as is proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell to be followed to-day. Now, the senior member for St. John, in introducing this matter, appealed to us to consider the question calmly and judicially, but I do not think that he showed much of the spirit of the judge in his discussion of that portion of the subject. I have great respect for the opinions of the senior member for St. John as a commercial lawyer; I believe his standing as a brilliant commercial lawyer is acknowledged by both sides of this House, but I do not think much of his judicial opinion in reference to an election petition while he is a member for St. John. I have no doubt that when he reaches the position, to which he will undoubtedly some day be entitled, we will all place the greatest confidence in the opinions which he may give concerning an election; but as member for St. John I think his utterances will have to be watched carefully and weighed well. For instance, before he sat down he adverted to the conduct of the returning officer, who certainly has some rights, who is to conduct his functions in the face of a Statute imposing tremendous pains and penalties upon him for disobedience in any one of his duties; and I think the member for St. John alluded to his conduct in a spirit that was hardly judicial—in fact, I believe that before he sat down he had worked himself up into such a feeling that he would have supported a resolution to draw and quarter the returning officer in this case, when he charged him with “gross dereliction of duty, and hoped the House would not tolerate such conduct on the part of a returning officer when his duty was so clearly pointed out by the Statute.” Another position taken by the member for St. John I challenge. He stated to the House that with the nomination, or what was done at the nomination for Queen’s, we had nothing to do; that was not material; that we had only to skip the sections, virtually, in the Controverted Elections Act regarding what was to be done at the nomination, and to skip all the sections regarding the duties of the returning officer, and to come down to the counting of the votes. I say, that properly to treat this subject, we must, of necessity, begin at the beginning, and ascertain what the duties of the returning officer were at the nomination, and whether, having done anything at the time of the nomination improper and contrary to the imperative language of the Statute, he had power to rectify that mistake before he made his return. Whether my opinions on that point are right or wrong, certainly I think that the hon. member for St. John erred in thinking that to be all the question before us. There was one thing, one sentence that dropped from the hon. member, to which I call particular attention. He stated that “if any of the proceedings were irregular, there is a tribunal provided in the Controverted Elections Act by which the returns can be rectified.” That was the only portion of his speech with which I heartily concur. We have that tribunal. The Minister of Justice has pointed out that this matter is one for that tribunal. I do not understand that the hon. member for Bothwell has challenged that position, and I think that no member of the legal profession in this House will say that this matter could not have been brought before the legal tribunal pointed out by the Controverted Elections Act, and dealt with satisfactorily there. Now, much has been said in reference to the Ballot Act of 1872. That was the Act before the judges in the case to which so much attention has been paid to-day, the case of the Queen and the Mayor of Bangor. It was with the provisions of that Act that the judges of the court were then dealing. The Minister of Justice has directed the attention of the House to the fact that that case, as it stands, and admitting the position taken by the hon. gentleman, does not bear them out as they believe it does. I wish to draw the attention of the House to another aspect of that case, in which I shall differ with the hon. member for St. John, when he says that the Ballot Act of 1872 and our Elections Act are virtually one and the same Act, so far as their provisions are concerned. Now, I will point out to this House that there is a marked difference. In the first place the clauses which are enactments in the Act before us, in the Controverted Elections Act, are merely rules appended to the Ballot Act of 1872, and I do not think the members of the profession in the House will challenge the statement that the rules appended to a Statute are, as a general thing, directory, whereas in an enactment they are imperative. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that the provisions regarding the duties of a returning officer in the Ballot Act of 1872, are found in the rules, while in the Act before us they are positive enactments—so that there at once you see a great difference between the Ballot Act and the Controverted Elections Act. Now, there is another great difference between these two Acts. The Ballot Act of 1872 specially provides a time for and a time when the returning officer is bound to consider the validity of the nomination papers placed before him. There is a time specially marked out for him to exercise his judicial functions; there is a time marked out in these rules at which all objections to a nomination paper must be presented; and the rules go on to say that after that any question regarding the returning officer's decision as to the nomination paper must be raised after the election, and by petition, and that there is no time in which the returning officer can change his opinion or disallow objections allowed, or allow objections disallowed to these papers. And the House will see at once that the difference renders the case and renders the decision so much commented on, entirely inapplicable to the case before us. What are those rules—and they are not in the Acts, as I have said, regulating elections in the Dominion of Canada? Rule 6 in this Ballot Act of 1872, after mentioning the manner in which candidates have to be nominated, goes on to say:

"No objection to a nomination paper on the ground of the description of the candidate therein being insufficient, or not being in compliance with this rule, shall be allowed or deemed valid, unless such objection is made by the returning officer, or by some other person, at or immediately after the time of the delivery of the nomination paper."

And rule 12 says:

"A person shall not be entitled to have his name inserted in any ballot paper as a candidate unless he has been nominated in manner provided by this Act; and every person whose nomination paper has been delivered to the returning officer during the time appointed for the election, shall be deemed to have been nominated in manner provided by this Act, unless objection be made to his nomination paper by the returning officer, or some other person, before the expiration of the time appointed for the election, or within one hour afterwards."

With those two rules, is it to be wondered at that the courts in England, when this question was brought before them by petition, should have said that after that decision is given, after the returning officer has exercised those judicial functions, it is a mere matter of count, he proceeds to follow out the duties appointed by the Act. Why, hon. gentlemen will not question the correctness of such a decision there, when I mention to the House that these clauses are not in our Act, and that, moreover, we have entirely different clauses in regard to the nominations and what is to be then done than they have in the English Act; and that difference is at the very bottom of this case, as it is in regard to the proceedings with respect to the nomination paper. The hon. gentleman will see that the case of the Queen vs. the Mayor of Bangor can be relied upon in no degree whatever in the discussion now before the House. The Canadian Act, chapter 8, section 22, contains a provision that will not be found in the Ballot Act, nor in the existing Act of 1863, of England:

"No nomination paper shall be valid and acted upon by the returning officer unless it is accompanied by the consent in writing of the person therein nominated, except when such person is absent from the Province in which the election is to be held, in which case such absence shall be stated in the nomination paper; and unless a sum of $200 is deposited in the hands of the returning officer at the time the nomination paper is filed with him; and the receipt of the returning officer shall, in any case, be sufficient evidence of the production of the nomination paper, of the consent of the candidate and of the payment herein mentioned."

Taking that section of the Act, together with the section towards the end of the Act in regard to the payment of any deposit before or after the election, and to which section I shall allude later on, the House will see at once that we have to face a position of affairs that cannot be found in any election case, parliamentary or otherwise, in England, nor in any Act that obtains there. In the view I take of this question I do not think it is necessary for the House to thresh out that question of law. I may mention to the House that the very question which is considered by some hon. gentlemen so easy to dispose of and decide, is now before the election courts in Nova Scotia, that it is a point relied upon by one of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, and in maintaining that position in opposition to the one taken to-day by hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, that gentleman hopes yet to become a member of the House of Commons of Canada. So, the House will see that the question involved in this election is not merely a legal one, but it is a question in regard to which more authority than the case of the Queen vs. the Mayor of Bangor will be required and much more argument addressed to the House before it will follow the decision given in that case. I may say to hon. gentlemen who do not belong to the legal profession, or say for them, that it is worth our while considering how this clause 68, Chap. 9 of the Canadian Act, came to be the law in Canada. In 1868 that legislation was first introduced. In the case of England it was introduced after a tremendous agitation had been made for such an enactment; and although that clause was much discussed in the Imperial Parliament and much discussed before it was brought to the notice of Parliament, I am surprised to find that in Canada, in 1874, that clause received very little attention when the Election Act was introduced in the House by the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Fournier. The reason was that for over four hundred years the House of Commons of England had been contending with the legal tribunals for the jurisdiction over election cases, and those parliamentary courts whose decisions had been appealed to had so offended by their decisions the sense of independent minds in England, that dissatisfaction arose and it became so strong that this change was deemed necessary. Over four hundred years ago, before the Election Act of 1868, legislation had been passed authorising the judges of assizes to enquire into the elections of members of Parliament; but this particular clause was not introduced into any of the Acts till 1868, and it became necessary then because Parliament assumed jurisdiction in every case of question as to the election and return of one of its members, and the conduct of its committees from time to time gave rise to scandals, and it was considered improper that members of Parliament should be judges of their own cases. What are we asked to do to-day? We are asked to decide, not only the question of Queen's county, but questions involved in a petition against the return of an hon. member in Nova Scotia. We are virtually deciding what may prove at some time to be our own case, and that of other hon. members. Is it proper that we should deliberately sit in judgment on a case with which we are connected? Surely no one but a hypocrite would say that we can enter into this case utterly devoid of partisan feeling and political bias? If that is the case, is it not wise to follow the letter, or, at all events, the spirit of the Act which relegated all these political or quasi-political questions to the legal tribunals? I think such a reference would be a result which everyone should strive to reach, a result that would take from us the responsibility of dealing with what I have pointed out to be a question in which we are all personally interested. In order to lead the House to understand the importance of this question, I trust hon. members will bear with me while I read one or two extracts from a very eminent member of the bar, written before the present Election Act was introduced into England, for his remarks embody opinions which I might imperfectly express. Sergeant Palling, in 1866, said :

"The claim of the House of Commons to alone adjudicate on the validity of its own members is a principle very objectionable. It is, in fact, neither more nor less than the claim of a body of individuals to act as judges in their own case."

Again, he said, in 1869, after the Act of 1863 :

"It has come to be at last recognised in the case of the House of Commons, as in that of other elective bodies, that all questions affecting the due return of the individual members who constitute it must not only be regulated by the general law of the land, but be disposed of by tribunals emanating and wholly governed by such law. There can now be no retrograde movement; nothing can upset the concession thus solemnly made to the nation, that all questions affecting the election of its representatives in Parliament must henceforth be disposed of by an established system of judicial enquiry, wholly free from the bias, the defects and the inevitable evils of the election committee."

Then Rogers, who is an authority on the law regarding elections, says :

"The House of Commons from the earliest time claimed and exercised the exclusive right of deciding upon the validity of all elections to its own body; its exercise was first regulated by Statute in 1707, by the Grenville Act, which provided for the decision of such questions by select committees of the House. The decisions of many of these committees have been reported and are still of authority where there is no statutory direction for the Court to follow.

"The right of deciding such questions has now, by the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, (31 and 32 Vict. chap. 125) been transferred to the tribunal (consisting originally of one judge, but since 1879 of two, under 42 and 43 Vict. chap. 75) created by that Act, so far as elections are concerned; but the House retains the right of deciding upon the qualifications of its members.

"The last-mentioned right has been exercised in several instances since the transfer of the jurisdiction over petitions to the judges; e.g. in the case of Sir S. Waterlow, who was declared disqualified under 22 Geo. III, chap. 45 (relating to contractors) by a select committee in 1869, and in the cases of O'Donovan Rossa, whose election was declared void by the House in 1870, and John Mitchel, an escaped convict, whose first election in 1875 was disregarded by the House; also in the more recent cases of Sir Bryan O'Loughlin, in 1879, who had accepted an office of profit under the Crown; of Michael Davitt a convicted felon in 1882; and of Mr. Bradlaugh, who was expelled in the same year."

And while mentioning the name of Mr. Davitt, and recollecting the allusion made by the Minister of Justice to that case, I would point out to the House that, as far as the proposition for which I am contending is concerned, legal gentlemen of high standing in the debate on that occasion challenged the position taken by the Attorney General of that day, Sir Henry James. It will be found that in that discussion these legal gentlemen contended that even as regards the question of disqualification or the eligibility of the members of the House, the House of Commons by this clause to which I have directed attention, had relegated the whole matter to the tribunals of the land. And in the Tipperary case that position was taken by counsel at the bar, and the argument was addressed to the court that even in those cases the House of Commons had by that Act deprived itself of its authority. They, of course, admitted that the House of Commons could pass another Act and so arrange to bring the matter within their jurisdiction, but that while the Act stood unrepealed they had no right to deal with a case touching the election of members, no right to deal with the eligibility of members to sit in the House of Commons; but in the Tipperary case the court gave a decision neither one way nor the other, as they were able to arrive at a decision without dealing with that point. This only shows to what a length this provision in the Act will carry us in cases of this kind. Now, every authority that the hon. gentlemen can find in the library, all the leading authorities of the day regarding election petitions, go to show that the position taken by the Minister of Justice is sound, and that this House has nothing to do with the consideration of the due return or election of a member to the House, because in those cases which have been pointed out the only causes affecting the eligibility of a candidate or his disqualification in which this House can act are when the candidate is a felon, a minor, a convict or a woman.

An hon. MEMBER. Why refer it then?

Mr. TUPPER. My hon. friend asks, why then refer it? I have already stated that from the search I have made on this occasion, I think that if the Minister of Justice took the strict position he is entitled to take, in virtue of these cases, he would not refer it for a moment, but would call on the House at once and summarily to dispose of it and refer it to the tribunal appointed by the country. But the minister's position is very strong, and should commend itself to my brother judges in this matter. So anxious is he that a judicial spirit should prevail, so ready to admit that this is a case of the kind that should engage the attention of the House that he is willing that all those cases with which individual members have made themselves acquainted should be carefully examined and calmly discussed in the committee, and then that the committee may take such a course as to it may seem proper. I think his position is an extremely strong one; he is not technical, but I consider that he has shown a desire to-day to be eminently just. Now Leigh and Marchant, in their "Law of Elections," quote this section, and our Act is just the same as the English :

"From and after the next dissolution of Parliament no election or return to Parliament shall be questioned except in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

The words are not exactly the same as in our Act, but any one, I think, will see that there is no substantial difference between that clause and the clause of our Act. The text writer goes on to say :

"Questioned means questioned by election petition, by persons having an interest in raising the question and wishing to vindicate their own rights, and does not take away from the House of Commons their authority to decide on the eligibility of a candidate, in the event of a felon, a minor, or a woman being returned. So in the case of O'Donovan Rossa, convicted of treason-felony under the 'Crown and Government Security Act, 1848,' who was returned for the county of Tipperary, the House of Commons agreed almost unanimously, on 10th February, 1870, 'That he, Rossa, having been adjudged guilty of felony and sentenced to penal servitude for life, and being now imprisoned under such sentence, has become and continues incapable of being elected or returned a member of the House.' A similar resolution was passed on the election of John Mitchel, a convicted felon, and an alien, as member for the same county; and it is to be noticed that this power of declaring ineligible by resolution, a person who has been elected, does not involve as a consequence that the resolution of the House of Commons can, per se, affix a disability not previously existing. If the House of Commons had not this power, it would make the rejection of a disqualified member contingent on a petition being presented. By the exercise of this power the House of Commons might refer to the consideration of a committee the seat of a member called in question by any member of the House; for instance, when a member accepts an old office of profit from the Crown, and has not sought re-election, and no writ has been issued for a new election; or, as in Sir S. Waterlow's case; or when a member already holding one office of profit received another to hold with the first, and does not vacate his seat. In the two latter cases it would seem that no other mode of raising the question would be left, as these cases would not fall within the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868."

Because, as you will see, the time for petitioning and the procedure would not at all apply to these cases, which might arise long after a general election. Well, to come nearer home, we have the decision in the Bagot case, in 1879, after the Act of 1874 became law. We have that decision, Mr. Speaker, given by one of your predecessors which, while it was not on all fours with this, throws some light on the point to which I address myself, and with the permission of the House I will read an extract from that decision, because on that occasion the opinion of the House was unanimous. As stated by the Speaker of this House, the matter was not within the jurisdiction of the House since the legislation to which I have referred was introduced.

The Speaker in the Bagot case, after a petition had been presented to a court of law, simply because charges had been made that collusion had occurred or that for some other reasons the election had been carried on improperly or corruptly, ruled the petition out of order, and went on to deal with the case in the way I have been stating :

" Now, the only question that this House has to consider is whether this petition is not in effect a petition questioning the return of a member, which, as it has been admitted on both sides, cannot be properly received by the House, in view of the fact that it has divested itself of its right of trying such matters by referring them to the jurisdiction of an independent judicial tribunal. In handing over this power to the Courts, the House still reserve to itself the right of taking notice of any legal disabilities affecting its members, and issuing writs in the room of members judged to be incapable of sitting ; but the petition now under consideration, both in its terms and scope, is a petition questioning the return of a member, and not within the purview of this House."

And what does the resolution propose that this House should do but question the return of an hon. member of this House just as much as a petition could ?

" By the Act 57 Vic., chap. 10, the House of Commons divested itself of its original jurisdiction for the trial of all matters growing out of the election and return of members having the right to sit therein, including the withdrawal and abatement of any election petition in consequence of alleged corrupt agreement between the parties concerned. That power now belongs to the courts of justice, which try all election cases in conformity with the Statutes in that behalf provided.

" The 63rd section of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, expressly provides that all elections held after the passing of the said Act shall be subject to the provisions thereof, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance therewith, showing clearly that the determination of the judicial body, to whom that power has been delegated, is final to all intents and purposes.

" Now, the petition in question declares, in express terms, that the city member has no right to the position he occupies, —"

I will ask hon. gentlemen to substitute the word " resolution " for " petition."

—" and were the prayer of the petitioners granted, the logical result would be the virtual resumption by the House of the jurisdiction which it has in its wisdom handed to the courts."

" To grant the prayer of the petition would be to violate the general principle which lies at the basis of all the legislation adopted by the English Parliament since 1868, and by the Canadian Parliament since 1873, that the court should alone adjudicate on matters of controverted elections. When the law has been proved to be inadequate to provide a sufficient remedy in any case, then Parliament has always come forward, as the various statutes in amendment of the Act of 1874 proved, and passed the legislation necessary in the premises. In view, then, of the fact that the petition is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the law which governs the House in such cases, and does in effect question the right of an hon. member to his seat, I have to decide that the objection raised by the hon. member for Bagot is well taken, and that the petition cannot be received."

I think that decision bears upon the case before the House. Hon. members may say that while it is true that the question of a member's seat is the concern here, the returning officer is under the authority of this House, that he has acted contrary to his express duty, and that his conduct is properly before Parliament. I deny that position as equally unsound with the position taken in this case, because the Act has expressly provided that the conduct of the returning officer may be reviewed. In cases where he has not properly performed his duties, he may be and is sometimes a respondent to an election petition, and the Act expressly provides how and when the conduct of that returning officer may come before this House. It is not until the judge has investigated it, before whom the returning officer is entitled, as he is not here, to have counsel to defend him, and then the judge is bound to report his conduct to the House. When that report is made, the conduct of the returning officer can properly be dealt with here, as was done in days of old. They used to bring some of those officers before the House and make them kneel and go through gymnastics not at all in accordance with the spirit of to-day ; and it is to those musty old precedents the honorable gentleman has mostly referred. In support of the contention that the returning officer's conduct is not properly before us to-day, any more than the petition should be, I will read to the House the opinion of a text-writer in reference to the provision of our statute, which is contained in the English Act. Rogers says :

" The jurisdiction of the House of Commons over returning officers does not seem to be taken away by the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, although the judges, and not a committee, would hear and adjudicate on any complaint against them. The judge, it seems, would make a special report to the House under section 11, if necessary, upon which the House would act as they thought fit."

Then the discretion of the returning officer has been spoken of, and my learned friends have stated what he ought to have done. Now, suppose this matter is before the House, and suppose it is differently considered by the judge of the election court from what it is by the House. Suppose the judges come to the conclusion that this return was a proper one, and that the return in the Nova Scotia case I have alluded to was an improper one. In the latter case the judgment will be in answer to the prayer that the returning officer ought to have done in the Nova Scotia case exactly what he did in the case before us, because, as everybody knows, the prayer in the Nova Scotia case, which is the converse of this, is that the returning officer ought to have returned the other candidate, and this question of the minority of votes would come up. In reference to the discretion of returning officers, Rogers says :

" It would seem that the returning officer is not subject to any liability as far as Parliament is concerned if he returned a disqualified person, nor on the other hand could he well be censured for exercising his judgment as to eligibility of a candidate and returning the person whom the judge ultimately decides to be entitled to the seat ; for in most of the cases in which a disqualified person has been returned, the form of the resolution of the Election Committee has been that the petitioner ought to have been returned."

So that, in the view I take of the matter, the returning officer, while he could have taken one of two courses, was at perfect liberty, and cannot be properly censured by this House for having adopted the course he did. Having exercised the discretion which I believe was given to him by the provisions of the Act, whether he exercised it rightly or wrongly, he would not in fairness be subject to the rebuke or censure of this House. Now, if the House will bear in mind certain sections in our Act, and not confine themselves to that section which states what the returning officer must do in counting up the votes, they will find that it is impossible to maintain the position that the returning officer has no discretion. His discretionary powers are many and of great importance. Under chap. 8, section 28, he has to report as to the non-compliance with any of the provisions of the Act. I have suggested with reference to the nomination that it is imperative, in order to be a candidate at all, a man must not only be nominated by so many electors, but must make a deposit in a certain way. The officer has no discretion. He has no final authority, but is bound to follow out the Act to the best of his ability, and a heavy penalty can be inflicted upon him if he does not. Chap. 8, section " I " invests him with discretionary powers also in reference to being bound to return the person who ought to be returned. I can say there is strong authority to show that the member for Queen's has been properly returned. There is authority in Ontario, that of Judge Wilson, who, in a case there, pointed out that in many respects our returning officers have judicial discretion, or powers not purely ministerial. In the Ballot Act, moreover, there is a definition of a candidate. In our Election Act there is no such clause, and I say that makes a vast difference. In the Ballot Act it is something to the effect that the " person who has been nominated " and so forth, whereas in our Act the candidate cannot be considered in the eyes of the law entitled to be returned unless the section " I " referred to is complied with, and the deposit made by the proper party.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. TUPPER. Before six o'clock I was dwelling upon the 68th clause, chap. 9 of the Act of 1836, which says:

"All elections shall be subject to the provisions of this Act, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance herewith."

I do not remember having read that section before this evening. I read the section in the English Act from which it is taken, and claim that substantially the two clauses are the same, and that therefore the authorities to which I drew the attention of the House in connection with the interpretation were perfect. I would like to read the two clauses of chap. 8, which must be taken together, in order that the point upon which the decision of the returning officer was given, or in reference to which the returning officer took the action he did in the case of the selection for Queen's, may be appreciated, and the House will understand, from the position I took, that it does not to me matter much whether he was right or wrong in the interpretation of his duty under this clause, because the election courts alone have to do with that. These two sections read as follows: Section 22, of chap. 8, after stating how the nomination should be drawn up in writing, makes it imperative that the $200 shall be deposited in the hands of the returning officer when the nomination paper is filed, and goes on to say:

"The amount so deposited shall be returned in a certain event. Section 118 says that no payment (except in respect of the personal expenses of a candidate), and no advance, loan or deposit shall be made by or on behalf of any candidate at any election, before or during or after such election, on account of such election, otherwise than through an agent or agents whose name or names, address or addresses, have been declared in writing to the returning officer, on or before the nomination day, or through an agent or agents to be appointed in his or their place, as herein provided."

I referred to authorities in England, which went to show that the language in that clause of the Act, though the precise language is not in the Election Act, as they have no clause similar to this requiring a deposit, but still the language in the body of the Act is imperative, and I pointed out too that there was no particular time for the returning officer to take the responsibility of directing what course should be pursued in regard to the rejection or acceptance of these papers. In the case of the Canadian Act, the returning officer has up to the time of making the return the right to treat the nomination paper as valid or otherwise. The responsibility lies with him. I point this out to show the arguable point, and the question involved in it, and I claim that these reasons require that this House should not touch a matter involving that peculiarly legal point. Now, reference has been made to the conduct of the returning officer, and to this case as an extraordinary one and particularly unfair to Mr. King. Naturally, at first blush one would say that the candidate or person receiving the majority of votes was entitled to the seat, and undoubtedly that is the fact. The candidate duly nominated, under the provisions of the Election Act, and having the majority of votes, is entitled to the seat, and the candidate duly nominated, if he did obtain the majority of votes under this act would get his seat, and this House cannot unless by Act of Parliament prevent him taking his seat here, but he must go through a certain preliminary stage before taking that seat. What hardship is there, supposing Mr. King to have the right to sit in the House, after he has proceeded in due course to law, in his case more than in the case of the other gentlemen who are claiming the same right, not by virtue of any mistake or misdeed of the returning officer, but on account of gross bribery on the part of the gentlemen who have been returned, and whom they hope to unseat? Then, if we come to what is fair, if we are to leave aside the legal aspect of this question and put it to ourselves as men, I think there is something to be said on the other side. I do not think that all the fairness or all the justice, according to the popular idea, is with Mr. King in this dispute. As the parties stand now, without the action of the House, which is desired by my hon. friend opposite, being taken, the law will give Mr. King all that he is entitled to. No one has challenged the proposition I have laid down that Mr. King can assert the rights which his friends claim for him in a court of law, and can obtain the position he claims, if his contention is sound. So the parties are upon an equal footing and the courts are equally open to them. But, if the House takes the step my hon. friend proposes, what will be the effect in regard to Mr. Baird? I ask the consideration of hon. gentlemen who will follow me in this debate to this point. You are depriving Mr. Baird in that way of all the rights which the returning officer believes he possesses, which he believes he possesses, and which a great many of the legal profession believe he possesses, at once and forever, because in that case he cannot get his case examined by a legal tribunal, he cannot go into an election court and have his case investigated as against Mr. King. That is a position we ought to hesitate before taking, because in that way we will do an incalculable injustice to Mr. Baird, and Mr. Baird cannot get rid of our action in any tribunal in this country. Even if we err in our decision as regards this point to which I have alluded, and if I am wrong and the returning officer is wrong in his view of the law, that can all be rectified, not by political partisans or on political considerations, but in due course of law and in the tribunal which we all must think the best fitted to deal with a question of this kind. Reference has been made to the terrible outrage perpetrated by a returning officer in returning a candidate who had the minority of votes. I alluded a little while ago to the fact that a candidate who was legally nominated according to the Act, and obtained a majority of votes under the law, was entitled to his return; but the proposition of my hon. friends is not equally true that any person who obtains a majority is entitled to the seat and ought to be returned by the returning officer. In the Tipperary case, to which I alluded, in the Mitchel case, to which, I think, the Minister of Justice alluded, Mr. Mitchel, also after being unseated, at the next election—I think it was, but that does not matter—obtained 3,114 votes, and his opponent obtained 716 votes. That came before the courts of law, and, instead of this opinion which has been expressed in this House to-day being sustained by the courts, strange to say the court declared the gentleman who had that minority of votes the duly elected member for that seat, and gave him the seat, and held that he was entitled to be returned. More than that, the court held that the returning officer should have returned this gentleman, Mr. Moore, who obtained only 716 votes, although the other candidate obtained 3,114 votes. The prayer of the petition, as is usual in these cases, claims that the returning officer should have returned the party whom the petitioner alleges should be elected, and the court in the decree granting that says the returning officer should have returned that party. I have already pointed out the extraordinary position in which we would be if it were possible that a case of this kind should be dealt with in the courts of law, and they should decide that the gentleman obtaining under these circumstances a minority of votes should have been returned by the returning officer, when this House would have taken the opposite course. I think we shall agree that in matters of this kind the legal tribunals would be more fitted to express a legal opinion than the majority of this House, which is made up of laymen as well as of those who have studied these questions professionally. In the Tipperary case, the petition declared that the returning officer should have declared Moore, the petitioner, duly elected, although he obtained the minority vote. The matter came up, I think, on a stated case, and the question was asked as to whether the returning officer should have returned this candidate who obtained the minority of votes. The question is on page 42 of O'Malley & Hardcastle's Election Reports, Vol. 3. The question is:

"Were the votes given for the said John Mitchel at the said election, under the aforesaid circumstances, thrown away, and was the said Stephen Moore, who was the only other candidate, and was duly qualified, and for whom were recorded the number of votes stated in the sheriff's return, entitled to be declared duly elected for said county?"

The answer on page 48 is:

"We now answer the two questions, submitted to us by the learned judge, in the affirmative."

And so in all these cases no one will question that the order is that the successful party should have been declared elected. Well, there is another case in which this minority question came up, and the returning officer was not considered to have acted so outrageously in the exercise of his discretion, as my hon. friends seem to think the returning officer acted in this case. We find this case in 10 Law Reports Common Pleas, Northcote and Pulsford; and I would like the hon. gentlemen who are interested in this matter to observe the state of the poll on that occasion, the action of the returning officer, and the action of the court, because in England, as here, where the action of the returning officer is involved, he is made a party to the suit, and is made responsible in costs if the court considers his action unjustifiable. Well, now, I think that so far as that election case is concerned the case to which I have alluded is in point. There were four candidates—Mr. Northcote, Mr. Harris, Mr. May and Mr. Pulsford. Mr. Northcote put in a nomination paper which was not duly prepared, and he put in another which was duly prepared, and complied with the provisions of the Act; and the returning officer, taking the view of my hon. friend opposite, that he was a purely ministerial officer, did not exercise any discretion whatever in reference to these papers, but posted both papers of the one candidate, Mr. Northcote, making two sets of ballot papers and two names for the one candidate, and each voter gave separate ballots for each of the names of the same man. As the returning officer had so many papers before him, and acting in that machine way, did not look at each paper but went ahead. There were 301 votes on one set of ballot papers for Mr. Northcote and 71 on another; and 508 for Mr. Harris, 372 for Mr. May, and 339 for Mr. Pulsford. But instead of giving Mr. Northcote the seat, to which he was entitled, having obtained 372 votes altogether, he gave the three seats to Mr. Harris, Mr. May and Mr. Pulsford, by separating the votes for Mr. Northcote according to the ballots on which they were given, and those ballots given in connection with the irregular ballot paper amounted to 71. Mr. Northcote presented his petition to the court and claimed to be elected instead of Mr. Pulsford. In that case the court declared that Mr. Northcote was duly elected and should have been returned, and notwithstanding the conduct of the returning officer in that case the court did not compel him to pay the costs and did not reprimand him in any way. So that, as I pointed out, the mere fact that a man obtains a certain number of votes is not the main question, when these questions are dealt with from a purely legal point of view. As I mentioned to-day, a case in one respect precisely similar to this is already present before the election court. I hope that this matter will be sent to the committee, and after the committee has reported I trust that this House will not consider this matter properly before us. Now, I mentioned to-day, that while I individually would have been prepared to vote directly against the resolution, and while I did not see why this matter should go to the committee at all, still I am prepared, under the circumstances, looking into all these cases, recognising the fact there are many of them to be examined, that my view of them may be incorrect, that a further examination may show that the opinion I have formed now is wrong, looking also at the practice in our own House, I think, after all that, it will be better that the matter should go to the committee, not as an admission that we have jurisdiction over it, but as a matter for them to investigate first on the point as to whether we have anything to do with it at all. Now, I noticed that in Mr. Bourinot's work on Parliamentary Procedure, after all his research he has not been able to find any case similar to this. Still there have been many questions affecting the members previous to the Act of 1874 and the Parliamentary Act of 1885. I find that on page 155, after dealing with the different cases, he says:

"A reference to the committee is no doubt a proper procedure in all cases in which there are reasonable doubts as to the facts, or the course that should be pursued, especially when it is necessary to examine precedents."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that he will be a bold man who, on perusing the different text-books to which I have referred on the election law of the Mother Country, which in many respects is the same as our own, and after remembering those changes and appreciating the difficulties of the returning officer in this case—I think he would be a bold man who would say, no matter how he felt personally, that there was nothing for us to examine, that there was nothing for us to look into. You have it stated, and to some extent the members who have spoken on this subject have verified that statement, that this is not a question for political parties, that it is a question for us to approach, divested of all political feeling. Well, we see the Minister of Justice taking strong ground on this point, and you see the hon. member for Bothwell taking strong grounds in the opposition direction, and each hon. gentleman claims that he has authors covering the point, and that they are final. Now, in this case, I think it will not be out of the way for lawyers as well as laymen in this House to admit that there is something to look into, something to investigate. My hon. friends opposite claim that when this matter is investigated, it will appear that the only matter to look into is the Election Act, and to treat it on its merits, and either to confirm my hon. friend from Queen's in his seat, or to amend the return and elect this other gentleman. Now, I hope and believe that an enquiry will lead to a totally different result, and I am willing to leave the matter to the committee, believing that the committee will endorse the position I have taken to-day.

Mr. EDGAR. I cannot help thinking that the two distinguished lawyers who have addressed the House against the original motion must have felt that they were addressing a very unsympathetic audience when they advocated so strenuously the cause of the minority candidate. I do not know that they could expect that all the hon. members in this House would sympathise with the rights of the gentlemen who represent the minority in their respective constituencies. The speeches these two hon. gentlemen made did not strike me as being entirely consistent with themselves or with one another, and are still less consistent with the amendment which the Minister of Justice moved. Now, almost the whole of their arguments were addressed to convince the House that we had nothing whatever to do in dealing with this case, that we had no more right to do anything in the way of favoring the claim of the minority candidate or the majority candidate in this case, than we had in any other matter that might be imagined not even remotely connected with this affair. Surely, if this House cannot properly deal with this case there is only one straightforward thing for us to do, and that is to vote that we cannot do so. If we propose to take up much more time of this House and of an important committee in dealing with this case it is surely an acknowledgment that we have a right to take action. Why not come in a straightforward manner to the House, if hon. gentlemen are sincere in their convictions? Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite have the courage of their convictions and vote against the original motion?

Surely it is not fair to the member-elect, if he has a right to his seat, to keep him dangling in the galleries of the House and hanging about the precincts of the building, not only while this debate is going on but while the enquiry is going on before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Last Session we had some experience respecting enquiries before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. They are not decided promptly; they sometimes drag along a whole Session, and even towards the end of the Session, when the report of the committee is brought before us, the leaders of the House think it better not to take action upon it. That is a nice position in which to place the member-elect if he has a right to his seat! If our contention be right, that the majority candidate should be placed in his seat, surely it is also unfair to keep the county out of its proper representation in Parliament. We want this matter settled, we ask the House to decide whether the facts are as we state them or not. We are told by the Minister of Justice, and by the member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), that we are going to do a serious wrong to the member-elect if we take this action, that the law is such that if Mr. King is seated now there is no provision under which Mr. Baird or any elector could file a petition against him and test the merits of the case. The resolution introduced by the member for St. John (Mr. Skinner), makes special provision that all rights of that kind shall be saved and preserved. But, supposing the language of the resolution amounts to nothing; supposing it does not override the statute law which says that an election petition must be filed within thirty days after the gazetting of the return, I would like to know whether this Parliament could not pass a law to put that matter right. If Mr. King is elected and allowed to take his seat and any elector wishes to petition against him, Parliament could pass an Act enabling that to be done. Any wrong that has resulted has been due to the acts of the returning officer, and not due to those of Mr. King or his friends. Therefore there is nothing in that argument. But have no other people rights? What about the rights of Mr. King, the majority candidate? Is there no sympathy for him on the other side of the House? I thought this question was to be approached in a non-partisan spirit. Surely some of the overwhelming sympathy of hon. gentlemen opposite will be felt for Mr. King and those electors who might desire to see the matter properly adjudicated. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) very frankly said a little while ago that to his mind it made very little difference whether the returning officer was right or wrong. I do not think the House will agree with that opinion. The Minister of Justice has not been able to deny that there is an unbroken series of decisions and precedents in the old Parliament of Canada, at any rate up to the time of the passing of the Controverted Elections Act of 1874, which showed that that Parliament never hesitated to take direct action in the line proposed to-day, to seat the majority candidate, and let the minority candidate claim his seat according to law. Hon. members are aware that this was invariably done—in the Oxford, Kent, Beauharnois, and Bagot cases, in the Lennox and Addington case before 1872, and then in the Muskoka case in 1873. How does the Minister of Justice get over those precedents? He is a lawyer and would naturally follow precedents unless he could give some reason why they should not be followed. And what was his reason? It was simply this: that in 1874 Parliament passed the Act for the trial of controverted elections by the courts. That is true, and the hon. gentleman claimed that such being the case Parliament had no jurisdiction any longer even on a question of this kind. Hon. gentlemen who are lawyers from other Provinces are naturally not familiar with the state of the law in the old Province of Canada before 1874. But, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) pointed out, there was a court from 1852 for the trial of election petitions.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask whether that Act contained clause 68 of the Act of 1874?

Mr. EDGAR. I will point out to the hon. gentleman some of the provisions of that Act. In the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, chap. 7, it is there provided—it is an Act respecting Controverted Parliamentary Elections—that “Every petition presented to the Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly of this Province within the time hereinbefore limited for that purpose with respect to such provisions and complaining of an undue election or return of a member to this House, or complaining that no return has been made, or complaining of special matters contained in any such return”——

Thus covering all the ground the other Act covers,— —“shall be deemed an election petition.”

Then by section 53 of that Act it is provided that “All election petitions received by either House shall be referred by the House to the general committee on elections for the purpose of choosing select committees as hereinbefore provided for the trial of such petitions.”

We see, therefore, that in the old Parliament of Canada there was a court with all its machinery provided for the trial of controverted elections just as is the case now, and that fact did not prevent Parliament, when a case was brought before it, as a matter of privilege, from exercising its inherent prerogative to control its officers—and the returning officers are officers of Parliament—and make them do their duty, as we are asking that this returning officer shall be made to do his duty. The precedents all go to show that Parliament did this while at the same time there was an election court, just as formal and just as regularly constituted, and even more formally in many respects, than the present courts for the trial of controverted elections. So that the Minister of Justice will have to revise the whole of his argument on that point, because the precedents which he has tried to set aside must be brought in and held to apply to this case. But let us look at the case itself. What happened? What have we before us? The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) said he did not care much whether the returning officer was right or wrong. I do not think this House will take that view of the case. Let us try and have a little common sense, and look at the simple facts of the case that are before us. There is no single fact required for the decision of this case that is not on the Table of this House, and printed in our Votes and Proceedings. There is not a single point of law that is required to be looked into to decide what we shall do. Even the two hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken to night do not say that there is any point of law necessary to decide what we shall do, because they say we should have nothing to do with it at all. Well, if they have sufficient information to enable them to come to that conclusion, let us see if the House has not sufficient information to enable it to decide upon the case. The papers show, in the report of the returning officer, on page 16 of our Votes and Proceedings, that a nomination was held. We find, also, in the same report that a poll was held and that voting took place, and then we find that he held a meeting for the summing up of the votes, and that he declared the minority candidate elected. There is no doubt about that. Then we go farther, and in the later return brought down last Monday, and printed at page 77, we find the actual result of this summing up in figures. We find that Mr. King polled 1,191 votes, that Mr. Baird polled 1,130 votes, and that Mr. King had a majority of 61 votes. That is all before us; we do not want a Committee on Privileges and Elections to tell us that. Let us apply common sense to the Act of Parliament. Section 59 of the Act of 1874, which has already been quoted, simply says that on summing up the candidate having the majority of the votes shall then be declared elected. How can we get over that? How can the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if they sat for ten years, make anything clearer than that? There was no possible alternative for the returning officer; there was nothing else he could do, after the polling and summing up of the votes, than declare the majority candidate elected, without an absolute and complete breach of his simplest and plainest duty. And if an officer of this House commits a breach of a simple and plain duty, more especially when it is connected with the privileges of members of this House, surely it cannot at this time of day be said that we ought not to interfere. From the argument which the last speaker addressed to the House, I think I can see how it was that the returning officer erroneously—to use a mild term—thought he had to make a report to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. He should not have done so. Section 59 says that he should have returned the candidate elected, and that is all. But I see by the Act that section 23 does refer to a report, and no doubt the simple returning officer thought, or was advised, that he would be complying with the Act if he made a report. Section 23 says that he shall “accompany his own return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, with a report of his proceedings, or of any nomination proposed and rejected for non-compliance with the Act.” He no doubt acted under that section, but that only relates to acclamation returns. Section 23 is among the sections of the Act which refer to the nominations of candidates, and up to that time the word poll or voting is not mentioned. It is not until the 24th section, the one which comes after that, that any reference, directly or indirectly, is made to having a poll; and he has gone to that section, which he would have had to act under, if at the time of nomination he had declared the result of that nomination in the shape of an election by acclamation. In that case only was he required to give these particulars. That is why we have happened to get that report. It was incomprehensible to me at first, but it is evident that, instead of the return he was commanded to make after the poll, he has made this report. Now, the case is in a nutshell; that is really the whole of it; it is all before us; there is no law, no facts, in dispute one way or the other. The case is infinitely clearer than the Muskoka case, the last case of the kind that was decided in this Parliament; and in that case the hon. leader of the Government himself admitted, apparently with some hesitation from the report of the debate, that it was a case which should properly be dealt with by this House, without referring it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and it was so dealt with. In that case the returns showed that there were poll-books lost; that there were people acting as poll clerks who were not sworn, and that there were a number of irregularities shown on the face of the return. And yet the House unanimously decided to put Mr. Cockburn in his seat in this House because, and only because, it was apparent from the papers on the Table of the House that he had the majority of votes, and it was not suggested in that case that it should be referred to any Committee on Privileges and Elections. Now, what are the returning officers' duties on nomination day? The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) has rather elaborately gone into that question. I will look into it as briefly as possible and see what I understand by the directions of that statute, and I think all the hon. members of this House who have had occasion in their own cases to consider the proceedings with regard to nominations and electors will follow me and understand it. He is to decide, simply I suppose in a judicial capacity, whether more candidates than are required to be elected are nominated. That is all he has to decide on nomination day. Then he either returns by acclamation under section 22 or he grants a poll under section 24. If he returns by acclamation under section 22 then he makes the report which this returning officer has thought proper to make here. But if he once acts under section 24 he has made a step; he grants a poll, and having made that step there is no power in the Act which enables him to retrace that step. He has taken a proceeding which he cannot retrace. He might as well make another return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery; he might as well indeed keep on making returns for a year. It is true there is no provision in the law which says that he shall not make more than one return—no provision which says that after going to the poll he shall not go back and declare a man elected by acclamation. Such a case is so absurd that the law does not deal with such a possibility. Having granted the poll, as was done in this case, and moreover, having actually held the election and polled the votes, his entire duties and functions as to nomination proceedings were discharged. He was absolutely functus officio. When granting a poll it is for the returning officer to decide what candidates are nominated, and he puts their names on the ballot papers. The Act then says that any votes given at the election for any other candidate than those so nominated shall be null and void. That is to provide for cases where the returning officer finds votes on the ballot papers for persons other than those put there by him as properly nominated. Now, I am afraid that this returning officer has had it running in his mind that that provision gives him some sort of discretionary power, when summing up the votes, to go into the whole question of the nomination again, and decide judicially whether a certain nomination has been proper or not. In order to show how little discretion is allowed to a returning officer to interfere, I will call the attention of the House to the South Renfrew case, which has been referred to by the hon. member for Pictou. It is reported in Hodgkin's Election Cases, page 705. In that case it was held by Chief Justice Wilson that the returning officer at the nomination has so little discretionary power that he cannot refuse a nomination paper which is signed by only 24 qualified electors instead of 25. The returning officer in that case did so, and he returned by acclamation the other candidate, Mr. McDougall, whose nomination paper appeared unobjectionable. A petition was filed by Mr. Bannerman, the unsuccessful candidate, whose nomination paper had been refused. The Chief Justice said the returning officer should have gone on and held his poll, and cited section 80 of the Act, which provides that no technicality shall affect the result of the election. And it was held by the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, that even such a glaring mistake in the nomination paper did not justify the returning officer in interfering with the ordinary course of the election. If he had any right to interfere, it was, as in the Renfrew case, before he granted the poll. But in the case before the House to-day, for a mere technicality, the returning officer, after he had granted the poll, chose to reverse the decision of the whole majority of the electors of the county. Now, I do not want to argue, more than I can help, the merits of the wretched technicality which the returning officer clings to as his excuse for violating the simple words of the statute, but as the hon. gentleman who has preceded me has gone into that matter a little, I will follow him. What were the merits of the returning officer's decision? He says in his report, which he wrongfully sent in:

“T. Medley Wetmore handed me the nomination papers of George G. King, of Chipman, Queen's Co., N.B., merchant, accompanied by the sum of $200. On my calling the attention of Mr. Wetmore to the fact that no election agent had been appointed by Mr. King, I was handed the appointment of John McLeas McLean as election agent for Mr. King. At two o'clock I granted a poll and announced the names of the candidates, notices of poll being granted and the names of candidates were then posted throughout the county.”

That was on the 15th of February. The election was held on the 22nd of February. On the 5th of March, the returning officer in his report says:

“I summed up the votes given for each candidate.”

That should have ended the matter, but it did not. Well, what was the objection taken? It was this:

"That the deposit made with Mr. King's nomination paper had not been legally made, since it was not made by his election agent."

The returning officer sustained that objection, declared all Mr. King's votes void and null, and returned Mr. Baird elected, stating in his report that no other candidate had been properly nominated. The nomination papers were admittedly all right. The consent of the candidate was put in, the money was paid to the returning officer accompanying the nomination paper, the returning officer accepted this deposit and acted upon it on the very day it was paid by granting a poll, and no objection was raised until the 5th of March, long after the polling had taken place. The law of course says the deposit should be paid to the returning officer; it does not say by whom in any of the provisions relating to the nomination proceedings. The words "agent" or "election agent" are not mentioned in any one of the sections relating to the nomination of candidates. Those sections are from the 19th to the 22nd section of the Act of 1874. Election agents are not referred to until section 121, at the end of the Act. I contend that the law is literally and fully complied with when, in the words of the Act, the sum of $200 is deposited in the hands of the returning officer at the time the nomination paper shall be filed. As a matter of fact, when we come to read anything in the Act about the agent or the election agent, we find that the law does not require him to be appointed until nomination day, and he need not even be appointed on nomination day. The law provides that the nomination paper and the deposit with it may be filed at any time after the proclamation. Is it reasonable for the returning officer to claim that the agent should make that deposit with him when the agent need not be appointed for days after the deposit may have been made? Again, the nomination, we know, may, under the provisions of the Act, proceed legally and validly, if the candidate is away from the Dominion altogether. He need not be here when the nomination is made, and need not give his consent in writing; and if the nomination is made during his absence, it is so stated in the nomination paper. It would be impossible for a candidate, under the provisions of the Act, who was absent—as, for instance, in the case of the opponent of the First Minister in Kingston—to be nominated, if on nomination day, when the deposit had to be made, it had to be made by his election agent. That election agent may not then be appointed. No absent candidate should be made ineligible through such a strained and forced interpretation of the law. I can see now from the argument of the hon. member for Picton what I had before supposed, that this returning officer had got into his head that among the provisions as to election expenses in the Act, he could find some excuse for the requirement that this deposit must be made with him by the agent. Section 121 of the Act, under the heading of election expenses, provides: "No payment (except in respect of the personal expenses of a candidate), and no advance, loan or deposit, shall be made, except through the election agent." That appears to be the ground upon which the returning officer undertakes to give a decision he has no authority to give. But surely this deposit must be some loan, deposit or advance in connection with election expenditure. Can any one contend that the deposit of $200 handed in with the nomination paper on nomination day can be held to be part of election expenses covered by this section? Why, it is paid back. Every hon. member in the House, and most of the candidates out of the House, have received their $200 back, and how can that amount therefore be included in election expenses? Later on we are told that these agents must include all their election expenses in certain particulars filed with the public officer. I would like to ask how many members of this House have included the $200 deposit made with the returning officer on nomination day in their election expenses? Not one. That has nothing to do with the election expenses. It has been useful to them to get it back to meet election expenses, but it was not election expenses, and therefore the idea that the provisions in this Act with reference to agents paying election expenses should have any connection with the deposit made on nomination day, under the nomination section in the beginning of the Act, seems perfectly frivolous and absurd. What are election agents appointed for? Do we not know why they were appointed in England? They are appointed to guard against corrupt practices, as far as the law can. If we are required to know what election agents are appointed for, we have it laid down in a recent case by an English judge. Referring to the English Act, the Act of 1883, in which these very words, with reference to election agents, were used, for we find it there provided that no payments, advances or deposit shall be made except through election agents, Mr. Justice Field, in the Barrow-in-Furness case, 4 O'Malley and Harcastle, page 82, says:

Mr. EDGAR.

"If I understand the Act rightly, the object is that a person shall be the election agent who shall be responsible for all the acts done in directing the election. No contract is to be made but by him, because he is a known responsible man who can be dealt with afterwards and looked to afterwards for an explanation of his conduct in the management of the election."

Can any explanation be ever asked from the candidate as to any corrupt or illegal design he may have in depositing the $200 with the returning officer? Can any such explanation be asked of an election agent? It is absurd. Therefore, the election agents, neither by the terms of the Act nor by the whole scope of the Act, can have anything to do with making this deposit to the returning officer. They may, as they very often do, make it for the sake of convenience, but they may not, and, as hon. gentlemen know very well, they have not done so in many of their own cases, and a large proportion of the members of this House have the same defect as Mr. King in this respect. The returning officer, I contend, has violated the Act in the first place, in assuming these judicial functions. His duty was otherwise than to have interfered in this matter at all. The evidence is now before the House that he committed this breach of duty, and I hope this House will, as the hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me have said, try and look at it in a judicial spirit; because it is creating an important precedent, and I am sure that the majority of the members of this House and the majority of the electors of this country do not want these election matters conducted in a spirit of hair-splitting and under the direction of a committee of lawyers, whose tendency—and I am a lawyer myself—is to be more technical than laymen, and I do think that this House should not be anxious, when a simple matter that they can all understand just as well as any lawyer, comes before them as this has been done for their consideration, to delay justice and to continue wrong any longer by sending it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because, if Mr. Baird is right, it will be continuing a wrong against him to delay a settlement of the question, and if Mr. King is right, it will be continuing a still greater wrong against him, and against the electors, by delaying the settlement of the question as it is proposed to do by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. LANDRY. In speaking upon this question, one cannot forget that perhaps the popular side of the question would be that of speaking on behalf of the candidate who received the larger number of votes. In speaking of the popular side, I do not mean to apply that expression in regard to members of this House, but I mean it in regard to the people in the country generally. But, while that may be admitted, yet upon this question the very people with whom it might be popular, just on the broad proposition as to who should be returned, the one receiving the majority or the one receiving the minority of votes, to sympathise with the one who had the majority of votes, yet, when they come to understand the situation as it is, a great deal of the popularity must be taken away from that side of the question. In the observations I shall make to you, I do not pretend to say that I myself have arrived at a positive or definite conclusion in my opinions as to whether the returning officer was right or wrong in his decision, but I will endeavor to show, and I hope to be able to show, that there is stronger ground for the decision that he gave than seems to be admitted by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. This I will undertake to assert, that the returning officer, in deciding in the way in which he did, in making the return he did make, did it bond fide and believing that he was discharging his duty to the best of his knowledge and ability, under the laws of the country and under the election laws as they existed. I believe that sincerely. I believe that he did it after thorough consideration of the subject himself, after receiving such advice as he had confidence in, and that he then decided to the best of his judgment and ability and not through any partisan spirit. If that be the case, it seems to me that it is entirely unjust to pass upon the returning officer the condemnation that I have heard passed upon him outside of this House, and I think also inside of this House when the matter was first broached, although I must admit that this evening the discussion has been quite free from anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman who has preceded me has endeavored to show that the argument of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) was entirely void of foundation, when he spoke of the law requiring the deposit to be made by the agent appointed by the candidate; and he cited the statutes to that end, and seemed to have convinced himself, whether he convinced the rest of the House or not, that what he had affirmed as to the argument of the hon. member for Pictou was correct. I say there is a great deal to justify the conclusion that this deposit was intended to have been made by the agent of the candidate, and that it was intended, in order that the nomination might be valid, that it should be so made by him. Before going any further, I will refer to the law as I interpret it, not that I have made up my mind whether it is right or wrong, but to show in regard to this question that there is a great deal of foundation for strong argument on the side to which the returning officer has inclined and on which he has given his decision. The hon. gentleman has told us that in the law referring directly to the nomination of candidates there is no reference whatever to the person by whom the deposit shall be made, that the agent himself is not mentioned, and that he is mentioned only in some subsequent sections of the law, and has no connection with this. The hon. gentleman may be correct as to the sections of the law in which the agent is named, but, while that may be true, I do not think he can lose sight of section 121 of chapter 9 of 37 Vic, which I think was in existence at the time the elections were had, because I think it was before the Revised Statutes were in force, and I think the sections are the same, though they are not numbered the same. It reads:

"No payment (except in respect of the personal expenses of a candidate), and no advance, loan or deposit shall be made by or on behalf of any candidate at any election."

I ask hon. gentlemen who wish to consider this subject and the law which bears upon it, to ask themselves what was meant by the word "deposit." To what did that refer? I do not think my hon. friend, with all his legal knowledge and ability, attempted to show what the word "deposit" meant. I think he left the House in the dark as to what he thought it meant. We find the word "deposit" in the Act before, and we find that it has but one meaning, the deposit which is to accompany the papers when the candidate is nominated. It refers to that and to that only. So, when we find the same word in the same Act, it is a natural deduction that it refers to the same deposit, unless it refers to something else so clearly that we cannot be mistaken. I ask the hon. gentleman and those who agree with him to tell the House what that word "deposit" is really there for, that no one shall make this deposit except it be the authorised agent of the candidate. If they can convince me that it is not that deposit required with the nomination papers, then I admit that one of the grounds on which the returning officer made his decision would be taken away from him. But are there any other grounds to show that what was meant was the same deposit which is made with the papers? I say there are, and I think I can point to them to show that these reasons apply to this section as well as to the preceding one. The hon. gentleman told us that this referred particularly to election expenses, that it must have some particular meaning in relation to election expenses, and that it never meant anything else. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the Act of 1874, because we have to refer to this Act to see the meaning of the word "deposit," and I will read section 19 of that Act, in which the hon. gentleman will find this language. After it refers to the deposit, which then was only $50 and has been since changed to $200, it uses this language:

"The sum so paid shall be applied by the returning officer towards the payment of election expenses."

So we find that precisely the same language "election expenses" is used, as is used in section 121 of the same Act. Therefore if it be used there as election expenses it is not, it seems to me, straining the meaning of it when we read the two sections together and say that they have, or may have, the same meaning. It is true that that part of that section was repealed in 1882.

Mr. EDGAR. Did my hon. friend ever know of any body putting that $200 in his election expenses under the Act?

Mr. LANDRY. I do not know that I ever heard of anybody doing that, but I think that somebody may reasonably put it in his expenses. Under the Statute of 1874, before that portion was repealed in 1882; and those to-day who do not get half of the number of votes polled by their opponent, I think could reasonably put it in as election expenses. Of course they get it back again under the law as it exists to-day; if they poll more than half the votes of successful candidates they get back the $200, in which case it does not go towards the election expenses; but in case they do not poll more than half the votes they forfeit the $200 which then goes towards election expenses, just the same as from 1874 to 1882 the $50 went towards the election expenses, no matter what number of votes the candidate received. Therefore when my hon. friend seemed to treat as trivial the argument used by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) on this question of the deposits, it appears to me that he did not grasp the idea that the hon. member for Pictou put forward so clearly and so well. Now, Sir, as to the duty of the returning officer. My hon. friend would wish to say that if he had made any decision at all, a decision that should have had any weight, he should have made it on nomination day. Well, to some extent, I agree with the hon. gentleman. I think for all parties concerned, it would appear more reasonable and it would have been less subject to objections and to attack if, on nomination day, the objection had been taken, and then and there the returning officer, when two o'clock had arrived, had decided there was but one candidate, that the other had not been nominated properly, in consequence of this defect, and had declared the only one nominated to be elected by acclamation. I think that course would, no doubt, have obviated very many of the difficulties that have arisen since. But we are not called upon to question that, I do not think we are called upon to discuss that now, because the returning officer not having done so, left the matter go to the polls. Now, Sir, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, if he could have done so on nomination day, if it had been legal and had given a proper interpretation of the statute, to have decided that Mr. King was not properly in nomination before him because the deposit had not been made by the proper agent, would his failure to do so, because the question did not arise then, make Mr. King a legally nominated candidate? If Mr. King on nomination day at two o'clock was not properly in nomination, was not legally a candidate under the law, would the fact of no question being asked, no decision having been asked for, or arrived at by the returning officer, make Mr. King's nomination valid one day or two days or a week afterwards. I am very doubtful about it. There is no doubt irregularities can be cured by no objections being taken and new proceedings being had. But these might be simple irregularities or technical objections that would not be as strong as what actually occurred. Here is a statutory provision that must be followed to the letter in order to make the nomination valid, and if this was not followed, if one important particular is left out and the nomination is not legal on nomination day, no action on the part of the returning officer on that day or subsequently can make that nomination legal. The fact of the question not having been raised on nomination day, goes to show the bonâ fide of his decision, the sincerity of his decision. The irregularity was not brought to his attention, and not having been brought to his attention, he might not have had the law at his fingers' ends, and therefore this may not have occurred to him at all, and he granted the ballot in the usual way. If, on nomination day, however, the question had arisen, and he had given his decision differently to what he gave it on declaration day, then his motives might have been questioned but the question was not raised on nomination at all; he was not asked to decide.

Mr. AMYOT. He raised it himself.

Mr. LANDRY. Not as to the deposit.

Mr. AMYOT. There was no agent appointed.

Mr. LANDRY. I must have misinterpreted the returns, if my hon. friend is right. He says that he raised the question himself. What interest had the returning officer to raise the question on that day, that there was no agent appointed, beyond his desire to see regularity in the proceedings? But he did not raise the question of deposit. He said there was no agent, and I did not understand the returning officer to say that he told Mr. King that in consequence the deposit was not valid. Therefore I say that the point as to whether the deposit was valid, not having been raised, he having given no decision upon it—unless the fact of his holding the deposit be taken as a decision—it shows that he acted in bonâ fides.

Mr. MILLS. He gave a receipt.

