The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) made a wise and mature sounding statement when he said, while speaking in this debate some weeks ago—I believe this closely resembles his words—that, "no one's tears are to be ignored", the inference being that the striving people of one of our provinces, the sufferers from the yet unnamed and subtle revolution, should receive sympathy. I most heartily agree with this, but I am also much concerned with, and my sympathy equally goes out for, those who will suffer, and are suffering at the present time, from the ruthless and most unexpected discarding of things which they hold very dear.

If the hon. member for Leeds is right—and on this particular point I think he is right indeed—when he says that every tear is important, then I would suggest to him and his party that serious consideration be given to the tears of loss that many people will shed as a result of this proposal. It seems to me cruelest of all to toy with the intangibles of life. The hurts of extra taxation, the hurts of taking from people material things, can be repaired. They can be reasoned with; they can even be discontinued. But you cannot reason with someone who has lost a son or a father or a brother and who wants to keep what is to them—and no one can change it—the symbol of that sacrifice.

Canadians, Mr. Speaker, are very reasonable people. We are called reasonable people throughout the world. Canadians will compromise, will understand and will give in to a majority if they are sure it is a majority. But it is only fair to give them time to find this out. Pushing this debate, threatening no recess of parliament until it is through, gives an unpleasant impression of coercion which is neither useful nor sensible. If any unity can come, if any unity can be achieved by creating a distinctive flag, then by all means let us put our minds toward achieving it. But let us not merely replace one dissatisfied group of people with another equally dissatisfied group. Are all the facts of history going to be changed? Are we suddenly going to arrive at a new, mysterious understanding just because we fly a different flag which no one has ever seen before and which many people dislike? Far from it.

I am intrigued, Mr. Speaker, with the new horizons of understanding and the possibilities we now face for tolerance to and understanding of other countries and nations of the world. How are we Canadians going to achieve this understanding of other countries and other nations if we cannot reach some compromise between ourselves, and understand one another? How can we give the leadership to attain this goal of a modern world if we cannot get along together? I do not think that the presently proposed flag is any contribution toward solving our problems in any way whatsoever. I regret to say that I find this whole debate ill-starred and ill-timed. It seems to me that we will not only end up with the cart before the horse, but we will end up with no horse at all. We are dealing with a catalyst, in itself a harmless bit of material, but once dropped into the chemicals smouldering in Canada, no one can possibly foresee the result. Mr. Speaker, such a gamble is not the course of wisdom, not even the course of common sense.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to take part in this debate concerning the flag, a plebiscite and the particular design proposed, I find myself slightly confused. I prepared my speech some time ago. However, at the end of last week there was an obvious change in the attitudes of the leaders in this house, with some hope of co-operation. I may say this is a very welcome attitude.

A great deal has been said about this flag issue throughout the country, and particularly in this house. Many volumes of Hansard have been filled with speeches against and in favour of the proposed design. I should like to quote some of those words later on today. Many representatives of the people of Canada have risen in their seats in this chamber accepting the right, privilege and duty to express the feelings and views of their constituents. Many of these individuals have appeared as delegates rather than members.

As I have said, I was happy to witness the change of heart, if I may use those words, on the part of the leaders of the parties in this house, and particularly on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). At an earlier date the suggestion was made that the vote on this issue would be a free vote. I think that suggestion was made even before the resolution was placed before us. After the resolution was made public we were informed quite clearly that the government would stand or fall on this issue. We were told we would have to accept the specific design proposed, whether we were in favour of it or not. Many viewpoints have been expressed by representatives of the people, and as time has passed there has been an obvious change. The Prime Minister I think finally began to realize that Canadian people were not willing to accept a specific design without having the opportunity of expressing their feelings. Many individuals have taken exception to the proposed design while others are prepared to accept it. Some people like the design, although I think they represent a minority, particularly in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could point out the feeling in my riding by reading some of the vast number of letters that have been written by representatives of town councils in places such as Cardston, Lethbridge and Nobleford, as well as by secretaries of the various branches of the Canadian Legion. I could go into great detail to point out how strongly people feel about the red ensign. I must admit that there are some, particularly the younger people, who favour a flag with a maple leaf design, either that proposed by the resolution or one that has been suggested since, having only one maple leaf. The percentage of people in my riding who favour the design proposed by the Prime Minister is very small, approximately 8 per cent. The group which favoured a single maple leaf design amounted to approximately 16 per cent. The great majority favoured the retention of the red ensign. The great majority of the people in my riding are willing to co-operate, and will accept a distinctively Canadian flag other than the red ensign, although one having a similar design.

Mr. Speaker, very much has been said about this country being divided in two, one side in favour of the government proposed design and the other in favour of the retention of the red ensign. The meetings which took place last week apparently resulted in a willingness to co-operate. I am sure a solution to the obvious difficulty has not been found but I am very pleased to observe this willingness to co-operate.

Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for taking up the time of this house, but as I pointed out earlier, I feel it is my duty and privilege as a delegate of the people in my riding to bring their views to this house. It seems apparent at this stage that there will now be a free vote in this house, and I must point out, that being the case, that the people will not accept a distinctively Canadian flag adopted by this parliament without having the opportunity of publicly expressing their opinions. They wish to have some voice in the choice of a design, and I think that is their right, Mr. Speaker.

I did mention the free vote, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to say a few words about that subject. This means something to the Canadian people and to members of the house but, quite frankly, what it really means I am not too sure. I said earlier that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) indicated a long time ago there would be a free vote. Then he reversed his position and said the government would stand or fall on this issue. Last Friday he said there would be a free vote. Members of the house know that a free vote means certain things. If you look back through history and examine the precedents you will find that a free vote really does not mean a vote on something brought forward by the Prime Minister of the country and seconded by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau). How can the house vote freely on a resolution brought forward in this manner? I sincerely hope this can be so. I am very optimistic about the trend that negotiations between the party leaders have taken and the trend that the debate in the house is taking, but I fail to see how we can really expect a free vote on a certain design at this late date.

I said earlier that there are people who are quite willing to have a distinctive flag. In fact, generally speaking I think all Canadians are quite willing to have a distinctive flag although their ideas as to the design may vary. As I came up to parliament hill this morning I noticed the flags of the commonwealth nations on display. There are many beautiful flags there and some I am quite sure we would like, but I was quite proud to notice the Canadian red ensign flying there. I thought it looked very beautiful and there are many people in Canada and many members of the house who think the same way.

I think the designs set forth in the sub-amendment are suitable for presentation to the public in a plebiscite so they may make their choice. As far as I am concerned, what I think I would probably do would be to take the red ensign and replace the union jack in the corner with the complete red ensign. There would then be a lot of room in the fly for green maple leaves, red maple leaves, a big golden maple leaf or a peace pipe as has been suggested by certain Indians. The views of the Indians have had very little representation in this house. I believe I have mentioned before that I represent the largest Indian reservation in Canada, the Blood reserve at Cardston, Alberta, and among my constituents is an Indian who is a member of the other place. These Indians have very strong views in this matter.

There are other Indians very close to Ottawa on the Six Nations reserve who pride themselves on having been allies of the Queen for many years. They consider themselves to be a nation and feel that they should be heard. They also pride themselves on the fact that many, many years ago they formed the first successful league of nations known to the world, and I think they should be complimented for this. They have their ideas about designs for a flag if there is to be a new one and have suggested that a peace pipe might be included in the design; but not for one moment have they ever considered doing away with the union jack completely. In the opinion of many Canadians this is one symbol that must be included in any new design.

I have found that in the interval since the flag debate began up to the present time many people who were actually in favour of a new design, and particularly in favour of the one presented by the government, have been having second thoughts about the matter. I have realized from speaking to them that they have had little conception of what the union jack really meant, not only to the various provinces and areas of the country but to Canada as a whole. I could go into great detail in talking about the various crosses that make up the union jack, but I will content myself by pointing out that when you honestly and sincerely sit down with people and discuss this matter at length and in depth you find that many who had strong feelings earlier in favour of the new flag do not feel that way at this time, and quite rightly so. You talk to them about expressing the Christian idea in our flag and having a Christian emblem and many people ask what you mean. When you discuss this matter with people who do not understand and have not taken the trouble to find out, their reaction is one of amazement and they have very little criticism for the ensign. As a matter of fact, they wish they had not been so sure that they wanted to get rid of it.

I said earlier that much has been said in this debate. I should like to quote particularly a statement made by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) in concluding his speech. As found on page 6532 of Hansard, he said:

> I say and repeat that we have everything to gain by remaining within confederation. We will be better off financially, and the opposite is untrue.

That is what I want to say to the house. I commend the hon. member for bringing this point to the attention of the house. There are many others in the house who feel the same way, myself in particular. I am very glad that such a statement has been made because there has been so much talk about the differences between east and west and increasing the cleavage between the races. I deplore this kind of talk. Words such as I quoted from Hansard a moment ago are what we need in this debate and every other debate in the house. It is this sort of co-operation which crosses party lines and races, Mr. Speaker, which will bring us forward not only to the designation of a distinctive flag but on so many other matters that face Canada today.

I wanted to point out as well, Mr. Speaker, along the same line, that there has been a great deal said about the cleavage between the races, the differences between east and west. It has been said that maple leaves do not grow west of the great lakes and that there should be all kinds of other symbols on our flag. I mentioned that in so far as the Indians are concerned we could have a peace pipe or a beaver. We could have many other things. Frankly, I like the maple leaf design very much, but not particularly the three leaf design. I believe it would be better to have a single leaf design. In spite of this adherence to the maple leaf I just cannot see throwing away the emblems of our heritage. In my opinion, we are just like a family. It does not hurt the younger members or any members of a family to have some sort of respect for their elders. Some people take exception to the fact that we want to keep our ties with certain countries. I know there can be a lot of arguments advanced and a lot of red herrings drawn across the path, but the fact we have the British North America Act which grants certain rights to people is a rather unique situation in this world today. It is something of which we ought to be very proud. If it had not been for the protection of the union jack I doubt very much if we would be in this house or have the British parliamentary system of which we are so proud. It must be a good one because it is about the oldest parliamentary system surviving in this world today.

Certainly, this constitution was given to us under the union jack and guaranteed to us by the union jack. It was given to us at a time when we certainly needed a guarantee. I just cannot see how the Canadian people can scrap this sort of thing and along with it the fleur-de-lis. When we talk about certain laws and principles, we must recognize our heritage from France. We have it in our language, not only in French Canada but in our English language. If you look for the definition of a word in the dictionary you often find that it is a derivative of a French word. I am speaking frankly and very honestly right now. It is difficult for me to understand French Canadians wanting to throw away the fleur-de-lis and the union jack, if for no other reason than their mother tongue and the protection and guarantees which account for their very existence today.

I should like to say also, Mr. Speaker, that I am very optimistic at this point. I think that before long we will have co-operation which will not only bring an end to this debate but may even lead to some co-operation on the design of the flag. I have tried to point out time and time again that we are not adamant. I do not believe there is anyone in Canada who would not be willing to co-operate a little bit on a design for a distinctive flag provided, of course, that we keep certain emblems. We have noticed students travelling across the country, many being present here in Ottawa, and as a matter of fact in the galleries. I was back in my area, in the city of Lethbridge, for a couple of days. I was not on holidays, as I hoped to be, but I attended a civic reception. In that civic reception were 20 high school students from the city of Montreal who were visiting 20 different homes in the city of Lethbridge. As a matter of fact I sat beside the premier of Alberta, Premier Manning. I do not mean to give the impression that I am any more than personally friendly with Premier Manning, because he is of a different political stripe than I am.

I have always felt about Premier Manning in the same fashion as was indicated by the prime minister of Iceland. He was holidaying in Banff and I should like to quote from the Globe and Mail for August 12 a statement he made:

> Prime Minister Bjarni Benediktsson, of Iceland, holidaying here during a cross-Canada journey, says he is puzzled by the Alberta political situation.
> "There's nobody against the government," he said. "It's rather an odd situation when you have a 63-seat government and only three opposition members—and so far I have discovered only one person who openly supports the Social Credit party."

I am only quoting this, Mr. Speaker, to point out that I am not that kind of politician. I do admire our premier, though, and I did attend this civic reception with him. These students were there. This was a good thing. The students were visiting 20 homes in the city of Lethbridge. I have not heard of another city in Canada that is carrying on this type of program. I am very proud of it. I mentioned something about co-operation, and here is a very good example of it. Upon further investigation I found that this was not an isolated instance, but an exchange of students took place every two weeks from the time school closed until it opened. The public school board and the separate school board of Lethbridge co-operate in sending 20 students to Montreal and they are replaced by Montreal students who go to the homes these students have left. I am sure that this type of co-operation will bring about the understanding that Canadians need.

In spite of the extreme partisanship that my constituents have they are trying hard to understand other people's viewpoints, and not only are they trying but they are doing something about it in a very concrete manner. This is the way we will make progress on this matter. I would like to say I was never prejudiced, but there was a time during this debate when I almost was prejudiced. However, I am glad I was very patient and, as I said earlier, I feel much happier now.

Some 25 years ago I remember installing a heating system in my house. I ordered the apparatus from Montreal. It was a good deal, almost as good a deal as I could have had other places, and I felt as a true Canadian then, at a time when I had not the slightest idea I would ever be standing in this chamber talking about different flag designs, plebiscites and everything else. But I have always had that little feeling for my country and I am proud to stand here today and point out what my constituents think. It we talk a little more I think we will arrive at a distinctive flag that will make many Canadians happy and feel it is what it should be.

Surely the Prime Minister, the government and all hon. members opposite will listen to this sort of plea, and I put it in the form of a plea, that we do this thing. If we do we will not find complete agreement in every part of the house but we will have sufficient agreement so that we can go ahead and give the Canadian people a distinctive flag. Frankly, as I said earlier, I believe the people probably should have a choice, and various designs can easily be worked out when we come to that point. Some choices are indicated in the subamendment and others may be incorporated.

This is something I could not say several weeks ago because at that time this proposal was, to me, a political one. The three maple leaf design was definitely a political design and at that time I could not imagine its being associated with anything but a political flag because of the manner in which it was introduced. It was the design of one person, the leader of the Liberal party; but now I am happy to see the progress we have made.

Some people have been critics of this debate and have called it a filibuster, but if we in the great Conservative party had not taken this stand—and I do not agree it has been a filibuster—we would not have reached our present point of progress. There is a much more happy atmosphere in spite of all the things that have been said, and if this party is to go down in history as being accused of a filibuster I emphasize once more I am glad to have taken part in it because, without it, we would not be at the point where we are today. I look forward to a time in the very near future when we will have a distinctive flag that will unite Canada and which will be of a design that is very acceptable to most Canadian people.

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, but in view of the many letters I have received from my constituents I would be remiss in my duty if I did not make their views known to the House of Commons. I know other hon. members have received as many letters as I, and when they have spoken the papers have screamed "obstruction," "filibuster" and everything else. As a matter of fact one of the hon. members from Halifax used that term "filibuster" in his broadcast yesterday. But I point out that this is not a filibuster; it is merely bringing the views of our people before the House of Commons.

I have brought one letter along with me as a sample of the many I have received. It states:

> Mr. Pearson, in his latest speech on the "Nation's Business," stressed two points: 1, the need for Canadian unity; 2, the need for a "distinctive" Canadian flag.
> Regarding the first point, that is, the need for Canadian unity, everybody knows that the public controversy aroused to date by the introduction of Mr. Pearson's flag has reduced Canadian unity to the lowest ebb in our history.
> Regarding the second point, that is, the need for a "distinctive" Canadian flag, only Mr. Pearson seems to be unaware of the fact that we have in the red ensign one of the most distinctive flags in the world. Where it flies on Canadian embassies, no one fails to recognize it as Canadian. Only Mr. Pearson seems to doubt this. Yet Mr. Pearson's flag—

Mr. Hellyer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is it not the custom that we do not refer to hon. members by their surnames but rather by the constituencies they represent?

Mr. Cooper: I am reading a letter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member, as I understand it, was referring to the text of a letter.

Mr. Cooper: This is a letter I received and I have brought it before the house as a sample of all the letters I have received. I shall continue:

> Only Mr. Pearson seems to doubt this. Yet Mr. Pearson's flag possesses no distinctiveness whatsoever, and can in no way be compared with our nation's flag, the Canadian red ensign.

I think it is time, Mr. Speaker, that you know I stand for the red ensign and I am proud of it. Of all the samples and designs I have received at my office, the one suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is the most vacant looking. I think the right hon. gentleman is way off the beam in throwing away our red ensign, together with all our tradition, and proposing this new flag. I stand for a vote, and the sooner the vote can be brought about, the better. Let the people decide what they want. I do not believe that at any time in Canadian history one man has backed a certain design and forced it on the people of Canada. Therefore, I am in favour of the amendment and of the subamendment. I think we should hold a plebiscite and let the people of Canada express their views on this subject.

Just as an example of the publicity this flag is getting across Canada, and possibly to let us all have a little laugh, let me tell this little story. In our town, not too long ago, a man came out of a corner tavern, really loaded, and said in a drunken voice: "I am for a maple leaf flag. It has a bar at each end". That is an example of the publicity this flag is getting across Canada.

I know many who are present in this chamber will recollect the old song "We'll Never Let the Old Flag Fall". That promise is being broken by members on the government side—a promise which was sung with all our hearts in the first world war. No doubt most hon. members can recall, also, the poem by Dr. John McCrae, with its moving lines:

> If ye break faith with us who die
> We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

Today in the House of Commons the government is breaking the pledges and the promises which were made in two world wars.

Our flag, with the union jack in the corner is a symbol that we belong to the great commonwealth of nations. I have been down in the United States on a few occasions in connection with defence installations, a joint effort by our two countries. On these visits I saw our red ensign flying side by side with the stars and stripes. I must say it did look very good. It made me proud to have a part in that flag.

I know the maple leaf is Canada's emblem. But I should like to point out that the sugar maple is grown in only a small area of Canada, and that west of the great lakes we shall have to tell our children what those red blobs are on that flag—they have never seen a maple leaf. In fact very few maples are grown in western Ontario.

I am a westerner. I am a wheat farmer. Canadian hard red spring wheat is known all over the world and it is grown in every province in Canada. I think a sheaf of golden grain would be more appropriate as a Canadian symbol than a maple leaf.

An hon. Member: How about a fish?

Mr. Cooper: With these few remarks, let me indicate my intention to support the amendment. In my opinion the red ensign is more symbolic of Canada than any flag which has been shown to me so far. A Canadian can look with pride on this beautiful old flag and be proud that he has a part in it. I might go back a few years to the turn of the century when the western provinces were formed. People went there from every part of the world, from dozens of countries. We have a mixed population out there. And just ten years later they were called to fight for their country. We saw this mixed population take arms and go overseas to fight for the land of their adoption, with the red ensign flying before them.

It was only a generation later that their sons and daughters were called upon to cross the seas and fight for the land in which they were born. I say with great pride that the province of Saskatchewan, with its small population, contributed the largest number to the armed forces of any province of Canada on a per capita basis. This is something we are proud of.

I said my remarks would be brief, Mr. Speaker and I will conclude by saying once again that I will certainly support the sub-amendment before the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian parliament is now writing a very important page in its history. The debate on this resolution and its happy conclusion, with the adoption of a distinctive national flag, will stand as another milestone on the road leading to the independence of our country.

Following the Statute of Westminster and other important legislation passed since then, it will be a positive action taken by a truly responsible government and parliament and proof of our maturity.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep emotion and pride that I rise to express my humble opinion, as well as the views of my constituents, on the resolution under consideration, the purpose of which is to adopt a distinctive Canadian flag, as indicated in the resolution.

As could be expected, an amendment was tagged on without delay by the official opposition and it did not even wait for the house to vote before it moved an amendment to the amendment.

Having followed the debate from the beginning and especially last week, I will no doubt be allowed to say that I am completely against the idea of a plebiscite as suggested in the amendment of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), for two reasons.

First of all, if the national flag issue were dragged on the public and political hustings under the present circumstances where unfortunate statements and speeches are being made both here and outside, that would create disunity instead of strengthening national unity, which was the prime reason why the government introduced this resolution.

The second reason is that the Canadian people have elected in a democratic way representatives who received proper mandates to deal with the business of the nation. Consequently, the members of this house have the responsibility to execute the specific mandate entrusted to them. Settlement of this matter by a plebiscite cannot be seriously contemplated in a parliament where there is a responsible government.

The rare examples of such a measure in Canada repudiate any further application thereof, and especially in this case. Besides, we have the words of the leader of the official opposition himself to convince us of the inadvisability, uselessness and inefficiency of this procedure. Indeed, at time of the debate in this house in 1942 on the advisability of a plebiscite to relieve the government of previous commitments concerning the recruiting of soldiers for overseas, the present leader of the official opposition who was then member for Lake Centre stated, as recorded on page 186 of Hansard for January 30, 1942:

> Allow the members of parliament to vote on this question. Do not submit the question to the people of Canada, for in my opinion the taking of a plebiscite at this time may well destroy the unity of Canada.

And the same person added later, when the decision was taken, as one can read on page 836 of Hansard for February 25, 1942:

A plebiscite is to be taken regardless of the fact that in the long history of Great Britain, with all the constitutional changes which have taken place, no government has ever submitted any matter to the people by way of plebiscite.

I could quote other testimonies as bitterly eloquent and perhaps even more so on the part of members of the Leader of the Opposition's Conservative family, but I am short of time. I will only remind the house, and more especially certain members opposite, of those words of the acting leader of the Conservative opposition of the time, Mr. Hanson, who stated during the same debate in 1942, as recorded on page 26 of Hansard of January 26:

Let this government rise to the level of its duty; let it not be afraid to lead. A plebiscite is not a policy; it is the negation, it is the avoidance of a policy. It is merely an unworthy expedient to avoid facing a vital issue. Its purpose is to avoid facing a vital issue. Its purpose is to avoid rather than to face responsibility; it is to avoid rather than to enforce the performance of a duty. It is not a declaration of faith; it is a declaration of impotence.

I know that those historic words have already been quoted in this debate; that is why I wish to do it myself in order to point out to the official opposition, and to its leader in particular, the strange, curious and contradictory position in which it now finds itself.

What more will the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina City bring? Nothing more than the confusion which the latter has spread in the debate, turning it into an open, concerted and unfortunate attack against one of the founding groups of this country. That is obvious if you just refer to some of the speeches made in this house over the last week.

To those who, faced with their disappointments and their blunders, clamour in this house and elsewhere that the proposed flag with three maple leaves was designed to appease the province of Quebec, I will say that they are wrong to spread such untruths and to say such things because for a long time the people of Quebec have longed for unity within confederation. If for years they have been asking for a distinctive national flag, it is to strengthen that unity without which we cannot develop fully as an adult nation. That is why, although they are very proud of their origins, the people of Quebec want for Canada a truly distinctive flag which will not bear any sign of subservience to either of its inhabitants' mother countries.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in an adult country such as Canada, which is recognized as such throughout the world and by all international bodies, it is superfluous to discuss in 1964 the need for our country to have its own flag which will show in Canada and abroad that we are a sovereign state, an independent state, a symbol which will identify us everywhere and in all circumstances, as is the case for France, England, Ireland, Italy and all the countries of the world which can easily be identified by their distinctive flags.

Last week, I had the opportunity to meet delegates of the various commonwealth countries to the conference on education now being held within our walls. Without exception, all of them expressed the greatest surprise over those endless discussions concerning a distinctive flag and over the fact that our country is still without a truly distinctive flag. Among them was a representative of Ghana who could not believe that this whole debate was taking place. As hon. members know, Ghana is an African country and a member of the commonwealth which obtained its independence in 1957 and which has its own distinctive flag. Would Canada be lagging behind Africa? Unfortunately, we must admit that such is the case, at least in that respect.

Symbols play an important part in the life of a nation and the most important of those symbols, in my opinion, is the national flag. Now, a national flag must be distinctive, in this sense that it must not be confused with the flag of another country on account of any of its characteristics. That is why, with all due respect for the red ensign, which a 1945 order in council gave authorization to fly pending the adoption of a distinctive flag, we have to admit, with regret, that we never had and do not have yet a truly Canadian flag, symbolizing Canada as a whole and constituting the emblem of all Canadian citizens.

I think the time has come for Canada to have a flag which all Canadians, without exception, can contemplate with pride, a flag which could symbolize our great country, be the object of our affection and loyalty and become a rallying and unifying emblem, insuring for the future the greatness of Canada from coast to coast. In my opinion, such a symbol could not be put in better concrete form than is described in resolution 44A.

Indeed, are not the three red maple leaves on one stem the symbol which His Majesty George V attributed to us by royal proclamation on November 21, 1921? Before that, Queen Victoria had by proclamation dated May 26, 1868, conferred to the province of Ontario three green maple leaves on a golden ground which we find again on the escutcheon of the province of Quebec. The royal proclamation of 1921 which was issued at the request of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who was Conservative prime minister at the time, was the logical result of serious and deep-reaching studies and of the recommendations made by the special committee appointed after the first world war by Sir Robert Borden, another Conservative prime minister, to study the problem of Canada's symbols, which was considered of great importance. That committee, which, as far as I know, was composed exclusively of brilliant and prominent Conservatives like Major General Willoughby, G. Gwatkin; Thomas Mulvey, under secretary of state; Sir Joseph Pope, under secretary of state for Foreign Affairs; and Arthur G. Doughty, Dominion Archivist had considered the matter for several months. Whom of these hon. gentlemen does the right hon. Leader of the Opposition have in mind, when he accuses this government of breaking with the past; does he mean Mr. Meighen, Mr. Borden, Mr. Gwatkin or anybody else?

When suggesting to the Canadian parliament the adoption of symbols, and a distinctive Canadian flag, no hon. member in this house should try to express narrow nationalism. And the suggestion of a distinctive flag must not be interpreted in this way by anybody not sharing the views of those who favour this symbol of our maturity, that is, a distinctive Canadian flag.

It is not a question of denying our past, our history or our institutions. Quite the contrary, we must respect, and we do respect our past, our history and our institutions, and I believe that the adoption of a distinctive flag is the logical consequence for a nation which has reached nationhood; it is the greatest tribute we can pay to our past, to our history and to our ancestors who have built for us this great country of ours, so that we can, in 1964, live in a mature and sovereign country possessing the rights of a state which has reached its political majority.

To give our country a distinctive flag is to give the whole world, all international organizations to which we belong, all nations and all Canadian citizens in the first place, the proof that we are proud to be Canadians. Also, we are only attempting—and that is very important—to give to the spirit of our people, to the enthusiasm of our citizens, an emblem around which and under which our youth and the whole Canadian people can rally in adversity as in joy, in peace as during the dark days of war.

All Canadian citizens of any origin, of any language and of any creed, born on Canadian soil or who, voluntarily, sometime during their life, have adopted Canada as their new country, without repudiating their origins, have decided to leave the flag of their birth country and to rally under the banner of their adopted country to form with their new countrymen the great Canadian family which they and we want great, strong, independent and respected a mari usque ad mare.

Our forefathers worked too hard to pioneer and to develop this land, soaked with their sweat and fertilized with their blood, a land now the home of close to 20 million people, a country with all modern communication facilities, great natural resources, etc. etc., that this country should not have the right and the legitimate pride to display the distinctive signs of its majority.

To continue such wonderful work, I shall contribute to it with those of my colleagues who believe in the necessity for our country of having a distinctive flag, in voting with pride for resolution 44 (A) that is for the flag with the three leaves.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate because, like so many other people in Canada, I feel very strongly about this whole issue. I should also like to mention the fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) acknowledged his feelings that hon. members would wish to present their opinions on this flag issue at the time it was being considered. I should like to emphasize that fact and deny the suggestion that we are partaking in a filibuster. I certainly do not admit that this is a filibuster and I will give more detailed reasons at a later time.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two remarks about that what was said by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard). He admitted that this was an important debate, and he is one of the few members on the government side who have participated in it. He said we were taking one more step towards independence. I suggest that is an expression of utter nonsense in view of the fact this country is completely independent at this time. There is no subservience on the part of this country to any other country in the world. I should like to ask that hon. member what he means in this regard. Does he mean by any chance that this is a step towards the removal of our sovereign as Queen of Canada, so that Canada will subsequently become a republic? I should like him to answer that question.

With all due respect to the people of Canada I am sure they will laugh at the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bonaventure that Canada is at this stage something other than completely independent. This country of ours has been a country since 1867 and has, during these past years, become completely independent. I do not understand how the hon. member can compare this country to Ghana. I suggest the circumstances are entirely different.

Mr. Speaker, I intimated earlier that I am taking part in this debate because I feel very strongly about the flag issue. I should like to point out that resolution 44 (A) states:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps...a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921 —three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag; and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Speaker, I have read the resolution in an attempt to point out that prior to June 15 the resolution up to the end of the word "flag" in the second last line formed part of a whole resolution worded in such a way that the red ensign was going to disappear entirely. Under the present alignment of two split resolutions it is still to disappear completely. Apparently to some this might appear desirable, Mr. Speaker, but I must insist that to millions of people across Canada it is next to sacrilege.

I have heard it said, as I mentioned earlier, that the red ensign denotes some sort of colonialism or subservience to Great Britain. Utter nonsense. I think it is well worth pointing out though, that while under these two resolutions the red ensign is to disappear completely from the picture as far as the people of Canada are concerned, the union jack is to be retained to be flown on certain occasions to denote our commonwealth relationships, or something of that nature. If one stops and examines the picture it would seem that for those who did have any idea there was any kind of subjugation or what have you by Great Britain, the flying of the union jack under such circumstances would not be as acceptable as the red ensign. I know we are not discussing the second part of the split resolution but I do want to point out that the union jack is the flag of one country, Great Britain, and under those circumstances how can it be flown by us without denoting more subservience of some kind to that country?

I admit I have not made a study of the complete history of the Canadian red ensign. Others claim to have done so. I cannot cite certain dates on which it is presumed to have originated. All I know is that during the course of the debate it has been pointed out by many members on this side of the house that it has been flown as the flag of Canada for many years, certainly longer than I can remember. This whole question is not one of dates and figures. It is a question of the heart. It is the most emotional issue that could be brought before this house. I admit I am emotional about it but so are millions of other Canadians. That is why I insist that this whole flag question should not be before the house at this time. But, Mr. Speaker, as long as it is before us I for one propose to fight for our principles in this issue.

I know certain newspapers and other news media have taken it for granted that the result is a foregone conclusion. It has been said that no matter how wrong the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) may have been in bringing this issue before us at this time, no matter how many people may dislike the Prime Minister's personal choice of a flag, or how much, we should fold up and accept this dictum. No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot do that. I feel very strongly that in an issue such as this it is my duty to fight this coercion in every parliamentary way possible.

I do not accept defeat of the principles under which I grew up in this country. I do not accept the suggestion that having to fly this proposed flag is a foregone conclusion. I do not believe it is inevitable. It cannot be suggested for one minute that discussion of this issue is holding up the country's business. That is just not so. The Prime Minister has indicated that a recess can be had when this debate is over. We are not delaying the business of parliament. I admit we are delaying our own vacations but I for one am happy to forgo any vacation to prevent if I can this high handed, arbitrary action which would divide our country irretrievably for years to come.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) spoke the other day, and certainly he showed a great deal more concern for the Conservative party than for his country. I suggest that he pay particular attention to his own party. No one has any mandate to bring in a distinctive national flag, particularly without the union jack on it at least in some form.

I was not present this afternoon for all of the speech of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) but I am told that probably never before has a greater indictment been made of the government than was made by that hon. member. I feel that this whole question is one that should not be before us. I am repeating myself, but I feel so strongly about the matter that I say: If unity is wanted in this country, for goodness sake take the flag question out of parliament. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had dealt with the fact that, in my opinion, the Prime Minister's choice of a flag is not inevitable, along with some other facets of the flag question. I had pointed out that I did not believe the question should be before parliament at all. I should like to mention one or two other thoughts I have had in connection with this matter.

I have had the honour and privilege of representing my constituency for something over 11 years. During that period of time I believe the citizens of Perth county have trusted my judgment on most matters that have come before parliament for consideration. I feel that they have sent me here to do my duty as I see fit. In all honesty, I feel that for certain matters, such as economic, fiscal and many other matters of this type that come before us, I am probably in a better position to pass judgment than a lot of the citizens of my constituency simply because I have ready access to the pertinent information. I feel it is my duty, after weighing all the considerations, to make up my own mind and act accordingly. To me, sir, this just makes good sense.

However, Mr. Speaker, on such a fundamental problem as the choice of a new flag, my opinion should not carry any more weight than that of any other citizen of my constituency. Their feelings on this divisive question are just as sincere as mine. I feel that certain attitudes expressed to me, particularly by those who have served in Her Majesty's active forces, should carry as much or more weight than my own. The representations made to me, particularly by returned men but including many organizations and hundreds of individuals have, by a huge majority, been in favour of the retention of the Canadian red ensign. I admit that I have had some three or four letters indicating that the individuals concerned would be in favour of the Prime Minister's suggestion. I believe the huge majority, not only of my constituency but of all Canadians, would accept a modification of our present flag but certainly not the complete destruction of it.

I mentioned earlier that I had represented this constituency for some 11 years. Prior to that I had some municipal experience. I think that experience has led me to believe that on certain questions a plebiscite is a good thing. I was reminded just recently of an incident in my municipality which has had long range benefits to my city. Many years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway wished to bring a line into Stratford. Many business interests were in favour of this. They wished to have competition against the old Grand Trunk Railway which had given good service. The tragedy of the whole matter, Mr. Speaker, was that Canadian Pacific wished to have their roadbed come in along the river flowing through the middle of the city of Stratford. They wished to have their station in the middle of the downtown section, which is right in the heart of our parks system. This matter caused concern in the city. A plebiscite was held and those dreamers who could see the future of our parks system won out by a narrow margin.

I only mention this to show the benefits to be achieved by a plebiscite under certain conditions. I think anyone who has seen the Stratford Shakespearian festival would agree to two things. First, I do not believe there is any more beautiful parks system in any city in Canada, similar in size at least. I believe this was only possible because this plebiscite was defeated. Second, there would not have been a Stratford Shakespearian festival if we had not had this beautiful parks system to encourage those who dreamed. We all fully realize, I am sure, what that festival has meant to culture all across Canada. To me, Mr. Speaker, this is a concrete example of the long range benefits of a plebiscite.

The subamendment reads:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:

"and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:

1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

This subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) sets out four choices from which a flag for Canada may be selected. I have indicated, and I indicate again that my personal choice would be the retention of the red ensign, and there are many reasons for this which I will deal with in more detail later in my remarks.

This whole question is so personal and is of such a type that I do not feel the opinion of the most studied student of heraldry is worth more than mine or those of many, many millions across Canada. As a consequence, I feel these four choices should be at least presented to the electorate so that they would have an opportunity of showing a preference.

It should be noted that the subamendment states:

—and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:

And it goes on to list the four choices. There are other choices which could be included if the subamendment carries, and such other choices might be decided by a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons. This has been dealt with in some detail by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) and several others during the course of this debate.

Mr. Cashin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Monteith: No, not at the moment. You can make your own speech whenever you feel like it, and there are many other people on your side of the house I would like to hear speak also, like the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Beer), and the members from the Toronto and York ridings. I think they would be very interesting.

If the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) would only refer a study of this matter to such a committee it would provide a cooling off period, which I believe to be vital to the unity of Canada. Many hon. members in this debate have made just about the most impassioned speeches I have heard since I entered the House of Commons. They were all from the heart. I ask the Prime Minister not to let them fall on deaf ears.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I hear words of contempt, one might almost say of derision, from the other side of the house when I make these statements. I am serious. It is time some of you people got a little serious. I claim that this is no way to develop unity in the country.

Now I would like to say a few words on the various clauses of the subamendment and I shall first deal specifically with choice No. 3, the question dealing with the three maple leaves. I feel this is a reasonable choice to put before the people of Canada. The Prime Minister has indicated his adamant approach to this flag design. Indeed there has been a great campaign going on, and I am assuming this is backed by the Liberal party, to try by high pressure methods to sell this particular suggestion to the people of Canada. We have seen buttons, we have seen flags, we have seen miniature flags, and we hear of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) placing an order for 100,000 bumper stickers. If this is not a campaign I do not know what it could be called. Mr. Speaker, this commercialization of something which may never come about is to me deplorable.

I feel this is doing a great injustice to our present emblem, but despite the fact that there has been so much discontent shown in regard to this suggested design, I do believe that it should be included in a plebiscite from which a choice could be made.

I now mention clause No. 4 in the subamendment which deals with one large maple leaf in the middle of the flag, instead of three, and otherwise is practically similar in design to the three maple leaf design. I believe there are some who have indicated a desire for this particular pattern. Many representations have been made suggesting that even though preference might be for the red ensign, or a modification thereof, at least a one maple leaf flag would be better than a three maple leaf flag.

However, Mr. Speaker, I have to admit that the foregoing two suggestions—that is, the three maple leaves and the one maple leaf—do not move me in any way whatsoever. I fail to see how either of these two examples could be representative of all Canada. First, we know that there are many varieties of maple trees in Canada, and I would ask just which one is this? Also we are aware, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Cooper) mentioned this afternoon, that maple trees are not a natural tree in the western provinces. Further we know the maple tree is much more prevalent in certain areas of the northeastern United States than in some areas of eastern Canada. To me it just does not have any heraldry or tradition behind it. Both designs leave me cold.

I now come back to the red ensign which is listed as No. 1 in the subamendment. It is not my intention to put a lot of quotations and detail on the record. I was, however, particularly moved and impressed by an article written by Mr. Stafford Johnston, the associate editor of the Stratford Beacon-Herald on May 26 last.

I do not intend to read the whole article but I would point out that it was written on May 26 last and shall give it in summary form. The writer started out by pointing out that 20 years ago that day he was in the line of vehicles, many miles long, heading for Portsmouth, about to go aboard ship for the landings in Normandy. That is in summary form. The author gives details of his experience during those days. This, for me, has great bearing on the feelings of many people across Canada, so I should like to read some of these details as given in the remainder.

The day we have been remembering lately was not D-day, but D-plus-5, when we came to the first moment at which I can remember any letdown.

On Sunday, June 11, 1944, our brigade headquarters was in the village of Le-Fresne Camilly. The invasion beaches were seven miles behind us, and the enemy three miles in front. The seven or eight vehicles that made up the headquarters were parked around three sides of a courtyard. The home of Mme Jeanne-Marie de Gastebled occupied the fourth side of the square. It was a big house, and it needed to be; one result of the invasion, inevitably had been the shooting-up, and bombing of a good many houses, and a lot of doubling-up of families in other houses. We never did get close to a count on the number of people then sheltered under Mme de Gastebled's roof, but when all the children came out in the morning to see the soldiers, the place looked like a schoolyard.

Some time during that day the Brigadier emerged from the truck which was his home and office, and took a look around. It was probably the first relaxed moment for him since the run-in to the beaches five days before. He noticed a flagpole in the middle of the courtyard and that gave him an idea. "Run up a Canadian flag," he said, in an off the cuff order.

This was, of course, a silly order. Modern armies don't carry flags into battle. During the weeks before the channel crossing we had all listed and checked, and counted and rechecked every item of equipment, and stowed and restowed it in the vehicles, and the lists certainly did not include anything as unnecessary to battle as a flag. It was easy enough for the boss to toss off an order, but to us underlings it seemed obvious that the order could not be obeyed.

However, the signallers had an idea. They rummaged in a locker where they had signal flags stowed and, by a minor miracle, they found a Canadian flag mixed in with the kind of flag the signallers use for wigwagging. We found some rope, and somebody shinnied up the pole.

The French children watched all this, and some of them must have reported to their mothers and their aunts. By the time the flag was ready to run up the pole, we had quite an audience of French civilians, women, children and old men. Madame herself emerged from the house, followed by a younger woman carrying an immense silver tray with glasses of wine. Madame made a short speech, and while we did not follow the words, we got the general idea that Canadians are a good thing. The brigadier, when he felt the atmosphere getting emotional, turned coward, and retreated to hiding. The rest of us tried to pretend we did not feel moved by seeing the flag go up.

It was the Canadian red ensign, of course.

The people, three miles away at the time, who might have wanted that flag to be pulled down, consisted of the two German divisions then opposed to 3rd Canadian division. The 21st Panzer division was a top rated division of the regular German army. The 12th S.S. division was one of the fanatical outfits in which every man was a nazi party member. For another month they fought us to a standstill, before we finally broke out of the bridgehead.

Hitler's elite troops couldn't make us pull it down, but now, 20 years after, it seems that a resolution of parliament may. Defeat comes strangely.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat that last paragraph:

Hitler's elite troops couldn't make us pull it down, but now, 20 years after, it seems that a resolution of parliament may. Defeat comes strangely.

I should like to leave it—and I am serious about this—with you and the house for contemplation.

Now, we come to item two of the subamendment. It reads:

Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?

I, personally, could accept this suggestion. I feel the majority of Canadians would accept it and I honestly believe it would be the best compromise and the one most acceptable to our people. The fly might contain a large fleur-de-lis, or maple leaf, or the designer might put forward a design where both appeared. We could then leave the union jack in the corner. This would please all those who are in favour of retaining the red ensign while at the same time indicating to the rest of the world the value of the great contributions which have been made to Canada's history by those of French origin. We could be proud of such a combination of symbols which would, at the same time, indicate the freedom under which we have always lived, and pay tribute to the heritage and tradition to which we have all grown accustomed and in which we believe.

On the evening of July 1 on parliament hill those present witnessed a sight which, I believe, will always live in the memory. At least, it will live in mine. It was a beautiful sight. There were some 66 red ensigns around the grounds whereas usually there are about 22. I admit the display caused me to become somewhat emotional, and I am not a bit ashamed of it. I was disturbed. I was frustrated. And I was angry at the people on the other side of this house who are trying to tear this flag down. It was a memorable setting, and to think there was any possibility of such a sight disappearing aroused strong feelings in many others beside myself.

I pass the garden of the provinces twice each day on the way to and from this building. I wish hon. members would go out there and take a look at the ten flags which are flying. There are three which have white backgrounds and insignia of some sort in the middle. I am sure all who saw them would have to agree that they cannot compare, in distinctiveness, with all the other flags flying there—the other seven flags. I do not say this with any disrespect for the three flags concerned and I certainly do not claim to have any aesthetic virtues. But I do claim that a flag with a white background is not good enough to be a flag of Canada.