Mr. LANDRY. He gave a receipt for the deposit, it is true, but no question was asked him, and he was not there as a judge. If he were the proper tribunal to decide it, he was not, as a judge, called upon to give that decision. The parties were represented there. One was represented by an attorney and the other by an agent; the parties were there themselves, and that question was not raised, and he was not called upon to give a decision himself, he was not called upon to look after the technicalities that might arise and give a judicial decision on that point, with the question being raised for his decision. But it came before him on declaration day, and for the first time—at that time, I think, as a judge, as an officer on whom the duty devolved to give a decision. I think that was the time for him to have given a decision, and it may have been much more convenient for him to have done so on nomination day had he been asked to do so. I think he was prepared to give his decision on declaration day, when the question was put as to whether the gentleman was properly nominated, and he gave it to the best of his judgment under the law, and he considered that Mr. King was not properly nominated, and consequently there was only one candidate in the field, and he returned him by acclamation. Well, it appears to me that the difficulties are all in a nutshell as the case stands. He did not give his decision on nomination day, because he was not asked to do so; because the point was not raised; because no party interested had taken the point before him, and therefore the matter went on until declaration, and then he gave his decision and gave it according to his interpretation of the law, and according to the way it is interpreted by very many people who have looked into it. For I do not say myself, I am not prepared to say what course I would have taken upon that question; I am not prepared to say whether he was wrong, but I do say that there was a great deal to contend for on the side he has taken. Well, if that be the case, where is the proper tribunal to decide this as it now stands? If there be a point in this case, if there be something to argue upon at all, where is the proper tribunal to decide this point to-day, and to say whether he was right or wrong? I do not think we are. The hon. gentleman who has preceded me has laid great stress upon the fact that many cases had been decided by Parliament and by legislators almost similar to this. He laid great stress upon the fact that under an Act, I think he said, not of this Parliament, but of the Parliament of Canada as it existed before Confederation, there was a tribunal to try these election petitions, and that the House had taken cognisance of cases similar to this, notwithstanding this tribunal. But, Sir, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman had forgotten, or I am much mistaken in what that law contains; no doubt he is much more familiar with it than I would be, because I have not studied closely the Acts of the Parliament of Canada previous to Confederation—but I think he will search a long time before he will find in that Act a provision similar to the one in our statute concerning controverted elections, and it is this: section 63 of chap. 10, Controverted Elections Act, reads thus:

Now, if there were no such section in the law, then I could easily see why, although the law pointed out and authorised such a tribunal to hear such petitions, that did not deprive Parliament of the authority it possessed to consider those matters and decide them. But when we have a provision in the law so explicit as exists in this provision, it should make us pause at any rate before we take the case into our own hands instead of sending it to the proper tribunal; that is, the tribunal in accordance with the Controverted Elections Act. We have that Act to-day. The election for the local district of Queen's county is controverted. If this Act means anything, the election ought to be questioned and controverted under and subject to the provisions of this Act; that is before the proper tribunal and not before this Parliament. And it seems to me there are very strong grounds, when we have a competent tribunal with proper authority and jurisdiction before which to try these cases, for holding the opinion, that they should not come before Parliament for trial and for decision by a vote. There was much reason before the passing of the Act why Parliament should do so. It was the only tribunal to try such cases, except the tribunal referred to by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, but that tribunal consisted of a committee of the House, and therefore was not so competent to deal with cases as are the election courts as now constituted. At all events, it was evidently thought so by the passing of the Act of 1874, by which we provided for election courts. So we have a legal tribunal which would arrive at a just conclusion between the parties, and it is open to parties who feel aggrieved, to either Mr. King or the gentleman returned to this House, to go before that tribunal in order to have it decided as to which of those two gentlemen is right in this contention, as to whether the returning officer is right or wrong in the return he made. The last paragraph of the motion before the House would go to show that the hon. mover, and the friends who are with him in this matter, must have felt their case to be weak indeed when they inserted these words: "Saving, however, to George F. Baird the right of contesting such election, as provided according to the usage of Parliament and the laws of Canada." Why was this inserted in the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman? It was because he felt that some injustice would be done that gentleman by the action of the House, if by the vote of the House his opponent were given the seat; in fact that an injustice would be done to Mr. Baird unless his rights were guarded by the wording of the resolution itself. But those words would have no effect whatever, for even if they were adopted by the House they could not override the statute law. My opinion is that these words could have no effect whatever either to place Mr. Baird in a better position or in a worse position, and they might as well have been omitted from the motion. If the House was to decide by a vote to seat Mr. King, the rights of Mr. Baird would not be altered by those words, and they might as well have been omitted. The hon. gentleman who preceded me went further to show how strongly he felt that the action he asked the House to take would prejudice the rights of Mr. Baird, by saying that if injury was done an Act could be passed to remedy it. Is it not going too far that we should be invited to commit a grave injury which we may not be able to remedy except by an Act of Parliament? And yet this House is asked to place itself in that false position. The hon. gentleman gave his case away when he mentioned that injury would be done and rights swept away, and that we could pass an Act for the purpose of having those rights restored according to law. But we have the proper tribunal for a trial of these cases, possessing jurisdiction and machinery, and it is open to Mr. King or Mr. Baird; and the question as to whether the returning officer acted rightly or wrongly can be easily determined by that court without any great expense, or at all events the one adjudged wrong will have to bear the greater portion of the cost. While I am prepared to vote for the amendment, I would have been prepared to vote directly against the resolution on account of the view I hold, not as expressing any opinion between the parties, not as expressing the opinion that Mr. King did not get a majority of the votes honestly, for I have no knowledge or evidence in regard to it, but simply to express my disapprobation of the course proposed that, although proper tribunals exist in the country for the trial of such questions, this case should be taken out of the hands of those tribunals and drawn into Parliament for the purpose of having it decided here. Simply as a protest against that course I would have voted against the resolution even if no amendment had been proposed; but as there is an amendment I am prepared to support it, and let the case go before the Committee on Privileges. For the reasons given I shall vote for the amendment, because the case should go before the proper legal tribunal instead of our endeavoring to try it here.

Mr. ELLIS. To a layman it is somewhat puzzling to hear the learned arguments which have been adduced on a matter that is exceedingly simple. When I hear hon. members on both sides of the House, who are lawyers, discussing this question, I cannot but think of the remarks of a very able Englishman who once attempted to study law, but who afterwards became famous in English literature, and whose writings have shed a lustre on our language. After devoting a year in endeavoring to master one of the learned books of the profession he threw it up, declaring that it was a work which weighed four stone, that every sentence in it was inspired by the goddess of dulness, that it was nothing but reflections upon precedents that should be forgotten and of observations upon practices and customs that ought instantly and forever be abolished. It seems to me that, as far as justice is concerned, these remarks would apply to many of the precedents brought forward on the other side of the House. I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) has somewhat misrepresented the member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), in that he made it appear that that hon. member said that this was a case in some way which might go to a legal tribunal, to the courts.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me if he understood that I conveyed the idea to the House that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) had admitted that this particular case was one for a trial. I said, while challenging some of the points he had made, there was one sentence in his speech which I thought was exceedingly correct, and that was, that if there were irregularities in connection with the return, they could be remedied by the legal tribunal. I know the hon. gentleman did not apply it to this case, but I did.

Mr. ELLIS. I will read what the hon. gentleman said. It will be found in the Hansard of 15th April:

"The duty of the returning officer was simply the ministerial, or, to use the language of an eminent judge in England, in a very late case, his duty was the arithmetical calculation of the number of votes, and that is all. Beyond that he had no power, and if any of the proceedings were irregular there is a tribunal provided in the Controverted Elections Act by which returns can be rectified. But I say, without fear of contradiction, no power exists in a returning officer to declare an election invalid or to refuse to count up the votes, or to refuse to declare elected the candidate who had the majority of votes."

Now, I think the hon. gentleman, whatever he may have sought to do, conveyed a different impression by the remarks he made to this House. I desire to say that the Minister of Justice, in presenting the case, seemed to present it as though it were a case as between Mr. Baird and Mr. King. I submit that that is not a proper description of this case. It is a case in which the people are the plaintiffs, and they come to this court asking that justice shall be done. It is not a matter affecting Mr. King, except so far as it affects him as an individual in this land, but it is a case in which the majority of the electors of Queen's are interested. But it appeared to me that the hon. gentleman did not exhibit a great deal of earnestness in the arguments he used. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) in his speech ran in the same line as far as Mr. Baird is concerned. He said that a great injustice would be done to him if the House were to act in the manner proposed, because Mr. Baird would be in a worse position than if the House had not acted. I wish to call his attention to one matter—not with a view of introducing political feeling—but I wish to point out that Mr. Baird finds himself in his present position entirely from his own action, and if any wrong is done him by this House doing right he has himself to blame. I wish also to call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) has not touched the point at all. He has dealt with the section of the Act which provides for a deposit, and which provides that if anybody wrongfully makes a deposit he is liable to a fine or some other punishment. But the whole case is covered by that section of the Act which provides that there shall be a nomination made in a particular manner and that the returning officer shall give a receipt; and it is a matter of fact that such a receipt was given, for the newspapers contained a report of the proceedings, showing that the nomination was regularly made and that the returning officer gave him a receipt declaring that it was made according to law. There is another matter to which I wish to refer. On the day of declaration there was some speeches made at the court house, and Mr. Baird, among others, made a speech and here is the report of what he said :

"He felt that a respectable election had been run, and when it was over he was willing to accept the verdict of the people. Then he went to St. John afterwards; he met Mr. King on the street and congratulated him upon his victory. When asked about a protest he said no. Then he was called upon by the party leaders in St. John. They had asked him to go to Queen's and run the election and he had accepted. He was discharging a duty to the party in doing so. Mr. King, poor fellow, had fought hard, but had not won. Then after the election it was discovered that this error was in the nomination paper and there was one grand rush of the party to his office.

"These party leaders who had raided his office spoke thus to him: 'What kind of a party man are you? You are a part of a political machine, and we call upon you to drop your sentiment and open Queen's county again.' He consented to do so. He had no particular glory to gain for this election, but he was working in the interests of the party. He had tried to persuade them in the matter, but had failed, and they gave a majority for Mr. King.

"And he concluded his speech by declaring that the only hope that remained for the Liberal party was in the Province of Quebec, the majority in which was composed of Rielites."

I mention this, not for the purpose of arousing any political feeling, but because I think it is not the correct position of the leaders of the Conservative party of St. John or anywhere else. As far as I can judge from the public expressions of opinion which have been made on this question, the Conservative party in St. John, and throughout New Brunswick generally, have been surprised, astounded—I might almost say they have been paralysed—at the daring way in which this thing has been done, at this daring attempt to deprive the people of their rights. I do not think the Conservative party will be the gainers, if this course is pursued. I do not think the Conservative party will take the responsibility of sustaining Mr. Baird in his conduct. Moreover, Mr. Carrey, Mr. Baird's legal adviser, came to St. John and was interviewed by a reporter of one of the newspapers, and here is a report of the interview :

"When asked what Dunn had done with the ballots, Mr. Carrey stated that Baird, having been elected by acclamation, there was no ballots. He went on to say that this was the only way to elect Baird, as the revising barrister had disfranchised a great many Conservatives throughout the county, and it would have been impossible to elect Baird without taking advantage of a technicality."

Now on behalf of the revising barrister I feel bound to say that, although he is not a political friend of mine, he is an exceedingly fair and just man, who would not allow his party feelings—or rather his personal feelings, because I do not think he has any party feelings—to influence him to do a wrongful act. I believe the list was a fair one. I make these statements to the House and country because I think Mr. Baird places the Conservative party, by the speech he made on that occasion, in such a position that they will have to assume the great responsibility of saying whether he is right or wrong. It is the easiest and simplest thing in the world for every man to decide on his conscience what is right to do in this matter. It is an easy matter, perhaps even in the simplest case, to get up a large display of legal lore, but you cannot throw dust in the eyes of the people, or prevent them from seeing what is right or what is wrong in a matter of this kind. The Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Pictou, and indeed all who have spoken on that side of the House, admit that this Parliament has reserved to itself rights which enable it to deal with a question of this kind. These hon. gentlemen say that many of these questions should go before the courts for decision. No doubt it is true, but this is one case in which Parliament would be justified, under the powers which it has reserved, in interfering in the interests of public liberty, freedom, fair play and justice, as it is an important case in which all these are concerned.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat thinks it is an easy matter for this Parliament to interfere in the present case. But, Sir, I think this Parliament has denuded itself of the power of interfering in a case of this kind. So far as the question whether the returning officer has the power of deciding whether Mr. Baird or Mr. King is elected is concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that I think the returning officer has no such power. I agree that the position of the returning officer is as described by a member on this side—that he has nothing whatever to do but to make a return. He has no judicial function to discharge; all he has to do is to make a return. But in this case he has made a return. Let us suppose he has made a return in error—that he has subjected himself to the penalty clauses of this Act. What has this House to do? Is this House to take a course which will be contrary to the law as laid down by itself? Is this House—to use a colonialism—to go back upon itself? Is this House, to use the language of a great lawyer and parliamentarian, to drive a coach-and-four through its own Act of Parliament? That is the real question. We might set a precedent here which would be a very serious thing indeed. If this House decides that it can declare whether a man can take his seat here, in regard to the validity of whose election a question has arisen, then, Sir, we may find that when either the party with which I act has a majority here, or when the party opposed—if the day comes, as in the lapse of time it may—has a majority, we may find that this will be a precedent for seating a man here improperly. I will call the attention of the House to the case of Mr. Wilkes. He was elected to the Imperial Parliament. He was obnoxious to the majority in the House and what did the Imperial Parliament do? It unseated Mr. Wilkes although he had a majority. The fact that a person not seated here has according to the returns a majority, has nothing to do with the principle of the case. The question is this—has this House the right, having denuded itself of the power of dealing with such cases, to go and deal with them? When there was before the Imperial Parliament a Bill for taking out of the hands of Parliament the power of dealing with questions of this kind, the Right Hon. Mr. Bouvier, Chairman of Elections Committees for some time, a great parliamentary authority and a man of judicial mind and great force of character, spoke as follows :—

"They should recollect that once having parted with their authority, however much they might impugn the decisions of the judge, they would have no power to remove him."

Sir, this House has parted with its power to deal with a case of this kind; and even if it be the case, as I think is proved by the return, that Mr. Baird's opponent had a majority of the votes, even if it be the case that this returning officer has behaved badly or mistakenly, I think it would be a very improper thing for this House to take any action. I think it would be improper because, above all, political feeling may run high here at the present minute, and it would be unwise and undesirable that either Mr. King or Mr. Baird should be prejudiced by political passion. I look over the names on this committee, and I find that the leader of the Opposition and other distinguished lawyers on both sides of the House are on the committee; and can any man doubt that before such a tribunal, having all the advantages of a deliberative assembly like this, and at the same time the weight and responsibility of a judiciary, a question of this kind would be more properly entertained, more properly discussed, sifted, and decided upon than before this assembly? I happened to have my attention directed to a question of this kind before I took my seat in this honorable House. It happened that the gentleman who opposed me, Mr. Ross, had not resigned his seat in the North-West Council before running. The Act against dual representation did not come into force in the North-West Territories until the 1st of March, so that if he had resigned on the eve of the 1st of March he would probably have been a qualified candidate. But not having resigned by the 1st of March, it was held by the lawyers, at all events, in the Territories, that he was disqualified. Suppose he had got a majority of the votes, what would have been the duty of the returning officer? I may think, as a lawyer, that the duty of the returning officer would be to have returned him as the candidate elected, and allowed me to go into the court, prove that he was not qualified, and demand the seat. According to my view, that would be the proper course. But suppose the returning officer had taken a different view, and said: This man is not qualified; he has been a member of the North-West Council while running and cannot be elected, and I declare his opponent elected, although having the minority of the votes. I, for my part, would be very sorry to have the question decided by this House, and I should never come before this House to have it settled. I should have gone before the proper tribunal appointed by statute, established my case and demanded the seat; and I think it would be a very unwise and improper thing for us to try to mend the mistake that the opponent of Mr. Baird has made in not taking that course. Now, if the House will permit me, I would call the attention of hon. members to the Act, and I will do so very rapidly, because the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) has with great force and cogency dealt with it. In clause 118 it is laid down in the most emphatic manner:

"No advance, loan or deposit, shall be made by or on behalf of any candidate at any election, before or during or after such election, on account of such election, otherwise than through an agent or agents, whose name or names, address or addresses, have been declared in writing to the returning officer, on or before the nomination day, or through an agent or agents to be appointed in his or their place, as herein provided; and any person who makes any such payment, advance, loan or deposit otherwise than through such agent or agents, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

If we turn to section 101, we read again:

"If any returning officer wilfully delays, neglects, or refuses duly to return any person who ought to be returned to serve in House of Commons for any electoral district, such person may, if it has been determined on the hearing of an election petition respecting the election for such electoral district, that such person was entitled to have been returned, sue the returning officer who has so wilfully delayed, neglected or refused duly to make such return of his election, in any court of record in the province in which such electoral is situate, and recover from him a sum of $500."

Now, Sir, if the returning officer did not think he was acting in strict accordance with the first section I have read, could we for one minute believe that he would wilfully lay himself open to this serious penalty? There can be no doubt whatever that he has been acting bonâ fide, in accordance with the best interpretation of the law he could make. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) said that he thought the only thing we could do was to proceed to vote upon the case. But this House, it seems to me, has its own dignity to guard, it has the justice of the case to guard, and—the hon. gentleman who preceded me spoke of the rights of the majority—it has the rights of the majority to guard. It cannot guard its own dignity, it cannot guard the interests of justice and the rights of the majority. It cannot guard the rights of the people unless it proceeds in strict accordance with the law. I have the Act of Parliament that declares the course, by its own solemn act, for any candidate for parliamentary election who feels himself aggrieved, to follow. For this House to set aside that Act, would be to betray its dignity, to betray justice and the rights of the people. It is quite a different matter to refer this subject to the committee. The committee will be able to look carefully into the precedents. It will be prepared to look carefully into the question of principle, on the very ground on which it should be discussed, and it will be able to report to this House the decision it shall come to.

Mr. MILLS. Why should we go to this trouble if the House has denuded itself of its authority, and the matter belongs to the courts? The hon. gentleman has made up his mind. Why refer the matter to a committee?

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman thinks I have made up my mind. I can assure him my mind is in a perfect state of balance, and I am perfectly ready to go into this question in a thoroughly judicial spirit, and if I could convince myself that the proper course was that this House should proceed to decide upon the question, and vote upon the question, and that it had the authority to do so, that it had not stripped itself of the power of doing so, then I should probably be inclined to vote with them.

Mr. MILLS. You would be loaded up the other way.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend is mistaken. One David said that all men were liars, and, of course, that means that another David may be mistaken. The legal aspect of this case has been very fully gone into by the learned Minister of Justice and by my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), and it has been to some extent gone into by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and I will trouble the House no further on this question. But I will certainly vote for the amendment, at the same time strongly expressing my conviction that the proper thing for the aggrieved member, the aggrieved candidate in this case, is to go before the proper tribunal appointed by this House, and if he establishes his claim there, if claim he has, he will get the seat; but if the facts are as reported to us here, if he did not comply with that section which declared that the candidate who makes a deposit in the way this gentleman has, is really not a candidate, the decision of that tribunal would be that Mr. Baird is entitled to his place.

Mr. BARRON. I am well aware of the fact that it is not often wise for a young member to address the House, but as hon. gentlemen know youth is sometimes the season of enthusiasm and advanced age that of wisdom and discretion. This enthusiasm is always ready, as well to applaud a righteous act as to resent injustice, and justifies me tonight in rising on this question, because I think a gross injustice has been perpetrated on the public and on a constituency in not having the gentleman sitting here to represent it who had the majority of votes. It has been stated by several hon. members, and I think that is the general opinion, that there has been too much law on this question. I agree with the opinion that by applying too much law to this case the public mind will seize the idea that it is a question of law altogether and not of justice. I think the public is anxious that the candidate who has the largest number of votes should sit in this House. Although I believe there has been too much law given to us, this House will pardon me if I take up a little of its time in answering some of the views advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), whether knowingly or not, I am not prepared to say, tried to create the opinion that the $200 deposited in some instances became election expenses. Now I controvert that statement. In no case does the $200 ever become the election expenses of the candidate. It does become part of the election expenses, not of the candidate but of the returning officer. This is the section, and I think the hon. member for Kent, if he had dealt fairly with this House, would have read the whole of it:

"The sum so paid and not returned" —

That is in the event of a defeated candidate not getting the moiety of votes, —"as herein provided, shall be applied by the returning officer towards the payment of election expenses," —

The hon. member for Kent went so far but not farther. He should have read through to the end:

—"and an account thereof shall be rendered by him to the Auditor-General of Canada."

Showing, I think, that the $200 in the event of the candidate not getting the moiety of votes, does not go into the election of the candidate, but into the election expenses of the Crown, and the public get the benefit of it. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) referred to this section, and said it must have some importance because there was already a case, involving the construction of this section, going on in the Lower Provinces. Do we not find that there are cases going on all over the Provinces involving the seats of hon. gentlemen in this House. I believe there is a case involving the seat of the member who has the honor of addressing the House now. I do not know for what reason, except that they may desire to challenge my right as the champion baby-kisser in the Province of Ontario. I do not think it is any reason, because there is a case going on involving the construction of that section, that we should attach so much importance to that section. The section has been read two or three times in this debate, but I will read it again with the permission of the House, because I want to refer to one or two considerations in connection with it:

"No payment (except in respect to the personal expenses of a candidate), and no advance, loan or deposit shall be made by or on behalf of any candidate at any election, before or during or after such election on account of such election, otherwise than through an agent or agents."

I think that is the whole pith of this case. It is contended, I believe, that the returning officer in this case had the right to return the minority candidate because the deposit was not made by the authorised agent. I say that, according to the statute, if anyone is to make the deposit, it is the witness to the nomination paper. The statute says, in a preceding clause, that the nomination paper shall be handed in, and it goes on:

"The returning officer shall require the person or one or more of the persons producing or filing any such nomination paper to make oath before them that he or they know that the several persons who have signed such nomination paper are electors duly entitled to vote."

So you see that the person who is to hand in the nomination paper is the witness to the paper itself, and the time at which it is handed in is the time to hand in the deposit. In no case can I find in the statute any reference whatever as to who is to pay in the money, and I think it is straining the law and doing violence to the constituency which Mr. Baird has come from, to say that he is to sit here, instead of the man who has the majority of votes, simply because the deposit was not handed in by the agent. There is this, also, in reference to the matter. That particular section, section 118 of the Revised Statutes, imposes a penalty:

"Any person who makes any such payment, advance, loan or deposit otherwise than through such agent or agents is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Now, you see there is a special penalty attached to the breach of that section, and I take it that no other penalty can be attached to the breach of that section. Several cases have been referred to in this discussion to show that the returning officer had no right, even if the gentleman who received the majority of votes was disqualified, to take cognisance of the matter, and I think the cases cited on this side of the House, and also on the other side, go to show that. I shall not, therefore, refer to them any more. I believe the country at large, apart from the legal aspect of this case, is not in sympathy with the hon. gentlemen opposite when they desire to deprive a gentleman, who has the majority of votes, of his seat in this House. I may refer to the Mail newspaper of the 7th March. It was discussing this case, and also referred to another case affecting the right to sit here of an hon. gentleman whom I am glad to see here. The Mail says:

"In both instances the moral, though there is not much comfort in it for either of the victims, is that none but men with an ordinary amount of common sense should be appointed as deputies. Meanwhile it may be said that the candidates who will accept an election by virtue of the errors of the officials, are not to be envied."

Mr. BARRON.

I think that, if there is one spirit that ought to animate, and does animate, most of the members of this House, it is a spirit of loyalty, and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if, in depriving the gentleman who has the majority of votes in this case of his seat, they are loyal to the people of this country? I do not think they are. I think the first thing necessary in the sentiment of loyalty is to be loyal, not to one individual, but to the people, and I say that we are not truly loyal to the people of this country if we allow a gentleman to sit in this House who has a minority of the votes. I do not understand the argument, Mr. Speaker, that we ought not to take cognisance of this according to the motion which is in your hands, but that it should be referred to a committee of this House. I am not yet familiar with the procedure in this House, but I take it that the committee will report to the House afterwards and that then the House will take cognisance of it. If we cannot take cognisance of it now, how can we take cognisance of it then? I think the country at large will be better satisfied—I know my own constituency will be better satisfied—if we dispose of this case now. I can say for my opponents that, if similar circumstances had arisen in my constituency, the Conservatives there would never have allowed the returning officer to return the minority candidate as in this case. I do that justice to my constituents, and to the Conservatives there, because I know they possess a sense of honor which would prevent their taking such a course as has been followed in this case. I hope and believe that the country at large will not be in sympathy with us on this occasion if we do not vote for the motion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. LANDRY. One word of personal explanation. I am sure the hon. gentleman did not wish to misrepresent me, but he misunderstood me, because I take it to be an accusation against any hon. member to say that he cited one part of a section and left out a portion which would have given a different meaning to it. I did not read the section which he read at all, so he must have misunderstood me. I read this section of the Act of 1874, which says:

"The sum so paid shall be applied by the returning officer to the payment of election expenses."

And that is all there is to it. I know the hon. gentleman did not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the returning officer has anything to do with the payment of the election expenses of the candidate?

Mr. LANDRY. The argument I made was this: I said that under the Act of 1874 there was a provision that the deposit so made shall be applied by the returning officer towards the payment of election expenses.

Mr. MILLS. What election expenses?

Mr. LANDRY. The amount of $50 which was deposited became virtually an election expense of the candidate. The law imposed it upon him. The hon. member may hold a different opinion, but I still maintain that it is a part of the election expenses. The argument I made was that the law imposed upon him a deposit of $50, and that $50 was part of his election expenses. I do not care where it went, it was part of his election expenses, as he paid it in connection with the election and it was not refunded to him.

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to the question of my hon. friend, I would say that I could not for one believe that he had quoted that section, because it was repealed in 1882.

Mr. LANDRY. I said it was repealed in 1882.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches on this subject, to the lengthy and learned arguments. We have been treated to an endless verbosity of words, and I do not think that on either side they have shed much light upon the subject—certainly they have not changed my mind. I think that the conduct of the returning officer for the county of Queens, N.B., was the greatest outrage in connection with elections in Canada that has come to public knowledge for thirty years, and I think this House would only be consulting its own dignity if it summoned that man to the bar of the House and compelled him to correct his return, and to seat the gentleman who received the majority of votes. I am not going into any lengthy legal argument, but I say it is palpable to any man of common sense—and there is a common sense, and a sense of natural justice that will override all these legal quibbles in the minds of the people of this country—it is a matter of common sense that when the returning officer accepted that $200 and allowed that election to go on until the day of declaration and summed up the vote, he should have ignored any petty technicality, if any such existed, and have seated the candidate who received the majority of votes. In our Act of 1874 for the trial of controverted elections it is provided that :

“ All elections held after the passing of this Act shall be subject to the provisions thereof, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance therewith.”

The returning officer was only an executive officer on the day of declaration. He was not acting in a judicial capacity, and when this petty technical objection occurred, if it was an objection, he was out of his function in acting in a judicial capacity on the day of declaration, and the Controverted Elections Act provided how that should have been dealt with. For my part, I do not think this House ought to refer this to a committee. I intend to vote against referring it to a committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. POPE. I congratulate you on the cheers of your Grit friends.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I do not want the cheers of anybody, I want to do what is right. I wish to give you, as I have told you before, a fair and honorable support, and you will get no other from me. I think that it is a disgraceful thing if a minority candidate, by trick or quibble by any lawyers playing upon the mind of a credulous and ignorant returning officer, can obtain and hold a seat in this House, against the will of the majority of his constituents. It is upon this common sense ground, which I shall be able to justify to my constituents, to the people who sent me here, that I intend to vote. I was elected as an independent candidate, not to be dictated to by any man in this House, and I resent any impertinent allusion to my course or my action in this House. It is because I am in accordance with the wishes of my constituents in voting against any conduct of that kind, or any countenance in this House of such conduct on the part of the returning officer, that I shall give the vote I intend to give to-night.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but owing to certain remarks from the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) and from the hon. member sitting before me (Mr. Davin), I feel it my duty to say a few words in answer to their arguments, which to a certain extent contradict what has been said by the hon. the Minister of Justice and by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper). It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question now before us is simple enough to make it unnecessary for us to seek precedents in England or elsewhere, in order to form an opinion on the course followed by the returning officer, and to pronounce with a knowledge of the facts on the duties which this returning officer was bound to perform, and that is the first question which we have to consider. In the first place, how is the nomination of candidates to take place? We have a very positive law on that point, and if we only refer to its provisions we will see that it leaves no room for doubt. In referring to the Revised Statutes, chapter 8, sections 22 and 23, it will be seen that the nomination of a candidate is made by means of a certificate signed by 25 electors, that a deposit in money must be made, and that the returning officer may require from the man who puts in the certificate an oath to the effect that he knows the candidate and the parties who signed the nomination, and that the person so nominated has consented to it, &c. Section 23 does not state that it will be the agent of the candidate who will file the certificate and deposit the money, but in order that a man may be legally nominated it will be sufficient for him to have a certificate signed by 25 electors, and that the sum of $200 will be deposited in the hands of the returning officer, and the receipt given by him will be a sufficient proof of the nomination and of the deposit. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the present case it is just what has been done; therefore, the nomination was perfectly legal. No objection was made, when Mr. King, the candidate, was nominated, the proclamations were posted, a poll was granted, the votation took place regularly, and the votation having taken place, what was the duty of the returning officer? Again we have the statute, which says very clearly, and it seems to me that to any man who sees this thing in the light of justice and not in the light of party spirit, there are no two ways of judging this question. The only thing the returning officer has to do, when the summing up of the votes takes place, is to take the boxes, to open them, to take the returns, to add them up, and to ascertain which candidate has the majority of the votes. He has not even the right to open the envelopes to see the ballot papers, he has no right to refer to what has been done in the past, he is a passive subject and must carry out the letter of the law. He has no judiciary power, and all the law allows him to do is to sum up the votes, and when the votes are added, the sole and only duty he has to perform is to declare elected the candidate who has received the majority of votes. Sub-section 2 of section 60 says, that when the summing up of the votes takes place, the candidate who shall have the majority of the votes, will be proclaimed as elected. The returning officer has no right to say who will be declared as elected, he has no right to choose the candidate; the law is imperative, and all that he has to do, when the votes are added, is to proclaim as elected the one who has the majority of votes; the law says that such a candidate and no one else shall be proclaimed as elected. And to answer at once to an argument and to a precedent which has been quoted, I will say this: Even if, after the summing up of the votes, it should be pretended that the candidate who has the majority of votes is not of age, or is a felon, or an alien, I say that according to the Statutes the returning officer has no discretion to use, and that he must even in that case declare as elected the candidate who had the majority of votes, even if he is a minor, or an alien, or a felon, because the section says that the candidate who has the majority of votes, when the summing up is made by the returning officer, will be the candidate elected and no other. This is the way I look at it, and I believe that the law should not be construed otherwise, because if the power of putting aside one candidate or another is left with the returning officer, I say there will be cases—as it unfortunately happens too often—where a not over-scrupulous returning officer, in order to please his political leaders, will put aside a man who will have been elected, and, as in the present case, will give the seat to a man whom the majority of the electors of the county will have rejected. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a man has been regularly nominated, when the proceedings have been made legally, when no objection has been made at the nomination, when a poll has been granted, when the votes have been cast, the returning officer has no other alternative but to declare elected the candidate who has the majority of votes when the summing up takes place. Now it is stated that the deposit should have been made by the agent and not by the candidate. Well, I think that if that was necessary, there are many hon. members who might have been deprived of their seats by the returning officer, and I myself would be one of them, for it was not my agent who deposited the money. Besides, the law does not require it. The law declares that what is wanted is a presentation paper, signed according to law, and a deposit. It has also been said that the deposit should be made by the agent because it is an election expense and that all such expenses should be paid by the agent only. Well, I believe it is not an election expense, because the deposit is to be remitted to the candidate who has received a certain number of votes, while even if he has received votes enough to save his deposit, his election expenses are not returned to him. Therefore it cannot be said to be an election expense. But even admitting that it should be an electoral expense, it is a personal expense, and the law allows the candidate to pay his personal expenses without the help of an agent. However, I say, this argument cannot hold because it is not even a personal expense, it is no expense at all, except in a certain case, and then it is a penalty, when the candidate is so unfortunate as to not obtain the required number of votes. Therefore this argument cannot hold in face of the law. I say, supposing it to be an election expense, it is not necessary that the agent should make the deposit, because then it would be a personal expense or a penalty, and the candidate can make this deposit himself or make it through his agent. Now it is said that this House has no right whatever to deal with this question, and that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The hon. member who sits before me (Mr. Davin) has said that in this committee we have all the necessary guarantees, that we have the hon. leader of the Opposition, that we have prominent lawyers on both sides. It is true, but I only regret that the hon. member is not himself a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, for we will need his advice, and if the question is left to the House we shall have that advice. Mr. Speaker, does not the Committee on Privileges and Elections form part of this House? Will not the hon. members who will discuss and give their opinion before the committee, come back before the House with their report to have it approved or rejected by the majority of this House? Certainly, they will. Then why should we lose time? Why take this round-about way which is perfectly useless and go before the committee? If there was evidence to be adduced, if there were witnesses whose evidence it was absolutely necessary to hear, if the hon. gentleman who was proclaimed as elected could suffer any wrong because the question was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I would be the first to vote for the amendment, because I want no hon. member in this House to suffer wrongs, no more than I want to suffer them myself. But there is only one simple question at stake, a simple legal question; there is no need of witnesses, for we have already the written testimony of the returning officer, who says that the only reason why he has not proclaimed as elected the candidate who had the majority of votes, is that his deposit was not regularly made. Consequently, we have before us all we need to pronounce with a knowledge of the facts, and all we have to do is to read over the papers which are before the House. Why, then, should we not pronounce immediately? We have only one legal problem to solve, a question which was discussed on both sides of the House, in all manners and from every point of view. What need have we of the Committee on Privileges and Elections for those members of this House who have already expressed their views on this question? I see no other reason than a desire to gain time, to allow the Session to pass and to benefit by the vote of a man who represents the minority of a county, and is so deficient in self-respect as to cling to a seat which he knows does not belong to him. Well, I say that for all these reasons, the House has a right to judge immediately this question upon its merits, being in possession of all the facts of the case, having before it all the documents necessary to discuss with a knowledge of the facts the only legal question which we have to decide. I say it is perfectly useless to refer the question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the House can pronounce on this legal point, because there is no investigation to be made. We have before us all the papers, and the returning officer says in his report that the only reason why he has not declared as elected the candidate who had the majority of the votes, is that his deposit was not made by his agent. Now, I believe, that under the clauses of the Act which I have just quoted, the deposit was perfectly legal, and even if it was not legal, it is too late for the returning officer, on the day of the summing up of the votes, to pronounce and to use such an extraordinary power as he has seen fit to use, and to deprive a county of a man who had the confidence of the people. For all these reasons I shall vote against the amendment, for I consider that we would be losing time uselessly and depriving for a longer time the county of Queen's of the representative who was chosen by the majority of votes. I say we have a right to pronounce and to substitute the member who was regularly elected to the one who sits here illegally without having received the majority of votes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I take some interest in this discussion because it comes near home. I must say in reference to this remark of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), that I most heartily admire the man who is able to sink his party allegiance in the interest of justice and fair play. Twice already in connection with this Franchise Act, I have found that hon. gentleman on the side of justice and fair play, as I have found my hon. friend on my left, the king of the Gatineau (Mr. Wright), with some other hon. gentlemen, one of whom is now in my eye. On the occasion when this iniquitous Franchise Bill was brought in by the Government of the day, it became the duty of hon. members to point out the iniquities which it contained, I had certain suspicions as to the objects of certain provisions of that Bill, and did not hesitate to express my opinion about it. I find now, Sir, that that Bill, in some of its particulars, is now producing the fruits that the hon. gentlemen who proposed it and carried it through this House, contemplated, perhaps—I say perhaps—at the time. Sir, is it to be said in a free Parliament like this, that we who are here by the votes of the majority of the people in our different constituencies, are going to allow iniquities to pass such as this fraud on the part of the returning officer who was appointed by the Government of the day, a man who was the secretary of the Liberal-Conservative Association, and an active partisan in the county of Queen's, N.B.? Shall it be said that we will allow that man deliberately to override the votes of the people, and permit him to return a man to this House who received a minority of the votes? Sir, if we countenance this thing to-day, what may be the effect of it? Are we going to perpetuate the power of these gentlemen on the other side of the House forever? At the next general election—if they remain as long, and I do not believe they will—what will be the effect of it? They will appoint other returning officers of this kind—I hope there will be too much honesty in some of them to consent to it—but we know they have appointed such persons in the past. I have nothing to complain of myself because they appointed the sheriff of the county who acted fairly, and when the Bill was passing I endeavored to get the local officers who had charge in the counties controlling the local elections, appointed to carry on the general elections in the Dominion. If that course had been pursued, and the sheriffs in the several counties of New Brunswick had been appointed, we would have had no transactions like this, where a partisan officer, appointed by the Dominion Government, deliberately returned the man having a minority of votes on a technicality which has no foundation in justice or in facts. Sir, I have looked with some little care over this Act. I find that the law requires that $200 shall be paid—for what?—paid as an assurance of the good faith of the candidate, in order to prevent persons from coming forward merely for the purpose of blocking legitimate and proper candidates who might come forward for these constituencies. That was the sole purpose of the deposit, to show that the man coming forward and being nominated was put in nomination in good faith to receive the votes of the people, and to prevent the blackmailing of bona fide candidates. In this case the money was paid. They claim it was not paid by the legal agent, or by the candidate himself. But he was recognised as the candidate, and the money was accepted by the returning officer, a receipt was given for that money, and Mr. King was sent forth to the country as one of the persons who was soliciting the suffrages of the people, and that fact alone forecloses, in my opinion, the right of any man to come in and say that Mr. King should be kept out of his seat on the alleged technicality. The fact is, that the returning officer recognised Mr. King as a candidate in the county, and the constituents recognised him by giving him a majority of the votes. I hope, by their votes, that the members of this House will see that justice is done to the people of that constituency, and I am encouraged to expect that from the fact that the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), though a strong supporter of the Administration has yet the courage and honesty to come out and declare, no matter what his party proclivities, no matter how strong his fealty to his chief, no matter how strong his partisanship might be, he declined to be party to a fraud, as I declare this to be, on the people of Queen's county. I will not, at this time of the debate, enter into any of the details about this subject, because the House is tired of them, but I rose for the purpose of giving expression to my opinion as to the transaction itself. There are countries, and not very far removed from us, possessing free representative institutions, where, if such a transaction had taken place, the men that perpetrated it and the party—who might be the creature of the Government that retained him in office in defiance of justice, honesty and right, in place of receiving commendation and support—would be treated to a coat of tar and feathers. That is about the fitting remedy for some of those men. I am surprised that the Government of the day should countenance this transaction. I have been disappointed in the Minister of Justice, because he did not come out at once and say that this is a transaction that cannot be justified either by the principles of right and honor—and I doubt if it can be justified by law—and it would have been much more honorable if hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, instead of attempting to defend the corrupt act of a corrupt partisan officer, appointed by themselves, had at once come down and said that Mr. King has received the majority of votes of the electors of the Electoral District of Queen's, N.B., and is entitled to the seat, and the gentleman who occupies it has no right to it, and the House shall at once deal with the case. What is the object of sending it to a committee? Is there a particle of evidence wanting in the papers laid before us? Does not the return show that Mr. King obtained a majority of votes, that he deposited the necessary money, that his name was placed upon the candidates' list, that he was voted for in opposition to the sitting member? Then what else is wanted to enable the House to decide, and why is it sought to send the case to a committee? I will state the reason: The Government want to place a buffer between themselves and public opinion. They want some one on whom to cast the blame, and with a strong majority in this House, and with a majority on the Committee of Privileges and Elections they will be able, if they are able to get a majority on the committee who possess partisanship above their ideas of what is pure, honest and just, to obtain a report that will confirm Mr. Baird in his seat, and the Government will at the same time be relieved of the responsibility. I hope the House will not shoulder the responsibility for the Government. I trust the House will say that here is a case completely proved, that we have a right to deal with it; that there are no matters to enquire into, and that it comes before the House to be dealt with; and, such being the case, there is no reason to send it to a committee. The House should take the responsibility of saying whether Mr. King or Mr. Baird has the majority of votes and is entitled to the seat. That is the simple question. I will not enter into the legal quibbles and technicalities by which hon. gentlemen opposite endeavor to accomplish their purposes and seat a gentleman whom they support, instead of the man whom the people want. It is the duty of the House to deal with the question directly. Let hon. members ask themselves: Has Mr. King a majority of votes? If so, seat him; if not, let Mr. Baird be confirmed in his seat. With these few remarks I have much pleasure in supporting the motion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When I first noticed the question under discussion on the paper it appeared to me that an officer of the Crown had been guilty of gross misconduct. I have learned with a great deal of interest, from the long speeches which some eminent lawyers on both sides of the House have delivered, that the points of law are so fine they have been unable to find them themselves. There are, in truth, no points of law involved in this case, and we have the facts before us contained in the papers laid on the Table. I agree with the hon. gentleman who last spoke, that the returning officer has been guilty of the most outrageous act of misconduct, whether through error or wilfully I am not prepared to say; but that we are in possession of all the facts, all will admit. I am able to say, as a layman, that although I have sat here for a number of years and heard many questions discussed I do not think I have ever heard a subject brought before the attention of members on which there was not at least an opportunity for able lawyers, by using special pleadings, such as we have had examples of to-night, to throw some mist over the question and enable members to have difference of opinion. But the facts are so few and simple in this particular case that any member of the House, any true Canadian, wishing to preserve the dignity, honor and position of this House, or even of the members of Parliament themselves, could entertain but one opinion. With respect to the propriety of sending the case to the Committee on Elections, it is said that the House has no right to deal with it; but I hold that if this House has the right to send it to a committee, it has a right itself to deal with it. Not being a lawyer, I cannot understand the matter in any other way. The opinion will spread among the people on both sides of politics, and extend to the world at large, that members of this Parliament are not able to express an honest and candid opinion when a simple matter arises that the most ordinary mind can understand. It places the members of this House in a most unfortunate position when it is found that partisanship runs so high that a member cannot give an honest expression of opinion on the most simple matter coming before the House. I regret that such is the case, although I was glad to know, after hearing the long speeches of many able lawyers, that there was one legal gentleman who agreed with me in the opinion that long speeches were made for the purpose, not of obtaining a fair and just decision, but of causing confusion, and with all the facts before him he declared that the returning officer had been guilty of the most outrageous conduct, and the first opportunity should be taken by the House to place the matter in a right position.

Mr. LISTER. If the charge made in this resolution had happened one hundred years ago, the individual would have been confined in the Tower by the unanimous consent of both sides of Parliament; while in this progressive age, in this age of great honesty, very little is said about the returning officer, and the contest is reduced to one between two candidates who ran at that election. The conduct of the returning officer was a most scandalous outrage on the rights of the electors of Queen's, and the Minister of Justice and his colleagues in the Government are guilty, as accessories to that crime, by moving the amendment which the Minister has moved to-night. The Secretary of State smiles. I would expect nothing else from him. It must have been gratifying to every gentleman to see the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson), strong supporter as he is of the Government of the day, have the manliness and independence to rise and denounce the efforts of the Government to put a man in a seat in this House who obtained a minority of the votes of the electors of Queen's, N.B. A more dishonorable act it would be difficult to conceive—a more disgraceful act on the part of any man, than to seek to usurp the rights of another and deprive the people of the county of Queen's of their rights, I have never had brought before me since I have been a member of Parliament or otherwise. The speeches of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) were the speeches of special pleaders. The latter gentleman was badly briefed; his brief was an imperfect one, inasmuch as he possessed himself neither of the facts nor the law. The speech of the hon. member for Pictou was something better, but it was a special plea and nothing more. And as far as the speech of the Minister of Justice is concerned, what shall I call it? What ought we to expect from him—the man who appoints the judiciary, the man who, to a certain extent, administers the legal affairs of this country—what shall we say of him being a party to an act so scandalous as this? Sir, we know—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I do not think the hon. gentleman's expressions are parliamentary.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the matter with them? There is nothing wrong with them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am in order. I rise to ask what is wrong with them. I see nothing wrong with the expressions.

Mr. SPEAKER. I say that it is unparliamentary to say that an hon. member of this House—a Minister of the Crown—has been a party to a scandalous or dishonest act.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is so, whether it is in order or not.

Mr. LISTER. I say it is a scandalous act to put a minority candidate in this House. We have had enough election committees. We know what they are. I have had the honor of being a member of this House only four short years, and yet in that short time I have had some experience on election committees. I have seen your so-called election committee unseat an hon. member behind me, who had the majority of votes in a county in Prince Edward Island, and put the man who had the minority of votes in his place in this House, and he held that seat for four long years. The people of Prince Edward Island, when they had the opportunity, told you what they thought of such conduct as that. To tell us that the members of this Committee on Privileges and Elections are going to look at this matter as a judicial body, is to tell us something that our experience teaches us we cannot believe. Sir, the members of the committee have nothing in this case to decide; and, speaking about my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, while the members of that committee reported to this House that he ought to be unseated and the other man take his place, the Chief Justice who has the appointment of the sheriff of the county, who was the returning officer—while this House said that that returning officer had acted rightly—the Chief Justice of Prince Edward Island declared that he had acted scandalously, shamelessly and shamefully. This is the legal result, the legal offspring, of the legislation you brought into the House within the last few years. You repealed the Act that Mr. Mackenzie passed providing that public officials should be returning officers. Why did you do so? Shall I say why? It was because you could not manipulate the public officers, and you appointed your own partisan returning officers from one end of the country to the other—men who would do your dirty work, and they have done it nobly. Here, Sir, a partisan of the most partisan character, the secretary of the Conservative Association of that county, is appointed the returning officer of that county, and he does his work well; he does his work clean. He puts in the minority candidate, and you are bound to keep him here. If you were not, you would resent this insult to the dignity of this House, this invasion of popular rights, because every county in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific is interested in this case. If a man violates the law in one case, it will be violated again, and the House owes it to itself to condemn in unmistakable language the conduct of that man. The Minister of Justice gets up here and admits that Mr. King had the majority of votes; he pleads for the man who has wronged Mr. King—for the man who has usurped his place. Sir, if Mr. King has been wronged, why perpetuate and intensify that wrong by throwing the case before the Privileges and Elections Committee? Why not deal with it at once, as the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) has said, and decide it here, because we can decide it at once, for the simple reason that there is no more evidence to be produced before the committee than we have before us to-day, and that evidence shows that Mr. King has been elected by a majority of sixty-one votes. The people of Queen's have decided who shall be their member, and you, in defiance of the popular wish, say that somebody else shall be the member, and not the man the people elected. If it goes before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when will it get out and what report will they make? I venture to say that if it goes before that committee it will result in seating, in keeping in his seat the man who has received the minority of votes. We will see the case go before that committee. The Government has decided that it must go there, and I suppose there are not sufficient hon. gentlemen on the other side to take an independent stand in the matter, although I know there are a number of them who feel that a great wrong is being done. I fear, Sir, that party fealty, that feeling that they have—that many of us have too much of perhaps—that feeling of fealty and allegiance to the party will force them to do what they know is abhorrent to their better feelings. There is no man sitting here to-night but must feel that the electors of the county of Queen's having decided that Mr. King shall be the member; there is no honorable man here to-night who does not feel in his heart of hearts that we are committing a wrong in keeping him out of the seat to which he was legally elected. I know that it will be doing violence to their feelings to allow the minority candidate to take a seat in the House. It is amazing—it must be amazing to every honorable man—how an hon. gentleman occupying the position he does, would not at the first opportunity say: No, the people of Queen's have not elected me, and I will never degrade myself by taking that seat. What is there to be decided? A paltry contemptible quibble—it is nothing more or less—that the two hundred dollars was not paid by the agent to the returning officer. Now, Sir, if the returning officer was a judicial officer—and I admit that he had quasi-judicial functions—it was his duty at the time the money was paid to have decided that case one way or the other; to have told Mr. King that his deposit was not sufficient, and if he did not do that, then he should have decided that the deposit was sufficient and that the nomination was a proper one. Being a judicial officer and having decided that—because there can be no question that he did decide it—having received the money and given a receipt, having proclaimed these men as candidates and issued the notice, and held the elections, and printed the ballots, he was functus officio; he had no power whatever at a subsequent time to review his action. I am not arguing the question whether the nomination was lawful. I maintain that it was a perfectly regular and lawful nomination, but even if it were not that judicial officer, having exercised the power which the law gave him, it was not in his power subsequently to review that decision. Such being the case, the election took place, and Mr. King received a majority of the votes. The law, then, is perfectly plain and beyond controversy, that the duty of the returning officer was to declare Mr. King duly elected. The language of the Act is imperative; it says that he shall do so. Instead of that he disregarded his plain duty and the plain wording of the statutes, and declared the minority candidate elected. Sir, until this House votes, I cannot believe that the hon. members will do Mr. King a wrong—that they will be a party to an outrage perpetrated on the county of Queen's. I feel that it is the duty of this House at the earliest moment to purge itself of any suspicion of being a party to this wrong. It would be doing Mr. King a great wrong, doing the constituency a greater wrong, and it would be a dangerous act so far as the whole Dominion is concerned. It is all very well to laugh, but it may be your case, or mine, or any other hon. gentleman's at any time; and when questions affecting the dignity of Parliament come before Parliament, I say all hon. gentlemen on both sides should unite and say that the dignity of Parliament shall be upheld, and that no man shall have a seat here who does not hold it by the voice of a majority of the people.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise simply to make two or three observations before the vote is taken on this question. I am glad, for his sake, that the senior member for the city and county of St. John is not present to-night. I remember when he rose to bring this question before the House, he invoked the spirit of impartiality, and he tried, so far as his voice went, to exorcise the spirit of partisanship from the discussion. If he had been here to-night and had witnessed the outburst of partisan feeling which has just been exhibited, he would, I think, come to the conclusion that neither his appeal nor his objurgation had very much effect, and that this House had sadly deteriorated from his ideal of what an impartial tribunal should be. The speaker who has just addressed the House declared that he had heard from this side nothing but special pleading, although he had supposed that the discussion would have been conducted in a calm, judicial way. I ask hon. members who have listened to his fiery and fierce harangue if he occupies the position of a special pleader or the position of a calm, impartial judge bringing to the decision of this question a judicial and fair spirit. If anything was needed to prove that this House is not the place where a question of this kind should be brought for decision, the speech we have just heard, and the two or three speeches preceding it, have been the best proof of that. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is very much opposed to the judicial committee of this House, the Committee on Privileges and Elections; he says that it is not a fair judicial body, and yet what does he propose to do? He proposes to take a body made up of men who have not all of them the legal attainments of that committee. He proposes to take a body of 215 men, of whom he is one, some of whom I suppose, few, I hope, are animated by the same partisan spirit as himself. He proposes this as the judicial body to decide that question, but he is very much against relegating it to the committee of legal gentlemen chosen from amongst the best members of both sides of this House. My own opinion is, and has been from the first, that the courts of this country will take care of the rights of the people of this country, and that the courts of this country are well able to take care of this case. It has been brought here—who brought it? Not the candidate who at present has the seat in this House; it has not come through the courts; it has been brought here by gentlemen who did not dare trust the courts to give a decision upon it. It has been brought by gentlemen belonging to the same party who have over and over again deprecated the bringing of such questions to this body for decision, and who have laid down, and persistently argued from the dictum, that questions like this should be relegated for decision to judicial tribunals. An example of this is not very far distant, afforded by a late lamented member of this House. In 1883 the case of the King's county, P.E.I., election was before this House, and we were trying to decide which of two claimants had a right to the seat. I think it is reported in the Hansard of April, 1883, that Mr. Cameron, of Huron, made a motion on that case in this House, and made a speech in support of that motion. His motion was that inasmuch as this House was not a judicial body, but was partisan in part, and was not well adapted to take up and decide legal questions, therefore the question in dispute should be brought before the Supreme Court, in order that the law should be decided by that court for the guidance of this House.

Mr. MILLS. Did you agree to it?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman had better ask himself if he and his party are consistent to-day with what he and his party voted for in 1883. It is more of the hon. gentleman's concern to keep a little charge of his own consistency than to ask what position we took on that question in the premises. Mr. Cameron said:

"I say there may be something in the view which they hold; it is a question open to argument, and it is the bounden duty of Parliament to obtain the very highest legal adjudication upon it in order that the law may be settled and determined. It may be argued further, and I think with some propriety, that although this Parliament has the power, by virtue of the law of Parliament, to declare that a sitting member that occupies a seat in Parliament is disqualified for personal reasons, such as holding a Government office, being a minor or a lunatic, or something of that kind; but I deny that, although this Parliament has the power to declare as vacant a seat in Parliament, it has not the power to do anything else, to declare that any other person shall occupy the seat. * * * * * The power and jurisdiction of Parliament was never invoked to give a seat to a member whom the returning officer did not declare elected, and the people at the polls did not elect."

And the hon. gentleman opposite will find that not one or two but many of his own party stood at the back of Mr. Cameron and echoed his demand that this question should not be tried here, but that the legal points involved should be put before the Supreme Court in order that the House might have the benefit of the judges' decision. Now, to show the calm judicial spirit which animates hon. gentlemen opposite, they not only plead in a special way, they not only make their fierce and partisan harangues, such as that made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, but they actually passed sentence. They would tar and feather the returning officer; they would put him in a tower and keep him there, and from the many plaudits which came upon the heels of that assertion, it is not simply the hon. member for Lambton who has that fine, calm, judicial spirit, but a large number of hon. gentlemen on that side. These are the men who would be the judges. You heard what the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) said. He bore testimony to the character, the straightforward character of the returning officer. I have never heard anyone speak ill of the returning officer.

Mr. ELLIS. If I said returning officer, I made a mistake. I meant revising officer.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that so far as I know, and I think my knowledge of the question is quite as great as that of most hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Dunn is a man of education and a man of intelligence, a man of good family and good character. I believe that what he did, he did because he conscientiously thought he was doing right; and I think it would be far better for us, unless there is evidence, and strong evidence, to the contrary, not to impugn the motives of the returning officer and thus show we are not in a judicial frame of mind. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) thought that he could not do better service in the interests of justice and of fair and judicial judgment than to read what purported to be a statement made by Mr. Baird at the time of the declaration. May I ask that hon. gentleman from what source those sentiments were obtained? Will he vouch for their being the sentiments of Mr. Baird? Does he not know they were published in a paper inimical to Mr. Baird and the party to which he belongs? Does he not know that they were publicly denied? And will he stand up and vouch for their truth in Parliament?

Mr. ELLIS. I will say this, that they were reported by one of the most competent reporters on the St. John press, and to my knowledge Mr. Baird has never denied them.

Mr. FOSTER. In what paper?

Mr. ELLIS. The Daily Telegraph.

Mr. FOSTER. All who know that paper and have been cognisant of its course for the last two years will require stronger testimony than this to prove anything true that appears in it. It is however an evidence, as I said before, an additional evidence of that fair, calm, judicial temper of the would-be judges in this case, in which the rights of individuals and the people are concerned, that they should take a newspaper report, which has been denied, and which has been made by a paper not noted for its veracity, but for its extreme partisanship, and cite it as evidence. Such things as that hardly comport with the character of judges deciding a case of such importance. The hon. member for the city of St. John said this was a case of the people against Mr. Baird. If it is, why now allow Mr. Baird a chance to be heard? But my hon. friend would come here, and, with his friends, decide the case off-hand. I am not a lawyer, and I am puzzled with reference to this matter. Laymen in this House are not in a position to decide this question. The first question to be asked is: Who is a candidate at an election? He is not every gentleman who puts his name before the people. There is a certain path by which a man comes to be a candidate, and if he does not come to be a candidate through travelling that path, no matter how good a man he may be, he is not a candidate in the eyes of the law. Did the candidate in Queen's county, for whom to-day hon. gentlemen opposite claim the seat, become a candidate in the legal acceptance of the term? Did he travel the path which is laid down by legal enactments? That is the question which lawyers are to decide; not one which we laymen can decide in a spare moment. Another question is: Has the returning officer judicial power? Hon. gentlemen opposite have admitted that he has. There is question as to the limits of these powers, as to when he becomes divested of them. That is a question for lawyers to decide; that is a question for judges to decide, and it is not a question which men, unversed in the law, can decide off-hand. Another question is as to precedents. I have listened to a great many to-night. I do not understand the full drift of them; I do not think any hon. gentleman can, until he studies up the cases himself, until he has ascertained what were the laws upon which these precedents are based, what were the circumstances, and whether these precedents go on all fours with the question before us. That is a question not for laymen unversed in the law to decide, but for legal gentlemen. These cases ought to be left where the wisdom of Parliament justifies their being left, namely, with the courts of the country, and the courts of the country will see that the rights of the people are not infringed upon. This question has been brought before this House in order to give a seat to a person who has not been declared to be returned by the returning officer, and as it is well for this to be decided, it is better it should be decided, after it has been thoroughly sifted by the best legal talent of the House. I will be prepared to vote to refer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where the best legal gentlemen on each side can take up the whole matter, go over the legal question, investigate precedents, and give us the benefit of a calm and judicial consideration of the matter. I have too high an opinion of hon. gentlemen who compose the Privileges and Elections Committee, to think that when they come to discuss this question they will turn themselves into partisans. I believe they will approach the question as fairly as legal minds can, and give us the benefit of their report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no doubt whatever that the hon. gentleman, after carefully weighing the reasons and arguments advanced, has with pain and care made up his mind to consent to the course the Minister of Justice had adopted in advance; and it does him great credit to have been able after all that time to have come to a conclusion. I believe the conclusion which the House will draw and ought to draw, which the country has already drawn from this matter, is the gross impropriety of the Government of the country appointing the returning officers at their will and pleasure. I think that is the lesson to be drawn, and if hon. gentlemen on the other side are desirous of purging this House of the complicity in this outrage, they will take steps forthwith to get rid of this most obnoxious power, and put it in impartial hands—in the hands of the judiciary as is done elsewhere, or in the hands of some more permanent officials having a stake in the country, and who can reasonably expect to be trusted by both parties. What is the leading fact in this case? The hon. gentlemen have asked for precedents. I do not wonder that my hon. friends were unable to find any precedents for such a case. I do not believe that any precedent for such an outrage as this before this House can be found in the annals of any representative body in any quarter of the world, and, if there are no precedents found, it is because no precedent exists for such an act as this. But I want to ask if it is not true, as I have heard it asserted in many quarters, that there are in this House, holding their seats on both sides, a very considerable number of gentlemen in whose case the deposit was not made by their recognised agents, and who, if the ruling of this returning officer were right, have no business to sit here. I am informed—the hon. gentleman can contradict me if I am wrongly informed—that this is the case even in regard to the Premier of the Dominion in connection with his election for the county of Carleton.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a mistake, altogether.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I am very glad to hear it, because it would be a most unprecedented and extraordinary thing if the Premier was sitting here under such circumstances and was trying to deprive my hon. friend Mr. King of his seat on that ground, but, if it be not true in his case, it is true, as I have heard from many quarters, in the case of a number of other gentlemen who are here now. It appears to me to be one of the most pitiful and contemptible quibbles that I have ever heard of. Take these Consolidated Statutes to which my friend called the attention of the House, but to which I will venture to call the attention of the House again, and we will see what is said with respect to these same elections. Here are the words :

"Unless a sum of $200 is deposited in the hands of the returning officer at the time the nomination paper is filed with him, the nomination paper shall not be valid."

And it goes on to say :

"The receipt of the returning officer shall in every case be sufficient evidence of the production of the nomination paper, of the consent of the candidate, and of the payment herein mentioned."

It appears to me that if it be possible for words to have a clear meaning, it is evident that that section was drawn and intended to avoid just such petty mistakes, just such quibbles, and just such evasions as that by virtue of which my friend Mr. King is, I trust, only temporarily unseated. I do not think this is a matter which requires the subtlety of forty legal minds to decide. The facts are as clear as noon-day. Every man here knows that a great wrong has been committed; every man in this House, and every man out of the House, and the public press, to do them justice on both sides—supporters of the hon. gentleman as well as supporters of ours—have admitted that a great outrage has been committed in attempting to seat Mr. Baird in place of Mr. King. Why, they know perfectly well that the returning officer estopped himself, if ever a man was estopped in this world, by his own repeated acts from disputing the correctness of the deposit. Did not the returning officer, according to the papers which have been laid on the Table of this House, proclaim a poll; did he not give notice to all the inhabitants, or to all the electors of the county of Queen's, was not that poll held, and was it not weeks after this irregularity, so called, occurred that the returning officer attempted to go back on his own judgment? I will only say this. I do not believe that a large number of the hon. gentleman's supporters entertain the slightest difference of opinion from that which has been expressed on this side of the House, that a gross wrong has been done to Mr. King, and that the House ought to right it at once; and I do not believe that, if the position had been reversed, if any returning officer in this Dominion had been found, or had been insane enough to attempt to unseat a supporter of the hon. gentleman on this ground or any similar ground, that scarcely twenty-four hours would have elapsed after you, Mr. Speaker, were in the chair before that returning officer would have been brought to the bar of the House and this writ amended; and I do hope, in spite of all that has come and gone, that there will be enough members found in this new Parliament, on this important occasion, when we are called to act for the rights of the people and for our own rights, enough members found even among the hon. gentleman's supporters, to show that they would have done a wise and prudent thing, as well as a generous thing, in consenting to reverse this decision in the manner proposed, and in allowing the man who, according to the evidence which has been laid on our own Table, is unmistakably the choice of the people to take his seat, and allow Mr. Baird to take his remedy in the courts of law. If there be any difficulty, or any supposed difficulty, as has been stated by two or three gentlemen, as to Mr. Baird having the power to contest the seat afterwards, I am sure that both sides will be only too glad to give Mr. Baird that opportunity, if that is all that is standing in the hon. gentleman's way. Then there is another consideration. Who was the returning officer? The hon. Minister who spoke last was good enough to give him a certificate of character. I know nothing about him personally, but I do know that the returning officer who perpetrated this wrong was the last man who should have been placed in that position by any Government. He was the trusted agent of the Government; he was the secretary of the Conservative Association in that county; and no Minister and no Government which had any self-respect should have committed the outrageous indecency of appointing the secretary of the Conservative Association, the chief wire-puller against Mr. King, to a position in which he could sit in judgment on that unfortunate candidate.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria). The gentlemen on the other side of the House have addressed themselves largely to the merits of the case, while the members on this side are contending for a principle which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to forget. I do not know that the rights of Mr. Baird, or the rights of Mr. King, or the rights of the county of Queen's are at stake here, but the question is the rights of the Province of New Brunswick and of the whole Dominion. I do not see the difference between trying to put one candidate in the place of a member elected, upon the ground of his having a larger number of votes, and upon any other ground which would void the election. The hon. gentleman who has last addressed the House says there is no precedent for the return of a candidate having a minority of the votes. In 1875 an election took place in the county of Victoria, which I have the honor to represent, when the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, was in power. That Government passed over the sheriff of the county, who was one of the two officers to be appointed to that position, and offered the position of returning officer to another, who refused. The sheriff of the county was never asked to accept the office, and the excuse the Government gave was that he was engaged in a local election and could not attend to the duties. Since that time, in 1878 and in 1883, the Local elections and the Dominion elections were held simultaneously, and the sheriff performed both duties without any disadvantage and without any protest being made by anyone. The appointment was offered to the registrar of deeds, and for various reasons he refused, the chief reason being that the sheriff had been passed over. A brother-in-law of one of the candidates, who at that time was running in the interests of the Government, was appointed. Now, I think, to any fair-minded person, it would be preferable to appoint a partisan to a judicial position than to have a brother-in-law of one of the candidates presiding over the elections. Well, a petition was presented to this House, the copy of which I hold in my hand. It is signed by sixteen Liberal justices of the peace in that county, and an M. P. supporting the Liberal Administration in the Province of Nova Scotia, and largely in sympathy with the Liberal party in Ottawa. I find the statement of facts contained in these petitions to be that the returning officer refused to count the ballots in one section of the county. The only excuse he gave was that in a box the deputy returning officer had not made a statement of the number of votes. On declaration day this was discovered, and the deputy returning officer was present and handed him a declaration under his hand of the number of votes polled for each candidate, and offered further to attest under oath before the returning officer that the statement was correct. This was rejected, and by throwing out the votes polled in that district, the party who actually was in the minority was returned to this House and sat in this Parliament for one year. Now, I have never yet to this day heard it stated that that returning officer did this to favor one party more than another. I believe that he did it, thinking that he had no right to take any statement which was not contained in the box. That petition was up here complaining of the action of the returning officer, and these facts which I have stated are all contained in the petition. The petition states that all the ballots being counted, the candidate who was not returned, received thirty-six majority over the one returned. Now, I find the leader of the Opposition of to-day who was then a member of the Government, presented this petition, and in presenting it he said that so long as this House had conferred the duty of trying controverted elections upon the courts, he, for one, would not consent that the matter should be investigated before this House. He laid it down as a principle that when an act relating to that returning officer was complained of, the courts should take cognisance of it, and he would never consent that Parliament should have anything to do with it; but if he found that it was a matter over which the courts had no jurisdiction, then he would be willing that this House should investigate it. I have his words here. After reciting the petition and the matter of it, he says :

"But the most of the acts which the returning officer might be charged with would come before the cognisance of the courts, necessarily, and inasmuch as the principal acts here complained of in the conduct of the returning officer were such as properly came before the cognisance of the courts on the trial of an election petition, it did not appear to him that it would be acting in accordance with the spirit of the Act to invite the House to deal with the conduct of the officer in the present state of these proceedings. He would be very sorry to believe that the House had been deprived by the position of the Controverted Election Act of its power over returning officers of its power to investigate complaints made against them, and to punish them for improper conduct, but when Parliament transferred the trial of election petitions to the judges, and expressly provided that the conduct of returning officers might be complained of and they might be made respondents to petitions, Parliament thereby expressed a preference for that mode of investigation or at any rate a petitioner could adopt that course. Under these circumstances he did not think it would be proper to ask the House to enter into an investigation of the conduct of that returning officer pending the election trial. The appointment of the returning officer was a different matter."

He gave as an excuse that the sheriff was otherwise engaged. This was not the fact, because the sheriff was never offered the writ. Then it was offered to the registrar; and for the reason that it was not offered to the sheriff, thinking that no party would be appointed but the sheriff himself, he refused on that ground, and then another party was put in his place. Now, possibly hon. gentlemen may see a difference between this case and the one before us. I cannot see any difference. If the throwing out of one vote affected the result, and returned a party in the minority, I do not see any difference between that and rejecting two hundred votes, so long as the result is the same. I should be sorry indeed that the return of any person should be left in the hands of the House. I, for one, am prepared, had the motion been made, to reject it altogether, and I would have preferred voting upon the question here than to send it to a committee of the House. There is another point which I think has been referred to by hon. members, which is contained in section 63 of the Act of 1874, which is as follows :—

"All elections shall be subject to the provisions of this Act and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance herewith."

I think Mr. Bourinot, in his parliamentary work, lays it down that the House often refused to consider these petitions; and in fact since 1883 it is almost conclusive that in any matter that the court can investigate it is not wise for the House to interfere, and the House has invariably refused to deal with them, particularly when the time had not elapsed within which the petition must be filed. In Mr. Bourinot's work I find, on page 121, that he says :

"In any case it is always regular to receive a petition setting forth a grievance and praying for a remedy, providing that it does not question the return of a member within the meaning of the Controverted Elections Act of 1874."

I would have very much preferred that this House should not have entertained the motion at all.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). After the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member, it is, perhaps, necessary that a layman, about to cast his vote, should give his reasons. I understood the Minister of Marine to say that he was a layman and consequently was unable to judge this question. He wanted to divest himself of any responsibility in the matter. He wanted it to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and afterwards to be referred to the courts. Well, that may be the opinion of his judgment as a layman.

Mr. McDONALD (Victoria).

He sets this value upon his own opinion : that he is incompetent to judge a simple question like that, and far be it from me to say that he is competent. But I would simply point out that the hon. gentleman, being incompetent, as he said, would have manifested a more becoming modesty if he had refrained from saying anything on the subject. People should only speak upon subjects they know something about.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then sit down.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have some light upon it, and for that reason I am found speaking on this occasion, and there are some hon. members opposite who tender that advice to me who do well to retain their seats. But I fancy that it is hardly from a sense of modesty that they do so. I have thought that perhaps a feeling of shame entered into the composition of some of those gentlemen, of shame, perhaps, to defend in the House what they will vote for. Sir, I feel that I can approach this subject in a judicial spirit. We say, too, that we are sitting here as a jury to try this case. When we appeal to the people of the country at a general election, we speak of appealing to the great jury of our countrymen, and a jury of our countrymen said that George G. King should sit in this House, as the representative of Queen's county, N. B., and there is an attempt being made to carry out what has already been done, and to override the verdict of the jury, and to perpetuate what I deem to be an outrage on the rights and liberties of this Parliament. We should, therefore, approach the question in a spirit free from partisanship, though I agree with the member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), although I cannot go his full length, when he said that he would view any man as a hypocrite who would say that he could utterly deprive himself of all party feeling in this matter. I suppose it is an impossibility to forget to which party we belong. But I feel that I am about to give, by my vote, expression to the decision arrived at in my own mind, and whether I am blinded by partisanship or not it will be for the House to judge; but I feel I have arrived at a conclusion that is honest and just, and I have no hesitation in casting my vote in the direction in which my mind is made up. The question is a plain one; it is a question for laymen as it is for the lawyers of this House. And I would say here that there is a feeling abroad in the Province from which I come—I do not know whether it prevails in other Provinces—a feeling, with which I am not in entire accord, but a feeling that prevails with many men, though I believe that legal men are necessary and many of them are ornaments to the House and are indispensable for the conduct of its business—I say there is a feeling stirring many minds that there are too many lawyers in this House, too many legal quibbles made and too many laws framed in their interest. When the speech of the Minister of Justice is read and understood by the country—the Minister of Justice he is called, and in Parliament he is supposed to carry out justice—and also the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), abounding in technicalities, plausibilities and sophistries, endeavoring to defeat what is clearly a just demand under the circumstances of the case, the feeling of the country will be deepened and intensified. No; I think it is a question on which every man, even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, ought to have his opinion, for I think every layman is able to form an opinion on this question, although that Minister said he was unable to do so. If the Minister of Marine is to be consistent with his own statement, what must he do? He must vote against the amendment as well as against the original motion, for he admits that he is not competent to pronounce an opinion; it is not for a pure simple layman like that hon. gentleman to do so. He says we must vote against the proposition and leave the matter to the courts. According to the speeches of the Minister and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), this question must be left to the courts, and not dealt with by the House or by one of its committees. Let it be remembered, however, that we are responsible to our constituents for the votes we are about to give. I am about to cast a vote on this question, and I am responsible to them, and I claim to be able to judge respecting any question brought before Parliament. I shall be able to say this case was this: An election was held in Queen's county; nominations were received by the returning officer; both nominations were received; the necessary deposits were paid in; receipts were given; both names were accepted and were mentioned on bills printed by the returning officer, the name of Mr. King being printed as well as that of Mr. Baird; polls were opened throughout the different portions of the county; voters came and recorded their votes; ballots were returned and it was found that by a majority of 61 the voters of the electoral division declared Mr. King to be the candidate of their choice. That having been done, there was a legal quibble raised as to whether the deposit was paid in by the proper party, although a receipt was given; and this House deprived the candidate possessing a majority of votes, of a seat, while the minority candidate was given the seat. I shall tell my constituents that when the question came up there was a resolution moved to amend the writ by inserting the name of the majority candidate, a proposition that will commend itself to every honest man in the country, to whatever political party he belongs, and I am willing, having done that, to assume the responsibility as a layman to run all the risks of explaining to my constituents that I voted for it, and I am not afraid they will rebuke me for the position I have taken. There are not two sides to this case. There is not any question for argument; justice must be done first. Give the seat to the man elected, and then if the courts have to come into operation, let them do so in the regular manner. But this whole proceeding is discouraging to a lover of this country. All the movements that occurred during the last general elections are enough to make Canadians blush; taking power into the hands of the Government to appoint their own returning officers, coupled with their conduct as it has been revealed by the Franchise, Gerrymander and other Acts, trying to stifle "the free expression of the people's will;" all are discouraging to Canadians who desire in this country, no matter what political differences exist, that we shall recognise the fact that we believe in constitutional government and the right of the majority to rule. It is not for the members on the other side of this House to attack as to partisanship on this occasion. I desire to judge this question in a judicial spirit. I think we are so acting; but there is such a thing as honest indignation, when injustice is attempted to be perpetrated and wrong to be consummated simply because there is a majority in the House of Government followers. Is it too much to hope that those hon. gentlemen opposite who have been guilty of precisely the same irregularities as in the case of Queen's county will hesitate before they pronounce that the majority candidate in Queen's county is to be deprived of his seat, and that they will refuse him justice, while they themselves are suffering under the precisely same disqualification? This applies, I understand, to the two members for the city and to others. Hon. gentlemen opposite will each know for himself whether he is in that position or not. All the facts may not be known for some time, but when they come to light, and it appears that they have been guilty of the same irregularity as is alleged in the present case, and that they nevertheless voted to seat the minority candidate, it will be a sight for the country to behold and a subject for their constituents to consider. I feel somewhat strongly upon this matter. I do not now feel so, simply because a member of the Opposition happens to be involved in the case, although I have a strong personal friendship for the hon. gentleman deprived of his seat. But I am cognisant of the fact that the Government possesses a majority, and that a change of one or two votes is not going to affect it. If I looked at this question purely from a party standpoint, I might consider that it would be an advantage to us for hon. gentlemen opposite in the face of these plain facts presented before us, facts that are incontrovertible and which no amount of legal quibble can remove, to allow them to perpetrate and consummate this outrage against the liberties of the people and leave the country to judge with respect to it. The country had a shock last year, when the First Minister hid himself to East York and standing on a public platform, as I understand from a newspaper report, used the very fact of the physical inability of one of the grandest members of this House, the fact that in the service of his country he had so broken down his health that his once powerful voice could be no longer heard in this Parliament—standing on a public platform he urged that as a reason why the electors in that county should reject Mr. Mackenzie and elect Alfred Boulton. Well, Sir, there are things which transpire in the heat of election conflicts which we may be sorry for afterwards, but it seems to me that, in the case of an hon. gentleman whom Conservative members in common with Reform members, have acknowledged to be one of the most honorable, honest and able men in Canadian public life, it would have been a generous thing—there would have been something of the spirit of chivalry in the act—if the First Minister could have abstained from going there or, if he must go there, abstained at least from urging that gentleman's physical disabilities as a reason for his being rejected in favor of Mr. Alfred Boulton. They talk about maintaining good feeling among our public men; but I ask them to put themselves in the places of the Opposition; let them put themselves in our place with a gerrymander forced upon us which lost us many ridings; let them put themselves in our place when they attempted their very best by an Act of Parliament to legislate men out of this House—sitting there as they do with a majority largely procured in this way; let them put themselves in the place of the Opposition who, weighed down as they were, and without whining accepted the position, and determined that they would rely only on a desire to maintain, as far as they can, the principles they believe are correct, and to urge the carrying out of those principles. We are here for that purpose. We seek no party triumph in this matter, but I rejoice to say that in this case I believe every member of the Liberal party will be found on the side of justice, on the side of the people in their desire to exercise their constitutional right of saying who shall be the member to represent them in this House.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has given us the very best evidence of the necessity for sending this question to some other tribunal than before the members of this House. Hon. gentlemen may convert this debate into levity; they may convert it into a subject of mirth, but I do not think the warmth displayed and the epithets employed by them are any evidence that the members who would judge this case if it were left to the House would judge it otherwise than partially. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has given us another exhibition of what I might almost call the hydrophobic attacks of political rancor which were displayed by him and others in the course of the heated debates over the Franchise Bill; and ever since that time, whenever that name is mentioned, there appears to be something in it which arouses their spirit of antagonism and vindictiveness, and the display of something which is not consistent with a calm, judicial consideration of any question like this. I would ask in the first place for what purpose does this House appoint a Committee on Privileges and Elections at the commencement of every Session? Is it expected when the committee is appointed that anything will come before it? If it is intended that that committee is appointed for any purpose, then I think that such a case as we have before us to-night is one that should be dealt with by that committee. Mr. Bourinot, who is considered a very high authority, mentions that committee as the first committee of the House of Commons, and says that it shall be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters as may be referred to it by the House. But there are other things connected with this case that must be considered before giving a decision. I think we must at least assume that there is honesty in human nature, and remembering that there is provision made for the punishment of those who violate the principles of this law, we must assume if hon. gentlemen are correct, that the returning officer in this case was not only void of common sense and a disposition to do right but that he had not before his eyes any fear of the punishment which is provided for in the case of his committing a wrong. In the first place he takes an oath that he will do his duty, that he will act faithfully in that capacity, without partiality, without fear, favor or affection. Now if he violates that oath, as hon. gentlemen have assumed that he has, if he violates it wilfully he in the first place perjures himself, and in the next place he gives evidence that he is so sunk in dishonesty and vice that he is not fit to be recognised in respectable society. Now, we have not heard it claimed that he is such a character. We have not heard it claimed by any hon. gentlemen opposite that he is not a respectable man, a man who is honest in his intentions. If we assume that he is honest in his intentions and has taken that oath and believes that he has faithfully carried it out, then we have the right to assume that this is only a case of want of co-ordination in the interpretation of the law—he interpreting it in one way while others give it a different interpretation. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that this was only another evidence of what we might expect by the appointment of returning officers who were not sheriffs or registrars—in diverging from the former method of appointing sheriffs and registrars to act as returning officers. The hon. gentleman forgets that only last Parliament we dealt with a case where a sheriff was a returning officer and returned both candidates, and for so doing was dismissed from his office for the very act which they said would not have occurred in this case had this returning officer been a sheriff or registrar. If I am correctly informed the returning officer was not a lawyer but a layman. Now, what interpretation did he put on the clause which says that no payment shall be made—no advance, loan or deposit on behalf of any candidate before or during or after the election, on account of such election, except by the election agent. Now, if he interpreted the law as a layman to mean that this deposit which was made on behalf of the candidate must be made by the election agent, although he overlooked that fact at first, and in his scrutiny of the law afterwards, in the disposition to do what was fair, decided to reconsider it and held that it was the duty of the agent to make the deposit, instead of the party who had made it, I think we have the right to assume that he was honest in his intentions, in so far as his knowledge of the law went. Is it to be wondered at that we should find a difference in the interpretation of the law in such a case, when we find so much difference in its interpretation by the legal gentlemen of this House. Some of these gentlemen sitting on this side of the House give one interpretation of the law, and others sitting on the opposite side give an interpretation the very reverse; and is it, therefore, to be wondered at that this returning officer, who is not a lawyer or a judge, but only a layman, should happen to interpret the law a little differently from the best legal minds of the country. I think we should assume that the interpretation was made with the belief that he was justly interpreting the law and was honestly endeavoring to carry it out correctly. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) went on to say that the returning officer's interpretation of the law was such a crime and vice that it should be stamped out, and he wondered that any hon. gentleman should entertain the idea that this was a thing which should not be remedied by the House. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that there is a penalty attaching to the crime of the returning officer, if crime it is. The penalty is that he can be sued and five hundred dollars can be recovered from him, as well as all the damages that the candidate has sustained and all the expenses connected therewith. That is one of the penalties. The other is that he can be prosecuted for perjury, if he wilfully violates his oath, and in addition he can be sued by any individual elector within a year, and the person suing can collect the sum of two hundred dollars. Are we to suppose that he did not think of these things, that he had not these penalties in view when these proceedings were going on and that he was not endeavoring to carry out the law? It seems to me that it is assuming a great deal to say that he deliberately misinterpreted the law and allowed his political fealty to lead him to declare the candidate elected who was not the choice of the people. The hon. member for South Oxford went on to say that we were violating a principle that had heretofore existed in elections by appointing other persons than sheriffs or registrars as returning officers. I think he forgets the Algoma case. The Provincial Government of Ontario reserved to itself power to pass over sheriffs or registrars for cause. Why did they pass over the registrar and sheriff in the Algoma case? It was currently rumored in the press that it was because those men were not venal enough to carry out their wishes, and therefore they selected a man who was a stronger partisan and was willing to do their bidding. If I understand the function of Parliament, it is to make laws, and the function of courts and judges and lawyers is to interpret them; and if this case can be brought before the courts, as no doubt it can, then I think we have no right to be asked, as laymen, as lawyers, as political partisans on both sides, to give our interpretation of the law, and sit as judge and jury on this particular case. In doing that, I think we would be abrogating our functions as the makers of laws. We would not only have ourselves placed in the position of men whose political bias might warp their judgment, but whose feelings might be excited by that bias, by the rancor of debate and a hundred other influences which would never affect the judges on the bench. In view of these considerations, I think it strictly in accordance with our duty that we should send this particular case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which is appointed for the very purpose of dealing with such cases; and if that committee cannot decide the case, it can be taken to the courts of the country. The candidate who thinks he did not get justice has the courts of law to appeal to, and he can prosecute that officer for perjury if he has wilfully violated the law, and by these means he can obtain his rights if rights are to be got. But it is not consistent with our duty that we should take this case in hand, for in this House it is not likely to be decided in the calm, judicial spirit that would animate judges on the bench, who are not interested in seating one candidate or the other, as the political parties of this House might be expected to be.

Mr. AMYOT. I am rather surprised at the argument that because the returning officer knew the penalties attached to his wrong-doing, we must presume that he did not do the wrong intentionally. When a murderer is taken before a court we say to the jury, that man must have known that if he killed his fellow-citizen, he would be hanged. The returning officer is exposed to a penalty of $500. When we see in some counties, I will not say by which party, $10,000 or $20,000 spent to defeat an opponent, we may say that the returning officer will hope, if he pays his fine, that he will receive $5,000 or $6,000 compensation besides an increase in his salary.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the punishment for perjury?

Mr. AMYOT. Yes, he would perhaps be tried by some jury that would be bought, as we have seen in some cases. What do we see to-night? Nearly half of the most respectable members of the House taking the part of a returning officer who has audaciously acted against the provisions of the law; and the returning officer might expect that if he were prosecuted, he would get a jury that would protect him. Some of the witnesses might disappear, as often happens in such cases; a juror will fall sick or some other incident will occur to make the law after all a dead letter. The returning officer has acted wrongly; we do not impute his motives; but we say he must have been either a scoundrel or a fool, and in either case he does not deserve the support of this House. I heard the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) saying a little while ago that we would set a dangerous precedent, if we did what? If we allowed this Parliament to punish the returning officer. Well, we would set a dangerous precedent indeed if we decided that the election of a member of this House now and in future should be in the hands of a single officer, chosen, not at the instigation of a Minister, but through the instigation of some political friends of the Minister. Such a precedent would be dangerous and it would be scandalous. It is said that this matter should go to the courts. Who has the right to say to the candidate who has the majority of votes that he is bound to make the $1,000 deposit, that he is bound to fight against an opponent who has not, perhaps, a cent to refund him his expenses? Who has a right to say that the man who has the majority of the votes must search for witnesses and expose himself to the danger of a trial? Here the spirit and letter of the law says that when a candidate has a majority of the votes it shall be the duty of the returning officer to declare him elected. He does not do it; and because he has been either a scoundrel or a fool, he will tell to his victim: You pay the $1,000, pay the witnesses and the lawyers, endure all the anxiety, and bear all the consequences of the act of the scoundrel or the fool. It has been said in this debate that we should not look at this question with party bias or from a party point of view, and I hope we will not do it. What are the reasons given for sending this case to the committee? Some have said we have no right to mix ourselves up in this matter—it is for the courts. To this I reply: when Mr. Macdonald came in the law was as it is to-day, and it was then, and is now, the provision of the law that all rights in controverted elections belong to the courts. Yet we have seen the hon. leader of this House, all his Ministers and the great majority of the Conservative party saying and voting that this Parliament has kept the right it always possessed of deciding questions of privilege. The question was then sent to a committee, and why? Because there was some evidence to collect. We did not know whether the opponent of Mr. Macdonald had or had not resigned his position as a local candidate at the time he contested his election. Then we decided the principle in accordance with the authorities, that Parliament is sovereign, that it is the guardian of its dignity and privileges, and of the liberty, not only of Parliament but of the people. The principle was decided that Parliament had the right to interfere. That doctrine cannot be changed to-night by the very parties who decided in the sense I have just told you. Being admitted by that party, which I respect, that it was our duty to interfere, we apply the same principle here, only we go a step further. I ask: Why send that case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? What facts do we want to elicit? Has there been an election? Have there been two candidates? That is not denied. Has there been a deposit? That is not denied. Has there been a receipt given, which is proof prima facie, and more than that juris et de jure, that the deposit was correct? That is not denied. It is not denied that an election has been had, that votes have been taken, that this candidate, by a pretended court—for there was no such thing as a court then—but the votes were counted by the returning officer—was, in defiance of the law and common sense, declared elected though a minority candidate. We have all these facts. What are the facts that can be elicited by the committee? In spite of the researches of hon. members who took the part of the returning officer, not one of them has been able to quote one single fact that required to be elicited by the committee. What can be the reason for sending this case to a committee? There can be only one, and I will not dare to attribute it to those who propose the measure, but it can have only one effect; that will be to try and kill the thing in some way or the other, to prepare the spoliation of the majority of that county, and allow a man to sit in this House representing the minority. That is as atrocious as if the minority on this side wanted to rule, and pretended by some fault of the returning officer, that the majority had not the right to rule. This is not only a question of justice but of dignity in this House. It has been said rightly that if the hon. member who has taken his seat by the vote of the minority respected this Parliament he would never have dared to come within its walls, but would have resigned his seat at once. Instead of that he comes in and takes his seat, and the majority say: You belong to us and we will protect you. A Government cannot do such acts as this very often without destroying its reputation and undermining the basis of its existence. When we ask for precedents, we ask for something impossible. No returning officer, with the law so clear, has gone so far as this one. Precedents are often the science of those who have no other science. If there are no precedents we will make one, and teach that officer that nobody who dares to defy the rules, regulations and laws of the country will escape severe punishment. He deserves the punishment, and it is this honorable House, which is the guardian of our liberty, to take the matter in hand, and justly and fairly proceed to punish the guilty party, and give to that county its real representative. I do not pretend to throw any light on the subject, but I record my protest against the idea that, because there is a punishment attached to the offence, we must assume it is no offence at all. Law like that would prevent the administration of justice and the holding of any court. It is entirely adverse to common sense and right dealing. We know what party spirit will do; we know the people who are seated above the returning officer, and how party spirit engages the returning officer to commit great mistakes, and when we see people seated above those committing those faults through party spirit, we know, when we come down to those party men, we may expect to see something worse. For my part, all party politics aside, if I saw a man sitting on this side representing a minority, I should refuse to remain with him, or else I would not respect myself.

Mr. GIROUARD. Notwithstanding the late hour, I hope I will be allowed to say a few words. It has been stated there is no reason for referring this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, there being no new facts to be elicited. Granting this to be true, have we not an important question of law to examine, the question is whether we can deal with the case or not. This I consider to be a very important question, indeed; it is the first time it has been raised. In 1882, at the time of the discussion on the King's county election (Prince Edward Island), the point was not raised at all. Mr. Cameron, the member for Huron, wanted to refer it as a special case for the Supreme Court of Canada upon a special order of this House; and if I recollect well I think it was laid down we had no such power. We had no power to deal with the case under the Controverted Elections Act of 1874, which still governs such cases. Had the attention of the House been called to that point, we might, perhaps, have referred the case to the ordinary courts of the country. There is, however, considerable difference between that and the present case. King's county election took place six months before the sitting of Parliament; the time had elapsed to file an election petition, and none had been filed, and there was no representative in the House for the county. The question was raised, that as the courts would not deal with the case, should we allow the county to remain unrepresented or not? In the present case, the time for filing the election petition has not lapsed; the parties who have been injured have all their rights intact; the question would be, whether this is the proper tribunal to examine the case. From the quotations from the Statutes, I have no doubt that we have no jurisdiction in the matter. I am satisfied that we have parted with that jurisdiction by vesting it in the ordinary courts of the country, and it should be to those that the parties ought to go. It is not a question of injustice or fraud, but purely a question of procedure: Have we the power to deal with the case? This is a question which should come before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and will be open there to the fullest discussion. Parties interested will have the right to employ counsel to plead their cause, and more than that we will not be called on to give a hasty decision, as we would, if we gave one this evening. These are sufficient considerations to induce hon. members to refer this case to the committee. The matter is a very important one. To-day it may be a clear case of injustice, but it may be a doubtful case to-morrow; and when you have the ordinary courts of justice given jurisdiction do not let Parliament take that jurisdiction that has been invested in them so wisely. To-morrow it may be a doubtful case, and partial majorities may, perhaps, deprive a member of his seat. I will refer to the statute and conclude by it, to show that really we have divested ourselves of all jurisdiction. Section 7 of the Controverted Elections Act of 1874, with rules this case, because the Revised Statutes only came into force on the 1st March, declares:

"The petition complaining of an undue return or an undue election of a member, or no return or a double return."—

Look at these expressions. "An undue return." That is, if the election has been irregular, if all the proceedings have been illegal up to the very day of the election, if there has been an illegal return, if there has been an undue return, then you should go to the court of justice. Then, if there is no return, or if there is a double return, as there was in King's county, P.E.I., in 1883, you should go to the court of justice, and yet the motion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) is that we should declare who was returned, that we should declare that the majority candidate was returned. What power have we to do that? Section 29 of the same statute says:

"At the conclusion of the trial the judge shall declare whether the member whose election or return was complained of, or any other person is duly returned."

The judge is to declare that, and here you are proposing that we should declare who is returned. You have no jurisdiction in the matter. You have no more jurisdiction than the first man passing in the streets of Ottawa. Look at the last clause of the statute which is still more precise, which says that in every matter connected with an election we have no jurisdiction:

"All elections held after the passing of this Act shall be subject to the provisions thereof, and shall not be questioned except in accordance therewith."

Mr. GIBOUARD.

I am certainly against injustice. I am against oppression, whether exercised by a public officer or by anyone else. I am also against all frauds at elections. I am for justice for everyone, but I want justice in a constitutional manner, according to the rules laid down by the Parliament of this country, and, before coming to the relief of the county of Queen's, or coming to the relief of Mr. King, I will respect the law of the land which has been passed by this Parliament, and that I consider my first duty. For that reason I would have been prepared to declare immediately that we have no jurisdiction, but every member of this House, perhaps, is not so prepared; every member of this House is not a lawyer.

Mr. WELSH. Thank God.

Mr. GIROUARD. You say "thank God." Perhaps, if you knew more law, you would exercise your judgment a little better in this matter. Let us go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and hear counsel on both sides, and after a few days of deliberation we may be able to come to a more satisfactory conclusion. I express no opinion on the merits, but simply upon the jurisdiction of this Parliament to deal with the case.

Mr. FISHER. After the last few words of the last speaker, I think I have not the same high opinion of the profession to which he belongs that I think he would like all laymen to hold. He has told us very clearly and distinctly that he, as a lawyer, having examined this question thinks the proper course is to leave it to the courts, but, by his proposed action, he declares the very opposite to his expressed opinion. If the lawyers of this House give us such an example as this, may we not fairly consider that the laymen of this House are more trustworthy in their judgment, more trustworthy in dealing with a matter of justice and right than these professional gentlemen who give such opinions as that. I do not desire to say anything against that profession, or to say that there should not be in this House many members of that profession, but from the example we have had to-night from the lawyers on the other side of the House, I think it is very necessary that there should be in this Chamber some other members than lawyers. The whole burden of the song of the hon. gentlemen on the other side is that this matter is not within the jurisdiction of this House, that it should be referred to the courts of the land. If that is their conviction, why is it that they have not so proposed, why is it that an amendment has not been moved to leave it to the courts of the land and declaring that this House should not express an opinion upon it? They say now that it should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but what is the Committee on Privileges and Elections? As far as I understand the constitution of the standing committees of this House, they are committees to which are delegated the work of this House, which may do that work and then present a report upon which this House is called upon to pass. When the Committee on Privileges and Elections presents its report, the House will have to pass upon this question as we are asking the House to pass upon it to-day. If this means anything, it is simply a postponement of the question, a postponement of the date when the House will have to pass upon the question and declare its opinion upon it. I do not consider it necessary that this question should be entered into by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because the whole facts of the case are before us. It is not such a case as that which has been cited by the hon. member for Victoria, N.S. (Mr. McDonald). He cited an instance in which the details of the case were unknown, in which there was a dispute as to the details, and it was necessary that witnesses should be summoned in order to arrive at a decision as to the details. In such a case, it might be right to relegate that matter to the courts, where the details might be more thoroughly investigated, but here we have on the Votes and Proceedings every detail of this case. The hon. gentlemen have not suggested that there is any additional detail which they propose to lay before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or before the courts, if it should be sent before the courts; so we are to-day in as good a position as we could be after the committee have decided and presented their report. The only advantage which could be obtained would be that we would have the opinion expressed by a small number of the majority of that committee. But we have had already the advantage of the opinion of a large number of the members of this House, quite as many, I believe, as are on that committee, and I think we are quite justified in proceeding to an immediate decision. I believe that this is not so much a matter of law as a matter of justice. It is said that we should not decide the question between Mr. King and the present sitting member for that county. It is not only those two gentlemen who are concerned, but it is the voters of that county who are interested, and I believe they are the chief people to be considered. I believe that the rank and file of the voters of the county have the right to be considered much more than any person who happens to be for the moment the choice of the voters in any county. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries make some remarks in reference to the present sitting member for Queen's, N.B. I understood the member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) to refer to some statements put forth by the present sitting member and I understood the Minister of Marine to say that those statements had been denied, and that the sitting member had never made such statements. I should suppose that the sitting member would say "save me from my friends," because, if that gentleman ever showed that he was a man of honor, it was when he made those statements, if he did make them, and not now, when he takes his seat in this House in opposition to the votes of the county he is supposed to represent. If that hon. gentleman did not make use of these expressions, I regret to hear it. I am sorry to think that at no time did he feel the whole responsibility of his actions, that at no time was he actuated by that high sense of honor I had supposed had actuated him. But, Sir, there is a question to be considered also with regard to the returning officer to whom the hon. Minister of Marine gave a high character. I think, however, we had sufficient grounds to go upon without taking his character from anybody. This returning officer, when he knew that he was in the position of an active partisan, that he was holding confidential relations with one of the two candidates, deliberately accepted the position of judge, as between the two candidates of that county. Nobody who had a high sense of the duties of that position, who had a great sense of self-respect, would have accepted such an anomalous and invidious position. Had the returning officer been such a man as the Minister of Marine described him to be, he would have refused to act as returning officer after he had held the position of secretary of the Conservative Association of that county. Sir, I do not believe that as the facts are clearly laid before us, we ought to allow them to be surrounded by such a cloud of legal quibbling as that the people of the country may be led to believe that these facts are not clear as daylight. I can only believe that this proposition to refer this question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, is a scheme by which the Government propose to relieve themselves and their supporters of a direct vote in this House, and of the responsibility of such a partisan action as the one in question. They think by shielding themselves under the report of a committee, the people of the country will be prevented from having a clear perception of the character of this act, and the Government hope thereby to shield themselves from the condemnation of all right-minded people in the country. I trust the course of this debate has been such as to secure that they will not succeed. While speaking thus, I think I may defend those hon. gentlemen around me who have showed, perhaps, a little heat in the midst of this debate. Hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of having showed partisanship. Sir, the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion to the House is acknowledged by all on the opposite side to have done so in a judicial spirit, without showing any partisan feeling, but I do not wonder after they heard the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice, and the speeches of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and others, which precluded us from any hope that this question will be treated upon its merits, and which precluded us from any hope of obtaining justice from the Government for our friend, the late member for Queen's in the last Parliament. I do not wonder, I say, that the members of this side of the House allowing themselves to speak strongly, and if they have shown any heat it is only because they found that the Government of to-day were disposed to excuse this outrage, and were not prepared to grant justice to the man who had received the majority of the votes.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Thompson (p. 160):

ADJOURNMENT—THE FISHERY PAPERS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman say anything as to the period when the fishery papers will be laid on the Table?

Mr. FOSTER. They are quite rapidly approaching completion. The printers are making satisfactory progress.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1:5 o'clock a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th April, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Berlin and Canadian Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Bowman.)

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the New Westminster Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Chisholm.)

Bill (No. 37) respecting the Regina and Wood Mountain Railway Company.—(Mr. Davin.)

Bill (No 33) to amend the Act to incorporate the Hamilton, Guelph and Buffalo Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to the Hamilton Central.—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 39) to authorise the Grange Trust (Limited) to wind up its affairs.—(Mr. Masson)

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND DEPARTMENT OF INLAND REVENUE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 41) respecting the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue. He said: If the House will permit me to postpone a statement of the provisions of this Bill to another stage, I will be obliged, as I have such a cold that I really cannot speak. This Bill I wish to have read the second time with another Bill, relating to a proposed Department of Trade and Commerce, which now stands for the second reading. The two might be connected together, and might properly be discussed as one portion of the reorganisation of the Departments.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us whether it is the intention of the Bill to make one Department of Customs and Inland Revenue.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say, in the first place, that the Bill will provide that it shall not come in force until proclaimed—it will come into effect by proclamation. The two Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue are administrative departments merely; they are not suggestive departments, and it is intended that in due time these two departments shall, as it were, be sub-departments of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is also provided that the heads of those sub-departments shall be Under-Secretaries as it were—to go in and out, but not to be members of the Cabinet, and to have diminished salaries. That is the principle of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. JAMIESON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 40) further to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. JAMIESON. I may say that the Bill at present introduced is somewhat similar to the Bill introduced by me during two Sessions of the late Parliament. Many of the provisions of this Bill received the approval of this House, but they failed to receive the assent of the Senate. It has been deemed advisable, owing to the fact that the Canada Temperance Act is in force in so many counties and cities of this Dominion, to make the Act as perfect and as workable as possible. The first clause of this Bill provides that in the case of there being more than one registry office in a county, the depositing of the petition in one of them shall be sufficient. It is proposed also to make this law applicable to the Province of British Columbia. At present, owing to the fact that there are no organised municipal divisions in British Columbia, the Act has not been applicable to that Province. We propose by this Bill to allow the Act to be submitted in the electoral districts of that Province, as provided for representation in the House of Commons. We also propose to make the Act applicable to the provisional or temporary judicial districts in the Dominion, of which there are several in the Province of Ontario. In addition to that we propose that penalties may be imposed upon physicians who may give colorable or fraudulent certificates, as we think this is necessary in order to the effective working of that Act. We also propose that the quantity of liquor which may be prescribed by a physician shall be in his discretion. At present he cannot prescribe less than a pint. It is also proposed to apply the search clauses of the Canada Temperance Act to the Dunkin Act, where a by-law under the Dunkin Act may be in force in any part of the Dominion. Further, we think it necessary that the provisions with respect to a search should be amended so as to permit of a search at any time. At present a search is only permitted in the daytime. We also provide a set of forms which we think are necessary, because a great deal of difficulty has arisen owing to the fact that many of those connected with the administration of the law are not lawyers or skilled in legal matters. The last clause of the Bill—and it is a most important one—provides that all penalties imposed under the Act shall be payable, in cases where the prosecutor is a provincial or public officer, to such officer, for the purpose of enforcing the law; and where any other person is prosecutor, one-half shall be paid to him and the other half to the local municipality in which the offence is committed. We think it is necessary that these amendments should be made in order that the law may have a fair test in the Dominion. There are some minor amendments which I shall explain at a subsequent stage of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this is a favorable opportunity to call the attention of the House and the country to the way in which the Government are shirking a very important part of the responsibility which devolves upon them. Sir, if there is any question upon which it is the duty of the Government to have a policy, upon which it is their duty to mark out for themselves the line in which they intend to travel, with a view of meeting the public sentiment, it is with reference to the question which is now before us. Sir, we remember very well when another Administration occupied the position which these gentlemen now occupy, that an hon. member from the Province of Manitoba, who has now a seat in the other House, proposed to this House a resolution declaring that it was the duty of the Government to take up the question of prohibition, and to guide the House and the country upon that subject. That resolution, if I rightly remember, received the support of every gentleman now on the Treasury benches who was then a member of the House. The Government of the day did take the question up, and introduced in the following Session the measure known as the Canada Temperance Act. That measure, which is still on the Statute-book, and which some hon. gentlemen who are not members of the Government are endeavoring to make a more perfect and satisfactory measure, was enacted as one relating to the peace, order and good government of the country, and our jurisdiction in passing it was sustained by the courts on the ground that it was a measure of that character. There can be no longer any doubt, therefore, that it is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament to deal with the subject; and yet these hon. gentlemen, who were ready to take up the license question, which did not belong to them, have, during the past eight years, been shirking their responsibility with regard to this question. Now, I think the time has come when we have a right to know where these gentlemen stand. I think the time has come when the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries should declare himself on this question. That hon. gentleman peregrinated through this country advocating the principle of prohibition. He pressed upon the attention of the country the propriety of supporting no man for a seat in this House who would not pledge himself to vote for prohibition. More than ten years ago he declared that the public opinion of this country was sufficiently ripe to have such a measure placed upon the Statute-book. Well, Sir, how is it that the hon. gentleman has not been heard from on this question since he has occupied a seat on the Treasury benches? The hon. gentleman still poses as the apostle of prohibition. He is still put forward as the light of this country, if not of the world, on this particular question; and how is it that with his splendid opportunities, with a seat in the Cabinet, with a majority of this House to sustain the Government of which he is a member, he has not ventured to assume the responsibility of proposing to this House a measure upon a question admitted to be so important by a vast number of the people of this country, and by many of the supporters of the Administration? Why should this important question, affecting the public revenues as it does, be eliminated from the policy of the Government, and be transferred to the hands of a private member? There are questions upon which it is, no doubt, the right of an Administration to differ, and which may be left as open questions; but, Sir, any question affecting the public revenue is not a question of this sort; it is the duty of the Government to have a policy upon such a question. A Government is not bound to direct the general legislative policy of the House; upon all ordinary questions individual members, and even members of the Cabinet, may be left to take such a line as they see fit; but upon a question which has been held to affect the peace, order and good government of the country, a question relating to the morals of the people, ought not to be left in the hands of a private member. Upon such a question it is the business of the Government to have a policy and to enunciate that policy to the House; yet these hon. gentlemen have not yet spoken on this question. We would like to know what course the Government intend to take. Are they going to support a policy of free traffic in liquor? Are they going to furnish facilities for the encouragement of this particular manufacturing industry, or are they going to adopt the views of the hon. gentleman who has proposed this motion? They cannot shirk their responsibility. Why, Sir, a large portion of the people of this country are scarcely satisfied because the Opposition, who are in a minority, do not undertake to direct the affairs of the country on this subject. How much more are these gentlemen, whom the public have entrusted with their confidence, and who are supposed to direct the affairs of the country on this subject, responsible, than gentlemen on this side of the House? They can no longer shirk their responsibility, and I trust the House and the country will insist upon their having the courage of their convictions, whatever those convictions may be.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Mr. THOMPSON, in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 42) to make provision for the appointment of a Solicitor General, said: The effect of this Bill will be not only to establish this office, but to define the duties of the officer. They will be in connection with the Department of Justice, and such other duties as may be assigned to him from time to time by the Governor in Council. He will be eligible to a seat in either House of Parliament.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is it the intention of the Government to create two new Departments?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not the intention. It is simply intended to have this officer, whose duties will be principally connected with the counsel work of the Department; that is to say, he will attend as counsel for the Crown in the litigation in the principal courts. It is not intended to establish a new Department.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is it intended by this appointment to obviate the necessity of employing counsel throughout the country, as hitherto?

Mr. THOMPSON. In so far as it will be possible for one person to attend to those duties. He will attend to them and to such duties as we employ counsel for now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume the office will be political, and he will go in and out with the Administration.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Bill provides that he will have a seat in either House, and, therefore, the office will be political.

Mr. MITCHELL. But he will not have a seat in the Cabinet?

Mr. THOMPSON. Not necessarily.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved, That this House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday next, to consider the following Resolution:—

That the salary of the Minister of Trade and Commerce be seven thousand dollars per annum.

Motion agreed to.

SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Mr. THOMPSON moved, That this House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday next, to consider the following Resolution:—

That the salary of the Solicitor General be six thousand dollars per annum.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to enquire of the hon. Minister of Finance whether he is yet in a position to give any information as to the probable date of bringing down the Estimates and the Budget Speech? I need not tell him that the House is meeting here at this very late day at great inconvenience to all the hon. members, and that, of course, the longer it is necessary for him to delay the Budget Speech the longer we will be here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope at the early part of next week to be able to intimate the probable time.

PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. McLELAN [moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) to amend the Act respecting Public Officers. He said: This Bill relates only to the securities which may be accepted by the Government from public officers for the performance faithfully of their duties, in addition to what we received before. It enables the Government to take an assignment of any amount that the officer may have at his credit in the books of the Post Office or Government Savings Bank. That is the whole purport of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. POPE moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Government Railways Act. He said: The object of the Bill is to facilitate crossing, and give greater despatch to trains over lines of railway where they have all they can do to make up their time. This is done by other Governments, and has been found to work well. On the Intercolonial Railway, for instance, we have the greatest possible difficulty to make time, and the stops we have to make retard us very much. I anticipate no danger from it. However, I do not propose to say it shall positively come into operation, so that if it be found a source of danger it can be stopped. With regard to the gates, questions have arisen as to what are proper fastenings for them. It is declared here there should be two upright posts supporting the gate at each end, if the gate is fifteen inches longer than the opening, which shall be deemed proper fastenings.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me that this is introducing a very dangerous practice indeed, as we have always understood it, because, when a railway train passes a crossing of another railway, it always has to come to a stop; but this is to provide that they may go straight through at full speed. There may be appliances which have been invented to make that safe, but surely they must be very complicated appliances, and the Minister has only told us that he understands they have been introduced somewhere in the western States. If that is the only case in which they have been introduced, I think we should wait a little longer before we make any death-traps on our railways. I should like to know what companies have applied for this. Have the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the Grand Trunk Company urged that this change should be made in the law? I think, before the House is asked to read this Bill a second time, we ought to know what representations have been made to the Government on the subject.

Mr. POPE. The railway company that has principally urged this upon us is the Canada Southern.

Mr. EDGAR. That is, the Michigan Central.

Mr. POPE. Yes; and the Michigan Central has applied this now. There is no danger, because the other road is perfectly stopped while the train is crossing. I agree with the hon. gentleman that we always did provide that a train should come to a standstill at a crossing for one minute. but I am quite satisfied that this is quite as safe, and that it will expedite the business of the country.

Mr. MULOCK. Do I understand the Minister of Railways to say that this Bill is introduced in consequence of an application from the Michigan Central?

Mr. POPE. No, not the Michigan Central.

Mr. MULOCK. Because it only applies to the case of a private railway crossing a Government railway. As I read it, it is limited to any other than a Government railway crossing a Government railway. I suppose what is meant in this Bill is the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. POPE. Yes; but there will be another Bill introduced to apply to other railways in the same way.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not see why, if it be a sound principle, it should not be applied generally as well as to a private railway crossing a Government railway.

Mr. POPE. So it will.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not see that the Minister of Railways is a better judge in regard to the carrying out of this provision than the manager of a railway would be. If the principle is sound, it should be made general. If it is unsound, it should not be adopted at all.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) respecting the Department of Trade and Commerce. He said: This is simply a Bill to establish the Department and provide for the duties. There are only three clauses in it. As I mentioned on the first reading, there is another Bill affecting this subject. I have just introduced that, and this Bill can be discussed together with the other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course, under the circumstances, we can have no objection to the two Bills being discussed together, but I would take this opportunity to mention to the hon. gentleman, and also to the House, that I think a measure of this importance will require considerable discussion. I have always felt that we committed a great, although, perhaps, an almost unavoidable, mistake in constituting our present Cabinet as we have done, with thirteen or fourteen Cabinet Ministers of the first rank. I have always believed, although I was never able to put my opinions into practice, that we would have done a very great deal better if we had a much smaller number of Ministers of the first rank, and a considerable number of Under-Secretaries of State, selected from junior members of the House, as is done in England. If we are going to enlarge the Government, and constitute a Cabinet of fifteen members, it may be worth the consideration of the House whether an attempt should not be made to go back to a more wholesome system, difficult as I know it is at this time. I only throw out that suggestion now, because the whole thing can be discussed when the two Bills come up together, as the hon. gentleman proposes.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me that we are simply increasing the expenditure for the administration of the government of the country, and making the machine of administrative government more and more unwieldy. We know very well that, in England, they have sub-heads of the various Departments representing the Government in one House, while the real head of the Department sits in the other. There, of course, they have an immensely larger and an infinitely more complicated field of administrative work than it is possible for us to have in this country, and therefore it is necessary for them to have a larger number of persons engaged in the administration of public affairs in order to master the details, and to make the Parliament acquainted with the details of each Department of the Government. The administrative machine in England is, perhaps, not by any means as efficient as it might be. We know what the custom is in that country, and how they are addicted to allow matters to go on from time to time without any other alteration than such as may arise from additions. Sir James Mackintosh said long ago that it was something like a gentleman's mansion. It had little architectural beauty, but it had perhaps very little inconvenience, additions had been made to it from time to time, which made it unwise to tear it down in order to make a more symmetrical structure, but no man in the world who was about to build an original structure would take it for a model. It seems to me that the tendency of the hon. gentleman is to undertake to make a system of administrative government upon a model, which, in a new country, ought never to be followed. It always seemed to me that the Italian system was very much better adapted to a new country like Canada than that of England. The hon. gentleman has, no doubt, examined it and considered it. A Minister of the Crown having charge of a particular Department, though a member of but one House, may nevertheless speak for the Government in both; and as an administrator of the Government, responsible for the conduct of an important Department, he is at liberty to act as an exponent and defender of that Department in both Houses. If we were to have a change at all, a change based upon the Italian system, it seems to me, is much better adapted to the wants of a comparatively new and poor country in which the administrative machinery need not be complex, and in which that machinery ought to be kept as simple as possible. It is always easier to exercise effective control over the administration of a Department when it is under the conduct of a single head, than when it is under the control of two. Now, I am not, any more than my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), going to oppose this measure at this particular stage, but I think the House would make a great mistake in allowing the Bill to go through in silence, or without full consideration. Every change in the organisation or administration of a Department of the Government, ought to receive a very full consideration, certainly a much fuller consideration than we would give to an ordinary measure, because it is part of the machine by which the operations of the Government are to be carried on, and being so, it ought to receive very full consideration at the hands of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I leave to hon. gentlemen opposite the business of reconciling their views concerning this measure. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says there must be good reasons given for altering the present organisation. He, himself, suggests a very considerable alteration by adopting the Italian system, as that would involve an application to the Imperial Government, and an alteration of the British North America Act. I think I would rather listen to the counsels of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). His suggestion is that the Cabinet should be reduced, and that there should be subordinate officers, members of the Government, but not members of the Cabinet. That is exactly what this system is intended to introduce, and eventually will be brought into force, having the effect of reducing the number of Cabinet Ministers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I differ not only from the views of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), but I differ entirely with the right hon. gentleman as to the necessity of this Bill at all. I do not think this Bill is calculated to advance the true interests of the Administration of public affairs. I think the whole tendency of the Administration is to increase the expense and increase the heads of the Department. The right hon. gentleman, a Session or two ago, divided his Department into four, and made four heads. Have we found any special advantage from that? Have the expenses been reduced? Have there not been as many complaints against the manner in which supplies are let, and the public affairs administered? Sir, what would be the result here? There will be a policy in relation to one Department different from that which will be applied to another Department of the Government. This new Department of Trade and Commerce is to have supervision of these other two Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue, of which they are to be sub-heads. Do they propose reducing the position of my hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Costigan) from being a member of the Cabinet to that of a sub-head in the Department to be created? Is it the object of this Bill to get rid of my hon. friend? If that is the object of this Bill, why is it not so stated at once? What do they propose to do with the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell)? Do they propose to get rid of him, too? Is that the object of the Bill? It looks to me very like it, and I think if it is the object, they had better state it at once. My objection to the Bill is that it is adding to the expense of the country. It is a Bill which is not in the direction of the public interest, a Bill which, I believe, is going to increase, not alone the expense of an additional head of Department, but going to add a new staff of officers, which will constantly increase. We will want new buildings directly if this system goes on. I think we had better economise the public affairs of this country, reduce the debt and keep down the charges, and endeavor to relieve us from the payment of the enormous annual sum of ten or eleven millions interest which we are paying to-day. That is the course which the Government ought to take in their legislature, instead of going on, year after year, with Bills changing the laws and creating new Departments in the direction of adding to the expense of the country, as this Bill is going to do. I say this will be the result of it, and for my part I am opposed to the principle of the Bill, and when the subject is up again for discussion, I shall endeavor to give my views at greater length in order that the country may understand what the Government are doing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Could the First Minister give us an idea what will be the probable cost of this Department; because we could consider that in detail when it comes up for discussion at a future time?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is proposed that on the second reading the two Bills shall be discussed together, and I hope the principle of this Bill will be adopted by the House, as I suppose it will be, and I hope the principle of the other Bill as well, on Tuesday. Then after that we can go into Committee of the Whole on the two Bills, and full discussion can be taken on every clause, including the cost of the measure.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not wish to discuss the measure to-day, but I quite concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that this country is being, to some extent, governed to death. The increase of officials has been something alarming for the last few years, and it is about time the Government should call a halt, instead of going on to increase the Departments as they propose by these two Bills.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

BANFF NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved second reading of Bill (No. 16) respecting the Banff National Park.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is only proper that the Minister should explain in some detail, not merely the object, which we can gather from the title of the Bill, but what it is in reality that the Government propose to do, and also what the probable cost is likely to be. The Bill, which I have only had time to glance at, appears to propose to take charge of several hundred square miles of land in the North-West for the purpose of preserving it as a national park. Now, if I am correctly informed, in that two or three hundred square miles there are a considerable number of special grants made to several parties, some of whom, in former days, have been members of this House, and it does appear to me that it is a questionable thing that these parties should be left in possession of these properties there. If we are going to have a national park, I think we ought to own everything that is included within its circuit. If it cannot be possible for the Government to recover possession of these without very considerable expense, we ought to know, before we commit ourselves to this project absolutely and definitely, what the views of the Government are with respect to the cost, and with respect to these private properties, which are, apparently, included within the boundaries of the park. I see that the area covered is 200 square miles, more or less, and all that portion is to be withdrawn from sale and settlement. A number of regulations are made with respect to the control of the streams, the working of mines, &c. If I am not misinformed, some large hotels have already been erected in this district, and the leases of some of the hot springs have been given to gentlemen, many of whom were formerly members of this House. Altogether, I believe the Bill requires a good deal of discussion and consideration before we proceed to pass it.

Mr. EDGAR. This area is about equal to the extent of an ordinary county in this part of the world, and we should like to know from the Minister as to the agricultural quality of this large section of land which he proposes to treat in this very peculiar way. The action is entirely unprecedented in this country. We have heard of a government taking a quantity of land around Niagara Falls for a specific and clearly defined purpose; but here it is proposed to take into special charge a principality almost, and to take power to work mines and develop mining interest in that district, to lease the land for all such purposes, to carry on trade and commerce, and to grant permits for the grazing of cattle. Moreover, all regulations passed by the Minister of Interior will, after publication for four weeks in the Canada Gazette, have all the force and effect of law. So the Minister of the Interior can, when seated in his office, legislate for that whole principality by a stroke of his pen, and legislate with reference to every individual and interest in that large district. Those powers are entirely unprecedented, and I am sure the House should not be asked to grant them without very full explanations from the Government. No such powers have been asked within my knowledge previous to this time by any government or corporation in British America. No doubt we have large quantities of land, but there must be some particular and special value in this area or it would not be proposed to set it apart. The hot springs are, no doubt, very valuable, but we hear that they have been claimed by many parties. The Government should inform the House as to the nature of the claims, and state in a general way how they propose to adjudicate and legislate upon them. All these explanations should be given before the Bill is allowed to pass.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Most of the hon. members of this House, or, at all events, a very large number of them, Mr. MITCHELL.

have already visited the springs. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) was one of the first to call my attention to the importance of the Government reserving them, after having had an opportunity of visiting them and ascertaining something of their value. The springs are said to be of exceptional value from their curative properties. The scenery about the springs is exceedingly beautiful, and the area which is reserved, although it is large, is not agricultural land in the ordinary acceptation of that term, but a very considerable part of the area is water. For instance, this particular reservation includes Devil's Lake, which is a very beautiful sheet of water some fifteen miles in length.

An hon. MEMBER. Is it hot water?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is hot enough, no doubt, for the hon. gentlemen opposite; they can go up there and bathe in it. The object of making so large a reservation is, that all experience proves it is a matter of great consequence to have very strict regulations. As to what those regulations may be, as to the character of them, it would be almost impossible to embody all of them in an Act of Parliament. With regard to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as to certain persons having already possession of leases of the springs, I may say that the hon. gentleman is misinformed, if he means by that remark that parties have any exclusive possession of the springs. It is quite true that Dr. Brett and other gentlemen associated with him have put up an hotel there, and it is already becoming a very important resort. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are erecting another hotel, the foundation of which is completed, and for the purpose they have appropriated $100,000; and they propose within the area leased to them for that purpose—for we propose to lease the land to persons who put up hotels—to make it as attractive as possible, and in that way secure a large number of patrons for the springs. There is no exclusive property in the springs given to any one. On the other side of Bow River there is a town site. The Government have already surveyed it and laid it out, and are selling lots; and I am told by the Secretary of the Department, who has recently been up there with a view to making a report as to the progress of matters, and to determine the conditions on which sales should be made, that $15,000 worth of lots have already been applied for. The intention is, of course, to frame such regulations as will make the springs a respectable resort, as well as an attractive one in all respects. Those who know anything of the hot springs of Arkansas are aware that this is one of the great difficulties. It is not a resort to which people will care to go if they can possibly avoid it. They go there for health purposes and for nothing else. If we can make this particular reserve a really attractive resort, I believe great advantage will accrue to the country at large. My own impression is, that the revenue we shall obtain from the town site, from the lease of the privileges at the springs, that is from the water of the springs, will almost recoup the Government for the amount that will have to be expended in connection with the undertaking. Even if the amount is not quite adequate, still in the interests of the country it is well worth while reserving the springs in the way proposed by this Bill. Of course the area seems a very large one, twenty-six miles long by ten miles wide; but when it is remembered that one lake in that area is fifteen miles long—and it will prove very attractive, and efforts are being put forth to make it a good place for sport—I am inclined to think that the House will agree, that the action of the Government in this regard has been well taken. I am not aware of any reservations there. Of course, there were some grants in this area before it was reserved; they are private properties in the meantime and will have to be protected. If we can get them back into the hands of the Government without serious cost, I think it would be desirable to do so, so that the whole of them should belong to us, except in so far as the building up of a town on the opposite side of the Bow River may necessitate the sale of a portion of them for that purpose. The object really is to make an attractive resort and to benefit that part of the mountain.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely agree with the course pursued by the Government in relation to preserving that property as a public park. I think amongst the earliest means of calling the attention of the Department to the matter was a letter addressed by myself to the right hon. the Premier, after I had visited those springs and saw what they were like. I have had some experience in visiting some of the springs of the United States, and I saw what difficulties existed in that country in relation to such resorts. The Minister has correctly stated that they become the resort of a very doubtful class of people, so that life was, and is now, practically unsafe in many of the southern springs. I think it is of great importance that these springs, which are said to be of very great value for their disease-curing qualities, should be preserved for the use of the sick in such a manner that they can enjoy the greatest amount of comfort, and be surrounded by the greatest respectability. As to the extent of the park, I for one do not object. Anybody who has seen that section of the country knows that it is practically a territory of mountains, and when we consider that an immense lake exists in the middle of it I don't think it would be wise to risk the limiting the amount of the property taken. As to the regulations which ought to govern such a resort, I must say that I do not exactly agree with the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) in relation to that part. It is impossible to make these regulations and embody them in an Act of Parliament; you can only tell by the experience of the persons controlling such a place, from month to month, and from year to year, what is really required in order to establish those health-giving resources of nature on a proper basis. For that reason I do not think it would be wise to embarrass the Minister by asking him to embody in the Bill the regulations under which the springs should be governed. I do think, however, that when the Bill comes to be discussed an estimate ought to be given of the contemplated outlay, and also, as nearly as can be arrived at, a statement of any of the embarrassments or difficulties in the way of private lands within the limits of this reserve. I am aware that there are hotels building on the property, and I think it is desirable that that should be the case. Two years ago when I was there the people were flocking to the place, and they were lying on the hill-sides and rocks taking the benefit of the springs, without any of the comforts and conveniences that sick people ought to have; and if one-tenth part of the reports of the health-giving qualities of these springs have any truth in them, then I say that no reasonable amount of money that the country can lay out in improving and beautifying a locality with such advantages should be—and I am sure will not be—refused by the Parliament of Canada. Therefore I give the measure introduced by the hon. Minister such a fair and just support as, in my opinion, it has a right to receive in this House.