I admit that certain people do not have the same feeling for the red ensign as I have. Some time in the future, when the present generation of older citizens has been replaced, it may be that some change will be more readily acceptable. I repeat that nothing could be more divisive than bringing forward this flag issue at the present time. It is one which strikes at the very roots of all of us.

I remember when audiences in Canada did not stand up to a man for the singing of "O Canada".

Today this is generally accepted, and one would say that such hesitancy would be an irreverence and unheard of. Only time has accomplished this meeting of minds across Canada. The time may come, and conceivably before too long, when much more unity of purpose can be achieved in coming to a decision on a new flag or even a modification of our present one.

[Mr. Monteith.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I started until at least five minutes after, but I should like to repeat one story to finish. While in discussion the other evening with the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) he mentioned a friend of his had been requested to ask the blessing at a banquet at which the hon. member was present. The words had impressed my colleague as they did me, and I trust he will not mind my passing those words on for the thoughtful consideration of the house. They were simply: "Oh Lord, help us to stand for something, so that we will not fall for everything".

Mr. Reg. Cantelon (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, after having listened to so many excellent speeches on this topic I am afraid this one may bore you very much. However, as you have listened to so many I hope you can put up for a little while with some of the same ideas repeated in my own language. When one is making a speech, which must be about the one hundredth speech on this topic by now, surely no one would expect any very great originality or very much new material, and I claim neither for this one. However, since this is an emotional and historical topic and one on which one might be expected to have an opinion, as well as one on which one's constituents also have opinions which, as members, we ought to respect, I should like to state what are my own views and what I conceive are those of my constituents.

It is quite certain that the original reaction of my constituents to this proposal to change the red ensign to a new and distinctive design was one of amazed disbelief. This point has been emphasized over and over again. Is it true that the Liberal party did in fact pledge itself to introduce a new flag within two years of taking office? If it is, it has certainly never been brought to the attention of my constituents. Nor, as has been pointed out on many occasions, was it brought to the attention of the constituents in eastern Canada. This fact was emphasized very much this afternoon by the Liberal member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), who stated that not a single advertisement placed by that party in the election of 1963 and published in Toronto had to do with a new flag. I doubt whether anyone in the west noticed that promise either. If they did I think they all thought this new and distinctive flag would merely be a new form of the red ensign. Or perhaps they thought it might be a formal declaration that the ensign would be adopted.

After all, there is no reason why they should think otherwise. In 1946 the Liberals had been in almost universal approval of the red ensign. When the order in council at the end of the second world war during the term of office of Mr. Mackenzie King proclaimed the red ensign, that flag then began to have an even more general acceptance than it had had before. It was flown from public buildings, from schools under provincial jurisdiction in my own province, and largely substituted for the union jack which had generally been flown up to that time.

In these circumstances one can see why the Liberal promise had no impact. One can see why it was thought that the implementation of that promise was to be merely a confirmation of what was becoming an established practice. This view is again confirmed by the comments of the hon. member for York-Humber this afternoon, whose documented facts are well worth remembering. There was shocked disbelief on the part of the great number of my constituents when they realized that the interpretation by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of a distinctive Canadian flag was one of a flag which had no element of familiarity or any historical significance. They reacted to this fact, as I said previously, with astonishment and then in many instances, I am sorry to say, with a great deal of anger. I received petitions containing literally hundreds of names requesting, and in some cases demanding, the retention of the red ensign. Demanding is a rather strong word in the English language, but it shows their belief that the red ensign has for many years been recognized as Canada's flag. Not one single letter of approval have I had from my constituents for the new maple leaf design.

Those of my constituents who are members of the Canadian Legion were among the strongest opponents of the new flag, which of course is quite understandable. Certainly they have a very strong belief that the red ensign is Canada's flag and that it was the flag under which they fought. No arguments from our Liberal friends can change that incontrovertible fact. I would not like to say that they fought for a flag, they fought for their country, our country. But to them that flag represented their country and they do not like to see it done away with and, rightly or wrongly, done away with at the whim of one man. He is unfortunately a man who has demonstrated that he is incapable of organizing the business of this parliament; a man who does not have the genius for compromise which is so essential to the leader of a party. He is said to have had training as a diplomat. Heaven help us if our present diplomats are no more conciliatory or appreciative of the effects of stubborn, intractable action than is the Prime Minister, with his stubbornness on this flag question. I suspect that at 68 years of age he is in fact years older than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who chronologically is one year his senior. This could account for the odd things he does, like saying to his supporters that they could have a free vote and then emphasizing that his government would stand or fall on the result of that vote. Of course, he has now modified that stand. However, irrational attitudes are characteristic of the aged.

In putting forward the views of my constituents I would like to quote from a letter I received from a resident of Eston on May 21. He says, amongst other things:

> Well, I am like a lot of the rest of the people of the west. I think the old flag should be left the way it has been for so long, as the Legion fought two world wars to protect it. So I hope the Conservative government—

—he was a little out there—

> —will see that this is put to a vote of the people of Canada and find out for sure what flag they want. I don't like this thing of Mr. Pearson shoving or showing off. I think there is lots of other things Mr. Pearson could be doing besides worrying about a new flag. I have never heard of the U.S. wanting to change their flag and I don't think Canada should either.

This is the general attitude of the letters I have received. Rightly or wrongly, nearly all opponents of the new distinctive flag refer to it as the "Pearson flag". To illustrate this point I should like to quote from a telegram I received on June 16 from Tompkins:

> Vote no on Pearson flag. Reasons, leaf design not distinctly maple. Jack absent.

I think these quotations emphasize very clearly what is the general attitude of my constituents. Those of the Legion who attended the recent national convention held in Winnipeg were incensed at the poor taste of the Prime Minister in making a controversial announcement to introduce a new flag at what they consider was a service of dedication and remembrance on a Sunday night. Why was not the announcement made at the opening session on Monday morning? This is the logical question they ask. And I ask the same question: Why had it to be done at that service, at what was a service of dedication? Did not the Prime Minister realize how controversial an announcement he was making? Is this just another example of his poor judgment?

The legionnaires present on that Sunday night were indignant at the attitude of the press, who magnified a small disturbance into a major incident. Why did they do so? Was it to make the Prime Minister a martyr to those nasty legionnaires? While the legionnaires admit that some disturbance was created by a few, and I think under some provocation as a result of the Prime Minister's announcement, they consider that very little disturbance did occur. They cite the fact that the Prime Minister was able to deliver his whole speech as proof of the good manners of their members. When we remember the ill-mannered boorishness of an organized demonstration against the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in Vancouver we can see that the legionnaires were well mannered by contrast and that the Prime Minister was bothered very little.

The Prime Minister has now precipitated into the political arena an issue which, in my humble view, time was solving for us. Very seriously his manner of attempting to substitute another flag for the one we recognized as ours was tactless and ill considered, and it was especially ill considered at a time when we have rumblings of separatism from Quebec. This is a time when the rest of Canada should not have its antagonisms aroused against Quebec, and yet this is just what this new flag is doing. Instead, we need a calm reappraisal of our attitudes and a sympathetic understanding of Quebec's problems. Surely the Prime Minister does not feel that his flag is going to contribute to such an understanding. It may please Quebec, but it will harden opposition to what may be Quebec's legitimate demands. From personal experience as the result of the few visits I have made home in the last four months I can confirm that this indeed is exactly what it is doing.

Whether he likes it or not there are many Canadians who think and say that this flag is just a sop to Quebec. I hasten to add, my party does not say this. I do not say this. I could not and would not, because if you will examine my name you will see that there is more than just a stirring of French ancestry in my past. It is true that may have been many hundreds of years ago, but I still have a very soft place in my heart for my French ancestry, and I resent any such thing being said. I would not accuse the Prime Minister of such political opportunism, but the accusation is being made by others. The Prime Minister could meet those charges with better grace if the flag had not been selected as it was selected by the cabinet and, hence, many people think by the Prime Minister himself. Indeed, the Prime Minister made it very plain that this flag was his personal choice. He alone then must accept the responsibility for the design and for the lack of judgment and foresight in introducing it now. There were many other ways in which a flag could have been selected and this suspicion avoided. Why was not an all party committee set up and either a single selection or a small variety of choices submitted to parliament. If this had been done parliament would have selected a useful compromise, no one could have called the flag a Pearson pennant, and it would not have been subjected to the ridicule which is now being applied.

I should like to quote from an article written by Eric Nicol which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of August 17, 1964. He stated:

> Mr. Pearson's design for a new Canadian flag—the one with three maple leaves rampant on a field of whiter wash—has been greeted by a variety of noises, mostly rude.
> That's the trouble with "making up" a flag. It's too arbitrary for most stomachs. We want a flag to have a background of tradition, history, battlefields and glory. The only way the P.M. is going to sell his flag is by leading a charge with it across parliament hill, inviting volleys of shot from a dug-in battery of Old Sweats, and going down with the bullet-shredded banner still in his hands.
> Then, if he likes, he can call an election.

I do not intend to read the whole article but I should like to read one or two more excerpts. Mr. Nicol continues:

> If Mr. Pearson is saying "Let's run it up the flag pole and see if anybody salutes," I think his design will run a poor second to the packaging of soapflakes.

The last paragraph concludes as follows:

> Today when Canadian soldiers go into action it is under the flag of the UN, and a very fine flag that is, too. Why we need a third flag, except to shine the spotlight on at Maple Leaf Gardens, is not clear.
> I fear that Mr. Pearson is going to be stung by his blue-tailed fly. And only one jack is apt to be jolly: J. Diefenbaker.

Now that the Prime Minister has forced us all into the unfortunate situation of accepting his personal flag or none at all, the hon. Leader of the Opposition proposes a way out. He proposes a referral to the people. It is a sensible way for an emotional issue like a flag to be decided. For this is purely an emotional issue, this has been emphasized over and over again, and one not to be decided by reason except as applied to the emotional overtones of the issue. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) was, I think, the last hon. member to emphasize this very clearly.

One of the government members attacking the Leader of the Opposition's amendment said that it was just a smokescreen, that one could just as reasonably settle the pension problem by a referendum. This is a stupid comment. Is the member too obtuse to recognize the difference? The Canada pension plan is not an emotional issue based on the preconceived and basic stereotypes of a person. A member of parliament, or anyone else for that matter, should be able to debate unemotionally, and apply intelligent discussion to arrive at a reasonable solution of a monetary and social problem like a pension. He ought to have, if he studies the matter, a better informed vote on the pension issue than most of his constituents. But the flag issue is not in that class. No amount of study will make an M.P. better informed than his constituents on a matter that has its only foundation in emotion. Here, no reasonable explanation will sway many of the people. In fact, the only appeal to reason that can be made would be the one that, rather than cause trouble one ought to accept the new distinctive flag. Not a very cogent reason, but one which is sure to affect those who do not have very strong opinions, and I am afraid there are not too many of them. Perhaps the Prime Minister knows this and is acting accordingly. But if there was a referendum, no accusations that this was a politically chosen flag would have validity as they do today. Surely the Canadian people have the right to a flag free from political stain. The only way they are likely to get it is by a referendum or by a unanimous decision from a parliamentary committee dealing with the matter, which seems to me the most reasonable way to attack the problem.

Then too, the people have a right to a better selection than the one which is suggested. The proposed flag is a bad selection for it does not have artistic appeal nor as it flies does it have what I, for want of a better term, will call the clarity or stand-out quality in the air that one recognizes in the red ensign, the union jack, the French tricolour and the American stars and stripes. As one hon. member pointed out this afternoon, if you go over to the west block and look at the commonwealth flags flying there you will see that they have this quality too. They are clear-cut and stand out well in the air.

To illustrate further what I mean, some weeks ago when the new flag began to flutter from car aerials in this area one week end I sailed through the Thousand islands. There the Canadian boats all flew the red ensign and the United States boats the stars and stripes. Against the background of the shimmering water and the deep green of the shores these flags stood out clearly. They had clarity. As we returned to Ottawa we saw again the three maple leaves flag. It was colourless and insipid compared with those we had just observed. It does not have clarity in the air. Half a mile away it fades completely into the background. One might almost say it camouflages itself.

I wondered as I looked at it why the government did not select, if they had to have a flag of this type, the A. Y. Jackson flag. In that flag the blue bars were placed at the top and bottom of the flag instead of at the ends, and the red maple leaves were placed in the centre. Consequently this flag flies much better. It can be seen because it stands out against the sky without the white break in the middle which destroys the design we are asked to accept. It certainly is a much better looking flag, and this we might expect since it was prepared by one who is recognized as one of the foremost artists that the dominion of Canada has produced.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the hon. member if he would—

Mr. Cantelon: Later.

Mr. Matheson: —vote in favour of the A. Y. Jackson recommendation?

Mr. Cantelon: Later, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Cantelon: The flag is not an issue on which an election should be fought. To do so will arouse strong feelings between various regions of the country and create wounds which will be a long time healing.

Personally I much prefer the red ensign. We have had it as long as I can remember. It has grown to symbolize our traditions of fair play, our heritage of civil justice and our type of parliamentary government in which we all take our part. In Canada our flag has also meant freedom for many who have come to our shores from other countries with less happy governments. It has meant equality of opportunity for these people so that in the House of Commons the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) can sit on the Conservative benches along with a sixth generation Irish Canadian like myself and a Dutch Canadian like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The peculiar genius of the British parliamentary system has long been the capacity to compromise. Like many other systems have done, our parliamentary system would have perished long ago without that capacity. Indeed, it was because they knew of the justice and equality that existed under that system that so many immigrants have come to Canada in the last hundred years, and still come today.

Our French Canadian friends have been indebted to that capacity to compromise, allied with justice and fair dealing too, because their rights and their equality have always been recognized in our constitution and in our government. All we have to do is to look at our history, at the terms of the Act of Union, the Quebec Act and the act of confederation, to recognize that that capacity for equality and respect for others is demonstrated in this country today.

Only the strong, secure in their own strength, are willing to compromise. I would hope that the leaders of all the political parties have the strength and that the first element of that compromise can be set up in the acceptance by all parties of the suggestion to submit this whole question to a committee of the house. Without this first step there can be no compromise. I should like to refer to an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of August 19 which is headed, "Concession No Surrender" and reads as follows:

> Politicians, the public, the press and the pundits of broadcasting hinder a solution of the flag issue by emphasis on "breakdowns" in negotiations, "escapes" for the leaders and the importance of "face saving". It is preposterous to argue that a concession is a surrender, or that to suggest an alternative is to be a quitter. The country is the loser if an impasse on the issue continues and divisions become so deep they cannot be bridged. The leaders, themselves largely responsible, should be thinking more of country than of party and those who encourage them in bitter conflict serve their country ill.

Without compromise the nation will be divided. I do not want to be a member of the parliament which does that. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for the amendment and the subamendment. I cannot vote for the resolution as it is today. It must be modified. It must be submitted to a committee for a compromise that can receive the approval of this house.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate I do not wish to speak at any great length unless, of course, I get carried away. We have heard cries of "carried" from the other side on numerous occasions. I wonder if they are aware of what we are discussing here. I was of the opinion we were speaking on the subamendment and I am quite sure they do not want the subamendment carried. They must be thinking about the main motion.

Over and over again during the course of the debate we have heard that we were elected to take the burden of decision. I think the last person who said that was the leader of the Creditiste party. I accept that, Mr. Speaker, but I will not agree that we were elected to decide on a new flag in this manner. As members we were not even asked our opinion. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) brought forth a design with an accept it or else attitude. This we might accept in a dictatorship or a republic but certainly not in a democracy.

As far as the design is concerned, many people seem to forget one fact. We have a flag which many of us cherish, and along with most citizens of countries outside of Canada, we feel it is a truly distinctive flag. If we felt that we had no flag, then almost any design would be acceptable.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Moore: Don't be in a hurry, you will get your chance. Surely the Prime Minister, with a better than average knowledge of psychology, could see that people will often accept gratefully something they have never had before, but will fight to the end to retain something they already cherish. To me, Mr. Speaker, the promise that the vote will now be free is commendable, but it has a bit of a hollow sound at this late date. We had this promise once before when it could have meant something, but it was withdrawn by the Prime Minister when he decided that course would help his cause. I believe I have said enough; I think you all have the message.

A referendum at this time would at least be one way of finding out how the people of Canada feel. It has been suggested that a committee might be another method. Why the insistence by the government that there must be a time limit on the debate on the findings of the committee? Certainly if the committee came up with a decision the members would accept it with very little debate. Perhaps I am of too suspicious a nature, Mr. Speaker, this attempt to limit free debate bothers me a bit; I do not like it. I should like to make something clear right now: I do not look upon this proposed flag as a concession to the people of Quebec. I look upon it as a concession to the Prime Minister. Before coming to Ottawa in 1962 I had met very few Canadians from Quebec. Since then I have been impressed by their friendliness, their ingrained politeness and their moderation when controversial matters have arisen. Forgive me if I say there are one or two exceptions, perhaps. I would not presume to dictate to those Canadians what designs or emblems they should expect as a contribution to the make-up of our flag. I do reserve, however, the right to stress my own feelings in this regard and those of millions of other Canadians. We feel that those emblems which mean a great deal to us must be retained. This is why we are carrying on this debate. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that not reason enough?

I should like to read a paragraph from a letter I received. It is not from one of my constituents, but I think it covers a very important point and possibly shows the feelings of some people in Canada. I quote:

> Friends and relatives who have been motoring from the eastern seaboard of the U.S. via Ontario and Manitoba told us last month that they had never seen so many red ensigns flying from every city, town, village, farm, barn and hamlet before. Other relatives who have just returned to Winnipeg from a motor trip to B.C. via Alberta, Saskatchewan, and of course, Manitoba, said that they had questioned many people on the way and where they stopped, and everyone was strongly in favour of the red ensign. All who did the questioning were young (thirtyish) university graduates with responsible positions and much common sense, so I feel their report carries some weight.

For those who would wipe the union jack or any other connection with Britain from our flag, I would say this—and I have no English or French blood in my veins but a mixture of three other races: To me, the union jack on our flag has no connection with imperialism, subjugation, slavery or any such thing. The very thought of this is ridiculous. It signifies only that our system of government is patterned after the British system which took possibly a thousand years to evolve. Our system of justice is also patterned after the British system. Is this not why millions of immigrants have come to Canada, because they realized they would receive the fair treatment here which that flag has come to symbolize? Otherwise, they could have gone to the south sea islands where, perhaps, the climate is better.

It is not possible for me to say how all my constituents feel on the flag issue. It is not possible to talk to everyone in an area comprising many thousands of square miles, especially when we spend the recess in the House of Commons. Since the government has adopted the tactic of using controversial legislation as a club—they say, pass it or no recess—we are not likely to see much of our constituents. Unlike some of my colleagues, I am afraid I cannot say that every letter I have had has protested the maple leaf flag and favoured the red ensign. I can say truthfully that all but one have, and I have received well over 100 letters in that vein.

I feel that now I should read a few excerpts from these letters. I shall be brief and I have tried to choose those that deal with the amendment in question. This is the first one:

> When I first went to school in Canada I was taught that the red ensign was the Canadian flag. It is one of the most beautiful flags in the world and has such a wonderful history behind it that I cannot understand the mentality of any true Canadian that wants to replace it. We do not need any other flag but it; it covers everything.
> Please do everything to keep it. Nothing could replace it.

Here is another one:

> I feel so strongly about the flag issue, I could scream.

Obviously, this one is from a lady.

> It is only the thin edge of the wedge. If it passes, what next? The Queen? I feel Mr. Pearson is "playing politics" with the issue. I deplore such tactics. One does not just dump a flag and all it stands for—it is our very heritage. Fight for it.

This is the next letter I wish to quote:

> Because I have very strong feelings regarding the flag issue I felt the best thing to do would be to express these ideas to you, as our member from Wetaskiwin. Please let us keep the flag we have grown to love and respect. Let us not just take a piece of cloth and put anything that may come to mind on it and fly it across our country and expect people to love and respect it.
> We have grown up with our present flag. All the traditions and memories associated with this flag cannot be wiped out overnight and thrown aside. These memories and traditions that weave themselves into our country's life are very important to the morale and greatness of our country. If we must make it more distinctive, let us add to it, not take away.

This is a statement with which I agree.

> The flag is for all our country, not parliament, so all the people should voice their feelings.

In other words, this lady is in agreement with having a plebiscite. I think that points out very well what some of my constituents feel. Here is a short excerpt from another letter:

> It must be tiring to be battling away for ideals in the heat and humidity of an Ottawa summer, but it is proof that a large number of our M.P.'s really and truly care for their lovely Canada and its future. Don't ever give up the fight.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that possibly the older people in Canada do not want to give up their flag but the young people are all for a change. During my last trip home I was interested in talking to a girl in grade five. She said that in her grade they had a vote on the flag question. In other words, a question was asked, do you favour maintaining the red ensign or do you favour the new maple leaf flag? This was the result of that vote, and it surprised even me. There were two who favoured the new flag and all the others in this school room were strongly in favour of retaining the red ensign. This gives you some idea of what some of the young people in my area feel.

I should like to make a short comment on the subamendment. In a spirit of compromise, we may have to modify the red ensign. If that is the case, it is covered by the second question. I believe this situation was explained very well by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith). This afternoon, while listening to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) I heard him refer to the flags flying in front of the west block for the commonwealth conference on education. If I remember correctly he said that some of these delegates could not understand what the fight was all about. They had their distinctive flags and they could not see why we did not want one. In looking over those flags, I noticed that four of them, in addition to the flags of Britain and Canada, contained a union jack. I wonder what the peoples of those countries thought? Did they think that they did not have a distinctive flag? Did they also think they should get rid of the union jack?

If I remember correctly, he also mentioned that we should accept the symbols given to us by George V and Queen Victoria, in other words, the three maple leaves on one stem. It was my understanding that that was the reason for getting rid of the union jack and all other symbols—because they pertained to Britain; but here they are using this as an excuse and they want to adopt the symbols given to them by the British. I fail to follow this type of logic.

One of the reasons given for the choice of the maple leaves was that the army adopted them and used the insignia of the maple leaf. I, along with many thousands of Canadians, wore the fleur-de-lis proudly in my buttonhole for many years, as a boy scout. Is not this a possible reason for adopting the fleur-de-lis as a symbol. One argument seems as sensible as the other. If this gentleman is so sure that all the ethnic groups want a new flag, and I think he said that, why is he so worried about a plebiscite? I think he is in for a surprise.

The three maple leaves are not too distinctive because I have seen many Esso flags flying over service stations, and under some weather conditions they are very similar. One constituent of mine suggested to me that we have a five cent stamp with three maple leaves on it and now we are in danger of getting a five cent flag with the same three maple leaves on it.

Further, the one leaf design is not too distinctive either, and is not easily distinguishable from the Supertest pennant. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that both these companies have vast quantities of gasoline and therefore can afford to have a white flag and keep it well washed.

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I find it a little difficult to rise and speak on the flag issue after listening to so many eloquent speeches during the last few days, but I am taking this opportunity to speak as the representative of Assiniboia constituency because the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) extended an invitation to all members of parliament to speak on this matter.

At noon today I went outside my office in the west block and noticed all the commonwealth flags in front of the building, and I can truthfully say I believe any Canadian or any member of the House of Commons would be afraid to stand up and say that we do not have a beautiful flag in the red ensign. At the beginning of my speech I would like to repeat a few words which the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns) used in his opening remarks the other day, when he said that a nation should be proud to unfurl its new flag and this should be a time of excitement and enthusiasm. I feel if we were to have a new flag unfurled at present this would not be a time of rejoicing after all the controversy there has been over the present flag.

I have with me a copy of the Leader-Post of Wednesday, August 19, which had a report dealing with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) and the headline says, "Sharp urges P.C.'s to end Filibuster." I do not consider that by taking part in this debate I am filibustering, because I feel that the Conservative party today stands alone in trying to save the Canadian red ensign as our national flag.

A short while ago the Prime Minister said there were six important items that had to be attended to by parliament before a summer recess. If my memory serves me correctly, we are now on the sixth piece of legislation, and therefore members of parliament are dwelling on the flag issue on their own time in lieu of a recess. This brings to my mind a cartoon I saw not so long ago in the London Free Press where it showed a member of parliament with a shackle around his leg, tied up outside one of the windows of the parliament buildings, and the caption at the top read, "Hello Voter, Hello Nation, I'm in Camp Concentration." It showed all the tourists going by with those big carriers on top of their cars, with a little pup trailer behind, all going over the hill and out to the lakes, while we were sitting here. I feel we are doing this on behalf of the citizens of Canada who feel that we should retain the Canadian red ensign.

One of my reasons for taking part in this debate is because I believe a plebiscite is necessary on the flag issue. I am one of those who feel that whatever flag is Canada's we must all be proud of it and be proud to fly it, whether it be the Canadian red ensign as it is today, or another design which is the choice of the people; but like most Canadians I do not like to be handed an ultimatum, as we were in the case of the maple leaf flag. Under these circumstances I feel it is absolutely necessary to have a plebiscite in order that people all across Canada can have a voice in this matter, and in a democracy such as we have in Canada we realize that the people will accept the decision of a plebiscite.

I have also felt for a long time that the whole flag question could have been settled in a manner by which it would never have reached the point of disunity that exists at present. Had the Prime Minister called the parties together and said, "We want a modification of our new flag; you make the decision as to the type, but this must be settled," I feel it could have been settled by a certain amount of compromising in all parties. I realize that this may have been achieved, partly, in the last few days. The only regret I have is that the move toward agreement was so late in starting; too much feeling may have been engendered, one way or the other. If the present government continues to feel we must accept the proposed flag, then I think the adoption of the subamendment providing for a plebiscite is the only course I could support, providing, as it does, a way in which the citizens of Canada can express their wishes and offering the only means by which they will accept a change of flags in our lifetime.

I should like to draw the attention of the house now to a series of quotations, all of which have a bearing on this issue. First, from an article which appeared in the Toronto Star on May 20, 1964:

> As the drinks were served and the newspapermen nibbled on sandwiches, Mr. Pearson brought out several flag designs on cardboards, selected one with a cluster of three maple leaves and two blue bands and placed it on the mantlepiece as his choice. He said he was prepared to have the government stand or fall on the maple leaf flag. The Prime Minister was careful however to make it clear that the flag on the mantle was his personal choice.

Then, as recorded at page 3164 of Hansard of May 12, 1964, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) stated:

> When the time comes to submit the decision of the government in this matter to the House of Commons, I would hope every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates, and that there would be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense.

The Toronto Star of May 20, 1964, also had this to say:

> One week later he stated he was prepared to have the government stand or fall on the maple leaf flag.

Then, only last week, we heard it had been agreed that there is to be a free vote in this house on the flag issue. If there is to be a free vote, the best indication how members of parliament are thinking on this subject would be for all of them to get up and express their opinions regardless of which political party they support. In this way we would have an expression of the feelings of all members before the house. I believe the majority of the people of Canada would feel that some sort of justice had been extended to the minority, whichever it might be. All members would have been allowed an opportunity to express themselves in a democratic way. I realize that majorities have rights in our country, too.

This afternoon the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Wadds) referring to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) said there would be some tears shed on one side or the other. I think that is true. But I am completely confident that if this matter were placed in the hands of the people of Canada they would accept a decision reached as a result of a plebiscite. I see an hon. member on the other side shaking his head; presumably he does not agree with me. But I say the only reason the present government is against the amendment supporting a plebiscite is that they know, themselves, that the majority of the people do not want the new flag design, and they fear the result of such a plebiscite.

I have had several discussions with hon. members on the other side of the house who have spoken in favour of a distinctive flag which has nothing to do with the past. I see one such hon. member present in the house this evening. I asked him: Are you not proud of your name? And he should be. I asked him: Are you not proud of your parents, your grandparents; do you not feel there is some tie between yourself and the past? I will not put on record the reply he gave me. But I feel very strongly that we do have ties with our families and our grandparents and we also have these same ties with Canada and our motherland, regardless of whether we come from England, Ireland, Scotland or France or wherever it might be. I do not think there is a person alive who does not feel some loyalty for his mother country.

I am one of those who are not ashamed of Canada's past in any way. Nor am I ashamed of the future. And I have every hope and confidence that Canada's future will be bright. I may add that I believe the sooner the people of Canada get back to having a majority government and two major political parties the better, for the biggest part of our problems will then be solved.

I should like to say a word or two about the word "distinctive". "Distinctive", properly used, means "distinguishing". As applied to the red ensign, it means that the latter is readily distinguished as Canada's flag. As no other country flies the red ensign, and as it has become known all over the world for over half a century, it is Canada's distinctive flag. The union jack on it signifies that we are part of the commonwealth—which we are indeed, in spite of the wishful thinking of some segments of people in Canada.

The true meaning of a free vote in parliament is one in which the members are free to vote as they wish, but in which the life of the government is not at stake. To say, as the Prime Minister does, that the coming vote is a free vote but that the life of the government is at stake is therefore a misuse of the word "free" as applied to a vote in parliament. Again, I realize the Prime Minister has now modified that position and has stated that we are to have a vote in the House of Commons which, even if the motion were defeated, would not mean the fall of the government.

I can truthfully say I would regret very much going to the people in a general election in Canada on an issue such as the flag issue.

I have here an article which I believe all members of parliament received. It is called "Remembrance Day" and I should like to quote three paragraphs. It begins:

> Canada was not built in a straightforward, cut and dried manner, but rather has suffered cuts and bruises in its growing up. We are not a new country without a flag. Many countries have taken centuries to accomplish what we have done in 97 years—strangely enough much of it is under the ensign. During these years of growth Canada has always tried to make the world (as her men are serving today in many parts of the globe) a better place for all of us in which to live...
> What surely could be more uniting than when persons who have worked side by side—Indians, French, English, Negro, ethnic and Jew, to build this great country in one century; who fought, shed their blood and immortalized the bloody beaches, trenches and battle fields of the world so that we might have what we now have—this opportunity of debate and personal incentive and independence. All this so that the ensign might continue to fly with pride over this land.
> Certainly after having paid the greatest price—death—is this in itself not enough to make the ensign official. Or was this, the greatest of human sacrifices, meaningless and wasted. The least we can do now is show our humble gratitude, reverence and respect. Let us leave the ensign alone and make it official.

If we as members must decide, let us have a choice by getting together on three or four preferred designs with the understanding that we must come up with a flag of which we can all be proud, and settle this issue like grown up men and women in a free country.

I have here an article—

Mr. Byrne: Have you anything else?

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): This article is from the Globe and Mail for August 12, 1964. I think this article is a comedy on the flag issue in Cyprus and it relates to the current issue in Canada. If I may I should like to quote part of this article. It is headed: "Canadians can't flee flag fuss", and is by Peter Buckley.

> Any Canadian who hopes to escape the great flag controversy at home would be well advised to avoid Cyprus.
> Flags in Cyprus approach the level of a national mania, second perhaps only to a day or two of shooting in the mountains.
> In the Turkish sectors of the divided island, the question is straightforward. The only flag to be flown is the flag of Turkey—white crescent and star on a red background.
> Well, almost straightforward. Since the flags sometimes fly for extended periods, the decisive red field tends to bleach in the sun to a pale pink.
> Then it becomes difficult to tell the Turkish national flag from the flag of the red crescent society, the Moslem equivalent of the red cross, which flies a white flag with a red crescent over its food dispensaries and other buildings in the Turkish sector. The weather tends to make that flag, too, look pinkish in time.

Then it goes on to speak about the Greek flag.

It is in the Greek Cypriot areas, however, that the confusion hits a fine peak.

There is the Greek-Greek flag, the Greek-Cypriot flag, and the flag of Cyprus.

The flag flown outside the Greek embassy here, for example, is a white cross on a blue field. In the centre of the cross is a gold crown. That, says the embassy, is the official flag of Greece.

If common sense were the sole guiding force, the official flag of Greece would be the most logical banner for Greek-Cypriots to wave in demonstration of their affection for mother Greece—the way the Turkish-Cypriots wave the flag of Turkey.

Instead, the Greek-Cypriots prefer the flag of the royal Greek navy. That flag is a series of blue and white stripes, with a blue and white cross in the corner—a design vaguely reminiscent of the stars and stripes.

For buildings of a public nature in Greek-controlled areas—historic monuments, police stations, government office buildings, and the occasional Greek Orthodox church—there is the genuine and official flag of Cyprus.

The situation being what it is, the official flag is among the rarest to be seen. Some Cypriots have been known to regard this as a blessing because the flag of Cyprus is the result of compromise.

The article continues but I should like to read only the last part.

Since the peaks so often look alike—and since the Greek and Turkish Cypriots themselves are scarcely distinguishable one from the other—a partisan climbing the hills for a day of rifle practice could become one of the rare battle casualties if there weren't a flag to guide him to the right camp.

The entire situation has been even further confused, of course, by the arrival of the United Nations.

Since the six national contingents in the UN force—Canada, Britain, Denmark, Finland, Ireland and Sweden—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. An hon. member is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I am very interested by what the hon. member tells us about the flags of Cyprus, Turkey and Greece, but I wonder whether he intends to add other questions to the referendum proposal now under study.

In my opinion, he should keep to the resolution, as he is supposed to do under standing orders.

[Text]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Oh, you are so funny.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this article says:

The UN banner—

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is asking for a ruling on the point he has raised. The only thing I can say is that I really do not think it is a point of order. I have been listening to the hon. member very closely and with interest, and it seems to me that this is part of his argument.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion, this article says:

The arrival of a new flag to replace the red ensign over the Canadian camps, if it ever occurs, will only add a small ripple to the sea of confusion here.

I went home over the week end and one of my constituents asked me how we expect the people in Cyprus to be able to settle their issues when we as members of the House of Commons cannot settle the flag issue. She felt we were asking for a pretty big job to be done by our troops and the rest of the members of the United Nations force in Cyprus.

I feel in respect of this issue that members on all sides should have respect for the feelings of others, and that it will be necessary for all races and parties to realize that this may mean a compromise. I am sure that all hon. members of parliament can and will rise to the situation. I say that this is not a time to find fault without good reason. This is a time when serious men should reason together.

When I was travelling through Winnipeg recently I was discussing the flag issue with several people. One gentleman said to me that the only flags of the new type he had seen flying in Winnipeg were being flown on United States tourist cars travelling in Canada. Apparently the people of the United States have purchased a great many of these flags—made in Japan, I am informed. They think the proper thing to do when visiting Canada is to buy a new maple leaf flag and fly it during their visit to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): I suggest to the hon. members down in the corner who are doing the clapping, that as a loyal Canadian, after we hold a plebiscite and find that the people of Canada favour the adoption of this new flag, I will honour it. I feel however that the people of Canada should make this decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Would the hon. member allow a question?

[Text]

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have only a few minutes of my time left and, as I said before, I should like to hear all hon. members speak on this flag issue and invite the hon. member to make his speech later on.

An editorial appearing in the Toronto Telegram on Saturday August 22, states:

> The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.

I believe that is good reasoning and the proper way to settle this issue.

I am not going to read the whole editorial, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to read two or three excerpts under the heading "Too Big For Compromise". The first excerpt reads:

> It is far too important to be settled by parliamentary compromise...
> It has been said that a plebiscite would be divisive. This is nonsense. Nothing could have been more divisive than the Prime Minister's introduction of the issue as a matter of high priority.

The article then continues:

> Perhaps Mr. Pearson fears the outcome of such a testing of public opinion. Letters and petitions expressing determination to retain the ensign have been impressive.
> There is no reason why this obstructive and divisive bill should not be shelved pending a reference to the people. There is no urgency. Most Canadians outside Quebec appear to be quite satisfied with the flag we have now. In Quebec the matter is of little importance as there they fly the Laurentian flag with its white cross and fleur-de-lis.
> Until Mr. Pearson softens his stand, the opposition is justified in continuing a modified filibuster.

Again they have used the word "filibuster", with which I disagree. The article then continues:

> As distasteful as such devices are in parliament, no other method seems practical in the face of Mr. Pearson's stubbornness.
> The way out of the parliamentary impasse is clear: a plebiscite to end the long debate and to allow parliament to get on with more important legislation.

Mr. Speaker, an editorial appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 2, 1964 under the heading "Collision Course". I do not intend to read the whole editorial, but it does point out four errors the Prime Minister made. No. 1 was made when he promised a Winnipeg audience of foreign-language newspaper editors that a Liberal government would produce a distinctive Canadian flag within two years.

The second error was committed when the Prime Minister announced even before he had made a final decision on a design that he would take the House of Commons vote on his proposed flag as one of confidence.

His third error was committed when he told the Commons that it would have a full-scale debate on the flag, with this issue taking absolute precedence over everything else on the agenda.

Error number four occurred when the Prime Minister presented the Commons with a resolution endorsing not one Canadian flag but two. Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on but I feel there is little point in putting a good deal more on the record that has already been printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, I have another article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Thursday, June 18, 1964 under the by-line of John Walker, of the Southam news service. This article refers to the survival of the maple leaf. Mention is made in the article of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), and it states:

> John Matheson...who advised Prime Minister Pearson on the adoption of the central three maple leaf symbol in the new flag, told the house Wednesday:
> "Some people say this flag is a concession to the French Canadians. But they are part of us, part of Canada...
> Every member of a family should be respected. The distress of one is the distress of all.
> It is not a concession to do what is just and kind—"

Mr. Speaker, as we all know, and as has been pointed out many times, the maple tree actually grows in only about 5 or 6 per cent of the area of Canada. I would have no personal objection to the adoption of a flag embodying a maple leaf design as a compromise to the red ensign, if a parliamentary committee could come to a majority decision, or if it were clearly shown by a plebiscite that this was the choice of the people. I do feel with all sincerity and respect for hon. members from the province of Quebec, and others who feel we should get rid of the union jack on the red ensign, that that is not a majority view. I do not agree with that idea but feel that the union jack should be retained. I know other hon. members feel the coat of arms, or the entire red ensign, should be replaced by a flag with a maple leaf design. We are grown-up men and women and should be able to sit down and settle this issue in a businesslike manner so that we can then carry on with important business of parliament. I am sure if we follow this course everyone will be satisfied, provided this is done in a democratic way.

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, when it became apparent early in this session that the government intended to proceed with the introduction of a resolution that would lead to the identification of a flag as the distinctive flag of Canada, whether it was the Pearson flag or whether it was some other choice it was not unreasonable then for members of the house in every party to expect that the government, before introducing the resolution, would have first shown some indication that it was prepared to assess the feelings of members of the house and the people at large. But the government did not do this.

It has become apparent from what was said earlier today by a supporter of the government that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) consulted only a very few of his own colleagues and supporters. This of course is the very reason why we have been for some time, are now and probably will be for some time to come engaged in a debate on the resolution and the amendments thereto. For if it is our function here, as apparently the government expects it shall be, to designate a national symbol to represent Canada in the eyes of its own people and in the eyes of people throughout the world, and that we shall either confirm the symbol we have or find a new one, then it is only fair and equitable to every shade of opinion and to each member of the house that there should have first been a consultation and ascertainment of what would be both desirable and acceptable. But that has not been done and there is no sign it is going to be done.

What we in the Conservative party have been endeavouring to do and are endeavouring to do now is to provide the government and its supporters with an opportunity to reconsider their position, to consider whether they are following the best and wisest course, the unifying course for Canada in this issue. I do not think there is any doubt that the course the government has embarked upon has been entirely unwise and that it has failed in its purpose if that purpose was to provide a symbol with some element of national identity around which we could unite and which would draw us together.

I think the government has made a very great error in assuming that there was a tremendous desire for such an extraordinary and total change in the flag of Canada. Perhaps it is true. Certainly there has been discussion for many years in many parts of Canada to the effect that we should in some way make the flag of Canada more distinctive from the point of view of our Canadianism, our history and traditions. I did not feel this was a necessary thing to do but I know there are Canadians who did, and who do.

If the government had decided that this feeling was really strong and if it had been prepared to respond to this feeling with some form of action that would have determined how deep rooted the feeling was, how great the desire was and what symbol of unity in the form of a flag would have proved most acceptable to the majority of people, then we should not have been able to fault the government for having moved in this direction. But we can and we do for the simple reason that if there was validity in what the government felt, it destroyed the validity of its position by the manner in which it acted because it did not ask the people of Canada to express their opinion before it brought a design for a flag into the house. It imposed a design, and not even a design of the whole of the party in power. It sought to impose on the house and on its own supporters a design of a small group. We do not know how many, but from what we heard from a government supporter today we are led to suspect that they must have represented a very small proportion of the total of government supporters. Instead of bringing before the house as a symbol of national unity a flag embodying the elements of unity, we have had thrust upon the house a symbol of division and we are still trying to live with it.

This criticism can fairly be made, and I only make it because I believe it is a justifiable and justified criticism. But there is a way out for the government. I think the Prime Minister recognized last Friday that his position was no longer acceptable and no longer in the interests of Canadian unity when he took the step of indicating that when the vote comes it will be a free vote. But what is the purpose of a free vote on a symbol that the people do not want? There is no purpose in it whatever.

I am not suggesting I can say to the house that the majority of the people do not want this symbol, but I suspect that is true. A great many of my friends in the house also suspect it is true and I believe there are members on the government side who suspect it is true. Consequently, if there is this suspicion in the house now to any substantial extent, then steps must be taken to eliminate the possibility of a dreadful mistake if we impose this flag on Canada; because if we do, the emotions of the people of Canada and their relationships with one another will be torn asunder, particularly so far as the racial groupings in the nation are concerned. If it leads to a division, then any move to accept this flag is a fatal move in the life of Canada. If not fatal, the wound will run deep and blood will flow long and the nation will take a long time to recover its strength afterward. This must not happen.

There is no necessity for a flag to be imposed. If there is any danger that one is about to be imposed, we have a way out. We can simply provide the people with an opportunity to express their opinions about the ensign, the flag which has represented Canada and by which Canada has been known throughout most of its history, if not always in its present form then in evolution to the present form. As a native born Canadian whose ancestors have been here for several generations, although not for as many generations as the ancestors of others in the house, this flag is to me the flag of Canada, because of the place of my birth, the environment in which I grew up and the traditions to which I am unquestionably attached. There is no doubt in my mind about this. But I realize there are others who do not have this feeling as strongly as I do and if they are in the majority they should be provided with the opportunity to demonstrate that fact. If they are not in the majority, if the majority of Canadians still wish to retain the national flag under which they have lived their lives and served the nation in peace and in war, then they should be provided an opportunity to indicate that fact.

After all, there has been a great deal of talk, Mr. Speaker, about service on foreign battlefields under the red ensign. It is not just those who served Canada in the armed forces in world war I, world war II or any other international engagement in which this country has taken part, who have served Canada under that flag. Every soul who has lived his life in Canada, raised his family in Canada, served his country in any capacity, however great or small, has served it under that flag. His attachment to that symbol, to that flag, is equally strong. Therefore, sir, it should be discovered, first, how strongly this desire runs in the nation for a change and whether, in fact, a change at this time would be or could be a unifying factor or whether it would be more likely a dividing factor. There is the justification for a plebiscite.

If the plebiscite is rejected—and there are those who feel it is a cumbersome method, would take too long or cost too much—then there is the parliamentary committee. A plebiscite could preserve the unity of the nation on this question. However, if a parliamentary committee were decided upon, the members of this house from all parties could gather in the less fervid atmosphere of a committee, away from the pressures of debate on this floor, away from the attentions of the press and public, to examine the possibilities of the various courses that could be followed. They could endeavour to discover what the people of Canada are thinking. If necessary, that committee could travel from coast to coast holding hearings and calling the people before them to give evidence. If this is necessary, then let us do that. Somehow or other, there must be consultation. There must be some more effective means found of ascertaining what this action we are expected to take will mean in terms of our national harmony, of our national existence.

It need not prove that I am right when I indicate my attachment to the ensign. It may not prove that the government is right. However, there may be some common ground between the two positions that would be acceptable to all Canadians. If the government persists in going ahead on the course it is following, it will never know until it is too late. After this house endorses this resolution establishing the proposed flag as the flag of Canada, then that is the end of the matter. This becomes the flag of Canada whether or not the people want it, whether they are prepared to live with it or not, whether it divides the nation or not. I do not believe it is up to us to take that gamble. This is no ordinary piece of legislation that we have been asked to pass. If there is a change of government there will be no opportunity to pass amending legislation in connection with the flag, as we would if this were an ordinary piece of legislation which a succeeding government might find unsatisfactory to it—unless, of course, we are going to adopt party flags, and have rotational flags that change every time the government changes. This would be about as ridiculous as the situation we are facing now, when we are presented with a flag design that does not meet with the wishes of the majority of the people in their desire for a national symbol.

This debate has been going on for some time, and as I say it will likely go on a good deal longer unless the government recognizes that there is no necessity to thrust this proposed design down the throats of the members of this parliament. There is no necessity to take that gamble. There is not necessity to risk a mistake. The government can take action that will either confirm or deny the validity of its position. Equally, it could prove to the opposition whether or not it has been following a valid course in the eyes of the people. In my judgment, the course upon which we are now set leaves no alternative to us but to put forward every argument that we can, those of us who feel as I do, that this motion should not come to a vote; that this motion is a mistake and the ensign still represents the flag desired by the majority; that if a change were desirable, the majority would still prefer a flag which evolved from the ensign and which retained some of the elements of it. Since we feel this way, we cannot allow the government to secure the adoption of the resolution which may have far reaching and damaging effects on the structure and the harmony of the nation.

I come back to my original suggestion, sir. The thing that is so difficult to understand is that this issue, of all issues, should have given rise to so much antagonism and bitterness in this house, that there should be suggestions that those of us who have a certain affinity for the ensign are colonially minded or that the proponents of the three maple leaf design should eliminate all our Canadian heritage and tradition, and that this sort of thing should become the daily currency of discussion in this house and in the exchange of ideas between Canadians. It is a tragedy that this should have happened, because I am sure no member in this house who discussed this matter two years ago would have assumed that when this question came to the floor of this house for debate there would be anything but a substantial degree of unanimity amongst members, regardless of party. They would have assumed there would be no partisan division, no major fragmentation of the nation. There would be some basis worked out carefully, after consultation, and there would be common ground both in the house and in the nation.

This has not been done. This debate is evidence of that, and it would never have taken place if that had been done. This is the charge we are making against the government. No effort was made to create an atmosphere, either in the house or in the country, conducive to the acceptance of this distinctive national flag which would, in fact, represent the Canadian nation to all its people and to all the people in the world wherever that flag was flown.

So, sir, I would ask the government and its supporters to realize that there is an opportunity to change the course of this divisive debate. There is a means by which unity can be found on this question, but it is now in the hands of the government members to decide, in consultation with their leaders and in particular with the Prime Minister, whether that course is to be followed or not.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we are stalled on a flag debate of the government's choosing and, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Watson) pointed out, we are taking up our recess to defend the right of each Canadian to have some say in what flag he shall adopt as the symbol for his country.

From time to time we have asked the government to introduce legislation which its members cried for in 1963. They said at that time legislation was necessary arising out of the royal commissions on transportations and on magazines, and they forced an election because they thought this legislation was not coming forth. For the past two months we on this side have been asking them to bring on this legislation. We will deal with it and in due course pass it, as we have done already in some instances. But today we are bogged down on a resolution introduced by a very stubborn government which is bent on ramming the three maple leaf design down the throats of members of this house and of all Canadians.

The three maple leaf design is the design of the Prime Minister, and perhaps of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson). I do not know just what part the latter played in it, although on this particular issue the newspapers give him credit for being the man behind the man. Now we hear some talk that there is to be a free vote and that the trained seals over there—

Mr. Fisher: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): A noted writer who is also a member of this house does not like those words "trained seals". He is entitled to his opinion, but hon. members opposite have been very active in this debate by simply sitting in their seats and making a lot of noise when they thought it was appropriate. However, very few of them have risen to defend their Prime Minister and to say why Canadians should accept his design.

The Prime Minister has said he will give them a free vote, but I do not quite see a bunch of swallows flying forth flapping their wings freely. As recorded in Hansard of May 12 the Prime Minister said that when the time came to submit the government's decision on this matter to the House of Commons he hoped every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictated, and that there would be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense.

Later, on about May 20, he stated he was prepared to have his government stand or fall on the flag issue. He considered the problem in the interval and realized that he had better whip the boys into line. Maybe a few of them told him about their problems with their constituents, and from May 20, almost for three months, he has had them toeing the mark. Now he has turned them loose, hoping we would think they could go back to their original thoughts on the flag. They were sold a bill of goods on May 20. They accepted a bill of goods on May 20, and therefore the announcement of a free vote at this time means very little because they cannot go back on the words they have spoken to their constituents during the last few months.

We in the opposition have a duty to perform. At the very outset we realized a flag debate would be one in which very many people would have numerous ideas to put forward with regard to Canada's flag. Now we have heard from people all across Canada on the proposed design of the Prime Minister, and it was our duty to show the opposition that was evident in the country with regard to this design. We have done just that and we may continue to do just that.

We also hear some talk that the government is prepared to accept the one maple leaf design put forward by the New Democratic party, but we do not know whether this is a fact or not.

An hon. Member: Would you accept it?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Many things enter into making a choice. It depends on what colour it is. There would be great similarity between one red maple leaf on a white background, and the red cross. I think it is our duty to know what the issues are. This business of picking up by way of the grapevine that the government is prepared to accept one maple leaf is not good enough. We are all grown men and women and should be able to realize that the opposition in the country to the three maple leaves makes a compromise necessary.

There are many divided countries in the world. This afternoon one member mentioned Cyprus. British Guiana is another country in which there is strife. There is also strife in the Middle East, and considerable strife in our neighbouring country to the south, but if the cards are on the table surely we as grown men and women should be able to compromise, to sit down in a committee of 10 or 11—it does not matter how many—to go into it with the sole purpose of coming out with a solution, and be prepared to compromise. Surely in such a committee we could arrive at a suitable flag, whether it has one maple leaf or three, whether it has the union jack or not. Surely we have reached the stage in this debate where we know a compromise is necessary.

I always thought the Prime Minister was a great diplomat, and I have been told that diplomacy is the art of compromise. I only hope some of that diplomacy could rub off in this house so that we could take action toward a compromise. The committee in 1945 which studied this flag question had something like 2,400 designs presented to it and I believe the members of that committee really considered this problem and worked on it. They tried to reach a decision which all Canada would accept and honour. Some 25 members approved the recommendations of the committee and one was opposed. I think this represented a tremendous effort on the part of that committee to reach a solution. Perhaps the same could be accomplished at the present time.

This should have been taken into account by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) before he put forward his three maple leaf design and said: Accept this, or else. This issue has been talked about for so many years in Canada that it should have been realized, particularly by those on the government side, that if the committee to which I have referred could not reach a conclusion, the matter ought now to be placed in the form of a referendum and sent to the people for decision. I am not saying this should be done immediately. But it might be done whenever the next election is held. There would be no significant extra cost about asking Canadian citizens to make two X's on ballot forms, one in relation to the election and the other with regard to their flag preference. This would constitute a relatively simple solution to this problem and I think it is the solution which all Canadians would accept. In addition, it would not take nearly so much of the time of this house to ratify the result of such a plebiscite. An amendment and a subamendment have been moved. In the subamendment, four suggestions have been put forward. I think a flag is something which should embody our tradition and history, a symbol which all Canadians are prepared to accept. If it is evident that any major portion of our country is not prepared to accept the symbol put forward by the government, or by parliament, we should have enough common sense not to press the suggestion.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am glad an hon. member on the other side agrees with me. We should be prepared to bring forward a design which will be generally accepted and which will unite the country—a flag which every Canadian will be proud to honour.

Not long ago I met an old schoolteacher of mine, and while renewing acquaintance he told me he had been teaching for three years in Europe. While I was not his favourite pupil in school—we had our disagreements in those days—I found we got along fairly well, meeting outside in the hurly-burly of life. I told him what we were engaged in at the moment —the flag debate in parliament and he told me he had travelled all across Europe during the summer recess. He had visited all the points of interest to Canadians; he had seen the crosses on many of the war graves over there. And he said to me: The red ensign is accepted as the Canadian symbol in Europe. I might add that this teacher is neither French nor English in origin. He told me he shuddered to think that any government was prepared, so callously, to wipe out the past and do away with the symbol of freedom for which these men fought and died. His parting words were: Do not let that government bring in this three maple leaf flag without first submitting it to the people—without first getting unanimous support from the people, because the symbol of a country without the people behind it means very little. These are the words he spoke to me recently and I cannot help but remember them and put them before the house.

Surely we must be prepared as legislators to bring in a flag which means something to everybody—a flag which can be recognized and honoured by everybody. We are grown men and women and are able to sit down in a committee and discuss this matter. And if a solution cannot be found in a committee, then surely it could be reached along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More). In any event, the committee could decide on a list of questions to be inserted in a plebiscite and the people could then choose which flag they wish to honour in the years ahead.

I am sure Canadians do not want a flag which was picked by one man, rammed down the throat of parliament by a government which in this connection has little regard for freedom of thought and freedom of speech. Fear of being deprived of a recess was held over our heads; we were told that if we did not pass this motion we would have no recess. I am proud of being a member of the party which puts duty first and a recess last.

May I call it 10.30?

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, August 25, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—SUGGESTED MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS WITH PROCEDURE SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Although I have not indicated to you, sir, or to anyone else the point of privilege which I wish to raise, I am sure it will be clear in a moment that it is a matter of concern to the entire house.

On August 12, entirely on my own, I addressed an open letter to the leaders of the parties in the House of Commons in which I suggested that consideration might be given to ways and means of arranging in the future to avoid unnecessarily protracted debate. My letter had nothing to do with the current debate on the flag. It looked only to the future, and it was based on the proposition of acting only by agreement amongst all parties.

I am happy to report, Mr. Speaker, that I have now had a reply by letter from each of the party leaders. One of the letters is marked "Personal" and I shall therefore not disclose its contents. Indeed, I shall not make public any of the letters unless I am authorized to do so. I feel I can say to the house, however, and I am sure the house will be happy to hear this, that there is a wide measure of agreement amongst the five party leaders in their replies. Some of the letters seemed to agree with what I set out in my letter, although all of them did not go that far. However, all the leaders are united in their desire to do everything they can to improve the procedures of this House of Commons.

In view of this, Mr. Speaker—and this is my point of privilege—I should like to suggest that there should be a meeting of the five party leaders with the members of the subcommittee on procedure, which is a subcommittee of Your Honour's committee on procedure and organization. I suggest that there be such a meeting, not for the purpose of discussing the current flag debate but rather for the purpose of looking to the future to achieve what all the leaders have expressed, the desire to improve the procedures of this House of Commons.

I therefore wish to suggest that if within the next day or two the five leaders would indicate to me, as chairman of the subcommittee, their willingness to attend such a meeting I would call a meeting of that subcommittee for the purpose of extending an invitation to them. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that one should consider that this suggestion is being addressed to the party leaders, and a case could be made for their holding a meeting on their own, but I am sure members realize that this is a matter of concern to the House of Commons as a whole, and that it would be proper for such a meeting to be held by the subcommittee on procedure, to be attended by the five party leaders for the purpose of having this discussion. I should like to go one step further and suggest that at such a meeting, Your Honour might also be present. If you are willing to do so, you might also make your chambers or some other room available for the holding of such a meeting.

I hope consideration will be given to such a proposition, and I express to the house my pleasure at the replies I have received from the five party leaders.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I begin by asking Your Honour whether this is a question of privilege. It seems to me like a specious endeavour to raise a question of privilege and designate it as such when, in fact, it is not.

Then there was a reference to a personal letter. I was rather surprised that the hon. gentleman should have found that the best means of communicating his views was through the instrumentality of an open letter to the press. Be that as it may, it was most unusual. I thought it could have been raised in the house or through the ordinary means of communication by post. This procedure was not followed by the hon. gentleman.

He mentioned a personal letter. I think the one I wrote to him was personal, but I will be only too pleased to have it published. In so far as the suggested meeting is concerned, however, the committee has its representatives from the various parties. Let the committee on procedure continue its work. It has done very good work. Certainly to bring up such a matter in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has just brought this before the house does not indicate that degree of care that should characterize the handling of questions like this. If he had brought it to one's attention outside the house or through any other means of communication, it could be understood. I simply say that our desire has always been to expedite the business of the house within the limitation that we discharge our constitutional responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I immediately say to the hon. gentleman that having secured the publicity he apparently desired, I will be only too happy to have publication of my letter, which he can release immediately if he chooses.

Mr. Churchill: For our guidance in the future will Your Honour declare whether this was a valid point of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: I think it is clear that one cannot determine whether a question is one of privilege until you hear what it is. Usually, to be effective, it seems to me a question of privilege should conclude with some sort of motion asking the house to do something, or asking that a decision be reached. There was no conclusion to this projected question of privilege, and in the circumstances I can only say it is quite unusual. I want to assure the house that the Chair, of course, knew nothing about this, but that is beside the point. Perhaps some useful service was rendered by the hon. member rising at this time, but may I suggest that we get on with our business.

Mr. Churchill: A flagrant abuse of the rules; that is what it was.

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—STATUS OF PERSONS CONCERNED WITH NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and in fact in view of the situation there will be more than one question. It pertains to the purported arrival in Toronto last evening of George Hogan and Robert Ameln of San Francisco, who are reported to have a record of strike violence in both San Francisco and St. Louis.

My first question is, have these men been appointed by Mr. Brown, head of the international typographical union, whose head office is in Colorado Springs, Colorado, to act as strike directors? My second question is, under what terms did they come into Canada? My third question is, does the minister intend to apply to them the same treatment accorded to some pressmen who were to assist in getting the newspapers on the streets and whom the newspapers were ordered to get rid of unless the men were prepared to become landed immigrants at once?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I will make an inquiry on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): While an inquiry is being made respecting this question would the minister advise—and this is within his personal knowledge—what directions were given recently to the three Toronto newspapers respecting certain employees who came from the United States? Did the minister direct the three metropolitan Toronto newspapers that they must either get rid of these men, or that the men would have to acquire landed immigrant status if they were to remain in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, no work permit is delivered to a person entering Canada on a temporary visa and a person who visits our country without a visa must first seek authorization before starting to work; in other words he must obtain immigrant status or secure a work permit.

To my knowledge, at the time of the strike in Toronto about ten people entered Canada without having a work permit and immigration officials informed them that they could not work in this country without such a permit.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: If, as the hon. member for Melville has said, two gentlemen have arrived under the description of strike directors, would they come within the ambit of the principles which the minister has just enunciated?

Mr. Tremblay: As I said, anyone who comes to Canada has to get a permit to accept any contract or undertake any work here. I will make inquiries today to find out exactly what happened.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask whether he has received any representations from the national unemployment insurance commission association protesting the recent pay increases as being inadequate in the opinion of its members?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, but I will check to see whether any representations have come to my office which have not been drawn to my attention.

Mr. Starr: Will the minister bring this matter before the government so that a review may be made which will give a more adequate increase in salary to these employees, who between 1963 and 1965 received an increase amounting to only 3.5 per cent as announced over the week end?

An hon. Member: What did you do?

Mr. Starr: I readjusted it.

An hon. Member: Not in 1961.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to make any statement with regard to salary increases for federal civil servants in group B? Can we be told whether these increases were granted on the basis of recommendations by the salaries review committee or by the civil service commission, and whether they will be reviewed by treasury board?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The President of the Privy Council has a statement to make on this.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): On Friday last, as appears on page 7114 of Hansard, in response to a question from the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and again yesterday, as reported on page 7168, in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister promised to review with me the representations that have been received from the civil service organizations with respect to the recently announced group B salary revisions.

This is to report that we have reviewed this matter and, in doing so, have paid particular attention to the rates for grades 1 and 2 typists, clerks and stenographers in whose positions both hon. members expressed a special interest.

We are satisfied, after further examination of the problem and from the careful study which has been given to the whole range of group B salary rates by the ministers on the treasury board, that the rates which have been announced are fair and equitable, and place the government's salary levels on a basis which compares favourably with other employers in Canada. There are numerous comparisons which could be made, including comparisons based upon data derived from the pay research bureau surveys, to confirm what I have said. However, pay research bureau reports are confidential, and I am therefore obliged to make the following comparison on the basis of data available from public sources.

To illustrate my point, we have compared the rates now announced for typists, clerks and stenographers 1 and 2 with the rates in force under collective bargaining agreements between the Saskatchewan government employees association and the government of that province. In five of the six classes referred to the maximum rate now effective in the federal service is equal to or greater than the maximum provided under collective agreements in the Saskatchewan service.

I should also say a word, I think, with reference to the claim that large numbers of the employees in group B have not received a salary increase in four years. This is not in fact correct. The ranges of pay for typists, clerks and stenographers grade 1 all contain at least seven steps, and while rates of pay may remain unchanged for a period of time, employees entering these classes are entitled to semi-annual statutory increases of $90 a year until they reach the maximum. For group B as a whole the increase in the actual levels of pay over the two year period since the last review amounts to approximately 6.4 per cent and this latest increase in the rates of pay will add another 3.4 per cent to this increase, making an increase in the actual salary level of the order of about 10 per cent over the two year period.

As for the question asked by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue on Friday last as reported in Hansard on page 7114 regarding the position of the corresponding classes on the House of Commons staff, while I may point out that this matter is under the jurisdiction and responsibility of Your Honour perhaps I could have the indulgence of the house to say that prior to the question being asked last Friday, action had already been initiated to deal with the revision of the salary rates for this group. This is in accordance with the usual procedures for reviewing the salary rates of the clerical, stenographic and other office classes of the House of Commons staff concurrently with the group B.

As I have indicated, since this matter is in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and while it is not perhaps entirely appropriate for me to say when the announcement of the revision will be made, may I be permitted to indicate that I expect it will be made very soon.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the minister whether the increases which have been granted and are now approved are in accordance with the recommendations of the salaries review committee or the recommendations of the civil service commission?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, they are not in accordance with the recommendations of the civil service commission, but are based on the data provided by the pay research bureau.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. gentleman a question. With regard to the announcement the minister has made, which will be received with disappointment, I am sure, by civil servants in all parts of the country, does that represent a decision of treasury board, to whom this matter was submitted recently for consideration?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I want to pick up part of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition when he used the word "paltry" the other day in relation to the increases and speaks about "disappointment" today I would point out that when his government dealt with this matter they did not grant any increases. However, Mr. Speaker, this represents a decision of treasury board which has now been confirmed by the full cabinet after consideration of the whole matter. I might add that this decision was taken after a good deal of time had been spent on the question.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BURNT OUT PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In his absence it was replied to by the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, who said that today he would give us an answer as to what action is contemplated with regard to increasing the allowances of those who qualify under the Veterans Allowance Act. Is it now possible to have the answer that was promised yesterday?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question was brought to my attention just a few moments ago. I can say to the hon. gentleman that it is my hope to have a recommendation some time in the month of October. This is a hope; I trust I may realize it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the minister bring the house up to date on the situation in Viet Nam today, particularly as it relates to the state of the government, and also the situation centring around the truce supervisory commission and the part Canada has in it?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster gave me notice this morning of his intention to ask a question along similar lines. My response will take into account events that have occurred since his notice of question was received, which was of course prior to the question just put by my hon. friend.

A statement was issued in Saigon not very many minutes ago by the military revolutionary committee revoking the recent measures and announcing the proposed election of a new head of state and the convening of a national congress in Viet Nam. These events are of course too recent to warrant any comment. Canada does not have any diplomatic mission in South Viet Nam. Our contacts there are, of course, made as a member of the international control mission, of which we are a member, serving in both North and South Viet Nam.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask a supplementary question. I ask the minister whether he has had drawn to his attention the comments made on C.B.C. by Mr. Tom Gould, I think, reporting from Saigon, speaking of the dilapidated condition of the quarters of the Canadian representatives on the truce commission, the antiquated vehicle that is used, and the faded red ensign. I ask the minister whether any investigation has been made as to the accuracy of these remarks and, if they are true, what steps he intends to take to rectify them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not heard the report of Mr. Tom Gould but I have seen the conditions myself under which the commission in Laos operates and can very well understand the situation. This only goes to show that Canadian diplomats abroad are prepared to do their duty under difficult circumstances.

Mr. Douglas: I have another supplementary question. Do the difficult circumstances necessitate unpainted buildings, 1929 vintage cars and filthy premises that are supposed to represent Canada in another country?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this gives me an opportunity of reminding some of my colleagues of the difficulties under which we must operate in this department.

INDONESIA—SUGGESTED TERMINATION OF CANADIAN AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of a report which appeared in last Saturday's issue of the Vancouver Sun, the heading of which reads as follows: "Go to hell, Canada," says Indonesian paper, with certain other observations in a similar vein, I am wondering whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs can accelerate his decision as to whether or not Canada should continue to hand out aid to Indonesia so she can thus save on foreign exchange and buy arms to attack Malaysia. In view of this particular observation in an Indonesian official paper I suggest to the secretary of state that they be told to go to the same location.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I may say to my hon. friend that if the direction reported in the paper was a correct representation of what was said, the hon. member need not think that the Canadian government has any intention of observing the direction. I want to add, however, that in the formulation of foreign policy both my hon. friend and I would be wise not to use stories that emanate from outside as a necessary base for the foundation of foreign policy.

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the speech he made in Banff a few days ago, could he tell the house whether there has been any change in the policy of the government as to its admission to the organization of American states, and whether Canada still intends to join this organization?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall table a copy of my speech. There is no change in our policy, but I took the opportunity to explain our views in detail and to state our reasons.

[Text]

Mr. Martineau: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's answer, and in view of the fact that he said it was Canada's ultimate destiny to join that organization, I was just wondering whether his speech meant just nothing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend would know more about that kind of thing than I, but I can assure my hon. friend that if he reads the text he will find that it was a contribution from which even he might derive some benefit.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Having read the text of the minister's speech I should like to ask him, in view of the fact that two South American countries have been compelled reluctantly to impose economic sanctions on Cuba as the result of an O.A.S. resolution, does the minister propose that Canada shall now be reduced to the same status?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any countries have been compelled to take the course which my hon. friend mentions. However, while he has read my speech, perhaps if he were to reread it he might find that the question was not really necessary.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman suggests reading the speech twice, and I have been privileged to endeavour to interpret it too. Does that mean it was couched in such uncertainty it was meant not to be understood by anyone, including the hon. gentleman?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend is in such a frame of mind that I hope he will not mind my saying, if I told the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam to read my speech twice, it is apparent that the right hon. gentleman should read it three times.

VISIT TO RUSSIA BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Having in mind the announcement today of the forthcoming visit of a group of distinguished parliamentarians to the Soviet union, I was wondering whether the Canadian government would consider extending a similar invitation to Russian politicians at the appropriate time to visit this country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The invitation in question was issued to the Speaker of parliament. I think the question of a return visit should be considered by them on behalf of parliament.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister state if he will recommend a recess of this house in order to permit the Speaker and other members of the delegation to attend?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; but I think consideration should be given to the possibility of postponing the visit, in view of the fact that the house will be in session next week.

Mr. Starr: And the week after.

CYPRUS—EXTENSION OF POWERS OF UN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any extension has been now provided in respect of additional powers for the United Nations force on Cyprus, and in particular whether the Canadian members of that force have received instructions that arms may be used when considered necessary by the officer commanding.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, under the directives, which of course are those between the United Nations and the United Nations commander of the Cyprus force, there will be no difficulty in the kind of situation to which my right hon. friend has just referred. With regard to the other aspect of the question, as I pointed out last week, as a result of the negotiations between General Thimayya and the government of Cyprus there have been some improvements in the position of the force and its authority.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the question is, have directions been given by the United Nations organization to the United Nations force in Cyprus that arms may now be used when, in the opinion of the commander, it is deemed necessary and appropriate?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. This is not a new situation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—DIRECT INCENTIVES TO INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to reply further to a question I posed to him some days ago in reference to the report and recommendations of Professor T. Wilson of the University of Glasgow, and a subsequent press release by Premier Stanfield concerning industrial incentives in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can embark upon a debate in respect of that very interesting report, but I can suggest that when the estimates of the Atlantic development board are before the committee we should have some discussion on it. As I understand it, Mr. Stanfield merely produced a submission he had made months before to the Atlantic development board coincident with this document, and there was nothing novel, therefore, in what he said at that time. The board, of course, for a long time has been giving consideration to the representations of the government of Nova Scotia, and there have been discussions going on with the officials of the board, Industrial Estates and ministers in the Nova Scotia government.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a supplementary question. I realize the board is giving consideration, but what we want, of course, is action. May I ask the minister whether he is suggesting that the premier of that province is absolutely incorrect in what he said in his press release?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the quickest way for the government of Nova Scotia to get action would be to put some concrete proposals before the Atlantic development board.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

REPORTED DENIAL OF AID TO FISHING SHIP IN DISTRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the captain and crew of the long liner Cheryl Anne recently found it necessary to ask for aid from the ocean going tug Slavnij of the Russian fishing fleet, when assistance was denied their disabled craft in a 60 mile gale on Georges bank by the transport ship Thomas Carleton, will the Minister of Transport inform the house the reason for this disgraceful action by a government ship on the high seas, and will he also tell the house the exact nature of the duties presently assigned to the Canadian coastguard?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that would also necessitate a rather prolonged debate. However, as a result of the particular incident to which the hon. gentleman referred, which I do not really think should be properly called disgraceful although perhaps there may have been an error in judgment in this matter, I have suggested that there should be a very careful review of the work of the coastguard, particularly in respect of fishing vessels.

Mr. Crouse: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister give consideration to providing aid to all small ships owned by fishermen when they are in distress, and I refer to aid that may be provided by the present coastguard? Will the minister give this some consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will give a good deal of consideration to enlarging the duties beyond those prescribed by the government the hon. gentleman was supporting.

RECRUITMENT OF STAFF FOR TRAINING COLLEGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister report any progress in the recruiting of qualified staff for the coastguard training college in Sydney?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I did not catch what kind of staff the hon. gentleman mentioned.

Mr. MacInnis: Qualified teaching or training staff, which the minister indicated was holding up the progress in starting the school.

Mr. Pickersgill: Progress in starting the school is not being delayed at all. We are making very good progress, and some staff is already being recruited. I have no doubt that by the time we hope to be taking pupils in this school, which would be in the autumn of next year, it will be quite ready for them.

AGRICULTURE

JOINT LOANS TO FARM GROUPS FOR EQUIPMENT PURCHASES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

It is based on a report published in La Terre de Chez Nous to the effect that the federal government is preparing a bill to grant loans to some farmers who would like to get together to buy particularly costly equipment.

Could the Minister of Agriculture tell us if he intends to introduce such a bill this session?

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should hope we could get at this legislation as soon as possible.

PURCHASE BY RUSSIA OF CANADIAN LIVESTOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether the Russian agricultural delegation now touring Canada are very much impressed with what they have seen so far, and whether they have shown any interest in the purchase of livestock, particularly bulls?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the Russian minister with regard to what he thought of Saskatchewan, but I can assure the hon. member that he is interested in bulls. The Russians are interested enough in our livestock that on the 26th of this month there will be a shipment from Montreal of 600

Hereford bulls along with 65 Lacombe hogs, which were developed in Canada, and three Holstein cows.

ALBERTA—CANCELLATION OF CONTRACTS WITH MILK PROCESSING PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture and I am asking it also on behalf of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and the hon. member for Acadia whose constituencies are affected as well. Has the minister received a petition from 124 farmers in the Bashaw area concerning the cutting off of their contract with the Carnation milk plant in Wetaskiwin, and what action has he taken?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not received a petition from 124 farmers, although I have received communications from some of the people affected by the closing of this plant. In this regard the federal government does not have any authority over milk plants with regard to their sources of supply or the arrangements they make with those shipping milk to their plants. The federal government does, however, stand ready under the Agricultural Stabilization Act to support all butter produced through a purchase program at 53 cents per pound plus a supplementary payment of 13.3 cents per pound of butterfat to eligible shippers. Thus, while certain farmers have lost access to the concentrated milk plant, an alternative method of merchandising their product is available to them. We would hope that these plants would diversify their operations so they could take care of problems when they arise as they have in this particular area.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister look into the possibility of finding a further market for the condensed milk that this plant produces? I think that is where the trouble lies.

Mr. Hays: Yes. We are familiar with the situation and, as I have just mentioned, we feel that some of the plants in these areas should be more diversified along the lines of the production of powdered milk, butter and so on, so they could be supported under the stabilization program.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What about buying the milk for school children?

[Mr. Hays.]

QUEBEC—PROTESTS RESPECTING FEED GRAIN SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. Since he announced a subsidy for the transport of feed grain in eastern Canada, can he tell the house whether he has received protests from officials of the Quebec Catholic farmers' union? Can he tell us also about his recent interview with the representatives of that association, more especially on Friday last according to press reports?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I fail to see the immediate urgency of this question. Surely it is a question for the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, since this is a very urgent question which interests farmers in eastern Canada, I ask that it be taken up at 10.30 tonight.

[Text]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a supplementary question to the one which you ruled out of order, Mr. Speaker, and I have a submission to make about its urgency. The policy is to take effect on the 31st of this month and I want to ask the minister if before August 31 he can announce any change in the interim policy on feed grain subsidies.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Last Friday I received a delegation from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Representations have been received, and we are now studying these. We will advise the house in due course.

TURKEYS—POSSIBLE OUTBREAK OF COMMUNICABLE DISEASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has a reply to the question I directed to him a week ago Monday in connection with the death of turkeys.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie concerning the cause of death of some 10,000 turkey poults in a flock in Saskatchewan, I am advised that laboratory and field investigations conducted by veterinarians of the college of veterinary medicine of the University of Saskatchewan indicate no evidence of an infectious or contagious disease. The field investigations indicated that improper feeding was likely the cause of the mortality, and this diagnosis was supported by the fact that birds removed to the university made a complete recovery when fed a balanced ration.

TRANSPORT

CONSTRUCTION OF CAUSEWAY BETWEEN LABRADOR AND NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Could the minister tell the house whether the government intends to study and carry out the project of building a causeway between Labrador and Newfoundland whereby that province could be connected by means of the trans-Canada highway? Railroads and power lines could be built and the climate could also be improved in the gulf of St. Lawrence, St. Lawrence river and Saguenay areas, and all that for less than what the St. Lawrence seaway cost.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question for the order paper.

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION UNDER PRIVATE SPONSORSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent proposal by the consulting engineering firm of A. D. Marginson and Associates for the construction of the Northumberland strait causeway to connect Prince Edward Island to the mainland, to be financed by Canadian funds under private sponsorship, can the minister inform the house of the government's reply or attitude to this vital proposal?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I may say that beyond an acknowledgement of receipt of the proposal there has been no reply.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): As a supplementary question, will the Minister of Transport be prepared to make a statement in the house outlining the government's position when he does give a more extended reply to this proposal?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would think this is a proper matter to be referred to in the house at that time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED RESTRICTION OF FLAG DEBATE TO TWO DAYS A WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will remember that on May 25 in response to a question he invited all members who wished to do so to participate in the flag debate, and my question is related to this invitation.

In view of the fact that most members appear to have accepted this invitation, resulting in no foreseeable end to the debate, and in view of the fact that the Liberals and Conservatives have adopted positions that at the moment are totally irreconcilable, which will result in an even longer debate, would the Prime Minister consider having the flag debate for only two days a week for the balance of the session and letting the house deal with such other items as the Canada pension plan, so there could still be full discussion on the flag without neglecting all the other vital matters that should be receiving our immediate attention?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I still think we should proceed along the course already indicated, and I do not like to think that there is total irreconcilability between positions.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—REPORTED RENT INCREASES IN VETERANS PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General as the minister who reports to the house for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Yesterday afternoon in his absence I directed a question to the Prime Minister relative to the position of the veterans in the Fraserview project at Vancouver. Is the minister now in a position to give the house any information with regard to a review of the situation which these hundreds of veterans and widows face, having in mind the fact that within a few days they will be confronted with having to pay increased rents, or buying their homes, or being evicted?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the suggestion that something is to happen within a few days, I would point out that the actual date involved is October 1. I might also say I am informed by officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the tenants of the corporations's Fraserview veterans project were notified on July 3 of this year that rents would be increased effective October 1. The increases range from $3.50 to $11 per month.

The increases in rental charges were implemented after very careful study and consideration by the corporation which extended over a period of several months. In this study the corporation had the assistance of consultants who were retained on instructions of my predecessor, Hon. Jack Garland. The increases which have been approved by the corporation's board of directors are sufficient only to eliminate the deficit in the operation of the Fraserview project. I might add that over the past two or three years there has been a serious question whether, and the extent to which, these rates should be raised. The increased rates are considered to be fair and reasonable to both the tenants and to the corporation, and they are considerably below the rental market in Vancouver as established by the study by the independent consultants.

Early in July I answered a similar question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. At that time I thought it would be wrong to raise the hopes of the tenants, and after most careful consideration and discussion with the officials I do not think it is advisable to reconsider this matter at this time. I think it should be terminated now. It would only raise false hopes if we did anything else.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not correct that although the date is October 1 the tenants have been told they must make a decision either to buy or pay increased rent by the 14th of September? I have one of the notices in my possession, and they must answer by the middle of September. This matter concerns a housing project built for veterans and not for profit. Will the minister recommend the postponement for another month or two of the date by which these veterans must make a decision, so the matter can be reconsidered not only by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but by the veterans themselves? Will the minister recommend postponing the deadline for another month?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, briefly the answer to that question is no. I might say that I personally saw the officials of this organization as far back as May and discussed the matter with them at some length. I then referred it to a special meeting of the board with my own comments on the subject. This matter has come up several times over the past two years, and I think it is time we put an end to it rather than raise false hopes.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister reviewed the situation did he take into account the written promises made to these people by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources before the last election?

Mr. Nicholson: We have made the decision that we think is right and proper under the circumstances. While I am on my feet—is there a further supplementary?

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. I believe it is a correct question for the House of Commons, when we are now told that a certain decision has been reached by the minister which is completely at variance with a written promise made by the minister of northern affairs. If we are now told that there is a differentiation between what the government has decided and the written commitment of the minister of northern affairs, then surely that is something about which we should ask in this House of Commons.

Mr. Nicholson: With due respect, Mr. Speaker, I say there was no promise made by the minister of northern affairs. This was a statement, I believe, that was made by a political candidate in the course of an election campaign some years ago. It was not made by a responsible minister of the crown.

Mr. Chatterton: Can the minister say whether this candidate to whom he referred was the minister of northern affairs? Does the fact that he has become a minister relieve him of responsibility?

Mr. Nicholson: All I said was that at the time the statement was made, in 1962, unless it was made by a member of the government of the hon. gentleman sitting opposite, it was not made by a member of the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): This is the most outrageous proposition that I have ever heard advanced. Does the minister say a statement made by the man who today occupies the position of minister of northern affairs is irresponsible because he was not the minister then?

Mr. Nicholson: I never made or suggested any such statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just ask the minister, then, to whom he was referring when he spoke of this irresponsible statement.

Mr. Nicholson: With all due respect, I did not say that. I said it was not made by a responsible member of the government, because it was made at a time when the right hon. gentleman headed the government of this country. It was not made by a member of the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will simply ask this question. Is the statement to which the minister refers a statement made by the person who today is minister of northern affairs?

Mr. Nicholson: I have not got the statement before me, but if it is the statement that I think it is, it was made before he was a minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: Actually, Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the minister to whom reference was made, the statement was made before he was even a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister say that statements made by candidates are not to be regarded as responsible unless they are ministers when they make them?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nicholson: The answer is emphatically no, but I say there is a difference between a private person campaigning as a member of the opposition party trying to get elected, and a member of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lake St. John.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order; it does seem to me we have had a long discussion on this matter.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I just wanted to ask the minister a simple question. I have not participated in the discussion. I should like to ask whether being sworn in as a member of the cabinet relieves a member of all the previous commitments he has made.

Mr. Nicholson: In answer to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, what I said was that when a man speaks as a member of the government he speaks on behalf of the government. When a man speaks during the course of an election campaign about what he will try to do, that is another matter and different from speaking as a member of the government.

[Later:]

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General as minister answerable for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. What is the real reason for the approximately 18 per cent increase in the rents for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses in the Fraserview veterans housing area? Is the real reason that stated by Arthur Laing in public—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Webb: —to force sales of the houses?

Mr. Diefenbaker: When did he say that?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of this particular statement. If the hon. gentleman would put his question on the order paper I would be glad to answer it.

Mr. Webb: I will send you a copy.

Mr. Chatterton: As a supplementary question, may I ask the minister whether the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has made representations on behalf of the Fraserview tenants, since he became a member of the ministry?

Mr. Nicholson: Having regard to the oath I took as a privy councillor I cannot very well answer that question, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ISSUE OF NEW STAMP WITH INSCRIPTION "QUEBEC LIBRE"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): May I deal now with a question that was asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. He asked whether a new stamp bearing the inscription "Free Quebec" had been issued by the Post Office Department. The question was put to my parliamentary secretary. There is absolutely no truth in any such suggestion. I might say I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for having brought this to my attention, since it may have been overlooked by the department; because I believe an investigation is warranted to ascertain whether there has been a recent infraction of the Post Office Act.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POLICY RESPECTING NUCLEAR ARMS STORAGE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he tell us whether storage of nuclear arms in Canada was discussed at the Canada-United States conference held recently in Harrison Hot Springs, British Columbia? Can he tell us also whether there has been any change in the policy of the department on national defence in connection with the storage of nuclear arms in this country?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, there has been no change, Mr. Speaker. The policy was very clearly set out in the white paper on defence that was tabled in March.

BROADCASTING

HEARING IN HALIFAX OF APPLICATIONS FROM WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I have in my hand a notice for a public hearing of the board of broadcast governors to be held in Halifax on September 4. At this hearing applications from radio stations in Winnipeg, Edmonton and Prince Rupert, B.C., are to be heard. I am wondering what possible justification there could be for having the representatives of these stations travel to the Atlantic seaboard for the hearing of these applications.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): If the hon. member would just glance again at that notice he would find it is supplementary to a much longer notice. One application to be considered at the hearing is a very important application from a T.V. station in Halifax.

Mr. Enns: I was wondering if this was a clever device by an alert minister to have the Canadian National deficit decreased by forcing these people to travel this distance on the Canadian National?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not responsible for the board of broadcast governors, sir.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a report in today's edition of Toronto's leading morning newspaper to the effect that by-elections in Westmorland and Waterloo South will be held on November 16. Has the government reached a decision that these by-elections will be held on November 16, or on some other date, and if so will the Prime Minister inform the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not reached our decision, although apparently the newspaper has.

Mr. Bell: Is the newspaper report incorrect?

Mr. Pearson: I could not comment on a speculative report.

FINANCE

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON DRUGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance but I believe it can also be directed to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a resolution from the Canadian pharmaceutical association, as a result of its recent meeting in Halifax, asking for the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on drugs? If so, would he give consideration to this request?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall have to look into that, Mr. Speaker. It is my impression that I have received a telegram from that organization on this subject, but I will check.

WORLD BANK PROFITS FOR LOANS TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister inform the house what is the attitude of the government in regard to a plan for the world bank to use its profits to provide interest free loans for educational and agricultural projects in underdeveloped countries?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): In the absence of the Minister of Finance I shall bring this question to his attention.

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY—REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer very briefly three questions asked when I happened to be out of the house yesterday. The hon. member for Cumberland asked the Prime Minister a question about the Atlantic development board immediately initiating an economic investigation of the harnessing of the bay of Fundy tides for electric power.

The board is giving consideration to this and other related proposed power developments in the Atlantic provinces, and as the Prime Minister, I thought very properly, pointed out in reply to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, it is very desirable that these matters should not be considered in isolation from one another.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO LEASES OF WATERFRONT PROPERTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke asked a question about a possible lease to Coal Harbour Investments Limited by the national harbours board. There is no lease, and there will be no lease unless the project is approved by the city of Vancouver.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF ESCALATORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, notwithstanding a request I made to him as I went out of the building that he should not ask me any questions, chose to ask me an urgent question about escalators at the airport at Winnipeg. This matter is under consideration in relation to the possibility of a different method of conveying passengers to the planes, and until that matter has been resolved it would be perhaps unwise to go on with the installation of escalators.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I thank the minister for answering the question. I am sure he realizes that in effect I was giving him notice so he could answer the question when he got back.

Mr. Pickersgill: With regard to the hon. gentleman giving me notice I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that that great exponent of the rules did not put the question on the order paper, as other hon. members do.

Mr. Bell: Slapped down twice in one day.

Mr. Knowles: That proves something but I don't know what.

PUBLIC WORKS

OTTAWA—ABSENCE OF QUEBEC FLAG IN GARDEN OF THE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the hon. member for Labelle asked me why the province of Quebec was not represented by its official flag at the garden of the provinces.

I must tell him that at this time the national capital commission is flying at the garden of the provinces the banners bearing the provinces' coat of arms rather than their flags because most of them have not yet adopted an official provincial flag. I think that only four of them have done so.