Mr. CASEY. I think everybody is agreed as to the advisability of reserving some portion of our vast domain near the Rocky Mountains for the purposes of a public pleasure ground. But I must differ from the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and agree with my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) in thinking that the provisions of this Bill are something very different from a mere reservation of a public holiday ground, and that they are, in fact, extremely peculiar in their nature. In the first place, I call the attention of those who have not read the Bill to the fact that, in dealing with these two hundred and sixty square miles of territory, the Government is freed from the trammels now laid upon them in dealing with the public lands in the North-West, by the Dominion Lands Act, and any regulations made under said Act, or any other Act with respect to mining or timber licenses, or any other matter whatsoever. Now, it is evidently expected and believed by the Government—probably they know as a matter of fact—that this reservation included not only lands fit for some purposes of settlement, but territory containing minerals, territory upon which timber is growing, or upon which timber licenses may naturally be expected to issue. The Government, after proposing nominally to reserve this district as a public pleasure ground, contradict that statement by taking to themselves power to deal with it in the way of issuing timber licenses, mining licenses, and so on. They first introduce an Act on the assumption that it is proper and advisable to withdraw this land from settlement, from mining, from timber licenses, for the purpose of making it a public playground, which is a very good purpose, and then they turn round and take to themselves power to give licenses to cut timber, to dig minerals, to pasture cattle, to build hotels, to lease or sell the lands, and to make provision for trade and traffic of every description. So, after pretending to preserve the lands for a park, they say they do not intend to reserve them for a park at all, but they are reserving power to deal with them as if they were still public property, by giving these licenses just as in any other part of the public domain. The only effect of the Act in that respect is to set the Government free from the restrictions placed upon them in their dealings with the public lands, under the Public Lands Acts, by the repealing of those Acts so far as they apply in these territories, and to enable them to deal with them in any manner they choose. Now, I think that, on the face of it, such an Act is, as my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) said, one which ought to be very closely scrutinised. The Government evidently appear to be about to enter into a big speculation. On the hon. gentleman's own statement they are going to give, not exclusive possession, but a limited possession, of the lands around these springs, to certain parties. Now, why should they not give to everybody who gives certain securities and certain proofs of his respectability and the amount of capital he has to invest, the liberty to go and build a hotel near those springs, and have a share of the profit which is to be made out of them? They propose not to do that, but to let the Minister say who is to build private hotels around the Banff Springs; in other words, the Minister reserves power to make the fortunes of some of his friends who wish to go into hotel-keeping. I do not know whether they will do so or not, but he reserves that power. He says that certain parties, one of whom he named—Dr. Brett—another being, I believe, Dr. Orton, lately a member of this House—have already built a hotel near the springs, and he has led us to understand that there will be no interference with them. He does not tell us whether he intends to give a monopoly to them and to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but it would be quite within his power under the Act to give the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and Doctors Brett and Orton a monopoly of the hotel-building there. And if you recollect certain transactions in the way of hotel-keeping which took place in the maritime portion of the Dominion—I refer to the Inch Arran Hotel—we cannot feel confident that this Government is quite above putting advantages in the way of its friends in this way. The Minister reserves to himself the uncontrolled power to give timber licenses and mining licenses to anybody, regardless of the existing Acts on the subject. How can mining be carried on within this district hand-in-hand with the keeping of the place as a public resort? You cannot have a public park, with all the wild animals preserved in it, and have mining industries going on at the same time; you cannot have trade and traffic, involving railways going to and from the mines, and at the same time keep the place for sport. If you intend to keep it as a park, you must shut out trade, traffic and mining. If you are going to preserve it for mining, do not call it a park reserve; the two things are inconsistent. Then the hon. Minister proposes to let people pasture cattle, in other words, to have ranching privileges, in this so-called public park. I would like to know how ranching privileges and the preservation of wild animals and sport can go together, or how a collection of cowboys in this park is going to add to its attractiveness as a public resort, or a reservation for game and sport. I conclude from all this that there is something in the Bill that we do not understand, and something the Minister does not propose to tell us, for he has not answered the questions put to him by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). He has given no idea of the cost of the scheme or of how many claims there are in the district; he has given us no information on the matter at all, except what is contained in the Bill itself. In this state of darkness in regard to the Government's intention, I think we should proceed very gingerly with this Bill. The hon. Minister objected to the proposal of the hon. member for West Ontario that he should put regulations into this Bill. I do not see why that should not be done. I do not suppose that the Minister, or any other man, can at once draw up the regulations, but he intends to draw them after the Bill passes, and I do not see why it should not be delayed until he is able to insert them. Then we shall know how we are acting. But to ask us to proclaim this district, and to put it under his exclusive control, is asking too much, notwithstanding the confidence we have in the Minister of the Interior. For these reasons, although I suppose the Bill will go to the second reading now, I think, when it comes up in committee, it will be the duty of the House, without regard to party, to scrutinise it very closely.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has not given us information on a very important matter connected with this measure. If I rightly remember this part is within the limits of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's lands.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, it is not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is immediately on the border of the fertile belt east of the summit of the mountains. Of course, if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have declared their intention not to make any claim to these lands, then we will know that we are not undertaking to include their property; but in the regulations as they stand, there is nothing to prevent the company making a claim if they see fit to do so. Now, there are certain provisions of this Bill to which my hon. friend from West Elgin has referred, and with regard to which I shall not again trouble the House; but it does seem to me that in sub-clauses c, b, e, g, h, and sub-clause 2 of clause 4, extraordinary powers are given to the Minister. In fact, if the Bill passes in its present form, it will be necessary that geographers should describe Canada as consisting of seven Provinces, four territorial Provinces and a Government of the Minister of the Interior. It is, in fact, creating a small Province and holding it under the jurisdiction of the Minister. Now, I can understand that where a Government is treading upon new ground, and where they have no path to guide them as to what to do, in order to carry out the administrative operations they have in hand, the Governor in Council should have power to make regulations; but it is altogether an unusual course to confer upon the head of a Department the power to make regulations that practically have the force of the law of the land. The hon. Minister will see, for instance, that the working of mines is provided for in sub-section d of section 4. Why should not the hon. gentleman state what the regulations are to be? If there are valuable mines in the territory, why should not the ordinary mining regulations apply? Why should the hon. gentleman take to himself power which would enable him to make arrangements with any private parties for the working of the mines, provided that they conferred upon him a great fortune. That is a power which I certainly would not ask for any hon. gentleman on this side of the House, if we were in the position the Government occupy, and it is a power which I think no Government should ask us to put into the hands of any Minister. It is true, there are some limitations; but in this matter I think the power of making regulations ought to be in the hands of the Governor in Council, subject to the approval of Parliament. Then, let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to sub-section 2 of section 4, where he proposes to take power to alter the criminal law. He has power to legislate for the government of persons in the territory with regard to the commission of offences that come under the criminal law. We refused to confer power of that sort on the great railway corporations in 1875. I have no doubt the First Minister will remember the discussions we had in this House when it was proposed to confer on the great railway corporations certain powers for the punishment of their own officers in certain cases; and yet this Bill confers on the Minister power which will actually place the liberty of the subject within that territory in his hands. I do not think the difficulty of making regulations to govern the park is so serious that it is necessary to confer upon the Minister these extraordinary powers. It does seem to me that the Government, when they come down to the House proposing such a measure, ought at least to be prepared to lay before the House general plans and limitations of any power they propose to take, so that it may not become a source of abuse, and the liberty of the subject will not be in the hands of a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. TROW. The Minister of Interior has just stated that he thinks I was the individual who first drew the attention of the Government to the advisability of reserving a portion of the territory near Banff for a public park. I had occasion to visit, two years ago, the celebrated springs, and I considered the place was one of vital importance, which should not be placed in the hands of squatters to be destroyed, because it required very lavish expenditure to make it valuable as it is valuable. I consider that no one should be allowed to lease that property unless he was in a position to expend from $80,000 to $100,000, because it is unquestionably, in my estimation, the greatest boon to this Dominion. Immediately after leaving the springs, I made it my business to have an interview with the hon. Minister of Interior, to whom I stated the Government should unquestionably reserve a large tract of the country, as there may be other valuable springs in the locality not known. I was not aware that I had much influence with the Minister, but I stated the true facts of the case, and that it would be advisable to make of this place a park similar to the Yellowstone Park in Montana. I made it also my business to see the present Minister of Finance immediately afterwards, who, if I recollect rightly, told me he would write the First Minister in regard to my statement. I do not know of any portion of the Dominion that will become more celebrated in the history of this great country than that park. The Bow River, running within a few yards of the celebrated springs, has a depth of thirty feet, and gives thirty miles of excellent boating. Near the summit of the mountains you have perpetual snow in view, and beneath you have natural parks surrounding you for a score of miles. I cannot, under any circumstances, blame the Government for making a large reservation until such time as they know the value of the land in that locality. There is no squatter could have any claim there, because there is no timber or agricultural lands. I do not know if there are any mining limits, but, no doubt, some will be discovered, for on the other side of the river there is coal belonging to Mr. McLeod Stewart, of this city, the best coal property we have in that section. There may also be coal in this reserve, but as for timber, there is none valuable. It is very scrubby, and a very great portion of the limit reserved is covered by this celebrated lake. I take a little responsibility in the matter for various reasons. I do not know that I did my duty properly when I did not speak to the Minister on that occasion, of the mission I was expected to perform. Two young men of my county claimed the springs. They informed me they were the explorers and discoverers of the springs, and that it was my duty, seeing their friends and connections in my county had aided me in every contest, to speak to the Minister respecting their claim. I declined to do so, because I considered no man had a right to such valuable property without being in possession of means to put valuable places of accommodation upon it.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say a word in reference to one of the parties who set up the claim to be the first who found out those springs. We have heard a good deal in reference to their value. They have probably medicinal properties of great importance. If they are of such importance, if they are so valuable, those parties who were the original discoverers are entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Government. Some few years ago I accompanied one of the young men—there were two of them—said to be the first parties to find out the springs, and application was made to the Department, either for control of the springs or for compensation for finding them. At that time it was said they were not surveyed, consequently the Department was not cognisant of them, and the party was requested to hold over his application for some time. He was also assured that when the Government had sufficient knowledge of them to do anything, if a license was not granted it was likely some compensation would be given him as one of the explorers. I understand since then some unprincipled speculators have so manipulated things that the right has gone out of the hands of the two young men, and that today they are without compensation. I think the Government could afford to deal liberally with the young men, and should compensate them handsomely since they have not been allowed the privilege of making anything out of them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the Minister of the Interior to say that, before he proceeds to discuss this in committee, he will supply an estimate of the cost, and also bring down to us a list of the persons having leases—a memorandum showing the extent of property under lease and the nature of the leases passed?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The only other points that I would call attention to are, first, the one to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) called attention. I think that these regulations provide that, in certain cases, a very heavy fine, amounting to $200, or, in default of payment, six months' imprisonment, may be inflicted. I think where regulations are going to be imposed by the Governor in Council, the infraction of which is to be visited by severe penalties like these, most assuredly they ought to be confirmed by Parliament. They might be allowed to have interim force until the next Session of Parliament, but where you are dealing with the liberty of the subject, the least that can be done is that regulations requiring such penalties for enforcement should be approved by the Parliament of Canada as well as by the Governor in Council. The other thing that I would like to know, and probably the Minister has had it before his eyes when drawing this Bill, is under what terms and restrictions the Government of the United States have incorporated their national park? Have they taken powers similar to those which the Minister proposes to take? But is it not the case that in the United States national park, the property is reserved absolutely as the property of the United States? I have not recently looked over the Act, but my recollection is that in the case of the United States national parks, the United States keep absolute control.

Mr. EDGAR. I have just sent for the Act relating to the Yellowstone Park, and I find the provisions of the Act are much more restricted than those proposed here:

"The secretary may, in his discretion, grant leases for building purposes, for terms not exceeding ten years, of small parcels of ground, at such places in said park as shall require the erection of buildings for the accommodation of visitors; all of the proceeds of said park to be expended under his direction in the management and the construction of roads and bridle-paths therein."

The restriction as to granting leases seems there to be restricted, whereas the unrestricted powers proposed to be asked in this Bill will enable the Minister of the Interior to give leases for 100 years, which would be equal to an out-and-out sale. It is to be considered whether the objects, which are very laudable indeed in one sense, ought to be accomplished, would not be much better accomplished by keeping control in the Crown of the property, as the Americans have done.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SENATORIAL REPRESENTATION FOR THE N. W. T.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved second reading of Bill (No. 17) respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the Senate of Canada. He said: This is a Bill merely to give the North-West Territories two Senators, to give them a representation in the Senate which they have not yet, although last Session we gave them representation in this House. At the time that the Bill was introduced and carried last Session, the Government was of opinion that the appointment of members to the Upper House might stand over until the Territories were made a Province, but there is a very considerable opinion existing among the people of the North-West that they should be on an equality with the other Provinces, although they are not yet a Province or Provinces, that they should have representation in the Upper Chamber as well as in this. The measure provides, therefore, that the North-West shall be represented in the Senate by two members. An Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament, as the House knows, authorising this Parliament to give representation to the North-West in both Houses. The hon. the leader of the Opposition asked the other day if that Imperial Act was warranted by the resolutions and the address as passed in this House previously. I was not able to answer that at the time, but on looking at it I see that the address asks the Imperial Government to introduce an Act to enable the Parliament of Canada to give the North-West Territories representation in Parliament. It does not say representation in this House, but representation in Parliament, and the Imperial Parliament, considering our address in the obvious meaning of our language, have given us the power to give representation in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is any condition going to be put in this Bill that those appointed shall be residents, as is the case in all the other Provinces of the Dominion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The First Minister has referred to the Imperial Act. Has the hon. gentleman the Act before him, so as to see what the exact words are?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not, but I have looked at it.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman remember the precise words of the Act?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are "representation in the Senate and House of Commons," I think. I am sure of it. Representation in both Houses expressly.

Mr. MILLS. Without any limitation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Without any limitation.

Mr. MILLS. So the Parliament of Canada could give twenty Senators to the North-West instead of two, if it saw fit?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I took exception to the address which the hon. gentleman proposed last year on this subject, and I think the power which the hon. gentleman says the Imperial Parliament has conferred shows that the exception I took was well founded. When we proposed on a former occasion to alter the British North America Act and provide for the admission of Manitoba under the Federal system, which was not done before Manitoba was actually admitted into the Confederation, we also prevented the Government from undertaking to proceed by address, and we indicated here in the House what were to be the provisions of the Imperial Act which was to alter and amend the constitution in that particular. Last year the hon. gentleman proposed to this House an address asking the Imperial Parliament to legislate, not doing what we had done before, not indicating to the Imperial Parliament the precise character of the legislation which was required, but an address asking simply for legislation. It did not require any very serious consideration of the subject to see that the members of that Parliament, unfamiliar with our system of Government, without any disposition or motive to give the question serious consideration, were likely to make alterations in our constitution which might prove of the most serious character. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes under this Bill to give to the people of the North-West Territories representation in the Senate by two members. The hon. gentleman knows that the British North America Act limited the number of members that might be appointed to the Senate for the Province of Ontario, for the Province of Quebec, for the Maritime Provinces. They were restricted. The hon. gentleman cannot appoint more than twenty-four senators for the Province of Ontario, but the hon. gentleman admits that in this case there is no such restriction. There is a radical alteration in the terms of our constitution, and it is in the power of the Administration to propose a measure to Parliament, and it is in the power of Parliament to carry through such a measure, to give to the North-West Territories, where there are at this moment but little more than twenty thousand people, as large a representation in the Senate as all the other Provinces have put together. The hon. gentleman has done this, and I call his attention to the fact that, if there was a change of Government to-morrow, if the new Government had a majority in this House and could obtain the consent of the Senate to it, there would be nothing to prevent their asking this House to appoint forty senators, so as to enable the Reform party to counterbalance the representation that the hon. gentleman and his friends have already acquired in that body. That is the position in which our constitution is placed by this action of the hon. gentleman. There is nothing to prevent an unlimited number of senators being appointed. All that is necessary is that these senators shall be called senators for the North-West Territories. If that is done, the law is complied with, the constitution is not violated, and the flexibility of the English system, which the hon. gentleman has so frequently lauded in this House, will have been actually introduced into our second chamber. I do not know that the people of this country are especially anxious that the number of nominated senators should be increased. I do not know that that body has proved so thoroughly efficient, so necessary to the proper balancing of our constitution, that the people would be very indignant with the Administration if they failed to bring this portion of the constitution into effect. I admit that there are many very important enquiries, many important functions that a second chamber might undertake to discharge. There are important functions that are performed by the House of Lords, but these functions are not performed by the Senate of this country; and it does seem to me that people who, altogether number only 23,000, the number to be found in an ordinary constituency, will be quite content to have four representatives in this House without having a certain number of illusory representatives in the second chamber. There is no pressing or special necessity for it. In the United States, where they live under a democratic system of Government, where the rights of the individual are very carefully guarded, the Congress of the United States has given to the people in the Territories two representatives from each territory. They have the privilege of explaining their position in the House of Representatives, but they are not voters in that House. Their constituents are supposed to be too largely dependent on the Executive to make it the interest of the country that they should exercise any influence by way of voting in that chamber. But in the Senate, in this second body, which is intended to protect the rights of the state and to prevent encroachments being made upon their autonomy or authority, there is no representation at all. It is not supposed that representation is necessary; it is not felt. Why, Sir, the great majority of the people of this country have an idea they could get on without representation in the Senate as it is now constituted. To this Senate each Province returns, or is supposed to be represented by a certain number of senators. But what important interest of a Province has that body, as it is now, ever guarded. What encroachment undertaken by this House upon the rights of the Provinces has been resisted by the Senate? The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have disregarded the provisions of the constitution, they have violated its spirit and have disallowed measures that are clearly within the competency of the Legislatures, and within their jurisdiction; but in what instance has this body, that was intended specially to guard the interests of the Provinces, come to the rescue of the Provinces, and protected provincial rights against national encroachment? In not a single instance. So I do not see that the Territories are likely to suffer for want of the two members which the hon. gentleman proposes to put into the Senate on behalf of the Territories. It does not seem from the Bill that it is necessary that they should come from the Territories.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will see that all the clauses are taken from the British North America Act and applied.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says all the clauses are applied. If they are in the Province of Quebec, the senator must reside in the particular district which he represents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman ought to read over the Bill before he criticises it.

Mr. MILLS. I have read the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not much.

Mr. MILLS. Well, I have a better opportunity of knowing than the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He has forgotten the terms of the Bill, that is all.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Sir, I say that the people of the Territories have not asked for this; they are not pressing upon the Government the appointment of two senators. What does it mean? What has the hon. gentleman done for the people of the Territories? Why, last year he insisted upon the retention of the appointees in the territorial legislature, who are appointees of the Crown. The hon. gentleman did not dare wholly to trust the people of the North-West, for two years ago he proposed to increase the number of nominated members. Now, because the people have elected from these Territories four representatives to this Chamber, the hon. gentleman thinks it necessary that the Government should appoint two of their friends to the other House. At the present time we know, Sir, that financially this country is in straightened circumstances; we know that the extravagance of the Government has largely increased the public debt, and increased the public burden. We know that the hon. gentleman had to dismiss from office his Finance Minister, and to recall a former colleague from the other side of the Atlantic to take charge of the financial affairs of the Government; and in these circumstances, the hon. gentleman proposes further to add to the public burdens by appointing two supporters of the Administration to seats in the Senate. I am quite certain that the public opinion of this country is anxious for a reform in that Chamber, that the public opinion of this country is in favor of taking out of the hands of the Crown the appointment of members to the second chamber. That being the case, I think the hon. gentleman should retrace his steps, he should refrain from the exercise of the power which he asks by this particular measure, and he had better wait a while until he sees what the public are disposed to do with reference to the reconstitution of that body.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has evidently got some unholy design against the Senate, and I have no doubt he will carry it out when he becomes a Minister. You see how naturally the hon. gentleman's mind runs towards gerrymandering. We are charged with gerrymandering this House; so he suggests that if he comes in he will gerrymander the Upper House by putting in forty of his friends as senators. Well, I shall give the hon. gentleman full liberty, when he gets on this side, to put forty senators in the Upper House from the North-West. The hon. gentleman always looks towards the United States for his model, and because the Territories of the United States have no representation at Washington, he says therefore we ought not to give it here. They have no representation; they can send two men to make speeches, to sit on the floor of the House of Representatives, and to explain the interests of the people of the Territory—in other words, instead of sending in petitions and papers, to be there on the spot and state verbally what the Territory wants. Now, if my memory does not fail me, the hon. gentlemen opposite—I cannot speak from recollection of the hon. gentleman himself—some of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the last Parliament spoke very strongly in favor of giving representation in this House in the British sense and not in the American sense. Well, we did so, we gave them four members. There was a feeling which I have discerned—and I think I know as much about it as the hon. gentleman—that the Territories did not want to be in any respect in an inferior position from the Provinces, and that they should have representation in both Houses. The hon. gentleman says that this country is not in favor of a nominated Senate. Well, we have just come from the people, Mr. Speaker; we know what the people want, what they have been thinking about. I have been over a very considerable portion of the Province of Ontario, and sometimes my exertions in educating the people to good Conservatism were not exactly successful. But I have never met either a Conservative or a Reformer during my tour that ever brought up the subject of the Senate at all. It is not a burning question, it is not a question at all among the public; it is only by speculative political philosophers that this question is sought to be brought into importance by being discussed here. But the hon. gentleman said that this Act will do away with the balance of power in the Senate. If we look at the British North America Act we will see that that Act was applicable only to the older Provinces, and that the Maritime Provinces had 12 senators, Quebec 12, Ontario 12; but that did not prevent us from afterwards giving representation in the Senate to British Columbia and to Manitoba. I do not think the balance of power has been in any way disturbed by those Provinces being represented in the Senate, although there was no allusion to them, especially Manitoba, in the Act, but I think there was in regard to British Columbia, and certainly as to Prince Edward Island. British Columbia, however, got its representation in both Houses, as did Manitoba, and this is simply a Bill to give the Territories representation in both Houses. If there is going to be any change in the constitution of the Senate it will, of course, apply to the senators from the North-West Territories as well as to those from the rest of the Dominion. If the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) carries out his system of having an elective instead of a nominative Senate, or if the Senate is to be annihilated, of course, in such an event there will be no more senators from the North-West. As to the argument that the revenues of the country are going to be overtaxed by paying the parliamentary allowance to two members of the Senate from the North-West, I think it is a rather small objection to a constitutional Act of this kind which is done for the purpose of placing the North-West Provinces on an equality in every respect with the old Provinces. I think it is too small an addition to our expenses to be worthy of allusion. If the enquiring minds of hon. gentlemen opposite would allow them to consider the question of economy in moving for returns, a judicious economy in the expenditure for that purpose, it would enable us to give the North-West Territories a dozen senators instead of two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think any hon. gentleman on this side of the House has the slightest objection to these Territories being represented in due proportion to the number of their inhabitants. If we have any objection at all, it is an objection which goes much further than the North-West Territories, and the objection is a very well-founded and well-grounded one; it is to any small number of people in any part of the Dominion having a representation on the floor of this House many fold in excess of what their number would entitle them. One of the fundamental features of our federal compact was that each Province should be represented here in proportion to its numbers. That fundamental feature the hon. gentleman, and I think inadvisedly and unwisely, has repeatedly violated. Perhaps one of the least objectionable violations is in regard to these North-West Territories, because we may hope, in spite of the exceedingly unfortunate results that have so far attended the exertions of the Government in settling those Territories, that a better day may dawn for them, and they may within a moderate number of years acquire a population entitling them to four representatives on the floor of this House. I have seen so much in the past few years of the very great misfortune which has befallen this country from the extreme ignorance of responsible Ministers about that country, that I am glad to see anyone here who can speak with knowledge as to the affairs of the North-West, as I have no doubt my hon. friend can do. Although I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will be able to obtain a couple of gentlemen in the North-West willing to take one thousand dollars a year and their mileage, the same objection which I stated applies as to the disproportion of representation to population in the representation which the hon. gentleman proposes to give the North-West Territories in the Senate.

There are about 23,000 people in the North-West Provinces, or there were that number when the last census were taken. That number does not entitle them to the representation which the hon. gentleman proposes to give them in the Senate, on a numerical basis at all events. The Province of Prince Edward Island with its 100,000 souls has three or it may be four, I forget which.

Mr. DAVIES. Four.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Our own Province, with a population of about two millions, has a representation of but twenty-four; and although there may be a fair reason for granting to the various groups throughout this country a somewhat larger representation than the numerical one, still I do not think that, looking at what is done in the Senate, which I notice is adjourned for a fortnight at this very moment, from having nothing to do, there is no very burning necessity for having more than one representative from the North-West Territories. There is another point to which the hon. gentleman alluded, in regard to which I beg to take exception. The hon. gentleman travelled all over Ontario, and he said he did not find a single man, Conservative or Reformer, who had any objection to make to the Senate, or who thought that the Senate was a body of partisans appointed by the Government of the day. I travelled all over Ontario and visited a great number of places, and I venture to say this, that if the elections in the various counties had been conducted on an honest voters' list, on a voters' list made by the people and not by partisans of the Government, the hon. gentleman would not occupy his present seat to-day. But whether this be the case or not, I have this to say: In no one assembly out of the scores I addressed, attended largely both by Conservatives and Reformers, did I fail to call attention to the blot on our system of representative government, caused by the existence of a Senate, which was nominated exclusively by the Government of the day; and in no one of these places did I find any single question which seemed to take more hold of the popular mind, which seemed to commend itself more to the audiences (composed as they were of both Conservatives and Reformers), and if men of both political parties expressed themselves to me after the meeting more unreservedly on one question than another, it was as to the fact that the Senate, as now constituted, is a disgrace and a scandal in every respect to our system of government. It is not like the British House of Lords; there is no sort of comparison—it is not fit to be named in the same year, let alone on the same day. It is a perfectly useless, worthless body of partisans, and the sooner it is reformed the better for the people of the country, although it may not be better for the hon. gentleman and the party he controls.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to add a word to what has been said in regard to this matter. I apprehend that the leader of the Government does not make this addition to the Senate because he is fearful of being too weak in that revered body. I think the relative proportion of parties is about 15 to 63.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About two to one.

Mr. CHARLTON. The addition is not necessary, therefore, in the interest of his party? I rise, however, to corroborate what my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated. The First Minister could have hardly judged very accurately the condition of sentiment in the west if he supposes that the Senate of Canada is a popular body with the great mass of the people. I as well as the hon. gentleman travelled somewhat through Canada, and whatever sentiment might fail to receive the approval of the audiences, the one which was sure to meet with approbation was any reference in an unfavorable sense to the Canadian Senate. The Senate, Sir, is unquestionably unpopular with the people of Canada. The people of Canada recognise it as a useless appendage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

age to the Parliament of this country, a packed body of partisans—

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether it is in order to speak of the second chamber of the legislature in those terms.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would say upon the question of order which the hon. gentleman has raised, that there can be nothing disorderly in speaking of the Senate as a packed body of partisans, unless the hon. gentleman thinks it is discreditable to be considered a partisan of the Conservative party. If the hon. gentleman thinks that the Conservative party is right in its views, that it is an honest, respectable party, why it is, of course, no discredit to the Senate to speak of it as a packed body of partisans of the Tory party.

Mr. McNEILL. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is now whether two new members ought to be added to the Senate, and, of course, it is competent for hon. gentlemen to discuss the advisability of such a measure, and even to dispute the usefulness of that honorable body. As to the expressions used by the honorable member for Bothwell, I consider them rather objectionable, and I do not think such language ought to be used towards a legislative body which forms a part of our Parliament, and which, as such, ought to deserve the respect of this House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I accept your ruling. I have this to say in explanation—that I spoke of the Senate as a partisan body, because, Sir, it does not in any sense reflect the sentiments, or wishes, or feelings of the people of this country. The people in this country have no voice in the selection of its members; they are placed there by the nomination of the Crown; they are invariably men of one party. When a Reform member of the Senate dies his place is filled by a gentleman of the other party, and if the right hon. gentleman remains in power five or six years longer it is possible that you would not have five Reform members in that Chamber. If he should remain in power for ten years it would be a body which in all probability would be unanimously Tory—a body in which not a representative of one of the great political parties of this country could be found; and it was speaking in that sense that I referred to the Senate as a packed partisan body. I only had reference to the mode in which it was constituted. At the time the point of order was raised I was saying that if there is one unpopular feature of Canadian affairs, if there is one sentiment which appeals to public sympathy, in speaking to the people of this country, it is a denunciation of the mode of constituting the Senate, and the assertion that it is an unnecessary and a partisan body. With regard to the statement of the right hon. gentleman, that he comes here to this House with the approval of the people with regard to the constitution of the Senate and all the public questions that were raised in the election, and that therefore his policy with regard to the Senate is approved by the people, the answer to that statement is that we have not got an unbiassed, free, direct opinion from the people of this country. If the hon. gentleman had taken away either the Gerrymander Act, the Franchise Act, or the corrupt influences used by the Government, we would have come here with a majority; but, handicapped as we were with all these three influences and outrages, we have not got a free expression of the popular will. The hon. gentleman owes the majority at his back, not to an untrammelled expression of the popular sentiments of this country, but to the influences I have named—to loading the dice, to the arrangement of the constituencies in such a way as to enable two hundred and fifty thousand Conservatives in Ontario to exercise as much influence as would three hundred and fifty thousand Reformers, to the fixing of the Franchise Act, and to the accumulation of a great fund of money which we know was lavishly used in the election and the results of which we see to-day. There has been no free expression of public sentiment. The right hon. gentleman, I believe, asserted that I got some money from Michigan. I think this assertion was made when he visited some friends in Toronto, when he called together the manufacturers of that city to meet him. It is said that the right hon. gentleman once appealed to a meeting of manufacturers, when asking for election funds, and told them that they ought to remember their friends; that they should not act like the swine picking up the apples under the trees, without remembering the bountiful and munificent hand that was shaking down the apples. The right hon. gentleman appealed to the manufacturers in this case, and he went on to say that the Reformers were accumulating a fund, that Charlton had been to Michigan appealing to the lumbermen of that State, and that he had come back with a large amount of money. Well, as the hon. gentleman made this statement in a way that gave it publicity, I may say that I had not been in Michigan for many months, that I never received a dollar from Michigan or any other portion of the United States for any political purpose whatever. With regard to the use of money in the elections, I may state that it was with the utmost difficulty that the Reform party were able to raise a meagre sum of less than ten thousand dollars to pay the expenses of committees, to furnish campaign literature, and to supply speakers in various parts of the country. So far as any influences of that kind were used, if used at all, they were used on the side of the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman boasts that he came to this House from the country with a majority at his back, but I tell him that he has not come here with the verdict of a free unbiassed expression of opinion by the people, but that he comes here by virtue of the Gerry-mander, the Franchise Act and boodle.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman speaks of something I said in Toronto. Well, I dare say that is a subject which will come up in this House at another time, and then we will discuss more about it and where it came from. As regards the statement that we do not represent the people of Canada, that we are not here by a full, fair expression of the majority of the people—that I deny; and the statement is only made by hon. gentlemen opposite because they were utterly disappointed by the result of the election. Although there was the Gerry-mander Bill, as they call it, although there was this objection and that objection, hon. gentlemen opposite were satisfied they were going to carry the country. There is indubitable evidence that they made arrangements in the belief that they were going to be transferred from the cool shades of opposition to this side of the House. There is indubitable evidence before us and before the country that hon. gentlemen were so satisfied of that, that all the preliminary arrangements of many of them were made so that they could at once take full possession and govern this country. Here in Ottawa, in Toronto, and in other great centres we know that there were pro-scription lists made out, equal to those which were prepared by the old Roman triumvirates, to cut off the heads of the unfortunate Conservatives who had offices worth anything, and perhaps in a good many cases their successors were already indicated. We know that a great many men worked at the election with the understanding that Mr. Blake was certain to come in, and that the Tories had at last come to the end of their tether. The Conservatives were going out and the Reformers were coming in, and I am sorry to say that we have found, in very many cases, that the civil servants, believing in the open and ostentatious statements as to the certainty of the Reformers carrying the country—and they were told at the same time in Prince Edward Island and elsewhere that they would be punished if they did not vote on the winning side—I say we found that these civil servants, a body which used to be said was of course going with the Government of the day, were voting as a general rule against the Government for fear of their being dismissed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, for fear of being dismissed by the incoming Government. The policy of ux victis was going to be carried out to the utmost extent; and I ask the hon. gentlemen if that does not prove that they fully expected to carry the country, gerrymander or no gerrymander. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they did not believe until the last hour that they were going to carry the country. The people of Canada had before them the whole policy of the Government of the day for the last eight years; they had before them the statements of a different policy which would be pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the people of Canada showed their approval of the policy of the Government, both as to its legislation and its administration, by returning a large majority in its favor. It was a very remarkable thing that they should have done so for the third time in succession, because we all know that just as the people of Athens tired of hearing Aristides called "the just," so the people of Canada might be supposed to be tired of hearing that the National Policy was a great success, that the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway was an exhibition of great administrative ability and boldness, and had raised the prestige and credit of Canada to an enormous extent, and therefore it might naturally be supposed that we could not last forever, and hon. gentlemen opposite might fairly expect that their turn would come. But it was the ingrained opinion of the people of Canada that the five years administration of hon. gentlemen opposite were five years of misfortune, disaster and incapacity of every kind. Notwithstanding all our faults, all our shortcomings, all our errors, they thought it better to keep us, after eight years of mismanagement, according to the statement of these hon. gentlemen, and to give us a commission to misgovern the country for five years more. I said I would challenge the hon. gentlemen to say whether they did not expect to carry the country beyond a doubt. That belief existed after the 22nd day of February, and it existed especially in the mind of the hon. leader of the Opposition. You may remember that on the night of the 22nd it was pretty well known that we had a majority; but the North-West and Manitoba elections were still to come on, and so the Grit press, with that energy and accuracy which distinguish them, telegraphed all over the west that the Tories were down, the reign of corruption had ended, and the party of purity had carried the country by a majority of eight. They have a Grit party, or the nucleus of one, in the town of Victoria, in British Columbia; and they, believing these telegrams—and it was a wonder that the Grits, knowing what their press was, did believe them—telegraphed to the hon. leader of the Opposition their hearty congratulations on his glorious victory. That telegram, according to its date, left Victoria at 2:37 the next day, the 23rd of February. By that time I think it was pretty well known that this majority of eight was rather mythical than otherwise; but on the 24th, two days after the election, the hon. leader of the Opposition telegraphed: "Thanks for your congratulations; work with all your heart and complete the victory." So that two days after hon. gentlemen opposite had been beaten, horse, foot and artillery, such was the impression upon their minds that they would not believe the plainest facts, and they still believed that they had carried the country, and that the reign of corruption was over. These are the exact words of the telegram:—

Mr. McMULLEN. How did you get it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Why, it was published in the Grit papers of British Columbia.

"TORONTO, 24th February, 1887.

"To J. C. McLAGAN.

"Thank Victoria Liberals for congratulations. May they do their duty and complete a Liberal triumph.

"EDWARD BLAKE."

This was sent two days after the election had been held. Now, Sir, let us return for a moment to the question of the Senate. I was led away by the eloquent speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, to follow him in his rather discursive discourse into things in general. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated that he objected to there being a disproportion between the number represented and the number of representatives. Well, that is to a certain extent the case in these small communities. The same objection was taken when Manitoba was granted a constitution as a Province. It had then a very small population indeed; but it was argued in the House—and Parliament saw the reasonableness of the argument—that it would be of no use to give them one man to sit in the Senate without a friend to communicate with in regard to the affairs of his Province. The proper course was to give them a certain number, and provide that that number should not be increased until the population of the Province reached a certain point, when it would fall into the same arrangement of representation by population provided by the British North America Act for the other Provinces. I suppose Manitoba will now very nearly have her right by population to the number of senators she has now. At any rate, the number will not be increased until the population will give the Province the right to have it increased under the provisions of the British North America Act. I think, Sir, this Act will meet with the general approbation of the country. I did not in my remarks say that the whole country was in favor of the Senate. I did not speak of the popularity or unpopularity of the Senate. What I said was that during my political travels through Ontario last autumn and winter, the question of altering the constitution of the Senate or abrogating the Senate altogether was never once alluded to by any speaker or by any person I communicated with during the whole of my travels, so that it could not be a burning question in any sense of the word. It was not alluded to. Nobody asked me: Are you going to alter the constitution of the Senate? I heard a great many enquiries about the matters in which the people were interested, and discussed various questions of importance in public and private during my itinerary, but that question was never put to me from the beginning to the end of my journey.

Mr. DAVIES. I am sure, Sir, no one will grudge the hon. gentleman the time he has taken in singing his little song of victory over the events of the 22nd of February last. He has a right to put a little pluck into his followers. While I admit he has a very accurate knowledge of all that transpires in his own party, I do not think his knowledge extends with equal accuracy to the transactions of his opponents, and he is a little premature in stating that he knows exactly what arrangements were made by us in expectation of the victory. I have no hesitation in saying that we hoped and expected, as we had a right to hope and expect, a victory, and if we did not achieve that victory, no one knows better than the hon. gentleman that our defeat was due to foul and not to fair means. The hon. gentleman smiles, but he knows that what I say is correct. No one in Canada has a better knowledge of this than he, for he superintended the arrangements and devices of his party. The right hon. gentleman intimates that during a rather extended campaign in the Province of Ontario, he had never heard the question of the Senate discussed by the people, and he did not think the people took much interest in it. As far as I can gather from reading of the progress of the hon. gentleman in the "Jamaica," he took good care to deliver his address from platforms where he was surrounded by members of the Government, and where there were no political opponents to challenge his statements. It was not likely he would, at those meetings, hear any matters discussed except those which it was in his own interest to bring before the people. Be that as it may, if the hon. gentleman's information with respect to the political feeling of the other Provinces before the elections, is as inaccurate as his statements with reference to Prince Edward Island, there is not much reliance to be placed on it. He has ventured to say that an important factor in the campaign in Prince Edward Island, where the Reformers did their duty by returning a solid plank to oppose the right hon. gentleman, was threats used against the civil servants of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. I have no hesitation, at this the earliest opportunity, in telling the hon. gentleman that there is no foundation whatever for the statement; and I challenge him to bring before the House the name of the author of that statement, in order that I may give it particular denial. The campaign was conducted there, so far as we were concerned, in a fair, open manner, on broad political issues, such as the action of the Government in connection with the fisheries, in connection with the question of reciprocity, and the question of expenditure, and all other great questions which should come before the people; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that while we succeeded in gaining the support of the electorate of that Province upon these questions, and upon them alone, we were not met in exactly the same way by the hon. gentleman. No one knows better than he that the project of constructing a tunnel across the straits received his imprimatur, a very few days before the elections, and that his letter was circulated through the island. True, with his usual caution, he guarded himself, so that when the letter is read in Parliament, it will be seen he has not positively bound himself to the expenditure of so much money. His followers cheer that. I admit he is an adept at writing political letters of that kind, which to the electors may mean a great deal, but which to the hon. gentleman when called upon to keep his promise, mean nothing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There was no promise.

Mr. DAVIES. The people were led to believe there was a promise, and no man knows it better than the right hon. gentleman. But the assumed promise, the letter which his supporters said contained a promise or a pledge, was circulated from one end of the Province to the other, and the reliance the people placed upon the word of the right hon. gentleman is seen in the representation they have sent here. The hon. gentleman was disposed to deal with the Province still more kindly. Rumor has it, the Local Government leaders stated it on every platform, that they had a letter from the hon. gentleman, telling them he had placed $500,000 to the credit of the people of Prince Edward Island, in the hope they would return six men to support him here. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman is prepared to deny that he gave members of the Local Government the assurance that $500,000 would be placed at the credit of the Province.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I gave no such assurance.

Mr. DAVIES. If he did not, his most prominent supporters in the Island will stand branded before the people as having been guilty of a wicked and a most deliberate lie.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, they will not.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh! that would not hurt them.

Mr. DAVIES. Not only the hon. gentleman, but if I mistake not the Finance Minister was interested in the result of the election, and although not able to come there himself, he had in the previous part of the summer done us the honor of paying us a visit, and had paved the way in the strong political speech which he made at the time he was High Commissioner. He, too, spoke to the people from Amherst, and, if I mistake not, lent the weight of his influence and his voice to the scheme for the construction of a tunnel which would involve the outlay of so many millions. The right hon. gentleman will see, with the positive denial I make, speaking for myself, and I think I can speak for my hon. colleague, for he was with me during the whole canvass, that no threats were made against the Civil Service. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has not only made the statement in this House, but I am given to understand he has already instituted proceedings against those civil servants who had the temerity or the honesty to express, by their votes, their opinion, and has authorised a commission, an inquisitorial commission, to sit in secret, and these men, it is rumored, are to have their heads cut off as servants of the Crown. I know men who have been dragged before the commission charged with having used their influence in favor of the Opposition candidates—men who I was not aware had taken any active interest in the election at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To your knowledge.

Mr. DAVIES. To my knowledge. They had not even canvassed. When the hon. gentleman reads the evidence, he will see that those who gave the information have misled him, that these men who were informed against were not guilty of doing anything else than simply expressing their opinions, as they have a constitutional right to do, by their votes. They may or may not be dismissed. The policy may or may not be laid down by the hon. gentleman that to the victors belong the spoils, but if it should be, all I can say is that the day for the Reformers to return may not be so very far off, and hon. gentlemen on this side may reap some of the benefit of that policy, if that be the policy laid down. Experienced politician as the right hon. gentleman is, he might have manliness enough not to act on mere rumors or information.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By no means.

Mr. DAVIES. No doubt if he acts fairly on the evidence those gentlemen, whose political heads are said to be cut off, will remain in their places.

Mr. JONES. I am rather surprised that the right hon. gentleman should make any reference to the influences which he says were brought to bear against the civil servants in Prince Edward Island or elsewhere. Had the right hon. gentleman been aware of the influences which were brought to bear in the Province of Nova Scotia against a large number of people who held positions under the Government there, I am sure he would have avoided any discussion of this subject to-night. The hon. gentleman went into the discussion of his position here with a majority to support his party in this House, and he was to a certain extent amusing his people with some of the expectations which some on our side of the House entertained previous to the elections. As has been mentioned by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, we had a good right to expect, if there was any sense of fair play, or any honesty in this country, if there was any intelligence in this country, looking at the history of the Government for the last seven years, looking at the extravagance and corruption which had characterised every branch of the Government, that our party should have succeeded on the 22nd February; but we went into that fight like a man going into a contest with his right arm in a sling, with all those influences against us, with corrupt revising barristers and corrupt returning officers, and with the Civil Service against us, and with all these men brought up against us day by day, and with Ministers of the Crown going through the Province of Nova Scotia, to which I particularly refer, promising railway subsidies to every part of that Province, stating that the Government having now completed the Pacific Railway, would carry out their policy and complete all the local roads required in that Province. Why, the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General, during their peregrinations through Nova Scotia, promised subsidies to various railways in that Province amounting to not less than eight or ten millions of dollars. A Minute of Council passed just before the election was scattered through Colchester and Cumberland and Pictou, and, if the present members for those counties are here to-day it is owing to the influence they exercised through those Minutes of Council which they brought there, pointing out that, if they were returned, the Government were going to build those local roads which the people of those counties considered necessary for their interests. In the city of Halifax, we have got about four hundred men who are in the employ of the Intercolonial Railway, and what course did the Government take in regard to them? The requisition to my hon. colleague (Mr. Kenny) and his colleague who ran the election there, was circulated through all the workshops from one end of the city to the other, and these men who were in the employment of the Government were threatened that if they did not sign that requisition the influence of the Government would be brought against them. The day before that election, when it was known that a certain number of railway men in Halifax, wanted to exercise their franchise—and franchise means freedom, and these men should exercise their franchise according to their own judgment—an order came from Moncton, from the head of the Railway Department, and every man in Halifax who was supposed to have any sympathy with the Liberal party was ordered to report himself in Moncton the next day, and every man in Moncton who was supposed to have any sympathy for the Liberal candidate was ordered to report himself at Halifax the next day, and any man at Colchester who was supposed to have any sympathy with our friends there was ordered to be in Moncton the next day, and it was the same thing with regard to Pictou. They were sent from Pictou to Halifax, from Colchester to Moncton, and from Moncton down to Halifax in that way, and so those men were deprived of the privilege of exercising the franchise. I say unhesitatingly that, were it not for the influence of Dominion officials, exercised by order of the Tory committee in Halifax, my hon. colleague would not be here to-day. He does not represent the people of Halifax in that respect. He only represents those who were controlled by the election committee in Halifax, and therefore I say that, when the right hon. gentleman ventures in this House to lecture hon. gentlemen with reference to the coercion of civil servants in this country, he had better take care to make himself familiar with all the facts. When his own colleagues the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General, went through the counties and distributed Minutes of Council which they had prepared for the occasion, if it may not in a legal sense be put down to intimidation or bribery, it was to all intents and purposes offering the greatest bribe they could offer to the people of that country; and when this question comes up, I think they will find that we in the Province of Nova Scotia have no ground to fear the fullest, the most ample, and the most searching investigation that can be had.

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Speaker,——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will say that either this Bill can be read a second time now and this discussion renewed on Tuesday when we go into committee, or we can adjourn the debate. It is not worth while, in view of what is on the paper, to come back again to-night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not object to that on condition that the hon. gentleman will consent that the motions which stand on the paper for Monday in my name may be taken up on Tuesday or Wednesday, as the case may be, as I shall be absent on Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, certainly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6:15 p.m.

Bill (No. 47) to amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. Popo.)

ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. EDGAR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 46) to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to give us some idea of the provisions of this Bill?

Mr. EDGAR. The provisions of the Bill are such as I hope will commend themselves to all hon. members who have recently gone through an election contest, as their experience must have convinced them that a good many provisions of the law required improvement. One provision of the Bill is to ensure greater secrecy of the ballot. There is no use having the ballot at all unless it is a secret one, and I found, from my own experience in voting, in a good many places, as well as from what has been told me by others, that the ballot paper used was so thin and flimsy that the voting by ballot was not by any means secret, owing to the fact that the pencil mark made on the ballot showed plainly on the other side, and could be seen by the deputy returning officers, the agents, the poll clerks, and everybody else. Another little defect has been mentioned to me, and it is this: that in some places a rough board has been provided for a desk or table on which to have the ballot marked, and when this is the case, no matter how thick the paper is, it is apt to show the pencil mark on the other side. I therefore suggest that a hard and smooth surface be provided, as well as a certain thickness of paper. I have made enquiry at the Stationery Office as to the qualities and weights of different papers, and I find that a change to a suitable quality of paper to obviate this difficulty will involve so trifling a difference in cost as to be hardly worth mentioning. Then it is well known that a good deal of difference of opinion has existed between lawyers, as to whether deputy returning officers and poll clerks had a right to vote at the last election. I know that very eminent lawyers have disagreed upon that point, and, therefore, I propose to insert a provision declaring that these officers shall have the right to vote, thus preventing any possibility of disqualification in that way. Then, it is also alleged that abuses have prevailed in some cases by the improper use of certificates given to agents by returning officers. It is alleged that a large number of such certificates have been improperly given by deputy returning officers to persons alleged to be agents. I propose that only two certificates of this kind may be given——

Mr. BOWELL. The deputy returning officer has no power to give them.

Mr. EDGAR. No, it is the returning officer who gives them.

Mr. BOWELL. The only reason I interrupted the hon. gentleman, was because I understood him to say that the deputy returning officers gave these certificates.

Mr. EDGAR. I did say so, but it was a slip of the tongue. It is the returning officer who gives them out, but the deputy returning officer takes the votes, and some of them have so understood the law that they thought it was proper to accept a great many certificates in some cases, and that certainly was not the intention of the law. Then, the law as it stands provides that each deputy returning officer and the poll clerk, after counting up the votes, and before putting their final statement into the ballot box, shall take an oath as to the accuracy of their proceedings. The deputy returning officer must take it before either the returning officer himself or a justice of the peace, which implies that he must keep a justice of the peace on hand at the poll, or else he cannot comply with that provision of the Act. I am sure I do not see how it has been done in the absence of a justice of the peace. The poll clerk is allowed to take his oath before the deputy returning officer, so that in his case there is no difficulty. I propose the simple change, which is at present the law in Ontario as well as in Quebec, that the deputy returning officer may take that oath either before the returning officer or a justice of the peace, as hitherto, or before the poll clerk, so that there will be no excuse for keeping the ballot box open until a magistrate can be obtained. I think these amendments will commend themselves to the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No 22) to incorporate the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers.—(Mr. Shanly.)

Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Emerson and North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Watson.)

Bill (No. 25) to amend the Act to incorporate the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

IMPORTATION OF DISEASED CATTLE.

Mr. MADILL, in the absence of Mr. SMITH (Ontario), asked, Is it the intention of the Government to prohibit the importation of cattle into Canada from Great Britain and Ireland, fearing the introduction of diseased cattle?

Mr. CARLING. The Government have not decided to prohibit the importation of cattle into Canada from Great Britain and Ireland. The whole subject of restrictive legislation is, however, under consideration.

GAZETTING OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) asked, Whether any member of the Ministry had any conversation, correspondence or communication of any kind, mediate or immediate, with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, on the subject of gazetting members elected to this House? If so, which member of the Government, and what was the nature of such correspondence, conversation or suggestions?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. member will move for correspondence it will be brought down. The Government decline to be cross-examined about their conversations with anybody.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. RINFRET, in the absence of Mr. DE ST. GEORGES, asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for a repeal of the Electoral Franchise Act?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not.

STATUTES OF CANADA.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Who were the Commissioners appointed to revise and consolidate the Statutes of Canada? Has the compensation to be paid to said Commissioners for such work been fixed; and if so, what is the amount, and have they been paid in full? Has a claim been made on the Government by any of the Commissioners for further compensation? If so, which of them? Has an application been made to the Minister of Justice for a fiat to file a petition of right for the enforcement of such claim? Was such application granted? If not, why?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am sorry that, as to the first part of the question it must stand, as I left behind me the memo. giving the information. No claim for further compensation has been made by any commissioner, and no application for a fiat to file a petition of right.

BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce any measure whereby the bank circulation will be rendered absolutely secure—say by compelling banks to deposit Government bonds against circulation, as in the United States? Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a measure compelling the banks at all times to keep adequate reserves?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The action proposed could not be done without amendment to the Banking Act. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any amendment to the Banking Act during the present Session.

WEIGHT OF SALT IN BARRELS.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation for regulating the weight of a barrel of salt?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is under consideration.

WHARF AT MATANE.

Mr. FISET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repair the wharf at Matane, and more especially the last work executed under the direction of J. C. Taché, Engineer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have received a note from the Chief Engineer of my department, who states that there are in the department no information showing that repairs are necessary for that wharf.

RIVER RIMOUSKI IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. FISET asked, What is the amount expended for improvements made at River Rimouski in the years 1885 and 1886? Is it the intention of the Government to carry on the said improvements during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount expended in 1885 is about $1,200, in 1886, $1,000. The question of continuing the works this year is yet undecided.

WHARF AT RIVER BLANCHE.

Mr. FISET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry on and complete this next summer the work already commenced at the wharf at River Blanche?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Chief Engineer of my department says that we have no report showing that additional expenses are required for that work.

IMPORTATION OF BUTTER SUBSTITUTES.

Mr. FISHER asked, Whether, since last Session of Parliament, the Government have issued any instructions to the officers of the Customs Department by which proper enforcement of the prohibition of the importation of oleomargarine, butterine, and other substitutes for butter may be effected, or has issued any instructions to the officers of the Inland Revenue Department by which the effective enforcement of the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 42, may be accomplished?

Mr. BOWELL. The Customs Department placed the amended law in the hands of all officers of Customs in the usual way, the result of which was that a few samples of what was supposed to be oleomargarine were sent to the Department to be tested. They were given to the Dominion analyst, who pronounced them to be butter. With regard to the Inland Revenue Department, my impression is there was nothing further done than to give general information to the officers to carry out the law, and the result was as I have already indicated.

FOG-ALARM AND LIGHTHOUSE, MURR LEDGES.

Mr. GILLMOR asked, Is it the intention of the Government to erect a fog-alarm and lighthouse on some part of the Murr Ledges, near the southern head of Grand Manan, and will an appropriation be made this Session for that purpose?

Mr. FOSTER. Preliminary investigations were last year made, and it is the intention of the Government to erect a fog-alarm and lighthouse on one of the Murr Ledges. Whether the construction will be commenced during the present season or not, is still under consideration by the Department.

QUEENS, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. MULOCK, asked, Is it the intention of the Government to pay the cost and expense of the election contest in Queen's, N.B. (other than those of an election by acclamation) in case it should be determined that the returning officer was right in returning G. F. Baird as elected by acclamation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the case comes up, it will be time enough to answer. The whole subject is now engaging the attention of the Department.

SUBSIDY TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has a sum of money been placed to the credit of the Government of Prince Edward Island by the Federal Government, from the first day of July, 1886, up to date? If so, what amount? If not, is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates during the present Session for that purpose? And what sum?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No sum, in addition to the usual subsidy, has been placed to the credit of Prince Edward Island by the Federal Government from the 1st of July, 1876, to date. It is the intention of the Government to ask Parliament at this present Session for authority to grant an additional subsidy of $20,000 to the Province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES. Is that yearly?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have constructed during next summer a new steamer to assist the Northern Light in carrying on winter communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland? If so, what steps (if any) have been taken to that end? If not, how do they propose carrying out the terms of union with that Province, next winter, in respect to such communication?

Mr. FOSTER. The whole subject is now engaging the attention of the Department.

CLAIM OF THE SIX NATION INDIANS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) moved:

That a Special Committee be appointed to examine into and report upon the claim of the Six-Nation Indians, as set forth in their petition presented to this House on 18th April, 1887, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Mills (Pothwell), Dawson, Lister, McNeill, Armstrong, O'Brien, Casey, Paterson (Essex), Burdett, Guillet, and the mover, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: I am not unaware of the fact that, in moving for a special committee of the House with power to send for persons, records, &c., some expenditure is involved, but I think the subject I move upon is of such importance as to warrant it. The claim of the Six Nation Indians to a large tract of land has, I think, been under the consideration of the Government for some years, and the chiefs and warriors of those nations feel they have been unable to obtain a satisfactory explanation, or receive what they deem a satisfactory answer; in short, they feel that the claim they prefer to such lands, mentioned in the petition, is a just and valid claim. They feel that they are unable to present their case as favorably for themselves as they would desire, owing to the lack of full information on the subject; and the First Minister and the House will recognise that I, who present their claim, lie under the same difficulty in not having access to, and in not having the opportunity of examining the documents and records connected with this matter, so that I can only make such representations as have been made by the Indians by myself. I am in hopes that the First Minister will be able to give us some explanation; and if he sees his way clear to send the case to a committee, I hope that committee will be in a position to order all the papers and records bearing on this important matter. It would be well, in order to place the House in possession of the nature of the claim of these warriors, that I should just read the petition which they presented to the House, and which has not yet been read:

"To the Honorable the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, in Parliament Assembled:—

"The Petition of the Six Nation Indians, respectfully and humbly sheweth—

"That, by a certain instrument, dated the 25th day of October, 1784, under the hand and seal of arms of Sir Frederick Haldimand, then Captain General and Governor in Chief of the Province of Quebec and Territories depending thereon, the Mohawk Nation and such other of the Six Nation Indians as wished to settle in that quarter were authorised and permitted to take possession of and settle upon the banks of the river commonly called Oswego or Grand River running into Lake Erie, allotting to them for that purpose six miles deep on each side of the river, beginning at Lake Erie and extending in that proportion to the head of said river, which they and their posterity were to enjoy forever.

"That the Six Nation Indians, from time to time, by deeds dated respectively January 15th, 1798, February 5th, 1798, November 19th, 1809, April 19th, 1830, April 19th, 1831, February 8th, 1834, March 26th, 1835, and January 18th, 1841, surrendered to the Crown that portion of the said lands so granted to them from Lake Erie to the north boundary of the township of Nicol, in the county of Wellington, excepting thereout lands in the township of Tuscarora, Oneida, Onondaga and Brantford, which are held and occupied by your humble petitioners.

"That the head of the Grand River is in the 4th concession of the township of Melancthon, a distance of about forty miles from the north-boundary of the said township of Nicol.

"That the Six Nations had not at any time surrendered a right to the lands between the said north boundary of the township of Nicol and the head of the said Grand River, nor had they been allowed or granted any other lands in lieu thereof, nor had they been paid or allowed any sum for the value of the said lands, but the said lands have been taken by the Crown and sold, and the right and title of your petitioners to the same has been ignored.

"That the said Six Nations believe that they were justly entitled to the said lands in question which they claim according to the reading of the said instrument as the only deed they always recognise—the deed of the said Sir Frederick Haldimand—which they have always had in their possession, and which the Imperial Government also recognised, as evidenced by their action whenever the Six Nation Indians surrendered any land to the Crown, even subsequent to the issuing of the Simcoe deed, which your august Assembly seems endeavoring to put forward in place of the first deed.

"In the report of the Hon. John Henry Dunn, the Hon. George Herchmer Markland, and William Hepbourn, Esquire, the trustees who were appointed by His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor on behalf of the Six Nation Indians to investigate and report for his information on claims preferred by various persons to lands belonging to the Six Nation Indians and situated on the Grand River, are the words: 'The trustees are satisfied, from copies laid before them of the correspondence in the year 1797 between the late President Russell and Captain Joseph Brant, deceased, as well as a power of attorney dated 10th October, 1804, and executed, it appears, by the Sachem and Chiefs at a council especially convened for the purpose, that Captain Joseph Brant was the accredited agent of the Six Nations, and invested with full power on their behalf to obtain deeds from the Crown conveying the tracts of land granted to them on the Grand River by the late Sir Frederick Haldimand in the year 1784, and which grant, it would seem from the correspondence above alluded to, was confirmed by the Home Government during the Duke of Portland's administration.'

"It is therefore the prayer and humble desire of your petitioners that your august Assembly do fully investigate and give your serious consideration to the said claims of the Six Nation Indians now presented before you, and your petitioners in duty bound will ever pray.

"Signed in behalf of the Six Nation Council and warriors,

"WILLIAM SMITH,
"Mohawk Chief."