[Text]

GRAIN

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICES FOR WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in his absence possibly the Minister of Agriculture could answer it. How soon can the Canadian wheat board release the purchase prices for wheat and coarse grains to the elevator agents, so that farmers with grain in storage since the beginning of the crop year might be paid?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be glad to bring this question to the attention of the minister.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Perron (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from a statement made to the press by Mr. Claude Jourdain, president of the economic development regional council of the Gaspe peninsula and Magdalen islands.

In his statement, published in the newspaper Montréal Matin of August 25, Mr. Jourdain suggested the abolishment of unemployment insurance benefits:

Instead of paying benefits to the unemployed, they should be forced to work.

My question is directed to the Minister of Forestry since he is responsible for the administration of ARDA.

Does he agree with Mr. Jourdain's statement when he says that unemployment insurance benefits should be abolished in order to put the people of the Gaspe peninsula to work under ARDA?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I did not read that press report, and I would like to do so before making a statement on this matter.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Monday, August 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, to continue my talk on a Canadian flag, and trying to put forward the views of my constituents and what the Canadian people feel about this debate, I said last evening that I am sure most people in Canada think we should get on to something other than the flag.

As grown people we should realize the extent to which this issue is controversial. Perhaps it should be taken out of the realm of politics and placed in the hands of a committee comprising representatives of all parties, where a solution might be found. If no agreement on a flag design can be reached there, perhaps the committee could agree on four questions to be asked in the course of a referendum, questions similar to those set out in the subamendment with, possibly, a few more added. The Prime Minister has indicated that he is prepared to submit this matter to a committee as long as a time limit is placed on its deliberations as well as on the debates in this house when the question is brought back to the Commons. This seems to be a further indication of his intention to use his authority to force Canadians to accept his three maple leaf design.

I think there is no necessity for a time limit to be placed on the work of the committee. Surely such a committee should be given all the time it needs in order to reach a conclusion. My own belief is that such a committee could reach agreement. After all, the committee set up in 1945 was virtually unanimous in the conclusion it reached. I think another committee could reach a similar measure of agreement provided no time limit were placed on its work, and if its members began their task with a real intention to do something about this controversial question which has upset the nation so much, even if compromises were necessary in order to achieve this purpose.

Perhaps the first question which should be placed on any plebiscite is, do Canadians really want a new flag? This is a question I have encountered from time to time, and it is a question I have often asked myself. If it were put to a plebiscite, this house would know the feeling of Canadians generally in this regard. If the answers showed that Canadians do want a new flag, then we could set ourselves to work in an effort to evolve, or find, that new flag, one which would be satisfactory to the majority of the people and which would unite our country rather than divide it.

Everything has its good points, even this flag debate. The debate has made Canadians more aware of the Canadian flag, more aware of the red ensign than ever before. A few months ago I was shocked at the number of Canadians who were asking what is on the red ensign, and what does it mean, anyway?

I think this unawareness stems from the lack of teaching in schools across Canada, particularly on the subject of Canadian history. Canadians are more ignorant about Canadian history than they are about the history of the United States or Britain. One could ask any number of school children about the war of 1812, and I imagine that not more than one out of 100 could say very much about it. I think ignorance of the red ensign, the Canadian flag, stems from the fact that very little Canadian history is taught in our schools across Canada. If better instruction were given we should all be very much more aware of the history of the red ensign, because this flag certainly has close links with Canada's past.

In 1945, under the order in council passed on September 5, the government of that day set out clearly that the red ensign, as modified, was Canada's distinctive flag to be used wherever a distinctive flag for Canada might be needed. This was generally accepted at the time. The question which arises in my mind is, why this sudden need for a reappraisal of the whole flag question in 1964? The Prime Minister suggested, in a television talk I believe, that it came about because he had promised a new flag. Well, the Minister of Transport at one time promised two flags and, indeed, three flags for Canada.

We all want to see a united Canada. We want to see one flag for all Canada; this is the only way in which Canada will remain united. To return to this question of the need for a reappraisal of the flag situation in 1964, the Prime Minister, it is said, promised a new flag for 1965.

An hon. Member: He promised other things, too.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): He promised a lot of other things, too. A promise was made about milk, and we discussed that promise this afternoon. The Minister of Agriculture told all Canadians we would have a school milk program. Now we have a surplus of milk in Alberta and he says he cannot touch the problem. Another promise which we in western Canada remember very well is the promise with regard to $2 wheat. We have not seen it and we are unlikely to see it fulfilled by 1965 or even by 1968. We could talk about the time the minister of northern affairs made a number of promises. That was before he became a member of the cabinet. This promise about the flag could be regarded in the same light. It was made before the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) became Prime Minister.

People can only form their opinions in the light of their own knowledge, I suppose, but I do know that the new flag was never waved about in western Canada in 1963. It was never proclaimed that this promise was one the Liberals intended to keep. It was certainly not proclaimed as loudly or as often as the promise about $2 wheat. As a matter of fact, in my constituency I heard no talk whatsoever about the introduction of a new flag; neither did anything on this subject appear in the weekly newspapers. The hon. member for York-Humber made this position very clear when he spoke yesterday. He told us the flag was not promised in Toronto.

So where was it promised, and for what purpose? I do not wish to contribute to any division which already exists in this country, but we know that the promise of a new flag served the Prime Minister well. Why did he bring it before this parliament? It was not mentioned in the speech from the throne. I suggest the Prime Minister brought it forward because he had very little other legislation ready. He is using this flag debate as a filler. He tells us "Pass the flag resolution and we will give you a recess". This will give them more time to prepare their pension legislation, more time to discuss things of that nature with the provinces. The Prime Minister has promised the house many things; in particular, a recess if we accept this flag. I said yesterday that I am proud to be a member of a party that puts duty before holidays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The Prime Minister has clearly brought Canada's flag into the political arena. For what purpose, he knows best; but I think it should certainly be taken out of the political arena, because we want Canadians all across this country to accept the flag once it is chosen. We are well able to gather that the flag at present proposed by the Prime Minister is not acceptable to many Canadians. Therefore it must be referred to a standing committee which can study the whole subject at great length.

I noticed an editorial in the Quebec Chronicle of August 8 which I think is very significant to this particular debate. It says in part:

> For reasons he knows best, Mr. Pearson has made a political issue of the flag: and he could not have picked on a worse time. Introduced in rather authoritarian fashion in the house, with no popular consultation and in the teeth of fierce opposition from a large section of the public, the flag question, far from settling anything, has only stirred unnecessary controversy and a great deal of recrimination.
> Mr. Pearson surely knew (there were plenty of public statements which pointed to it) that any flag, as long as it did not contain references to the histories of either of the two founding nations, would be acceptable to the French Canadians. Why then did he not consult the people on a design which would have been universally acceptable? One Liberal answer to this is that it would not have been practical.

I think that is a very weak answer indeed. This editorial goes on to say:

> But this is utter nonsense. All legislation is, in fact, based on the principle of popular consultation. Why else do we go through the enormously costly motions of electing a new government every four years? Why else do we give our M.P.'s the right to speak for us?

It goes on to deal at great length with some of the problems this flag has run into because of the time at which the Prime Minister chose to present it to parliament. I will not read the rest of this editorial, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it deals with the question very well. It states that the Prime Minister has brought this flag into the political arena at the worst possible time, when the country is divided enough, without adding to the problem. Certainly it has already been proven that this flag issue is adding to that division.

In looking at the four questions contained in the subamendment one notices that the first question suggested by the hon. member for Regina City is "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?" I think I should point out that in going back over the history of the red ensign we find it was flown by the Hudson's Bay Company. This trading company was more or less the founder of western Canada, particularly, and most of eastern Canada. They used the red ensign as their flag and the flag of Canada. I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that this company were perhaps more than just a trading company. They were the government of the day; they had powers far more sweeping than many governments; they could arm ships, punish offenders, enforce laws, and so on. In fact they controlled the whole area that is now western Canada; and at that time, away back in the early 1800's, the Hudson's Bay Company used the red ensign as their flag.

Coming to a later period, in 1841 northern Manitoba used this flag. It flew over Fort Garry at the junction of the Red and Assiniboine rivers. Hon. members have referred to the fact that in 1904 and 1905 the red ensign was flown as the flag of Canada. In 1922 an order in council was passed authorizing the use of the new Canadian coat of arms on the fly of the red ensign.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Certainly.

Mr. Francis: I understand the hon. member said the Hudson's Bay Company had used—I forget the date—the red ensign as its flag. Has the Hudson's Bay Company, however, changed that practice? Do they still not use it as their flag?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Being a very loyal company, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that perhaps they do. In 1924 a government order in council authorized the use of the red ensign on all Canadian government buildings in foreign countries. In 1934 the Bennett government declared the red ensign to be our national colours. During the second world war the King government chose the red ensign as the flag for the commander of the Canadian army overseas. Mackenzie King has often been quoted in this house, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps I may be allowed to quote him once more with regard to the Canadian flag. Mr. King said this:

> The red ensign, with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly has, for over 70 years been very generally used in situations where a flag specially distinctive of Canada was essential. It was first authorized by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald shortly after confederation for use on Canadian merchant vessels. It has been popularly accepted as a flag distinctive of Canada.

Certainly the red ensign flew over the houses of commons of Upper and Lower Canada at the time of confederation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if one looks back over Canadian history one can see that as history unfolded the red ensign was there. This parliament has defended the flag many times. During one attack back in 1949 Mr. King said this:

> Canadians have fought and died under this flag. The red ensign should be good enough for anyone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Every prospective immigrant is informed what our flag is by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. They are advised that the flag used as distinctive of Canada is properly described as the Canadian red ensign, with the shield of the coat of arms in the fly. This should point out to most members that the red ensign has very strong claims indeed to being called Canada's distinctive flag, and certainly the first question submitted by the hon. member for Regina City has a right to that place.

In view of the great deal of controversy over the flag question the hon. member has referred to a modified form of the red ensign in question No. 2, perhaps one which would set out more clearly the two founding races of this great country of ours. Certainly this has merit, because if it can bring greater unity to this divided country in which we now find ourselves, it will be very worth while. Anything that can bring greater unity to this country should be seriously considered. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would wholeheartedly support the second question, if such a flag were favoured by most Canadians as the result of a plebiscite being held.

The third question contained in the hon. member's subamendment is, "Are you in favour of a three maple leaf design?" One wonders why one should be in favour of such a design. Naturally, being an agriculturist, when the suggested Pearson pennant was brought forward I looked at the maple trees in Ontario and even those in Quebec to see if three maple leaves grew naturally, as suggested by the Pearson pennant or the Pearson flag, as it is now called. I failed to find any resemblance whatsoever. I immediately wondered, why three; why not five? It seemed to me maple leaves grew in clusters of five more frequently than in any other number; I never found them growing in threes. Why not one maple leaf, as has been suggested by the New Democratic party? Certainly the timing of this flag resolution has been poor; the advance notice on behalf of the government has been poor, and the authoritative manner in which the government has presented its three maple leaf design has been poor.

I could not help noticing an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of August 22 from Southam news services, written by that noted reporter Charles Lynch. Mr. Lynch states in this article:

> To me, Mr. Pearson's decisiveness introducing the three leaf flag, as a focal point around which new flag sentiment could rally, was admirable. In decisive fashion, he made it clear that this was the new flag and that the government would stand or fall on it. Now was the time for all good Canadians to rally 'round.
> But in the next breath he trotted out the union jack, to be endorsed for Canadians as our symbol of Queen and commonwealth. This preposterous proposal started the erosion of his position, arrested only momentarily by the action of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton who broke the leaves and the jack into two separate resolutions.
> In the subsequent confusion, the Prime Minister seemed to be saying that he would stake the life of his government on adoption of the union jack, in its Queen and commonwealth context.
> Now he has made it clear that he isn't staking the life of his government on any flag—leaves, jacks, or what have you.
> And instead of fighting valiantly for the three leaf flag that he unveiled so dramatically last spring, he's saying that he'll agree to referral of the flag matter to a parliamentary committee, provided a time limit is set both on the committee's work and on the subsequent debate in parliament on whatever the committee recommends.
> This seems to me to be a considerable retreat from his previous position of solid support for the three leaf flag.
> And if the Prime Minister is retreating from the three leaf flag, the three leaf flag would appear to have little chance of ever being run up the parliamentary flagpole.

Mr. Lynch then says:

> What weakened Mr. Pearson's position?

Mr. Lynch then suggests reasons for this weakened position. Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will bear with me while I read another portion of this article. Mr. Lynch states:

> One factor has been his own unwillingness, and that of his Liberal colleagues, to stump the country in support of the three leaf flag.

In other words he is suggesting there is some dissension among Liberal backbenchers, and Mr. Pearson is just a little bit confused as to whether he would have the support of his party after the members got out on the election hustings, away from parliament and out from under his thumb. He is suggesting that perhaps these backbenchers when fighting in their own ridings would not be proud to fly the three maple leaf flag, and it would not receive the unanimous endorsation that Mr. Pearson thought it might.

Mr. Lynch then states in the last paragraph of this article under the heading "The Red Ensign is Now Stronger Than Ever":

> If not above the battle, it at least flew over the battlefield—

He was referring to the House of Commons.

> —and its position seems considerably stronger at summer's end than it was at the beginning.
> Mr. Pearson is ready to throw the design of a a new flag back into committee—a far cry from hopes that it would be flying by July 1, or for the royal visit in October.

Mr. Lynch is suggesting that the government is going to withdraw its flag and refer it to a committee in the hope that the committee can bring the government out of its state of confusion, and out of this hopeless situation it has brought parliament to, without losing too much face. Mr. Lynch then commends to opposition party for standing up for what it thought was right, in an effective debate in respect of this flag issue.

Certainly I should like to see this flag issue resolved. I know my constituents would like to see this house get on with the more urgent business of parliament, including the pension legislation, legislation in respect of the railways, which is of great concern to western Canada, legislation in respect of the Hall report, also of vital concern to Canadians, to say nothing of the legislation promised by the Minister of Agriculture six or seven months ago, which he said will revolutionize agriculture in Canada if only the opposition will allow him to bring it in. I am sure we are all agreeable to allowing him to bring in this legislation. I invite him to do so, and we will deal with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allowed him has expired.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the subamendment now before this house, because I feel that for several reasons I am in almost a unique position.

Those of us who live in the Northwest Territories have real difficulty in masking our incredulity and containing our amusement at the prospect of you sophisticated southerners trying to suffocate each other with an issue which on the surface at least has little real significance to us in the north. It is perhaps this very sort of thing that motivates some Canadians to move into the Northwest Territories, where there is enough work to do each day to keep their minds off these interesting but hardly productive problems.

For my own part, I do not have any mandate from my constituents on this particular issue. I believe I have received altogether four letters in the past year, three of them asking that the red ensign be retained and one asking that the new flag be a single maple leaf design. In fact only one person suggested anything, should there be a necessity to change the flag and after all, 10,000 of my constituents live in the Canadian barren lands.

I should like to ask you this question, Mr. Speaker. Have you ever tried to explain three maple leaves to an Eskimo who has never seen a tree? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would you like to fight an election about a flag, going to voters who have no access to flagpoles? What in God's name, we in the territories ask, is all this about? Who decided that now was the time to proceed with this issue? The people of the north on my recent visit continually asked me, what is going on? I could only tell them that our Prime Minister has chosen a design for a new flag and has said that until it is accepted the other business of parliament must remain on the shelf. I have told them that, if he chose, the Prime Minister could bring forward other pieces of legislation that are of direct concern to them, such as the pension plan, legislation in respect of the Hall commission report, and even legislation, which is long overdue in the Northwest Territories, giving the people of the north the right to vote in territorial elections. But in the eyes of the Prime Minister the right to vote takes second place to three maple leaves waving proudly over their heads on metal flagpoles.

What else can I say to answer the question of what is happening in this place, when asked by people who need schools, roads, hospitals and jobs to give them even half a chance to raise their families in health and decency? This prime ministerial preoccupation with a new flag is incomprehensible. To me personally, but speaking as a northern Canadian, the whole business is a pathetically stupid piece of fumbling by a Prime Minister devoted to tokenism in the handling of Canadian domestic problems. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the conversion of the flag debate in a barely disguised underground battle between the two founding races is a direct result of the ineptitude of the Prime Minister and more particularly of his advisers. The issue is not a real one, nor is the proposed solution a real solution. The subamendment we have before us is, as I see it, an attempt to modify and change a basically unsound and unfortunate government resolution.

I have spoken about these matters before and I intend to do so again today. When we talk about tokenism surely the parallel is obvious, that parallel being the B and B commission. This, after all, was one of the greatest exercises in tokenism that any Canadian prime minister has ever attempted. This is saying to people who have legitimate complaints, who have legitimate feelings of injustice on certain matters, "We will give you a commission where the extremists among you can run off at the mouth. It will change nothing really but we will say in the next election, see what we have done, we have set up the B and B commission," as though that accomplished anything.

This is what the flag issue is, too, because the Prime Minister and the government will go to the people of the country and say, see here are three maple leaves; you have unity, you have a nation. This is nonsense, and it is the most vicious kind of nonsense that could be perpetrated on the Canadian people at this time. I say it is vicious because I believe this issue is postponing in fact two essential steps that have to be taken to achieve Canadian unity. As I see them, these two steps are in the first place the repatriation of the constitution, which we know is being worked on but which will be postponed in the artificial atmosphere of a new flag; and second, a hard headed review of the responsibilities and the revenues in each of the federal and provincial spheres of government.

This is the work that needs to be done to give Canada a new sense of national purpose. What frightens me about the flag is that should it be accepted, be it three maple leaves or one, be they red or green, it will be used to say to the people, "Here, you really have something," when in fact the basic problems confronting this nation will have been postponed for an even longer period.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he wants to meet the needs of certain areas of Canada he should state firmly now the position his government will take in relation to new kinds of revenue and new kinds of arrangements that will be made with the provinces. Quebec has legitimate demands that must be met. What I want the Prime Minister to do is to outline these views to the house and the country, and say to Quebec and all the other provinces, "Beyond this we do not go".

I say that because what is bothering many people is a vague feeling of unease that there is no end to the demands that will be made by a group of people in a minority position who feel, perhaps quite rightly, that they have been treated unjustly. Such action on the part of the Prime Minister would do much in itself to remove the malaise that is affecting many Canadians and that causes them to interpret every act of the government as some kind of appeasement to Quebec, whether it is or not.

At this point I want to take a few moments to register strong objection to the efforts of numerous members of parliament from the province of Quebec in all parties to appoint themselves as the sole spokesmen for the so-called French Canadian people. I am a French Canadian from the Northwest Territories. I am as French Canadian as anyone in the House of Commons. I can trace my ancestry back to 1665 and an early deserter from the French forces. I am able to read French and can speak it haltingly, sufficiently well to get by. Indeed, I am relearning the language, and within a year I should be able to chatter along with the best of you.

But this is beside the point completely. Indeed, I resent the implicit suggestions that any French Canadian who cannot speak French has forsaken his cultural heritage or is some kind of traitor. I resent the suggestion that the well-being of French Canadians is totally tied up with the well-being of the province of Quebec.

I make these points, Mr. Speaker, because the myth is being circulated that all people of French descent support the expressions of view of a handful of extremists, some of whom are in this house. I have a right to speak for those French Canadians among us who do not live in Quebec, who do not speak French as their first language, who do not particularly feel that they have had an unfair deal, who do not resent the union jack or the red ensign, who do not consider the world wide use of English in commerce and international aviation as some sort of Anglo-Saxon plot against Quebec. Furthermore, I suggest that the widespread unease, anxiety and tension are being heightened by seemingly interminable demands on the part of some Quebec members, and more particularly by the startling inability of the government to manage the business of the house.

I urge the Prime Minister to use restraint in the course he has adopted, because the temper in the rest of Canada and indeed among many French Canadians in other parts of Canada is not good.

Mr. Berger: Who says so?

Mr. Rhéaume: I say so. You listen, because I will have more to say. I urge the Prime Minister and the government to depart from the kind of tactic that we saw too often in the two previous election campaigns, the business of destroying something that is good before you can say you have anything else to offer. It was a matter of real concern to me to see the disrespect that became widespread with regard to the red ensign and the efforts, which I have to believe were conscious and deliberate, to discredit the red ensign among the young people of the country and in certain parts of the country as a preliminary step to introducing the three maple leaves pattern. I say get rid of this kind of tactic, because you will never achieve unity that way and you will only leave many of us in Canada with a bitter taste in our mouths.

The amendment and subamendment set out the terms of a plebiscite. Some speakers have suggested that a plebiscite would divide the country as it has never been divided before, but oddly enough these same speakers feel that a vote in the House of Commons would not divide. I ask this question. Why in the world would anyone believe that feelings and emotions in the House of Commons would be less deep or less painful than in the country at large? Who is afraid to allow the Canadian people the opportunity to say what they want in terms of a majority vote in a plebiscite?

I ask this question today particularly after the sham and the subterfuge has been stripped away from the public position of the Prime Minister on this whole question of the flag. I have wondered for weeks how there could be complete unanimity in the Liberal caucus over the flag issue. It was not until the confession of the hon. member for York-Humber yesterday that I realized why there was no disagreement. The matter had never been discussed with the membership of the caucus.

I urge the Prime Minister to reconsider this whole question, its timing and its dangers. There is after all, Mr. Speaker, a difference between courage and foolhardiness. I suggest that the course he is now following can only lead to a confrontation of all strong people, can only divide and deepen mistrust. If he does not do this, if he insists as he did earlier today that he shall have his way, then I predict that he will be remembered in history not as a man of many distinguished accomplishments and contributions to Canada, but rather as the great token prime minister who helped the country into bitterness that will be a lasting black mark on his name, on our House of Commons and on our time.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I hesitated to rise, Mr. Speaker, because I did not want to prevent some member of the Liberal party from participating in the debate. I continue to wonder why no member of the cabinet has come to the defence of the Prime Minister. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was not doing that the other day. What has happened to the former great Liberal party?

However, as no one did rise, I take this opportunity to participate in what has become a great, historic debate of national importance. There is no question now, since ample evidence has been produced in the course of this debate, that there is a very strong feeling across this country against the action of the present government, and particularly the action of the Prime Minister. There has been ample evidence of the strength of feeling in members who have spoken so far in the course of this debate, and they have indicated that they are expressing the feelings of their constituents.

The miscalculation of the Prime Minister and his advisers has been shown to be very great. There was miscalculation with regard to the approach to a subject such as this which arouses the emotions, which affects our history and traditions; an amazing miscalculation with regard to the attitude that would be taken by the members of races other than the founding races of this country; a miscalculation with regard to the method by which an innovation like this should be brought forward.

This is a catalogue of errors. The result so far has been not to create the unity which the Prime Minister emphasized so much in his opening speech on this subject, but to create great disunity. The Prime Minister will go down in history as the man who, of his own accord, by his own faulty judgment, created greater disunity in this country than at any time in our history. This is a lamentable development indeed. I hope it is not too late for the Prime Minister to retrace his steps and restore to Canada better feeling with regard to the matters that should unite us rather than divide us.

In a matter such as this, as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris pointed out when he was speaking, evolution is the process, a slow and steady development if change is desired in something that touches so deeply at the roots of our country, and not the revolutionary tactics and arbitrary action of the government. This was the initial, vital mistake of the Prime Minister. His greatest error was made in his approach to the biennial conference of the Royal Canadian Legion in May of this year in the city of Winnipeg. Members of the Royal Canadian Legion will take second place to no citizens of this country in their devotion to duty and their love of their country. They have demonstrated this ever since the organization of that great body. Their efforts are primarily concentrated, after they have dealt with the problems of their disabled comrades, on improving the life of communities right across Canada and making stronger our national spirit.

However, it was to this body that the Prime Minister, without prior notice, without advising the officers of that organization that he was going to introduce a political note, brought forward his proposal for a new flag. As a member of the Legion since 1927 I register, as my comrades on this side of the house have, my protest against that action. When I heard that the Prime Minister was going out to Winnipeg to do this—and in this rumour-infested town you hear about these things in advance—I said it would not happen for three reasons. First, the Prime Minister is himself a veteran of the first world war. He will respect the stand of the veterans on the question of the flag. He knows they have been endeavouring to conduct a campaign to retain the Canadian red ensign. In the second place, he will not do it because, as a veteran, he knows that their opening ceremony held on Sunday is a memorial service, a deeply impressive memorial service, for the hundred thousand comrades who were left overseas around the world. I said that he would know every man and woman in that audience on that occasion would be thinking of friends who had been lost in battle. I said the third reason he would not do it would be that, after years of experience in the field of diplomacy and in political life, he would judge it to be unwise to introduce a political question under such circumstances.

Unfortunately the Prime Minister, either wrongly advised or failing to exercise good judgment, intruded himself upon that memorial service of the Canadian Legion and introduced a political tone that aroused controversy which will not be forgotten. Unfortunately the Prime Minister—and this is really unfortunate because veterans tend to respect veterans—lost the respect of thousands of members of the Canadian Legion. To show how much effect his announcement had on this gathering, in subsequent days when they were still assembled in their business sessions, a petition addressed to the Secretary of State was signed with 1,100 names, indicating the veterans were unimpressed with the Prime Minister's point of view and registering their opinion and belief that the Canadian red ensign should be maintained as Canada's flag. I shall transmit that petition to the Secretary of State as a permanent record of the feelings of the members of the Canadian Legion who were present at that meeting.

I intend to deal with certain inaccuracies which have crept into this debate, concerning the maple leaf emblem and the Canadian red ensign, and then I propose to indicate why in the suggested plebiscite, if and when it is held, people should give their support to the flag we now have rather than to the personal choice of the Prime Minister or to the personal choice of a fragment of the New Democratic party, because you have in those two suggestions political flags, flags sponsored by political parties. With regard to the inaccuracies that have crept into the debate so far, much has been made of the fact that the maple leaf has a long history in our country, and with that I do not disagree. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), who patiently made quite a study of this matter, pointed that out when he was talking. It has been a recognized symbol and, as I said during the course of his speech, we admire it as a symbol but not as a flag.

I do not quarrel with any of the arguments made about the antiquity of the maple leaf as a Canadian symbol, but I do suggest that the references made by the hon. member for Leeds and the Prime Minister, with regard to its use by the Canadian army overseas and Canadian service people overseas in two world wars, are somewhat inaccurate.

Quite a bit was made of the fact that most of the battalions that served overseas in the first world war wore the maple leaf as a cap badge or shoulder badge. That is true because about 90 per cent of them did; but I happen to be one, like the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane), who served in that world war and never wore a maple leaf badge. There were thousands of others also in a similar position. However most of the battalions did have a maple leaf badge, and it arose this way.

When mobilization was called in 1914 General Sir Sam Hughes, minister of national defence, decided he would not use the names of the militia regiments and favoured instead, and so ordered, that regiments would be numbered. So the battalions that were raised were numbered from one up to several hundred. Then, when the battalions were being organized the commanding officers were faced with a considerable problem, one which I have gone through twice in my experience in the army, namely what to do for a cap badge, what should be the design, and what to do with a number, like 7, 44 or 115, pinned to the cap. The obvious solution was to put a backing on the cap badge, and the easiest thing to deal with was a maple leaf. And so the maple leaf was used as a base and the numbers were superimposed on it.

There were a few exceptions. The Little Black Devils of Winnipeg did not put the maple leaf behind their historic figure. The 22nd regiment superimposed their number on the beaver, and the Black Watch maintained their original insignia. The Fort Garry Horse of Winnipeg had the Fort Garry gate, and they put the maple leaf behind that; but they should now remove it because the Fort Garry gate alone is sufficient recognition of that regiment. Neither did the Royal Canadian Dragoons make use of the maple leaf. And so it was by accident, not by design, that the maple leaf was so outstanding and so extensively used in the first world war.

In the second world war about 60 per cent of the battalions in the army used the maple leaf in connection with their badges, and 40 per cent did not. Once again in my experience in the second world war I served in northwest Europe without wearing anything resembling a maple leaf, and so did thousands of other members of the Canadian army, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the navy. In the second world war the maple leaf was not the all-pervading symbol that it was in the first world war, and in the regular army of today only about 20 per cent of the battalions have a maple leaf incorporated in the design of their badges. Therefore the maple leaf has been going out of existence since the first world war, when it arose by accident, and you cannot make an argument on the basis of war experience that the maple leaf was preferred by Canadian servicemen.

To give the house an example of how misconceptions arise, in the fall of 1945 some parliamentarians visited northwest Europe. They motored up from the Normandy beaches into Holland, and by that time the army was forward in Holland and on the banks of the Meuse. These parliamentarians were impressed by what they saw en route and one of them made the following remarks a few years ago, after indicating where they had been. As a matter of fact they did not drive up from the Normandy beaches. They flew into Brussels, motored down the coastline and then up into Holland; but this is what he says about the Canadian troops:

> As if they were anxious to show that they were Canadians they had painted maple leaves on pieces of cardboard, and nailed them to the telegraph poles and trees along the road. If up to that time I had not believed that Canada should have a distinctive flag, I would have believed it then. And ever since that time, whenever, I have had the opportunity I have told that story, because I think it meets some of the arguments of those who think that we should not consider having a purely distinctive national flag.

It is very easy for misconceptions to arise when you do not know the facts. The fighting troops of the Canadian army were much further forward than these visiting parliamentarians. The parliamentarians travelled along a route which was marked with maple leaf emblems from the Normandy beaches into Holland, and the purpose of those markings was simply to direct the lorry drivers on that long drive, travelling night and day, so that they would not have to stop to read maps. We called it "maple leaf up" and "maple leaf down". Those signs were just road signs set up by ingenious Canadians for that purpose, and they were of great help to a lorry driver I had in my regiment who was unable to read or write, but who could follow the signs.

One of the visiting parliamentarians thought this was evidence of a national desire on the part of the Canadian troops to have the maple leaf as their symbol. But there was nothing to it at all. It was simply a route director and the Canadian soldiers paid no more attention to this than they did to a great many other things during their lives. As a matter of fact, in both world wars the distinguishing sign for Canadians was the word "Canada" on the shoulder, worn on the greatcoat or on the tunic. You don't peer at a man's cap badge to find out what country he comes from; you look at the flash on his shoulder. Every Canadian was proud to have the word "Canada" there, and that is how they were designated. In forward areas, where steel helmets were worn, there were no cap badges in evidence. It was the distinguishing regimental flash, the brigade and divisional insignia on the arm of the tunic, which indicated where a man belonged.

Mr. Matheson: But every divisional badge contained a maple leaf.

Mr. Churchill: No. In the first world war there were 140 badges and these will be found in the official history of that war. They were of different colours, and there is not a maple leaf to be found among them.

Another inaccuracy which has crept into this debate is the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) as reported on page 4321 of Hansard:

> The red ensign, though many of my correspondents do not seem to appreciate this, was not in use during world war one in any way, shape or form for the Canadian forces.

I do not know where the Prime Minister served during the first world war but I think it was not in Flanders. He must have been completely unaware of what was going on. Yesterday my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), imperturbable as he must have been as an artillery man in the first world war, showed equal imperturbility here under a missile attack in the House of Commons and gave incontrovertible evidence that the Canadian red ensign was used among Canadian troops between 1914 and 1918, and backed his statements up with testimony from General McNaughton. I can corroborate this story, because I was present also, on July 1, Dominion day, at the corps sports event which everyone who was there will remember all his life. On that occasion, Canadian red ensigns were flying freely at our assembly points.

Was the Canadian red ensign used elsewhere in the first world war? Of course. In 1918 a monument was unveiled to the artillerymen who lost their lives during the battle of Vimy ridge and the Canadian red ensign was flown at the unveiling; a picture of it may be found in some of the books in the library. The Prime Minister did not make the long march from Mons to Germany to join the army of occupation. But I did. When we crossed the Rhine bridges, the first division crossing at Cologne and the second division at Bonn, we passed reviewing stands and on those stands the Canadian red ensign was flying with the union jack. I remember it very well, and as far as the bridge at Bonn is concerned, a reproduction appears in the August 1 edition of the Globe magazine—the second Canadian division passing the reviewing stand where the Canadian red ensign was flying. We experienced the same thing when the first Canadian division crossed the bridge at Cologne.

Let me remind the house of another significant factor. Earlier than this, in 1915, in the month of April, the Canadian first division—I was not there at the time—was subjected to a poison gas attack and fought the battle of St. Julien which prevented the Germans breaking through to Ypres and the coast. The name of Canada was spread throughout the world as a result of that action. This was the first occasion in the history of the world upon which poison gas had been used, and our Canadian troops were among the first to be subjected to it. They were without any protection whatsoever—it was before gas masks had been invented. And they held the line, though the Canadian division suffered 6,000 casualties, killed and wounded. But, as I say, the name of Canada was flashed across the world and in the celebrated magazine Punch, an artist, sensing the significance of that occasion, drew a picture which has since been reproduced many times in this country—it should be hanging somewhere in the corridors of our parliament buildings. It was a picture of a Canadian soldier standing on a battlefield amid barbed wire and mud; near him is a piece of artillery and all around is a scene of desolation and destruction. The soldier standing there holds a rifle in one hand, and in the other, he grasps—what? A Canadian red ensign—the distinctive flag of Canada at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: I mention these things to correct some of the inaccuracies which have crept into this debate thus far.

Another inaccuracy which is even more alarming is an inaccuracy with regard to Canada's coat of arms. The Prime Minister and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) have based their case on the emblem of the three maple leaves which appears in the coat of arms, and they have drawn our attention to the proclamation of 1921. It is an incidental footnote to history that when this declaration was signed by King George in 1921 it was transmitted to Canada, to the governor general here, by none other than one who was a member of the government at that time, the most famous man of this century, Winston Churchill. His letter will be found in the appropriate books.

Hon. members opposite have spoken about that proclamation and they have based their case upon it. But they have been misled into inaccuracies. I do not think they realize the extent of those inaccuracies. On June 15, the Prime Minister, as recorded on page 4322 of Hansard, spoke on the subject of the proclamation and the order in council, and then he used these words:

> If I may paraphrase this royal proclamation of 1921 establishing the arms of Canada, by simplifying the heraldic language, what it said in essence was this: The King, at the request of Canada, assigns to Canada the national colours white and red, and declares that the national emblem of Canada shall be three red maple leaves on one stem, on a white field. These shall be used to represent Canada on all appropriate occasions. Surely Mr. Speaker, that answers the two questions "What are our national colours"? "What is our national emblem"?

I suggest, first, that those words were not the original words of the Prime Minister; they are the words of Colonel Duguid, who delivered exactly that interpretation of the proclamation to the committee which was meeting in 1945 to discuss the Canadian flag. Those words, which I shall soon show to be inaccurate, have continued down for almost 20 years now, have received the blessing of the Prime Minister and are already being quoted as authentic by people who are writing letters to newspapers.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I will but interrupt my hon. friend for a moment, but I wonder whether at this point he would be good enough to explain the answer given by his government on February 5, 1963, to question No. 1,449. This question was:

> Does Canada have a national emblem; and if so, what is the emblem?

Canadian Flag

The answer was:

Yes. Three maple leaves conjoined on one stem.

The other question was:

Does Canada have national colours; and if so, what are these colours?

Yes. White and red.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: I am very glad the hon. member mentioned that, Mr. Speaker, because he has been studying this problem and his speech in June encouraged me to study it. I would say now that the government of our day was misled, in exactly the same way as was the government of Mr. Mackenzie King, the government of Mr. St. Laurent, and the present government. I shall give the house the evidence to show this is the case. I will put forward two pieces of evidence. One is contained in the committee report of 1945 and is to be found on page 59. Mr. Savage, who is not without distinction in the art of heraldry, made these statements. He said that Colonel Duguid's statement abounds in false premises and inaccuracies; that Colonel Duguid has confounded the colours of mantling and crest wreath with "national colours"; has taken the maple sprig, a small part of Canada's arms, and incorrectly stated that it is the "national emblem of Canada". Then Mr. Savage says in so doing Colonel Duguid has changed from green to red the accepted and heraldically proper colour of the maple leaves; has read into and deduced from the proclamation, and has presented as facts, conclusions and statements which definitely are not included in that document.

As further evidence let me draw to the attention of the house the explanatory notes that were produced by the committee of 1921. The committee, which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) has drawn to our attention, and has commended for its ability—with which I do not disagree at all, because very able men sat on that committee—made certain comments in their explanatory notes concerning the coat of arms. You have to refer to a bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics in order to find what they had to say. I have been able to find only the second edition of a descriptive booklet published by the office of the secretary of state in 1923. There was obviously a first edition. There have been subsequent editions published, I think, in 1937 and 1947. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I had to go back to the d.b.s. annual report of 1921 to find out what they had decided was the meaning of that proclamation and the advice they had given to the government. This is what you will find on page 17 of the Canada Year Book of 1921:

> Three considerations were kept in view in determining the "achievement of arms", i.e., the combination of arms, crest, supporters and motto, which has now been authorized. These were: first, that Canadians stand to their King in as close a relation as do any of his subjects elsewhere; secondly, that Canada, an integral part of the British empire, has emerged from the war a member of the league of nations; and lastly, that Canada was founded by the men of four different races—French, English, Scottish and Irish—and that Canadians inherit the language, laws, literature and arms of all four mother countries.
> The arms are those of England, Scotland, Ireland, and France, with a "difference" to mark them as Canadian, namely, on the lower third of the shield, a sprig of maple on a silver shield.
> The crest is a lion holding in its paw a red maple leaf, a symbol of sacrifice.
> The supporters are, with some slight distinctions, the lion and unicorn of the royal arms. The lion upholds the union jack, and the unicorn the ancient banner of France.
> The motto is new—A mari usque ad mare—"From Sea to Sea"...

There is not one word there with regard to national colours. Are we to believe that the committee which sat in 1921, and which subsequently drew up the representations for the coat of arms and had the coat of arms produced and submitted to the college of heralds in London, were dealing with national colours when they went through all that work? Why did they not make some mention of "national colours" in the course of their explanatory notes? Why is there no mention of this in the subsequent issues? In this issue there is not one word about "national colours". I ask the hon. member for Leeds, who has made a study of this problem, to indicate to me the authority by which he determined that the mantling on the coat of arms represents national colours. I have not been able to find any authority for that.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, if I may—

Mr. Churchill: Subsequently he may be able to give us that information. If so, I shall be very grateful. But I want to move on to this other significant point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may answer that point. These colours are in both the wreath of the liveries and in the mantling of the arms. And has this not been completely covered in the announcement of the Hon. Ellen Fairclough of October 8, 1957 and, furthermore, Her Majesty's banner as Queen of Canada, containing three maple leaves on a white field at base, which was created by Sir Anthony Wagner in 1962, when my hon. friend was a member of the privy council?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Is the hon. member for Leeds rising to ask a question, or is he rising on a point of order?

Some hon. Members: He made a speech.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I rose in reply to what was said by my hon. friend and also to ask a question of him. My question is, has not this matter been dealt with by the clear, unequivocal statement of the Hon. Ellen Fairclough of October 8, 1957; and, furthermore, the subsequent act of Her Majesty in 1962 on the matter of her own banner as Queen of Canada?

Mr. Churchill: I do not mind these interruptions, Mr. Speaker, provided my time is not subsequently reduced, because it is a very interesting question. I think our government was misled, just as other governments were misled, by that original statement of Colonel Duguid's. Let me deal now with the three red maple leaves. I have read the description that on the coat of arms there is a lion standing on the crest, holding in an uplifted paw a red maple leaf. The explanation is, "The crest is a lion holding in its paw a red maple leaf, a symbol of sacrifice". That description or definition was repeated in the subsequent issues concerning the arms of Canada, published by the office of the Secretary of State, until you reach the issue of this year, 1964, when that descriptive sentence is left out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Why was it left out? In the terminology of the coat of arms this red leaf is described as "gules", which means red. There were three other leaves in the coat of arms and the description, I think, can be given as "proper", or in the French version, "au naturel", which means in its natural state. The red maple leaf had been pre-empted for one specific purpose, to indicate the sacrifice of life in the first world war which contributed to the building of our nation.

We cannot have then, sir, one red maple leaf representing that sacrifice and then three more red maple leaves. That was never intended, because had the people who devised the coat of arms in 1921 intended that the three leaves at the bottom should be red they would have specifically stated that and used the word "gules". They did not use that word but instead "proper" or "au naturel". The maple leaf in its natural state is green. It is when the leaf is dying that it turns red.

Are we to take away from the coat of arms, as has been taken away in this descriptive booklet, that red maple leaf which represents a blood sacrifice in the first world war? I say that Colonel Duguid was wrong when he said that the three maple leaves at the lower part of the coat of arms should be red. He was obviously aiming at the achievement of something; a white background for a flag with red maple leaves.

We are now faced with this problem. What do we do with the coat of arms? If we are going to accept the idea of three red maple leaves on a white background in the coat of arms, what do we do with the red maple leaf in the right paw of the lion representing that sacrifice? You see, this is an impossible situation. I suggest this change was made for some deliberate purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I am surprised that members opposite laugh. I think that red maple leaf representing the sacrifice made in the first world war is very proper and should be retained. I think, therefore, we should revert to the colour which was on the crest before, namely three green maple leaves.

Referring again to the original question asked by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), Mr. Speaker, I think that the secretary of state in 1957 was misled or not given complete information. As a matter of fact, I phoned her to find out what the situation was, but my only recollection of that episode is that we were told the coat of arms would be changed because Queen Elizabeth had selected a different crown; the St. Edward crown to replace the Tudor crown. The only alteration required in the coat of arms was a redrawing of the crown, and that was done.

That opened the way to what has been called a simplification of the coat of arms. I do not object to this and I think it has been done rather nicely. However, in the circular letter—there was no order in council—issued on September 23, 1957 and signed by the under secretary of state, there was nothing to indicate that there would be changes made in the coat of arms. There was reference to the fact that the change was being made because of the change of crown, and I think this is sensible. There was also reference to simplifying representations of the coat of arms but not one word in respect of changing the green maple leaves to red.

Mr. Speaker, when the enlarged coat of arms was hung up in the railway committee room several years ago I looked at it week after week while sitting there in caucus, and I commenced to wonder why we could not have the colours put on that coat of arms. I went to the Speaker of the house, Hon. Mr. Michener, and asked whether steps could be taken to have that coat of arms coloured so we could see exactly what was on it. Had it been coloured I am sure I would have noticed the change from green to red.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest an error has been committed, and the reason I have dealt with this matter at length is that unless this error is corrected people outside this House of Commons, writing about our coat of arms and our so-called national colours, will follow this mistaken course. I feel this error should be corrected.

Mr. Speaker, I could produce more evidence from people skilled in heraldry to support my point of view. I think it would be a great advantage to a committee to consider this problem and to call for expert advice. We are amateurs in heraldry. I did not know much about it three months ago, although I know a lot more about it today. But we are only amateurs. Furthermore, the revised coat of arms issued in 1957 was not submitted to the college of heralds in London, and there is no college of heralds in Canada. It was not submitted for their advice, counsel and approval as to whether or not this design was accurate. I suggest we have fallen into an error. We are referring to Canada's colours being white and red. I say there is no authority for that suggestion. We are talking about Canada's national emblem being three red maple leaves on a silver-white background. I say there is no authority for that suggestion whatsoever, except that statement made by Colonel Duguid in 1945.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member whether he has given serious consideration—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired, unless he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether the hon. member is overlooking in his comments the fact that a royal warrant of Queen Victoria in 1868 conferred—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Leeds can be allowed to ask a question I think we must ascertain whether hon. members will extend the permission of the house to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to speak beyond his allotted time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I do not see any objection to the hon. member who had the floor being allowed to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) but I am against his being given more time.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Apparently the hon. member does not have the unanimous consent of the house to continue. I regret that we cannot hear him.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is very difficult for the Chair, in view of comments being made on both sides of the house, to determine clearly whether or not the hon. member has unanimous consent to continue. Do we have unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hear at least one no, and in the circumstances I regret that the hon. member may not continue.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I bow to the will of the house.

Mr. A. M. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I originally had no intention of entering this debate on the flag, but after so many opposition members stating that the backbenchers in the Liberal party should get up and state their opinions I concluded that I should do so, and give my reasons for the position I take. It is not against my conscience that I do so, Mr. Speaker.

First let me say I am a Canadian, a Legion member and a past president of my local Legion branch. I am a life member of the Legion and I served in the first great war under the union flag or, as it is called, the union jack. Sometimes I think I belong to the lost generation, the generation of the union jack. All these things I do not think should keep me from thinking and stating that Canada should have a distinctive flag.

As a Canadian, my ancestors have been here for upwards of 200 years. Before the first great war I was what you might call a Britisher—not an Englishman, Mr. Speaker, but a Britisher. Canada was a part of the empire and I was a British subject. For me, when the empire was at war Canada was at war. At that time I was not alone in those thoughts. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was an ardent champion of the empire. In fact, in 1898 his postmaster general brought out a stamp and the stamp showed the British empire all in red and Canada in the centre. The words on the stamp were, "We hold a vaster empire than has been". Even the Transvaal and the Orange Free State of South Africa were incorporated in red, although I believe they were not annexed by Britain until two years later.

For many reasons the first great war changed the opinions and ideas of a great many people, and after the war for me Canada came first. On returning home I thought in the words of the poet:

> Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land?

If I was not before, Mr. Speaker, I was a Canadian then; but the union jack was still my flag. It has been said by opposition members that the cross of St. George, the cross of St. Andrew and the cross of St. Patrick, together forming the union jack, have always stood for high ideals, justice and freedom and that in fact they represent our Christian faith. I would say that on balance in the past this was probably true. But what about a Scotsman whose forebears were forced out of Scotland under this same flag? Can he look back and, remembering the forced emigration from Scotland, the clansmen who were evicted from the highlands, the homes that were burned and the people who died on the emigration ships, think that that flag at that time represented high ideals, justice, freedom and the Christian faith for the highlanders? The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) can perhaps bear me out.

Reading John Prebble's "The Highland Clearances", one finds that in the summer of 1791 George Dunoon advertised the sailing of the Sarah and the Dove from Fort William in Scotland for Pictou, Nova Scotia. Had the laws then covering slave ships applied to these emigration vessels, they would not have been allowed to carry more than 489 passengers. Dunoon filled the tiny holds with 700 emigrants from Lord Reay's country and the clan lands of Seaforth, Fraser and Cameron. If they believed his promise that in Nova Scotia they would find a tree that supplied fuel, soap and sugar, they might have found the nightmare voyage endurable, but it is unlikely. Forty nine people died on the Sarah alone and the suffering of all was so terrible that it was remembered in Nova Scotia for more than a century.

You might say, Mr. Speaker, why did they go? Well, the lairds or the chiefs of the clans owned the lands and they could not resist English money. The Scottish highlands were rented or bought up for sheep ranches. The people were evicted from their homes and if they did not move their homes were burned. They had to emigrate. It is surprising to me, Mr. Speaker, that so many of these people, including myself, still have a great love for their native land, Scotland, and for the flag which looked down on these terrible scenes. Perhaps it is because we can forget the past. I heard a member of the opposition say that a country that forgets its past has no future, or words to that effect. However, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that most of the trouble in the world is because we cannot forget the past or do not wish to forget the past.

Look at the trouble on Cyprus, Mr. Speaker, the trouble on the Israeli border, the trouble in Kenya. In fact, it seems to me that the trouble all over the world is caused by people who cannot forget the past. My great-great-grandfather was scalped by the French and Indians on a raid down the Saint John river, but I do not see that this is any reason for me to keep on remembering it so that I should hate all Frenchmen and all Indians. Apparently we were a bicultural people at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[Text]

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the opposition members—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just said that his ancestors were scalped by the French. I wonder where in history books that fact is mentioned and, consequently, I feel that this gratuitous statement should be deleted from the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is obvious that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Dorchester is not well taken. He could ask a question which the hon. member for Charlotte could answer, but he cannot raise a point of order in this connection.

Canadian Flag

[Text]

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Again, I heard an opposition member say that his father came to this country and found freedom. A great many people have come to this country and found freedom, but it was not always thus. We did not always have responsible government in Canada.

Mr. Mandziuk: We do not have it now.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Louis Joseph Papineau and William Mackenzie had to go to the United States. We had a rebellion in 1837. We did not always have responsible government in this Canada of ours. It was my great-grandfather and great-great-grandfather and many of the great-grandfathers of the members present who made this country and laid the foundations of freedom for those who came after to enjoy and for the present generation to enjoy.

It has been said by an opposition member that the Canadian red ensign is known all over the world as representing Canada, and is the only red ensign. I would point out that in 1939 there were six red ensigns. The British mercantile marine had one, Canada had one, Jamaica had one, British Guiana had one, Tasmania had one and Newfoundland had one. I have known the union jack and the red ensign for over 70 years and to my mind the red ensign has always been a secondary flag.

As of 1939, Pear's Encyclopedia states that the flag flown over Canadian government buildings outside Canada is the red ensign, but that inside Canada the union jack is used. Before the first great war we had no embassies abroad but after the war in the early thirties, I believe, embassies were established and there was no way to distinguish a Canadian embassy from a British embassy if they both flew the union jack, which was the flag of Canada. So apparently the secondary flag, the red ensign, was flown over these buildings. Hence Pear's Encyclopedia states that in 1939 the red ensign was flown over Canadian government buildings outside Canada and by the Canadian mercantile marine, but inside Canada the union jack was used.

The union flag was introduced in 1606 after the union of England and Scotland and first bore the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew. It was ordered by James I to be borne on the maintop of all British ships except ships of war. On ships of war the union flag was borne upon their jackstaffs. I believe this is the reason why it is called the union jack. The cross of St. Patrick was added in 1801 on the union with Ireland.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are three ensigns and the ensign is flown upon the ensign staff of the vessel indicating its nationality. The red, white and blue ensigns represented the divisions of the British fleet but in 1864 the divisions were done away with and new uses were allocated to the three ensigns. The white ensign is the exclusive flag of the Royal Navy and the Royal Yacht Squadron. The red ensign is flown by British merchant ships and ships not belonging to the Royal Navy. The blue ensign is flown by the Royal Naval Reserve and by certain yacht clubs.

The Cambridge Encyclopedia states that colonial war vessels flew the blue ensign with the colony's badge in the fly. Recently I made a voyage on a Canadian government fishery vessel to Campobello and I noticed that the vessel flew the blue ensign and it had a badge in the fly, I presume denoting the colony. I would also point out that in Jamaica the flag with the crosses flew for nearly 300 years, 100 years longer than in Canada. When Jamaica became independent this flag, which had represented the power and prestige of the British for 300 years, was pulled down or lowered not by a citizen of Jamaica but by a member of the royal family, Princess Margaret. I would point out also, Mr. Speaker, that the blue ensign, the flag of Kenya, was pulled down or lowered not by a citizen of Kenya but by a member of the royal family, Prince Philip. Can the opposition be more loyal to the crown than the royal family itself?

It has been said by members of the opposition that the crosses on our flag represent the Christian faith and the government is engaged in pulling down the Chistian faith; that they are apparently about to raise a non-Christian flag. Some rather vicious propaganda has come across my desk in this regard. In one propaganda sheet headed, "The Sign of the Times", it states:

> Christian haters have taken the cross off the soldiers' graves, so take the cross off the flag—the next will be the cross out of the churches.

I do not believe that any member in this house would agree that this is true. I would point to the Irish republic, a Christian state from early days and the emerald isle of St. Patrick. I suppose the Irishmen in the Irish republic are more Roman Catholic than the Roman Catholics themselves. Yet when they got a new flag, Mr. Speaker, did they put on it the cross of St. Patrick? No, they did not.

The Irish republic has a flag consisting of three stripes, green, white and orange. I can imagine that the green is for the emerald isle and the white is probably for honour or the Christian state. However the orange, that colour stumped me, unless it was put on for the orangemen of the six counties of northern Ireland with whom they wish to unite some time. The stripes are all of equal width, the green being nearest the pole. This argument, therefore, about Christianity and the flag seems to me to fall flat when we consider the flag of the Irish republic. In fact, many Christian countries have crosses on their flags and many Christian countries have not. Are we to say that the great republic to the south of us is not a Christian country because a cross does not appear on its flag?

I want a distinctive Canadian flag, Mr. Speaker. I have 12 grandchildren and I do not want them living in the past. I want them to live for the future. I want a distinctive Canadian flag for that future for them. Then, they and all other grandchildren in Canada can say, "This is my flag; this is the Canadian flag which represents the Canada of the future". Canada is a great country, Mr. Speaker. It is going to be still greater in thought, in word and in deed. I see the future of Canada in the bright, young and intelligent faces I look upon as I travel across our wonderful land.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, since the day the session began this house has probably not faced a more important or a more serious decision than that concerning the new flag of this country. The flag, in itself, may not be important but that for which it stands is most important. Someone has said it represents the soul of the people, and I believe that. I believe that no amount of effort, no expense and no amount of time should stand in the way of this house choosing and offering the Canadian people a flag which will attain the unity of the people. Unity is needed in this country as much as anything else is needed. We have two great races that are undertaking to create, on the northern half of this continent, a great nation. Its future is almost unlimited. We have made a great start.

There have been murmurings recently of discontent, a certain amount of bickering and quarrelling between the founding races of this country. I do not believe that this is serious, and after listening to the speeches in this debate I think that this house and the people of the country can take great hope from what has transpired so far. The government, I honestly believe, has tried to add to the unity of Canada by presenting to the people a new Canadian flag, a distinctive flag, a flag which the people of Canada will be willing to accept as their own. I would commend the government for this, even although I think their approach to this problem is very wrong.

During one of the discussions of a recent budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) urged this house to give consideration to the objectives of the government, to take cognizance of what the government was trying to do, to give them credit for trying to improve the economy of this country. Well, I am willing to give the government credit for trying to create a greater measure of satisfaction in this country through the introduction of a flag.

Now we have before us a resolution, an amendment and a subamendment. The principle involved in the resolution is the establishment of a distinctive Canadian flag for Canada. I can agree with that. I can agree with most of the first sentence in the resolution which is to the effect that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish an official flag. I cannot agree with the remainder of it. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has moved that all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted:

> As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag.

Again, so far as the idea of a plebiscite is concerned, I am in wholehearted accord with it. I am speaking for myself when I say I question the words after the word "plebiscite" which are, "prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons," and my reason for questioning that particular part of the amendment will be made clear as I go along.

The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) would seek to insert four questions in a plebiscite:

> 1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
> 2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
> 3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
> 4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

I would like to see the people of Canada offered their choice in this regard, but I would not put these questions in words, I would put them in flag designs. The ballot would contain four, five or six of the most popular designs that can be arrived at through an all party committee or through a commission, and the people would be allowed to mark their "X" opposite the particular design of their choice. If that method were followed I see no reason why a flag design could not be arrived at and accepted which could be a unifying influence in this country.

Some people favour the red ensign; some favour three maple leaves, some favour one maple leaf. But there are other people who do not favour any of these and who are looking for something in the nature of a compromise, and that is the group which has my sympathy. If there is insistence on the unmodified red ensign there will be a large element dissatisfied. If the three maple leaf design is imposed by this house there will also be a great many people dissatisfied. It may be contended that you can never arrive at a design which will satisfy everybody, and I agree with that contention.

However I feel that the greatest amount of satisfaction and the greatest amount of unanimity can be reached through the acceptance of a flag which is acceptable to the majority of the people in this country. I have in my hand, and I suppose most members of the house have received this little flag, a design which may be folded, composed of a red cross and a blue cross arranged on a white background, with a maple leaf superimposed over the centre. This has been suggested by one of our colleagues from the province of Quebec. Another suggestion by one of our colleagues from Quebec is a flag divided diagonally from the upper outside corner to the lower inside corner, the upper inside triangle being red and containing a small union jack—quite small, not a quarter of the flag as it is in the red ensign—and the outside triangle, being white and containing a fleur-de-lis. I am only suggesting these as possible compromise flags which would tend to satisfy everyone and which would tend to unity rather than division.

The opposition has a job to do. Under the rules and traditions of parliament it is the duty and right of the opposition to prevent the government from taking action which might not be in the best interests of the country as a whole. The official opposition believes that the procedure—and I repeat the word procedure—being used by the government in seeking to establish a new national flag is harmful to national unity and should be abandoned in favour of a different approach. The procedure being followed amounts to an autocratic imposition on the majority of Canadians against their will, and despite their protests, of a political, unilaterally chosen, unsatisfactory, party labelled flag.

A summer recess has been offered parliament as an incentive for acceptance, and a general election has been threatened for refusal. The stubborn persistence of the government in forcing this flag issue, in the way it is forcing it, has disrupted the orderly processes of parliament, has delayed the sessional program of legislation and is degrading the image of this institution. The government's methods have failed to promote unity and have failed to bring to the people of Canada the satisfaction that can rightfully be expected through the establishment of a distinctive, acceptable national flag.

The government's methods of approach have proved a failure. Widespread dissatisfaction and disunity have been the result. The time has come to adopt a new approach to this flag problem. The new approach suggested is the abandonment of the government's nation-wrecking, unity-destroying flag resolution in its present form, in favour of a continued search for other more satisfactory flag designs, through the medium of an all party committee, with the final choice to be made through a national plebiscite or referendum.

This is not a sudden unconsidered idea on my part. On February 24 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the following question on the orders of the day as shown on page 136 of Hansard:

> In view of the government's undertaking to provide the people of Canada with a distinctive national flag, has consideration been given or will consideration be given to allowing the people to make their own choice through a plebiscite or referendum from among several of the most popular designs, including the red ensign?

To which the Prime Minister replied:

> All I can say at the moment, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the procedure which should be followed in this matter is that parliament certainly should be put in a position to decide for or against a particular flag. As to whether it would be desirable to have a popular referendum on this matter so that the people could choose from among a number of designs, I would like to give that matter very careful consideration before agreeing to it.

I hope that as a result of this debate the Prime Minister can see his way clear to adopting such a course.

I have searched for the judgment of others to support my contention that the government is on the wrong track and in this regard I would refer the house to an editorial, already mentioned on several occasions during this debate, which appeared in the Globe and Mail some three months ago under the heading "Collision Course". It appeared in the issue of June 2, 1964. Even three months ago the editor who wrote this article could see where the situation was leading. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> In his haste to give Canada a distinctive national flag, Prime Minister Lester Pearson has set his government and the nation itself on a collision course. There is still time for him to alter it. But there is not much time.

It seemed for a while during recent weeks as though an irresistible force had met an immoveable object. Something had to give. I am relieved, as I am sure all members of this house are relieved, that the government has seen the light to the extent that the threat of an election as a result of an adverse vote in the house has been rescinded. I believe the government has greatly increased its popularity by so doing. If they are willing to go the rest of the way and adopt an all-party approach to this flag issue, I am sure their stock will rise even higher. I am asking for a new approach through an all-party committee, the final selection from among several popular designs to be reached through a plebiscite or referendum.

The editorial article to which I have referred goes on to mention four errors the Prime Minister made in the method he used to provide Canada with a distinctive national flag. The first, the article says, was in setting a time limit of two years within which the new flag was to be produced. The second was to make the flag issue a question of confidence in the government, with a threat to dissolve parliament if the proposed new flag did not gain acceptance. Hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister started out with the idea of a free vote. He later changed his mind and made the issue a question of confidence. Now he is back to a free vote. We want him to change his mind further and make a new start altogether. By doing so he would make himself, his party, and the country generally, a lot happier.

The Prime Minister's third error, in the opinion of this editorial writer, was in giving the flag issue precedence over other pressing business in this house. On June 3, the day following the appearance of this article, the right hon. gentleman outlined 38 items of business, passage of which was required before a summer recess. The flag resolution was not even mentioned. Yet 27 days later, by June 30, when the Prime Minister announced the final five or six items of legislation that he wished completed before a summer recess could be declared, this flag resolution had assumed such importance that it dominated the whole legislative program. The question is: What happened during the month of June to give the flag resolution such importance?

There have been some interesting speculations arising out of this question. One of them is that the flag issue was deliberately injected into the program in order to create a deadlock and provide an excuse for an election. If this was so, the bluff was called by the opposition. If the government wanted an election they were offered an opportunity to have one. Responsible members of this house will not be bought off or bluffed out of doing their job according to the dictates of their consciences.

The editorial writer in the Globe and Mail listed a fourth error. He said this was the bringing in of a doublebarrelled flag resolution covering both the government's design of three maple leaves and the union jack. By skilful use of the rule book the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) got the government out of that political sand-trap. The doublebarrelled resolution would have meant defeat in the house; government supporters would not have been willing to take the chance. This so-called fourth error lends further credence to the proposition that the government, for a time at least, was inviting defeat in order to justify an election.

However that may be, the situation was all changed as of Friday last when the Prime Minister lifted the election threat from the house and declared that any vote on the flag resolution or on the amendments thereto would be entirely free.

The Globe and Mail editorial writer ends with the following conclusion:

> So we could have an election on, of all issues, a national flag. In such an election, we would be saying that the party with the most popular flag was the one best fitted to run the country. Canada should not—must not—get itself into this ludicrous and dangerous situation.
> This is a time for statesmanship. Mr. Pearson should call in the leaders of the four opposition parties and thresh out the whole matter with them.

I am glad to say he has done that. The article goes on:

> He should attempt to find agreement to a method of proceeding with the flag resolution that, by keeping the debate within bounds, would spare the nation from being pitchforked into an election it does not want, on an issue that would threaten national unity.

I submit that editorial articles in the newspaper having the status of the Globe and Mail are worthy of consideration and it is my view that the contents of this article make good backing for the contention that the government is on the wrong track in its search for a national flag, and that the sooner it changes its approach the better it will be for all concerned. This editorial also supports strongly the proposition that the flag should not be a unilateral party choice but should be made an all-party project. We in this party are not asking that the government abandon their search for a satisfactory flag design. We are in favour of a distinctive national flag for Canada; a statement to that effect is in our party manifesto. What we are asking for and begging for, imploring, demanding and insisting upon, Mr. Speaker, is that the government cease its unilateral party policy and adopt an all-party approach.

I submit that the government is fully aware that they are being somewhat stubborn in this matter. As proof of their stubborn attitude, consider one paragraph of the Prime Minister's speech of June 30, as reported at page 4906 of Hansard. He said:

The government has been urged to postpone the flag resolution—

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister was discussing the legislation which should be completed before a possible summer recess. This was at the time when he was suggesting there were 38 or 40 different pieces of legislation to be dealt with. He said:

The government has been urged to postpone the flag resolution, as it is obstructing other legislation and as it is, as we all admit, a measure which is controversial and arouses deep and genuine emotions. So far as obstructing other legislation is concerned, I think it is quite clear that there never will be a time when this flag issue, which is an issue of vital national importance, will not be controversial and will not interfere with other legislative proposals to which some hon. members would, for various reasons, wish to give priority over it. So, whenever this resolution would be introduced in the house there would be that difficulty.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that if the government would stop being stubborn over having their own way in this matter, and would adopt an all-party approach and give up their high pressure rush, their troubles with regard to a flag would disappear and a greater measure of unity could be achieved. In spite of warnings and protests in parliament and from outside, the Prime Minister has consistently refused to alter his approach to the flag issue. He has stated time and again in the house that the flag resolution must be carried through to a decision before a summer recess can be allowed. Well, the time is getting rather late for a summer recess; I am afraid it will have to be a Christmas recess. In his June 30 speech the Prime Minister made another statement, as is reported at page 4907 of Hansard. He was still speaking of the items of legislation which he said should be completed before a summer recess could be declared:

In any event, when the matters I have mentioned are dealt with, we shall return to the flag resolutions and the debate on those resolutions would be continued until a decision is reached on them.

He went on further to say:

The target date I should like to submit is the end of July. If we meet that target date it would be our desire and, I think, the desire of all members of the house, for parliament to recess until the middle of September.

It is rather sad to consider those words in retrospect, Mr. Speaker. Here we have the bribe and the threat; the bribe of a recess if the resolution is accepted; the threat that there would be no end to this session short of dissolution, because the Prime Minister must know full well that there are many members in this house who are not prepared to accept the proposition that a unilaterally chosen, party labelled flag shall be imposed as a national symbol on the people of Canada, against the will of a majority and despite their protests.

As further support for the suggested remedy that we are seeking in this matter, I submit the contents of a letter from 12 responsible citizens who have attained a status in their various fields of work which entitles their collective opinion to the fullest consideration. This letter is addressed to the Prime Minister under date of May 27, 1964. I believe copies of this letter were forwarded to every member of this house; at least, I received a copy. Its contents are endorsed by Dr. D. G. Creighton, professor of history at the University of Toronto; Dr. Eugene Forsey, director of research of the Canadian Labour Congress; Mrs. H. A. Dyde, of Edmonton; Dr. W. L. Morton, professor of history, University of Manitoba; Mr. T. H. B. Symons, president and vice-chancellor, Trent university; Mr. Jean Palardy, author, Montreal; Dr. Denis Smith, assistant professor of politics, Trent University; David M. Harley, barrister and solicitor, Toronto; Eric McLean, music critic, Montreal; Mr. Walter Pitman, a respected ex-member of this house—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomas: I am glad to see that some of his colleagues remember him. He is head of the history department of Kenner collegiate, Peterborough; Dr. Macgregor Parsons, Red Deer, Alberta; Mr. Scott Symons, assistant curator in charge of Canadiana Collections, Royal Ontario Museum. The letter is not long, but I fear I shall not have time to read it. I will leave it till later, Mr. Speaker, and read it if I do have time. However, I should like to put the last paragraph on the record at this time:

> We respectfully suggest that you withdraw the maple leaf design for the time being, and that you convoke at once a private meeting of the parliamentary leaders of all parties to agree upon a new design which asserts our history. We profoundly believe that the present proposal will only deepen the spiritual malaise of Canada.

I consider this to be one of the finest analyses I have seen regarding the Canadian flag. I will read the rest of that letter, if there is time, before I finish. I wish to submit, as further evidence of dissatisfaction with the government's course of action, an editorial in the July 24 issue of the Montreal Gazette, which reads as follows:

> Though a new Canadian flag is far from having been officially adopted, it has been flown a good deal across Canada in an unofficial way. Canadians have had the opportunity to see it as a flag, not merely as a design. And it must be said that it is a poor looking flag. Whatever may be said about the flag issue in general, this particular flag lacks life and colour; it is a drab thing, scrawny and weak.
> It is not altogether surprising that the product is poor. For though Canada has had years to contemplate designs for flags, the particular design selected by the government in the end was drawn in a curious crash program.
> The designers did their work in nine hectic days. The flag that won the cabinet's approval (with slight later changes) was that of a retired commander of the Royal Canadian Navy, who regards himself as an enthusiastic amateur in the field of heraldry. He worked, as he says, "with one eye closed from 10.30 at night until shortly after 1.30 in the morning."
> The design shows rather sadly the one-eyed rush and fatigue with which it was conceived. Not even those most enthusiastic for a new flag have been able to show an equal enthusiasm about the design proposed. These three scratchy maple leaves, dying on a severed stem, have been flown enough already, in an unofficial way, to make clear that they can respond to even a bracing breeze with nothing but a dismal flap.

Mr. Speaker, that is a further indication in a responsible newspaper editorial, as evidenced by the policy of that newspaper, that the present proposed flag does not command the unanimity and the sympathy of the people of this country.

I have received hundreds of letters on this flag issue, as I expect have all members of this house. Hundreds of these letters from Legion groups, the daughters of the empire, Canadian corps associations, women's institutes and others are in favour of the red ensign. Hundreds of other letters are in favour of the government's flag and other designs.

I am opposed to allowing the government to continue on a course of action which will tend to divide the people of Canada into two groups, and then to chose between them in such a way that for generations to come one half of the people of Canada will have bitter feelings towards the other half.

The government's proposal will not bring unity, but discord, and there is no sound reason why they should continue to follow such a policy in such a rush. I believe that a flag design can be chosen through the employment of the proposed methods, which will be more acceptable to all, and in the choice of which there will be no winners and no losers, and from which will result national unity rather than division.

In dealing with the flag issue this house is playing for keeps. I should like to stress that fact, Mr. Speaker. If we discard the red ensign and what might be a compromise flag, and the present resolution succeeds in passing this house, as it appears it will at this stage if there is a vote, we will not be able to undo what we will have done. If we take a sensible attitude we will not be able to undo our actions because we cannot have a new flag every time the government changes. I repeat, no amount of effort, expense, trouble or time should be allowed to stand in the way of the choice of a flag which will be acceptable and tend to unify this country. I think it is possible to find such a design if we adopt an all party approach and let the people make their own choice. For that reason I am in support of the principle of the subamendment as well as, I may say, part of the amendment and part of the resolution.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on some of the remarks made by several hon. members who have preceded me in this debate. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), who dealt with the history of the maple leaf both in France and during the last war.

I remember being ordered toward the end of the last war to wear the maple leaf insignia on my tunic. If my memory serves me correctly only certain troops were instructed to wear that insignia, and those were army troops such as ordnance and supply. I do not believe that the members of regiments who formed the fighting force were ordered to wear the maple leaf patch. When the troops who were ordered to wear this patch saw the design there was an expression of disgust, distaste and annoyance. The patches consisted of a golden maple leaf within a dark circle, to be worn on the shoulder. They were considered to be very ugly in design, and I remember that we could not understand why we should be forced to wear them. I am sure they were worn only because of a threat of military punishment. There was such resentment that quite a long time after the order was issued, at a party in the officers' mess at headquarters, a senior officer pointed out to a brigadier that practically none of his officers were wearing this insignia on their uniforms as required. I assure you there was a good deal of trouble about this situation, and one result was a parade at eight o'clock the following morning of the entire officer group of that unit. I presume this parade was held in an attempt to make sure that the maple leaf patch was worn on the tunics of those officers. I might add, that unit was the largest in the Canadian army.

Mr. Speaker, I point out these facts to give some indication of the reaction to the order requiring these particular army troops to wear that maple leaf insignia. I remembered this situation again only when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre referred to the maple leaf insignia being used for various purposes at various times.

It is perhaps because I grew up in western Canada that I cannot understand why the maple leaf is supposed to be significant and emblematic of Canada. The use of the insignia to which I referred was introduced only late in the last war, and only to a limited degree. So far as the outfit, to which I was attached, is concerned, it met with nothing less than resentment.

It was a pleasure to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre describe the use of the maple leaf to indicate wartime truck routes. I have never before heard anyone attempt to twist the meaning and acceptance of the use of the maple leaf insignia during the last war into a suggestion that there was a great demand for its use by Canadian troops. I have never heard the significance of the use of that insignia by Canadian troops referred to as a demand for the replacement of our national flag by a flag including that particular design.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the great propaganda campaign, and the attempt to stir up the feelings of Canadian people by misrepresentation, as well as the attempt to minimize the agitation that has been created, I feel it is essential to bring these misrepresentations to light whenever an opportunity presents itself.

I was much intrigued by the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. McLean), and I must say I have a good deal of respect for that hon. member. He certainly spoke with conviction. However, I think it is incredible that a man of his age will state, as did some other members in the far left corner of this chamber, that we should not consider the past at all but only look to the future. If any member asks, what is Canada today, I am sure the answer can only be found in our history, those things that Canada has done, the opportunities that have been given to people in this country, the actions that Canadians as individuals and as a nation have taken throughout the years. Canada is a land with a reputation for upholding its end in international obligations, but we have to look at history to see that we have taken our share in world conflicts and world conferences and have made our time, money and resources available to help others.

I certainly hope the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. McLean) is not suggesting that we should not look back and recall these things when somebody asks what Canada is today. I think it would be a betrayal of every soldier who ever fought with distinction in a Canadian uniform to say that we should not look back if the question is asked, what is Canada. If it is not the sacrifices of those men who fought in two world wars, the Korean war and the South African war, if our history of valour on the field of battle and in defence of democracy is not a part of present day Canada, then I do not know what is.

Certainly those who say we should only look to the future must have their tongues in their cheeks. Canada's future is bright and promising but it has been made so only because of the achievements of the past. I suggest that the hon. member for Charlotte and others who are taking a specious look at the question and saying we should forget the past and look only to the future have no idea how to look to the future. They have not, unless they take into consideration what our parliamentary institutions are based on, what our history of democracy and our system of justice mean. Unless they look to the past and understand it they have no conception of the manner in which we should proceed in the future.

In the thinking of some hon. members who say that a new flag is something of the future and that we should quit looking at the past, I suggest we can put our finger on one of the misconceptions that may have caused this house and the whole country so much trouble in considering the question of whether we should now change our national flag completely. I should not have to remind members that there have been instances such as in Germany during the 1930's when there has been a failure to realize what the system of democracy is based on. Spurious claims and some flag waving were made use of to divert the attention of the people of that country from the lessons of the past, with the result that they lost their democracy. If those who resist most strongly a change in our national flag base their argument solely on the premise that the union jack and the red ensign stand for our history of democratic government, for the achievement of our nationhood and as a reminder of our parliamentary system and our system of justice, and take the stand that it is necessary to keep these reminders in front of us in order that people like the hon. member for Charlotte will not forget the importance of the past, then I think we have an almost undefeatable argument.

I must say that since the flag debate first began I have resented the efforts made in the house and throughout the country to say that we have no flag. Efforts have been made to say that the red ensign is not distinctive and that it has never really been Canada's flag. I thought the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) did the house and the country a real service when he pointed out in his speech that the red ensign has in fact been Canada's national flag for 100 years. For the life of me I cannot understand why some members keep saying in this debate that we must get a national flag. Certainly the question is whether we now want to change our national flag, and the more people say we must get one the more they are adding to that type of propaganda which has been foisted upon the people to mislead them into thinking that Canada does not now have a national flag.

I have just been home for a week end, for a change, and had a chance to speak to quite a group of people. It was one of the largest gatherings I have attended since I came here in January, and after such a long while I found it most refreshing to have a chance to hear people speak very bluntly and simply about what is going on in this chamber these days, express their feelings about the flag debate and about whether they want a new flag, or the present flag changed. I am not going to pretend there is anything like unanimity on this matter. I believe that the strongest feeling throughout the country is: Why is parliament fooling around with the flag? Why does it not get on with the business? I think that is a fair summation of the majority feeling that I encountered at home.

There are quite a number who do not become vehement about the red ensign or the new flag and who in fact care very little about the matter, except to the extent that the present argument may disrupt the country. These people cannot understand why the subject has been brought up now. They cannot understand why it has taken so much time and why other business has not been proceeded with. I think there are some questions that the government owes it to the country to answer. I have talked to other members and I find that the situation in my constituency is not much different from that in other constituencies. Certainly the newspapers reflect the situation to quite an extent. I would say there is a general feeling across the country that the flag debate is interfering with more important business and there is an inability to understand why this is so.

I have asked the Prime Minister before, as have other hon. members, to explain why it is necessary that the flag debate should go through to a conclusion now. We have had the red ensign for 100 years. Certainly there is no doubt in the minds of most members of the house that, improperly handled, this subject can do more to destroy unity in this country than any other action of this or previous governments. Why then must it be rammed through with such haste? If those people who are so desirous of having a national flag and who put all the pressure they can on the government really want one that much, if it means that much to them, then it should be so important to them that they would not begrudge the time necessary to make sure that it is done properly and that the matter is handled in such a manner that it will bring credit, not only on any new national flag but on the people who support it and on the manner in which it was introduced.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I know if I were one of those who desired to get rid of the red ensign—and there is a certain group in this country who do not care what the new flag is as long as it is not the red ensign and has no union jack on it—I am sure I would say, let us make sure we put this over in such a way that it will not be resented; it must stand for a feeling of unity in the country; it must be a unifying force. We do not want it taken as a symbol of our dissatisfaction or as evidence of political opportunism. There is no reason I can see, therefore, and I would be only too happy if the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) or some member of the government would explain to me where my thinking is wrong, why there must be such haste in acting on this matter.

It could be allowed to sit for a while or referred to a committee. Let everyone have a full opportunity to discuss it. Let us have the various groups throughout the country appear before the committee if they so desire. Let us take it slowly, by stages, and make sure that there is no suggestion of political partisanship. Let us make sure that every faction has its feelings satisfied, to this extent at least, that it has had a full, fair and impartial hearing. There is no injustice that rankles so much as that which results from a feeling that the right to be heard has been denied. There is no punishment meted out in the courts which causes people to become hardened criminals more quickly than the suggestion that they have been denied a fair hearing. I submit that any member who wants a new flag, who wants to do away completely with any suggestion of our present flag and substitute another, must support that line of reasoning.

I resent the suggestion that those of us who prefer the red ensign are just stalling. I am not standing here speaking in the hope that I will put off the evil day, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, when I say that I prefer the red ensign I am aware of the fact that if an election were called my preference would not be shared by a majority of Canadians. There are some who would not want the red ensign in its present form. I am quite willing to go along with a change in that regard. I hope if there is going to be a change in our national flag that change would not be so drastic as to erase all the symbols that I should like to see on our flag to indicate our heritage. However, Mr. Speaker, I will accept that if it is the wish of the people. I do not believe I am so different from those people I represent who would resent not having their voice heard. I will even put up with taking away the red ensign. I will put up with taking away any symbols of our past. I would even put up with the proposed flag, provided it resulted from the choice of the majority of the people of this country and provided it were brought about in a manner that would satisfy all sections of the populace. I would put up with it if all reasonable designs and reasonable suggestions were considered and if parliament was striving its utmost to keep politics out of it.

If this new flag were arrived at in such a way that it would be obvious from the manner in which this house handled it that all these considerations had been taken care of, and that once the new flag had been adopted it would serve to unify the country, then I could accept it. It should of course show respect for history and for the future of our country. I hope I am not being too repetitious, but I have said in this house before that what a new flag is most likely to stand for, if it is a complete departure from the old one, is a feeling of the manner, the method and the time at which it was introduced. I suggested that had there been a national catastrophe and had we changed governments and a flag had been introduced at that time, then most people would, for some time to come at least, associate the new flag with that national catastrophe. I have suggested before that when there is no previous association with the design that is being offered on the flag, then it becomes of importance to see that the method by which it is introduced evokes only happy memories, memories of respect by one part of the country for another.

I have perhaps dwelt long enough, Mr. Speaker, on the method by which a flag is selected. We are speaking on the subamendment now, on the questions that should be put in a referendum. I should like to deal rather briefly with the questions on the referendum; however, I see it is now six o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of standing order 39A, it is my duty to inform the house that questions to be raised at 10.30 are as follows:

The hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard):

[Translation]

Agriculture—feed grain for eastern Canada

[Text]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate those voices shouting "carried, carried" before you called order. I am sure they were referring to the remarks I made when we adjourned at supper time. It is my fervent hope that they have now seen reason, and they are suggesting to me that the trained seals on the government back benches are now going to recant and reflect the views of their constituencies and the responsible views of a member of parliament, instead of following the views of those members of the Liberal party who think in terms of the adhesion or cohesion of the Liberal party rather than the serious question affecting the house in this debate.

I think at six o'clock I had just mentioned the subamendment, the matter of the national referendum or plebiscite, and the questions which should appear in that referendum. I should say at the outset that I am not in entire agreement with the subamendment and I cannot really understand the form in which it is presented. In this subamendment on the question of a national flag as it should be put to the people of Canada we have the red ensign as it is, and the red ensign as it might be amended with some relationship to other ethnic groups in our country. Then we also have that peculiar monstrosity presented to the house by the government as a projected flag, and we also have a one maple leaf design.

I want to make it clear at the outset that I am not at all averse to a national referendum in which people may have a broad choice, but I am totally unable to accept the proposition that in that national referendum this Pearson pennant, as we have known the three maple leaf design proposed by the government, should take equal precedence with the flag that has been so proudly Canada's for 100 years. To me this is preposterous, and I would not be so vehement about it unless it had failed in every requisite that one would think of in connection with a national flag.

It has not been arrived at by any process that the people of this country would like to think would be associated with a flag that represents them. It does not represent the people of this country. It was brought in as a political manoeuvre, presented in that manner and sustained only in any sense of the word because of the political implications behind it. To suggest a national referendum, where that sort of a pennant would take equal precedence with the flag that is so revered and treasured by such a large percentage of the people in this country, is to me just out of keeping with our responsibilities to this country.

I may say that if that flag had anything about it that is artistically pleasing, perhaps I would find some excuse. If I thought that as other than a political gimmick it was attractive even to the members from Quebec, I might not resent it so much. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot forget the spectacle of the members of the Creditiste group coming into the house one day, each of them with a little pennant on his desk. That was the flag referred to earlier today by one of my colleagues, red and white with a green maple leaf, divided diagonally between red and white. I must say I do not pretend to be an artist. In this, as in other respects, I am an ordinary citizen of my community where art is concerned; but to me, if we are going to have a flag which is not everything a flag should represent, then at least it should have the advantage of having a pleasing appearance.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) took the trouble on behalf of a group in his constituency—I believe the sons of Norway, who are plugging that same flag—to bring a copy of it around to every member of the house, and I will say it had the distinction of being very attractive. It was not a muddied up or muddled up flag such as that which the government suggests.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a man, woman or child in this country who would not like our flag to be at least, if not beautiful, then presentable. This cannot be said for the three leafed monstrosity that this unartistic government presents to us. If I, in pursuance of the question of what should be in the referendum to be submitted to the people, can describe the so-called Pearson pennant, as I am sure it is known across the country, I would say the first thing it brings to mind is a presently noted song. Perhaps it is not too respectable but it deals with the subject of General Jubilation T. Cornpone. I think it is a take-off of a Li'l Abner character, a general who fought all the famous battles, described as Cornpone's anguish, Cornpone's humiliation, Cornpone's defeat, Cornpone's disgrace and Cornpone's retreat. If the government is really suggesting, or if any member of the house wants to put that pennant on a national referendum on the same basis as our revered red ensign, I can only say that I think my reaction will not be too different from that of so many people in this country who listen to the radio or television occasionally and who have some imagination.

To me, this proposed flag with a blue border at each end and three red maple leaves in the centre on a white background sounds like an emblem of that great general, Jubilation T. Cornpone about whom the song was written. The Canadian public cannot be blamed for associating this proposed flag with the political record of the Liberal party. The first blue bar represents the first disgrace which the party suffered—the 60 days of decision. Then, in keeping with General Cornpone's military career, which was a complete failure, we come to Cornpone's humiliation. The first little red maple leaf represents that famous budget—the budget which was put forward and subsequently revised. I am sure this is what is going through the minds of the people of Canada when they look at this pennant. The second maple leaf represents something else—the much heralded pension plan. I am sure all members have heard about Cornpone's defeat. I have in mind the first time this pension plan was brought in, and the manner in which it was presented. The government said: You will take this plan because we presented it; it must be the greatest. The Liberals presented this flag resolution in the same way, though you would never know it today. I can see how the people of Canada will associate the proposed pennant with these events.

General Cornpone, as we all know, had a famous retreat. Talking about a retreat, what happened to the redistribution bill? The Liberals had a great idea. A member of the New Democratic party suggested a slight amendment. The Liberals went along because the N.D.P. wanted it. Then they found the official opposition would have no part of it. Where is the redistribution bill now? We had thought, from some of the opinions expressed in this house, that the Liberals had really wanted to correct some of the anomalies in the representation of constituencies in this House of Commons. Where is the bill now? Cornpone's retreat.

If this flag were ever accepted by Canada, the last blue bar would represent the most shameful thing of all. It would represent the division caused in this country by the political machinations of the present government in treating as a mere political tool something which is sacred to so many people. What colour is the background to all this? It is the white background of surrender—the surrender of every ideal known to members of this house on the altar of political expediency. Yet members across the way want us to accept this design and consider it in our minds on the same basis as the red ensign, which has represented everything in Canada which we think is worth fighting for and worth retaining.

I suggest the first sign of sense shown in connection with this whole debate is that the Prime Minister is now prepared to consider another course of action. I cannot understand why the right hon. gentleman does not do his thinking before he acts. We in this house have seen so many reversals, so many somersaults, so many withdrawals of ideas, that the one question in the mind of each one of us and of people right across the country is: Why in heaven's name, don't they think a little before bringing these things forward?

When the Prime Minister first introduced this resolution he had in mind that there would be a free vote. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Watson) has put the evidence on record. It was only after the right hon. gentleman's political henchman got to him that he changed his mind. These men, working behind the scenes, said: Look, this is how we can win so many votes from this group or that. So he changed his mind and some days later he said the government would stand or fall on the resolution. Now, after all this time, the Prime Minister has found that the people are asking: Why should the flag issue have priority? Is it not worth a close, careful and even lengthy scrutiny by parliament? Does the government have no legislation which is urgent or important and which needs to be discussed? These are the questions being asked in the country. The people have asked them long enough and hard enough for the message finally to sink through to the Prime Minister, and he has retreated to the position which, I submit, he should have taken in the first place.