That is the wording of their petition to the House. It recites in a brief manner the claim that is preferred. The Six Nation Indians, as the House will know, remained during the time of the Revolutionary War true to the British Crown. They lost their possessions in what became the United States of America as the result of that, and the English Government, recognising their services, recognising their loyalty to the Crown, through Sir Frederick Haldimand, then Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec and the Territories appertaining thereto, gave to these Indians, under the hand and seal of Governor Haldimand, a grant of six miles in width on each side of the Grand River from its source to its mouth. Thither these Indians removed, there they were residing, and there their descendants reside today. The House will need no arguments to be advanced to lead them to a sense of justice and right towards these Indians. I do not for one moment desire to seem to intimate that the Government are at all lacking in that matter, but there is this difficulty, I suppose, connected with it: that the First Minister being the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs and the First Minister of the country, has a very great deal to attend to, and perhaps he has not even himself as fully investigated this claim as we might hope to be able to investigate it were a committee granted. The Six Nation Indians being in a peculiar position, standing rather in a peculiar position as wards of the nation, of course it is understood that the Superintendent General himself shall exercise peculiar care and regard for them, though I am not insensible to the fact that, while he stands in that relation to the Indians, and is thus bound to protect all their rights, as head of the Government he has to do what is just and right as between other parts of the community. Nor do I think these Indians desire that anything which they do not believe they are fully entitled to should be done; nor would I be found advocating any claim which I did not believe was founded on justice and equity; nor do I pronounce in any way on the subject, because I have not access to all the documents in regard to it. But these Indians feel that their claim is good, and I believe it is unanimous amongst them, and the correspondence which has taken place, and the answers they have received have not been of such a nature as to satisfy them. My object is to get all the facts in connection with these matters before us, so that we may be in a position to summon representatives of the Six Nations before us who would have an opportunity of stating their case before a committee, which would have the opportunity itself of examining all these different documents. I have no doubt that, if the claim can be established to be a good one, the Commons of Canada, acting in a proper manner, will grant to these Indians what is their right; and I feel equally sure that, if it is made apparent and plain to them that their claim is one which is not founded in justice and in equity, they would be perfectly satisfied after having had this full opportunity of investigating the matter and being assured of that result. But I assure the First Minister and members of this House that, unless this be done, unless some way be adopted in which they can have access to these documents and can have a full understanding of this matter, there will be a feeling of uneasiness, a feeling that they have been imposed upon, that the Government and Parliament of Canada have been careless in reference to their demands and have not given them that which they deem to be their rights. I am not insensible to the fact that it would have been a proper thing to place the name of the First Minister, as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, as the first name upon this committee, but I hesitated to do so, knowing how fully his time is occupied elsewhere. I have understood that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has had a good deal of experience with Indian matters, and, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is unwilling that his name should be put on, I would, with the consent of the House, if the First Minister declines to have his name upon the committee, substitute the name of Mr. McCarthy, of North Simcoe, in place of the name of the Hon. Mr. Mills.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not at all object to the hon. gentleman bringing the subject up; indeed I think the petition having been placed in his hands, he could not do otherwise than to bring it before Parliament. I think, however, that instead of moving for a committee in the first place, he ought to have moved to have papers laid on the Table of the House, all the papers, in order that they might be referred to a committee of the House, and disposed of in the ordinary way. The mere power of a committee to send for papers and records is not regular, nor has it the force of giving possession for any practical purpose, of the papers and records of the Government. The hon. gentleman is quite right in stating that it is the duty of the Indian Department to protect the rights of the Indians. The Department is supposed to be the guardian—or, rather, the Sovereign is supposed to be, and is, the guardian of the rights of the Indians of Canada; and it is the pride of Canada, and of all Administrations, that the Indians, on the whole, have been fairly and liberally attended to. This question, however, is surrounded with a great deal of difficulty. In the first place, it is a very old one—three-quarters of a century old, at least, and has been before the old Province of Upper Canada, before the Province of United Canada, and now it is brought up here. The question is a legal one, and a committee cannot well decide a question of title. It is simply a question of title, and is one of a very considerable magnitude with respect to the pecuniary interests involved in the settlement of this claim. The lands which are claimed by the Six Nations now are not in the possession of the Crown. They belong to other parties, and have belonged for many years, and it comes to this simply, that if this land belongs to the Indians and is improperly disposed of, the Province of Ontario must make compensation to these Indians for the value of these lands. Well, the hon. gentleman opposite shakes his head. Somebody has got to make compensation; the lands have been sold or disposed of; they cannot be transferred to these Indians, because they belong to other people, and therefore if the Indians have been wrongfully dispossessed of these lands, of course they must be compensated either by the Dominion Parliament, or the united Province of Canada, or the old Province of Upper Canada. It is simply a matter of title, and it can only be decided by the courts. The Indians have applied again and again, and Government after Government have decided and have declared that the Indians have no legal nor equitable claim, and I fancy that if it is pressed it will have to go to the Supreme Court in some way or another in order to be decided. The Six Nation Indians, after having brought it up before several Governments for many years, applied to Her Majesty's Government, and they have relegated it here for reconsideration. The matter has been lately before me, and I have carefully examined the papers. I do not wish to express an opinion at this moment, either for or against the claim of the Six Nations. The most proper way and the only satisfactory way of deciding this question, is by having it brought in some way before the Supreme Court—whether by submitting it in the way of a question, or by the Department of Indian Affairs asking for a fiat as against the Crown to have the subject before the Supreme Court, I am not prepared to say. I thought, perhaps, when the hon. gentleman moved just now, that he would have some statement or argument which he had received from his constituents—I will not say his clients—that would throw some light on the subject. The hon. gentleman very naturally said he had no information further than he had gathered from that petition; therefore we are not in a position to grant that committee. I would prefer that the hon. gentleman, instead of moving for a committee, should move for the papers, and I shall see that they are all brought down. They are very important and very interesting, for there is a very interesting question connected with this grant, or supposed grant, from the Lieutenant Governor—I think Lieutenant Governor Haldimand—to the Indians; but we do not know its extent, nor its value, nor what was really conveyed, or promised to be conveyed, to the Indians, and I think, with the consent of the House, the hon. gentleman had better alter his motion and make it a motion for the papers in the meantime. As a reference from England has only arrived lately, or within a very short time, the Government will consider the question whether it ought not to be referred at once to the Supreme Court. When we have the papers, then the hon gentleman perhaps may make up his mind as to the course he will pursue. Of course I feel the full responsibility of my position as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. I feel that the red man should be protected against the white men and against their intrusions upon his rights. I believe that the Government, without reference to political changes in Canada, have always tried to do justice to the Indians. The present Government have every desire to do justice to the Indians. We have no object in not doing justice to them. This question is one of very considerable magnitude, as I have already stated, and perhaps, now that the hon. gentleman has brought it before Parliament, we may as well have it decided, so far as Parliament can decide it, and obtain the opinion of Parliament as to how the matter should be finally disposed of. After hearing the facts hon. members will be of the opinion that the case can only be properly decided by a court of law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the First Minister will explain the difference between this case and the one with which he dealt two years ago, the case of the Mississauga Indians, at Trenton. I think the hon. gentleman in that case made provision out of the public Treasury that a very considerable sum, $40,000 or $60,000, should be paid to those Indians by way of compensating them for some claim about the same age as this claim. I think in that case the hon. gentleman did not invoke the aid of the courts, did not obtain a judicial expression of opinion on the merits, before he dealt with it; and, perhaps, he will be able to say why in this case a different course is proposed to be pursued from that which the Government took in the case of the Mississauga Indians just before the elections.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot speak as to the Mississauga case, because I do not remember the circumstance at this moment. The hon. gentleman has got elections on the brain. He says that case was dealt with just before the elections. I am quite sure the Department decided what was right in the matter. In this case there is a series of legal opinions against the claim of the Six Nation Indians. I speak not by way of comparison, but as to what I think is the proper way of dealing with the case at present before us.

Mr. MILLS. All judicial decisions are matters of comparison.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The observations of the First Minister are, in effect, that I should change my motion. I do not know that I object to do so very much. I had two reasons in moving as I have done, for one of which the hon. gentleman should give me credit. We on this side of the House are often found fault with for moving for voluminous and costly returns. Before taking action I consulted with the Deputy of the Department, and, in fact, the suggestion came from him—it was thought best to move for a select committee which might have before it the original papers and save the work of copying, which would be a task of great magnitude. The other reason was one which pressed itself strongly on my mind, namely, that the work being so great we might not be able to get the papers before the close of the Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You will get them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Of course, if the First Minister makes me that promise, and will lend me his powerful aid, for he can do almost anything as the House is at present constituted—and he certainly can do it with the help of the Opposition—we can, no doubt, obtain the papers. If the case is to go before the courts it is desirable that all the documents bearing upon it should be printed. I would point out also, with respect to obtaining a legal decision, that the Indians' case might fail on some technicality. For instance, it might be held, as it has been held, I believe, in some cases in which incidentally the question of a Haldimand patent came up, that the patent was given under the Governor's own seal, and not the Great Seal. What I would desire to secure therefore, is, that the Indians' claim should be considered as one of justice and equity aside from legal technicality. There can be no doubt that Governor Haldimand gave that patent, whether it is formal or informal. The Government are not acting upon that patent, however, for they recognise a subsequent one, the Simcoe deed, dated 1797, I believe. There was a line struck north-west from the head of Burlington Bay. The Indians do not go by that, but always by the Haldimand deed of 1784. A fact that I cannot very well explain, is, why the Indian Department always recognises the Simcoe deed and ignores the Haldimand deed, and why this has been done in all the surrenders the Indians have made; in fact, all the surrenders have been made under the Haldimand deed, which those who administer Indian affairs have set aside. The Indians have furnished me with a copy of one of the surrenders, and I will trouble the House by reading it, in order to emphasise this point. It is dated on 19th November of the 49th year of the reign of His said Majesty:

"Whereas the Sachems, principal Warriors and people of the Mohawk or Six Nation Indians, in consideration of William Dickson, of Niagara, Esquire, had given counsel and advice and done other professional services to and for the said Nations, did in full Council assembled, at the head of the Lake, on the 19th day of November, in the forty-ninth year of the reign of His present Majesty, deeming such services worthy of remuneration, decree, resolve and determine that on reward and compensation thereof, the said Nations would surrender to His said Majesty, his heirs and successors, a tract of land containing by admeasurement about four thousand acres, situate at the mouth or entrance of the Grand River, by virtue of and under the authority of a certain instrument in writing, under the hand and seal at arms of Sir Frederick Haldimand, late His Majesty's Captain General and Governor in Chief of His Province of Quebec and Territories thereon depending, (now His Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada,) done at the castle of St. Lewis, the twenty-fifth day of October, 1784, and in the twenty-fifth year of His said Majesty's reign, to the intent that the said tract of land so to be surrendered should be granted by His said Majesty, his heirs or successors, to the said William Dickson for the purposes aforesaid.

That is a copy of one of the surrenders made by them, and it is an instance, as I am informed, of the fact that in all the surrenders made the Haldimand deed is referred to and not the Simcoe deed. It appears to my lay mind there is a point in the Indians' favor in that circumstance, and it is a point that requires explanation. It has been stated in some of the courts where the question has been incidentally raised, that the Haldimand deed was informal; but that deed, whether informal or not, was some years afterwards registered in the Secretary's office, and the Simcoe deed was not registered. This statement with respect to the Simcoe deed is made on the authority of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), for I do not know it myself. I mention these matters to point out to the House that there is a case for investigation, and as the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said when the First Minister took into consideration the claim of the Mississauga Indians, and without any recourse to the courts, but determined on the authority of the Department, the Department making the award—I say this made them more strong in their belief that their object can be attained by a proper representation of their case. I do not know that it is necessary to say more, after the First Minister has indicated the direction in which he would like this enquiry to proceed. Of course, as the Indians are very much interested in the matter, I rely on his promise that all the papers will be brought down with as much expedition as possible; and I also count on his help to see that they are printed, in order that we may have that advantage in dealing with them.

Motion withdrawn, and the following substituted:—

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all title deeds, patents and records concerning the claim of the Six Nations Indians, in their petition presented to this House on April 18th, 1837."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Would you not add the word correspondence? From a conversation I had with Mr. Vankoughnet, I find that the Department claim that they have the authority of Joseph Brant, acting as the accredited agent of the Indians, for the substitution of the Simcoe deed for the other; and, if that is in existence, it should be brought down with all documents of that kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The motion, as I understand, is to be a broad one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, in the widest sense. Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PURCHASE OF THE NORTH SHORE RAILROAD.

Mr. GIGAULT, in the absence of Mr. AMYOT, moved for:

Copies of the bargains, agreements or contracts made between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, respecting the purchase of the North Shore Railroad between Montreal and Quebec, or between St. Martin's and Quebec; and also for copies of the contracts between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the purchase or transfer of the said portion of the North Shore Railway.

Mr. POPE. Those papers were all laid on the Table of the House last year, I believe; but if there are any which were not, there is no objection to bringing them down.

Motion amended by inserting after the word "copies" the words "all papers not already brought down."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RETURNS OF GENERAL ELECTIONS OF 1874.

Mr. TUPPER moved for:

Return showing as to each electoral district the date of the return made to the writ by the returning officer in each electoral district after the General Elections of 1874, the date at which such return reached the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the date at which such return was gazetted, and all correspondence between himself and the returning officer in reference to the returns.

He said: I wish to explain to the House my object for making this motion, which will be somewhat similar in its result to the motion made a short time ago in reference to the election returns of the last election. It will be recollected that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) laid considerable stress on the fact that, in the returns after the last general election, he found that members on one side of the House seemed to be gazetted exclusively in the first Gazettes after the election, and he took the trouble to explain to the House the result of an investigation he had made into those returns. He said:

"But we know right well when we find that, in the first instance, members on that side of the House are exclusively gazetted, and members on this side of the House are excluded from the Gazette, that it is done for a purpose, and it is the duty of this House to enquire into the irregularities of the proceedings in this particular."

Now, I took the trouble to look up the returns of the election run under the Reform Government of this country—the only election of that kind which had ever been conducted, both before and after, under the auspices of a Reform Government in Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about 1878?

Mr. TUPPER. I said both before and after, but in the election of 1878 the Reform Government ceased to exist by the time the returns were in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. TUPPER. Virtually and constitutionally it ceased to exist.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, not constitutionally.

Mr. TUPPER. However, be that as it may, in explaining the object I have in view it is simply necessary to draw attention to what happened in that particular year, in the same line of argument as that adopted by the hon. member for Bothwell. He found that on the 5th of March, 1887, seven Tories and one Liberal were gazetted. Now, I find that on the 31st of January, 1874, there were gazetted ten Grits and one Conservative. Then, my hon. friend found that on the 12th of March, 1887, twenty-eight Tories and five Reformers were gazetted. I find that on 7th February, 1874, twenty-three Grits and twelve Conservatives were gazetted. Then, I find that the hon. gentleman laid stress on the fact that, on the 19th of March, 1887, fourteen Tories and three Reformers were gazetted, while I find that on the 28th of February, 1874, twenty-eight Grits and eleven Conservatives were gazetted, so that if my hon. friend looks at all the returns he will find that he can find no good argument upon such a coincidence. I make no charge against the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in connection with the performance of his duties in 1874; but I think the returns on that occasion will show that no good charge can be made against that officer in connection with the performance of his duties in the last election. It will be found that prominent names of Reformers reached the Gazette, and were published before those of Conservatives at that time. For instance, there were no less than seven batches of returns after that election made by the Clerk, and published in the Gazette. Those returns continued from early in February, through the month of March, and extended over a period of eight or nine weeks. I find the names of nearly all the prominent Liberals in the first two Gazettes—the names, for instance, if I may be excused for mentioning them, of the leader of the Government of that day, Mr. Mackenzie, Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Ross, Mr. Paterson, Mr. Charlton, and other leading members of the party. I think that fact weakens considerably that portion of my hon. friend's argument. It is quite true, in 1874 the elections were not by law required to be held simultaneously; and whatever difference that may make, I do not think it has much bearing on this point. But, as the Reform party had previously claimed that in justice and right those elections should be held simultaneously, I find in the Toronto Globe the boast was made that Mr. Mackenzie had, so far as possible, carried out the view he had advocated while in Opposition and had, on the first opportunity, though not required by the law, so arranged the elections as to have them, as far as possible, held simultaneously. In Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, the nomination day was on the 22nd of January, and polling day on the 29th of January; and in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island nomination day and polling day were respectively two days later. Therefore, I think the weakness of my hon. friend's argument is tolerably well demonstrated by a reference to the returns about which he knows so much.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have no intention of renewing the discussion of the subject I brought before the House a few days ago. I have a motion on the paper, which will come up to-morrow, when I think I shall be able to show to the House that the views I have expressed already, in condemnation of the conduct of this officer, are amply justified by the returns brought down. The hon. gentleman has moved for a return in connection with the election of 1874. That return will not sustain the proposition he has undertaken to establish. If the conduct of the former Government were as objectionable as the hon. gentleman would seek to have the House believe, I altogether repudiate the notion that a wrong done by one Administration, if a wrong has been done, is any justification for a course being persisted in that interferes with the liberties of the people at this hour. If that Government did wrong, it was the duty of hon. gentlemen, when on this side of the House, to bring their conduct before Parliament, and to see that they were condemned for it. But the statement is not well founded. I have the Gazettes before me to which the hon. gentleman's motion refers, and what do I find? The hon. gentleman read the names of a number of members who were gazetted first; why were they? Because the majority of them were elected by acclamation, and therefore their returns were in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before those of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were at that time under a cloud. I have a list of those names, and I find that among them the following gentlemen who were not Reformers, were gazetted on the 31st of January: Mr. Little, the member for North Simcoe; Mr. Ouimet, of Laval; Mr. Colby, of Stanstead; Mr. Masson, of Terrebonne; Mr. Dugas, of Montcalm; Mr. Lanthier, of Soulanges, and Mr. Desjardins, of Hochelaga. There were thirty-seven members gazetted at that time, twenty-five Reformers and twelve Conservatives, just about the proportion of the two parties in the House. Then, I find in the Gazette of 7th February, thirty-five members gazetted, twenty-three Reformers and twelve Conservatives, about the same proportion. The Conservatives constituted about one-third of the House. In the Gazette I find the names of Mr. McDougall, of Three Rivers; Mr. Ryan, of Montreal Centre; Mr. Pope, of Compton; Mr. Caron, of Quebec Centre; Mr. Baby, of Joliette; Mr. Alonzo Wright, of Ottawa County; Mr. Mousseau, Mr. McGreevy, Mr. Robillard and others. Then, in the Gazette of the 14th of February, I find the names of hon. gentlemen opposite, in proportion to their numbers, to be just as numerous as those of our friends. Do we find all the Conservatives left to be gazetted in the third or fourth Gazette, and all the Reformers in the first or second? Not at all. In this Gazette I find the names of Messrs. Dorion, Cheval, Bernier, Laurier, Fiset, Geoffrion, Huntington, Tremblay and Holton, from Quebec; Messrs. Ross, Church, Melsaac and Coffin, from Nova Scotia; Picard, Charles Burpee, Domville, Anglin, and Smith from New Brunswick. So you will see that the return moved for by the hon. gentleman does not at all establish the proposition he has undertaken to establish. It shows beyond all controversy that the Government of that day did not interfere with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in the performance of his duties. What was the position of things at that time? The law did not require simultaneous elections, and yet the Government adopted that principle. They put the Government on an equality with their opponents in the election, and they abided by the decision of public opinion, honestly and fairly obtained without any undue advantage that administrative influence could give them; and the same fairness was exhibited by the Government in the publication of these returns in the Gazette. If the hon. gentleman wishes a full and fair report, let him amend his return to include the elections of 1878 as well as those of 1882, brought down in the form in which we have the return respecting the elections of 1886, and then we shall see how two elections under a Reform Administration and two under a Conservative Administration were conducted, and whether any undue or improper influence was used over the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in connection with the gazetting of members. I shall show that that officer flagrantly violated his duty, that he violated his oath of office, and the Government ought to dismiss him for his improper conduct.

Mr. TUPPER. My hon. friend seems to think I brought this motion forward as a tu quoque. I said I did not from these facts, which I thought harmless both in 1874 and in 1887, draw any conclusion adverse to the officer under a Reform or under a Liberal-Conservative Government; and I read—and the hon. gentleman repeated to some extent the statement—the same in reference to the numbers returned in these different Gazettes. So far as the hon. member disagrees with me in that matter, we can be both set right by any hon. gentleman who will look the subject up when these returns are all presented. I based my remarks on the opinion that I thought the hon. gentleman had discovered a mare's nest.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was not present at the beginning of the argument, but I judge from what the hon. member from Bothwell said that he imputed to the mover the desire to set off the misconduct of the previous Administration against that of this Administration, and that the hon. gentleman repudiates the idea of any such attitude being taken by him. As one independent of both Administrations, certainly not favorable to the Administration at the date to which the motion refers, and not particularly friendly to the Administration of the day, I entirely agree with the hon. member for Bothwell that the publications of the returns from the different constituencies are so marked in their character, so very unfair, that the House should demand explanations from the Officer of the Crown whose duty it was to publish these, in order that we may find whether his course was suggested to him or whether it was an accident. If it was, it was certainly a very remarkable one.

Mr. MILLS. It is impossible it was an accident.

Motion agreed to.

ICE BOATS—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Return showing the names of all the parties who tendered for carrying the mails to and from the board ice at Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island; the amount of each tender, and to whom contract given?

He said: In my opinion, and in that of the people of the Island, the ice-boats ought to be kept longer on the route. I remember well this winter, I think it was on the 5th or 6th of April, the Northern Light made her first trip from Georgetown to Pictou, and a day or two afterwards boats at the capes were ordered to be put up and the Northern Light got caught in the ice. From that day, there were no mails landed on the island for eight days afterwards and the boats were idle. If the management of the service were left to the Agent of Marine and Fisheries there, he would keep the boats going until later, and far more satisfaction would be given. The least one would expect from the Government, in view of the large number of passengers who cross, would be to keep these boats on the route as late as required. Until the Government think well to build the subway that we hear so much about, or a tunnel, or a bridge, I hope they will keep these boats long enough on the route in the spring to carry mails and passengers, until the Northern Light or some other steamer will be able to cross daily.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY SUPPLIES.

Mr. JONES moved for:

Return of supplies furnished to the Intercolonial Railway, Halifax and Truro, with names of parties, quantity, and prices paid, stating in each case whether by contract or by private agreement.

He said: I make this motion with the object of obtaining from the Government some explanation with reference to the mode adopted in obtaining supplies for the Intercolonial Railway. It amounts to a very large sum in the Lower Provinces, and I have been informed that the same mode is followed there which was followed under the Administration some few years ago, and which then resulted in a very unsatisfactory agitation, as hon. gentlemen on that side will remember. It would appear from all the reports in circulation, that certain parties have the supplying of the road pretty much on their own terms; at least such is the boast among certain friends of the Government in that quarter, and it may also possibly account for the very large stock on hand. I do not pretend to be a judge, but over $750,000 of stores on hand does seem to be a very large amount, when all the necessary supplies can be obtained at almost 24 hours' notice. I move this resolution with the object of arriving at some information as to the mode which the Government propose to adopt of obtaining supplies for that very important public work.

Mr. POPE. I think my hon. friend is laboring under a great misapprehension. Almost all the supplies for the Intercolonial Railway are obtained by tender.

Mr. JONES. Public tender?

Mr. POPE. Public tender. We certainly have not a large quantity of supplies, and all that we do get which are of much consequence without tender are such as we have to get immediately, and they are as small as possible. I have no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman, but I would like him to confine it to some time. I do not know whether he means to have a list of the stores since the railway was built, or what he means.

Mr. JONES. The last year.

Mr. POPE. We will say since 1874.

Mr. MITCHELL. While this subject is under consideration, I would like to draw attention to a matter which is cognate to it, and I would ask the hon. gentleman's attention to the question of some supplies which are obtained at Moncton. I have heard it stated from one end to the other of the county which I have the honor to represent, I have heard statements, insinuations, charges and assertions, that the lumber supplies for the railway at Moncton are confined to one individual—if the hon. gentleman wants his name, I will give it to him—and that that gentleman tenders at a certain rate, and, instead of giving the class of lumber which is asked for, he rushes in all kinds of lumber of all grades and qualities, to the detriment of the fair competitors, many of whom live in the county I represent. I have heard this from many who are connected with the trade. Whether it is true or not I do not know, but I ask the Minister to enquire whether it is true that a certain party resident in the town of Newcastle, who became a very bitter opponent of mine, gets all the contracts for these supplies.

Mr. POPE. Give his name.

Mr. MITCHELL. His name is Edward Sinclair. He has, as I am informed, been constantly supplying great quantities of lumber, and it is said that the quality is much lower than that which is asked for, and which the other competitors have to tender for. I ask the hon. gentleman to make a note of this. I do not want to make any motion in regard to it, but I have the courage to give the name of the man. He was a very active participant against me in the election, and, as he had not taken any part in politics before, and took a very active part then, I thought he might have some reason for it.

Mr. POPE. I thought he might have been a supporter of the hon. gentleman before, but when the hon. gentleman left this side and went to the other, I suppose he thought it his duty to fight him. However, I may say that a large part of the lumber used in Moncton is got outside of this county, because the oak and other kinds cannot be got in the section which the hon. gentleman represents, and as a general thing, the lumber is got by tender. I do not know this man, but I will cause enquiries to be made in regard to the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. MITCHELL. What I complain of is that, while tenders have been asked for a certain class of lumber of one kind, while a first-class has been asked for, a third or fourth quality is supplied. That is the point. My action in changing from that side of the House to this has no significance. I changed my place over here in order to get a better seat; I am as Independent now as I was when I sat there and opposed the hon. gentleman's motions. All those which I thought worthy of consideration—and I do not think there were many—I supported; and I will continue to support any measure which he may bring in which I think a good one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then I shall lose the measure?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know that the hon. gentleman will lose the measure, but he may get a dressing.

Mr. POPE. I accept the apology of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. JONES. The Minister says that he obtained these supplies by public tender. I observe the daily papers in my part of the country with as much regularity as most people, and I have not seen any advertisements for supplies of this kind. It may be possible that the Government have sent simply to their own friends to ask them to tender, but that is not public tender.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I was going to ask in what mode the supplies were tendered for, because I agree with my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) that we do not see these advertisements in the papers. I understand that circulars have been sent around, and, in regard to one building, the first the carpenters in St. John knew of the proposed erection of that building was when the contract was given to a gentleman who managed somehow to get nearly all those contracts on the Intercolonial Railway.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I refer to Messrs. Rhodes, Currie & Co., of Amherst. It was said that the notices were put out, but those sent to St. John, instead of being posted, were discovered some months after the tender was accepted, under some boxes in a portion of the freight house at St. John.

Mr. POPE. I admit that, in the particular case the hon. gentleman refers to, the notices were not put up as it was intended they should be and as they ought to have been. When the hon. gentleman speaks of no tenders having been asked for, he always refers to that particular occasion which has been discussed here again and again. I forget exactly what the building was, but I know that it had to be done in a hurry. The notices were sent out and stuck up, because we had not time to wait; but, as a general thing, the notices are given in the ordinary way.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF BUTTER FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for:

Return showing the number of pounds of butter imported into Canada from the United States, and entered for consumption for the years 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, and up to the 1st of April, 1887; showing also the Provinces into which such butter has been imported and entered for consumption.

He said: I read in the Globe of Saturday, the 23rd of April, the following:—

"IMPORTATION OF ALLEGED BUTTER.

"Since the American Dairymen's Association commenced their war upon oleomargarine, and especially since they secured State and National legislation forbidding the vending or exporting of the stuff except under its real name, there has been a significant change in the quantity of American butter handled in Canada. The following figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns show what the change has been:—

IMPORTS OF BUTTER FROM UNITED STATES INTO CANADA.

Into Ontario and Quebec.	Imported. Lbs.	Entered for home consumption. Lbs.
1883	169,403	26,740
1884	262,359	39,750
1886	932,857	145,925

I took a leading part, and was largely instrumental in bringing about the legislation of last Session dealing with this question, although hon. gentlemen opposite, and the press representing them, claimed all the credit for that measure which the Globe says now is not producing the desired result. I may say that when I read this article I was somewhat surprised, and immediately undertook to investigate the correctness of the statements it had made, because, if the figures quoted by the Globe are correct, some further legislation would be necessary in order to protect the dairy industry, and, I am sure the Government would grant this legislation to the farmers of this country at once. But, Mr. Speaker, I find the figures given by the Globe as being a correct statement, have been manufactured for the purpose of misleading the farmers of this country, and making them believe that they are being injured, when such is not the case. The correct figures were given by the Trade and Navigation Returns. The quantity of butter imported into the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec and entered for consumption in the year 1883, was 115,218 lbs., while the Globe says there were 26,740 lbs. In 1884, the quantity entered for consumption was 13,068 lbs., while the Globe says it was 39,750 lbs.

Mr. CASEY. For Ontario, or the Dominion?

Mr. TAYLOR. For Ontario and Quebec; the Globe only deals with these two Provinces. In 1885 the Globe says there was imported 139,064 lbs., while the fact is there were but 4,468 lbs. imported and entered for consumption in those two Provinces. The Globe says that in 1886 there were 145,925 lbs. imported, while the fact is there were 59,007 lbs. imported and entered for consumption. I also have a statement of the quantity imported during the last six months of the year 1885 and the corresponding six months for 1886, after the Oleomargarine Bill was passed by this House last Session. During the last six months of the year 1885, there were 148,751 lbs. entered into the whole Dominion, and during the last six months of 1886, there were 86,696 lbs. entered for consumption in the whole Dominion. But 78,439 lbs. of that was entered in British Columbia, leaving but 6,167 lbs. for the balance of the Dominion for the last six months of 1886, after the Oleomargarine Bill was passed. For Ontario and Quebec, the quantity was 5,237 lbs. But the Globe goes on further to make some other points in dealing with this matter. It says:

"Why upon earth should one single pound of American butter come into Eastern Canada and pay four cents a pound tax, seeing that Canada exports butter largely to the United States? The answer is not very difficult. The alleged American butter which comes into Canada cannot be butter, but must be oleomargarine. Otherwise, why should the consumption of American 'butter' in Eastern Ontario and Quebec have been multiplied by six in four years' time? Surely the efficiency of our dairymen has not decreased during that time. On the contrary, has it not increased to a most remarkable extent? If there is any other than an oleomargarine explanation of this phenomenon we should like to know it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Globe that it is unnecessary to import butter for home consumption into Canada, and also agree that our country is making rapid and substantial progress, that our dairy industry is progressing rapidly; but I disagree with the statement that 145,925 lbs. of butter were entered for consumption in 1886 for the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, while the fact is that only 69,007 lbs. were entered in those two Provinces in that year, and the great bulk of that was previous to the passing of the Oleomargarine Bill, because since the 1st of

July, 1886, up to the 1st of January, 1887, there were 5,237 lbs. entered; which proves conclusively that the passing of that Bill has acted as a prohibitory measure, practically. The Globe makes another reference. It says:

"And as to the large quantity of American butter which is imported and re-exported—is there any guarantee that this, too, is not oleomargarine? And is it not sent abroad as Canadian butter, to the great damage of the none too good reputation of the real article?"

Well, with that part of the subject I am not prepared to deal, for I am not conversant with the bonding regulations of this country. I do not think, however, that it is possible to import into this country American butter and export it again to the English market as Canadian butter. However, I will let the Minister of Customs deal with that matter, as he is conversant with the regulations concerning importations in bond and exportations, as this charge is directed against the management of his Department. The next point the Globe makes proves conclusively in my mind that it has become an out-and-out protectionist as far as the farmers of this country are concerned. I do not know whether it made the statement when the Oleomargarine Bill was before the House, but it says:

"When the Oleomargarine Bill was before the House of Commons last Session we expressed the opinion that there is no way of excluding oleomargarine from this country save by forbidding the importation of butter. There is not a Custom-house officer in the country that can tell oleomargarine from butter. Even the leading dairy scientists have not yet agreed that there is a perfect test between the two articles. We again say that the only way to protect our dairymen from the competition of oleomargarine is by forbidding the importation of butter."

I am glad that since the hon. leader of the Opposition made his Malvern speech, the Globe has fallen into line, and is now an out-and-out protectionist in the interest of the farmers of this country, and in order to give protection it goes in for prohibition, and would prohibit an article being brought into this country of which we can manufacture enough to supply the home demand. This may be one way to deal with the question, but it might possibly be called a Retaliatory Bill if we were to prohibit the butter of the American and English farmers. I think the better way would be for the Government to raise the duty on butter to eight or ten cents a pound, and that will effectually prohibit oleomargarine being imported into the country and passed off as butter on the Custom-house officers, as I admit it is nearly impossible to tell a genuine article of oleomargarine from a genuine article of butter. But the Globe, when trying to raise a feeling of antagonism between the farmers and manufacturers of this country, says:

"The Government would be fast enough to do this"—

To prohibit butter coming into the country altogether—

"were it a lot of subsidised and tributable manufacturers who were concerned, instead of the farmers."

I wonder the Globe does not remember that the leader of the Opposition said in his Malvern speech, that if he was returned to power the manufacturers would have nothing to fear. The Globe appears to have forgotten that statement, and it intimates, and in fact insinuates, that with the present Government manufacturers are a favored class to the detriment of the farmers, and it gives a long string of figures purporting to have been taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns as a correct statement, in order to prove its assertion. But the statement it has given is not correct in any particular. I have given, in my opinion, the correct figures as I gather them from the Trade and Navigation Returns; but, in order to verify them, I move the motion now before the House.

Mr. CASEY. I think the hon. member must know that he is in error with respect to the claim he puts forward for credit as regards the prohibition of the importation of oleomargarine, for there is no doubt as to where the credit for the prohibition should be given. The hon. gentleman introduced a Bill, not to prohibit the importation of oleomargarine, but to protect its manufacture in Canada. He proposed to place a duty on the imported article such as would make it profitable to establish the industry in this country, and even informed the House that a company with large capital was to be established in Montreal for the manufacture of the article. The Minister of Inland Revenue had also a Bill imposing duties on that article. I believe I was myself the first to suggest that it would be impossible, if oleomargarine were allowed to be manufactured in the Dominion, to provide that it should not go into consumption here, and that in any case such an article would compete abroad with our home made butter. The idea was opposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by some hon. members on this side of the House. Finally, on the motion of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), who was the first to place the matter in shape for the House to act upon it, the House adopted the plan of prohibiting the importation of oleomargarine, and the Minister's Bill was amended accordingly, and became a prohibitive Bill. As to the figures of the Globe, quoted by the hon. member who last addressed the House, I cannot pretend at the moment to say how far the Globe may have miscalculated in quoting figures from the public documents. It could certainly have no object in intentionally misrepresenting them, for so many members had copies of the document, and would be gratified to find a flaw in the Globe's figures. But there is a general understanding now that the prohibition of oleomargarine is an absolute necessity to the preservation of our butter market in Canada. Whether the prohibition of the importation of butter is such a necessity, there is room for argument; but it does not become hon. gentlemen opposite to urge that there would be anything unfair in such prohibition. The farming class have been taxed for a long time for the support of the manufacturing class, and we would only be asking that protection be extended all round, as was promised when the National Policy was originally introduced. Whether this mode of protection is necessary it is not now the time to consider; but the Minister should give special attention to the task of prohibiting the introduction of oleomargarine into the country. There can be no doubt, that in order to prevent such an importation, much attention will be required, for the two articles are very similar, and nothing short of a chemical or microscopical test will decide the matter.

Mr. BOWELL. Some chemists say that will not detect.

Mr. CASEY. I think that a microscopical test is a pretty safe one. At all events, it would not be difficult to have experts appointed. If every sample of supposed oleomargarine is to be sent here to be tested, much trouble will be involved, and in practice it will not be done, the Customs officers passing it on their own responsibility, but if it was referred to some chemist or expert in butter in the town where the entry was attempted to be made, much time and trouble would be saved. It would be impossible, I suppose, to do as was done in some other trades, to have a butter expert appointed as a Customs officer at such places where butter was imported. That would, perhaps, be doing too much for the farmers, but I believe it will prove to be the only effective way of completely prohibiting the importation of oleomargarine. I hope the Minister will use his best efforts to secure the object we have in view.

Motion agreed to.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS IN THE THUNDER BAY DISTRICT.

Mr. DAWSON moved for :

Return of all reports of surveys and explorations made under the direction of the Geological Survey Office, within the past two years, in the Thunder Bay District to the westward of Port Arthur.

He said: Surveys have been going on for some years past to the westward of Port Arthur, under the direction of the Geological Survey, but we have had no report as yet of what has been discovered in that interesting country. No doubt the Geological Survey sent very able officers and men of great experience there; but what avails all that when we have not received any report? I ask that a return be made of the reports of those gentlemen who were sent into that district. The Geological Survey have discouraged mining enterprises; they have told people who proposed to enter into such enterprises that they would be likely to lose money, and they warned them against the investment. Independent, however, of the survey, explorations have been made during the past few years by other persons, and they have been attended with marked success. To the south-west of Port Arthur and north of Lake Superior, gold mines of immense richness have been discovered. One is now being worked with a large force of men, and with stamps and all the necessary machinery. The same remark applies also to our silver region. Very valuable silver mines have been discovered there of late, not by our Geological Survey, but by other explorers and scientists who went in there on their own account. I may mention one instance. There was a gentleman came from Duluth who possessed a large amount of capital, and he was very much struck and pleased with the appearance of the country. He selected a location which had nothing in particular to recommend it more than any other part of the district, excepting that it had a few promising mineral lodes passing through it. He employed experts and scientific men, and they recommended him to go on with its development. He accordingly went on developing his mine, and expended $150,000 upon it without its resulting in any return whatever. But such was his confidence in the experts that he continued at the work and at last he has his reward. Within the past three months they have taken out one million dollars' worth of silver from that mine. The place I refer to is the Beaver Mountain mine. Another and similar case was that of the Rabbit Mountain, which, after a little surface exploration, was about abandoned by our own people. A few Americans came in with skilled miners and they determined to sink a shaft. They did so, and in a short time passed through one hundred feet of solid silver and already they have $400,000 of that metal on or near the surface. Some of our mining and geological experts have been there, but yet we have no report—nothing to show the world at large that such a place exists. And it is not silver alone that will be found there. There are immense operations in iron ore going on in Minnesota just across the boundary line, and last summer they exported from that region to a place called Two Harbors, on Lake Superior, 350,000 tons of iron ore. The iron bearing range of Minnesota undoubtedly passes into our side of the line a little to the north of the silver mines. There have been skilful young men from the Geological Survey there exploring, and they were highly impressed with the value of the country; and yet in three years we have not before this House a single word to show what that country is. It is for this reason that I move for these papers, and I hope they will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

TRACADIE HARBOR, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. WELSH moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, departmental orders, reports and other papers relating to Tracadie harbor, Prince Edward Island.

He said: I think this is a matter which has been under the consideration of the Government for some years past, but I have not heard whether they decided to take any action in regard to it. It is very important for the residents of that place that some action should be taken. At one time it was one of the finest harbors on the north side of Prince Edward Island; it was a coaling station, and Her Majesty's ships passed in and out frequently. At present it is nearly filled up with sand, for the want of proper care and attention. The people there mostly depend on fishermen, and it is in such a state that even boats can hardly pass in and out. I will read an extract from a speech made by Hon. Senator Haythorne, in which he referred to this harbor:

"In a state of nature Prince Edward Island possessed very many valuable harbors on its north coast which, for many years past, since the settlement of the country, have silted up at their entrances with sand and other debris, and this has been the case with the harbor called Tracadie, concerning which I have given notice. There is a large area of land-locked water there, inside of the harbor, round which reside a numerous and enterprising body of fishermen. The industry of these men is now very much confined to boat-fishing, whereas, in former times, notably during the time of the French occupation, vessels of considerable burden used to frequent the harbor; and not only so, but vessels that had the misfortune to be caught in storms off the coast frequently sought safe refuge in Tracadie harbor from the winds and waves * * *. I think it will cause a good deal of disappointment if nothing is done for this particular harbor. I should like to add that the action of the Government of late years, with reference to several other harbors similarly situated on the coast of Prince Edward Island, has been very successful, that the silting up of the bars has not only been arrested, but they have been very considerably deepened in many instances, and I believe as a rule the works lately constructed have withstood the winds and waves remarkably well. There is, therefore, the greater encouragement to repeat the experiment with regard to Tracadie harbor, and as the harbors east and west of this particular one have been successfully treated, it is hoped that the same will be done with regard to Tracadie."

I may call the attention of the Government to the fact that the people living all along the north shore from St. Peter's to New London Harbor mostly gain their livelihood by fishing, and if this harbor were dredged out it would be a very great benefit to them. I believe there have been surveys made of it, and the people have been led to believe that the matter would be taken up by the Government. I may say, for the satisfaction of the Government, that nine out of ten of the people who live around this harbor are Conservatives; and if by telling the Government this fact I can be the means of getting this matter considered, I am very glad to do it.

Motion agreed to.

NOVA SCOTIA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. EISENHAUER moved for:

All correspondence between the Government and Nova Scotia Central Railway Company relating to a subsidy for said railway; also the report of the Government engineer sent to examine the work.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Government, and more particularly the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways, to the reason he gave in his place in Parliament, last Session, for not bringing down a measure of relief to the Nictaux and Atlantic Railway then, and also to remind him of the pledge he then gave that the Government would make provision for the road next Session. It will, no doubt, be within the recollection of those hon. gentlemen who sat in this House during last Session, when the Government resolutions providing for subsidies to some thirty odd railways, that the Nictaux and Atlantic road was referred to by Mr. Woodworth, then member for King's. The hon. leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) and Mr. Vail, then member for Digby, advocated a subsidy for this road. It seems, however, that the hon. Minister of Railways was not present when the road was referred to on the 28th of May. I will just read a few extracts to show what occurred in this House last Session with regard to this road. Mr. Woodworth, speaking on the evening of the 28th May, said:

"What did the Government do, this argus-eyed Government, when fifty members of the House of Commons signed a memorial to the Government begging them in the name of Heaven to help the western part of the Province of Nova Scotia—the Nictaux and Atlantic road, which is lying there in a state of utter collapse, with the sleepers rotting, an attempt having been made to build this road ever since 1877, the company having received a subsidy from the Local Government which was, however, totally inadequate to complete the undertaking. This argus-eyed Government did not turn their eyes in that direction. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) implored them almost on his knees to listen to this memorial, which graphically portrayed the extent of that road, and its necessity, which gave the report of Martin Murphy, the Provincial Engineer of Nova Scotia, extracts from which showed the absolute necessity of the road and that the counties of Shelburne, Queen's and Lunenburg had no railway communication with the outside world. I do not mean to say that they have not touched it. I do not know what goes on in that great Saubedrin in the Eastern Block. I do not know what they say or do, or what may be in their minds now. They may bring it down; but the observation of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Allison) has brought to my notice the fact that these men do not require any representation; when they see a great and necessary work like this, they bring it down. If they do not, I think the western counties of Nova Scotia will speak out with no uncertain sound. I think they will have something to say about this argus-eyed Government."
Mr. WELSH.

After Mr. Woodworth finished his speech several other gentlemen advocated the claims of the road. On the following day, the hon. Minister of Railways, who appears, from his remarks, not to have been present when the discussion was going on, said:

"I would like to say that while I was absent last night—not being able to be out very much in the evening—my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), and my hon. friend from Prescott (Mr. Shanly), stated that a certain road in Nova Scotia was of very great importance in that section of the country. I regret, Sir, that I had not been informed of it earlier, so that this road could have been placed on the list of those subsidised by this Bill. I will say, however, that the Government will be prepared to come down with a measure of relief for this road next Session."

I am informed that Mr. Kaulbach did not then stop his efforts on behalf of this road, but continued to urge the Government to grant it aid. In view of the memorial, signed by fifty members of the House last Session, and the discussion which had taken place on the floor of this House previously, it seems very strange that the hon. Minister was ignorant of the claims of this road up to the 29th of May. Now, the question arises, what became of this memorial? Perhaps it was put into one of the pigeon-holes in the hon. gentleman's office; it may possibly be that the hon. gentleman never saw it. I must say I am at a loss to reconcile his statement that he had not been informed of the claims of this road with all these facts to which I have alluded. Now, it seems to me that the Government had no intention of making any provision for the road previous to the vigorous speech of Mr. Woodworth on the 28th of May, in which that gentleman denounced the Government in strong terms for overlooking its claims. I think it was only after Mr. Woodworth gave the Government to understand that those western counties would have something to say about the matter, that they promised to reconsider it favorably this Session. I am sure I need not dwell on the great importance of this road and the claims it has for public aid. Mr. Murphy sets forth its claims very fully, and I find by the Official Debates that they were also fully discussed in this House. When we consider that the Government last Session subsidised upwards of thirty different railways, five or six of which are situated in Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island, and, so far as I am aware, roads on which not a sod was turned or for the construction of which no company was organised, I think the Nova Scotia Central was fully entitled to consideration. That railway was commenced ten years ago, and up to last year a very large number of bridges and culverts had been built, and the road is well forward. But for the want of aid the company have been obliged to proceed very slowly. I think it is not necessary for me to say much more at present, for I hold that the Government are committed to providing a subsidy for this road. The people of the county I represent expect it, and I am sure the Government cannot stultify themselves and go back on the promise the Minister of Railways made in Parliament.

Mr. JONES. I think the representation of my hon. friend from Lunenburg will have been very opportune if it reminds the hon. Minister of Railways that such a place as Lunenburg exists in the Province of Nova Scotia, of which he was apparently not aware. However, the railway to which my hon. friend refers is one of very great importance to that section of the country, because it not only intersects a very fine district, but opens up communication between the Windsor and Annapolis Railway and the town of Lunenburg, which is one of the largest and most important towns on the western coast of the Province. If the hon. gentleman refers to the statistics of exports from that place, he will be able to gather an idea of its importance; and as it has no communication with the outside world except by water, I think the hon. gentleman will see that the expectations of the people of Lunenburg are very moderate in asking the Government to facilitate the completion of that road. The Local Government went as far as they could under the circumstances, and, during the time the hon. member for Lunenburg was in the Local House, obtained a grant which was the commencement of that road; but they had not sufficient subsidies to finish it. Looking at the amounts which have been granted in other parts of the Dominion to other roads of no more important character, and, I may say with all due respect, of less important character, I think we had fair grounds for hoping this road would receive Government assistance before this. However, my hon. friend has placed this before the Government, and I trust when the Estimates come down the result of his appeal to the Government will be shown to be successful.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). My constituency is somewhat interested in this road, half of which runs through the county of Annapolis, and there is no doubt that the road, when completed, will be a great benefit to that portion of the Province. It has been a long while on the carpet now in Nova Scotia. We have had two men with two pickaxes, two wheelbarrows and two shovels, about long enough on that road, and now I would like to see it completed. I think it rests with the Dominion Government to complete it, and I am quite convinced it will not be finished until the Dominion Government take hold of it. The letter given to Mr. Kaulbach, the member for Lunenburg, last Session, was circulated with a great deal of freedom throughout the county of Annapolis. That letter was written by the Hon. the Minister of Railways, and the fact ought to be sufficient to satisfy any hon. gentleman that the subsidy will be granted. I have rested in security in the matter, troubling myself but little in it, relying almost exclusively upon the letter given to Mr. Kaulbach last year, and I am quite convinced the Dominion Government will, when the estimates come down, furnish the requisite subsidy to complete the Nova Scotia Central Railway. It can only be completed when the Dominion Government takes hold of it, and I am quite convinced it will do so.

Motion agreed to.

NOVA SCOTIA—BETTER TERMS.

Mr. JONES moved for:

Correspondence between the Government and the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia, relating to the financial condition of that Province.

He said: It is not always a very pleasant duty to parade the poverty of one's own Province, and the position in which it stands, but I have less hesitation in doing so on this occasion, because I shall not be required to use my own arguments in laying before this House, very briefly, a statement of the financial condition of Nova Scotia to-day. I shall be able to show the House, in the language of the hon. the Minister of Justice, which I am sure will receive acceptance on his side of the House, that, under her present financial condition, it is impossible for Nova Scotia to continue the public service as heretofore sustained. At the time of the Union, when Nova Scotia took just grounds of complaint that the financial arrangements made under the terms of Confederation were less favorable to that Province than to the others, an arrangement was made by which the sum of $1,186,000 was added to the debt which Nova Scotia was allowed to enter Confederation with in 1867. At the time this arrangement was made, hon. gentlemen may remember there was a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Province of Nova Scotia, not only with the terms of the Union, but against Confederation with Canada on any terms; and the Colonial Secretary of that day, in a despatch to Lord Monck, dated 10th June, 1868, requested "that the Government and Parliament of Canada would modify any arrangements respecting taxation or the regulation of trade and fisheries which might prejudice the interests of Nova Scotia." That arrangement continued until the present time. And when the Government changed in Nova Scotia, and the Government was formed of which the present Minister of Justice was the actual head and Attorney General, a representation was made to the Government at Ottawa respecting the position which Nova Scotia then occupied under the Union. In a memorial addressed to the Governor General, dated 7th January, 1878, the Government of the Minister of Justice said that:

"The condition of the local revenue is of such a character and so inadequate to meet our requirements, even upon the scale of closest economy, that it has been decided by the Government that I should lay before you in as comprehensive a form as may be, an abstract of the financial history of the Province since it entered Confederation up to the beginning of the present year, in order that the resources of the local revenue may be fairly and fully understood and the necessity of some readjustment made more apparent than a mere superficial view of the situation is likely to convey.

The memorial goes on to point out the different amounts allowed the Government subsequent to Confederation, to show the grants which the other Provinces enjoyed as compared with Nova Scotia at that time. The Province of Ontario, which had a population of 1,921,000, had $1.40 per head; Quebec, in 1881, had $2.10 per head; New Brunswick had a population of 321,000, and $1.95 per head; Nova Scotia had a population of 440,000 and she only got $1.18 per head. Ontario thus had for her local purposes 31 cents per head more than Nova Scotia; Quebec had 91 cents more, and New Brunswick 76 cents more. This estimate was made in a subsequent memorial by the subsequent Government, but it is in fact the same calculation which was made by the Government of which the hon. the Minister of Justice was a member. The Government, in their requisition, pointed out to the Dominion Cabinet that, under the present condition of affairs, it was utterly impossible for the Province of Nova Scotia to conduct her public services, and they said that at least $150,000 would be required to enable her to efficiently maintain her service even with the exercise of the greatest economy. It is true that since that time the income derivable from mines and minerals have somewhat increased, and to that extent it would lessen the difference pointed out by the Local Government of the day as requisite for maintaining their local service, they having about $50,000 from the estimates of that day, and according to the same calculation, if our expenses did not increase it would only leave about $150,000 which we were annually going into debt for. Then again the question came up with reference to the amount of interest which was to be allowed us on our debt at the time of Union, and the amounts which were to be added to it subsequently. There was a special reference of this branch of the subject made to the Attorney General, and in this memorial which I hold in my hand from his Government, they go on to say:

"By this Act $1,544,270 was added to the public debt of this Province, but which, under these terms of the Act quoted above should be circulated and allowed as the sum fixed by the British North America Act were increased from $32,590,000 to $73,036,088.84. The interest on $1,544,270, then, should be allowed from 1867 to 1873 on the same ground that it has been allowed from 1873 till now. If this is correct, the Dominion Government ought to allow the Province of Nova Scotia the sum of $463,281, being the interest on the above amount for six years at 5 per cent. per annum. Also the interest on $463,281 from 1873 to 1879, six years, at 5 per cent., $138,984.30, making a total of $602,265.30."

Now, this branch of the question was referred to the Attorney General, the present Minister of Justice, for his report, and the Attorney General makes his report under date of the 27th February, 1880. He says:

"The second section of the Act supports to the fullest extent my contention that the increased allowances made in 1869 were made in consequence of the Province having established her right to have received better terms at the time of the Union, because it is still more plain and strong in its language in dealing with the matter of additional subsidy."

The hon. gentleman then goes on in various ways to point out the legal aspect of the case, and the ground why he thought that contention should be sustained, and he says:

"The Statute enacts—

"It was, and is the intention of the Act first above mentioned that the increased subsidy to be allowed to the Province of Nova Scotia under the said Act, should be based upon the said sum of $9,186,706, as if that sum had been mentioned in the 114th section of the British North America Act, 1867, instead of the said sum of $8,000,000."

"It would be impossible to give effect to the Statute without considering the larger amount of debts substituted for all purposes for the smaller in the British North America Act of 1867 in the same way, and to as full an extent as if it had been originally inserted therein."

I will not detain the House by going over all the financial arguments which were addressed by that Government and repeated by a subsequent Government under a liberal leader. When the Government in which the Hon. the Minister of Justice was Attorney General went out of power, and a Liberal Administration came into power, they took up the question where their predecessors had left it. They had not, I am sorry to say, made much progress with the Government or obtained any more satisfactory answer as to the position which our Government had assumed when they left office, and therefore our Local Government took the question up again, and both parties in the House, as I think the Hon. the Minister of Justice will bear me out in saying, both Conservatives and Liberals in both branches of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, joined in a representation to the Administration repeating the arguments adduced by their predecessors, entering perhaps more minutely into all the financial details and pointing out to the Government that, under the existing state of affairs, it was a matter of impossibility that the Province of Nova Scotia could continue to maintain her public works without some rearrangement of these financial terms. It is true, and we admit, that for a long time under both Administrations no answer was received from the Central Government, and it would appear, I think, that more courtesy was to be expected from the Dominion Government towards the smaller and less powerful Provinces when they approached them in a question of such magnitude as they then presented for their consideration. The Dominion Government withheld for some considerable time any reply to the memorial of both the Provincial Governments, and when the reply was received, the first reply was combated and disputed most energetically and conclusively by the Local Government of which the present Minister of Justice was a member; so I hold it to be a peculiarly fortunate time, in discussing a matter of such importance, when the Province of Nova Scotia has in the Dominion Cabinet to-day a gentleman of the ability and energy of the hon. the Minister of Justice, who so thoroughly understands the question from our provincial standpoint; and I have no doubt, when the question comes before the Government for its consideration, the hon. gentleman will consistently bear out the position he took when he was in the smaller political atmosphere of the Legislature in our Province. It is true that a modus vivendi was suggested by the Government of the hon. gentleman, that some arrangement might be made looking to the mines and minerals of the Province. It was pointed out that, under the previous Administration, a sum of money had been given to the Province of New Brunswick, $150,000, in lieu of the export duties which that Province had at the time of the Union, amounting, I think, to about $60,000, if my memory bears me out. At all events, the Province of New Brunswick was granted $150,000 in lieu of the export duties, and that has placed that Province in a much more favorable financial position, numerically speaking, than the Province of Nova Scotia enjoys. It was, therefore, suggested, and I think not without reason, that, looking at the action the Government had taken with reference to the Province of New Brunswick, they might adopt a similar position with reference to the mines of Nova Scotia, which pay to the local treasury now a royalty of 10 cents per ton. If that were adopted, and an arrangement made on the same basis, it would give the Province of Nova Scotia somewhere about $300,000 per annum, and the Government would then hold the royalties which are derivable from the mines and minerals in the Province of Nova Scotia. This is an increasing quantity. It is only $100,000 at the present time, of course, but our coal mines are practically inexhaustible, and if, as we hope, there is an increased demand from year to year, the Government may very early be recouped for any such expenditure which they might make on such a basis, and I think the suggestion of the Government of which my hon. friend was a member, that some such settlement should be made on such a basis, should be considered by the Government, looking to the position which Nova Scotia occupies at this day. When this question comes up again, I may, perhaps, dwell on it at greater length, but I know it would weary the House to go into the figures now. I have only selected the prominent points at issue between the two Governments, and I think those gentlemen who are called upon to deal with the question will admit that I have placed it fairly before the House, as it was placed by both the Liberal and Conservative Governments in Nova Scotia. I trust that the Administration may find some way to satisfy the people of Nova Scotia without departing from the principles of the British North America Act, and that they may adopt some such methods as they have adopted in the Province of New Brunswick, so that our own Province may have sufficient funds for our own wants.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FLYNN. I desire to say a few words on the subject of the motion introduced this afternoon by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I may say that I do not approach the discussion of the motion in any party spirit. It is a question that cannot be approached in that spirit, for it is one in which every representative from Nova Scotia on both sides of this House must feel a deep interest. If, Sir, the financial condition of Nova Scotia is such as has been represented by memorials, and the addresses sent by both Houses of the Provincial Legislature, and if that financial condition is calculated to produce discontent in Nova Scotia, I hold it is the imperative duty of the Government to examine carefully the matter set forth in the memorials, and, if possible, to adopt some remedy in order to remove that discontent. Now, among the different points raised in opposition to the Union in 1867-68 there was none more prominent than the financial terms of the Union. It was considered then by the anti-union party that the financial terms were unfair and unjust to the people of that Province. I am not now going to advert to the action taken by the Local Government, or to the correspondence that took place between the Local Government and the Dominion Government on that occasion; I merely say that what I have stated now is borne out by the language used by the Finance Minister of that period, Sir John Rose, then in the Government of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government to-day. He stated on that occasion that under the financial arrangement of that scheme, it would be impossible for Nova Scotia to carry on the affairs of the Province without resorting to direct taxation. In consequence of the action then taken by the anti-confederate party, the Federal Government submitted a measure for the approval of Parliament known as the better terms. I am not now going to repeat what occurred then, but merely to say that the Government of the day considered that they had a right to meet the complaints of Nova Scotia, that these complaints were just, and that it was the duty of the Government to remedy those complaints. Now, Sir, on that occasion the gentleman who occupies the position of Finance Minister in the Government of to-day, was a member of the House, and I think a member of the Cabinet. However, on that occasion he made a speech, and an eloquent one, as he always does, in the view that the Parliament of Canada had a right to discuss this question, that they had a right to open up this matter, and that they had a right to concede to Nova Scotia better terms than they then enjoyed. The hon. gentleman, in 1869, in addressing the Chair you occupy now, said:

"It had never been supposed that we could suddenly pass from the condition of isolated Provinces and arrange at a single stroke of the pen all the financial questions that would actually arise in the adjustment of the financial terms of the Act of Union. It was intended that subsequently a commission should issue—that the Local Governments should each appoint a commission, and one also jointly—and to these commissioners were to be entrusted the examination of the financial affairs of all the Provinces and the adjustment of the debts on a satisfactory basis."

Again, in that same speech the hon. gentleman said, in alluding to the Conference of Quebec:

"If that was an inflexible arrangement, not to be modified at any time thereafter, then Nova Scotia would be placed in a position very different from what she had been."

I perfectly agree with the statements made by the hon. gentleman then. We know that the resolutions brought down by the Finance Minister of that day were carried in this Parliament, but as he stated himself then the terms conceded were based on a careful analysis of the estimated local expenditure in Nova Scotia for the year 1868-69. But now after the lapse of many years the condition of affairs has greatly changed in that Province, for the expenses in some cases have increased and the receipts have diminished. I will refer to one item alone. On that occasion when Sir John Rose based his calculation on the estimate of 1863-69, the revenue from the Crown lands was $28,000, but for the last fiscal year it was only $7,000; in that one item we find a falling off of $21,000. The amount granted for education in 1869 was $160,000, and for the last fiscal year it was $207,000 or an increase of $47,000. Now, on the one hand, we find a falling off in the receipts from the Crown Lands Department of $21,000, and an increase in the amount appropriated for education to the extent of $41,000, making altogether $67,000 which the Province of Nova Scotia finds on the wrong side of its balance sheet. Now, if we take the $82,000 which were then granted to Nova Scotia as a part of the better terms, which was only for ten years, and only paid up to 1877, we find a difference of $150,000. The hon. member for Halifax, this afternoon, in introducing his motion, said that there was some increase in the receipts from the Mines and Public Works Department, that there was an increase in the royalty upon coal, amounting, as he said, to $50,000. Now, admitting, for the sake of argument, that there is $50,000 of an increase, if you deduct it from $150,000, it still leaves $100,000. The Province of Nova Scotia is to-day financially in a worse condition than she was in 1869, when Sir John Rose brought down his resolutions on which better terms were founded. I give that as a reason to show that we are actually in a worse position now than we were many years ago, for we know that as the Province increases its requirements become greater, and with the fixed and limited revenue she has it is impossible for the Province to become otherwise than financially embarrassed. We find as evidence of that financial embarrassment that the Provincial Legislature this winter has been compelled, in many important respects, to limit their expenditure. They have been obliged to curtail in very many points. I especially regret that the Government found it necessary to limit its expenditure on one very important point this year—an expenditure that must necessarily, from the inception of the measure in Nova Scotia, have gone on increasing as the Province developed—I allude to the education expenditure. Owing to the straightened circumstances of the Province, owing to the lack of funds, the Government were compelled to limit the expenditure to the sum appropriated last year, a course of action which they fully knew must be unpopular with the people and one viewed with great distaste and disappointment. At all events, the amount was so limited, notwithstanding the needs of the country for a larger amount. I regret, and there is no man in this House who I am sure regrets it more than the hon. gentleman who occupies the position of Finance Minister in the present Government, that the Local Government found it necessary for want of means to adopt that course, a course which may interfere with the proper expansion and development of our educational system, which he had the honor to introduce into the Legislature in 1864, a measure which was hailed at that time with some distrust, but which had since received general approbation, the measure giving to the child of every man a free education. I contend that if the financial condition of the Province in 1869 warranted and justified the Dominion Government in introducing a measure for conceding to Nova Scotia better terms, they are equally justified and ought now to grapple with the question and submit to Parliament a measure to improve the financial condition of that Province. If the argument then addressed to this Parliament justified the action then taken, the same arguments apply with equal force and equal weight to-day. The views enunciated by the present Finance Minister on that occasion in the speech to which I have alluded were sound and correct views; and if they were sound then, they are sound to-day, and I trust this motion will receive that consideration at the hands of the Government it justly deserves. This is not said in any party spirit. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Dominion Government by the Local Governments in Nova Scotia on both sides of politics, by one in which the present Minister of Justice was Attorney General, and therefore it cannot assume any party aspect whatever. The Government in which the Minister of Justice was Attorney General found it necessary in 1879 to send a memorial to the Dominion Government. Previous to that time a joint address of both Houses of the Legislature was sent, and in the following December the Provincial Secretary, Mr. Holmes, called the attention of the Government to the memorial, and joint address of both Houses sent in January previous, no reply having been received up to that day. No action was taken by the Dominion Government; and subsequently, when another Government came into power, the Government of Mr. Fielding in 1884, a joint address of both branches of the Legislature was forwarded, and to that no reply was given. It was followed by a letter from the Provincial Secretary in July, 1885, and to this, at last, a reply was given by the Dominion Government. This reply to the memorial of the Nova Scotia Government contained a great many reasons why the Dominion Government did not consider it was their duty to grant the demand put forward by the Local Government. I am not going to enter into those reasons, for they have already been fully met and ably answered by a joint address of both branches of the Legislature of that Province; but there was one part of that reply which I think was very unfair and in very bad taste; I allude to that portion of the memorial in which the Dominion Government say to the Local Government:

"Had not the Government of Nova Scotia withdrawn from the credit of the debt account large amounts which they expended in railway extension and other public works, the amount which they would have received last year from the Dominion Government would have been amply sufficient with their local resources, for all provincial purposes."

I think that portion of the reply ought never to have been inserted. If the Local Government could have been charged with extravagance, with waste in the management of public money, then it would have been quite within the scope of the Dominion Government to have shown where this had occurred. But were we in Nova Scotia forever to remain without railways? In 1867 our railway system was scarcely extended to New Glasgow; it was completed, I believe, in the year of Confederation. If, according to the doctrine laid down in this memorial, the Local Government should not build railways, then that portion of the Province which did not enjoy the benefit of railways was to remain without them forever. That is the only logical conclusion to be drawn from that reply, for you would not extend our railways and you say the Local Government should not. The Government said: If you had not expended this money on railways you would have had ample means, with your other resources, to carry on the Government of the Province. The people of eastern Nova Scotia, who had contributed by taxation to the building of railways in other portions of the Province, were dissatisfied, and urged the Government to extend the railways east. We were for nearly fourteen years without a mile of railroad east, and we have now, twenty years after Confederation, only eighty miles of railway in eastern Nova Scotia, and the Island of Cape Breton, with its vast and varied resources; its great mineral wealth and inexhaustible fisheries, is at this hour without a single mile of railway. Still, when the Local Government of Nova Scotia thought in the interest of that section they were wisely expending public money, they were taunted by the Government of the day by saying that if they had not expended this money in the extension of railways they would have enough now to carry on the affairs of the Government of Nova Scotia. I say that they could not have expended their money more wisely or judiciously than by building these railways, which opened up and developed one of the finest agricultural counties of this Province—the county represented by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice—thereby adding immensely to its material wealth and prosperity. Not only so, but it was by this action of the Local Government, which was charged as being a waste of money, that the Strait of Canso was tapped, thereby making this eighty miles of railway a feeder to the Intercolonial Railway and the whole railway system of this country, and thereby throwing money into the Treasury of the Dominion. So far from this being a reason why the just claims of Nova Scotia should be refused, I think it is a strong argument the other way; and I want no stronger evidence in support of that view than the language used by my hon. friend, the Finance Minister, when, in 1882, as Minister of Railways, he was asking this Parliament to subsidize certain roads, one of them being the Oxford and New Glasgow, in the Province of Nova Scotia. I will quote a short extract from his speech on that occasion:

"I believe it is a wise policy to aid in the construction of these lines. Although these are private enterprises, it is impossible to build these railways in Canada judiciously, in any section of the country, by means of either subsidies from the Local Government or private enterprises, without enriching the Treasury of Canada. Who receives the benefit from all the increased trade which flows from the increased development of the country by the construction of these roads? Certainly the Dominion Treasury. Every mile of road constructed puts a certain sum in the Treasury."

I believe that those views are sound and correct; I believe that by building these eighty miles of railway the Local Government was developing the resources of the country, increasing the trade of the country and enriching the Dominion Treasury. And if by doing so they have not sufficient revenues to-day to carry on their local affairs, to meet their engagements and provide sufficient for their educational and other requirements, I say that when they apply here for better terms, as they have the right to do, it is unfair and unwise to meet that application with the taunt that, "if you had not spent money in developing the country and increasing its trade you would not now be applying for better terms." I think that that part of the reply might well have been spared, in consideration of the language I have quoted from the Finance Minister, who so completely combats that view. There is one fact as to which there can be no two opinions. Whatever the cause may be, there is no doubt of the fact that Nova Scotia at present is unable, with the amount at her disposal, to meet her engagements and provide those things which, by the British North America Act, she is bound to provide. But, Sir, this was not the case before the Union. There was then no Province in this Dominion with a lower tariff or in a more prosperous condition than Nova Scotia, and to-day there is none with less revenue for local purposes than she has. Now, if the statements contained in the addresses of both branches of the Legislature, if the memorials from the different Local Governments be true, then, as I said in the outset, it is the imperative duty of the Government to enquire immediately into these matters and endeavor, if possible, to adopt some measures to relieve the prevailing discontent. It may, perhaps, be said that this would open up the British North America Act, that if you do it for Nova Scotia you must do it for the other Provinces. I admit that it may have that effect. I am not here claiming any right exclusively for Nova Scotia. I claim it for Nova Scotia to-night, and if under that arrangement, which was never considered to be a fixed arrangement or one that could not be opened up, Nova Scotia, after twenty years, finds that she has not the means successfully to carry on her affairs, then I say that you have the same right as you had in 1869 to open up the agreement and grant her better terms. And if Quebec should come here to-morrow and show the same reasons for the Dominion coming to her aid, then my voice would be lifted up in her behalf as it is to-night in behalf of my own Province. And if Ontario—or Prince Edward Island, or any of the other Provinces—finds that it has not sufficient funds to carry on its affairs, or that an injustice was done to it in the first place when the scheme was, as has been stated already, hastily entered into, then I would favor a reconsideration of the relations of such Provinces to the Dominion. If those who founded the Union wished it to be lasting and successful, I hold that wherever they find friction or discontent—no matter from what cause arising—upon the shoulders of these men specially, who claim to be the fathers of the Union, rests the imperative duty of endeavoring to ascertain what remedy can be applied to allay that discontent as speedily as possible. The right hon. gentleman the leader of the Government said on that occasion, let us reconcile the Nova Scotians, for Nova Scotia is the keystone of the Union. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman entertains the same views to-night, but I hope he does, and I hope he will say now as he said then, let us reconcile the Nova Scotians for Nova Scotia is the keystone of the Union. I hope, at all events, that this matter, which is now brought up for the second or third time in this House, will receive the careful consideration of the Government, and if it is necessary that the question must be re opened, that it will be re-opened. I hope that every cause of discontent will be remedied and that the Government will do that justice to Nova Scotia which the people of that Province think she is fairly entitled to.

Motion agreed to.

COLONIAL CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

Mr. EDGAR moved for :

Copies of all communications received by the Canadian Government from the Imperial Government, or any of its officers, relative to the Colonial Conference which opened in London on 4th April, 1887, and of all correspondence connected therewith, and of the instructions furnished to the Canadian representatives at the Conference.

He said: I ask for these papers chiefly in order that we may be able to know what has been done or proposed in connection with the great scheme of Imperial Federation. That question has been discussed a good deal of late, chiefly by essayists, especially in British periodical literature, and to some extent by British and Colonial public men. It has, I think, at last come to be almost on the verge of practical as distinguished from theoretical politics when a Colonial Conference has been called to discuss subjects which, if not absolutely all belonging to the question of Imperial Federation in name, at least very directly bear upon the subject. I do not know how, for instance, it would be possible to discuss, on an occasion like that and in such a body, the great question of the military defences of the Empire without bringing up the question of a closer union of the different parts of that Empire. We have the presence in this House, too, of the High Commissioner of Canada, who will be able to give the latest and most accurate information as to the prospects, the scope and the aims of that great question. There is also in this House, although I am sorry I do not see him in his place to-night, the president of the Canadian branch of the Imperial Federation League, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I hope he will take occasion to give the House some of the strong arguments which must have convinced his mind at least of the urgency and importance of this scheme. This is a new Parliament, Sir, and I do hope it will not be quite so timid as other Parliaments have been in discussing questions regarding the relation of Canada to the Empire, or the relation of Canada to the whole world if necessary. The project of Imperial Confederation is of course to bring the different parts of the Empire closer together, because it is nearly always urged by its advocates as an alternative for separation. It is said that if we do not get some closer and more immediate union of the different parts of the Empire, there is reason to fear an inevitable and imminent separation of the Colonies from the Empire. Now, I do not propose to discuss that theory at all. I do not propose to say anything about the suggestion that we must either have closer union or separation, but I would like, for a moment, to consider what sort of closer union it is possible for us to have with the Empire. It must be, I take it, either a commercial union, or a political union, or a military defensive union. We could, I have no doubt, have a commercial union of the different parts of the Empire without either of the other two; but a political union, I think, could not be had without a military defensive one, any more than a military union could be had without a political one; because we could not undertake to unite in any Federal Legislature the Governments of the Colonies and the Mother Country without uniting the armies. Neither could we have a common military and naval force without uniting the Governments that would direct and control it. As to commercial union, if that project was ever a desirable one, those who favor it must understand very distinctly that it is altogether out of the question now; and, if they deplore that fact, they can easily see that it was the financial policy which Canada adopted in 1879 that rendered a commercial union with the Empire impossible, and they will know without doubt who are to blame for that. The advocates of Imperial Confederation claim that the Canadian Confederation was the first, and a very important step, towards the realisation of the larger scheme; and they say and hope that confederation in Australasia and another in South Africa will still further prepare the way for it. As to the Australasian Confederation, I fancy that has altogether broken down, because neither New Zealand nor New South Wales will have anything to do with it; and I am afraid the South African Confederation idea has also resulted in failure, because it seems to be generally felt among the different proposed members of the federacy that it would have the effect of concentrating the whole power of South Africa in Cape Colony. There is one thing we may depend upon at any rate, and that is, that, whether federated or isolated, all the colonies will hesitate to give up one single iota of their self-governing powers, and I would like to know what scheme of federative legislature could be devised that would have any powers at all unless those powers were yielded up to it by the different states or members of the federacy. Then, when we come to the consideration of an Imperial federative executive power, it seems to me the difficulty is quite as great, if not greater, because I cannot imagine that any colony would be willing to yield up any of the prerogatives of the Crown which it has been permitted to control. Therefore, I think it may be confidently asserted that no colony would yield up its legislative or executive powers sufficiently to constitute a federal, legislative or executive political union. These were some of the reasons that occurred to me as certain to render a commercial or political union out of the question. Then there remains to be considered a military union, a defensive and offensive alliance, a sort of mutual obligation among the states of the federacy to assist each other in war, by land or by sea, whether in wars of conquest, of aggression, or of defence. For example, without a political union, Canada would have no voice in deciding on the merits of any quarrels which might arise in any remote portion of the Empire, and she would have to bear her share in the multitude of small wars which the Empire is always engaged in against the natives of Africa, or India, or in Chinese opium wars, or perhaps in great European implications. True, we are not now entirely free from the danger that arises from incurring wars; we are subject to the evils of war in case England should engage in a struggle with any of the great European powers whose naval armaments are to-day so enormous. Why should we increase our liability to that disaster? I admit there are a great many things much worse than war. I admit that national dishonor is worse than war; I admit that the loss of national liberty is far worse than war; but, at the same time, we should, in every way we can, seek to avoid rendering ourselves liable to war. Our favored position should surely be utilised, at least, to secure permanent and lasting peace to the people of Canada, and while avoiding wars in which the Empire at large might be mixed up, I am sure the people of England and the people of Canada, at any rate, know that if England were so unfortunate as to be hard pressed at any time in a great war, the Canadians would be her first and foremost allies. At the same time, Canada's position does not require her to be a military power, and her people, I am satisfied, will never tolerate any scheme which would draw us into the liability to maintain large military expenditure and activity. Now, where did this agitation for the federation of the Empire begin? It may be traced to England. Not, however, is it to be found in the daily press of Great Britain or among the masses of the people. There are some leading, prominent, patriotic statesmen, on both sides of Imperial politics, who take a deep interest in this scheme, and it is quite likely that, from their point of view, they may be right; and then there is another class who are always talking a great deal about it, and those are the colonial Englishmen who are residing in London. This latter class is largely responsible for convincing English statesmen that the Colonies are ready for the Imperial Confederation scheme, yet I think it is undeniable that they are the very worst possible guides as to the state of colonial feeling. It is impossible for a Canadian to reside permanently in London without losing his distinctive Canadian sympathies. We all know that. He soon becomes out of touch with Canada, and he looks at Canadian affairs through Imperial spectacles. It is to this unreliable class that British statesmen have been looking, for want of better information, to gather the state of feeling on this subject. I have no fault whatever to find with the selection made of the two gentlemen who represent Canada at that Conference, the Governor of Ontario and Mr. Sandford Fleming; but I cannot help thinking that, at the same time, there was a most extraordinary omission made by the Government, when the very purest type of Canadians, the Canadians in the Province of Quebec, were not represented on this Commission. I can only account for it on the hypothesis that no French Canadian gentleman was willing to go on that mission, because none of them had confidence in a scheme, which they could not help feeling and knowing would be sure to end, if carried out, in depriving them of some of the rights of self-government which they value so highly. We may not be able to take very correct views of Imperial affairs, so very far away from London as we are; but it does look odd to me to see distinguished British statesmen upholding the scheme to extend a federal system to all parts of the Empire, when they are so resolutely bent upon maintaining a legislative union between England and Ireland, although the mass of the Irish people are anxious to try something else, and when they are asking for nothing more startling than the application of the federal principle to the Union between England and Ireland. I wonder would it be a piece of presumption to suggest that the large scheme of Imperial Federation might be very properly postponed until the operation of a similar system shall have been tried in the British Isles themselves? We have had our own experience, too, of our own Canadian Federation for about 20 years, and I think he would be a bold man who would rise up in his place in this House to night and say that in his heart he had no misgiving as to the result. I have confidence that the scheme can be worked out to success, and am rather inclined to think that its partial failure is more due to the mistakes of the operators than to any inherent defects in the machine itself. After all, is it not the mission of Canadian statesmanship to plant the foundations of our own Confederation broad and deep, rather than to pursue the Will o' the Wisp of an impracticable Imperial scheme. Surely, the governing or the assisting in the governing of half a continent as we are all doing here, is enough for any man's ambition, and, as we find from experience every day, it is enough to task the powers and absorb the energies of such public men as a busy people can give to public life. We have no spare men to send away to assist in governing remote dependencies of the Empire, and what is more, I hope that we shall always try to exercise such powers of self-government as we possess and extend them as far as we can, without calling in the assistance of the inhabitants of remote dependencies of the British Crown.

Motion agreed to.

THE FISHERY QUESTION.

Mr. ELLIS moved for:

Return of the number of foreign vessels, fishing or other, boarded, ordered off, warned or interdicted in any way during the calendar year 1886 by the vessels employed in the fisheries protection service or by any Customs' official, specifying the name of the vessel, of her owner, and of her master, her nationality, port of registry, if any, tonnage, and the number of men employed on her; where and when boarded, by whom, and from what vessel or port, with the special report of the official in each case.

He said: I desire to bring before the House and the public some idea of the action of the fishery fleet during the last year. I think the extent to which operations have been carried on is not fully known to the country at large. It appears from some published reports that up to July 130 vessels had been boarded by the fishery fleet, and during the calendar year 120 cases of complaint had been filed at Washington against the Canadian Government for unnecessary and improper interference with the vessels of the United States. It would seem as if the laws or regulations of the fishery service had been carried out with a rigor and severity that, at any rate, has seriously imperiled our relations with the United States. I would like to call attention to one or two complaints, because they seem to be of a very extreme kind. Some of these complaints refer, for instance, to the entry of vessels into harbors in which they remained for only a few hours and were then ordered out. In some cases they were compelled to pay harbor dues without being allowed to take the ordinary privilege of making a port entry. The master of one vessel complains to his Government that he was not only refused permission to buy bait, but also to take a pilot at Port Amherst. The master of the Sarah E. Lee went into Liverpool Harbor, Nova Scotia, and was immediately ordered to sea, although his son was seriously ill with diphtheria. His complaint is that he was not allowed the ordinary courtesies of civilised nations. The Sarah H. Prior, while running from Malpeque, lost her large seine at sea, a fishing net said to be worth $1,000. The net was afterwards picked up by the master of a Halifax vessel, who offered to return it on payment of the ordinary salvage of $25, which was accepted by the owner, but the collector of the port would not allow the net to be returned, and the voyage was broken up. The captain of the schooner R. N. Crittenden, while on the homeward voyage, stopped at Steep Creek, in the Strait of Canso, for water. The Customs officer at that place notified him that if he took water his vessel would be seized. He was compelled to sail without it and to put his men on short allowance for the remainder of the voyage. The worst case appears to be that of the master of the Mollie Adams. He says that about the 26th September, he fell in with the Nova Scotia schooner Neskilita in a wrecked condition, and took off her crew of seventeen men and fed them for three days, saving, as well, a part of the wrecked vessel's material. He entered his own vessel at Malpeque, and was boarded by the captain of the Dominion cruiser Critic, who neither offered to care for the wrecked crew, to feed them, nor to assist them or take them off. The captain of the Mollie Adams asked his permission to land the wrecked material. The captain referred him to the collector, the collector referred him back to the captain of the Dominion vessel, and when he went back after him he found the vessel had put to sea. He says:

"The captain of the cutter told me that I could put the saved material on board a Nova Scotia vessel if I went outside the three-mile limit to do it. I endeavored to get some of the people on shore to take the wrecked crew, but no one would do it unless I would be responsible for their board. Finally I gave the crew $80, enough to pay their passage home on the cars, and also gave them provisions to last them during the journey."

The difficulty in disposing of this crew and getting out of Malpeque Harbor lost him, he says, ten days, his voyage was broken up, and he had to return home. Feeding the wrecked crew left his own provisions short. He called at Port Medway, stated the circumstances, and asked permission to buy half a barrel of flour or biscuit, and this was absolutely refused him. The collector threatened to seize his vessel if he bought anything. He was 300 miles from home, on an inhospitable coast with every door barred against him, and short of provisions. Although they made the run home in three days, his crew was on short rations for a whole day. Now, I think the country is scarcely aware of the extent to which the operations of the fleet have been carried on, or of the very great number of complaints and the seriousness of the complaints made, because the laws have been so rigidly and it would seem so harshly enforced. Indeed, if the statement made by those men are true, the remark made by the Secretary of the United States Treasury, that the laws were enforced with brutality, would not seem to be, under all the circumstances of the case, too strong. I do not desire, however, to prejudge the case. This is only evidence on one side, but I think it would be advisable to have all the information before us. There has been considerable delay already in reference to the correspondence on this subject between our Government and that of Great Britain which has been promised us, but the promise is unfulfilled yet, although I see in the St. John organ of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries a statement on Tuesday that the correspondence had been laid before Parliament, and a summary of it given in that paper. Now, however, that is not so much what I desire to touch upon as the resolution which I move.

The difficulty in disposing of this crew and getting out of Malpeque Harbor lost him, he says, ten days, his voyage was broken up, and he had to return home. Feeding the wrecked crew left his own provisions short. He called at Port Medway, stated the circumstances, and asked permission to buy half a barrel of flour or biscuit, and this was absolutely refused him. The collector threatened to seize

Mr. FOSTER. I regret that I was not in my place in the House so as to have heard what my hon. friend has said in making his motion, having been called away for a little while to attend to those fishery papers, which, I may state here, will be brought down to-morrow. With reference, however, to the motion my hon. friend may press it, for it will be granted, but it was not necessary. The whole of the information which he has asked is already in the hands of the printers, and will be brought down in a special report, which will be laid before the House just as soon as it is ready.

Mr. THOMPSON. As my colleague was not in when the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) addressed himself to this matter, it is only respectful to him that a word or two should be said in explanation of some of the cases to which the hon. gentleman made reference. I regret that I was not able to catch all that the hon. gentleman said, but I certainly understood him to refer to several cases, in respect of which it has been charged by the authorities of the United States that a want of consideration, a want of hospitality, was evinced by the officers of the Customs and the officers of the Fishery Departments on the maritime coast of the Dominion. I also understood the hon. gentleman to say, I was glad to hear the statement, that he was not disposed to prejudge our case from the evidence which appeared on one side. The hon. gentleman, however, was altogether too flattering to that side of the case when he characterised the statements to which he referred as evidence. I presume he gleaned his information from some documents which have been laid before a Legislative Assembly in another part of the continent. The hon. gentleman's selections were made from a number of rambling and inaccurate statements made against the British and Colonial authorities, by persons who received a general invitation to send in all the claims which they could possibly make against our Government, which was supposed to be liable to damages in the end. It has transpired not only from the investigation of these complaints, not only from the investigation conducted by our own officers, but subsequently by the admissions of some of the persons who made these very unvarnished statements to which the hon. gentleman had recourse—it has transpired that those statements are utterly without foundation, were reckless, were oftentimes based upon misapprehension and a want of knowledge of the circumstances; as, for instance, the statement that these vessels, while not allowed the privileges of a port, were obliged to pay port dues and other charges of that description. That has never been the case in any instance, and the hon. gentleman will find when the papers are brought down, as my colleague states they will be presently, that the assertions which have given him so much uneasiness, made on the part of the authorities on the other side of the question, are not at all of the character which will induce the hon. gentleman to retain those uneasy feelings as to our side of the case; and he will find then that the statement of a distinguished gentleman connected with the Administration of the United States, that the treaty has been administered with brutality, was as preposterous an exaggeration as the English language would permit.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was not present when the hon. gentleman from the city of St. John (Mr. Ellis) made his statements on this matter, and I am not going to discuss this question anterior to bringing down the papers. I think it is only right that we should have the papers before us before we discuss a matter in which we might be led into accepting impressions or making statements which might be detrimental to our own country. I will merely say that I think that the Government have earned approval in relation to their refusal to allow parties to buy bait as an article of commerce. I will not even discuss that question just now, but simply say this in justification of the attitude which I may assume hereafter, when the papers are brought down. It would be premature to discuss the matter further until these papers are before us; it would be unfair, perhaps, to the Administration, and might injure our own case.

Motion agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS TO MASTERS OF VESSELS PROTECTING THE FISHERIES.

Mr. ELLIS. In making this motion of which I have given notice, I will take the opportunity of saying that I would be very glad if the Minister of Justice gets out of the difficulty as easily as he anticipates. I have gone over a great deal of the correspondence and a great many of the complaints made, and I am glad to know he is in a position to inform the House as positively and as confidently as he does, that the matter will be ended amicably. I observed only a very short time ago, before the close of the sessions of the Senate of the United States, that a gentleman who was a senator from the State of New York, who had held a position in the Cabinet of President Grant, and might be supposed to know a great deal about the state of feeling in that country, stated with great deliberation that the position at the present moment was a cessation of commercial relations, retaliation or war. Now, if the matter has changed to any extent, as the Minister of Justice thinks it has, we are all glad to know it. I do not absolutely wish to have the papers if they are in the form in which the Minister of Justice says they are; I do not want to make my motion against his desire, but I wish to place the facts before the country. This is the motion of which I gave notice:

Copy of the instructions issued in the year 1887 for the guidance of the masters of vessels engaged in the Fisheries Protection Service.

With regard to that, it appears that last year there was a warning issued to all foreign vessels, whether they were fishing or not, to keep out of our ports. I believe that was withdrawn, but it was a serious matter at the moment.

Mr. FOSTER. I think a little reflection will convince my hon. friend that this motion ought not to pass the House at this time. The hon. gentleman made reference to a warning issued last year from the Department of Marine, which was afterwards withdrawn, and which conveyed a warning to all foreign vessels whether fishing vessels or not. That was true so far as one particular clause of the warning was concerned; but the whole context of the warning showed plainly what the warning meant. It was a printer's mistake which was discovered within a day or two after the first copy was issued, and those copies were withdrawn and corrected copies substituted. With respect to the instructions for 1887, I think it will strike the minds of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that it would not be conducive either to the carrying out of our protection of the fisheries during the coming season, or to the present negotiations, that they should be brought down to the House and made a subject for debate. They are special confidential instructions, so far as any new ones are introduced for 1887, and I do not think they ought to be brought down.

Motion withdrawn.

DEPUTY SPEAKER AND CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

On the Order being called—motion to rescind the Standing Orders respecting the election at the commencement of every Parliament of a Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees—(Mr. Fisher).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow that to stand to another day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What other day?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There will be plenty of opportunity.

Mr. FISHER. Are we likely to have an opportunity, as on Wednesday evening other business is taken up, and on Monday there are very frequently many members absent? It is desirable, of course, to have the motions cleared from the paper. If the hon. gentleman has any particular object in desiring this motion to stand, I will allow it to do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Please let it stand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will be better to have some understanding as to when it may be reached. It cannot be conveniently reached unless we come to some understanding.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will allow it to be brought up on Thursday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When and how will you arrange it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be in a good position, and I will undertake for the majority of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have an opportunity of moving it on Thursday.

Motion allowed to stand.

LANDS SOLD BY CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WATSON moved for:

Return of all lands sold in the Province of Manitoba by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company up to the 1st of April, 1887.

He said: My reason for moving for this return is that a large quantity of land has been sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that the agreements have not been registered, but that speculators have been allowed to hold the land, which has proved detrimental to the interest of settlement. When an amendment to the Canadian Pacific Railway terms was made last year, a clause was introduced providing that the Company should make a return within a certain number of days of the opening of the Session, of all lands sold by them up to first October of each year; but this return did not apply to lands sold previous to the passing of this Bill. Some municipalities are sending petitions to this House praying that land may be placed in such a shape that taxes can be collected. I think this matter is outside the jurisdiction of this House; but if such a return was made to this House, if the provisions of the Act of last year were carried out, it would enable the municipalities to obtain a list of lands sold during the year, the date of sale and the names of the purchasers, by which they would be able to collect the taxes. For instance, here is the municipality of Argyle in Rock Lake county. They set forth that the Canadian North-West Land Company have 54,240 acres of land upon which local taxes have not been paid, and up to the end of 1886 those lands were assessed, but the taxes remaining unpaid last year amounted to $4,789.16. These municipalities have been under the impression that all lands held by other parties other than the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were liable to taxation, and they have been levying rates but they found it impossible to collect the taxes, because they cannot find out the particulars of each sale. I am sure that if the information asked for in this return is brought down it will be a great convenience and relief to the municipalities. I would like to add to the motion these words "the name of the purchaser and the date of the sale of such lands."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If I recollect aright, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are obliged to give a return of all the lands they have sold and the date of sale. I forget at this moment, however, whether they are obliged to do so of their own motion, or simply when called upon, but I am pretty sure that they are not required to give the names of the purchasers, and if so, we cannot force them to do it because it is not in their Act of incorporation.

Mr. WATSON. The Act passed last year requires them to give the name of the purchaser and the lands sold, but the trouble is that it only applies to the year after the Act was passed, and as a large quantity of land was sold previous to that date, the municipalities have no means of getting at the information.

Motion agreed to.

IRREGULARITIES BY MONTREAL COTTON CO.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) moved for:

Copies of all reports made to the Customs Department by any of its officers or special agents concerning irregularities committed by the Montreal Cotton Company; also, copies of all correspondence between the Department of Customs and any of its officers or special agents, and copies of all correspondence between the said Department or its officers or special agents and the manager or directors of said company in regard to such irregularities.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be highly inconvenient at the present moment to bring down the papers moved by the hon. gentleman, for the reason that the matter is still under investigation. I may mention, however, for the information of the hon. gentleman and the information of the House, that one of the directors of that company wrote me the other day, stating that other irregularities had been discovered and that he would see that a full report was made of all the facts, and I returned the report to the special officer, to which the hon. gentleman has called attention, to Montreal, in order that a further investigation might take place, so that the Department might be in a position to come to a proper decision on the whole case. I may also mention that many of the reports made by special officers contain information which it would not be in the interests of the revenue, or in the interests of the country, to make public. For instance, they may state how they obtained their information, or they may give the name of the informer, and I think the mere mention of that fact is sufficient to show that, in cases of that kind at least, these reports should not be laid before Parliament. In many cases the Department itself never makes enquiries as to who the informers may be, for the simple reason that all we have to do is to investigate the facts and administer the law as we think it should be administered. I have no doubt that, before the House rises, I will be in a position to give the whole facts in connection with the case to which the hon. gentleman has called the attention of the House, and also the decision of the Department upon it. I trust that with this information the hon. gentleman will withdraw his motion, at least for the present.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I understand the Minister to say that he will submit to the House, as soon as he can, the information I ask for?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, just as soon as I am put in a position to enable me to come to a decision on the merits of the case.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then I need not move; the information will be brought down without motion?

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman had better make a formal motion without notice. I will inform him when I am ready.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I know very little about the matter, but the hon. gentleman knows that it is a subject which has been mentioned in the newspapers, and it seems to me desirable, in the interests of all parties, that the facts should be laid before the House.

Mr. BOWELL. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman; the more these things are made public the better.

Motion withdrawn.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return showing how many ice-boats are owned by the Government for crossing at the capes, the number of men employed in the service during the winter of 1887, the number of trips made by said boats, the date of each trip, and the number of passengers who crossed in said boats.—(Mr. Peiry.)

Return of the number of preventive officers appointed on our frontier since the 1st of January, 1886, giving the names of the several parties so appointed, with their residence and salaries.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return of receipts and expenditures to date of 1st of May, in the years 1886 and 1887, respectively, together with estimates of each year. Also memorandum of interest to be paid on the 1st of May.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Returns giving the names, occupations, residences and post office addresses of the returning officers at the last elections for the Dominion House of Commons, with their respective ridings.—(Mr. Somerville.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 9:35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 3rd May, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No 48) to incorporate the Guarantee and Pension Fund Society of the Dominion Bank.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

B.C. REPRESENTATION ACT.

Mr. BAKER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 50) to amend the Representation Act as respects certain constituencies in British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BAKER. I would ask hon. members to allow me to explain the Bill on the second reading, as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Gordon), who will be principally affected by it, is absent, and I should like him to be present when I explain it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is there any gerrymander in it?

Mr. BAKER. I might state, for the information of the hon. gentleman, that it is similar to the Bill which I introduced last year, but which, after dragging on to the end of the Session, was slaughtered among the innocents. I introduce it earlier this year so that it may have a show.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Resolved, That to any Penitentiary officer whose conduct has been good, who is compelled to retire in consequence of infirmity and who is not entitled to a superannuation allowance—A gratuity or retiring allowance may be given, calculated at the rate of a half month's salary for each year of his service, up to five years, and a month's salary for each year of service in excess of five years, and that such retiring allowance may be increased by one-half the amount thereof if the infirmity which compels such officer to retire from the service is occasioned by any injury received by him in the performance of his duty, without fault or negligence on his part, at the hands of any convict, or in preventing an escape or rescue, or in suppressing a revolt.

Resolved, That if any officer dies in the service leaving a widow or any person who in his lifetime was dependent on him, a gratuity may be paid to such widow, if any, and if not to any person or persons in the lifetime of such officer dependent on him, or to any person or corporation in trust for any such person or persons so dependent on him, but that no such gratuity shall exceed the amount of the salary of such officer for the two months next preceding his death, if he was appointed by the Governor in Council, or for the three months next preceding his death, if he was appointed by the Minister or the Warden; and that such gratuity may be increased by one-half the amount thereof if the death of such officer is occasioned by any injury received by him in the performance of his duty, without fault or negligence on his part, at the hands of any convict or in preventing an escape or rescue, or in suppressing a revolt.

Resolved, That no officer shall be allowed any perquisite except that any officer may, during the will of the Minister of Justice, occupy free of rent any house or quarters, with any grounds attached, which forms part of the Penitentiary property; that the grounds or gardens attached to the residence or quarters of a Warden or Deputy Warden may be kept in order and cultivated by convict labor, but that otherwise no convict labor shall be employed in keeping in order or cultivating any grounds occupied by any officer; and that any officer who wears uniform may be allowed such uniform as the Governor in Council prescribes.

Resolved, That nothing herein contained shall affect the salary of any officer, whose salary, as provided in the Estimates of the present Session, exceeds the maximum prescribed for his class by the foregoing table, but that the salary of such officer shall not be further increased.

Resolved, That the Governor in Council may, subject to the provisions of "The Penitentiary Act" and of any Act amending the same, from time to time, make regulations respecting officers' salaries, gratuities and retiring allowances; the occupation by officers of houses, quarters or grounds which form part of the Penitentiary property; officers' uniforms; the sale to officers of articles manufactured in the Penitentiary shops or grown upon the Penitentiary property; and any matter relating to the establishment, maintenance and management of Penitentiaries.

He said: I may say, by way of preliminary explanation, that the resolutions are to form the basis of a Bill which has for its object the regulation of the perquisites established in the different penitentiaries throughout Canada. These perquisites consist principally of the occupation of houses by the principal officers, the right to keep horses, cows, poultry, and other descriptions of stock, and the right to fuel, light and various other things. It is intended to retain for the officers the perquisites in relation to houses, because it is a convenience to the service that the principal officers especially should have their houses on the penitentiary property; but it is proposed to abolish the other perquisites. The House will probably be asked to commute those perquisites, and future appointments will be made without regard to these at all. It is likewise proposed to establish a different scale of salaries from that which now exists, with the view of having, instead of the discretionary powers which the Governor in Council has to appoint an officer under the present Penitentiary Act, at any salary between a defined minimum and a defined maximum, to provide he shall enter the service at the minimum, proceeding by gradual increase to the maximum.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I desire to call the attention of the Government to an item which appears in the Citizen of this morning, which reads as follows:—

"It is rumoured in Conservative parliamentary circles that when the House adjourns on Wednesday, the 18th inst., it will stand adjourned for one week. Thursday, the 19th, is a statutory holiday, and the following Tuesday the anniversary of Her Majesty's birthday. This would enable many members to make a home trip."

It may suit some hon. gentlemen to make a home trip and attend to their private business, but what will become of the members of this House who come from the far West and far East? I sincerely trust that the Government will not yield to such a proposition as to adjourn the House for a week. I understand we are sent here to attend to the business of the country, not to increase the number of holidays. We have holidays enough, and I trust that the statement in this paper is not correct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I heard of it only last night. A suggestion was made by some gentlemen who said they were in favor of it. It has not been at all brought before the Council, and we have not considered it.

FISHERY PAPERS.

Mr. DAVIES. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he hopes to be able to lay on the Table the Fishery papers.

Mr. MITCHELL. Don't press him too hard.

Mr. FOSTER. As I said yesterday, the papers will be laid on the Table to-day.

PUBLIC OFFICERS.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 5) to amend the Act respecting Public Officers.—(Mr. McLellan.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman ought to explain to us, to some extent, the reasons for the change.

Mr. McLELLAN. The only change made is to add to section 22 of the Act in the Revised Statutes the power to take as security from any officer in an office of trust, any deposit that he may have at his credit in the savings bank. The clause, after reciting what is in the general Act, adds :

“Or a conditional assignment of a deposit standing in the name of such public officer in the books of the Post Office or any of the Government savings banks, but in the case of an assignment of a deposit as aforesaid the interest shall be payable to the depositor in like manner as if no such assignment had been made.”

Mr. BLAKE. What I suggested was, not that the hon. gentleman should state what the change in the Bill was, for that is obvious, but what the reasons for the change were.

Mr. McLELLAN. In many cases the officer says he can give just as good security as a guarantee company, as he has money on deposit and wants the Government to take that instead of taking the guarantee company or individual security.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman say whether, to his knowledge, this method of obtaining security is adopted in the English or any other governmental system?

Mr. McLELLAN. I am not aware that it is, but it has frequently been pressed upon the Department here. Very often the guarantee companies, when called upon to pay, raise technical objections and delay, and we consider this better security.

Mr. BLAKE. Is there any provision in the law as to the extent of the security required?

Mr. McLELLAN. That is regulated by the different Acts of Parliament, and by the duties the officer is called upon to perform.

Mr. BLAKE. What occurred to me was this: if you obtained a private security, you obtained this certainty that there are persons who are competent, respectable people, who have pledged themselves for the good conduct of the officer. So, when you take a guarantee company, that company does not conduct its business on the theory that it will guarantee everybody; it makes, on the contrary, rigid enquiries as to the character, habits, the regulations of the transactions expected, in fact, as to everything concerning those it is proposed to guarantee. Knowing that, we know we have that sort of security, but when you propose simply that a sum of money will always be accepted, there is none of those securities. I have not attached so much importance to the simple quantum of the obligations as to the circumstance that people, whether private companies or individuals, are to be found who will run the risk involved in securing individuals. You know what happens sometimes when bail is asked. Bail is obtained by persons by simply depositing with those who gave the bail the amount of the bail. But that is not considered the very best kind of bail, although it is certain the sum of money will be forthcoming. What the law calls for is that security that a person will appear which is involved in another being willing to run the risk of his not appearing. Any security of that kind is, of course, got rid of by the proposal of the hon. gentleman. That was what occurred to me, and that was the reason why I asked him if he was cognisant of the fact that this mode of obtaining security was adopted. While I am on my feet, as I do not desire to trouble the committee again, I would suggest that it might be expedient to alter the latter part of the clause so as to provide that the interest should be paid to the depositor only until the forfeit is made. As it stands at present, the hon. gentleman will find that the security is very inadequate, because there is an indefinite provision that the interest shall be paid, it may be for all time, no matter what may happen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I go a good way with the hon. gentleman in his remarks, but I think that whole question was argued out when it was considered whether we should require personal security, or the security of a guarantee company. Of course, a guarantee company has to make enquiries of its own, but those enquiries do not come before the Government. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is of very great importance that we should have some security for the character and conduct of the civil servant, the public officer, and that the amount is not of so much importance as the enquiries which precede the giving of the security; but I do not fancy that there can be a better inducement should be held out to them to become respectable members of society,—I use that expression,—to become steady, serious young men, looking out for the future, and preparing for a rainy day. It is of great importance to get these young men to deposit what they can spare of their earnings in the savings banks or other investments, instead of wasting their annual salaries, which is perhaps too much the custom of young men. When a civil servant accumulates a sum of money in this unquestionable security, in the Government savings bank or the Post Office savings bank, sufficient to be a valuable security to the Government, that is a patent proof that the person who has accumulated it has been saving, has been economical, has been steady, and has a view towards the future, so I think this is the most unquestionable kind of security which could be offered.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that this matter was, to some extent, settled by the decision of the question whether the security of the guarantee companies should be accepted or not. As we know, they make enquiries, and the sureties will make enquiries themselves. Therefore, in neither case does it come before the Government. It is the case of the private guarantor who does this on the ground of affection, or relationship, or friendship, or of the guarantee company who do it for business. If this is intended as a reward for economy and prudence on the part of the young men who are entering the service, and to encourage them to look forward to the happy day when they will be able to get their bonds released, and if this is to be an incentive to them to be economical, I am glad to know that at his advanced period of life the hon. gentleman possesses such a sanguine temperament. It reminds me, however, of the proposition he made once before, that he would probably induce the poor Indian to exchange his rifles for shotguns.

Mr. McLELLAN. According to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, I propose to add to the last part of the clause “until the forfeiture of the security.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In answer to the remark of the hon. gentleman opposite that my sanguine disposition led me to think that this measure would be beneficial to the young men of the Civil Service, and that it was like my suggestion to persuade the Indians to give up the use of Winchester rifles by exchanging them for fowling-pieces, I may say that I was not then aware that it was a special instruction of the Government of which the hon. gentleman was, or perhaps was not, a member, that the Indians should be supplied with Winchester rifles. This Bill, however, saves the civil servant what he has now to pay to the guarantee company; he gets a satisfactory security, and it costs him nothing.

Bill reported, and amendment agreed to.

RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 6) to amend the Government Railways Act.—(Mr. Pope.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. POPE. This is a very short, and I hope a very innocent little Bill. The object of the Bill is to facilitate the quick passage of trains on long roads, or running between principal towns, which require as much despatch as possible, and carrying mails and passengers, not freight. Under the law as it now stands, every train is bound to come to a stop before it crosses any other track. A similar Act has been adopted in many of the States. It has been adopted on the Michigan Central, and parties are asking for its adoption in Canada. We have found the greatest possible difficulty on a long run, in the case of a number of railways, to make time, and the more stations there are the more time is lost, and new stations are being added as the necessity arises. We hope by this arrangement to facilitate the passage of mail and passenger trains from Halifax to St. John and Quebec. The provisions in the second clause are such as I can hardly explain to the House, but it has been urged on me by different railway companies, who say there is a difference of opinion between magistrates and others as to what constitutes a proper fastening for the hurdle gates. A hurdle gate is used on all railways in Lower Canada, and generally elsewhere.

Mr. BLAKE. Would the hon. gentleman say in how many cases on the Intercolonial he expects this to be brought into operation, and at what points?

Mr. POPE. Two or three points, I think, and perhaps more.

Mr. BLAKE. What points are they?

Mr. POPE. There is a crossing on the road from Halifax running to Pictou, and there are other important points that will probably need a little alteration.

Mr. BLAKE. Which are they?

Mr. POPE. The railway from St. John into Moncton. I only mention now that branch of the Intercolonial, where I would be very glad to make the alteration.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friends near me say there is no case of an intersecting railway on the latter, so that this is an Act of Parliament for the Halifax and Pictou crossing.

Mr. POPE. Or any other that may occur.

Mr. BLAKE. I want to know what others did occur?

Mr. POPE. I say this one where it is important; others will occur, they must occur. There are many more than that crossing, but they are so small that I cannot mention them now.

Mr. BLAKE. If they are too small to be mentioned, they are hardly large enough to make an Act of Parliament about. The hon. gentleman, in the first clause, speaks about a "device;" has he got a device?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And has applied it?

Mr. POPE. Not yet.

Mr. BLAKE. But he is satisfied that it is all right?

Mr. POPE. I am satisfied from the report of the engineer, after having examined it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE. Is this Bill specifically confined to Government railways, or is it proposed to extend it to others?

Mr. POPE. It is to be applicable to all railways when it is necessary.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says it has actually been applied in the case of the Michigan Central.

Mr. POPE. And some other roads as well; and the Canada Southern Railway is asking to apply it in Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it proposed to publish the provisions which are made? I see the plan is most elastic in its character. The Minister is to have power, from time to time, to make a written order saying what is to be done, then to revoke or modify, and make regulations. He has already told us that he does not propose to apply the Act except in the case of express trains.

Mr. POPE. Only passenger and mail trains. Trains running between large cities and on long lines ought to be delayed as little as possible.

BANFF NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 16) respecting the Banff National Park. He said: The other day, I was asked for information in respect to the companies and individuals having reservations in the park. I may say that before the reservation was made at all, certain limits were sold at public competition within what is now the large reserve. There were disposed of to the Eau Claire and Bow River Lumber Company, 28½ square miles; to the Hon. J. G. Ross, 43 square miles; to the Eau Claire and Bow River Lumber Company again, two lots of 1 and 26½ square miles, respectively.

Mr. CASEY. What is the extent of these limits?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). One was twenty-eight and a half square miles, another forty-three, another one, and another twenty-six and a half, in all about ninety miles.

Mr. MITCHELL. Within this limit?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Not altogether within it, and not within the region of the springs.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were these lands granted absolutely?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, they are only yearly leases. To the one that comes nearest the springs, no license has been issued, although an Order in Council was passed three or four years ago. A permit was, however, granted. For that one the licensee paid $81 per square mile. Then there were certain coal areas granted, also within the general reservation, although not within what is, properly speaking, the springs portion. These were all granted before there was any question of reservation whatever. The area is 1,155 acres and the amount paid for it was $14,437; the lands were all within the anthracite coal area and the average price paid was about $12.50 per acre. They are, however, not within what is properly the springs area but are on the opposite side of Bow River. There are only two settlers we know of, and they are persons who bought out the rights of squatters early in 1885 or in the latter portion of 1884. They have not yet been dealt with, and the question remains as to how we should deal with them. They are also on the other side of Bow River and on the other side of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a considerable distance from the springs themselves; but it is quite open to the Department to compensate these settlers in some way for the improvements they have made, if it is thought undesirable to allow them to remain there as permanent settlers. They took their lands before they were reserved as coal lands. In the first instance, there was a comparatively small area reserved by Order in Council; that included only where the springs themselves are. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and other gentlemen who have visited the ground, will readily understand that the area originally reserved was on the springs side of Bow River, and just where the springs themselves are; but we propose under this Bill to reserve a very much larger area, with a view of making the reserve include Devil's Head Lake. The question was asked the other day as to how this would affect the Canadian Pacific Railway lands. The general boundary extends about half-way up, but as the Canadian Pacific Railway are only entitled to their lands when survey has taken place, and as no survey has been made there, and as the company is co-operating with the Government in this matter, no difficulty is likely to arise.

Mr. CASEY. As to the area of ninety-eight square miles of timber limits, how does it lie with respect to the rest of the reservation?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). As to the timber limits, I may say as to one of them it almost covers the springs themselves. A license has not, however, been issued to that one, and it is a matter of negotiation to prevent the springs or any part of them being included. The licenses are only from year to year, and, no doubt, arrangements will be made to secure such property as is necessary to preserve the forest for the park.

Mr. MITCHELL. No license should be granted respecting any land or property within the limits supposed to be retained for the park, and we should reserve intact the natural forests. For my part, I propose to give the Government very great licence in a matter of this kind—far more in this matter than in any general matter of administration. It is one of those subjects very few persons understand. From what I have seen of that section of country I think it requires a personal examination in order to judge and appreciate what is necessary in creating a national park, which we expect will be productive of very great benefit to those troubled with diseases of various kinds. I am, therefore, willing to give the Government very great licence in the Bill before the House.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister, in addition to the statement he has made, was also to have brought down to the House some plan or statement showing the amount of money proposed to be expended by the Government on the park, and he was likewise to state what leases had been made for the springs or any part of them, or for the ground and on what terms. If the hon. gentleman will refer to Hansard of two or three days ago, he will see that I called his attention specially to all those points.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). With respect to the first point, I think that when the Estimates come up it will be a better time, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to say, to deal with the question of expenditure. The expenditure may be large or small as the House may determine. In the meantime, Mr. Stewart, who is superintendent, has constructed roads to the upper springs and through the park itself; he has thrown a bridge across Bow River and is putting across a light iron bridge of a permanent character, and is improving what is called the Cave Spring by making a tunnel entrance to it. But the expenditures outside of that on the Devil's Head Lake road, which is being built, are matters which may be determined from time to time as Parliament may be pleased to vote. The expenditure up to the present time amounts to between $35,000 or $40,000, covering the construction of roads, survey of the park and general improvements. As to leases: no leases have actually been given for the springs, because the question as to how the water is to be conducted to the hotel is engaging the attention of the superintendent, and at present the principle we propose to adopt is that followed at Arkansas, viz., that everyone using the water shall pay so much per tub, the character of the bathing-houses being under the superintendent. I think $15 a year per tub was what was fixed by Order in Council to be paid by those using the waters.

Mr. CASEY. I have here a statement of the amount expended on this so-called park, already. I find that under the Governor General's warrant dated September 7th, there was paid $10,000 for surveys, roads, bridges, &c.; on November 17th, $5,000; on April 14th, the day after the House met, $31,000, making a total, not of $35,000 or $40,000, but $46,000, spent on this park without the authority of Parliament, and by far the greater portion of it spent after the House met, and before the Government brought down a Bill to ask authority to reserve the park. I think that such unconstitutional dealing with the public funds, when the House is in Session and could have been asked for the funds, the spending of this money in anticipation of the fact that the House would decide to make this reservation on the terms proposed by the Government—I say I think that such dealing with the public money is not calculated to make us entrust the Government with very much power in respect to the management of the reservation itself. Now, Sir, in regard to the first clause, the map appears to show that the timber berths are altogether at one end of the reservation, and that being the case I do not see any reason at all why these timber berths, not being surrounded by other territory which is required to be included in the reservation, should be put in the reservation at all, unless it is intended to stop the cutting of timber upon them. If the hon. gentleman says, "I have included it in the reservation for the purpose of stopping the cutting of timber and preserving it as a national park," that is all right. But that is not the language of the Bill, because he takes power to make regulations for the cutting of timber on these very berths. The effect, therefore, of this is simply to take these limits out from under the operation of the ordinary law covering the cutting of timber on Crown lands, and the issuing of timber licenses, and to leave the issuing of these licenses, their term, and everything of that kind, entirely in the hands of the Minister, and I think that is a power the House would not give him, if it fairly understood what is meant. The statement of the bonuses paid for these timber limits shows that they must be very valuable. I think the hon. gentleman mentioned a sum as large as $80 or $100 and over per square mile, on what he says was a yearly license to cut timber. If that is the case these must be very valuable timber berths, and they should not be left to the uncontrolled management of any individual. Again, Sir, as to the coal lands, of which he has told us 1,155 acres are under license. He says this is the anthracite deposit. Well, that anthracite deposit at the base of the Rockies, we were led to understand, was, perhaps, the most valuable coal deposit in the whole North-West—of superior quality and almost unlimited in quantity; and yet all that belt is brought within the limits of this reservation and is to be worked under mining licenses. I do not see any reason at all, why this coal district should be exempted from the operation of the ordinary laws regarding mining licenses. If the Minister intends to let anthracite coal be worked at all, he should exclude that mining land from the reserve, and leave it under the control of the ordinary mining laws. If he does not intend it to be worked, then he should not take power to make regulations for the mining of the coal. In short, we come again to the contradiction of terms which I pointed out before—that the Minister is professedly making this reservation for the purposes of a public park, but he is really taking power to himself to allow cattle to be grazed, timber to be cut, and coal to be mined, but without regard to the operation of the ordinary laws with regard to mining, grazing and timber cutting. I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that the real object of including the coal, timber and grazing lands in the reserve is to obtain, not a reserve for the purposes of a public park, but a reserve for Government supporters; it is to obtain a reserve of lands which the Government may deal with, uncontrolled by the ordinary Acts of Parliament, and for which they will not have to account to Parliament in the ordinary way. If it is not so, if the Minister wishes to avoid that suspicion, he should either make it a part of his Bill that mining, grazing or timber cutting should not go on upon the reserve, or else he should exclude those parts of the reserve in which these operations are intended to go on from the operation of this Act altogether. Either he should take them out altogether or, if he puts them in, he should stop these operations upon the reserve, and make it a public park, as the Bill states it was intended to do.

Mr. ELLIS. I think the whole plan of this measure is very objectionable. I do not think the country wants such a park, or that it is able to pay for it. The Minister has already incurred an expenditure of nearly $50,000 without the authority of law; the work upon the park is scarcely begun, and he is committing us to an unlimited expenditure in future. I do not see, Sir, that the country, in view of the state of its finances, in view of the fact that it has had large deficits for the last few years, is in a position to take this matter up, because it is impossible to say what the expenditure will be which we are called upon to make.

Mr. HESSON. I am sorry to hear the hon. gentleman who has just sat down speak against the action of the Government in reference to this park. I am satisfied that if the hon. gentleman had paid a visit to that country he would have made a different statement as to the necessity for this park and the advisability of reserving it for the benefit of the public. I do not say that the Government should take too much power by way of regulation, but I do say that any person visiting that part of the country can see the necessity of some person being in control—some person having such powers as are provided for in the Bill, because circumstances may arise there for which you could hardly make provision in advance by an Act of Parliament. I had the pleasure of visiting those springs last October. I spent some time there very pleasantly indeed, and I am glad to see the Government making such an effort to provide for Canada a place of resort which, I have no doubt, will be sufficiently pleasant and valuable, as a place for invalids and pleasure-seekers, as to induce those in search of health or recreation to spend the money in their own country, which hitherto they have been in the habit of spending abroad. I was much delighted with the drives made on the mountain side and the river bank, and I was also surprised when I learned from the engineer in charge how small a sum the work had cost at that time. If it has since cost a considerable sum more, I have no doubt, from the rate of progress which was being made then by the person in charge, that there will be satisfactory results from the expenditure of the money. I can quite understand that to accomplish a work of this kind would involve considerable expense for the necessary labor. But the benefit that Canada may hope to derive from these springs is altogether of a kind that we cannot fully realise to-day. When I was there I saw invalids carried down to the springs in chairs by friendly hands, and when I returned from the Pacific coast I saw these same people able to walk down themselves, and they were basking in the sunshine on the mountain side. I was delighted to hear that the Government purpose keeping the springs free, so that invalids, or those in wealthy circumstances, who desire a summer recreation, can have their homes there; that the baths will be free for the poorest, and that it was for the poor and the humble, and those most in need of them that they made the drives, and scooped out of the solid rock the basins where baths are now taken. Nature had provided an underground chamber, where persons who had the courage, could go and bathe. My hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) has been in that bath, and I have been in it myself; and I would advise the hon. member for Bothwell to go there also and take a bath, and he will come back in good humor, well pleased with his country, and disposed to admit that the Government are undertaking a good work. I am sure that the people of Canada, after realising the value of the water there, will never regret that the Government have reserved it for the free use of the people of Canada, and will feel that a little expenditure for that purpose is a wise expenditure after all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The baths may be all that our friend has so eloquently described them, and the park may be an exceedingly valuable institution; but in most English-speaking communities it has always hitherto been understood that before public money is spent by Ministers of the Crown, the authority of Parliament should be obtained for it. There are certain exceptions very rigidly guarded, or intended to be rigidly guarded; but I do not think there is anything in the Act of Parliament which authorises the issue of the Governor General's warrants which justifies the expenditure of $46,000 of public money on this public park without the authority of Parliament. It would have been time enough to have spent that money after the authority of Parliament had been obtained for the creation of the park. That was the point taken by my hon. friend behind me, which, in his enthusiasm for these healing waters, the hon. member seems to have forgotten altogether. Whatever may be the merits of the park, I do not think anybody can get up here and contend that this expenditure comes under the terms of the Act of Parliament by virtue of which Governor General's warrants are supposed to be issued. I do not think this money has been properly spent, even if Parliament should find afterwards that the park is a desirable thing to institute. That is a point on which I think this committee would do well to ask for some further explanation.

Mr. CASEY. The haze of poetry thrown over this subject by the hon. member for North Perth has led us to forget the promise made by the Minister when we last discussed the question. He promised to explain these expenditures to us—what had been done, and what it was intended to do. He has explained in very vague terms one or two things that had been done; he explained that a road and a bridge had been built, and that another bridge was building. Surely these did not cost $46,000. The hon. member for North Perth said he was surprised to hear how little the improvements cost up to last October, when he was there. After Parliament met there was an unconstitutional grant of $31,000 more, which could not have been for the improvements up to last fall. The hon. Minister should tell us what this is for. He has given us a hint that a small part will be expended in bringing water from the baths to the hotel. The hon. member for North Perth gives us to understand that the baths will be free, while the Minister says that he is going to sell the privilege to use the water, at the rate of $15 per bath-tub, to certain favored persons who are to locate near the springs. We would like to know which is correct—whether there is to be a Government institution for persons who will go there in forma pauperis to ask for free baths, or whether its privileges are to be paid for by the guests in the hotels belonging to Government pets. If there are to be free baths, no one will use the baths in the hotel, and that would spoil the whole object of the Bill. On the other hand, if they are not free, instead of preserving these springs for the use of the public, the Government propose to preserve them for the use of such speculators as they choose to put in control of them. That is what we believe of the whole Bill—it is a speculators' Bill, one to enable the Government to go into a speculation with some of their friends. We know that they allowed one of their friends, Dr. Orton, a late member of this House, with Dr. Brett, to put up a hotel at these springs. We were told that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were also putting up a hotel. We have not been told whether anybody else is to build, or whether anyone else has been refused permission to do so, or whether the privilege of doing so will go by favor. I fear it will be the latter. Kissing goes by favor, the old proverb says, and I suppose it will be so with the right to build at these springs. We believe the object of this Bill is not to keep them for the benefit of the public, but to shut them up from the public and put them into the hands of speculators. That is the impression the public will have. What I particularly ask for now is an explanation of the expenditure of this $46,000. What has been done with it so far, and what is intended to be done with the rest?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have already explained that the expenditure up to this time has been for building roads and bridges.

Mr. CASEY. How many miles of road?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The road from the springs is three miles long running up the side of the mountain, and if the hon. gentleman knows anything of road building, he will know that that cannot be done for a very small amount of money. I have the opinion of a practical man, Mr. Van Horne, who is a good authority, that it is the cheapest piece of road he has ever seen in his life. As to the $31,000, that is for work partly completed and partly going on.

Mr. CASEY. What is the work?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Building a light carriage bridge across the Bow River. The bridge there last year was a mere temporary bridge to enable a carriage to pass over. Arrangements have been made for that work, and a contract made in connection with it. The work has been done by day's work under the superintendence of Mr. Stewart, and I think those who go there will say that the work is more economically and better done than if it were done under the ordinary system of contract. Then there is the work connected with the bringing down of the water from these springs to the hotels. As to the insinuation of the hon. gentleman, it is unworthy of him, and does not deserve an answer.

Mr. CASEY. It is all very well to answer an imputation sustained by evidence in that manner, but the country will know what such an evasion means. The imputation I have made will not be answered, because the hon. gentleman cannot answer it. The Bill bears on its face the evidence of a job, all the more on account of the hon. gentleman's pretended contempt of the accusation. The hon. gentleman says it is only the money given last fall which was used building the road to the High Springs, three miles of road, $15,000, and that the $31,000 is to be used partly for the bridge and partly for something else which he did not explain at all.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I may tell the hon. gentleman that it is the question of the reservation of the park which we are now discussing. When we come to the Estimates, I will give the fullest particulars as to each item of expenditure.

Mr. CASEY. I am referring to money which has been unconstitutionally spent outside of the Estimates on the park, before we agreed to make it a park or to give the hon. gentleman a Bill at all, and we have the right to know what was done with the money. The hon. gentleman should have been ready to give us the fullest details, and he promised to give us those details when we last discussed the subject. There is another matter the hon. gentleman did not tell us about. He said the Government were laying out a town site and that applications had been put in for 15,000 lots, and he also told us that the lots had not been surveyed in sections. On the map I find the site is laid out in sections; I find it is all laid out in squares. The hon. gentleman says no, then the map is wrong. There are several townships laid out which cover all the timber and coal land included in the park and the springs themselves.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There are no sections on that map.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. gentleman trust his eyes if I hand it to him?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a difference between squares and sections.

Mr. CASEY. This is a regular township—townships 25 and 26, ranges 11 and 12.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Townships are not sections.

Mr. CASEY. Township, range, and section are all laid down on this map. Perhaps they have been laid down on the map without being laid down on the ground. The very part where the coal lands are has been laid down in sections, but the hon. gentleman tells us the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is going into a speculation with the Government, and, therefore, will not object to giving up their sections. That is what we have been thinking. They are going in snags on the profits, as well as certain private speculators, and the reservation is partly for the railway company and partly for private individuals. Now, we have had already a great mass of inconsistencies and contradictory statements with regard to this matter, and it is, perhaps, hardly worth while to challenge any more statements, but the hon. the Minister has not told us what he estimated would be the total cost of putting this in shape. Of course we cannot expect details of that until we can get the Estimates, but we should have the details of what has already been expended. I ask for an approximate estimate of the total cost of putting the park in shape, and that is what the hon. gentleman promised us.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference to the ground itself, I understand that in a former discussion it was stated that the claims of the Canadian Pacific Railway to lands along the line terminated in a point east of this reservation. Today I understand the hon. gentleman to qualify that statement by saying the Canadian Pacific Railway is co-operating with the Government in the enterprise, and consequently there would be no difficulty; but we would like to know whether the assurance of the Government is dependent on the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway has no claim, or upon the hope that having a claim they will not adversely state it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The first reservation made of the park by Order in Council was all west of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The line that has generally been assumed is the western terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway land; when I spoke I had that in my mind. The larger area which is now proposed to be reserved under the report of Mr. Stewart, who is in charge of the works there, goes eastward of that boundary, and, of course, if the Canadian Pacific Railway had the right and did take the odd sections in it, which are no part of the springs, there would be no expenditure on that portion.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman entered into any negotiations with the company as to the surrender of any claims they may have to these lands?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No.

Mr. BLAKE. So that at present a large portion of what we propose to reserve is really subject to the right of the Canadian Pacific Railway to take alternate sections?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The only question is whether the land is fairly fit for settlement, and this, being all mountainous land, is not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The option lies with the company, and if they chose to consider it fit for settlement the law would not sustain the hon. gentleman in refusing to accept their decision upon that point. We ought to know whether this land that he proposes to reserve is ours alone, or ours and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's. I would point out also this fact, which he stated to-day, that 1,100 acres of anthracite coal-mining lands are in very close proximity to the springs, will, if the mines are worked, produce an undesirable settlement of an undesirable class of population, having reference to the especial objects of this reservation. No doubt miners in themselves are useful and industrious members of the community, but the establishment of a mining town so close to the springs might interfere with the object the hon. gentleman is aiming at. I would like to know, in addition to what is proposed to be done with the Canadian Pacific Railway, whether any attempts have been made to sink shafts or in any way to develop these coal lands, and whether the Government consider they have it in their power to resume these either by treaty or by taking them, as in such case they fairly might, at their fair value?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). These coal lands are on the other side of the Bow River, about three miles distant, and, strictly speaking, are not in the park at all. I believe one of the companies has been doing some work on them, but how far successfully I really cannot say. It would not be proper for me to say anything, because anything I have heard is simply rumor.