I believe that when he first introduced this legislation the Prime Minister really believed that it should not be a party matter. Those of us in this house who are aware of the right hon. gentleman's record have never considered him to be a politician, first. I have never considered him to be a statesman, but at least he was a diplomat. As a man who in diplomatic negotiations had to put Canada first, his first thought when he brought in this resolution was for the good of Canada. Then the Liberal politicians got to him. We all know the Liberal politicians. They are people who can sell a lie ten times as fast as a Liberal can tell the truth. They are afraid of the truth because they might not be able to sell it. But I think the truth has finally sunk into the mind of the Prime Minister and even into the minds of those tremendous politicians who belong to his cabinet. They have finally come to realize that to play politics with a symbol such as our national flag, even though it means different things to different groups, is dividing this nation and causing such rifts—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): I realize that it is my duty to speak for the second time on the Canadian flag. The first time I spoke on the subject was on May 28, 1963, during the debate on the address.

Before I begin to speak on this resolution or, rather, on the subamendment, I think I might draw attention to what my dictionary has to say regarding the definition of the word "flag". It says: "A piece of cloth of bunting upon which, usually, some device is placed, used as a standard or ensign". But to me, Mr. Speaker, the important question is not so much what a flag looks like but what it stands for; what it stood for in the past and what it will stand for in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rapp: I am speaking from personal experience in this regard. I may be the only member in this house who has lived under the hammer and sickle, and I know what this flag stood for and what it will stand for in the future. I also realized before I came to Canada some 35 years ago what the Canadian flag stood for. But much more important to me was what it would stand for in the future. I raised a family, and I know what some of these young people had to go through in countries where freedom is not interpreted in the same way that we interpret it here. I am referring to countries in which schools were used to indoctrinate young people with communistic ideas, with nazi ideas. You can understand, Mr. Speaker, what this flag meant to me and what it still means to me. You will understand how I feel when, as a parent, I see the union jack flying over a school. I and parents like me know this will not be a school in which our children will be indoctrinated with these ideas; that this is a school in which freedom is taught and where freedom means something.

It is not my only duty, Mr. Speaker, to tell you what I had to go through and what this flag means to me; but as the member representing the riding of Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale it is also my duty to speak on behalf of my constituents. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not follow their advice and put forward representations on their behalf. I have received many letters on this question. The resolution which was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), which was responsible for my receiving these letters, reads as follows:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag; and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

I would like to read some of the letters I have received from my constituents, and in particular from Legions in my area.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Dispense.

Mr. Rapp: I received a telegram from the Sylvania Legion which says:

> The Sylvania branch No. 54 of the Canadian Legion goes on record favouring the red ensign as the official flag of Canada.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not act on behalf of the people in my riding, after they have elected me three times, and bring their views before the attention of the house and this government. I also received a letter from the Leroy and Melfort branch of the Canadian Legion stating that they were in favour of retaining the red ensign as our national flag. I could go on and on in this respect; there have been similar letters from other branches of the Legion. As I said in my previous speech on this subject, the Prime Minister has introduced this new design that is not one of which the people of Canada will approve. I have received many, many letters and many telegrams to this effect from various organizations. At the time when there was not a member representing Saskatoon one lady asked me to put forward her view and the view of her group that the red ensign should be retained as the Canadian flag.

Why should there be a new Canadian flag, Mr. Speaker? Why should this new design have been introduced in the way it was? Why was it not declared during the election campaign that a new Canadian flag would be introduced into parliament? I and my opponents had many joint meetings. At those meetings not one of my opponents mentioned that the Liberal party intended to put before parliament a new Canadian flag. Certainly some time after the election it was said that their Prime Minister had stated that within two years a Canadian flag would be approved; but so many of these Liberal promises were made during the election campaign and we have heard nothing more about them since this government took office. If these other promises cannot be kept, why is this flag resolution so necessary? However, Mr. Speaker, believing in democracy as I do, I think there are ways and means of arriving at a solution in respect of our flag. As I say, a flag is not just a bunting; it represents much more than that.

If the house agrees, a compromise could be made. There could be set up a committee composed of representatives of all parties. However, I would be opposed to this if the committee were instructed to discuss only the flag introduced by the Prime Minister, because if this were the case that flag would be nothing but a political flag; nor would I like to see any other flag introduced by the government. The committee should be empowered to recommend a flag and have it approved by the house. Mention was made of a 15-man committee. The composition of the committee was also mentioned as being seven from the Liberal party, five from the official opposition, and one each from the other opposition parties. I think that the report or recommendation from the committee to the house should not be that of just a majority of the committee, but it should be approved by the house. There is nothing unusual about such a committee. We have a similar situation at the United Nations, where the Russians have the power of veto which they requested. The reason for this is that the rest of the members of the United Nations are democratic or more or less democratic countries, while Russia is a communist country, and if any question was decided by a majority vote, there is no question about it that the Russian government would lose out every time.

Mr. Speaker, I am very sincere, as I am sure are other members who have spoken before me, when I suggest that the resolution presently before the house involves a political issue. I think the flag issue should be taken out of this chamber and referred to a parliamentary committee, which may come to a conclusion in respect of a Canadian national flag which can no longer be called or referred to as the flag of the Liberal party, a flag of the Conservative party, a flag of the N.D.P. or a flag of the Social Credit party. I am sure most members will agree that a decision made by an all-party committee will not be considered as a decision of a political nature.

Mr. Speaker, I have not been home since the resolution now before us was presented to the house, but I do know the tenor of thought in my constituency. I have received a great number of letters expressing a desire to retain the red ensign rather than to adopt the flag proposed by this government. The general trend of expression in these letters is in favour of this issue being decided by referendum. I have received several letters from people who live in my own home town, which express a desire for me to return and report on the progress of this flag debate. Many of these letters have perhaps been precipitated by the reading of the copies of Hansard I have sent to my constituents. They have asked me to explain the lack of speeches made by members of political parties other than Conservative, and have expressed some astonishment at the absence of speeches of Liberal members. I agree with this opinion and suggest that those on the opposite side of this house should stand in their places and either support the flag proposed by the government or express a contrary point of view. I must report to all hon. members that my constituents do not appreciate the attitude adopted by those members in favour of the proposed design who pretend by acquiescence to be in favour of that flag. I suggest that they should stand and be heard.

Mr. Speaker, in reference to the subamendment, I suggest that if the committee proposed therein cannot come to something approximating a unanimous decision, the national flag for Canada should be decided by plebiscite. Such a plebiscite should include questions similar to those proposed by the subamendment. I would certainly like to see these two questions proposed on any plebiscite: Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign? Are you in favour of a distinctively Canadian flag embodying the three maple leaf design?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Rapp: I know you all say "yes", but why do you not get up on your feet and take part in this debate?

Mr. Speaker, perhaps a third question should be included in a plebiscite to this effect: Are you in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag? I think those three questions should be included in any plebiscite presented to the people.

I am very disappointed that in Canada today there is a question being raised about a change in the Canadian flag. Thousands and thousands, and perhaps millions of Canadians have come to Canada from foreign lands. Many of these people realize that the countries which they left adopted ensigns other than those of tradition, such as the swastika, but were left with something emblematic of a dictatorial power. Flags such as the red ensign have great histories. Our soldiers have fought several wars under the red ensign. To ignore the requests of these veterans to retain it, and that which is symbolized by it, is to ignore the sympathies of the majority of Canadians. I think the sympathies of these people who have fought in wars on behalf of Canada should be given full and thorough consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to one very short letter I received from a South African war veteran. This man is not one of my constituents but lives in the province of British Columbia and has not authorized me to disclose his name. He is a very outspoken gentleman and has said that when he enlisted as a young man for service in the South African war he did so under the emblem of Canada. He has lived his life since in Canada under the red ensign, and he states that in his senior years his heart bleeds at any suggestion that Canada abandon the red ensign as its national flag.

Mr. Speaker, I could spend another 30 minutes reading portions of letters and telegrams I have received from individuals who wish to voice an opinion in respect of any flag to be adopted by Canada. However, in conclusion I must state that I think it is my privilege and duty, as it is of every other member of parliament, to stand up in this chamber and express the views of the people I represent in respect of the retention of the Canadian red ensign. In spite of my own feelings, I think those members of this House of Commons who favour the three maple leaf flag design, or any other design, should stand up and express that feeling. These members were not sent to parliament to remain in their seats, silent, but to take part in debates of this kind, whether emotionally charged or not.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Albert Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate because it involves something that affects every Canadian citizen. It involves a subject which every Canadian should have the right to discuss, and concerning which he should express an opinion. In view of the dissension between the two founding races, this matter should be allowed to remain in abeyance until the emotional factor has died down. Once the flag resolution has been voted on the matter will be over and done with, and if careful planning and consideration is not given to both points of view, the ties that have bound these two peoples so closely may be broken for all time.

Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) I must say I am in favour, because I feel it outlines the proper procedure to be followed in respect of an issue such as this. If at the outset the flag issue had been introduced to this house in such a way as suggested by the subamendment, I am sure emotionalism would have been absent from the debate.

Before continuing I should like to say that I support the red ensign, I am sure I speak for the majority of my constituents, who represent every nationality in the world and live in perfect harmony. These people set an example to be followed by people all over the world.

Many people of Ukrainian origin live in my constituency, and I cannot agree more with the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), than when he stated that he came from people who believe in tradition and do not throw tradition out the window when it has served its usefulness. These people respect the traditions of people of other nationalities. They feel strongly about the union jack and red ensign.

These people are proud and hardy people who were not afraid to settle in some of the remote areas of our country. These are the people who, when the chips are down, were not afraid to answer their adopted country's call. The same can be said, Mr. Speaker, for Ukrainians, the Rumanians, the Dutch, the Germans, the Scandinavians, the Polish, the Russians, people from Greece and France, in fact, all these people from wherever they came. This country was the country of their choice, a land of freedom, a land of opportunity.

Again, we have the Doukhobors of Russian origin who, I am proud to say, are my neighbours at home and who, because of their religious beliefs and their refusal to bear arms, were persecuted in their own land under the Czarist regime. They came to this country and found their way of life, of toil and peace. These people are the people who today, sir, are some of the best farmers, lawyers, doctors, teachers and engineers. They have excelled in any profession they chose and they were able to achieve this under our flag. Do you think these people would want to see the Christian crosses stripped from our flag? The same can be said for the other minority groups who have also played their part in the development of this country.

People of every nationality have developed our country and have had some part in our heritage. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, can you honestly see the fairness in taking away from a majority in order to satisfy a minority?

We talk about the two founding races. What about our Indian people who were forgotten by the Liberal government? It took the Conservative government under the leadership of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to give them some of the recognition they deserved—representation in the Senate, the franchise, the right to better education and better housing. These people were not a bit backward in answering their country's call in time of need, and the ones I have talked to are in favour of the red ensign.

This three maple leaves flag design is the choice of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), a Prime Minister who is the leader of a minority party and who acts like he was the leader of a party with a great majority, a man who was a Nobel peace prize winner and who is now acting like a dictator. He has said: This is my design, my flag, the one you will accept or face an election. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the thought of an election struck fear into the Liberal party, with their many unfulfilled promises of the 1963 campaign when the flag was hardly mentioned; and of course this also shook some of the members of the other three parties so that many of them jumped into line.

How about the way this flag was chosen? I read that the Prime Minister had invited a group of reporters to his home and when they arrived they found the Prime Minister waiting for them and nursing a scotch and soda. Drinks and sandwiches were then served. I am not a drinking man and maybe this flag looks better after you have had a few drinks. Maybe some of my hon. friends opposite have viewed it in that light. Finally, after looking at many designs, the Prime Minister picked up the flag with the three maple leaves and said, "This is it, this is my design", just like a president of a company calling in his salesmen, introducing a new product to them and saying: Here it is, get out and sell it. I will not say whether they all did but some have tried, I think without too much success. So some reporters have turned on the Conservative party and have blamed them for carrying on a filibuster, which we all know could not be further from the truth.

If the Prime Minister and the group he leads—apparently it is not a party any more—are afraid to let the people of Canada speak out for themselves on this issue, then I am going to speak out for what I am sure the majority of my constituents want, and I do not care whether it takes four days, four weeks or four months. Twice in a generation men were prepared to give four years of their blood and sweat, and in many cases their lives, in order to fight for the freedom for which our flag stands. Then the Prime Minister goes to Winnipeg as a guest speaker at the Royal Canadian Legion convention and unfurls his three maple leaves flag design. What alternative did those Legion members have but to boo and heckle this so-called flag? This was the only way they could show their disapproval of his choice.

Unlike some members I did not send out a questionnaire to my constituents but I did receive many letters, all of them supporting the red ensign, not one supporting the Pearson political pennant. When the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) referred to the Liberal campaign literature containing their election promises, there was no mention made of the flag. Why was this contentious issue dragged into this session like a cat being dragged backwards by the tail? Was it to cover up for all the other legislation that was not ready, for instance, the Canada pension plan, the legislation based on the report of the MacPherson royal commission on transportation and the legislation to assist Canadian magazines based on the O'Leary report, just to mention a few?

During the last campaign, meetings were held with all the different party representatives present. I do not think my Liberal opponent mentioned the flag but he did talk about $2 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat and $3 a bushel for the first 300 bushel unit. He talked about two ministers of agriculture, one for eastern Canada and one for western Canada. This was also promised by the Prime Minister when he was campaigning in the prairie provinces. I do not know what he said in British Columbia but apparently from what we have heard from the other side of the house and from the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) regarding the Fraserview homes for veterans, it is fine to make promises when you are in opposition but you should not be expected to carry them out when your party is elected as a government and you are a minister of the crown. I would not think my Liberal opponent in the last election would walk into any of the Legion branches in my constituency and say, "I think we will take down the red ensign and replace it with the three maple leaves flag".

Look at the way the flag issue has been introduced. Is this the action of a man who cares? I think not, Mr. Speaker. Instead it is the action of a dictatorial prime minister, an arrogant, bureaucratic and careless government. After all, there are 10 provinces in Canada, so why not call a meeting of the representatives of the provinces and have them decide on a design they could all accept instead of having some of them flying the red ensign, some the union jack and others flying something else?

I do not have to tell hon. members that people are becoming very flag conscious these days. When I was home I attended fairs in my constituency. I could not help but notice that in the parades practically every float had a flag, some of them four or five, and I did not see one Pearson flag. The flags were the red ensign and the union jack. I think people are beginning to realize that something is going to be taken away from them. In western Canada we are not flag wavers but we do believe in what our flag stands for and nobody is going to take that away.

People have talked about the blood that flows in their veins in this house. I will tell you the kind of blood that flows in my veins. It is Irish on both sides, and if the Prime Minister thinks he is going to ram this flag down my throat he has got another think coming. When I went home in the early part of June at the time the flag issue was first mentioned people said to me: What is the matter with you members? You are getting $18,000 a year and you are wasting time discussing the flag. Have you not got something better to discuss? But when I told them what it was all about they changed and said: Do not let them take our flag.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Why do hon. members over there not get up and speak?

There was only one man, the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), who had the courage to stand up yesterday and say where he stood. I do not believe his constituency is too much different from some of the others in Toronto. I would say to some hon. members opposite, "Enjoy yourselves, because it is later than you think." Why do not hon. members opposite want to let this question go to the people? If they are so sure they are right and the majority of the people are with them, let the question go to the people. If the people decide that this is the flag they want, then that is fine; I will accept it. However, I will never accept the manner in which the Prime Minister is attempting to ram this flag through this house.

I should like to refer to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis)—that is a good portfolio for him, because I never heard him say anything in this house. I want to tell him that they are going to be looking for Liberal candidates in my constituency. He can come out there to run and bring his 100,000 flag stickers—

Mr. Dupuis: Do you want some?

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): —that will assure my re-election.

No, Mr. Speaker, I will tell you what hon. members opposite would like. I can say that my remarks are going to affect some members in the third, fourth and fifth parties. They would have liked to have shoved this flag question through quietly, then have a recess. They could have gone away for a couple of months and come back smiling and tanned, hoping the people had forgiven and forgotten. I do not believe it is going to work that way.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would again suggest that this issue should be referred to a committee, as has been suggested, in order that a design may be brought forward which would be acceptable to all. I hope that it would be a design that would unite and not divide.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there is any other member in this house or at least not very many of the members in this house, who have caused you as little bother as I have. I do not speak very often in the house. I have been here longer than most of you, and I always thought I could learn a lot more by sitting in my seat and listening to others than by talking. I have learned all I know by listening to others. I did not rise very quickly a few minutes ago because I was expecting perhaps we would get a speech from the other side of the house. I would be content to sit down and let anybody speak in my place. As a matter of fact, the only reason I am taking part in this debate is because of the fact I represent a riding that has instructed me to speak for it.

I have received a lot of mail, but I am not going to bother reading it to you. I received a lot a petitions signed by hundreds of people who favour the red ensign. I am speaking tonight because I favour the red ensign and I believe at least three quarters of the people in Canada favour the red ensign. Why the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) insists on making us take this flag, regardless of whether or not we want it, is more than I can understand. The Prime Minister was appointed—he was not elected, he was appointed by the Governor General—to the highest position any man in Canada can hold. As such, he is supposed to be a statesman. He cannot run Canada with one province; he has to have support from all the provinces of this country. I cannot understand anyone who would offer us a flag without giving us a choice. Then he said that there would not be a free vote and if we voted against the flag there would be an election. I, for one, would welcome an election on the flag issue. However, I would not welcome it in so far as the unity of the country is concerned because it would split the country wide open.

I have been here for a long time. I have never quarrelled with anybody. I have been able to get along with the French, the same as I do with the English. I have a French community in my riding. I never got one letter from those fellows, and they are fine fellows, just as good as any others in my riding. I never got one letter from the French in my riding insisting on this new flag. I have received a lot of letters from the people in my riding and with the exception of two, all those letters favour the red ensign. The two letters did not oppose the red ensign but wanted something added to it. As I said before, I am a red ensign man. I do not want to say anything tonight that will offend anybody else. I do not think that is the way we should go about this matter. There has been enough acrimony in this debate, and I do not want to add any more. We have been able to get along in this country for years without quarrelling, so surely in this enlightened day and age we will be able to get along for the next hundred years without having any interruption.

I was rather surprised when the leader of the separatists at the other end of this room said one day that he would welcome a revolution in Quebec. I think that was a terrible thing to say.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Cardiff: The leader of the Creditistes at the other end of the room. I heard him say it because I was in the house when he said it. I think that is a terrible thing to say. Whenever there has been a revolution in another country, there has been a lot of bloodshed. If that is what you want, a lot of bloodshed, well I understand a lot of blood was spilled over this carpet yesterday when I was not here. We cannot stir people up emotionally, and this is an emotional issue, so the best thing to do is to be careful of what you say. You should not stir up somebody else who may be more emotional than you are yourself. I am one of those whose temper can be aroused, too, but I do not like to quarrel with anybody. I like to get along with people. I think the fact I have been here for so many years is the result of my ability to get along with men, and women too, for that matter.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Cardiff: I have often said that I never saw a horse that I could not drive. A horse is not much different from a man, and there are some of them to whom you have to give a good licking in order to get along with them. There are some men you cannot get along with either, unless you give them a good licking. I believe in the old style; I believe in cracking down on a man who won't mind his own business. I believe that very often the old laws we had years and years ago are more effective than the laws they have now.

However, I do not intend to take too much of the time of the house tonight. The last speaker brought out many of the points I intended to bring out, so I do not intend to repeat them. The hon. lady member from Northumberland (Miss Jewett)—I do not see her in the house at the moment—made a statement when she was speaking on the flag issue two or three weeks ago. She said that she was appealing to fellow M.P.'s to disregard their own personal preference for a flag, and also the feeling of their constituencies about a flag which would best serve Canada. I was elected a member of parliament for a certain area and I intend to speak for the people in that area. When it comes to the point where I cannot speak for them they can replace me with someone else, and that is exactly what will happen. You know, Mr. Speaker, you can pick the best man in any community but you do not know what you have got until after you have got him. You do not know what his reactions will be until after he is elected a member of parliament.

Some people come here thinking they are some special creation and they forget all about their constituencies, but those people do not stay here for long, and during my time I have seen a lot of them leave. Mind you, they were a lot smarter men then I and could make wonderful speeches, but when it came down to solid facts they forgot all about the people who elected them. They did not pay any attention to their mail. I have seen fellows with mail piled a foot deep on their desks and who thought all they had to do was get up in the house and make a speech. More people talked themselves out of this house than talked themselves into it, and I would suggest to the younger members of the house that if you want to stay here, don't talk too often and then they don't know how stupid you are. That is the reason why I have stayed here so long.

When this flag issue first came up I thought the Prime Minister would at least give us a choice. I am sure hundreds of designs were submitted to him, as they were to all of us, but in my opinion he picked the one that was the least attractive. Had he gone to the Indians or Eskimos I am sure he would have found an artist among them who could have drawn a better flag than he produced.

I do not understand why the Prime Minister will not accept the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. This is the best way out that I know for him, and he should let the people tell him what flag they want. I myself do not want any particular flag. If the majority of the people want another flag I will go along with that, but I do object to having no choice whatsoever and I cannot understand this attitude of the Prime Minister and why he has been so ill-advised.

During the time the Liberals were in opposition they had two members who had more to say than anybody else, and knew how to run the country, or at least they said so, when the Conservatives were in power. Now they are in the cabinet, and if this is the advice they have given the Prime Minister, all I can say is that it is not very good advice. I suggest that he take advice from some of his backbenchers who have more sense about flags than he himself has.

I have a daughter-in-law who is a Ukrainian. Her family has been in this country for a generation and she can speak Ukrainian. She has a family of four, the youngest being about nine, but she has never tried to teach her children to speak Ukrainian. These people were satisfied to come to Canada and live like Canadians. In fact all the different nationalities that have come here in the last 25 years do not clamour for us to speak their languages. They are good people, fine people, and have contributed a lot to this country, but they do not demand that their languages be spoken, and why a minority language should be forced on the rest of Canada is more than I can understand.

I do not think the Prime Minister can stay prime minister unless he is ready and willing to do the things that the ten provinces want him to do. The sooner he gets that into his head the better he will get along. If he is the statesmen he should be, he will not listen to any minority group and do the things they want him to do. He does not have to do those things, and he does not have to be embarrassed about it either. At present he is embarrassing his own members who are trying their best to follow him against their will. I will not disclose any names, but some of them have told me they do not want to go along with the Prime Minister but what else can they do when he says, "Either vote for my flag or else there will be an election"? Like a great many others they do not want an election and I do not believe the country wants an election.

Surely to goodness there is not any group who would want a flag which the majority of the Canadian people would not accept? I hope the Prime Minister will take this advice from me. I have been here longer than he has. I do not pretend to know as much as he does, but surely I could not have stayed here for this length of time without being able to figure out the best thing to do. I have been in some pretty good fights since I came here, and I say to the Prime Minister that the easiest way to work this thing out is not to quarrel about it but to talk it out, and talk sensibly to each other.

I hope I have not said anything that has offended anybody in the house because I did not get up for that purpose. I would not want to offend anybody; I like my friends too well for that. I like my people at home, and I had to get up and say something about the flag because this is the flag they want, and so long as they want it I am satisfied to speak for them. If we cannot get it, then I hope to goodness we can appoint a joint committee of the house and the Senate to go into the question and bring back a recommendation. If there is an overwhelming majority of the committee in favour of that recommendation then I would say accept it, and it does not have to be a unanimous recommendation. I do not think it would be possible to achieve that, but it should be a great majority before we accept anything.

The Prime Minister has said he will allow a free vote, but now that so much time has elapsed I am afraid a free vote would not count as much as it would have a month ago. He should take a second look at this matter. I believe he acted like a school teacher when he said, "Either you pass this flag or you don't get any summer holiday." You cannot talk to grown men like that. I was whip of this party when we had 208 members to handle. I got along fine with them and from my experience I can tell you that you cannot tell grown men what they have to do. They know what they have to do without anybody telling them. You can ask them to do something, but you cannot tell them.

I hope the Prime Minister will come to his senses before he has destroyed the unity of Canada. If we are to have unity in Canada it has to be unity in ten provinces, not in nine, or one. We have to be all united and the sooner we are all united and go ahead with something more important than the flag, the better it will be for Canada. If the government has any legislation that is more important than the flag, why does it not introduce it? Why does it put the flag ahead of important legislation? Nobody told the government to bring in the flag and nobody insisted on its being introduced. Because we are talking to stop the government from passing this flag, and this is the only hope we have of stopping it, the Prime Minister thinks this is a filibuster. This is not a filibuster. This is a question which, once it is settled, is settled for all time. The decision, once taken, cannot be altered. I hope the Prime Minister—and this is all I intend to say—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cardiff: Now listen, boys, and learn a little more. I could stand here and speak for a long time. I have plenty of notes I have not looked at yet. Nobody else has seen them; I wrote them myself. But I do not like reading notes, even though in this particular debate I would prefer to have used my notes so as to avoid the possibility of my saying something which, later, I would find I had not really intended to say; sometimes we are led away on such occasions as this into saying things we might afterwards regret. On this occasion, let me remind hon. members opposite, I could go on for another half hour, at least. I do not know how much time I have left to me, but I have not been called to order yet and I wish to thank the Chair very much.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to take the wise advice of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cardiff) and sit still and learn a little more; but as this debate progresses and the month of August draws to a close I find it difficult to stand up in this chamber without indulging in a little reminiscing.

The minds of many of us on this side of the house, when we think of the many trouble spots in the world today, turn to an occasion almost 25 years ago, when we had to stand up and make decisions—decisions which, once reached, could not be treated lightly. In September, 1939, many of us, with little or no idea of what the future held, decided that Canada was worth fighting for and that our way of life should be retained, never of course thinking for one minute that the symbols which we cherished then would have to be surrendered on the altar of political expediency.

When the original resolution was introduced, it appeared, because of the heavy propaganda with which it was launched, that those opposed would be submerged by weight of numbers. But the constructive approach by members of this party has kept debate at a high level. Now it appears across the country that resistance has stiffened and that support for a more democratic choice for a flag design is being registered. It was to this end that the subamendment was introduced, and if it were adopted would show in no uncertain terms the divergency of opinion regarding a national flag.

By supporting this subamendment, the members of this party are being more charitable than were some other members of this house when Bill C-97 was introduced on October 2, 1963, and Bill C-83 on March 25 of this year. On both those occasions attempts were made to prevent first reading of a bill which would adopt by statute the red ensign as Canada's national flag. Because of the action taken with regard to the introduction of these particular bills, I am fully convinced that the people of Canada wish a choice in the design of a national flag. No amount of verbiage on the part of this government can conceal the fact there is bitter resentment not only regarding the design of the Prime Minister's flag but in the method used to secure its adoption. Many views were expressed to me, not all favourable, at a time when the flag issue was not so controversial as it is now. Needless to say, I am now glad their opinions were given at a time more free from emotion and sentiment. However, as I suggested, all submissions were not in favour of the red ensign as it flies today. There were those who suggested modification as defined in the subamendment. In a mood of compromise there have been suggestions that the present flag be retained, with further recognition of Canada's multicultural existence. At least those who feel additions are needed to a truly national flag should at least have the opportunity to put forward their ideas.

Still, it is obvious there are those with strong convictions who are willing to seek some common ground on which to settle this controversial issue. The subamendment introduced by the hon. member from Regina City (Mr. More) is the most sensible device yet suggested to give the people of this country the right to exercise that freedom of choice which is presently being denied them. It is hard to understand in this day and age why a minority government should use such an arbitrary method of forcing on the Canadian people a lacklustre flag, supported by illogical arguments and dedicated to rancour and division.

On the other hand, those who favour the three maple leaf design would have an equal opportunity to vote for the flag of their choice. They would be doing this on an individual basis and should be glad of the opportunity to register their opinions without political pressure or fear of any recriminations. It should be an honour for those who wish to relegate the red ensign to history to stand and be counted in support of a design which appeals to their particular fancy. Those who wish all symbols of our British heritage obliterated from our flag should welcome a plebiscite in which they could favour a design bereft of those emblems of our Christian civilization. This arboreal mutation of sea and tree is entitled to that recognition which the faithful can promote in a flag combination of wood and water.

If the government feels the Canadian public is overwhelmingly in favour of its design, then of course it is justified in the action being taken, but most indications are to the contrary. The government would immediately acquire considerable respect if even one or two of the suggestions made in this debate were considered.

Surely the suggestions made in the subamendment are not so outrageous as to be ignored completely. Surely reason and compromise are not words so foreign to our vocabulary that they must be disregarded. The official opposition has made it possible to discuss the flag issue in terms of the wishes and desires of all people in Canada, as opposed to the government's hard-headed stand on the three maple leaf design or nothing.

With the submission of literally hundreds of designs there must also be thousands of individuals whose creative imagination might yet produce a flag design acceptable to many people in this country. But under existing conditions there is no incentive or effort to produce anything but hostility.

A great disservice will be effected if the present amendments are ignored and the government proceeds on its present course towards that situation best described as an irresistible force meeting an immovable object. While I am personally in favour of any measure which will ensure Canadian unity and understanding, I cannot easily relinquish my feelings for that flag which has been recognized for a hundred years. The red ensign is a flag of dignity and nobility. It is a proud emblem of a great nation. It inspires pride and confidence in our democratic institutions over which it flies. It is an appropriate mark of our past and a distinguishing figure of our future. Those who have fought under its colours have an abiding pride in the traditions it represents. Those who promote its continuing existence today are remaining true to a trust which will ever be maintained by all who will never yield where principle or honour is concerned.

I have not used any documents in the course of my remarks, or excerpts from newspapers, or letters. However, these only serve to assure me that there is an ever increasing weight of public opinion which is dissatisfied with the method devised to promote the government's flag. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, the press can be of tremendous value at a time like this by faithful and objective reporting. But regardless of whether or not the voice of reason is heard, there will be no abject surrender on a topic which tears at the very roots of a nation. This is a time to bind and not to cleave, and I trust that methods may yet be found to mend our differences and resolve our difficulties.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I make no apologies for speaking on the subamendment that is now before us. I consider that it is the responsibility and, if I can be more emphatic, the duty of each member to speak on the flag issue and the move of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to take the red ensign from us. After all, as has been explained by many hon. members, the Prime Minister asked us all to express our views. This is not a filibuster. Members of the official opposition are doing what they were elected to do, namely to exert a restraining influence, and if I could be more blunt I might say to block foolish, unwise and unwanted government action. I am one of the majority of Canadians who consider that removal of the Canadian red ensign is unwise, foolish and unwanted. I repeat, this is not a filibuster. We are doing what must be done in an effort to prevent a great mistake that Canadians would have to live with for a long, long time. We are acting responsibly in the public interest, and to a greater and greater extent the public is beginning to appreciate this, in spite of certain biased press reports and certain statements by government leaders.

We are not holding up government legislation, as has been explained by other speakers, because there is no urgent government legislation before us. There should be government action on many pressing problems, but none of this very essential action has been taken, or at least it has not been directed into definite legislation that could be considered by parliament. How can we be accused of holding up government legislation, when the Prime Minister admits that he has nothing more for us to do now but pass his flag? The Prime Minister has told us that if we conclude the flag debate on the terms he has dictated, we can have a recess. I was going to say "a summer recess", Mr. Speaker, but that season is now past. As other speakers have said, we in the official opposition place our duty and responsibility above the offer of a holiday. By using up our own holiday time we cannot, in any fair way, be accused of holding up government legislation that is not ready for us.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, each member of this house should make his or her position clear on this very upsetting and emotional flag issue thrust on the country by the Prime Minister. I will make my position clear at the beginning of my remarks. I think the Canadian people should have an opportunity to express their wishes on such a personal and emotional question as a national flag. That is why I am speaking in support of the subamendment. As has been pointed out by other speakers, holding a plebiscite is not a very common practice in our system of democratic government. I agree that this is so. But in this particular matter of choosing a national flag, I think it is essential, in the interest of general acceptance of that flag, that the people be given an opportunity to express their views and thus make the choice by a majority decision. This is all we are asking in the subamendment and the amendment.

This particular flag issue is not an ordinary problem of government policy that can be changed by removing the government at the next election. With an ordinary piece of parliamentary legislation concerning economic or fiscal policy, that can be revised or removed by a succeeding government without too much effect on the public, I do not consider that a plebiscite is necessary. But this flag issue is entirely different. It is an intensely emotional question, and if a flag is chosen it will remain as our national flag and cannot be changed by a succeeding government. That is why we should have a plebiscite.

The subamendment clarifies the amendment moved by our leader proposing such a plebiscite. The Prime Minister and his supporters are opposed to this suggestion of a plebiscite. Why? They say a plebiscite would bring out —and these are their words—divisions in this country and would create new dissensions. The Prime Minister should have thought of this before he decided, apparently all by himself or at least with only a few advisers —or should I say, ill-advisers—to foist his three maple leaf design on Canada.

I am sure—and others have made the same statement—that foisting an ill-considered flag on the people, without their consent by their vote, will create a great deal more division and dissension than could ever be caused by a plebiscite. I firmly believe that the people—at least, those in the area for which I speak—want to be consulted about the flag; they want to have a hand in making this very important decision, this very emotional decision. I believe the Prime Minister is beginning to realize this at last. I think the great volume of letters he is receiving is having an effect on him. How else can one explain his apparent change of mind, or at least his changed attitude? Now he says he might consider the setting up of a special all-party committee to study the issue and bring in a report. Of course, there are strings to this offer; but at least it appears to be a softening of his earlier dictatorial attitude. If we cannot have a plebiscite, the matter of an all-party committee to study flag designs and bring in a recommendation might be considered.

The members of that committee would have a great responsibility and must be able to represent the views of the majority of their constituents. When and if such a committee is set up, each member should have received over 50 per cent of the votes cast in his constituency in the 1963 federal election. In this way those members would be considered as speaking for the majority of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, it appears that agreement in respect of such a committee has not been reached. I will now return to the question in respect of the plebiscite. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) lists four choices, or questions. The first is in respect of the retention of the Canadian red ensign in its present form. The second relates to the red ensign with changes, emblematic of the main heritages of the two founding races. The third relates to the three maple leaf design, commonly referred to as the Pearson flag. The fourth choice relates to the one maple leaf design.

Mr. Speaker, when I speak in support of the subamendment I am speaking for the many constituents who have written to me. I have received more than 800 letters expressing support for the red ensign. I received my first letter today in favour of the Pearson flag. In addition to those individuals who have written in favour of the red ensign, many have expressed support for a plebiscite. In view of the fact we are considering that subject at this time I should like to quote portions of several letters I have received. I think it is my duty to do so in an attempt to show that I am not speaking merely from a personal feeling, but from the point of view of my constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I only intend to read short portions of these letters, and I will name those places from which they emanate.

The first letter was written from Strasbourg and states in part:

> We consider it an insult to our intelligence that we have been denied a referendum.

The second letter is from Watrous and states in part:

> Regarding the flag. Most of the people that I have spoken with are in favour of the red ensign and those that are lukewarm on the subject at least feel there should be a vote on the matter.

The next letter is from Pense, and states:

> —75 per cent—

Referring to this district—

> —in favour of having a vote on the matter.

The next letter is from Nokomis and in part states:

> Regarding the flag issue—: Everyone I have talked to concerning this issue are of one mind. A vote should have been held asking if a distinctive Canadian flag was desired by the people.

Another letter I received from Strasbourg states:

> I don't think Mr. Pearson should be allowed to get away with such high handed tactics in regard to a flag we have had for so long. The people should have a chance to voice their opinion in such an important matter.

I received this letter from Semans, which states:

> As for the people around here, whether they are for the red ensign or not, the vast majority feels that a new flag should not be imposed on us without a national referendum. They feel that, if the majority of the Canadian people want a new flag then a new flag it should be, but if the majority want the red ensign then the red ensign should be maintained.

Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram from the Semans, Saskatchewan, branch of the Canadian Legion which was accompanied by four pages of signatures, and which states:

> We strongly deplore the arbitrary action of your minority government—

This telegram was sent to Mr. Pearson.

> —in dictating to the people that they shall have a new flag. This contravenes the democratic rights of every Canadian. We respectfully urge that the government call a national plebiscite and restore to the people their democratic privileges of deciding whether they want the red ensign or a new flag.

Mr. Speaker, in order to show that the point of view I am presenting is not that held only by the people in my constituency, I should like to refer briefly to statements from other sources. The first is from Toronto in the form of a circular letter which states in the third paragraph:

> One way we can be effective is to demand a plebiscite or national vote on the flag issue.

The second quotation I should like to refer to appears in an editorial in the Toronto Telegram of August 2, 1964 and in part states:

> The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.
> No decision of the House of Commons, by free vote or otherwise, to strike our historic ensign and replace it with a pennant of the Prime Minister's choosing can be construed as expressing the consensus of the nation.
> The voice of the people can be heard, on this issue only through a national plebiscite.

Mr. Speaker, I think that brief reference to this important editorial indicates the whole gist of it and expresses the opinion of the majority of Canadians.

I should now like to quote from an article which appeared in the Victoria Colonist as follows:

> —the request to the egocentric Prime Minister to allow the citizens of Canada to vote about the flag.

They were referring to a national plebiscite.

I should like to quote from an article appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of June 29, 1964, after the Prime Minister first introduced this new design to replace the red ensign. This article refers to a poll taken in Winnipeg in respect of the flag issue, and not a flagpole.

> Seventy four per cent of those polled favoured a national referendum on the flag.

I should like to now quote from a letter I received from the dominion president of the Canadian corps association. I am sure every member of parliament received a copy of this letter. The president states:

> Therefore, the Canadian corps association, dominion command, again emphatically requests the Prime Minister of Canada, and parliament as a whole, to place this subject before the people, at the next regularly scheduled general election. Let the voters finalize this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to mention this matter in the House of Commons when the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) is not in her seat, but I told her I was going to make reference to the amazing statement she made in which she asked every member to vote in favour of Mr. Pearson's design, disregarding the expressed wishes of their constituents. As I say, I was very amazed at that. I took her to task in an earlier speech and evidently what I said came to the attention of the newspaper in her district. She represents the constituency of Northumberland. The editor of the paper there saw my comments and sent me a copy of the Cobourg Sentinel-Star for July 22 last in which is published the results of a poll conducted in her constituency of Northumberland. The headline is "Northumberland wants ensign, favour nation-wide vote, county people are emphatic, decisive choice is made". The report goes on to say that in the survey 626 people were asked for their opinions and the result was considerably more than two to one in favour of the red ensign. With regard to the question of a plebiscite, which we are now considering, the question asked in the poll was: "Do you favour a vote on the issue of a national flag"? The survey showed that 358 favoured a plebiscite, 130 were opposed and the remainder either had no opinion or preferred a plebiscite provided no cost was involved.

As I say, I am sorry the hon. member for Northumberland is not present, but I am sure she received a copy of this newspaper survey. To continue further on the matter of a plebiscite I should like to read an excerpt from an editorial which appeared in The Legionary for July, 1964. I think it should be put on the record. It reads as follows:

> The Legionary believes that the flag question is such an issue and again strongly urges the Prime Minister to let the Canadian people decide, one way or another through a national plebiscite. It is the most democratic way of solving this problem. It is the only way to ascertain what the people really want. And the request for a plebiscite is sure to be warmly supported by all Canadians of good will and moderation because, no matter what the result, if the issue were settled by a parliamentary vote only, grave doubts would arise in the minds of a great many citizens that it represented the will of the people. These doubts would linger on for many years and would remain a serious obstacle to the attainment of national unity. So please, Mr. Prime Minister, let the people decide. It would be a statesmanlike solution and might well be a nation saving move.

I think that brief editorial comment certainly sums up the stand we in the opposition are taking. Finally, with regard to the need for a plebiscite I should like to refer to a report which appeared in the Amherst Daily News on December 29, 1961 before the Prime Minister became prime minister. He was being interviewed at a press conference held in Halifax and was being questioned with regard to a flag. He expressed the opinion then that there should be a distinctive flag, and was asked this question:

> How would you poll the people on this?

This was his reply:

> We would poll the people when we have a general election. And if they don't like the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag which can't be mistaken for that of any other country, they'll let us know in no uncertain terms.

That was the statement that the present Prime Minister made at a press conference in Halifax on December 29, 1961. I think I have put enough quotations on the record to show that the people of my constituency want a plebiscite, and I believe it is just an average constituency that is representative of a great part of Canada. The galleries have been crowded during the flag debate. These daily visitors from all parts of Canada have heard our side of the question, and when I say "our side" I mean the views of members of the official opposition. I have met some of the visitors afterwards and they have expressed surprise at the silence on this question on the government side. I might add that I too am surprised at the silence of government supporters. The gallery visitors and Canadians generally will have to place their own interpretation on the absence of personally expressed opinions in support of the Prime Minister's flag.

I am not a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that in court it is recognized legal practice that when the defendant has a poor case he says as little as possible. Perhaps this explains the silence of the government and its supporters. During a period of heckling directed against one of our speakers the Solicitor General (Mr. MacNaught), who is in the house now, was challenged to tell the house why he was supporting the Prime Minister's attempt to remove the Canadian red ensign, which has been our officially recognized flag for so long. His reply was that his vote against the red ensign would be his speech. I do not think Canadians will accept such an offhand attitude. They will want to know why he is voting against our present flag, why he, the Prime Minister and their colleagues are so determined to remove the Canadian red ensign from flagpoles all across Canada.

We would like to hear from more government members. I do not throw out a challenge, because that might be embarrassing to them, but I point out again that the people in the galleries and people all across Canada want to hear their explanations or excuses. The voters want to read in the newspapers or hear on radio or television why government members want to have a flag that severs all connection with our past history. In the hope that at least one of them will rise to defend his intention to vote against the red ensign if we ever come to the vote, I will conclude my remarks by inviting any member on the opposite side of the house to rise and defend his position.

Mr. G. H. Doucett (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate this evening on the subject that is before the house I consider it to be a great privilege as well as a duty on behalf of the historic riding of Lanark which I have the honour to represent. I first wish to express my congratulations to the many members who have taken part in the debate. As a former speaker said this evening, they have distinguished themselves and their speeches have been of a very high calibre. With that I agree, and while I should like to mention all of them, time does not permit.

But, Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to hear some of the government supporters express their views, especially some of my next door neighbours, and others a little more distant from my riding. I should like to hear my neighbour to the east who represents that great county of Carleton. I would also be delighted to hear my good friend and neighbour to the north, that budding politician who is making a great bid for the Liberal leadership in the province of Ontario. I should also like to hear from the minister who represents that historic constituency within which lies what is known as the limestone city, Kingston.