Mr. MITCHELL. The park is entirely reserved on the north-west side of Bow River, the coal lands are on the other side, and therefore the one will not interfere with the other. True, these coal operations may be carried on to a large extent, and I hope they will be, because it is in the interest of the country they should be developed and become one of our most important industries. If these deposits are there, and I believe they are, it might not be a very desirable thing, in the vicinity of a health-giving institution such as a great park like that, with the springs which will be so desirable for invalids, to have them located in that vicinity; but there they are, and we have to deal with them as we find them. What I realise about the matter from my personal observation is that there are those springs, which are, in my opinion, of vast importance to this country, and which, if properly attended to, developed, cultivated and cared for, will be a place of great resort not alone to people out of health, but, if the park is properly attended to, to the general public. People travelling through will all desire to remain over there for a day or two, and it is our duty to encourage that place as far as possible. There should be few restrictions and few limitations introduced into the area which it is proposed to reserve for the park. If there be any persons who have claims there, we should accept the fact that they are there, or we should endeavor to purchase them out. I think we should give a great deal of license to the Government in a matter of this kind. I do not generally have much confidence in the Government, but in this case I would let the geniuses of the Department of the Interior show what they can do, whether they can develop a great tract in that section of the country; and, from what we have seen in the past of the inventive genius of the Minister of the Interior, and the enterprise he has brought to bear in his own private interests, and the attention he has given to public affairs, I have no doubt he will make it a point to make that park a great spot for public resort, and that he will leave his success in this matter as one of the records of his public life when he departs from the Government. I am not anxious to see a change of Government. I do not suppose there will be one this year; but I think we shall have it before a year or two. I hope that, while he has the power to do it, the hon. gentleman will make this a success.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has already answered, with reference to a very large section of the territory which it is proposed to make into a park, that it is dependent on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Now, with reference to the springs themselves, there were for a long time statements appearing in the public press as to some persons claiming property in these springs by right of discovery, or by other titles which are generally set up to precious spots vested in the Crown. I think another ex-member of Parliament—not the one referred to by the hon. gentleman as a prospective hotel-keeper—but another ex-member of Parliament set up a claim to certain rights of property in these springs. I desire to ask whether any such claim is now made, or whether it has been settled, and if the Department is able to state whether there is now any outstanding claim which is of validity.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is no outstanding claim in reference to these springs. The Government have refused to recognise any right of discovery in regard to them, but there were people who had made some discoveries or improvements in connection with them, and it was a matter of honesty that they should be dealt with. Mr. Pearce made an investigation on the spot in regard to these claims, and took a considerable amount of evidence; and if any hon. gentleman desires to move for the papers, they will be brought down.

Mr. BLAKE. I gather from what the hon. gentleman says that nothing has yet been done in reference to these claims.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There has been only the payment to one claimant.

Mr. BLAKE. Who was that?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Woodworth.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, Mr. Woodworth.

Mr. MITCHELL. How much?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). A thousand dollars.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will see that it is not unreasonable that, on this first clause by which we are proposing to appropriate this property, we should learn our title to the property. As to the suggestion which the hon. gentleman has made, that the discussion of the Estimates was the proper place and time for dealing with these expenditures, I do not differ from that statement, nor as to the estimates the hon. gentleman proposes to bring down to us, but there has been already a large expenditure, an expenditure of $46,000, for which the hon. gentleman does not propose to estimate.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That will come in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, but the money is spent and gone, and we know the character of the discussion which takes place on a matter of that kind. It seems to me not unreasonable that when, before obtaining any authority for the creation of a park at all or the expenditure of a dollar upon it, the Government expended the sum of $46,000, we should have some general notion of what the scheme of the Government is with reference to the expenditure, because, if you begin, without having authority to spend a dollar, by spending $46,000 in a few months, for which you have to ask the authority of Parliament afterwards, if that is the beginning, what is the middle and what is the end to be? It is reasonable to suppose that the Government formed some sort of estimate, some sort of conjecture as to the nature, the character, and the extent of the expenditure which they proposed to make. I agree that it may be extremely difficult to estimate within $5,000 or $10,000, if you go into an expenditure of a great amount on a matter of this kind, what the expenditure is to be; but we might have some idea, in a general way, of what the expenditure is to be when we are asked to foot the bill. Are we going to expend $100,000 or $150,000 more, or what? To what extent are we going to commit ourselves in the future? We ought to know something about this, if we are to be told that Parliament practically agreed to go to any reasonable extent based upon the theories on which the Government acted before they came down and approached the House for authority at all. It, therefore, appears to me that we are still wanting in one of those elements which we ought to have before any of this expenditure is proposed. As to the general area, I would be very sorry, from the very scanty information that we have on the subject, that, even with the great desire to create a park as a permanent object of attraction, and to preserve in all their purity and with all their conveniences the springs themselves, it should be suggested for a moment that the economic minerals which are actually found in that part of the country should have any prevention placed in the way of their working; but, while that is so with reference to the timber, I should suppose that nothing would be more important than that, at the earliest practicable moment, arrangements should be made to prevent the cutting down of a single stick by persons who may be doing it for purposes of commerce. I do not suppose that anything which the hon. gentleman may propose to do, involving the expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars, will be likely to compensate for the loss of the pine and the smaller timber which in the course of ages may grow into valuable forests in this place. In rocky places we know the difficulty of growth and the practical impossibility of replacing what is cut down, whether it be from necessity or for personal convenience. So, if there be no great commercial necessity that any further timber should be cut on the premises, I think that all those considerations which alone justify the creation of the park will justify steps being taken to prevent its being despoiled of the timber. As to the expenditure to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, it may be proper that that work should have been performed by day's work; I do not know; but the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) points out that the Public Works Act forbids it being done by day's work; and it is evident that a great deal of it must have been done by tender. For instance, I do not suppose that the bridge, the iron bridge to which the hon. gentleman has referred, was made by day's work, whether it was put up by day's work or not. I am sure it is gratifying to know that the hon. gentleman has found out that it is much cheaper to do this by day's work than by contract. I know that, at certain epochs and seasons, in the immediate neighborhood of the building in which we are now assembled, it was so considered, but I would ask the hon. gentleman to pause before he comes to the conclusion that what may be very desirable and cheap in the neighborhood of this building can be done in that way as cheaply in the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. HESSON. There are persons who are not settled with yet at these springs, persons who were the real discoverers of these springs. They were young men from the county of Perth, and I believe they are more particularly constituents of my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow). These young men, the McArdle brothers, have been something like four years in possession there, one of them, I believe, sitting with his rifle to protect that famous property which they had discovered, while the other poor fellow was away hunting grub. They have been struggling there for four years, and the Government have gone so far as to appoint Commissioners, who have made a report. I presume the best way, as suggested by the Minister, is to ask for that report. No doubt the hon. Minister knows best what should be done, but I think something should be done at once to compensate these poor fellows who have been struggling for the last four years to hold the fort. They have rights, no doubt, and the Government do not think it necessary to eject them. They feel that they ought to be protected, and I have no doubt the Government will do something for them. They are not very wealthy, and they went into the mountains as pioneers to make discoveries, and I believe they had a contract for getting out ties for the railway when they made the discovery. Now it turns out that one Woodworth, who was not so poor as these young men, has been compensated for something he appears to have done in the matter. It may be that he was entitled to it, no doubt he was; but these young men who have been there for years have not received a dollar, and they ought to be provided for in some way, and very speedily. I think I am in a position to say a word on their behalf, for they have written to me several times about the matter since I have returned from the mountains. I trust that the Minister will put something in the Estimates to compensate these men, for I think they are entitled to it.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman told us, if I understood him aright, that it was only an additional part of the reservation, which it was subsequently determined to take in, which came within the railway belt; I suppose he meant that part which includes Devil's Head Lake. I find, by the map laid on the Table, that the western boundary of the Canadian Pacific Railway belt passes west of both the plots of ground for coal-mining, and follows the boundary of the town site; but whether it includes the springs I do not know, because he has not marked the springs on this map, and I cannot get anybody to mark the exact site of the springs for me. But, at all events, the railway belt goes up to the boundary of the town site, which town the hon. Minister told us was being built on the opposite side of the river from the springs, and, therefore, must come in the immediate neighborhood of the springs. That is on the map. The hon. gentleman shakes his head—probably he knows more than the surveyor of his Department. There can be no dispute in the matter. The western boundary of the Canadian Pacific Railway belt follows the boundary of the town site, going around the two sides of the section which is laid out for it, and includes all the land north of Bow River, east of the points where the curve occurs in the railway. Then, the claims of the Canadian Pacific Railway come right up to the town site. Now, as to the matter of the probable cost of the park, it is no use to affect a dignified silence in regard to that point. We have a distinct right to ask for information as to the probable cost before we make the reservation, and if the Minister continues to refuse to give us information in regard to the probable cost, we must infer either that he has made no estimate, that he is asking us to incur an expense which he does not know anything about, or else that he believes it would be so considerable that the House would refuse to grant it.

Mr. KIRK. This is a question that ought to interest every member of this House, and the Government ought to inform the House what is likely to be the cost of the undertaking. Hon. members from this side of the House have a right to demand an answer on that point. I notice that already upwards of $46,000 have been expended on this enterprise. Now, I am opposed to this enterprise altogether. I cannot see for the life of me why the Government should undertake to prepare hotels for tourists. I do not see that the Government should go into the hotel business at all. Why should they go into the business of preparing public parks as a resort—for whom? Not for the people of Canada, not for the people who pay the taxes, but for the wealthy people of the cities of the Dominion and the cities of other countries. Who are the people who will be called upon to pay the money to erect this hotel, this pleasure park, and the baths for these wealthy people? Why, the workingmen, the fishermen, the farmers of this country; these are the people who must put their hands in their pockets, some of whom can scarcely earn enough to keep soul and body together, in order to contribute to the comfort and convenience of the wealthy people of this continent, and perhaps of the other, too. I protest against the whole scheme, and I hope the Government have not gone so far that they cannot withdraw and leave the matter for private enterprise. If the Government have grounds up there which can be made into convenient parks for public resorts for the wealthy people, let them leave to individuals the business of doing so. There are many other places in this Dominion which could be turned into convenient public resorts; just as healthful baths could be prepared in other parts of the Dominion as in the North-West among the Rocky Mountains; and if the Government begin to do this kind of thing in that part of the country, they will be called upon to do so in other parts of the country as well, and where will it stop? I protest against the whole thing, and I say the Government should leave the whole matter in the hands of private speculators and to private enterprise.

Mr. TROW. I have visited famous springs on various parts of this continent, and I question whether there is any other place more deserving of expenditure than the one now under discussion. I had the pleasure on one occasion of baptising my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) in these celebrated springs. I think, however, it would be advisable, before the Government make much more expenditure, to analyse the waters and ascertain their curative properties. There is no such scenery anywhere else on the continent, and I believe a limited expenditure is called for on this park. The Government have not been lavish, so far, at all events. When I visited the park I recommended to the Minister of the Interior that the Government should do something of this kind. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has seen the springs at all, but I took the first opportunity of informing him of the scenery in that locality. The scenery is delightful. It surpasses the Alps. For miles around the tops of the mountains are covered with perpetual snow, and there is a beautiful navigable river to add to the charms of the place. There are no agricultural lands in the locality, so that no person could claim the right of a squatter. There is no land to cultivate except the valley on each side of the river, which is very limited. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) does not seem, from his statement, to understand the geography of the country. The coal lands are entirely separate from the springs, and are distant, nearly three miles, and there is a considerable distance from the springs to the side of the mountains on the other side of the railway to the coal mines, which are partially developed at several points. I approve of the expenditure, and I now know capitalists who would undertake to give the Government 1000 per cent. on all their expenditures if the Government would give them possession of the land, including the springs and coal lands.

Mr. KIRK. Let them give it.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) understood me to say that the springs and the coal mines were together, he was mistaken. I was simply referring to coal lands.

Mr. JONES. The principle involved in the question before the House has not received attention except from the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), and that is the appropriation of public money for such a purpose. It is well known that we in this country have given the Canadian Pacific Railway Company an enormous amount, 70 or 80 millions, to construct their railway for the people of the North-West, and for the development of the country in that direction. If anything more is required to attract settlers and visitors to that portion of the Dominion, the expenditure should be made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company who are going to derive the chief benefit from people visiting that country. Again, I cannot see on what grounds of public policy a Government can undertake to expend public money in a remote part of the Dominion, because it is a remote part, particularly as regards the people of the east, and the expenditure will doubtless amount to a large sum before it is finished. We have obtained no idea yet of the amount required for the completion of the work, and I cannot see upon what principle a Government can ask this House to sanction such an appropriation of public money. As stated by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), the taxpayers of the Dominion will not look with favor on such an appropriation. I protest in the strongest possible language against public money being spent for such a purpose at the present time. The financial condition of the country is not in such a prosperous state that we can afford to throw away money on such an object. We have had large deficiencies; there is depression existing in many parts of the Dominion; in the eastern section, at all events, there is very great depression, and the taxes that have to be borne by the taxpayers are a very great burden upon them; and, therefore, the people of the Dominion will look with much apprehension at the inauguration of a policy such as this, looking forward to a large expenditure. I trust the Government will hesitate before they inaugurate a policy such as is indicated by the Bill of the Minister of Interior to-day. The explanations made by hon. gentlemen who have spoken may apply with great force from their standpoint, but I throw them entirely on one side, because I take exception to the expenditure on any grounds whatever. If those springs are there, and are as valuable as pointed out by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) and can be disposed of to speculators for a very large sum, I do not see why the Government are not disposed to accept the offer. The springs will still be there, the purchaser cannot remove them, the people of the Dominion in that section, or whoever may visit the locality, will have the same benefit from them as if they were owned by the Government. We know very well that private enterprise always manages such undertakings much more economically and systematically than does the Government. We, unfortunately, have had too much experience of governmental expenditure in this country in the hotel line as well as in other directions, and therefore I hope this expenditure will not be undertaken. I enter my protest most strongly against the principle of the expenditure. It certainly seems an outrageous departure from the constitutional authority of this House and this Parliament that the Government should have used the authority which they possess under the Governor General's warrant for the appropriation of forty or fifty thousand dollars for an object not of any immediate and pressing character. The authority given the Government under the Act is, that where circumstances arise not foreseen by the Government, and where there is a public necessity for action by the Executive, the Government may act under the Governor General's warrant. But if hon. gentlemen opposite can on their own motion spend forty or fifty thousand dollars on a matter of this kind, they may spend a hundred thousand dollars for some other purpose equally undesirable, in my judgment, in some other part of the country. Therefore, on both grounds, I enter my protest against this expenditure, and I shall be very sorry if it is endorsed by this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has said that he hopes the Government will hesitate before going on with this expenditure. The Government will not hesitate—they have not hesitated, and with the approbation of this House they will continue in that policy. The hon. gentleman has said that we have spent a great deal of money in helping the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build the railway—millions, he said—and, therefore, as they will be principally benefited, they should be called upon to complete the whole undertaking. The hon. gentleman evidently did not hear the speech of the hon. gentleman who sits behind him, the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow). No doubt the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be only too glad to take the land and make 1000 per cent. out of it.

An hon. MEMBER. Sell it to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then there would be another cry raised, that here was another instance of the favoritism of the Government towards the Canadian Pacific Railway by giving them a monopoly of all those magnificent curative waters. There is really only one way of making that portion of the country what it ought to be, and that is by the scheme of the Government, undertaken with a full knowledge of their responsibility; and I am glad to find it is supported by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have visited the place and understand its value, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow). It is a place of ideal beauty. The hon. member for South Perth has not at all exaggerated it. I do not suppose in any portion of the world there can be found a spot, taken altogether, which combines so many attractions and which promises in as great a degree not only large pecuniary advantage to the Dominion, but much prestige to the whole country by attracting the population, not only on this continent, but of Europe to this place. It has all the qualifications necessary to make it a great place of resort. In the first place, its sulphur and magnesia waters possess beyond a doubt as great curative properties as either the White Sulphur Springs of Virginia or the sulphur springs of Arkansas. Besides, the scenery is magnificent and the climate is genial. So mild is the climate in winter in that portion of the country, though it is well up in the mountains and well towards the north, caused by the Chinook winds, that Dr. Brett told me that during the winter before, the only winter he spent there, the thermometer was only once down to three degrees below zero. The hon. gentleman has made an attack upon Dr. Brett and Dr. Orton. Well, Dr. Orton was a very respected member of this House when he was here. He is now pushing his fortunes in the North-West, those fortunes having been seriously injured, as have those of many other hon. gentlemen who have been parliamentarians, by his devotion to the public service rather than to his own interests. These gentlemen have put up a sanitarium, and I think it was said when I was there that they could take care of forty patients. Dr. Brett told me in August last that such were the understood qualities of the winter climate that he had already rented every one of his forty rooms for the whole winter to people coming from the south, on account of the mildness of the climate. There is beautiful scenery, there are the curative properties of the water, there is a genial climate, there is prairie sport and there is mountain sport; and I have no doubt that that will become a great watering-place, and that there will be a large town on the south side of Bow River, where the Government have laid out a town plot. I think the Government will be fully remunerated for any expenditure they have made there. Now, my hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior, took steps, as soon as he possibly could, to prevent the intrusion of speculators and squatters upon this large plot of land so magnificently situated for a park. A town or towns will grow there—because I have no doubt that the Canadian Pacific Railway will lay out a town plot there, though it is altogether away from the twenty thousand acres which lie on a rising mountain, and are surrounded by mountains in every direction. My hon. friend has stated that a considerable number of lots have already been sold, and I have no doubt that, ex necessitate, there will grow up a very considerable town at that place. Then there will be the rental of the waters; that is a perennial source of revenue, and if carefully managed it will more than many times recuperate or recoup the Government for any present expenditure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Recuperate, too, I hope.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, recuperate the patients and recoup the Treasury. In corroboration of what my hon. friend behind me said, I may state that I saw several patients during the short time I was there who told me their stories of the remarkably curative effects of these waters in their own cases. Now, the Government had to put an end to the rush of speculators to that portion of the country. Everybody knows—the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows—that when the squatter gets in he at once gets or assumes to get a claim; he claims compensation for removing him, and it was of importance, in order that these people should be kept out, that a reserve should be made at once, and that as much attention as possible should be paid to the protection of the timber in the general line of the park. Then it is of some importance—the Government thought it was of great importance—that all this section of the country should be brought at once into usefulness, that people should be encouraged to come there, that hotels should be built, that bath-houses should be erected for sanitary purposes, and in order to prevent squatters going in, the reservation was made. Mr. Stewart who was employed—and as far as I could judge his selection by my hon. friend was a happy one—has laid out the Mountain Park with a great deal of taste. I am not very æsthetical in my judgment—at least, I have no confidence in my own judgment of what is sublime or beautiful, but I have heard a great many travellers, and others who have visited that portion of the country, declare that the design of the park is charming, that the drives are beautiful, and the laying out of the ground generally, all that could be wished for. Now, it was important to do that at once. People were flocking there, and when I visited the place last August there were ranges of tents that the people brought there so that they might use the waters. The sooner the town was built the better—the sooner that the waters were brought into use the better for the sake of bringing the people there, and therefore the Government, having a full sense of their responsibility, and believing that the object was so clearly a beneficial one in every possible way, and having the certainty that the Treasury would be fully recouped for their expenditure, commenced last year to lay out the grounds and bring them into play for all the purposes required as soon as possible. They knew they would have to account to Parliament for this expenditure. But it seemed to me that the expenditure is so advantageous to that part of the country, that, with the certainty that there will be a considerable population, transitory or permanent, flocking in there, the certainty that there will be a town grow up in the vicinity of these waters, by the laying out of this park, the Government undertook to run the risk of Parliament disapproving of the expenditure. I am quite sure that if hon. gentlemen opposite would visit that part of the country they would, without a single exception, declare that the Government were wise in reserving this park, and that the sooner the work of bringing it into play was completed the better.

Mr. BLAKE. I have been greatly struck in the course of this debate, and more so, perhaps, by the last speech than by any other, with the wonderful properties of this water. These springs are certainly the most extraordinary springs I ever heard of. It is not only the description which hon. gentlemen have given of their curative properties, but it is the effect that the water has had on themselves. We see these effects. They produce an immense exaltation of sentiment, a wonderful development of the poetical faculty, and union and concord between gentlemen who ordinarily think very differently on almost every other topic. Why, the county of Perth, for the first time since I have known it, seems to be united. My hon. friend from the north riding (Mr. Hesson) and my hon. friend from the south riding (Mr. Trow) shake hands across the Banff Springs, and each one of them drops into poetry on the subject. And not merely are they poetical, not merely is there an expansion of mind and an elevation of feeling, but there is a regardlessness of base pecuniary considerations that shows not merely that the springs may be of use to those who are lucky enough to be able to pay their fares on the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that there should be an appropriation to bring them to every man's door. One hon. gentleman on this side said that if we wanted to sell them we could get one thousand per cent on the expenditure, and the First Minister has just repeated the statement. Now one thousand per cent. on our expenditure would be just $4,600,000, and springs that can produce in the Parliament of Canada that statement, seriously made on one side and emphasised by the leader of the Government on the other, are certainly springs that the nation should keep to itself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that, among their other effects, these springs have had the result of blinding the First Minister to the very plain terms of the Act of Parliament under which alone the Governor General's warrant can issue. Those terms are clear and precise. One reason only is assigned by Parliament for justifying the Government in meddling with the public money, before it is voted by Parliament, and that is when an entirely unforeseen urgency occurs, and it is illustrated by the words "such as an accident to a public building requiring repairs." The argument of the First Minister may be a very good argument for voting money for the purpose of developing and improving this property, if we decided on erecting a national park; but I submit that it was not a sound argument to justify him or his Government in taking a considerable sum of money out of the public Treasury and appropriating it to a purpose for which there could be no urgency. There may have been an urgency for reserving the site; but there was no such urgency as the Act of Parliament contemplates, for spending that sum of money in the month of July or August. Surely the Government must have known of these springs a considerable time before. Two of my hon. friends, some time prior to that expenditure, called the attention of the Government to the desirability of preserving this property for public use. The House sat until the 1st of June last year, and the Government could easily have taken a provisional vote. They did not, however, but chose to have recourse to the process of taking money by a Governor General's warrant, and I contend that there has been nothing stated by the First Minister to justify in the least degree the use of that power for such a purpose. I intend to call attention to the use or abuse made of that power at a later period; but I will just read for the benefit of the First Minister, who is not perhaps as familiar with the Audit Act as is desirable, the conditions under which a Governor General's warrant is issued:

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"If when Parliament is not in Session any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament, is urgently and immediately required for the public good, then upon the report of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question that the necessity is urgent, the Governor General in Council may order a special warrant to be prepared, &c."

Now, I submit that if this expenditure of $46,000 for the Banff Springs comes under the terms of that Act, there is no use whatever in our attempting to put any restrictions on the power of the Government of Canada to take money out of the Treasury and expend it according to their own will and pleasure. Just as good reasons could be given for the expenditure of $40,000 or $400,000 for that matter, in any part of the Dominion where they chose to expend it. I think the power has been grossly abused, whether it is a desirable thing to have the park or not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the unauthorised and unwarranted expenditure the Government has made on this park is deserving of the very serious consideration of the House. This is a question wholly apart from the merits of the undertaking. The establishment of the park may be wisely proposed in the public interest, and the expenditure on it may be a national advantage; but that is a question apart from the propriety of the Government undertaking to spend money without the sanction of Parliament. We know the position the hon. leader of the Government took in 1875, with reference to the expenditure proposed by my hon. friend from East York on the telegraph line along the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. friend was authorised by an Act of Parliament to build a line of telegraph along the railway. It was found necessary, before certain portions of the line of railway were absolutely located, and in the furtherance of the work of survey and exploration, to establish a telegraph line. Parliament had made the necessary appropriations, but because the words "along the line of railway," were used, and because the telegraph line did not in every instance follow the line of railway, the hon. gentleman declared that the expenditure was an illegal, unauthorised and unconstitutional expenditure. I have his words on that subject, and while they were not warranted by the question then under discussion, they are warranted by the question now before us. The hon. gentleman said:

"These contracts were therefore illegal, and if the hon. gentleman spent a single farthing on them the Government would be putting their hands into the public Treasury without the authority of the law, and would be guilty of a great illegality. This House would be bound to do what had been done in the case of the Churchward contract, in order to vindicate the rights of Parliament, and declare all these contracts absolutely void and illegal, without any binding effect or obligatory force whatever."

That was the position taken by the hon. gentleman with reference to an expenditure upon a telegraph line that was authorised, but taken upon the ground that the telegraph line did not follow a line of railway that had been actually located. Now the hon. gentleman comes down to Parliament and proposes to ask us to sanction an act which is a gross violation of the rights of this House. If there is any matter which peculiarly concerns the House of Commons, it is its absolute control over the money required by the Crown for public purposes. The hon. gentleman first decides that a public park is necessary. Now, I say he ought not to have so decided until he had parliamentary sanction. The first step cannot be legally taken towards the establishment of that park until Parliament has made the necessary appropriations. It is the fact of parliamentary sanction being required for such appropriations that gives Parliament efficient control over public affairs; and it would be converting this House into a mere registering body of the wishes of the Administration, if we for a moment consented to the principle that the Government shall make appropriations for public purposes, as they see proper, and then, after the money has been expended, come down to the House and asks us to decide as to the propriety of establishing such undertakings and spending large sums of money upon them. It does seem to me that this House would be wanting in its duty to the people, as the great trustees of this country, if they permitted this expense to pass unquestioned. What necessity was there for it? If this park was absolutely necessary, the hon. gentleman ought to have known of that when we were here last year; and if he did not know of it, what was the necessity of making this expenditure before the sanction of Parliament was obtained? The hon. gentleman knows there is no such pressing necessity. It may be a very good thing to establish such a park, but it is a better thing to obey the law. Obedience in this matter is better than that superior statesmanship and energy which the Government have exhibited in this instance. It was their duty to comply with the law. We are here sitting as a deliberative and legislative body, seeking to establish laws for the government of the country, and those occupying the highest position are those who give this extraordinary example to the people of setting the law at defiance. The hon. gentleman has shown the estimate which he placed on the independence of Parliament and the respect he has for Parliament; he has shown the estimate he placed on the maintenance of parliamentary authority, by the expenditure of a very large sum without parliamentary sanction, and by asking the House, after the money is expended, to approve of what the Government have done. Why, there are instances where such approval may be necessary. There are instances of some great and unforeseen calamity having happened, of some great emergency having arisen, which demanded prompt action for the maintenance of the state or the existence of some of the institutions of the state. In such a case, the supreme necessity becomes a part of the law, and a justification for the course which the Government may think proper to take; but there is no such supreme necessity in this case. The only necessity in this case was that a certain number of the friends of the Government, a certain number of those who were the camp followers of the Administration, undertook to appropriate a part of the public domain without the expenditure of a dollar, a certain number who were watching the springs, perhaps, as an hon. gentleman on the other side has said, with their guns, for years, as Rizpah watched the corpses of her dead sons—these gentlemen had undertaken to protect the public property, against what? Against the avaricious disposition exhibited by their rivals in the Government camp; and here we have a large expenditure made—for what? Why, to enable the Government to deal with these parties and pay them certain sums out of the public Treasury, for a necessity which had no existence in fact and no existence in law, which existed only in the minds of those parties in consequence of the support they had been giving the Administration. We have not had full daylight let in upon the whole transaction, but enough has been disclosed by a member of the Treasury benches to give us some idea of the actual situation, and how the affair stood before any action was taken, and why action was taken before Parliament met. So, in order to satisfy the demands of rival competitors for the possession of property which did not belong to them, and with the view of reconciling their differences and getting rid of them, the Government made the expenditure of $46,000, contrary to law, without the shadow of foundation in law, without any authority whatever beyond that which they expected to obtain from an obedient majority in this House. I say except from the support they expect to obtain from that obedient majority, the Government had no possible sanction or authority for what they have done. In my opinion, the House would be negligent of its duty and indifferent to its high trust, if it permitted the conduct of the Government in this matter to pass without censure.

Mr. DAVIN. At the risk of being irreverent, I will characterise the remarks I have heard from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as parliamentary pedantry.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What?

Mr. DAVIN. Parliamentary pedantry.

An hon. MEMBER. Say it loud and say it slow.

Mr. DAVIN. I will say it as loud and as slowly as the tympanum or dulness of the hon. gentleman makes it necessary. It is a pity, I think, that the hon. member for Bothwell has not visited the Banff Springs. If he had visited them and utilised them, I have no doubt whatever we should here witness an amelioration in the hon. gentleman's general demeanour and even in regard to his oratory, if that be possible, which would be of great advantage to the party of which he is a distinguished member and to this House. Now, if we take the sub-clause quoted by the hon. member for South Oxford what do we find? The hon. gentleman read:

"If, when Parliament is not in Session, any accident happens to any public work or building which requires an immediate outlay for the repair thereof, or any other occasion arises when any expenditure not foreseen or provided for by Parliament is urgently and immediately required for the public good."

The hon. gentleman stopped there, but if the hon. member for South Oxford, who travelled some time ago to the North-West—I happened to have had the pleasure of being in his company as far as Calgary, and I do not think he got off at Banff—had seen what is to be seen at Banff; if he had seen the miniature Switzerland to be found there, with sanitary and æsthetic attractions such as are not to be found in any part of the world, I do not think that he would have got up here and said that to have brought—if nothing more had been done—this scene of beauty and health one year or a year and a-half earlier into such a condition that it could be utilised by the general public, was not fulfilling the conditions laid down in the Act as warranting this expenditure. But if we read further we find that:

"Then upon the report of the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General that there is no parliamentary provision, and of the Minister having charge of the service in question, that the necessity is urgent."

What amount of responsibility would the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) leave a Minister? He says that to obey the law is better than high statesmanship. Well, if to obey the law, in slavish adherence to the letter, is better than to act in accordance with the spirit of the law and in high statesmanship, all I can say is: God save Canada from such political pedantry. I confess the hon. member for Bothwell always seems to me to take what might be called the most politically depraved view of a question. I use, of course, the language in a strictly parliamentary sense. A great poet tells us that "the mills of the gods grind slowly but they grind exceeding small;" but if they can do anything slower or smaller than our own Mills they must be miracles of the prolix in grinding and the infinitesimal grit. I was very glad to see the effect that the discussion of this very interesting part of Canada had upon the very distinguished leader of the Opposition. It is always a great pleasure to me to hear that hon. gentleman debate, but it was almost new in my experience of parliamentary life—and I have had some experience before of this life when I was able to observe it from another place—to see the display of humor we were favored with from that quarter, and the display is due entirely to the Banff Springs. As a North-West man, I claim the whole credit of that for the Banff Springs. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), instead of passing by Banff and going on to some other place in the mountains, should have got off there and should have got boiled as some other Reform members did. I do not know whether they are in the House now, because I know that some changes have taken place, but when I was coming from Banff, I met two members of the Reform party, and I was telling them that I had the honor and privilege of travelling westward with the hon. member for South Oxford, and was quoting to them his well known views. There is nothing private about that, because they are the same views that he has since expressed in reference to the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. These gentlemen, fresh from Banff Springs, said: We have been to the Banff Springs, we have been to Victoria, and all that sort of objection will have to be given up. I do not know whether they are in the House now, but if they are, I hope they continue to hold that view, and that they will rise in their place and say that they abandon that miserable plank in the platform of the Reform party, that the construction of that line so rapidly was improper, which has been the means of bringing into existence this very Banff. Without the Canadian Pacific Railway, the springs would be there, but they could not be utilised by the people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The springs would be there, but the people would not.

Mr. DAVIN. As the right hon. gentleman says, the springs would be there, but, so far from being a valuable possession, so far from being the means of health and recreation for the people of Canada, they would have no practical existence but for that railway. I consider that the Minister of the Interior, instead of being condemned by this Parliament for the course he has taken, ought to have, as he undoubtedly will have, his action endorsed, and endorsed with a will, because, if we are to have Ministers with the responsibility of Ministers, they should be prepared to act in emergencies of this kind; they are capable of being brought before this Parliament if they have done wrong. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) talks as if there was no check whatever. If any wrong has been done, bring forward your motion and condemn the Minister, but the proper thing, in my opinion—and I have been there—I have seen the results of what has already been done, and I can foresee the results of what is to be done—the proper thing is to thoroughly endorse the Minister of the Interior as an active Minister who has confidence in the North-West, and confidence especially in that portion of the North-West, and who believes in action. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a sort of duodecimo Mephistopheles, if I may make a mixed figure. I mean that he is the embodiment in this House of the spirit that denies. Mephistopheles was the vast embodiment of the spirit that denies, according to the great German poet. The hon. member for Bothwell is one whose speeches I read with more pleasure than I hear. I fully acknowledge their ability; I like to read his speeches; and, probably, after he has taken the Banff Springs, I may like to hear them; but in this House he is the embodiment of the spirit that denies, and in that he is typical of the party to which he belongs. They have no faith in the North-West, and they appear to have little faith in Canada; and their whole attitude, especially the attitude of the hon. member for Bothwell, is an attitude of criticism, an attitude of want of faith. If they had their way, the Minister of the Interior would sit with his hands folded in his office and do nothing for that great country, instead of being alive and active, visiting the country, doing what is necessary for its needs, and seeing that Banff Springs or any other place in that country, which can be exploited for the benefit of the people of Canada and the people of the North-West, shall be developed.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was all through the North-West, and was at Banff Springs. I walked over every mile of road that has been built there. I have been trying to think since this discussion commenced, and I really cannot see where the $46,000 has gone. There are, perhaps, from three to four miles of road built, possibly more. I do not think it would cost more than $1,000 a mile to grub out. I am satisfied it would not cost more than an ordinary railway track through a bush, and you can get that grubbed and cleared for $1,000 a mile. I know that the portion from Dr. Brett's to the mill is the most difficult part. In the other roads there is no cutting, but simply grubbing out. I admit that the timber is growing very thick, and that it takes considerable time for, perhaps, a considerable number of hands to work to cut that out. Still I do not see where the $46,000 has gone. Of course, there is the bridge, but it is a mere floating bridge of unsquared timber and might be constructed in a short time. I understand that there is a reserve out of the $46,000 to build the bridge which it is now intended to build. I do not know what the amount of that reserve is, but if nothing has been done there since I saw the place in September last, I cannot for the life of me see where the rest of the $46,000 has gone. I am quite prepared to endorse the action of the Government in reserving the place as a park, but I believe the greatest possible care should be taken by the Government to see that money is not uselessly spent or thrown away. I am prepared to endorse to a large extent the remarks of my hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces. I believe we should not indulge in more expenditure in the North-West than is absolutely necessary. I do not know that any necessity exists for any other expenditure there. There is a good road to the springs, and, unless it be for the bridge, I do not see where any further expenditure is required. I should like to know how much is reserved for that bridge. There must be a large sum reserved out of that $46,000, or else there has been an immense sum squandered on those roads. Of course I know that wages are very high there. Men get $2 and $2.25 a day on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and possibly the engineer has had to pay a large sum to the men whom he employed for the work which has been done; but, admitting that wages of that kind were paid, admitting that an outside figure was paid, I contend that for the roads already built not more than from $4,000 to $5,000 could have been actually spent. Then there may be some money for surveys, and I know it is a very rough section to survey, and that there is a great difficulty because the timber grows so exceedingly close that in order to survey it you would have to cut out a road every way you desired to run a line. But the surveys and the roads altogether cannot possibly have swallowed up one-third of the $46,000, and I think that the House should know where the balance has gone. I would like also to know whether the arrangement with Dr. Brett and Dr. Orton permits them to conduct the water from the springs to their hotel free of charge. The hotel is built a mile and a half or two miles from the principal spring, and I should like to know if they have the right, without paying any further charge, to conduct the water to their hotels through the pipes by which they intended to conduct it. With reference to the other springs, and I was at every one of them, I think it is desirable that they should be reserved, but they should be turned to good purpose and should be regulated in a such a way that the country would reap a return from them. We have already expended an enormous amount of money in the North-West more than $15,000,000 in addition to what we have spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we should cry a halt in regard to this sort of thing, or show more probability of recouping the Dominion for what has been already expended. Let the Government call a halt with regard to this matter until such time as they have evidence that we are going to realise some benefit from the amount we have invested.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member from the wild west who delighted us a few moments ago, has enlightened us as well as delighted us upon one point. Many of his old acquaintances in the wild east down here used to suppose that the flights of fancy, the gems of poesy and the flowers of rhetoric that appeared in the Regina Leader, were caused by the inspiration of genius. Now, Sir, we know better. He has told us it was not genius at all that dictated those articles in his paper, it was Banff. Another point that he made was that my friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), was bound up in a very small compass, that he was the incarnation of a person whom he calls, in his revised edition, Mephistopheles. Well, whatever my friend from Bothwell may be the incarnation of, in whatever size of binding he is put up, we are satisfied now that my hon. friend from the wild west—he will excuse me if I cannot remember his constituency at this moment—

Mr. DAVIN. I will excuse any amount of ignorance.

Mr. CASEY. I thank the hon. gentleman for excusing my ignorance. I would remark that he has satisfied us of one thing, at all events, that whatever my hon. friend from Bothwell may be the incarnation of, my hon. friend from the wild west is the incarnation of the Banff Springs, namely, gush and gas. Well, Sir, leaving this gushing subject for a moment, I wish to refer to one point made by the hon. leader of the House, which bears out our contention in this matter. He said that the Canadian Pacific Railway would only be too glad to get hold of these lands, that we had said that the railway ought to improve the land, that they would be only too glad to get hold of it, and that they would make large profits out of it. Now, Sir, we never said the land should be given to the railway company. What we said was that the railway ought to be at the expense of putting improvements upon the reservation. We were agreed there should be a reservation, but we believe the railway should pay the expenses. And why? Because it is the railway, second to the private speculators, who will get locations on the reservation itself, who are going to make the profit out of it, and here is where the Minister's remark came in. He told us that these springs would be thronged, not only by people from Canada, but by people from Europe. Now, how are the people from Canada or Europe going to get there? Over the Canadian Pacific Railway. Who is going to make a profit out of carrying them? The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and these are the people who ought to pay the expense of fixing up the park. Why, Sir, there was a little railway down in my county, called the London and Port Stanley Railway, about 24 miles long altogether, and it fixed up a park of its own at a watering place called Port Stanley, a park much more expensive in proportion to the length and the wealth of the railway, than the Banff reservation would be in proportion to the length and wealth of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and they found it one of the best speculations in the world. They spent thousands of dollars in fitting up the park, in bringing people to it, and they made money out of it after all. So, I say the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should do the same thing with the Banff reservation. All the Government should do is to reserve the land from settlement and prevent the destruction of its natural features, and call upon the Canadian Pacific Railway to pay the expense of improving the park. My hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hesson), talked as if it was going to be a boon for poor people suffering from disease. It has not been explained to us by the Minister of the Interior how it was going to be a boon, and his leader has made it plain that the speculators are going to be allowed to charge for the water. Nobody can go there without paying for the water and without paying for going over the Canadian Pacific Railway, unless he happens to be a particular friend of the Government or of the railway. Now, my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was puzzled to know what had become of the money. I think the Minister of the Interior sufficiently explained that when he told us that the work on the park was done by day's work previous to the elections, and when you have to expend money by day's work previous to an election, the wonder is, not that so much money was spent, but that they managed to limit it to $46,000. Hon. members know how money is expended before an election, and the rat holes in which the money runs. There is one point more on which I expect to hear from the Minister of the Interior. Has he enquired into the manner of conducting the great American parks, and has he an idea upon which this is modelled? I understand the Yosemite is a public reservation, and there is also one at the Yellowstone Valley. Has the Minister made enquiries as to how these reservations were established, how they are managed, and what the Government of the country has done in regard to them? I think—I have no doubt of the fact—that he must have made such enquiries, and I hope he will now give us, briefly, the substance of his information on that subject.

Mr. COCKBURN. It was not my intention to take any part in the debate, inasmuch as I have never had the advantage of being in the North-West, or of having seen Banff. I only wish to draw attention to one point which has arisen in this debate. We have seen the eloquent leader of Her Majesty's Opposition relaxing for a moment the severity of his looks to draw attention to the remarkably exhilarating effects which the drinking of the water has had upon the right hon. Minister who leads this House. Well, Sir, it seems to me that the very description given by the Prime Minister of the exhilarating effects of the water, has had a most remarkable effect upon the leader of the Opposition himself, inasmuch as it has led him to calculate that the interest on $46,000, at 1000 per cent., would be $4,600,000, instead of being, as it is, $460,000. If the hon. gentleman is to be no more accurate in his calculations, should he ever, in the lapse of ages, come across the floor, and occupy these Treasury benches, I can only hope, as a young member, that he will not trust himself, or be entrusted, with the finances of the Dominion.

Mr. MALLORY. I have no doubt that the park of which we have heard so much to-night is deserving of all the commendation that has been bestowed upon it, on account of the healing qualities of the waters of which we have heard from hon. members; and had we before us a report concerning those healing qualities from some scientific observer, if the Minister had sent some scientific expert to these springs to examine their healing properties, who had reported to the Government; if the Government of the day were able to lay before us this afternoon a plan of the park that they propose to lay aside for the use of the public of this great country of ours; if they were able to tell us what the expense of this thing is likely to be, then we would be in a position, I think, to take action upon the Bill now before us. But inasmuch as they have not seen fit, before going into the scheme, to consult Parliament in any way about it; inasmuch as they have not seen fit to lay before us estimates of the probable cost of the laying out and buying up of this park, as well as a report on the healing qualities of these springs, I think we are not in a fair position to take any action upon this scheme now. We should consider the matter very carefully before we entrust the present Ministry, or any other Ministry, with power to expend the money of the country in a scheme of this kind. I think the Ministry have been greatly at fault in the course they have taken, because there was no urgency in this matter at all. I believe that, independent of some personal consideration, there was no urgency for action, and the moneys of this country ought not to have been expended in any way without first consulting this House. We ought to be consulted in every respect with regard to the expenditure of public money, and I believe that the Minister has failed to discharge the duties which he owes to this country, not only in this, but possibly in other respects, in that he has not consulted the House, when he knew perfectly that there was no urgency with regard to the expenditure of this money. I believe the First Minister has given us a clue to the whole matter, because when he referred in such pathetic tones to one of his supporters who has not now a place in the House, he told us casually that that gentleman was probably not so comfortably situated as he had been, as the result of his filial duty to his party, and the great zeal he had displayed for his country; and I believe the great anxiety of the present Government to lay out this great park—and I have no objection to reserving that land as a public park—and expend the public money thereon as rapidly as they have done, has not been in the interest of this country, but in the interest of some parties who formerly had seats in this House. I have no objection to the Government setting aside this land as a public park; I believe that in doing so, they are discharging a public duty, I believe this land ought to be set aside as a public park for the use of the country; but I believe, with the public debt hanging over us that exists, with our annual expenditure rapidly increasing, in view of the deficiencies that have occurred during the last couple of years, it is the duty of the representatives of the people to watch carefully any proposal to place in the hands of the Government powers such as they are asking, and when they have committed a public offence (and I believe they have committed a public offence in this case) by expending public money not absolutely necessary in the interest of the country without consulting Parliament, I trust this House will not be a party to an action of this character. I trust the Government will set aside this land for public use, as they have stated; but I hold they ought not to include in this park any coal lands, the development of which may be necessary in the interest of the country. If there are any coal lands the development of which is really in the public interest, then they should not be placed under the absolute control of any Minister of the Crown, but they should come within the ordinary law with respect to such lands.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. I hope that the House considers that it is only quite recently the curative properties of the Banff Springs really became known, hon. members will find sufficient justification for the Minister of the Interior, and for the Government, in the expenditure they have undertaken on that park without waiting for the sanction of Parliament. The justification, I think, is to be found in the fact that many sufferers have been relieved, that people have gone there cripples and severe sufferers and have returned restored to health. That, in my opinion, ought to be sufficient justification. But it is very evident that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and other gentlemen who have spoken of the expenditure, and found fault with the outlay made at Banff Park, have not taken the trouble to visit that country, and had those hon. gentlemen visited the North-West and seen what a magnificent country we have when you get beyond the prairies to the mountains, they would have returned and, as the hon. members for South Perth (Mr. Trow) and North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) have done, expressed themselves in every respect satisfied with what they saw there. It has been said that the expenditure should be made at the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Perhaps I, as an interested party, should not say much on that subject, but I may mention that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are now expending, and will have expended by the first of July or by August, at all events, at least $100,000 in building an hotel for the accommodation of those visiting the springs, not as a matter of profit, but with the view, when it has been made a success, of giving it over on the most reasonable terms possible to those who will manage it properly and make it a place of resort equal to any on the continent. Anyone who has gone to Banff, and from the plateau on which the hotel is to be built, has looked down on the fall immediately below, a fall of eighty feet or more with a large volume of water, who has looked on the reaches of the Bow River, and, on turning round beheld the mountains towering heavenward, and not felt himself elevated and proud that all this is part of the Dominion, cannot be a true Canadian. I should like very much that the hon. gentleman for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and all those who have some peculiar ideas of their own down there would go to the North-West, and we would then hear very little more of secession or any desire to secure other connection than that with the Dominion, and if they would go beyond Banff to the Pacific they would find that every inch of ground was a picture either of grandeur or of beauty, such as is not to be found elsewhere. I give this, not as my own opinion, because I have not crossed the continent over the other Pacific lines, but I could give the names of many Americans, who will not be supposed to be over-partial to Canada, who have been over the Canadian route and who have seen everything else that is grand on the whole continent, as well as in Europe and the eastern countries, Japan and elsewhere, and they say that for an equal extent of country they have seen nothing to compare with it. I do hope those hon. gentlemen who have not seen the North-West and the mountain district will go there without loss of time, and I am sure they will return to this House and rejoice that we have such a country and a Government that are desirous of making it what it ought to be. One word more with respect to the Banff Park. I see there is an alternative in the Bill, either to sell or to lease. I trust that the leasing system will be adopted, so that the Government will have full and thorough control of it, and thus be able to impose conditions which will prevent the introduction of much that is to be found in such places, and which it is not desirable should prevail.

Mr. MALLORY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are going to do with respect to the lands there. It will be pleasing to hear from so good an authority, whether the company will waive their claim or not. I think the hon. gentleman was not present when this point was mentioned.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. I was not present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; but the hon. gentleman might perhaps inform us.

Committee rose.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING THE FISHERIES.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to lay on the Table of the House Correspondence relative to the Fishery Question from 1885 to 1887, and I desire at the same time to say that, although at my request the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) withdrew his motion last night for a copy of the instructions given to the fishery officers for 1887, yet after having carefully considered those instructions, which are merely supplementary to those of last year, I decided to bring them down, and they will be found embodied in the report.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

BANFF NATIONAL PARK.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MITCHELL. In the debate which took place this afternoon some of my hon. friends on this side of the House appeared to me to mingle in this discussion two questions, which, in my opinion, should be kept entirely apart, that is the financial question and the sanitary question. Now, I have visited a great many of these remedial springs in various parts of the United States. Take, for instance, the hot springs of Arkansas, which are the most noted in the United States. These springs were claimed by three different claimants, each claiming to have a title to them, and for thirty-seven years they litigated about their rights, and for thirty-seven years they were claimed, at the point of the musket, by three different claimants, and the poor unfortunate creatures who went there to get relief were mulcted in heavy charges for the privilege of bathing in these springs. Now, I believe that the hon. gentlemen are entirely wrong when they tell me that a great sanitary establishment like that, one of nature's great remedies, should be left to private enterprise. I may say with regard to the springs at Arkansas that, during those thirty-seven years of litigation, it was discovered and decided by the courts that neither one nor the other of three claimants had a right to the springs, but that the right was vested in the Government; and when that right was recognised the matter was taken in hand and dealt with in such a manner as, I presume, the Minister of the Interior will deal with the Banff Springs. The Government took charge of the whole of them, and let them out to twenty or thirty persons who were prepared to go in and make investments, to build bath-houses, put up hotels, and provide the necessary accommodation. These people were bound to provide a certain size of pipe at a certain fixed rate, and the result is that if to-day they had twenty times the facilities connected with those springs that they now possess they could let them make an enormous sum of money. Within the last few years the United States, knowing the value of these springs, have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in building a hospital on a magnificent site overlooking the springs, which is looked upon as the great sanitary institution by the army and navy of the United States, where soldiers or sailors who have served their country, and have become invalided from one cause or another, can find relief from disease and a comfortable home; and in that way it has been a great benefit to the country. That hospital is maintained at a large expense, and it is universally approved of by the statesmen and people of that great country. What I should like to see would be to have these springs recognised in future as a great sanitary establishment, not only for the disabled, sick or wounded among our soldiers or sailors, but by the whole of the people of this country, who have spent a large amount of money for the construction of a railway through that western country, and for whom every comfort and accommodation of this kind should be provided. These springs should not be under the control of private individuals, who could tax visitors to any extent they liked. In the case of the Arkansas Springs, when the Government laid out these pipes to supply the bath-houses, they made it a condition with the people there that no greater charge should be made than twenty cents a bath to anybody and everybody, and the poorest individual that visits them can get the baths at that rate. What is the state of things in Banff? When I was there I saw a couple of men sitting there with muskets, ready to defend them against the claims of a gentleman who was formerly a member of this House. I say that if these springs had got into the hands of private individuals—and they were very nearly getting into private hands—there would have been a grand monopoly there; they would have been a perfect failure, owing to the want of capital on the part of the men who would control them, and that would result in extraordinary charges and the lack of proper facilities and accommodation for visitors.

Mr. CASEY. There is nothing in the Bill to regulate the charges.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend says there is nothing in the Bill to regulate the charges, but the Government of the day is responsible to the people of this country, and I know there is intelligence enough in the Department of the Interior to make such regulations as will commend themselves to the public and lead them to believe that they are reasonable and just. What I would desire to see result from this legislation is not only the establishment of these facilities for the general public, but that in the early future an immense hospital may be established there, on our own soil and reached by our own railway, where the diseased, the sick and the suffering from whatever cause might resort for relief. I am not a scientist myself and cannot tell what the properties of the water are, but I may say that I spent one hour in the springs with my friend Mr. Trow, and spent it so comfortably that I would like to have spent a whole day there. But this I can say, that the springs of Arkansas cannot begin to compare with those of Banff in their strength and power for the relief of the diseased and suffering. My hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) spoke about the impropriety of the Government spending any money for parks. Well, that is one of the very things that I approve of in this transaction. The land in that part of the country is valueless for agricultural purposes, but it is immensely valuable in its attractions, its scenery, and the health-giving properties of its atmosphere. I believe the Government have done a wise and a just thing in securing an immense tract of this country, so as to make that park attractive, not only for the people of to-day, but so that those who come after us will find that they are not hampered by limited accommodations, or cumbered by individual or personal rights in spots of the surrounding territory. I believe that future generations will commend the men who have taken on themselves the responsibility of taking the matter up in time and assuming this extent of territory before it was interfered with by personal or individual interests, and who will endeavor to make it as attractive a resort as possible. It is said that private individuals have rights there and are building hotels, but I think it is to the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that they are willing to spend many thousands of dollars in building a hotel there, and who will find fault with them for doing it? Do they interfere with the rights of the park? I presume that any rights they have will be given to them under proper restrictions; and I say it is a relief to the Government to know that men of that calibre have the enterprise—and I am proud to say they have the capital—to assist in making it a credit not only to Canada, but to the continent of America. I would, therefore, ask our friends on this side to discover from the consideration of this Bill the purely financial question, with regard to the issue of the Governor's warrants, as that is a matter which can be discussed at a subsequent period of the Session, and I ask them to look upon the question in the meantime upon its merits. Let us deal with this question as a sanitary one, and one which is likely to give reputation and character to the public men of Canada, in dealing with the interests of the poorer classes of the community. I think it would not be well to place restrictions upon the Minister of the Interior in providing regulations for the management of the park, because it would be impossible for us to define what those regulations should be, and it would be both impolitic and injudicious to come to Parliament and ask authority for every change that might require to be made in the regulations with regard to the disposal of those water rates. I would, therefore, ask my hon. friend to withdraw the fiscal objection to this Bill, to deal with it purely from a sanitary point of view, and allow the Minister of the Interior to see how he can spread himself in making the Banff park a success and a credit to the country.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman has spoken eloquently in favor of the proposition to establish a national park. I have not understood, from any remarks that have fallen from any hon. gentleman on this side of the House, that the policy of reserving this tract of land has been called in question. I think I have heard almost every gentleman who has spoken rather approving of that policy. Nor have they confined their objection to what the hon. member for Northumberland has called the fiscal question. There has been a question more important than that raised—a question which I supposed the hon. gentleman, from his long experience in parliamentary life, would have been one of the first to express a very emphatic opinion upon. It has been charged by the hon. member for South Huron, who supported the hon. member for Bothwell, that the Government have, in defiance of constitutional usage, and in direct opposition to a positive Act of Parliament, appropriated a very large sum of money for building up this park. Now, Sir, it may or may not be judicious for us, after we have the proper information, before us, to vote this sum of money. What is contended for is this—and it is a proposition that has my most cordial support—that it is dangerous in the extreme to allow the Government to expend large sums of public money without having first received the sanction of Parliament. Parliament in its wisdom has already laid down the lines within which Government may expend the public money without parliamentary sanction; and the question the House ought to consider is simply this; whether this expenditure is within the lines laid down in the Statute. I heard my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) deliver a very flowery speech this afternoon about the medicinal character of the water, the salubrity of the air, the beauty of the scenery, and all that sort of thing. Well, as to the medicinal character of the water, I have failed to hear from the Minister that he has had any analysis made of it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That has been said two or three times. If the hon. gentleman looks at my report he will find that Mr. Sugden Evans analysed the water.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, I have not read the report; but the medicinal character of the water, the salubrity of the air, and the beauty of the scenery have not been improved by the expenditure of $46,000 of public money. They remain the same, and hon. gentlemen may talk as they please, but this broad fact will remain, the expenditure of this large sum is not in the interest of the public at large, and cannot be for the benefit of the poor. It is entirely for the benefit of the wealthy. My hon. friend from Northumberland can afford to spend hundreds of dollars for the benefit of his health in going hundreds of miles from the centres of population to visit this place; but how can a poor man go, whether he lives in Ontario, Quebec, or the Maritime Provinces? I do not wish to make this a sectional matter by any means; but this illegal and unconstitutional expenditure is an act which this new Parliament should at the very earliest moment place itself on record against. I think it would be a lamentable thing if we should sit here silent and endorse that action. What is the use of having an Act of Parliament at all? We know that there is nothing the English House of Commons guards more jealously than its control over the expenditure of public money by the Government; and the same jealousy should exist, and has existed here, and Parliament has embodied that jealousy in a statute. Can hon. gentlemen contend that they have acted within either the letter or the spirit of that Act? No one has so contended or can so contend. The money has been illegally and unconstitutionally spent, and with the knowledge of the fact that a new Parliament was about to meet. The hon. gentleman, if he intended to expend that money, should have come before this Parliament, laid his plan before us, showed what the total expenditure was going to be; and then, if after examining our financial condition we thought it was justifiable, we could have given him authority to expend it. My hon. friend from Northumberland talks about the United States. Why, Sir, is there any parallel to be drawn between the United States and this Dominion with reference to the expenditure of public money? No one knows better than he does that the United States Government have such a large surplus that they do not know how to expend it, and it is quite right and proper that that Government should expend money in the improvement of the Arkansas Springs to which he has referred. I have no doubt that they did it legally and constitutionally, nor have I any doubt that they are able to afford it. But there are two questions that we ought to decide. In the first place, has this money been expended unconstitutionally? If it has, I say the House ought to censure that expenditure. In the next place, before we vote a dollar of it, we ought to be satisfied, from information from the Department, what the total expenditure is going to be, and whether the financial condition of this Dominion is such as to justify it. I would like the hon. gentleman, who has spent $46,000 unnecessarily and illegally on this park, to stand on any public hustings of Canada, and defend his action before the people who are feeling the taxation of the country so severely. It is all very well to talk about the medicinal qualities of the water and the beauty of the scenery. There are many things we would like to have in this country if we could afford them; but, in homely language, we have to cut our coat according to our cloth, and I doubt whether the people either in this end of the Dominion or the maritime end will sanction what seems to me an unnecessary expenditure of public money. We are at the present time passing through almost a financial crisis. We have an abnormal deficit, the largest we have ever had, and from what I can gather we are on the eve of the announcement of another deficit not quite so large; and is this the time the hon. gentleman should choose to engage in an expenditure, the limits of which he cannot state to this House? We are now on the down track, giving the hon. gentleman carte blanche, and if the hon. gentleman's conduct receives the approval of this House, if we sit in silence and ratify his unconstitutional act, what can we expect in the future? In the part of the country I come from it is almost impossible to wring out a cent from the Government for necessary public works, without which the people cannot carry on their business. Oh, but, we are told, you are to have a Banff national park 3,000 miles away. That is not a satisfactory answer to the tax-payer; and although you may carry away hon. members in this House, when you come down to the level of common sense, your act is unconstitutional, the expenditure is uncalled for, and it would be politically criminal on the part of this House to allow this thing to go on. I reserve any expression of opinion as to whether it would be desirable in the future to expend money on this national park. It may or may not be so; but I say at the present time, in our present financial condition, we are not justified in expending a large sum of money for any such purpose. I oppose it on these grounds, and I condemn in the strongest language the unconstitutional conduct and violation of statute law which have been exhibited in this expenditure of $46,000 without the approval of Parliament.

Mr. BURDETT. As a new member, before being called upon to justify the unauthorised expenditure of public money, I think we ought to have reasonable explanation of what disposition is to be made of the money, and how much is likely to be required. While I am ready to support any Government in any reasonable expenditure which may be necessary for opening up the country either east or west, and making railway or other improvements to induce people to come into the country, I am not prepared to vote carte blanche to any Government, either Liberal or Tory, without knowing what the approximate cost of the undertaking will be. If this is to be a new pool of Siloam, let us keep it. We may have those springs and the medicinal benefit therefrom without this national park attached. There are two distinct propositions involved in this measure. I do not see that it is requisite for a man, after visiting the springs to travel over territory, admittedly 260 square miles in area in order to ascertain whether he is fully restored to health or not. We may have the springs in their entirety without the national park. Neither am I disposed to oppose setting apart a portion of our domain for a national park. I think that ought to have been done in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario long ago. I think that a portion of the waste lands and timber limits in each Province ought to have been set aside for the purpose of assisting agriculture, protecting our streams, avoiding freshets supplying springs, and for many other reasons and objects fully discussed, advocated and admitted in the State of New York, in reference to the Adirondack Mountains. But before I feel disposed to vote for the expenditure of money in this direction, I would like to ascertain whether the Government owns this land which they are disposed to set apart for a park. Who has the fee of the soil? If the Government own this land I might be disposed to stretch a point and give them the power to turn it into a national park, but what is the fact? Why we have here hon. gentlemen advocating on behalf of some men—on behalf of what might be called shot-gun proprietors—their rights, and others say they have rights, and the Canadian Pacific Railway contend they also have rights to the soil. Has any disposition been made of all these claims? Have the Government decided on any fixed way of settling these rights? Have the Government or their officers been able, by any means, to secure these rights by paying a fair price for the lands disputed? Have the Government any assurance that there are no settlers on the land, or that if there are settlers, they will sell their rights at reasonable prices? Or will we have to face the probability that, after the Government has made the place valuable, these people will insist upon being paid fancy prices for the land. What I understand by a national park is a territory set apart exclusively for the public, a territory free from settlers, free from corporations, free from monopolists of all characters and kinds. I understand the burning question in the Senate of the United States with reference to the Yellowstone Park was as to whether a charter should be given to a railway to run through the park. People are prevented from taking timber from the Yellowstone Park, they are prevented exploring it for minerals; it has been made absolutely a game preserve, so that all the animals that frequent that part of the country may be free from the hunter at all seasons of the year. I can understand and appreciate that. Does the Government, however, propose to turn our park into a coal-mining corporation, or a lumbering corporation, or a hotel-keeping corporation? Is the latter to be run on the Scott Act principle? Or what sort of a hotel is it to be? We would like to know, and I fancy the Government would be very much divided on that question as they are on many others. I desire to have some information on these points. The moment you allow proprietorship over any portion of the land, by lengthened leases or otherwise, you remove the element of a national park from the district. Allow coal miners and hunters and lumberers to frequent and work it, and it ceases to be a national park; and they would certainly destroy the game, and the fish, and the scenery, and all the beauties we have heard so much of. I cannot understand why there is not territory enough there to enable the Government to select a portion of the country over which there is no proprietorship except that of the Government itself. We are told a great deal of the medicinal qualities of the springs, and I hope these have not been exaggerated, but I find there has been no such haste in establishing parks in Ontario and Quebec, where I have always understood we had the finest scenery in the world. We have for instance Niagara Falls, than which nothing can be more picturesque and grand, but I never heard of any effort being made to establish a park there until the Ontario Government became alive to its necessity, and at great public expense are trying to establish a park in that justly celebrated region. I would like to know authoritatively whether this is intended to be a sanatorium to cure the afflicted of mankind. We are told that it is intended to heal cripples, but I hope by cripples are not meant the political cripples, whose pockets have been depleted by serving the interests of their party. I hope they are not the style of cripples who are to be restored to health after having been washed in these waters of the fountain of life, as it has been called. Not more than one in a thousand of people can visit this place, and when we are asked to vote supplies for this purpose, we ought to have some reasonable ground to justify our action. So far, I have heard none. It also appears to me that the Government ought to be able to approximate very nearly the actual expenditure required for this work. It does not seem to me there is anything novel in constructing a road, building a bridge or railway, or in erecting an hotel—there is nothing so novel or unknown in these structures as to prevent the Government calculating to a certainty what the cost will be, before asking us to vote the money. If they will make it clear the expenditure is within our limited means, and that these springs have the valuable character assigned to them, let the Government make and keep this as a national park exclusively, and not a park which may partly become a mining or a lumbering district. I do not believe in placing the power of leasing the park in the hands of any Government. No Government is so pure and disinterested as to ask for a particular power, without having a great desire to use it. Powers are not asked simply for pastime or pleasure, but they are asked in order that they may be used, and no doubt if unlimited power is given over this domain to any Minister, it will be used for the purposes of that Minister or of his party, to some extent. I do not blame any political party in using honestly the privileges and rights pertaining to their position, for the benefit of their friends, provided they keep first the public service in view. But I want to guard against the unauthorised expenditure of public money, or the expenditure of public money on a park or for any other purpose, before we have an approximate idea of what the cost will be, and before we know that the land will be kept exclusively for the purpose intended and for no other purpose or reason whatever. If these were the only coal fields or timber limits to be found in the North-West, there might be some excuse for the Government reserving the right to sell or use them, but there are ample mines and timber limits elsewhere which the Government can dispose of. I am prepared to give some assistance to the Government to build the park, but I must first know whether we are going to get the worth of our money. We have lived and prospered and enjoyed a fair portion of health without the Banff Springs. The name is almost enough to destroy any springs, and I would suggest that we should give them some respectable name at any rate. These are the reasons for my objections to this expenditure at this time.

Mr. CASEY. I simply wish to read a paragraph containing the hon. Minister's promise to give us certain information he has refused to-night. During the debate on the first stage of the Bill I find the following reported in Hansard:—

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the Minister of Interior to say that, before he proceeds to discuss this in committee, he will supply an estimate of the cost, and also bring down to us a list of the persons having leases, a memorandum showing the extent of property under lease and the nature of the leases passed?"

"Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Certainly."

That was a definite promise to bring down an estimate of the cost and to state the nature of all the leases. Now, the hon. Minister has stated the nature of some of the leases; he has told us in regard to the timber leases and the mining permits, but he has told us nothing of the nature of the leases given to Dr. Orton and Dr. Brett, and any other parts of the Government who may have obtained locations there; and he has absolutely refused, in the face of repeated challenges, to give us an estimate of the cost, which, on 29th April, he definitely promised to give us before taking this step with the Bill. I now challenge the hon. gentleman again, and ask if he will give us this information, or if he will maintain his attitude of mock dignity and refuse to be questioned on this very peculiar transaction.

Mr. TROW. The argument of my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Burdett) seemed to me to be not logical. He states that we have lived alongside the falls of Niagara for fifty years without undertaking to form a public park. Had the Province of Ontario or the Dominion Government purchased that land fifty years ago from the original proprietors, we might have had that as a park much cheaper than we can get it under present circumstances. I understand that on the Canadian side the owners are now asking not less than $10,000 an acre for their lands, and on the American side the State of New York is probably paying at least double that in some instances for the lands which they have procured for that public park. The Government here have taken the initiative while the lands are possessed by the Crown and they can utilise them as they think proper. We do not say that there is any job intended. The present expenditure seems to me not to be too lavish. When I was there a year or so ago, there was nothing to be had but a little pork and beans which you could purchase for dinner for a dollar. I have heard that the healing properties of these waters are unsurpassed and that they have done immense good, and scores of people are going and will go there, and those waters will increase in sanitary value when the necessary accommodations are constructed. I consider this is very desirable. We could not expect to attract our own people when there was no accommodation, and anyone who is afflicted certainly requires some accommodation; but there were no men of capital who would undertake to supply it in that remote region without having some railway communication, and some attempt to ascertain what the properties of the springs were, and without the locality being thoroughly surveyed and laid out. In the meantime, it is for the Government to say what steps they will take to improve it further. I do not say they are justified in expending $200,000 or $300,000 more, as my hon. friend has suggested, but I suppose their object is to open roads and make the place attractive. As I understand from the Minister of the Interior, a considerable portion of this amount is still unexpended, being intended for this bridge across the Bow River. It must be a very expensive structure, because the river is very wide at that point, and, if it is to be an iron structure, of course it will be very expensive to bring the material there, to a region so remote from the place of manufacture.

Mr. IVES. I think it does credit to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down that, while there is apparently an organised attempt on the part of his colleagues on that side to waste the day on this exceedingly trivial matter, and to make a little political capital out of it, he and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) have defended the action of the Government. I think we on this side of the House would be willing to leave the defence of the course of the Government to the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. It does him infinite credit that he has taken the line he has taken in this debate. When we see the United States, to which the hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of referring on all occasions, taking the course they have taken in regard to the establishment of a national park in Dakota, and the Province of Ontario taking the steps they have to create a provincial park of recreation at Niagara, I think the abstract question of whether it is desirable or not that a national reserve should be made near the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Rocky Mountains, is, beyond all question, settled by the people of this country in favor of such a reserve; and, if I am not mistaken, I have heard several hon. gentlemen opposite, on previous occasions when this matter has been under discussion, express their approval of a reserve being made in the west for a national park. I am quite sure that I have heard that principle approved of. Well, the reserve has been made in a sort of a way, and the initiatory steps have been taken to make this property attractive to tourists and the public generally, and a good deal has been said about it both by newspapers on this continent and by the press on the other continent, and it has attracted a good deal of public attention. As I understand the question as it is now presented, the Government is taking absolute steps to do what they have in a sort of a way done heretofore. The public have approved of this. The public have settled on the fact that a park is to be reserved there. It is approved of generally by every one, and the question is, has the expenditure so far been inordinate? I think we may safely take the testimony of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow), who says the amount of expenditure has not been more than it should have been. He seems to think that the expenditure has been a wise expenditure, and I should suppose that hon. gentlemen, after their experience in the past few months, would find that this sort of small talk does not go very far with the people. I cannot understand the object, five years from a general election, in wasting the whole afternoon, and for one hon. gentleman to stand on his feet at least a dozen times to address the House on this question, and to badger the Minister, when he must know from past experience that these little talks on little questions amount to an exceedingly small affair when they come to be laid before the people of the country. We have had in the past hundreds of afternoons wasted by hon. gentlemen opposite in the hope of making political capital, but when the day of reckoning came, when the time came to go to the people for a verdict, they had not time to refer to the matter at all, and they must appreciate the fact that it was all lost time. It is too early in the day, five years from a general election and in a hopeless minority in the House, to try to make capital out of this, and I should think it would be better to try to make capital out of something that would be remembered for one year at least and would be approved by the common sense of the people whenever we go to the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that any of us who have observed the course of the hon. gentleman, and listened to him in past Parliaments, will be surprised to find that he has not the slightest appreciation whatever of the value of an important constitutional principle which may be involved when there is to be a raid on the Treasury. He has spoken as we expected him to speak, and as we expect to have him speak. Whenever anything cannot logically be defended from the statutes, we know that the hon. gentleman will always be ready to defend it with his vote. In this instance the question is two-fold. The first question is, whether it is desirable to reserve property for a national park, as to which, on certain conditions, we are agreed. The second question is, whether the Government had the right, under the statute, to appropriate the money they did appropriate by Governor General's warrant, as to which we are entirely disagreed. And I may add, that the Minister of the Interior did certainly promise, as the Hansard shows, to bring down an estimate of the cost when we went into committee. I have not heard the hon. gentleman bring down any such estimate, nor have I heard him deny the accuracy of the report in the Hansard, which my hon. friend has just read. More than that, the hon. gentleman at that time informed the House that this property was not covered by the claims of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was a natural mistake, perhaps, but to-day the hon. gentleman has to come and tell us that of this property which is proposed to be reserved as a national park, a considerable quantity, how much he does not appear to know, belongs to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think the hon. member for Montreal (Sir Donald A. Smith) might have shed some light upon the subject, and to him I put the question before the House rose; but he is not in his place, so that he cannot give me this information. It would appear that this national park is to be a thing of shreds and patches, to borrow a favorite phrase of the First Minister. A part of it has gone from us in the shape of coal lands, as to which I must say that unless those coal lands are the only ones of equal value situated in the North-West, I have doubts as to the wisdom of their remaining in private hands in the centre of the park. Then we find that leases have been made, and I did not notice that the Minister of the Interior gave us any information in detail as to the leases of the sanitarium. He stated, he admitted, that some of these portions of land had been leased to Dr. Brett—I think the name was, but I did not hear him give any details of these leases. He gave details of the timber limit leases, and one or two other matters, but not of the mode in which these portions which belong to the sanitarium had been leased, which it is of some consequence for us to know. With these lands, in addition to the coal lands and the timber limits, which may be cancelled, the hon. gentleman admits that there is this unknown quantity in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, I must say that I think if we are to have a national park, I agree with the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) that we ought to have the whole of it, we ought to control the whole of it, we ought not to sell it, and I believe, as was suggested by several gentlemen on both sides of the House, it ought to be leased on short terms, as is done in the case of the Yellowstone Park, but we ought not to part with control, for any length of time, of property which it is proposed to reserve for the benefit of the people. Now, I think if the Minister will look at his own statement he will see that we are quite in our right in saying that he distinctly gave us to understand that he would give us an estimate, and that is all that he has been asked for in the first instance, at any rate from this side of the House.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I confess to some disappointment that a question of this kind should be made a subject of party controversy in this House. The establishment of a national park is surely one of those questions that we might discuss on both sides of the House without the slightest reference to party, certainly without imputation of corrupt motives which came, at least from one of the hon. gentlemen on that side. That accusation was so broadly put, so insultingly put, that I declined to answer any further questions of that hon. gentleman, although I recognise his right as a member of Parliament to ask any question he pleases. The question, however, that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has put in relation to the expenditure and the general statements made as to the expenditures to which the scheme might give rise, imply to some extent, at any rate, an estimate as to the future. The expenditures which have been made up to now, very largely, if not entirely, meet the necessities of the park until now, but in the meantime it is absolutely necessary—I am not dealing with the constitutional question which the hon. gentleman raised, and to which I will refer in a moment—but it was absolutely necessary, if we were going to make this park of use at all, that certain works should be prosecuted in connection with it, that certain roads should be built, and a bridge across the Bow River, that a thorough survey of the park should take place, and that works for the conduct of the water down to the different points should be undertaken. The cave spring, which everyone who has seen it recognises as a natural curiosity, as well as of wonderful curative properties, should be made in such a way that people could get into it without the necessity of going down the ladder, which my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and my hon. friends from South Perth (Mr. Trow) and North Perth (Mr. Hesson), I believe, have descended on one or two occasions. All these works were necessary to put the park in a position to use at all. But those works completed, leave the question of what further works may be undertaken one entirely of convenience. My own conviction is that it would be unwise and unnecessary to make any considerable expenditure during the next year beyond that which may be necessary for the completion of the works already commenced, and I think when hon. gentlemen see the estimates for the works next year, they will find that that principle has been carried out. I cannot give the hon. gentlemen the details, although I think I will be able to do so when we come to discuss the Supplementary Estimates—and these items will be in the Supplementary Estimates—but I cannot at this moment give him the exact details which have gone to make up every item of this expenditure. Some $10,000 expenditure has been made in connection with a topographical survey of the whole park, and for the early road building that was undertaken. The further money was obtained in order that the work might go on early in the spring, and be ready for this summer, when tourists will go to that part of the country. That was the motive for that expenditure being made, for the Governor General's warrant being obtained for that $31,000; and, I think, as I said before, it will be found that that expenditure will nearly complete those necessary works, which, if we are to have a park at all, if we are to utilise those springs, were necessary to be undertaken in the meantime. But beyond this the question of expenditure is purely one of convenience, that Parliament may decide upon from time to time, as it thinks proper. Then the hon. gentleman says it is discovered that the Canadian Pacific Railway line, the line agreed upon as the western boundary of the territory from which their grant will be taken, extends up into this reservation. It does not extend to the hot springs; the hot springs are in no way touched by the reserve. The Devil's Head Lake, for instance, is within that portion of the territory which is east of the boundary from which the grant of the Canadian Pacific Railway is to be given. But, if the Canadian Pacific Railway were to assert their right to this property—because after all, it is a question of agreement between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway as to the appropriation of these lands—they cannot select and reject at will—if they were to do that we would simply find, as to that part of the park that it reduced our park to that extent, but did not in the slightest degree affect the question of expenditure, because, beyond a small portion of road extending some three miles eastward of the boundary to the Devil's Head Lake, there has been no expenditure in connection with the national park proper, on what may be regarded as an area that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company might possibly ask for, although I do not believe they will.

Then the hon. gentleman from South Oxford referred to the coal land, and takes the ground—which I think, perhaps has a good deal in it—that unless these coal lands are the only anthracite coal areas in that district, we ought to make some arrangement for buying them out. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that these people have paid $14,000 for 1,100 acres of coal lands. They got this land when this was all coal area, and before there was any question of it being a national park at all, before the making it into a national park was in contemplation. But I cannot quite understand how the hon. gentleman can reconcile himself with his friends, who oppose any expenditure whatever in connection with the national park, when he suggests that we should actually enter into negotiations with these people who have bought these lands at large prices, and who, evidently, considered them valuable. They have made some expenditure, I do not know to what extent, but they have taken some coal out of the mines—he thinks we should enter into negotiations to buy these coal areas back. We may have the power under this Bill to regulate the manner by which the mining shall be carried on—the surroundings and everything of that kind—but to undertake to purchase it back again would be a very serious matter indeed. In relation to the timber question I may say, as I said this afternoon, that if we can arrange to exchange these limits for others, or in some other way release the park altogether from the presence of those leases, that course may hereafter be considered necessary. The hon. gentleman says I have made no statement as to the terms of the leases to persons who have erected hotels. Dr. Brett in company with some of his friends has erected an hotel at a cost, I am told, of between $30,000 and $40,000. A suggestion is made that some ex-member of Parliament was interested in that expenditure. All I can say is this: I do not think it can be held to be a ground of complaint against Dr. Orton that he has joined with another gentleman to spend $30,000 or $40,000 for the erection of an hotel in that park, if it shall turn out, as I can assure hon. gentlemen it will turn out, that he will get no concession or advantage not given to any one else erecting an hotel, for the privilege will be given to whoever is willing to erect an hotel there, having regard to the general areas set apart for that particular purpose. These terms were not agreed upon for this reason: I thought it very much better to wait for a while and study a little more what rental we should exact; but there is a condition in the permission given to Dr. Brett for his building, that he shall pay whatever rental may be hereafter determined, and that rental shall be paid from the commencement—that is for the land on which the hotel is situated and two or three acres round about used for pleasure grounds. The same course will be pursued in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's hotel; they will have to pay the same rental. In order to have no difficulty as to the possession of the springs themselves and the water flowing from them, if hon. gentlemen will look at the report of the Department of the Interior they will find that as far back as the 30th June of last year an Order in Council was passed as the result of the report made by Mr. Hall, Secretary of the Department, in respect of the management of the Arkansas Springs, in which we laid down the terms on which persons could get the use of the water of the Banff Springs. Those terms are the terms in existence to-day, and whatever person may go there and erect an hotel will be compelled to pay for the water on those terms. The question behind that, respecting the power the Government proposes to obtain under this Bill, to decide as to what shall be charged to the public per bath and matters of that kind, are subjects of consideration at this moment. Then as to the town site on the other side of Bow River, which has been laid out, and the cost of survey of which is part of the expenditure made. We have offers in two ways, either to sell or lease the town lots. The plans have only been got out within the last day or two, but my own feeling is strongly in favor of leasing in order to retain absolute control of the character of the buildings erected and the general conduct of affairs near the park, the object being if possible to make the park a model as to the general character of its surroundings, and that can only be secured by leasing rather than by selling lots to parties who, under those circumstances, might put up such buildings as they thought proper. I venture to think—of course I may be wrong—that within a year or two hon. gentlemen will find that instead of this national park being a burthen to the country, we will be deriving revenue from those leases and from the springs that will quite compensate us, and will certainly pay liberal interest on all expenditures we have made in connection with it. It is not altogether a one-sided matter. My anticipation is, that we shall not only have a park with these advantageous surroundings but that the result of dealing with the property as is proposed will be to furnish a revenue quite sufficient to defray the expense of supervision and management, and also pay a liberal interest on all the expenditure we have made in connection with it. As to the expenditure for the future, the suggestion is made that the park will cost $200,000 or $300,000; but there is no intention to make such an expenditure, and in the meantime we are simply making a small expenditure for the purpose of carrying out those improvements which were necessary to bring the park into a condition to be of use and advantage. That is not the only park that we have ventured by Order in Council to reserve. We have reserved others, but have made no expenditure on them, for the simple reason that they required no expenditure to bring them into use, in the meantime at all events. We had no less than four forest reservations through the mountains, and my impression is that they will prove advantageous not simply as large groves of fine forest trees in parks of which we ought to be proud, but they will be of advantage to the country in regard to its salubrity, and so far as the grazing areas are concerned these groves will retain the moisture and prove of great utility. One word as to the constitutional question raised. I accept to the fullest extent the general view laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite that it is undesirable for the Government to expend money without the consent of Parliament. Parliament ought to have, and in fact has control over every expenditure. But there is just this point in connection with the matter: I looked upon it—I may have been wrong, and it is evident I was wrong—but I held conversations with some hon. gentlemen opposite, with public men and others outside of the House on both sides of politics, and I never heard a suggestion from any one until it was made in the House to-day, that it was not an exceedingly wise act to reserve this national park and to utilise at the earliest possible moment the results which must flow from its reservation and improvement. We are living in a time when even a period of twelve months is a matter of consequence. The Canadian Pacific Railway had just been completed. Last year when Parliament was in session I confess that so far as I was concerned I knew comparatively little about the park, although I had been at Banff. Our object was to obtain the report of the gentleman placed in charge of the works there. He was selected because he was considered eminently qualified for work of that kind. He is a civil engineer and a clever landscape architect, and he has proved by the work done to be quite equal to the promises I had of him when appointed to the position. The expenditure I admit has grown, for the idea at first was that probably $5,000 or $6,000 might have been sufficient. But this Parliament the Session came on late. If Parliament had been called in January we would have been able to obtain the vote of Parliament for the $31,000, the amount of the latest warrant used in connection with the bridge and other works of that kind, and have secured their completion in time for the tourist travel of this year. I thought it was a matter of great consequence that almost contemporaneously with the opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway we should have this great attraction in a condition that would cause the road itself and the country itself to be talked about abroad. For that reason, therefore, the Government took the responsibility, not believing for a moment that there would be any suggestion of party motives in the matter—because there is really no room for anything of that kind—they took the responsibility of expending this money, trusting to the vote of Parliament, when Parliament met, to endorse it. I do not think it is necessary that I should say any more, but I thought it desirable to make this general reply to some of the remarks that were made on the other side.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has chosen to complain that I made imputations against him which he characterised as insulting, and he says that, for that reason, he refuses to answer any further questions from me. Well, Sir, I have seen a great deal of this conduct on the part of Ministers at different times—this putting on of an air of dignity and refusing to answer questions, because of imputations of jobbery or something of that sort, or because suspicions of that character were expressed. But the Ministers who have taken that course have always been very young Ministers, who have not been more than a year or two in office, who are very fresh, and who are oppressed with a great sense of their own dignity, and the result of their taking that course has invariably been to make themselves ridiculous, as the hon. gentleman has made himself on this occasion. The result of his general reply is that he would have saved a good deal of time, if he had made these remarks before, because it was in order to get some of the information contained in that general reply that we have been discussing this matter for hours, and the reply itself had to be couched in apologetic tones, instead of being a mere explanation, as it would have been earlier. I will only touch on one ground of his explanation just now. It was that he had been encouraged to expend this money unconstitutionally, as he admits, by the fact that gentlemen on this side had almost unanimously expressed their approbation of making this reservation. Let it be said finally, and be remembered once and for all, that the questions of the reservation and the present Bill have no connection at all. We are, I believe, unanimously in favor of making a reservation. The question is, whether money shall be spent on it, how much money shall be spent, and how it shall be managed. If the Minister has couched his Bill in such language that, without an explanation from him, it savors of a job, and even with his explanation has a little of that flavor about it, it is his fault and not ours; it is owing to the peculiar construction of this Bill that the opposition of which he speaks has been given to it. I was not prepared to make any opposition to it until I read the Bill when it was introduced the other day, and found that it was such a Bill that we could not decently allow it to pass without full discussion and explanation.

Mr. PLATT. The expenditure of public money when it is for the general advantage of the tax-payers of Canada, or the universal advantage of those who have to supply the money for the public chest, cannot well be objected to; but wherever an expenditure is asked for, the result of which is that it will be to the benefit of the few while the many have to pay the piper, I think then objection may well be taken. I think, Sir, that the establishment of public parks, where they are necessary to the public health or the public advantage, and where every citizen who adds his mite to the amount of money necessary for the completion of such parks reaps his share of the benefit, it may be well enough. But in the project which we are now discussing I take it for granted that of every thousand dollars expended on the Banff park, as it is called, nine hundred and ninety-nine of those dollars will be paid by tax-payers who will never see Banff park, or derive any benefit from it whatever. Upon those grounds I object altogether to the expenditure of public money for such a purpose. It is simply an extension of the principle, which has been a growing one in this country of ours, of taxing the poor tax-payers of Canada to pay for the luxuries of the rich. It may be all very well for the hon. member for South Perth, the hon. member for North Perth, and the hon. member for Northumberland to visit those springs and bathe in their medicinal waters, but it would also be well enough if those gentlemen would pay for those luxuries, and not tax them upon those who will probably never see the springs or hear of them, except through the newspapers. Now, whether or not this may be a political job, whether or not there may be this or the other political influence which may benefit financially from this expenditure of public money, I look upon it as a job against the tax-payers of the Dominion, a job which is calculated to benefit those who are rich and able to spend their own money to go to that distant region, and that this park will be maintained for the advantage of that class by those who are unable, and who probably always will be unable, to receive any advantage from it. For that reason I object entirely to the expenditure of public money for any such purpose, without the people of Canada having an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. It may be said that what the opinion of this Parliament is, should be the opinion of the country. But, as I understand it, the money has been expended on this park without the consent of Parliament. I am sure, Sir, that, no matter what may be the vote of Parliament upon this question, the money will be expended without the consent of the tax-payers of this country, and on their behalf I raise my voice against the expenditure of money from which they will receive no benefit or advantage.

On section 4.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think a limit of time ought to be fixed for these leases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is an objection to fixing a limit. As I understand, a portion of the park offers some beautiful sites for villas, and I believe the plan of the architect lays these out, to be leased to people of wealth, who will erect handsome buildings upon them. These buildings will have to be subject to the approval of the Government, to prevent any monstrosities being put there to destroy the general beauty of the park. We cannot say what length of time we can get people to take leases for in order to induce them to put up handsome buildings. Twenty-one years are suggested as sufficient, but people will not build handsome houses on 21-year leases. If there is to be a limit at all, there must be the right of renewal. I think the hon. gentleman and the House may trust any Government with the settlement of that question in the interest of the property.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest a further amendment, that is, that all the regulations made by the Governor in Council ought to be submitted to Parliament within a certain number of days after the opening of each Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no objection to that. We will make it fifteen days.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that in addition to ordinary habitations the Bill provides for buildings for the purposes of trade and industry. Such buildings will not come under the principles he has laid down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take it that there are portions of this large tract of land in which useful buildings can be erected without interfering with the beauty of the main portions of the park. It is of the most varied description, broken by glens, valleys and undulations of every kind, and there may be places where the property may be used for industrial purposes without interfering with the beauty of the park as a whole.

Mr. PLATT. The First Minister tells us that there are certain portions of this park which will be leased to wealthy people. I would like to ask if there are any little corners which will be leased to those who are not wealthy. Is it for the wealthy alone that this park is to be established? If so, let us go in and spend enough money to make it something worth while. I would like to ask the Minister whether there will be houses of entertainment. Shall we not have a theatre? Can we not have card tables, and everything else necessary to provide a jolly good time for the rich people of this country at the expense of the poor people. If that is to be the character of this park, let us know it, and give us passes on the railway so that we can go out there. It appears that this place is intended to be made a very nice health resort for the wealthy people of this country. I plead for those who ought to receive an equal benefit with those who have influence with the powers that be, and who may have something to do with Banff Park hereafter.

Committee rose and reported.

SENATORIAL REPRESENTATION FOR THE N.-W. T.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 17) respecting the representation of the North-West Territories in the Senate of Canada.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. KENNY. I rise for the purpose of saying a few words in reference to some remarks made on Friday by my hon. colleague, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and if my remarks are not pertinent to the Bill before the House, if they have no more relation to the two gentlemen in the North-West Territories than to the two gentlemen of Verona, I hope the remarks of my hon. colleague made the other night will be allowed to plead my excuse. I listened with mingled feelings of surprise and regret to the remarkable, I am almost tempted to say, violent speech made in this House on that occasion by my hon. colleague. I was surprised to hear him say that I owed my position in this House to the fact that 400 civil servants had been coerced and threatened into voting for me. I regret that the hon. gentleman, before he made so sweeping an assertion, did not take the trouble himself to personally investigate such a charge; for if he had done so, I am satisfied he never would have made a statement so entirely inaccurate and misleading. But as the statement was so positively and publicly made, I consider that it is due to my constituents, and due especially to my fellow-citizens of Halifax and myself, that my denial of that charge should be equally public and equally positive. As I listened to the somewhat excited address of my hon. colleague on that occasion, I fancied he was seeking for some excuse to give the hon. gentlemen who surround him on the other side, for the very unexpected collapse of their friends and allies, the secession party in the Province of Nova Scotia. I imagined that the hon. gentleman was trying to excuse to his friends the very inaccurate and very misleading statements which were sent from Halifax during the late campaign to the Grit party in Ontario, as to the sentiments of the people of Nova Scotia on Dominion issues. The most misleading statements were sent from that Province; statements which, when they were republished in the Liberal-Conservative papers of Nova Scotia, were subjects of laughter and ridicule. These statements, I am told, were repeated by hon. gentlemen opposite, innocently repeated by them, on several platforms throughout the Province of Ontario, and I believe that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake)—whom I do not see in his place—it is the first time I have ever felt it my duty to mention this hon. gentleman's name, and I pause for a moment to pay my tribute of respect, as a new member, to that hon. gentleman, and my recognition of the important and highly honorable position which he occupies in this House—I find that hon. gentleman was misled by these statements. I hold in my hand an extract from the Toronto Globe. I find that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), at a meeting held in the city of London just before the elections, made this statement:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT:

"My correspondent tells me Halifax is sure, and that we are sure of sixteen seats, at least, in Nova Scotia."

Now, I am quite certain that the hon. member for West Durham, when he made that statement, believed it to be true, but the person in Nova Scotia who, on the eve of the general elections, would believe that it was possible for the repeal party, the secession party, to secure sixteen constituencies in the Province must have been party blind, and the most reckless man among them, no matter what he might say or telegraph, I am certain, would not have bet five cents on such a statement. I wish to give the House another instance, and I will not delay it more than a moment, of the very ridiculous statement that emanated from Halifax about that time. I find in the Toronto Globe communication from its correspondent in Halifax, dated 9th February, the statement that—

"Nova Scotian Tories are grief-stricken and killed"—

Mind, Sir, this is 9th February—

"Turn where they will the same ghastly spectacle of inevitable defeat stares them in the face, and no corner offers refuge in which to hide their despair. Not a single county in the whole Province holds out the slightest hope of victory. There is hardly a single district in any constituency which they can boast of carrying."

If my hon. colleague felt it was incumbent on him to explain to the hon. gentlemen who surrounded him such statements as these, I do not wonder he was excited when he made the effort. The hon. gentleman said, in the course of his remarks, that he had great expectations his party would be successful in carrying the Province of Nova Scotia, and viewing it from his standpoint, viewing it from the standpoint of the secession party of Nova Scotia, of which he is so conspicuous an ornament, I do not wonder that he had very great expectations. The hon. gentleman made this mistake, however, a mistake which has been made out of Nova Scotia as well as in it. He did not recognise the great difference which the people make between Dominion and Local elections. He did not reckon that important factor in his political calculations. The hon. gentleman says that I owe my election to the fact that these 400 unfortunate civil servants were coerced into voting for me. I have never taken the trouble to count how many civil servants have votes in the constituency I represent, but I am quite certain that not half that number ever voted for me. In his reference to the civil servants, my hon. colleague made special reference to the number of the people who are employed in the railway department. In doing so he may have intended to allude to the fact that during the prosecution of my canvass, I visited the railway works and shops. I was asked to do so by the men who worked there, because it had been industriously circulated by the emissaries of my hon. colleague that I had accepted the nomination unwillingly, that I did not care whether they voted for me or not, and I was told this impression could be removed only by a personal visit. But another reason was given for my visiting these workshops. I was told by the men who had worked there for some years, that in days gone by, in those halcyon days when better terms were not considered, when there was no occasion to raise a repeal cry, when my hon. colleague was the Minister of Militia of this country, he had visited the railway workshops, and that the men had a perfect right to expect from so humble an individual as myself the same amount of attention that had been paid to them by a Crown Minister. Now, as to coercion being exercised over the railway men, I never heard of it, I had no knowledge of it, and I do not believe it existed. As regards these civil servants to whom my hon. colleague referred, they were the most disturbing element we had in our election. The emissaries of my hon. colleague paid these civil servants very special attention. They cajoled them into believing that the Government would be upset, and then they threatened them with the loss of their positions if they did not vote for them. While one set of emissaries were threatening these men with the loss of their positions, another set were going round the Province promising every Dominion office, from the highest to the lowest, to some ardent supporter of repeal. They promised them all a dozen times over. It is well established in Halifax that a large number of these civil servants did not vote at all. I suppose no one can know how anyone votes under the ballot system, but it is currently believed that a very large number of civil servants voted for my hon. colleague; and I should find no fault with them for that, if they thought they were conscientiously serving their country by so doing, because I hold, and I have ever held, that a civil servant has a perfect right to vote in the manner he thinks will best serve the country, provided he does so in a proper and becoming manner; but I have a very different opinion of the men who canvassed and worked against the Government they served, and did so in a most offensive manner. I think those men take their political lives in their hands, and must be prepared to abide the consequences. As to the coercion of the railway men, I did hear of an instance of it. I heard in the country parts of the county of a case where some of the laborers, some of the trackmen employed along the Intercolonial Railway, had come to my friends to say they were very anxious to vote for Stairs and Kenny, but they were afraid to do so because they were told by the emissaries of my colleague that the Government was going to be upset and they would lose their positions if they voted for Stairs and Kenny. I heard of that instance of coercion. For such an instance as that I do not for a moment hold my hon. colleague responsible. No matter what the legal aspect of the case may be, it would be unfair for me to attempt to say that I hold that hon. gentleman responsible for that. In a constituency so large as ours, with some 11,000 electors—and over 8,000 votes were polled—I do not for a moment pretend to hold the hon. gentleman responsible for such a case as that. I merely state its existence, because I have the most undoubted and positive proof of it. It would be abject folly to attempt to coerce a class of men so sturdy, so intelligent, and so honest as the men employed about the railway departments of Halifax. They are a highly respectable and intelligent set of men, and it is a downright insult to their intelligence to tell them, under our ballot system, that they can be coerced into voting for one man or the other. They vote as they please. As regard these 400 civil servants who were coerced in voting for me, there is no man in the county of Halifax who knows better than my hon. colleague that, if 400 civil servants had been coerced into voting for the Government candidates, he would not have been here to-day. So much for the reference which my hon. colleague was pleased to make to the civil servants and the question of their coercion. But he was also pleased to refer to the fact that certain members of the Government who were in Nova Scotia prosecuting their canvass had made reference to certain subsidies to some railways. My hon. colleague did not particularise any roads. I do not know, of course, to what roads he alludes, or to how many roads, but I had the pleasure of attending one or two very important meetings which were held in the city of Halifax during that election campaign, which meetings were addressed by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and on those occasions the only roads which I remember any reference being made to were the Short Line road from Oxford to New Glasgow, the Cape Breton Railway, and that road in western Nova Scotia county commonly called the Gap, which connects Pictou with Annapolis. Those are the only three roads I remember any reference being made to in that election campaign. I do not speak positively; I am speaking from memory; I may be mistaken. As regards these three roads, I believe that this Parliament had provided for their completion. I believe and I know that the people of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton have been clamoring for the completion of those roads for years. If I am not mistaken, my hon. colleague's friends, the Local Government of Nova Scotia, had by legislation expressed their desire that these roads should be completed. I am quite sure that, if these Cabinet Ministers came down to Nova Scotia and had not made arrangements for the completion of those roads, my hon. colleague would have been the very first man in Nova Scotia to assail them for their neglect of the most vital interests of the Province. In Nova Scotia, we take the liveliest interest in the development of our railway system, and instead of censuring the Government for aiding that development, I believe that the vast majority of the people of that Province feel deeply grateful to the Government of the day for having made arrangements for the completion of those important roads in which we in Nova Scotia are so deeply interested. I repeat my expression of opinion that in reference to the civil servants and in reference to the effects that these railway subsidies may have had in influencing the electors of Nova Scotia, these stories are all after-thoughts, for I find that after all these civil servants had been carefully counted and carefully canvassed by my hon. colleague and his friends; after the effect of these railway subsidies had been carefully estimated and gauged, my hon. colleague had not the slightest misgivings as to the result of the elections in Nova Scotia. For I find in the Halifax Morning Chronicle, of the 14th February, there is a report of a speech delivered by my hon. colleague in the city of Halifax a few days previous. I think it was delivered in the north end of the city, in College Hall, and I think that it was one of the most important speeches made by him during the campaign, and, Sir, in reference to myself, the hon. gentleman was pleased to say:

"It would be a dire misfortune to this community, and a very disagreeable position for myself if I had, I will not say the pleasure—of Mr. Kenny's company to Ottawa. But, gentlemen, I do not apprehend any such calamity. Mr. Kenny knows very well he has no chance in Halifax."

Now, Sir, that was the expression of my colleague's opinion as to the fate of parties in the constituency of Halifax, after all the civil servants had been carefully canvassed, and after any effect that the agitation of the railway subsidies may have had upon the people of that constituency, had been carefully calculated. But, Sir, I find that my hon. colleague was equally positive as regards, not only the constituency of Halifax, but the whole Province of Nova Scotia, for he goes on to say:

"On this occasion, while a general election is going on all over the country, it is of the utmost importance that the metropolitan county of the Province should speak with no uncertain sound. (Cheers.) We are hearing from all over the Province, and the accounts we receive are of the most cheering character. We find that from all parts of the country where the standard of the party has been raised the people are flocking around it. (Cheers.) And we find that in the other Provinces the people are fighting a winning battle. I received a letter from Mr. Blake last week, in which he tells me that the prospects of the Liberal party in the west were never so bright—(cheers)—and we know that in the Province of Quebec, where our friends are in power, it is expected that the Macdonald Government will not be able to elect more than ten or twelve out of the sixty-five members for that Province. (Applause.) If such should be the case, and if, as we believe, we shall have a handsome majority in Ontario, and we have the Local Government of Ontario with us; if we have a handsome majority in Quebec, and we have the Local Government in Quebec also with us; and if we have a majority from New Brunswick, we have also a majority of the Local Government there; and if we have the Province of Nova Scotia returning, as I believe we shall, eighteen Liberal members to the Dominion, and the Local Government here with us, where is the man that would be bold enough to stand up and say that he should stay the course of Liberal sentiment throughout this country? (Prolonged cheers.)"

Now, Sir, I mention this to show that my hon. colleague, a very few days before the election—because hon. gentlemen will bear with me when I repeat the date on which that article appeared, the 14th of February, only a week before the elections—when my hon. colleague spoke thus, he had no misgivings as to the coercion of civil servants or the effects of railway subsidies, although he had ample time to estimate both. But, Sir, the sanguine expectations which my colleague had formed were not confined to himself. They were shared by every member of his party in the city of Halifax. Why, Sir, I was repeatedly told, good-naturedly told, by many of the friends of my hon. colleague, that the majority against me was to be from 700 to 1,000. The fact was, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen were calculating on the majority which they had in the month of June. In the month of June previously the Local elections took place. The Local Government, the repeal Government, with the assistance of my hon. colleague, organised the Province thoroughly, and they kept their organisation up for the impending Dominion elections. The whole power of the Local Government was used against the Liberal-Conservative party in the Dominion elections, as the fourteen representatives of that party on this side of the House were made to know and feel. The appeal in June of the repeal party had been eminently successful, and nowhere more so than in the county of Halifax. They had carried the county by a majority of between 1,000 and 1,200, and they expected a similar majority in the Dominion elections, and therefore it was that these gentlemen, not having estimated, as I said before, the fact that the people of Canada to-day, as has been shown not only in Nova Scotia, but in the other Provinces of the Dominion, will vote on one side in Local politics and the other side in Dominion politics. My hon. colleague and his friends had not justly estimated they had not, in fact, gauged accurately the public sentiment of their Province. But my hon. colleague was not the only one of his party who had formed these very sanguine expectations. They were shared, as I said before, by members of his party generally. On the very day of the elections in the city of Halifax, extensive preparations were made for a grand open air celebration. The large space on the eastern front of the provincial building was carefully strewn with ashes, a platform was improvised by the removal of a temporary porch—a platform from which my hon. colleague, in June, in the local elections, had addressed a monster gathering of his friends, and this was to be repeated from the same platform in February. Well, Sir, it was a lovely night. I am sure my hon. colleague remembers it well.

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. KENNY. The fates were most propitious. The atmospheric and climatic conditions were most favorable to an open air demonstration, all nature seemed joyous and happy, yet, Sir, no speaker came upon that platform, there was no monster gathering, the torches were not lighted, the band was never heard. In fact, gentlemen, all the magnificent preparations were wasted, save the ashes. They served appropriately to remind my hon. colleague and his friends, if indeed, under the circumstances, they required any reminder, that the days of abstinence and mortification had set in. That next day was veritably Ash Wednesday. I said that my colleague had not a monopoly of the brilliant expectations. I will say to him that during the twenty years we have happened to be arrayed in different political camps, he has not had a monopoly of the defeats. I have had my ups and downs as a political man during those twenty years, but I hope I was always able to take my licking, as an hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House said the other day, like a man and was able to bear defeat with a patient shrug. I must say this: I never found anything was gained by abusing my opponents after the election was over, or by beating the air to find vain excuses because my party had not got as many votes as the other side. I might add that I always felt that losing an election was no excuse for my losing my temper. My hon. colleague has not yet discovered the true inwardness of the vote of the people of Nova Scotia in February last, and I will tell him how I read it. The true meaning of that vote is, that on sober second thoughts the people had decided to reverse their vote recorded in June last in favor of repeal and to stand loyally by the Union, believing the Government of the day would carefully enquire into the financial condition of the Province and adjust any disability that it may labor under. The vote meant in the most tangible way, in which it could be expressed, the hearty approval of the people of Nova Scotia with the Government of the day and their policy. The vote was not only the expression of the opinion of the people of the confidence, and I may say of the attachment, of the people of Nova Scotia to the great Liberal-Conservative party of this Dominion; but it was more than that, it was the pledge of our people that, as in the past, so in the future, we would continue our support to that party so long as it remained true to its great and grand tradition of ever seeking the greatest good of the greatest number.

Mr. JONES. My hon. friend seems to have taken exception to some remarks which fell from me on a previous occasion, and he seems disposed to blame me for having brought up the discussion to which he made reference. If he will bear in mind the course of the debate during that afternoon he will remember that it was the leader of the Government who assailed hon. gentlemen on this side of the House for having intimidated the public servants of the country during the last election; and while the hon. gentleman was amusing his audience with some of his jokes, which we had heard before—for it was necessary, perhaps, to keep them in good humor, because the evening before he had given them a very disagreeable dose to swallow in the Queen's county election matter—we listened with the greatest forbearance to what the hon. gentleman said, and the attacks he made on hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. During the course of my reply I pointed out the position we occupied in Nova Scotia during the last election, and I stated then, as I repeat now, that my hon. friend and colleague—and I call him my friend—owes his seat in this House to night to the fact that he had about 400 or 500 of the Civil Service employés of the Government to vote en masse for him at that election.

Mr. KENNY. I deny it.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman has made a case out to-night with a great deal of plausibility, but he has not referred to some of the statements I made on that occasion. It will be borne in mind that on the occasion to which he has referred I brought a charge against the administration of the railway department of the Government of their having exercised undue influence over the men in their employ, of having sent men from Halifax to Moncton who were supposed to be in sympathy with our party, of having sent them an emphatic order with a railway pass, which I saw, directing those men to report at Moncton the next day. The same course was followed at Moncton, the men being directed to report at Halifax. The same thing was done at Truro directing them to report either at Moncton or Halifax; so that in point of fact every man in the railway service of the Dominion at Halifax or along the line of the Intercolonial supposed to have any sympathy whatever with the Liberal party was directed to move out of his own county for that day, which had the effect, as a matter of course, of causing him to lose his vote. I denounced that then, and I denounce it now, as an unwarrantable interference with the rights of people who had a right to the franchise under the Act given them by Parliament. I say that so long as people had the right to the franchise given them by the Government of the day, they had a right to exercise that vote according to the dictates of their conscience, either for or against the Government. And so far from endeavoring, either myself or by my friends, to intimidate or to influence those people during that election campaign, the reverse is the fact, and, with the permission of the House, I will read an extract from a speech which I delivered on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and if he has the whole speech he will find it is in the following words:—

"Now we have been told in this election that the expectation of Messrs. Daly and Stairs, or whoever may come out in the Tory interest, is that they are going to receive the votes of the railway employés and of the other Government employés in the departments at Halifax. I expressed my views strongly on that question the other night. I think these people should not be interfered with by either political party. They are the servants of the country, paid out of the revenues of the country. They are as much our servants as they are theirs, and they will probably be our servants, according to Mr. Daly's own views after the 22nd of next month. (Great applause.) But if we were in power to-day, I would say to those gentlemen: while you have a vote, if you honestly believe that the Tory party is the party for the Dominion, and for the city of Halifax, vote for them; but on the other hand if you believe honestly that the policy of the Liberal party is the policy in the true interests of the country, then exercise your rights as free men—exercise the right your franchise gives you, and vote for the party you think most in the interest of the country. I am told it has been said to these people that if they vote for the Tory candidate and do not say anything about it, it will never be known who they voted for, and when a change comes they will say they voted for the Grits and they will be kept on. You see they are calculating on the Tories going out and the Grits going in; of course they will know who they voted for, they had the right to vote for the man of their choice, and no one can or ought to know whom they vote for, because that is a privilege given them by the Ballot Act, which was intended for the protection of men in such circumstances. Therefore I say to these men, without knowing what their inclinations may be, to act as free men and vote for the men who, they think, will best serve the public interests of the country."

That was the declaration I made to the Civil Service of the country at the commencement of the campaign, and I did so because, from positive information I had received, I knew what threats had been made. I do not say that the hon. gentleman made them, but his friends did, and he admits himself that he interviewed these people. But I say, without charging him with making the threat, that I do make the charge of my own knowledge, that his friends went to those people and said: You must vote for us, or if not, you must accept the consequences if our Government is sustained. I knew many men, who under ordinary circumstances, would have supported us—men who were left in their places when we were in power, because we never molested them. When Mr. Brydges came into the management of the road there was not a man disturbed on the Intercolonial Railway during the time Mr. Mackenzie was in office; and when a manager was required for the North Street Station in Halifax, Mr. Brydges came to me and said: "I want a station master for North Street, do you know anyone here who will answer?" I said: "No doubt there are many people in Halifax who think they can run the Intercolonial Railway, but I do not know anyone; do you know of any suitable man yourself?" He said: "There is a gentleman at Rivière du Loup by the name of Macdonald, but he is a Conservative." I said: "I don't care what he is; if he is a good man, bring him down and put him in as station master." He did so, and he has been there ever since, without interference by our Government when we were in power. During the whole time our Government was in power there were not five men of our side of politics placed on the Intercolonial Railway in the city of Halifax. There were two men who went into the department as clerks, but the moment the change came their salaries were cut down, simply because we put them there. They left immediately, and one of them has been in my employ since, and he is one of the best men that ever was upon that road. I mention these facts to show that we had men on that road who, under ordinary circumstances, would sympathise naturally with us, considering the fair manner in which we treated them. We never molested them, and if they were entitled to promotion, Mr. Brydges promoted them, and I never interfered with them directly or indirectly. Those men are still on the road, and, therefore, I say it was natural to suppose that there were many of them remaining there from old times, who would have remembered with some sense of justice the fair treatment accorded to them by the Mackenzie Administration, and would under ordinary circumstances have voted for myself, or given a split vote, as the case might be. I asked no man; I never was near them from the beginning to the end, but I knew there were 400 or 500 votes in the various departments, and I knew that there was coercion brought to bear on these men in every branch. A short time before the election, when it was not known when the elections would come on, a number of men were working at the deep water terminus. They had their wages cut down, but the moment the writs came out for the election, the wages of every one of them were advanced up to the rate they had received before. In addition to the number of people engaged in the Civil Service, they sent a lot of men down to the old penitentiary to whitewash, repaint, and clean up that old building, which had been abandoned as a penitentiary ever since the penitentiary was removed to Dorchester ten or twelve years ago. They were put on simply that they might be employed on that occasion and their votes secured. The hon. gentleman talks about their interference. Why, during the last Local election in Nova Scotia what did we see? An order came down to the Custom house in Halifax, from the department at Ottawa, to a young man in the Custom house there, whose name I will give the Minister if he asks for it, whose summer holidays had just expired. He had just returned to his duty after having been fishing down along the coast, at a place where he generally spent his vacation, and it was supposed that he had some influence in that locality. The order came from the Customs Department at Ottawa to say: Give that young man a fortnight more holidays, and he was sent down by the Tory election committee in Halifax, and his pockets were filled with fishing bounty cheques, to be taken up and down the shore and distributed among the fishermen. He spent a fortnight there, when he should have been in the Custom house, and that was done by the order of the Government. Now, looking at these things, one almost wonders at the innocence of my hon. friend. Of course he knows nothing about these things. He has a very happy faculty of remembering some things and forgetting others, but I have no doubt, when I bring these facts to the remembrance of my hon. friend he will recall the circumstances very well. The hon. gentleman says we were sure of sixteen seats; that we made a great boast of it, and that we were very much disappointed at our gathering at the provincial building on the eve of the 22nd. All I can say is that the hon. gentleman is entirely inaccurate in his description of the great preparations which were made, and I suppose it arises from the fact that the hon. gentleman was not there. He was not invited, of course; but I can say that we did meet that evening as usual; that we did speak as usual, and we did anticipate that we had carried Halifax county triumphantly, until the later returns came in, which indicated that my hon. friend would probably be ahead of my colleague, Mr. Fuller. I am sorry to disturb the picture which he so eloquently drew, but he will, perhaps, remember that it was the eve of our penitential service, that the next day we entered on our forty days' abstinence, and I can only say that our abstinence was not affected in any way by the result of the election, or by what passed previously or subsequently to that day. The hon. gentleman says that I was disappointed in the result of the election in Halifax. I tell him frankly that I was, although I was not as much surprised as some people were, probably because when I went around the county I ascertained one fact. I did not spend two days in the city. I found we had a corrupt revising barrister—I will not say a corrupt revising barrister, to the extent that those words might mean, because those who know Mr. Eaton, and I do not know him personally very much, do not blame him so much as they blame the men who surrounded him, and especially the man who was appointed as his clerk. That man was the permanent secretary of the Tory party in Halifax. I am not accusing Mr. Eaton of all the irregularities, although as a matter of course he was responsible on account of his position. Most people are rather disposed to blame the clerks and the people he had about him. What was the fact? Why, Sir, we proved the right of men to be put on the lists; their right was admitted by Mr. Eaton; but when the final list came out, I found as many as five, ten, or fifteen names omitted in every polling district, and we had seventy-five polling districts in Halifax county. When I ascertained that, I told our friends: "Gentlemen, when you come to take that fact into account, and estimate that you have from 400 to 500 Dominion officials to vote against you, which you had not in the June elections, you must expect a smaller majority," and I told my colleague that if we won 200, it would be as much as we could expect. I got 150, while my colleague did not come quite up to that figure. That is the way the elections in Halifax were run. My hon. friend says the Local elections were carried by 1,000 or 1,200 in June before. I admit that; but the hon. gentleman, to be perfectly candid, should have told the House that I polled 200 more votes than Mr. Fielding, the Premier of the Province, polled in June previous, when he had 1,000 majority. The hon. gentleman says he was not aware of any promises having been made by the various Ministers who visited Nova Scotia. I said in a general way the other night that the Ministers who visited New Scotia previous to and during the elections, had made promises there of railway subsidies, which they stated it was the policy of the Administration to grant. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to mention some of them? I will mention the Short Line Railway from Pictou to Oxford. I have here a Minute of Council which the Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General and the member for Pictou distributed all over those counties—they were picked up in bushels—pledging the Government to make that a public work, and I am glad to see by the Order Paper that they are going to carry out their promise and vote an additional $500,000 for that road. That is only in fulfilment of promises made by members of the Government during that campaign.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Corrupt promises.

Mr. JONES. They may not be corrupt in a legal sense; but when Ministers go to a Province or a community, and promise to spend public money in works in which the people are largely interested, I think this House will agree with me that such promises will be a very important factor in securing the election of their friends. Then the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Putnam) carried his county in the same way; they promised assistance for the Hants Central Railway from Truro to Windsor. I attended several meetings in that county, and wherever I went I was met with that one statement that they had the word of the different Ministers and the word of the hon. member for Hants, who sits in this House to-night, that if this Government were returned that road would be carried out. Then, there was a road in Colchester from Brookfield to Stewiacke. I am not condemning these expenditures, because if the public money is to be spent in such large amounts out in the west, I do not see why we should not have some of it down by the sea. Then, the late member for Yarmouth (Mr. Kinney) went home armed with a Minute of Council to the effect that the Government were going to put in a gap between Annapolis and Digby, so as to secure a through line from Halifax to Yarmouth. They thought that might defeat Mr. Vail in Digby. The hon. gentleman could hardly occupy the prominent position he does without being aware of all these circumstances. For the last ten years, no matter who represented Halifax, my hon. friend and colleague was the real recognised leader of the party there. He was the man who directed the policy of the party in the elections, and I think the party are under obligations to him, because he was a very wise and judicious counsellor. I have often met that hon. gentleman, and although we differ on public questions, I hope we shall retain in future as in the past our personal friendship and regard. But I do not think the hon. gentleman has said anything to-night which will disprove any statement I made. I said to the hon. gentleman that he had one supporter in this House, I believe a judicious supporter. I regret that he is here, and I look upon it as a misfortune that any man should sit on that side of the House and support this Government; but if any gentleman is to come from Halifax to support them, there is no man I would rather see here to-night than my hon. friend. I pointed out that the hon. gentleman was indebted to the Civil Service of Halifax for the seat he occupies in this House.

Mr. KENNY. No.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman may say no, but with all due deference to him I know that there are 400 or 500 men on the railway, connected with the Customs, Post Office, Marine and Fisheries and every other branch connected with the Government there, who went en masse for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KENNY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that there are 400 or 500 civil servants with votes in Halifax?

Mr. JONES. Yes, I say connected with these different services there are at least 400; and when you take into account the men who were taken on at the deep-water terminus, those who were sent to whitewash the penitentiary, to go up to Richmond to dig holes in the frozen earth with their picks, and who were discharged when the election was over, I say 400 votes is a moderate estimate of the number of men who were influenced in that way. You must also remember that these men had friends, so that they exercised a double influence, because they knew that their position were in peril, and their friends who desired to see them retain their positions were naturally less zealous in our cause than they would have been under other circumstances. That is the natural result of such a state of things, as any hon. member can understand. To finish the whole story, I repeat what I said then. I have nothing to take back; I have given you to-night additional evidence of the interference, and I do not think the hon. gentleman has been able to remove the impression which I gave the House the other night. I am very glad to see him here as a representative of Halifax, when my own colleague could not come, but when he and his friend and leader in the House attempt to taunt hon. members on this side with the influences which were exercised by our friends to obtain seats, I felt it my duty, as one of the members on this side, to remind the right hon. gentleman that his own party had pursued the course which he so emphatically condemns. If the right hon. gentleman is sincere in his objection to that policy, I hope before this Parliament closes he will introduce on behalf of the Government an Act disfranchising the Dominion officials, not only in Halifax, but all over the Dominion. I believe these men should be disfranchised and taken from the control or dictation of either political party. They may be the servants of the hon. gentleman and his friends to-night, but the day may come, sooner than the hon. gentleman expects (in one, two or three years), when these men may be the servants of the present Opposition; and do you suppose these men would desire to be—if our people were so disposed, which I know they would not be—insulted and outraged by being ordered to vote according as the political parties of the day changed. I lay it down as a principle, although I am in a minority in this House, that the civil servants of the country, who are as much my servants as they are of the right hon. gentleman's, because they are paid out of the money of the country, to serve the public interests of the country, should be free from all control on either side, and feel they are in an independent position. If nothing came out of the discussion to-night, I rejoice at having the opportunity of laying down a principle which we have contended for, in the Province of Nova Scotia, for a long time. Not only there did we disfranchise the Dominion officials, but the local officials as well. They cannot vote in a local election, and are glad to be in the position in which the Act has placed them. I, therefore, hope that during this Parliament some action may be taken which will place the civil servants in an independent position.

Mr. TUPPER. I think the House will not be anxious to hear a too lengthy statement from every hon. gentleman as to the events which he may think interesting to him, and which occurred in the excitement of the last election; but as the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has occupied considerable time this Session telling us the gossip of his committee rooms during the late election, and has felt it necessary to apologise to this House for his presence here or to explain why he appears with so few followers, it is necessary I should answer him on certain statements he has made with reference to the county of Pictou. Many of the hon. gentleman's assertions made a few nights ago have been taken issue with by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who, I think, taught the senior member a lesson, because that hon. gentleman in his reply deemed it necessary to avoid any allusion to the fanciful $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 subsidies dangled before the people of Nova Scotia, and retired from the position which he took the other night a few minutes before six, when he thought that by speaking up to six no one would have the opportunity of contradicting his assertion. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the county of Pictou and if his allusions in reference to his own county had no more foundation than those, I do not see much use in the junior member for Halifax taking the trouble and time to refute them. He said the same influences were at work in the county where my colleague and myself were returned by 600 of a majority. He charges the Government with having coerced the employés of the Intercolonial Railway, and the Civil Service. I challenge every statement made by the hon. gentleman, and what is more, I say that candidates whom we met in a fair fight and defeated fairly in Pictou, had the manliness and honor to make a declaration entirely inconsistent with the declaration of the hon. member for Halifax. Both Mr. McLeod, who opposed us, and Mr. Bell, stood up like men and admitted that they were beaten fairly; they said they had done their best to win but could not. Everyone knows that the senior member for Halifax is ashamed of the part he took in that contest. From the day he came here up to the present, he has never ventured to tell the House that he ran in the last election as the recognised leader of the secession party. I am glad the hon. gentleman has some sense of what is right and decent in the House of Commons, and is thoroughly ashamed of the policy that the Province almost from one end to the other repudiated with scorn. Why do hon. gentlemen opposite laugh? They were denounced as well as we. It was a fight of Nova Scotians against Canadians, which the ex-Minister of the Crown in Canada placed before the electors of Nova Scotia. These parish political cries, these sectional cries were pleaded for all they were worth. He endeavored to explain that Nova Scotia, forsooth, was building all the railways in the west, that she was being bled for the Canadians who were draining the resources of that Province.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that is true, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite cheered him when he endeavored to make capital at our expense by abusing them as well as the party in power. The hon. gentleman does not know why he is beaten; rather, he pretends not to know. He is too far-seeing not to be able to understand the cause that moved the people at the election. He pretends it was on account of the returning officers and the coercion of the Civil Service employés, and repeats the excuses he hears from the lips of his new found friends from Ontario. I will tell the hon. gentleman the reason he was beaten absolutely in the last election. He was beaten for a reason given to him by one who, although not a leader of his party in Nova Scotia, is entitled to be one, if ability and certain breadth of mind entitle an hon. gentleman to assume that position in the ranks of his party. When this miserable played out cry of repeal was raised in Nova Scotia, and the senior member for Halifax was desperate enough to adopt it, what was the platform laid down by him? It was this, as stated by an organ of the hon. gentleman:

"Neither political party of Canada ever has been, is now, or ever can be, friendly to Nova Scotia's interest, simply because Confederation has been, is, and ever will be, ruinous to this Province, and therefore no party which advocates the maintenance of the Union can be Nova Scotia's friend. No liberal opposed to repeal or luke-warm in the cause is now a member of what once was the Grit party of Nova Scotia. No such party now exists. The few anti-repeal Liberals are nowhere, and will have to stay there or yield gracefully to the wishes of the people and join the repeal enemy. The Liberals of Nova Scotia, by making repeal their platform, ceased to be a Canadian party, their one great aim and object being to secure separation from Canada. If Mr. Fraser is wrong in saying that 'the Nova Scotia party must fight them both' (Blake and Macdonald), then what in the name of all that is sensible did the party mean by raising the repeal cry? Fight them both we must, fight them both we will, till repeal is won. No looking back to regret for past friendships."

Mr. JONES. Who is that?

Mr. TUPPER. The Pictou News, and my hon. friend will not deny that it is one of the strongest organs of his party in eastern Nova Scotia.

Mr. JONES. Oh, an organ.

Mr. TUPPER. And it was to people who believed that stuff that the hon. gentleman appealed when he was asking for their votes in the city of Halifax, and the men who believed that at the time cheered the hon. gentleman and worked for him in that election. Mr. Pipes, to whom I have referred, said long ago that it would not be the returning officers or the corrupt and coercive Government that would secure his defeat, but he told him that "the jackals and crows may live on the putrefying bodies of the slain, but no political party or political man can prosper on the putrefying carcass of repeal." That was one of the hon. gentleman's friends and associates, and the day has come, as I am glad to see, when the hon. gentleman now recognises, as he appears to do so to-night, that