Yes, I would go a little farther west to one of the other ridings I know fairly well, and in which many of my friends and acquaintances live, that of Hastings South. I would be delighted to hear the young member who represents that riding express his views on this very important issue that is before the house. I think it is a very important issue, Mr. Speaker, but I do not believe it is an urgent one. I fully realize that feelings on this issue are mixed, but the extent to which they are mixed we cannot be sure. Surely when an issue strikes at the very soul of a nation, consideration should be given in an attempt to arrive at a fundamental solution.

In my opinion, the government is off to a poor start. Should there be a plebiscite or should a committee be established? This is something to which I believe the government should give serious consideration. The proposal now before the house is mentioned in the resolution, but I am not going to take the time of the house to read it. It will never bring about, Mr. Speaker, that which the government, I hope, would wish, and that is greater unity throughout Canada. The amendment before us offers all our people some alternative. Surely, the selection of a flag is not a one man task. Perhaps as a result of the strong feelings that exist in Canada today regarding language and culture, it is extremely difficult to unravel the threads leading to the subject of the flag, all the pros and cons of this particular issue, and to consider unemotionally and with understanding all the suggestions put forward by the various groups and organizations across this great country, all of whom desire to be known as Canadians.

A flag is described, as explained tonight by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), as being a piece of cloth or a device attached to a staff or halyard, used as a standard, symbol or signal. I feel certain that if Canada is to survive in the present state of confederation, such a flag must become a symbol of unity to all Canadians. Various groups hold very strong views as to what such a flag should contain by way of symbols and devices. These feelings arise from deep seated loyalties and allegiance to one or other of the founding races of Canada. The decision as to just what a national flag for Canada is to become is a very difficult one for those charged with that responsibility. While the decision will be difficult, it will also be historic and must be approached with a full realization of this position. On this decision undoubtedly will rest one of the greatest contributing factors to our country's unity or disunity for generations to come.

There are three flags prominent in the discussion concerning a flag for Canada. First there is the union jack. This flag, pure and simple, is essentially the military flag of England. It was ordained by virtue of the royal proclamation of King James in April, 1606. It is interesting to note that only 15 years later, in 1621, a flag was granted to Sir William Alexander for Nova Scotia by King James, in the charter of New Scotland. Nova Scotia is the only province of Canada to possess, through royal charter, a flag of its own, and I understand it is the pride of that province to this day. The union jack has claimed the strong allegiance of thousands of Canadians down through the years, particularly those whose ethnic origin is in the United Kingdom. In order to emphasize this point, Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary to recall the United Empire Loyalists who came to this country as pioneers to live under the union jack rather than another flag. All of those great citizens who braved the briny oceans, who came here and hewed their homes from the primeval forests, I am sure have left a heritage for us, of which we should all be proud.

Canada is pleased, I am sure, to regard herself as a Christian country. Most of her citizens, if not actually professing Christians at least have a certain amount of reverence for God, the Bible and all those attributes usually understood by the general term "Christianity". For this reason, the union jack has added appeal because it enshrines the upright cross which is the emblem of our Lord, yes, of our Lord's death on Calvary, for our national redemption and personal salvation.

The red ensign is described in the encyclopedia as a plain red flag bearing the union jack on the upper quarter next to the staff. This is the flag of the British merchant service and of all peoples who are not entitled to use the white or blue ensign. By the addition of a device in the fly containing the symbols of the United Kingdom, the fleur-de-lis for France and the maple leaf for Canada, this flag has been in common usage as a Canadian flag for at least two decades. It has been flown from all public buildings and government establishments in Canada. It has been used by our armed forces in various theatres of the world. It has been generally accepted by all visitors to Canada as the Canadian flag. Our men and women of the services have proudly served under the red ensign in foreign lands. To them it represented all for which they were ready and willing to lay down their lives if necessary and for it many shed their blood.

I should like to just read this poem by John McCrae. I think it is something to which every Canadian should give thought when they are thinking about wiping out the very heritage and tradition of this country, that symbol and that emblem which we have loved and cherished over the years. John McCrae wrote:

> In Flanders fields the poppies blow
> Between the crosses, row on row,
> That mark our place; and in the sky
> The larks, still bravely singing, fly
> Scarce heard amid the guns below.
> We are the Dead. Short days ago
> We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
> Loved and were loved, and now we lie,
> In Flanders fields.
> Take up our quarrel with the foe:
> To you from failing hands we throw
> The torch; be yours to hold it high.
> If ye break faith with us who die
> We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

I say that we should give thought to some of those great citizens who fought and died for us. During the world wars the Canadian red ensign, the old red duster as it is called by many, was symbolic of hope and unswerving devotion to duty on all the seven seas.

There have been strong representations, from national organizations as well as a host of individuals, that this flag be retained and confirmed as our Canadian flag. I, like other members of the house, have received many letters and suggestions for new flags, some from personal individual friends, but I would only like to put on record a couple, one being from the Smiths Falls Record-News as follows:

> We felt you would be interested in being assessed the results of a readers' poll taken over the past two weeks by this newspaper. The readers were asked their preference for a national flag as well as a national anthem. The following are the results:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | The ensign | 83.7 per cent |
> | Maple leaf | 16.3 per cent |
> | The Queen | 72.7 per cent |
> | O Canada | 27.3 per cent |

Enclosed with it was an article which appeared in the newspaper and at the end of it there was this poem:

> I am ready to fight,
> With all my might,
> Anyone on the wrong track,
> Trying to pull down our union jack.
> Some say a maple leaf that's all,
> To me a maple leaf turns yellow in the fall.
> My deepest soul
> Within me grieves,
> Flying on a pole,
> Three maple leaves.

I have another article from the same paper in which it states:

> The flag debate seems to have made people and organizations conscious of our present national symbols. A number of residents of the town have started to fly their own personal flag choice from their porches and car aerials. A number of merchants have reported that they cannot keep the red ensign in stock. Latest to join the red ensign group is the Smiths Falls lawn bowling club which erected a flag pole last week.

I would also like to place on the record a letter which covers a petition signed by many hundreds of signers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It would be well if we allowed the hon. member for Lanark to continue without being interrupted.

Mr. Doucett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was about to read this letter which covers a petition signed by several hundred signers:

> We the undersigned feel it is about time that some voices were heard in favour of the red ensign, which a vast majority in Lanark county respect and fly as our national flag. Why a change should be proposed by Mr. Pearson to appease a small vocal group we cannot understand.
> Mr. Pearson should be aware that his is a minority government. Only 42 per cent of the Canadian people saw fit to vote for this government, and the majority of our people decided not to do so. There has never been a prime minister since confederation who has caused so much disunity, bitterness, strife and confusion. I personally agree with some hon. members of parliament and many Canadians that Pearson is trying to ram this new flag down the throats of the Canadian people.
> We, the people of Lanark county representing every religious and political affiliation along with representatives of the I.O.D.E., Orange associations, I.O.O.F., Masonic, Knights of Columbus and many others etc., etc., are opposed to any Canadian flag which does not incorporate the union jack. May we respectively solicit your support in this respect.
> Rarely in Canadian history has a parliament presented such an unattractive picture of itself to the people who elect it, the people who pay for it, the people whose public business it is supposed to transact.
> The voters are not amused, the voters are not at all impressed with what they see in Ottawa. We are disgusted and disillusioned.
> We, the voters of Lanark county and petitioners go on record as being opposed to the proposed new tri maple leaf flag to replace the red ensign. Every Canadian should be granted the right to vote on this vital matter by means of a national plebiscite.

Of the many letters I have received those are all I am going to put on the record, but I would like to say a word about the proposed new flag. This flag, without any symbols of the two founding nations, is strictly Canadian design and it has been said it meets the heraldic requirements of a flag. It is not known whether this is acceptable to the French speaking population across the country, and it has been received with mixed feelings by other groups.

There are people who cannot see any good in it at all. There is another group which, though being extremely loyal to the crown of Britain, takes the view that unity in Canada is of the greatest importance, and the people in this group would accept the proposed flag in the hope that it might contribute to Canadian unity and make for a stronger Canada, which would in turn strengthen the commonwealth. In this way they feel that they would be serving the best interests of both Canada and the commonwealth. There is yet another group which subscribes to the thoughts just expressed but which hastens to add that it is in accord only with the principle of a new, distinctive Canadian flag, not with the methods being employed to bring about its approval. No individual, and no government can employ such methods without being political. I feel that a matter which so closely concerns the life of this nation should be settled in such a way as to cement the unity about which a former prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, said, and I say, "Without unity, all is futile".

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the Prime Minister, that while the people of this bountiful land wait for important legislation to be dealt with, he, their commander in chief, obstructs the country's march to economic fulfilment by protracted debate on an issue which history records was settled years ago. The voice of Canada from sea to sea is vibrant and strong. I say to the Prime Minister: If you would have ears to hear, its voice speaks by day and by night. Can this house ignore the wishes of men and women who long since decided what flag should represent Canada on the ramparts of freedom? Is the petition presented weeks ago by the hon. members from Cumberland (Mr. Coates), York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) and Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) bearing nearly 20,000 names to be treated as a mere scrap of paper. Are not these 20,000 people who took the trouble of signing a petition to send to the parliament of Canada deserving of some consideration?

The history of this country is steeped in tradition. I trust that the Prime Minister and the members of his government will give heed to the traditions they know to be a part of this great country's inheritance. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has closed his ears to the request of more than 250,000 gallant men and women who gave their services and offered their lives for their country, and who are now denied the right even to express their views by balloting on the flag of their choice. When the right hon. gentleman met with them in Winnipeg—I will not repeat what he said on that occasion; we have heard it several times—he as much as said: Here is your flag; take it or leave it. I think that is a pitiful experience to go down in the records of this country—that he would say this to people who fought and defended this country under the red ensign.

I fully realize we are living in a democratic country. I stand for the fullest degree of freedom and I hope we shall always have the privilege in this great land of ours to think, speak, worship and go about as we wish. But I do not think a decision of such emotional importance as this should be, or can be, decided by members of the House of Commons and still retain Canada's maximum unity. I feel that everyone who wishes to do so should have the opportunity to voice their views and opinions. The provinces which make up our dominion naturally have boundaries. But Canada is without boundaries from sea to sea and should be one Canada for all Canadians. As I say, I fully agree with the democratic process, but I feel the method employed on this occasion must be one which will keep this country united in order that we may go forward united and build on the great foundation which was so nobly laid by our forefathers.

Mr. Matheson: Would the hon. member who has taken his seat permit a question? May I ask the hon. member for Lanark, my friend and neighbour, whether in view of the fact that he has made reference to the Prime Minister's address to the Royal Canadian Legion in Winnipeg he would read to this house one sentence or paragraph thereof which he regards as being evidence of poor judgment, or poor taste, or as being offensive?

Some hon. Members: The whole speech.

Mr. Doucett: In reply to my hon. friend and neighbour—to use the expression he did—in case there may be some misinterpretation of the right hon. gentleman's statement I will leave it to him, when he makes his own speech, to explain in the greatest of detail what his views are. The hon. member has interrupted every speaker who has spoken in this debate—

Mr. Matheson: Untrue.

Mr. Doucett: And I think it is time they should have an opportunity to speak without such interruptions.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Louis Frenette (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but in view of the slowness of the procedure and the stubbornness of some members of the house, I feel I have to take seven or eight minutes to express my constituents' views and inform the house of the feelings which have developed among the people since this debate started two weeks ago.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the word debate no longer applies here and that what we are witnessing is much more closely connected with the world of entertainment than with parliamentary procedure.

I do not feel that the supporters of a real flag and their opponents have the right to carry on this empty discussion any longer.

More than a hundred speeches have now been delivered on the matter. Everyone has reached his own conclusions. I do not think that any argument can be added which might influence anybody.

An amendment and a subamendment have been introduced and since then speeches have been going on, most of the time outside the questions respecting this amendment asking for a referendum, or outside the subamendment which deals with the questions that might be asked in a possible plebiscite.

The Canadian people are asking more and more embarrassing questions on the nation's business.

Since when does parliament have to consult the people on such and such question after it has been sworn in? What is the role of the government? How far can the responsibility of the members of the government go? Are members of parliament so inefficient that they have to consult their electors as soon as a difficult question must be solved?

Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is high time to put an end to this sham of a debate, for the simple reason that the Canadian people are losing confidence in this wonderful institution of parliament. The Canadian people are also losing confidence in the members of this parliament, who refuse to take their responsibility and are looking for excuses to camouflage the truth.

I agree that each member should have the right to express his opinion in the house, and I respect that opinion. I also agree that the supporters of the union jack or the red ensign should defend those flags, and I recognize their merit. Were I myself in their position, I would do the same. Since they represent ridings where the electors want to maintain those symbols, they are only doing their duty and, for that reason, they deserve our respect.

But I cannot admit that responsible members of the House of Commons should hide behind this referendum smokescreen to reject the responsibility on the Canadian people.

The Canadian parliament has become the laughing stock of the people and its reputation for inefficiency is increasingly spreading, to such an extent that we are justified in wondering whether we could ever make up for all the wrong already done in this connection.

How can we claim to be qualified to administer the country and settle the serious problems of our times, if we are not even in a position to organize our own legislative program?

The deadlock where we now find ourselves is the most eloquent argument in favour of a revision of the whole procedure and I hope that all hon. members will remember that in due time.

The Portneuf people are well known for their common sense and their innate sense of logic. Besides, they proved it in a very eloquent way during the last two elections. They are respectful of order and of our institutions, but in face of the ridiculous situation created by the discussion on the flag resolution, their faith and confidence are seriously shaken. And every time I have an opportunity to meet them, they inform me of their concern and disappointment.

Those people want a genuine Canadian flag and after the information I gave them, they still have confidence that this government will adopt such a flag. That is why I am asking the government to take all the means available to them to bring to an end, as soon as possible, this futile discussion by giving us an opportunity to express our views by voting on the matter.

I do not intend to advance any new arguments in support of the resolution or to refute certain points raised by the official opposition, because I would be afraid to fall into the same errors for which I am blaming certain of my colleagues.

The choice of the design, the timing of the introduction of the resolution, the likelihood of an eventual compromise, all those subjects have been, to my mind, sufficiently discussed. I think the institution of a committee was an elegant gesture on the part of the Prime Minister, but the terms laid down by the Leader of the Opposition were so harsh that they prove, once again, the ill will of some members.

The Prime Minister is blamed for certain withdrawals, certain retreats. It has often been said in this debate that such reversals on the part of the leader of the government are due to the fact that he is no politician. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Prime Minister is not a politician; unfortunately, there are too many politicians who more often than not give more thought to the next election than to the serious business of the nation.

In reaching a decision, the Prime Minister was not concerned with election results, but with a solemn promise made to the Canadian people. By his courageous action, he gained the high respect of the whole nation and, whatever may be our views on this issue, he should be commended for his courageous attitude.

The manner in which this project was presented may have been clumsy. That is possible. However, I do not think it would be fair to discredit the whole issue because of that.

Personally, I am glad to be a member of parliament today and to participate in this historic debate. Having had the honour of supporting a truly Canadian flag will be my greatest satisfaction and probably my most pleasant memory as a member of parliament.

The Prime Minister is being criticized for his statement on a free vote. Among those who object to that, is there a single member whose vote will be affected by that statement?

Mr. Speaker, I feel that all hon. members are now sufficiently informed on the issue and that it should be put to a vote without further delay. In my opinion, the longer the final decision is delayed the greater the risk for national unity.

If, after the series of speeches that we have heard, there are still members in this house who do not feel sufficiently informed or enlightened, it will be necessary to consider amending the Elections Act to have each candidate take an I.Q. test, in addition to making a $200 deposit.

In order to maintain the reputation of parliament and its members, under the authority conferred upon parliament for the proper administration of the affairs of this country, I take the liberty to urge on the members of the government the necessity of taking action to close this debate, by extraordinary means, if need be.

Mr. Speaker, you may be sure that if I had the power to put forward a closure motion, I would be greatly pleased to do so, knowing that I would thus be doing my duty as a representative of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales).

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member who has just resumed his seat permit a question? He referred several times to "a distinctive flag". Would he mind telling the house what he means by "distinctive"?

Mr. Dupuis: Not with a union jack on the flag.

Mr. Smallwood: There's a great statement from a cabinet minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Frenette: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member, I must say that I do not know whether this is due to simultaneous translation, but I referred several times to an authentic and not to a distinctive flag. Whatever interpretation is given to my remarks, by a distinctive flag I mean an emblem which represents our aspirations and which does not bear any sign of allegiance to any foreign country.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Rhéaume: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Ten thirty.

Mr. Rhéaume: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) care to identify himself as the person who made the remark that "distinctive" is anything that does not contain the union jack?

Some hon. Members: Yes, say it.

Mr. Dupuis: I said that, Mr. Speaker. A distinctive flag is a flag without the union jack, or without the fleur-de-lis—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupuis: —or without the emblem of any other country on it.

Mr. Smallwood: You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Bigg: A very statesmanlike speech, that was.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. If there are questions about tomorrow's business, they might be asked now.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

AGRICULTURE—QUEBEC—PROTESTS RESPECTING FEED GRAIN SUBSIDY

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, during the question period this afternoon, I said that the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) should tell us about his discussions with the Quebec U.C.C. representatives who came to meet him last Friday in order to discuss the possibilities of amending his agricultural assistance project, providing for subsidies as regards feed grain transportation in eastern Canada as well as other parts of the country.

I had raised that question, knowing—

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but there seems to be more than the usual amount of noise in the chamber. I think the house would want to accord to the hon. member who is now speaking the privileges of the chamber.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are evidently used to these noises and I was not worrying too much.

I was saying that I was interested—as are most hon. members of eastern Canada—to know what was the intention of the Minister of Forestry concerning the subsidies for the transportation of feed grains.

We learned directly from the minister and also through departmental order No. 1964-1155, that the government intended to establish from September 1 next new rates for the transportation of feed grains in the various parts of Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and the maritime provinces.

Having studied the figures made available to us, I came to the conclusion that certain areas would continue to suffer discrimination while others seem to have benefited from the special attention of the minister concerned and his officials.

I refer especially to the Magdalen islands, represented by the minister, and to Newfoundland, which will both benefit from a most generous assistance for the transportation of feed grains.

I am happy, Mr. Speaker, that these areas will benefit from this assistance and I have no intention to propose a reduction of those subsidies.

On the other hand, if we compare the proposed rates, we note that $25 a ton will be granted for the transportation of grain to be delivered in Newfoundland, $7 or $9 for grain delivered in Halifax and $15 for grain delivered in the Magdalen islands. Certain factors which I find hard to assess have played a part in all that.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Saguenay-Lake St. John region which I have the pleasure to represent here, allow me to say that the farmers in that area will suffer from the government's new policy because starting September 1, if nothing is changed, they will have to pay 80 cents a ton more for transportation. I think that is far from what we had the right to expect and from what we had asked.

If that is the policy of farm assistance and restoration which the Minister of Forestry intends to advocate to help farming in eastern Canada, well, he has missed the boat entirely; he will have to proceed differently to restore the farm economy in our regions, particularly in the Saguenay-Lake St. John region.

Our farmers have very good land and they only need a little help in order to manage during the difficult period they are now going through.

Since we have been in the house, that is over two years ago, we have been constantly calling for some action to help farmers especially with regard to the transportation of feed grain.

After waiting so long, we finally hoped that thanks to the member for Îles-de-la-Madeleine, whom I trusted and in whom I still have some confidence, a solution would be provided.

But unfortunately, with the representatives of eastern farmers and the leaders of the Catholic farmers' union, I can only deplore this decision of the minister, and I hope that before September 1, he and his officials will acknowledge their mistakes. I hope that they will bring in some changes so that farmers of the Saguenay-Lake St. John area and others will not suffer any prejudice as a result of a mathematical error made by some officials.

We are told that it is a slight increase. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the present circumstances, the farmers are not in a position to support even a slight increase, when they had every reason and every right to expect an improvement in their situation through a reduction in the cost of feed grain which would have reduced their production cost and enabled them to compete on the markets.

[Text]

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for his question. I regret my inability to reply in his native tongue. I will speak slowly in order that I may communicate the thinking of the minister.

The hon. member has brought to the attention of the house the fact that farmers from the area he represents have had some problems and have expressed some complaints to the minister. The Minister of Forestry recognizes this and suggested to the hon. member in the house today that last Friday he did receive a deputation from Quebec and, in fact, from all Canada with regard to freight assistance on feed grain. I think he would expect me to say at this particular time that under the former policy—when I say "former" I mean the policy that applied prior to the interim statement made on July 24—certain inequalities did exist. There were areas in Canada where more than freight assistance was being paid by the government and in fact this did represent a subsidy on the feed itself.

It was the hope of the minister that these inequalities might be corrected and that in addition certain assistance might apply on feed grain moved by truck in many areas. It was hoped by the minister and by the government that the application of the assistance on feed grain moved by truck would make it more competitive and would thereby reduce the transportation costs on feed in many areas. While it is recognized that some of the subsidy may have been lost, which was over and above the freight assistance and was actually a subsidy on the feed itself, the reduction as the result of more competitive rates applying in the transportation of this feed will be a compensating factor. I think the minister expressed the thought in the house today that the views of the farmers as expressed on Friday last would be duly considered.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, August 26, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROUSE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR RED DEER IN "TIME" MAGAZINE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members of the official opposition. On page 7 of the August 28 issue of Time magazine the hon. member for Red Deer is reported to have said, after the meeting of the party leaders last week on the flag resolution, that the leader of the official opposition refused to consult with his own party. I quote his reported words:

> Mr. Diefenbaker refused to consult with his own party, or to consider any reasonable compromise himself.

I can say, Mr. Speaker, in connection with these matters, that the leader of the official opposition did consult with his party at all times, and the stand he has taken on the flag issue represents the opinion of this party. Either the hon. member for Red Deer is talking through his hat or he has been misquoted by this magazine. Since members of the official opposition know the quotation in Time magazine to be a complete falsehood, I would ask that the hon. member for Red Deer withdraw it and dissociate himself from Time's incorrect news commentary.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member, I should like to say that the leader of the Social Credit party is absent in his riding with his family. I think we may well take note of the question raised by the hon. member, even though I am sure what was said is true.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: At this stage I do not believe any further discussion will be particularly useful. It seems to me that we should await the return of the hon. member for Red Deer.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): On this question of privilege, the hon. member who has just spoken used the words that he believed this statement to be true. I think he should immediately withdraw those words or present proof to the house that his statement is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The best evidence, of course, will be what the hon. member for Red Deer will have to say on his own behalf. I do not see any purpose in continuing or perhaps in listening to secondary evidence. Let us hear from the hon. member concerned first.

Mr. MacInnis: Further to the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please; this is not the time for a discussion of this question of privilege. Certain allegations have been made. Let us hear both sides of the story before we reach a conclusion.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, the remark just made by a member of the Social Credit party is certainly a reflection on myself and every other member of the official opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely a member of a group in this house is entitled to stand up and say that the matter raised as a question or alleged question of privilege will be brought to the attention of his leader on his return. That is a matter of courtesy.

TRADE

JAPAN—VOLUNTARY RESTRAINTS ON EXPORTS TO CANADA

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to table a copy of a letter dated August 25 which I have received from the chargé d'affaires of Japan informing me of the voluntary restraints which the Japanese government is applying on the export of certain products to Canada during 1964. These decisions were taken by the Japanese government following consultations which began in December, 1963 between the Japanese and Canadian governments. The levels of restraint which Japan is maintaining during 1964 provide generally for orderly increases over the 1963 levels. These increases are in the order of 3 per cent to 5 per cent, and in virtually all cases these increases are not greater than the expected growth in the market for the products in question.

By leave of the house I suggest that the chargé's letter be printed as an appendix to Hansard in view of the interest it has for a large number of people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that should not be printed as an appendix to Hansard. As an appendix to Votes and Proceedings possibly it would be in order, but not for Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the details being published in Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gordon: I would like to take this opportunity to express appreciation for the cooperation shown by the Japanese government in the working out of these arrangements. The discussions have, of course, been long and difficult. We would not expect them to be otherwise, since they affect important sectors of Japanese trade just as they relate to important and sensitive sectors of the Canadian economy.

It might be useful if I reminded the house that last year during the course of consultations the Canadian government agreed to the removal of vinyl raincoats from the list of items under restraint by Japan. Following our policy of not seeking restraints on exports when damage to Canadian producers is no longer threatened, we agreed this year that plywood might be removed from the list of items under restraint.

It might also be useful if I said a word about our discussions with Japan on exports of worsted fabrics. There has been some speculation in the press on this subject and, accordingly, I would like to report briefly on where this matter now stands.

In late 1963 representations were received on behalf of Canadian producers of worsteds asking that Japan be asked to restrain exports. These representations were examined closely; it was apparent that until that time the very sharp increase in imports from Japan had been largely at the expense of other supplying countries, and had not directly affected Canadian producers. It was evident, however, that if imports from Japan continued to grow at that rate Canadian producers would soon be threatened with material injury. Japanese exports of worsteds to Canada in 1963 rose by 60 per cent over 1962. The statistics so far available indicate that imports of worsteds from Japan this year may be up by a further 50 per cent or 60 per cent over 1963. This would represent a total value of imports of Japanese worsteds far in excess of Japanese exports of worsteds to all of Europe last year.

It is important to note that Japanese exports of worsteds to virtually every industrial market except Canada and the United States are strictly controlled, either in Japan or in the importing country. This means that exports from Japan will tend to be concentrated on the relatively open Canadian market.

While we have had a number of discussions with the Japanese, no agreement has so far been reached on how to deal with this problem or the level of restraint that might be warranted. I will be taking this matter up further with Japanese ministers at the meeting in Tokyo next week, and I am still hopeful that some understanding on worsted fabrics will be reached which will meet the legitimate interests of all parties concerned, including the Canadian producers, the Japanese exporters and the Canadian users of Japanese goods.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I understand the finalization of these matters will take place in further meetings in Tokyo next week. But the minister said, I believe, in the early part of his remarks that the expected increase in quotas would about balance the increase in the requirements of this country. This, it seems to me, leaves a somewhat narrow margin for any increase in production in Canada and for the increased consumption in Canada of Canadian products.

It has been reported that there has been a worsening of our deficit position, or that there has been a big increase in our imports and a drop in exports; also in regard to the United States there has been a decrease in exports and an increase in imports amounting to 6.9 per cent. I wonder whether the minister is keeping this over-all picture in mind as he looks forward to further increases in imports of goods from Japan. I wonder whether he does not feel this situation is worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): When we have had a chance to examine this list of voluntary restraints on Japanese imports into Canada we shall be in a better position to make a statement regarding it.

However, I think the house should remember—and I am sure the government is aware of this fact—that Japan is still buying from us a great deal more than we are buying from her. Trade is a two way street, and if Japan and other countries are to buy from Canada they can only do so if they are able to earn Canadian dollars with which to pay for these goods. I think this must be kept in mind when we examine these voluntary restrictions. We shall be glad, in this party, to consider this list and make a statement at an appropriate time.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, we listened with interest, of course, to the statement just made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) on trade and financial arrangements made or to be made with Japan. However, in this connection one thing in particular should be borne in mind, and it is this. Even if our trade balance with Japan is favourable we should not forget that the labour content in the goods we import from Japan is much higher than the labour content in the goods we export to Japan. As a matter of fact, our exports to Japan consist mostly of raw materials with, unfortunately, a very small Canadian labour content, so that, as an end result, we are still showing a deficit as far as labour is concerned.

The same thing can be said about our trade with other countries; that is the problem we are now facing and will continue to face unless we change our policy as far as international trade is concerned.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say about the statement just made by the Minister of Finance. According to the minister we have a favourable trade balance with Japan since they import more from us than we do from them.

Now, some Canadian associations have complained to the Minister of Finance against some sort of dumping by Japan in Canada. Consequently, I feel the minister is not quite right in saying that after investigating the situation he is satisfied that such dumping does no harm to Canadian trade and industry.

As he knows, there are Canadian and American companies in Japan at present. As the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard) said a moment ago, our raw material is exported to Japan where it is cheaper to process it, and then it is exported back to Canada. Those are our imports. Let no one tell us that our trade and industry do not suffer from the fact that Canadians settle in Japan instead of producing what we need right here in Canada.

We live in an era when it is absolutely necessary to do business with the other nations of the world, but not to the disadvantage of Canada or other nations. That our international trade should balance, that is in order. However, let no one tell us that goods which enter Canada from Japan and which could be produced here in Canada do not hurt Canadian industry. If Canadians expatriate themselves and settle in Japan because labour is cheaper, the necessary action should be taken to encourage production and industry in Canada so that we may have more and more control over our general economy as well as over imports and exports which concern us.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

R.C.M.P. OFFICER JOHNSTONE, TORONTO

Question No. 1,494—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Does the R.C.M.P. have on its staff, on duty in Toronto, an officer named Johnstone and, if so, on what duties was the said officer assigned on June 22 and June 23, 1964?

2. Did Officer Johnstone visit the premises located at 50 Walton street, Toronto on June 22, 1964, and, if so (a) was he alone or in the company of others (b) what was the nature of Officer Johnstone's duties on that occasion and what duties were performed by any such persons accompanying him?

3. Did Officer Johnstone on June 23, 1964, have in his possession or under his jurisdiction any equipment that could be used for the tapping of telephone lines and, if so, was the said equipment put to any use?

4. Was Officer Johnstone in conversation with Mr. A. G. Dodd on June 23, 1964, and, if so, what was the nature of such conversation?

5. Has the government any information regarding admissions by representatives of the Bell Telephone Company relating to the tapping of telephone lines?

6. Does the R.C.M.P. own a green 1962 Mercury, licence number 722-412, and, if so (a) does this vehicle resemble a Bell Telephone vehicle (b) how and where was this vehicle employed on June 22 and June 23, 1964?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this question is in six parts. I am advised by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that the answers are as follows:

1. There is a member of the R.C.M.P. in Toronto named Johnston and his duties on June 22 and 23, 1964 involved a confidential investigation.

2. No, he was in the area on June 23 on duty of a confidential nature which is not in the public interest to disclose.

3. No.

4. Yes, the conversation related to matters of a confidential nature which are not in the public interest to disclose.

5. No.

6. The R.C.M.P. does own a 1962 Mercury passenger sedan, licence number 722-412. It does not resemble a Bell Telephone vehicle, nor could it be mistaken for a Bell Telephone vehicle. It is not a truck and the R.C.M.P. does not own, or has not used, a green truck.

ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF DISARMAMENT

Question No. 1,506—Mr. Prittie:

1. Is there any agency or department of the federal government charged with the responsibility for studying economic effects of general disarmament and particularly effects resulting from shifts in the nature of defence procurements and the closure of defence bases and, if so (a) which agencies or departments have these responsibilities (b) what agencies or departments have the responsibility for implementing such plans and studies?

2. During the years 1963 and 1964 to date, what reports have been prepared for the government on the economic consequences of disarmament?

3. During the years 1963 and 1964 to date, has the government of Canada submitted to the secretary general of the United Nations any reports on economic plans for disarmament?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On September 22, 1961, the secretariat of the United Nations requested member governments to provide certain information in connection with a study which a United Nations consultative group was undertaking on the economic and social consequences of disarmament. On March 18, 1964 the secretary general of the United Nations requested member governments to provide additional information in connection with a further report on this subject which he intended to submit to the 37th session of ECOSOC and to the 19th session of the general assembly.

The government of Canada prepared replies in response to both of these requests for information. These replies are contained in United Nations documents E/3593/Rev. 1/Add. 1-5 and E/3898/Add. 3 of July 17, 1964 and are available in the parliamentary library.

A number of government departments and agencies co-operated in preparing the replies to the United Nations. In the performance of their normal functions, various government departments and agencies generally endeavour to anticipate and prepare for future developments likely to have important economic effects. Any imminent prospect of significant progress on disarmament would, of course, be given appropriate weight in such forecasts or plans.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

AL GRAHAM—APPOINTMENT TO LABOUR MINISTER'S PERSONAL STAFF

Question No. 1,619—Mr. Coates:

Did the Minister of Labour recently appoint Al Graham to his personal staff, and, if so (a) at what salary (b) what are the duties associated with the position, and (c) what are Mr. Graham's qualifications for the position in question?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): (a) Mr. Bernard Alasdair Graham was appointed to the staff of the Minister of Labour at a salary of $15,000 per annum; (b) Mr. Graham is a special assistant to the minister; (c) intelligence and ability.

R.C.A.F. AND ARMY RESERVES

Question No. 1,689—Mr. McCutcheon:

1. What is the total number of enlisted men in the R.C.A.F. reserve by province of origin?
2. What is the total number of men enlisted in the R.C.N. reserve by province of origin?
3. What is the total number of enlisted men in the Canadian Army reserve by province of origin?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1, 2 and 3. For the purposes of these questions, province of origin is taken to mean the place of enrolment on enlistment. Strengths of enlisted men as of 30 June, 1964 are as follows:

	R.C.A.F. Auxiliary	R.C.N. Reserve	Army Reserve
Newfoundland		58	653
Prince Edward Island		44	498
Nova Scotia		112	3,105
New Brunswick		72	2,689
Quebec	145	218	8,165
Ontario	175	773	14,071
Manitoba	166	247	1,888
Saskatchewan	151	128	2,173
Alberta		247	3,663
British Columbia, Yukon and Northwest Territories etc.		299	3,308
	637	2,198	40,213

PURCHASES OF SCALLOPS BY ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,699—Mr. Crouse:

How many pounds of scallops were purchased by all branches of the armed forces during 1962 and 1963?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): 226,564 lbs.

DAMAGE FROM NATIONAL DEFENCE SPRAY OPERATIONS, N.B.

Question No. 1,700—Mr. MacRae:

1. Did the Department of National Defence carry out spraying operations in connection with brush control at camp Gagetown and, if so, have complaints been received to the effect that heavy damage was inflicted on crops in the Mangerville area, Sunbury county, N.B., as a result of such spraying operations?

2. Has the department taken steps to ascertain the extent of any such damage and, if so, what are the details of any such damage?

3. Is the department taking steps to indemnify farmers who suffered losses and, if so, what steps are being taken for such purpose and to what extent will farmers be indemnified?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. A contract for spraying operations in connection with brush control at camp Gagetown during the period 2-22 July, 1964, was arranged through Defence Construction Limited. One complaint alleging damage to crops has been received.

2 and 3. No. The contractor responsible for the spraying operations is receiving and assessing claims for alleged damage.

LOSSES FROM ARMY WORMS, MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 1,711—Mr. Coates:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture taken steps to ascertain the extent of the damage caused by army worms to field crops in the maritime provinces and, if so, what are the details of any such damage?

2. Is the department taking steps to indemnify farmers who suffered losses and, if so, what steps are being taken for such purpose and to what extent will farmers be indemnified?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): 1. It is not yet possible to make an accurate assessment of the damage caused by army worm infestations in the maritime provinces since the army worm feeds only on plants of the grass family, some of which will show recovery after army worm damage. Moderate heavy infestations were reported in the southern parts of New Brunswick as far north as Centreville and preliminary surveys indicate severe damage in the Moncton, Woodstock, Sussex, Centreville, Long Creek and Hallville areas. In Nova Scotia infestations were reported in the vicinity of Truro, Grand Pré, Canning, Port Williams, Clarence, Wilmot and Bridgewater. In Prince Edward Island infestations were reported at Albery Plains, New Perth and Fortune areas.

2. Programs of relief assistance on account of crop losses are initiated by provincial authorities.

ARMY WORM LOSSES, VICTORIA-CARLETON CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,712—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

1. Has any information been received from the government of New Brunswick concerning damage to crops in the constituency of Victoria-Carleton, due to army worm infestation and, if so, what are the details of such damage?

2. Has the government considered any method of indemnifying losses incurred by farmers through no fault or neglect of their own and, if so, what are the details of such indemnities?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No. However, reports from departmental officials indicate that there were severe infestations in that area.

2. Programs of relief assistance on account of crop losses are initiated by provincial authorities.

ARMY WORM DAMAGE, KINGS COUNTY, N.B.

Question No. 1,714—Mr. Fairweather:

1. What is the extent in area and the estimate of value of crop loss as a result of the infestation of army worms in central Kings county, New Brunswick?

2. What federal or provincial or joint programs are being conducted to eradicate or minimize the infestation?

3. What financial assistance is available under federal legislation to farmers who have suffered financial losses as a result of this infestation?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No accurate assessment of the damage by army worms in central Kings county is yet available. Surveys indicated heavy infestation in the area.

2. The present infestation of army worms has run its course. The damage is inflicted on crops over a period of 14 to 16 days. The second crop of larvae, the offspring of the late summer moths, have never been known to cause damage. As yet no successful method of forecasting infestations has been developed but survey methods to determine the abundance and distribution of very young larvae have been developed and are used to indicate infestations likely to be of economic importance. Such surveys enable warnings of possible outbreaks to be made in time for producers to follow chemical control measures developed to prevent serious crop losses. Warnings were issued by the department early in July of potential infestations in the maritime provinces.

3. Under the Crop Insurance Act the federal government contributes 20 per cent of the premiums and one half of the administrative costs under approved provincial crop insurance schemes designed to insure individual farmers against crop losses. However, since a crop insurance program has not been adopted in New Brunswick, this legislation would not be operative in the present instance. There is no other specific legislation authorizing assistance as a result of this infestation.

MAIL CONTRACT, R.R. 2, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 1,725—Mr. Coates:

1. For what reason were tenders called for R.R. No. 2, Amherst, N.S.?
2. Was the starting point associated with the route in question changed and, if so, for what reason?
3. How many bids were received and what were the amounts of the bids in question?
4. Who was the successful tenderer for the service?
5. What was the amount of the previous contract?
6. How long had the previous contractor provided the service in question?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General):

1. To obtain a formal contract.

2. Yes. Starting point changed to the Amherst post office. It is the general policy to have rural routes start and finish at a post office.

3. Three. Harvey Ralph Noiles, R.R. No. 2, Amherst, $3,200; Walter F. Dickeson, R.R. No. 1, Newport, $3,500; Mrs. Gweneth G. Embree, R.R. No. 2, Amherst, $3,650.

4. Not yet determined. In accordance with the terms of the Post Office Act, an inquiry is now in progress to determine whether the lowest tenderer is able to meet the requirements of the service.

5. $3,319.15 per annum.

6. Forty one years.

CONSIDERATION OF POWER PROJECTS, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 1,728—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

1. Is the Atlantic development board reconsidering the allotment of the grant to the province of New Brunswick of $20,000,000 for the Mactaquac project in New Brunswick in view of the announcement by the premier of Newfoundland that the Hamilton falls project is likely to be proceeded with without delay and that the power secured from Hamilton falls would become available to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island through the medium of a distribution station located at Sackville, New Brunswick at an estimated price of 4 mills per k.w.h.?
2. Is the Atlantic development board considering assisting financially in the distribution of power generated at Hamilton falls as an alternative to the Mactaquac project?
3. What, in detail, are the plans of the Hamilton falls project, Passamaquoddy development and Chignecto tidal development now in possession of the Atlantic development board?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am informed by the Atlantic development board as follows:

1. No.
2. No.
3. The Atlantic development board has not received official plans or reports concerning the Hamilton falls project.

With respect to Passamaquoddy development, the board has in its possession a copy of (a) the report of the secretary, U.S. department of interior to President John F. Kennedy, July 1963; (b) the report by Passamaquoddy Saint John river study committee to the secretary, U.S. department of the interior, dated August 1964.

On tidal development, upper bay of Fundy the board has (a) a copy of the report made for the New Brunswick government in 1962 entitled "Appraisal of Tidal Power in the Bay of Fundy"; (b) a study on sub-surface conditions at Shepody bay and Cumberland basin, commissioned by the board in 1963 and received June 1964.

FARM LOAN APPLICATIONS, KAMOURASKA COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 1,735—Mr. Dionne:

How many applications for farm loans have been received by the Farm Credit Corporation from farmers of Kamouraska county in the years 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963 and of this number how many were accepted?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises that statistical records are kept by fiscal years. For the municipal county of Kamouraska, the answer is:

Fiscal Year	No. Applications Rec'd	No. Accepted
1960-61	1	1
1961-62	2	2
1962-63	13	8
1963-64	12	8

CANADIAN ARSENALS AMMUNITION CONTRACT WITH C.I.L.

Question No. 1,742—Mr. Beaulé:

1. What is the amount of the Canadian Arsenals contract for making ammunition on behalf of C.I.L.?
2. Did C.I.L. refuse nearly 50 per cent of the production and, if so, for what reason?
3. What will be the cost of the extra work involved?
4. How many hours of overtime will have to be worked if this contract is to be completed?
5. Who will assume any loss involved?

[Translation]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry):

1. Total value of Canadian Arsenals Limited contracts for making high velocity sporting ammunition on behalf of C.I.L. is $219,684., consisting of nine purchase orders. Most of this volume relates to new Canadian production, having been formerly imported.

2. The first production lot, representing approximately 11% of the above amount, was refused by C.I.L. and returned for re-inspection. Standards of inspection for exterior finish of high velocity sporting ammunition are more demanding than those for military ammunition, which until now have governed manufacture at C.A.L.

3. Costs, in excess of those estimated for the contracts and due to higher quality standards required, are now being established. In view of the different standard of inspection, it is expected that renegotiation with C.I.L. will result in price adjustment.

4. Overtime will continue till September 4 so as to meet urgent delivery schedule of all the various calibres on order and will total approximately 1000 hours.

5. Para. 3 refers.

INCREASE IN FAMILY ALLOWANCE

Question No. 1,746—Mr. Ouellet:

Is the government taking steps to increase family allowances to $30 a month in order to bring them in line with other sectors of our growing national economy and, if not, what are the reasons for not taking such action?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As this is a matter of government policy any announcement will be made by the government at the appropriate time.

REMOVAL OF TARIFFS ON MEDICAL EQUIPMENT

Question No. 1,748—Mr. Irvine:

1. Has consideration been given to permitting the importation into Canada of relaxation chairs and other medical equipment, used in the treatment of retarded children, free from importation taxes or tariffs when these articles are not manufactured in Canada?

2. Has consideration been given to extending exemptions from import tax on tariffs to all medical equipment facilities imported into Canada, when the same or reasonable equivalents thereto are not manufactured in Canada and, if so, what is the decision, or when is it to be announced?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): In the course of preparations for the last budget, consideration was given to a number of representations requesting that the special end use items in the Customs Tariff providing for the duty free entry of certain equipment and materials used by hospitals, educational and religious institutions be broadened to cover a wider range of commodities, and that duty free entry privileges be extended to additional groups and organizations, both non profit and commercial, which do not currently enjoy such benefits. On the other hand, consideration was also given to representations suggesting that the duty free entry under these items should be restricted to goods which cannot be supplied by Canadian producers.

Having regard to these divergent points of view, it was decided that the best way to ensure full consideration of both sides of the question would be to refer the matter to the tariff board for review and report. The intention to do so was indicated in the budget speech of March 16, 1964.

The tariff board has announced that, in due course, it will conduct public hearings regarding this matter under reference No. 134: Equipment for hospitals and other institutions.

*RED MAPLE LEAF ON COAT OF ARMS

Question No. 1,757—Mr. Churchill:

1. What is the special significance of the small single red maple leaf on the coat of arms of Canada?

2. What is the wording of the explanatory note concerning this small red leaf given in the descriptive booklet on Canada's coat of arms published by the secretary of state in 1923?

3. What explanatory note is given concerning this small red maple leaf in the booklet on Canada's coat of arms published by the Secretary of State in 1964?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this question is in three parts.

1. The following is an extract from a memorandum prepared by Colonel C. F. Hamilton whose advice was sought by the committee appointed by order in council P.C. 668 dated 26th March 1919 to inquire into and report upon the advisability of requesting His Majesty the King, through the College of Heralds, for an amendment to the armorial bearings of Canada:

Extract from short memorandum by Colonel C. F. Hamilton, June, 1921:

The maple leaf is our most cherished emblem. In the crest its red colour may be taken as a reference alike to the autumnal glories of our woods, and to the red maple leaf which on our service flags indicated one who had sealed with his life's blood his devotion to his country.

The crest is a lion, in its right paw a red maple leaf, which latter during the great war, came to be used as a symbol of sacrifice.

3. In the description in non-heraldic terms of Canada's coat of arms, 1964, we find the following:

On the royal helmet, draped in a mantle of white and red, is the crest consisting of a wreath or ring of twisted white and red silk on which stands a crowned gold lion holding in its right paw a red maple leaf.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I ask that motions Nos. 134 and 158 be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—POSSIBLE CHANGES IN SIZE OF PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the matter concerns two departments I will direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask him whether there has been any request by the United Nations or consideration given by the government of Canada to the reduction by 80 per cent of the Canadian contingent in the United Nations peace keeping force in Cyprus. Has any communication been made to the Prime Minister in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no such request received by me or any member of the government; nor has any communication passed between the government and the United Nations on that subject. I am informed that the reports to the effect that such a reduction is being contemplated are without foundation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then is any consideration being given at the moment to any increase in the size of the contribution by Canada or other nations to the troops comprising the UN force today?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the matter of the possible increase in the force is, I believe, being considered by the secretary general, but no communication has been received from him on the matter. Nor has any request been made by the Canadian government for any such increase.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has any informal consideration been given by the government to increasing the numbers in the Canadian force?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, no consideration, formal or informal, has been given.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any information regarding reports that the governments of Greece and Turkey have agreed on a proposal for the union of Cyprus with Greece under certain conditions. Can he give the house any idea what those conditions are, and does he know through diplomatic channels what is the reaction of the Cypriot government to this proposal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada is not a party to the negotiations in Geneva, and would not be expected to become a party because of the neutral position we occupy as a member of the force itself. There have been discussions between the government of Greece and the government of Turkey and the mediator in Geneva, but beyond that it is not desirable to go at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could the minister inform the house whether the Canadian government was consulted on the planned reduction of the United Nations force in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister just gave an answer to such a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, and the answer was no.

Mr. Caouette: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question.

Since the government was not consulted, could he tell us whether, according to him, the forces to be withdrawn will be those under the financial responsibility of the United Nations or whether the reduction will be proportional to the number of troops maintained by the various countries in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member misunderstood the answer given by the Prime Minister and the explanation I myself gave him in answering his question, a few moments ago.

A reduction of the force is not contemplated. That question is merely based on reports published in this morning's newspapers, but there was no official communication between the Canadian government and the secretary general or Mr. Galo Plaza, the political representative of the secretary general in Cyprus.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF TAXATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Is he in a position to tell us when he expects to table in the house the report of the royal commission on taxation and whether he is receiving in the meantime interim reports enabling him to prepare his next year's budget and to grant Canadians the tax cuts they hope for?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a meeting arranged with the chairman of the royal commission on taxation for tomorrow morning at nine o'clock, during the course of which I hope to find out from him how the work is going and when he thinks the report of the commission will be ready for presentation to the government. I can assure my hon. friend that the report will be made public very soon after it is received, or perhaps I should say after it is printed.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell us whether he intends to follow the example of the United States government which is on the point of granting a second tax cut?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I think we are quite competent to arrange our own directives in these matters.

UNITED NATIONS

PROSPECTIVE OTTAWA MEETING ON STAND-BY UNITS FOR PEACE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. With regard to the conference which I understand is going to be held here in the near future involving those countries which have been invited to discuss permanent peace keeping arrangements under the United Nations, can the minister tell the house when he expects this meeting will take place?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the precise date has not yet been fixed, but progress in that regard has been made.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether it is to be this fall or this winter? Can he give us some idea?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would expect it would be this autumn.

COMBINES

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING AUTOMOBILE PARTS AND ACCESSORIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Would he tell us whether he intends to implement the principles of the brief presented to him recently by the national automobile products dealers association?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not understand the first part of the question. However, I know that I have read such a brief, and if such is the question, the answer is yes; if not, I shall look up the question in Hansard tomorrow and give a more detailed answer.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—INTERVENTION BY FORESTRY MINISTER IN "LA PRESSE" STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Since the newspapers report this morning that the negotiations of the employees on strike at the newspaper La Presse in Montreal are moving toward a settlement, would the minister assure us that he will not interfere with this settlement in order not to jeopardize its favourable result?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can read the answer I gave in this house with respect to this matter, about a month ago.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Last week the minister indicated that he hoped he would be able to tell the house last Monday what the final arrangements were under the student loan legislation. Apart from the provincial boards that are required, can he give the house an up to date report?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am planning to make a full statement tomorrow on what the situation is up to that moment.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have any instructions been sent out that school principals will have a voice in the processing of applications for student loans?

Mr. Gordon: No, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF SCHOLARSHIPS IN ENGINEERING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the shortage of professional engineers in Canada, as recently announced by the national employment service, and the recruitment of foreign engineers, would the government consider the provision of attractive scholarships to encourage students to enter this field?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to look into that question, Mr. Speaker. Of course the student loan provisions will soon be in effect, and should help.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED DENIAL OF CLAIM OF FORMER AGENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Justice which relates to the so-called blood bombing. In view of the radio story this morning that Mr. Cowlishaw is going to return to Ottawa to visit us if something is not done, and thinking of the welfare of the members concerned, I wonder whether the government is contemplating any investigation of Mr. Macdonald's claim to ascertain whether it has any validity.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I may answer yes to that question at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Be it on your own head if you don't.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very distinct success of the ombudsman in New Zealand in handling complaints of this kind, does the government not think it is about time we gave serious thought to creating some similar office in Canada, so we would not have to have these complaints brought to our attention quite so dramatically?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, as an individual at least I am ready to answer in the affirmative.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, despite the apparent closing of the door yesterday by the President of the Privy Council I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has received any representations from civil service staff associations asking for reconsideration of the matter of pay increases, in particular an interview with him, and whether an interview will be granted. Would he say at the same time that if such a meeting does take place and the arguments advanced are of a reasonable nature they will receive favourable consideration?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, an interview has been requested in messages I have received this morning, and that will be arranged. I am always anxious to give sympathetic consideration to reasonable arguments.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the difficulty which has arisen regarding the salaries of civil servants, may I ask the Prime Minister if the time is not appropriate for introducing legislation to provide for recognized collective bargaining rights for all public servants?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the government has arranged for an examination to be conducted by Mr. Arnold Heeney into the whole question of collective negotiation inside the civil service. That examination is being proceeded with, and we hope to have a report on the results before long.

CANADIAN FLAG

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF DEBATE TO CONSIDER OTHER BUSINESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he has had any indication from the various representations which have come to him that there is a substantial body of opinion among people who are neither pro red ensign nor pro maple leaf, requesting him to shelve the flag debate and get on with other more important matters.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had a great many communications expressing the hope that a decision will be reached on the flag question shortly, and then we can get on with other important business.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Any excuse is a valid alibi, I suppose.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question in connection with the answer which the Prime Minister gave the hon. member for Port Arthur. I want to ask the Prime Minister, if it appears that the flag debate is going to continue for a prolonged period of time, whether it would not seem advisable to convene the committees of the house so that we might make some use of the time we are here? None of the committees are working at the moment. If we are going to be tied up for the next month on the flag debate, it would seem that the committees ought to be convened so we can get on with some useful business during this hiatus.

Mr. Pearson: I understand there is a meeting of one committee scheduled for next Tuesday. The hon. gentleman's suggestion that we might schedule meetings of other committees is one that certainly should be considered, so that while this debate is going on in its present form some useful work might be accomplished.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Would it not be advisable to give at least two full days per week to a discussion of the main estimates, which have been so seriously neglected by the government this session?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the work of the house will be announced to the house in due course from time to time. At the present moment nothing could be more important than to bring the present debate on the flag to a decision, this debate having already gone on for 15 days and no decision having been made on the subamendment or the amendment or the resolution.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You asked everybody to talk.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that when we discussed the bill of rights the Liberal party spent a month obstructing that project?

Mr. Pearson: I think the bill of rights debate was a very useful one. It only took a few days, and there was unanimous agreement. The bill was improved as a result of the amendments made by the opposition, and a decision was then taken. At the moment, Mr. Speaker, we have had 119 speeches on the flag and we are still on the subamendment to the amendment to the resolution.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the flag was not even mentioned in the speech from the throne, and it was not mentioned as one of the important matters the Prime Minister said required priority, does the Prime Minister not feel that some of these other things he has not got ready might be got ready and brought before the house so we would be able to do that which we should be carrying out, namely improving the economic condition of this country and doing something on behalf of trade, the statistics on which show a very serious situation?

Mr. Pearson: On this matter I confess I share the frustration of the hon. member for Three Rivers and other members of the house. I do agree that it would be desirable if we could come to a decision on this matter. For that purpose, if my friend would only accept the arrangement proposed by the leaders of all the other parties, then a reasonable time limit could be agreed upon and we would be able to proceed with these matters to which he refers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Speaking of frustration, has the right hon. gentleman read the very significant remarks of the hon. member for York-Humber that this flag which was brought before the house was never before the Liberal caucus, nobody knew about it and the Prime Minister just brought it in on his own?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I read those interesting remarks, and I read them in conjunction with the remarks of the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière.

AGRICULTURE

JOINT LOANS TO FARM GROUPS FOR EQUIPMENT PURCHASES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. During his peregrinations in western Canada about a month ago he stated that on the 25th of July there would be introduced in the house a measure to provide loans to groups of farmers to enable them to purchase farm machinery in the most economical manner. I would ask him whether the legislation has been drafted and a resolution has been prepared, and is this not something that might well go on the order paper if indeed, as he said, it is all ready?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I am just a barnyard boy sometimes I do not understand the right hon. gentleman's words.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hays: We do have a piece of legislation that will soon be ready to go on the order paper.

An hon. Member: Soon?

Mr. Hays: The policy has been decided. We hope the matter will receive attention by the house and that we will get the legislation through soon, because the farmers need it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there will be no misunderstanding I say to the minister at once, put this resolution on the order paper and it will receive immediate attention, if he is so concerned about the farmers. Will you do that?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the right hon. gentleman has thrown a bit of a monkey wrench into this deal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A monkey wrench into a non-existent resolution.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

TURKEYS—REIMPOSITION OF QUOTAS ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I have received many complaints from turkey raisers in Saskatchewan asking that the minister reimpose the quota system on turkeys coming in from the United States.

Mr. Winch: You have got protection now. What more do you want?

Mr. Cooper: My question is, would the minister consider reimposing the quota system on imports of turkeys from the United States?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the turkey people are having a meeting, I think on September 14, at the Fort Garry in Winnipeg, and I shall be at that meeting to explain to these people why we do not feel we should impose these quotas at this time.

QUEBEC—EXTENSION OF ARDA PROGRAM TO SAGUENAY REGION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry in his capacity as minister responsible for the administration of ARDA. Has he given consideration to the request I made recently to the effect that he should recommend to his officials responsible for the administration of ARDA to choose the Saguenay-Lake St. John area for their next survey of farm problems?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this responsibility does not rest with the Minister of Forestry but with the minister of agriculture for the province of Quebec.

REDISTRIBUTION

SUGGESTED ALL-PARTY CONFERENCE ON LENGTH OF DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Assuming that when we get to other important business one of the early items might be a resumption of the discussion of the legislation regarding redistribution, I wonder if the minister would consider convening an informal conference of representatives of all parties, similar to the one he convened before we ever started the redistribution debate, to see if we might come to some understanding and avoid another protracted debate on that important subject.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think that is an excellent idea. If I had any indication at all that the representatives of the parties would be willing to come to such a conference with an open mind, with a view to overcoming the impasse we reached on that bill and which resulted in another protracted debate, I would be very happy to consider any reasonable proposal at all. I said so during the debate. If I had such an indication we would have such a meeting on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nice co-operation again.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman said there was nice co-operation between myself and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I only say, sir, I wish we could get the same co-operation from the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. As the remark suggested there was knowledge on the part of the minister that I was going to raise that question, let it be quite clear that I told no one I was going to ask that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Naturally I accept the two denials, and I expected the same course would be followed on this as on so many other matters in which that fine spirit of co-operation has been shown at all times.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am having a little difficulty trying to get the names of hon. members who wish to ask questions, and time is running out. The hon. member I have next on my list is the hon. member for Quebec East.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC—PREFERENCE IN APPOINTING PERSONNEL OF TELEVISION STATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Secretary of State?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Since the opening of the C.B.C. television station in Quebec city has been announced for next month, can the minister assure us that, in the hiring of the staff, their qualifications being equal, preference will be given to candidates from Quebec city and vicinity rather than to those from outside?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is surely aware, that is the sole responsibility of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and I am convinced that, in carrying it out, the corporation will take into consideration the views expressed by the hon. member.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO ISSUE OF THREE MAPLE LEAF STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): I should like to direct my question to the Postmaster General. Will the minister indicate whether the distribution of the three maple leaf postage stamp is part of a campaign to promote and publicize the tri-leaf flag design?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): I am rather surprised that this question was not asked months ago. The three maple leaf design was decided upon in or about the month of July last year, long before the question of the flag ever came up.

Mr. Webb: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister then undertake to see that ample stocks of Canadian stamps bearing the head of Queen Elizabeth are available at all times at post offices throughout Canada?

Mr. Nicholson: I gave that assurance at the time my estimates were before the committee. If the hon. member or any hon. member of this house can draw my attention to the fact that my direction is not being respected in any post office throughout the country, I will see to it that it is implemented.

Mr. Korchinski: Is the Postmaster General now considering a single maple leaf design?

USE OF MAILS FOR DISSEMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Walker (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Is he prepared to take any action regarding the use of Canadian mails for the dissemination of hate literature which originates in another country?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, when a question of a similar nature was asked by the hon. member for York Centre some months ago I asked members of the house, if they had envelopes or containers which showed the addresses from which this literature was sent, to forward same to me, and I indicated we were prepared to take action. It will be recalled that at that time we did close the two known postal office boxes that were in use in Canada.

I might also say that, as a result of the injection into the mail stream of a number of brochures and letters very similar to those which originated from the Toronto address earlier, which latter ones emanated from Winnipeg and B.C., I sought the advice of the Department of Justice, and in late July I issued an interim prohibitory order refusing the use of the Canadian mails to the particular organization involved. If hon. members have any other envelopes or containers that carry the address of this organization, which I believe is the national white American party, we would consider taking similar action.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): As a supplementary question, would the minister give consideration to making it compulsory for the return address to appear on all such distribution of mail?

Mr. Nicholson: I know my officials have discussed this with the Department of Justice as a possible course of action. I do not know whether this is one move that can be implemented, but I shall inquire and inform the hon. member later.

TRADE

NON-PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN GHANA FAIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in his absence, and in view of the fact that my question has a lot to do with the welfare of industry, maybe the Minister of Industry would care to answer it. Could the minister advise the house why Canada will not be an official exhibitor at the Ghana international trade fair next February, in view of the fact that some 31 other countries are going to participate?

[Mr. Walker.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I am not aware of the answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, but I shall take it as notice.

THE MINISTRY

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN NATIONAL DEFENCE PORTFOLIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Is the Prime Minister considering appointing the Associate Minister of National Defence to the national defence portfolio and, if this is the case, what will happen to the other minister? Will he be elevated to the other place?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the present minister is doing a remarkably good job—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —and I am sure he will welcome the continuing assistance of the associate minister in that job.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, last week the Prime Minister indicated to the house that the Minister of National Defence spoke for the government on matters concerning personnel. I would like very much to know just what the duties of the Associate Minister of National Defence are, if they do not include speaking for the government on personnel matters?

Mr. Pearson: He has many duties. Indeed, he is much busier than his predecessor was in the previous government.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TELEGRAMS DEMANDING RESIGNATION OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr Speaker, in order to prove that co-operation is not a one way or two way street may I, on behalf of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and myself, inform the house that the telegrams which he and I received this morning demanding our resignations from the House of Commons were not intended for him and me, but were copies of a telegram sent to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We started the question period at 2.25 and by virtue of the recent standing order, temporary if you wish, the half hour period ended at 2.57. It is now just three o'clock.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Tuesday, August 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): Mr. Speaker, in speaking at this time on the subamendment I think I would be remiss if I did not say a word or two in commendation of my colleagues for the many outstanding and patriotic addresses they have made in the house, and I think you will put up with me for a moment when I say many of us were so pleased last night that the hon. member for Huron made such an outstanding address. I believe he is the oldest member of the house in terms of age and the second oldest member of the house in terms of years of service.

I have no intention of speaking on the flag, but I do intend to speak on the subamendment which was moved by the hon. member for Regina City on August 13, and which is recorded at page 6806 of Hansard for that date. I think it would be only proper for us to refresh our minds by taking another look at the question he proposed at that time. The first one was, "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?" The second was, "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritage of both founding races?" The third was, "Are you in favour of the three maple leaf design?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Irvine: The fourth was "Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?" I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the action of hon. members on the other side in putting punctuation marks at the end of each of those sentences.

I think this proposal would give every Canadian an opportunity to exercise his freedom of choice, an opportunity to express his opinion as to what we should have by way of a national flag. It was my privilege to address the house on July 2, at which time I spoke at great length on the subject of the flag. As a result I have received many letters. I have a file here which any member who wishes may examine; it contains some 200 or 300 letters on this subject sent to me between the date of that address and today. These letters are not all from people with Anglo-Saxon names, though there are, of course, a large number which bear such names. There are also a great many letters from people whose names indicate a French background. Then again, a great many of the names suggest a background which is neither Anglo-Saxon nor French. For example, I have had letters from people with names such as Steve Marti, G. W. Snetsinger, Mike Hillcoff, J. Melkonian, Janet Schaef, A. C. Petrouski, Dr. H. C. Soltan and Zudy Martinovic. I could mention further names, but one which comes to my mind immediately, because it is a name which was borne by a man who rendered signal service to this house, is the name Aberhart. So these people do not all come from one national background.

Many of these letters are interesting. I do not intend to read them all, and I know hon. members will be happy about that. At the same time I must direct the attention of the house to some of them. I have letters from as far away as Manitoba. Many are from Quebec. There are some from New York state, some from Michigan and one from a correspondent in England. Among all these letters there is only one in support of the proposed new flag, and I am thankful to say it did not come from within my riding. As I say, one of these letters came from England, and I should like to quote a small portion of it:

I was shocked to read recently in one of the daily papers here in England, that Canada was to have a new flag. A few days ago, I received a letter with a strange stamp on it, but it was a Canadian stamp. The sender of the letter informed me that the design of the stamp was that of the proposed new Canadian flag, which, the writer thought, was to become legal the following week.

As one of your supporters I am writing to protest very strongly against the proposed new flag.

I have another letter which came to me as recently as yesterday. I should like to quote a portion of it because I think it is important and would make a contribution to this debate. It comes from the city of London under date of August 21, and it says:

I did want to say thank you for your recent copy of 'House of Commons Debates' with the particular reference to your part played in this tremendous issue of the national flag.

Canadian Flag

I want to express my appreciation of the way in which the Conservative party have fought this issue. I cannot help but feel very proud of all that has transpired upon the floor of the house, not unmindful of the many hours the honourable members must have spent in meetings, sittings, etc.

It has been a very grave and grim summer for all concerned, but little do we realize, so far from the actual scene of action, how wearying and, at times, discouraging, this all can be to the human mind and body.

Once again, my sincere thanks for a job well done. Whatever the outcome, whatever flag flies as our official national flag in the days to come, the Conservative party of Canada can well remember with honour this glorious summer of 1964.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Irvine: It is apparent that the words which have come from this House of Commons and gone out across the country are making an impression upon the people of this great nation of ours.

I should like to quote now from an article which was published in the London Free Press under date of May 23, 1964. It was written by Mr. Arthur R. Ford, who is editor emeritus of our paper in London. It is headed "Will New Flag Provide Unity?"

For my part I think it is a mistake nationally for a minority government to press this issue. Personally I think it will divide the country more than ever. I have a high regard for Mr. Pearson, for his achievements in his career as a Canadian diplomat. He has raised the status of Canada at the United Nations and in the international world.

Mr. Pearson, however, is asking a lot from Canadians of British or U.E. Loyalist stock to pull down the union jack, although most of us will accept it if it will put an end to the movement in Quebec for separatism, associate states and terrorism and bring about national unity, but I doubt whether the new flag or the new anthem will satisfy the Quebec extremists.

Most people in this part of Canada are prepared to go far, and to lean backwards, to meet fair and reasonable demands of French Canada. They earnestly want to join with them in building a greater Canada. They realize that the old Quebec is disappearing and that a new and modern Quebec is rising. The University of Western Ontario, a number of years ago, led the way by establishing a summer school at Trois Pistoles to give students of the university an opportunity, not only to learn French, but to understand French Canada. In recent years there has been a movement in the schools to broaden the use of French.

There are certain principles, however, which they are not prepard to surrender. They want a continuation of the connection with Great Britain, through a common membership in the commonwealth of nations. They want to retain the monarchy with the Queen of Great Britain also the Queen of Canada. They want a retention of the British parliamentary system of government, which stands for the possession of those precious freedoms which we have long cherished—the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, the freedom of association, the freedom of religion and equal justice.

[Mr. Irvine.]

This is part of an article which was written by one of Canada's most outstanding writers, and I know it came directly from his heart.

Some time ago the Prime Minister said in this house, at the beginning of the flag debate, that everyone would have an opportunity to speak. In fact he urged that all members should get up and express themselves, and I believe it is the right and duty of every member to stand up and express himself on behalf of his constituents. This cannot be considered a filibuster. We received an invitation from the Prime Minister himself to stand up and speak on behalf of our constituents.

On May 25, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Peace River, we were given to understand that the debate would proceed without interruption and that every member would have a chance to speak. This can be seen by turning to page 3533 of Hansard. Now there is talk of limiting the debate to one week in which to decide something of great national importance whose results we shall have to live with for many years to come. As late as yesterday the Prime Minister made a statement in this chamber in answer to a question. He said:

I still think we should proceed along the course already indicated, and I do not like to think that there is total irreconcilability between positions.

But by his very words, Mr. Speaker, he did admit that there was division. These are some of the things to which I think we should be giving serious thought now. We know there is great division throughout this entire country, perhaps more division than we have ever had in our whole history.

I know the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre referred last night to the article in the Toronto Telegram of August 22, 1964. He quoted one part of it. As a result of his quotation I went through this article, and I believe there are two or three more points that should be brought to the attention of this house and I hope ultimately to the attention of the people throughout this great country of which we are privileged to be citizens. This article goes on to say that the vote cannot be free. It says it is impossible for a vote to be free under these circumstances. Then the article says:

At this stage, with party lines hardened, it is difficult to conceive of a truly free vote.

Having shown, belatedly, a willingness to retreat from his earlier stubborn demands for the banner of his choice, he now should go one step further and measure public sentiment by plebiscite.

Perhaps Mr. Pearson fears the outcome of such a testing of public opinion. Letters and petitions expressing determination to retain the ensign have been impressive.

There is no reason why this obstructive and divisive bill should not be shelved pending a reference to the people. There is no urgency. Most Canadians outside Quebec appear to be quite satisfied with the flag we have now. In Quebec, the matter is of little importance as there they fly the Laurentian flag with its white cross and fleurs-de-lis.

Until Mr. Pearson softens his stand, the opposition is justified in continuing a modified filibuster.

Regardless of what they may call it, they say they feel we are justified in the stand we have taken; and I think this is the general opinion of Canadians across this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Irvine: This article continues:

As distasteful as such devices are in parliament, no other method seems practical in the face of Mr. Pearson's stubbornness.

The way out of the parliamentary impasse is clear; a plebiscite to end the long debate and to allow parliament to get on with more important legislation.

This is the way the people across this country of ours are feeling. I would admit that perhaps three or four weeks ago there was a slightly different feeling; but today, with the number of letters I am receiving in my office and the number of letters I know many other hon. members are receiving, the general idea is "Don't give up the ship. Keep fighting. You are doing a good job". I received word just the other day that the city of London has recently ordered its flag requirements for the next five years. The flag they ordered was the Canadian red ensign.

We could go on at great length, Mr. Speaker, to test the pulse of the people of Canada at the present moment. In the Ottawa Citizen of August 22, last Saturday, there appeared an article on the subject of the flag. I would like to quote one small paragraph that says:

And if the Prime Minister is retreating from the three-leaf flag, the three-leaf flag would appear to have little chance of ever being run up the parliamentary flagpole.

What weakened Mr. Pearson's position?

Further down it says this:

The red ensign is now stronger than ever.

If not above the battle, it at least flew over the battlefield—and its position seems considerably stronger at summer's end than it was at the beginning.

Mr. Pearson is ready to throw the design of a new flag back into committee—a far cry from hopes that it would be flying by July 1, or for the royal visit in October.

Then we have the Ottawa Journal of August 20, last Thursday. I could go on at great length with these quotations, Mr. Speaker. Many quotations have been given to the house, but these quotations have not been referred to. In this article appearing in the Ottawa Journal it says—and this shows the difficulty that is confronting the Liberal front benchers—

When the caucus met Tuesday, the Prime Minister missed the assault by the backbench on the cabinet because he was chairing that conclave of the party leaders seeking the elusive negotiated peace in the flag war.

There is an indication that the apple in the bottom of the barrel has gone bad; and we know what happens to the whole barrel as the result of something like that. I know many hon. members of this house have read these articles, and some hon. members on the other side of the house must be very much concerned about this whole question. The feeling is there, and that feeling is growing day by day. And we talk about a free vote. How could there possibly be a free vote? Many hon. members on the other side of the house have already declared their intentions; they have gone to the point where they just cannot go back. In some cases they have told their constituents how they stand. I know, from speaking with some of them personally, that they would like to make an about face now, but how can they do it?

What about the Secretary of State for External Affairs? I think he has passed the point of no return. A recent public opinion poll carried on in Windsor indicated a majority support for the red ensign. What will the minister do now? What is going to happen to him? It is not that I am too concerned personally, but as a minister he may be bound to the Pearson pennant alliance to a point from which he cannot retreat. Which way will he jump? We know he is pretty adept at jumping, but we do not know which way he is going to jump. I'll bet he is somewhat concerned at the moment.

Some of the other things that have come out in the way of propaganda sometimes make one wonder why we do not have a minister of propaganda in this house. They talk about the cost of keeping the house open. I believe that recently—I may be wrong, and if I am I stand to be corrected—the secretarial staff were told they would be employed throughout any recess we might have. Every member gets his pay whether he is here or not. What is the expense of keeping this house open? We have many visitors here in the summer; we have to keep it open for them to come in. Perhaps there is the cost of printing Hansard, Votes and Proceedings and things of that type. But we have no business before the house at the present time, and the time we are now taking, as good Canadians is for the purpose of standing up in this house and fighting for these things we think are right. We are using our holiday time, or our recess time, for that purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Irvine: It is interesting to hear the questions across the floor of this house. I am not too sure that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition may not be perhaps a little closer to a compromise than we all expect. Wouldn't it be nice if, as Canadians, we could just sit down together and work this thing out and come to a solution that would be satisfactory to everybody? But we cannot do it that way. The only recourse we have is a plebiscite.

I say these things, Mr. Speaker, as a member seeking only to further unity, national unity. It is my hope that they will come together and in some way establish an all-party committee which would select a flag which would be of truly non-partisan design.

The subject which is before us is the subamendment. It is my opinion that we should have a plebiscite, Mr. Speaker. However, let me go a little further and ask: Should we have a plebiscite now? To this question I would answer no. I would say, let us file away until the next election, which may not be too far off, this whole contentious issue, which is upsetting the country and causing so much division among the people. Then at that time let us have a plebiscite on this matter. If we were to have a plebiscite now we would have to put the whole of our election machinery into action. Through enumerators, we would have to prepare voters lists and employ all those people and services which are necessary in order to hold a plebiscite. This would cost just about as much as a general election and would be a waste of $15 million. There is no reason why this matter cannot be filed away and left aside until such time as we have an election. Then we could have the plebiscite, whether it be in November or March or a year hence. In the meantime let us get together as good Canadians should, and make sure that this parliament works in the best interests of the people in the Dominion of Canada. In this way we can kill two birds with one stone as well as save ourselves some money.

By approaching the subject in this way we will provide three opportunities to the people of Canada. First of all, we will give them a chance to simmer down and think about the matter a little less passionately than they are thinking about it at the moment. It would give them an opportunity to think clearly. The people are mad, and they are mad because they may be losing their red ensign. They are mad about that, and the great waves of protest are growing daily. We are not afraid of having a plebiscite because we know what the answer will be.

In addition, we will save $15 million. I think it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) who said "What's a hundred million?", and we know he was being facetious. But $15 million is a lot of money, and we should have it if we can.

The most important thing we shall be giving the people is this. We will be giving them the opportunity of exercising their freedom of choice. We cannot let down now. We must carry on. The only alternative for us if we bow down and accept the flag which has been presented by one person is, in essence, to let the people of the country down and give in to what is almost a virtual dictatorship.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate for the second time. I do so only because the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), for one, made in my opinion a rather provocative speech and I thought it only appropriate to answer him today. Second, the subamendment before us should be given serious consideration by the government. It is quite obvious that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is not interested in considering anything but the original or initial resolution, but it is with the hope that he will reconsider the matter that I take part once more in this debate. I also want to deal with some of the recommendations made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) whose speech a few days ago could well be considered one of the better ones delivered in this house for a long time.

I might just say that I am very interested to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), a fellow Albertan from the city of Calgary, in his seat today. I welcome him back. It is of course my hope that he will participate in this debate during the course of this afternoon because I know how some of the people of Calgary feel about this question. I should also like to know how the minister himself feels. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it appears at the moment as if our country is getting along on its own in spite of parliament rather than because of it. Again I plead with the Prime Minister to give this matter serious consideration, or if you like reconsideration.

When one looks at the subamendment introduced by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) he finds it poses four questions, namely: Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign? Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign modified? Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design? Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design? What possible objection could the Prime Minister see to a plebiscite on this question during some future election? What he would in fact be doing is allowing those people, and there are many of them, who have not communicated with their members of parliament either by petition or letter or telephone, and who feel strongly with respect to the questions involved in the subamendment, to express their viewpoints on the subject. What is more fair, Mr. Speaker, than to give these people the opportunity to mark an X against the appropriate question during an election? It would then give the red ensigners the opportunity to express their point of view. It would give those who feel strongly about the red ensign but would be quite willing to accept a slight modification to express their point of view. Then again it would allow those who are in favour of either one of the two other designs to express their point of view as well. What could be more fair than that, Mr. Speaker? I do not understand the Prime Minister's reticence with regard to action on this matter.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle suggested, as an alternative: Why not refer the matter to a parliamentary committee? Although I think this would be my second preference, I see nothing wrong with turning the question over to a parliamentary committee composed of an equal number of members from the two largest parties in the House of Commons, and members from the other parties in the house.

I suggest there are approximately 3,500 designs in the possession of the government at the moment. Surely the committee could study these designs, select half a dozen and then unanimously decide on one design out of the half dozen they have chosen from the 3,500. If it is insisted that a time limit should be imposed on the committee, then I say that to my mind this is not workable and will not work. I think the committee should be instructed to sit for a given number of days, and it might be a year or two years before a final report is received by the house. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) laughs. I think this is a very reasonable alternative to what the Prime Minister has proposed. Hon. members know what his proposal is. He proposes to shove it down people's throats.

Mr. Godin: Why not ten years?

Mr. Skoreyko: I did not hear the comment.

Mr. Godin: Why not ten years?

Mr. Skoreyko: I see nothing wrong with ten years if that is how long it takes the committee to decide. At least there would be one consolation. The people of Canada would be united when a final decision was made. You will not unite this country by forcing a flag down the throats of the Canadian people.

Let us talk about the resolution. I have more regard for relevancy than the Minister of Trade and Commerce had when he spoke on this subject, and it is my hope that when the Minister of Agriculture rises to participate in the debate he will also be relevant. Since the introduction of the resolution letters have been written to members of parliament including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and all the cabinet ministers. Polls have been conducted by various groups, organizations and newspapers. Petitions have been signed with thousands of signatures on them. Some have been sent to the Prime Minister and some to the respective members of parliament. On many occasions inside and outside the House of Commons speeches have been made on the merits, pros and cons of a flag.

I want to deal with some of the polls that have been conducted throughout the country since the resolution was introduced. I might point out, Mr. Speaker, and you will probably find it as interesting as I do, that in one recent survey conducted by a well known international magazine the city of Edmonton had the greatest percentage per 1,000 telephone calls in support of the red ensign of any city in Canada. Edmonton is a cosmopolitan city like Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, and the suggestion that certain ethnic groups, people of certain racial backgrounds, support or do not support either of the flag proposals before the house is wrong. People generally in the city of Edmonton, and I know this applies to Calgary also, are predominantly red ensign supporters.

I refer now to a survey that was conducted by the Edmonton Journal early in May of this year. The Journal polled residents of the city of Edmonton and district on whether or not they were in favour of the red ensign and after about a week these were the results. A total of 1,636 ballots were cast in favour of the red ensign compared with 862 in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag, and a large number of people simply said it did not matter to them at all.

Mr. Godin: Would the hon. member give us the question that was asked?

Mr. Skoreyko: I will be very glad to deal with that.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Skoreyko: I am still on my feet, Mr. Speaker. For the benefit of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) I am trying to find the question that was asked in the poll but I do not seem to have it in front of me at the moment.

Mr. Godin: I asked that question because from the remarks of the hon. member I understood that the question was, "Are you in favour of the red ensign". In my opinion that question alone would not elicit the type of answer that would give a proper indication of the opinion of the people.

Mr. Skoreyko: I have just arranged to have my office called—

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, it is not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Edmonton East has the floor.

Mr. Skoreyko: I know that the hon. member for Nickel Belt is jealous. He wants to support the Prime Minister whether he is right or wrong, and I do not blame him for inquiring—

Mr. Godin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member should refer to another member of the house as doing something, right or wrong, on the basis of partiality. I have had occasion to make a speech in the house on this matter—

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt is rising on a question of privilege and perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton East will give him an opportunity to state his point.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I was drawing the attention of the house to the fact that no member of parliament should indicate that another member is doing something on the basis of partiality, which was the intent of the remarks of the hon. member. I had occasion to make a speech in the house on the matter of the flag and it is unfortunate that the hon. member was not present to hear it.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has muddied up his question of privilege so that now no one understands it. I did not accuse the hon. and learned gentleman of being right or wrong with respect to the resolution. I said he was supporting the Prime Minister and he did not care whether the Prime Minister was right or wrong. I did not accuse the hon. member of doing anything—

Mr. Godin: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I insist that the remarks of the hon. member indicate that some members of this house—it happens to be me on this occasion—are doing something on the basis of partiality. The hon. member says that no matter if the Prime Minister is right or wrong I will support him. I support the Prime Minister because what he has done is good for Canada.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, this is precisely—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can understand the feelings of the hon. member for Nickel Belt but I really do not think it is unparliamentary to suggest that an hon. member is either voting or speaking because of partiality. I would suspect that many speeches made in the house are inspired by that feeling. I do not really think the hon. member has said anything up to now that is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Skoreyko: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I feel very badly that the hon. member should consider my remarks offensive. I understand his blind desire to defend the Prime Minister's actions, whether he is right or wrong. I say that he is wrong and I intend to prove that before I conclude my remarks, if the hon. member will permit me to continue.

As I pointed out, the Edmonton Journal conducted a survey by ballot, and the ballots will be delivered to my desk in a few minutes, I hope. The readers were asked to sign their ballots as evidence of their good faith, but the names would not be recorded on the ballots themselves, which would go forward to a distant point for tabulating. The results would be published as the reports were compiled. I have already put some of the reports on the record, Mr. Speaker. I was more than amazed that the city of Edmonton would respond so overwhelmingly in support of the ensign.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Skoreyko: I would grant the hon. member that courtesy if he would promise me he would get up and make a speech on the flag issue after I have listened to his question.

Mr. Godin: It seems to me it is the privilege of this house, if an hon. member purports to give evidence which will convince any hon. member of this house of one thing or another, to ask the hon. member to inform the house properly of the facts behind the evidence he is producing. This is what hon. members are now asking. We should have the privilege of knowing the facts behind the evidence which he is producing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not believe the point of order or question of privilege is well taken. It seems to me this is a question of debate. If the hon. member feels the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Edmonton East cannot be substantiated, he can say so in reply to the speech made by the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege. I would call Your Honour's attention to the wording of the statement on the prior question of privilege. The hon. member used the words, "if the member has any evidence to convince any member in this chamber". The hon. member has evidence that will convince me and many members on this side, therefore his statement in reference to any member does not hold water and there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We cannot permit a debate on the point.

Mr. Skoreyko: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the results of the survey taken by the Edmonton Journal were indeed impressive. A month or two after the original survey in May, another survey was taken. By this time the article to which I am referring, dated June 26, had been written. It is entitled "Two out of three favour red ensign" and deals with the question on a national basis, with the exception of the province of Quebec. I should like to read one paragraph from this news article because I think hon. members from the city of Toronto would find it very interesting indeed. Before I do, I may say that the city of Edmonton survey shows that two of three Journal readers favour the red ensign as Canada's national flag. Toronto has plumped most heavily for the ensign, with Telegram readers casting 7,865 ballots for it and 1,839 for the Pearson flag. I am just wondering how the members from the city of Toronto, 18 of them in all, feel when they sit on their hands in the House of Commons without expressing a point of view.

An hon. Member: One did.

Mr. Skoreyko: Yes, and I dare say hon. members across the house wish he had never opened his mouth.

There is another comment in an Ottawa report by Patrick Nicholson dated August 21, a few days ago. I am still dealing with the poll that was started originally in the city of Edmonton by the Edmonton Journal. This article says:

> It quickly became obvious that "Mike's maple" had attracted overwhelming support among French Canadians, while the lukewarm enthusiasm for it elsewhere was gravely tempered by the resentment, as some M.P.'s expressed it, that this was "yet another concession to French Canada".

I want to deal with the aspect of this remark because, as a political party, we have been accused of using the words "massive concessions". I want to assure you that of all the speeches I have read, one man used those words and used them deliberately, and that was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp).

I continue to quote from the article:

> The lopsidedness of cross-Canada sentiment on the flag issue has just been revealed by a nation-wide poll, whose sensational results were given front page prominence in Ottawa's thoughtful French language newspaper, Le Droit.
> This poll discovered that a majority of Canadians, in every province except Quebec, prefer the Canadian ensign to the maple leaf design. It also ascertained that about one third of all Canadians would prefer some other flag, such as the union jack or another design, or were ignorant or indifferent about the whole issue.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) looks at me as though he were familiar with the article and wished me to quote another paragraph. If he asks me to do so, I will.

Mr. Godin: I would prefer to hear your views.

Mr. Skoreyko: Why will the Prime Minister not consider the modification of the red ensign? Why will he not consider an alternative? I suppose, to be fair, one ought to give him the benefit of the doubt. However, I must ask this pertinent question—

Mr. Moreau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been listening with a great deal of attention to the hon. member's remarks and I have not raised a point of order dealing with the relevance of his remarks to the subamendment. However, in view of the fact the hon. member has spoken on the resolution, I feel his remarks referring to some loaded newspaper poll are not relevant to the subamendment and I would ask Your Honour to bring him to the point now before the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East indicated at the start of his speech he intended to be relevant to the subamendment. He did say that his remarks were to be relevant to the plebiscite question. I assume that the quotation he just read a moment ago will make some reference to the question of the plebiscite and the subamendment.

Mr. Skoreyko: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We seem to be having a number of interruptions in the house this afternoon, with foghorns, and the hon. member down in the corner who is determined I am not going to be able to send this speech out to my constituents for their benefit.

I said earlier that I wanted to know why the Prime Minister would not consider a modification of the red ensign, or an alternative design? I want to ask a number of questions in this regard. He has refused to consider a plebiscite. He has given what amounts to a refusal to consider the feasibility of a committee to study the flag question, and by refusal I mean he has insisted that a time limit must be imposed on hon. members if and when the committee reports to the house.

I need not remind you, Mr. Speaker, that over the years the changes in the rules of the house have been of a nature such as to tend to curtail the amount of time a private member has to express his opinion, and I find most objectionable any suggestion that there should be further curtailment of the time of a private member. I can understand the hon. member sitting in the back row who has contributed very little, if anything, to this debate, and he has not suggested that he will. I am looking forward to reading his remarks when he makes them.

Mr. Moreau: On a point of privilege, I would like to inform the house that I intend to speak on the main resolution, if we ever get back to it.

Mr. Skoreyko: That is not a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, but it is a neat trick if he can get away with it—get back to the resolution so that the government has a free hand.

Mr. Godin: Let us vote on the amendment if you want to hear him.

Mr. Skoreyko: The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) was complaining about this being my second contribution to the debate, but I have not yet heard his contribution.

Mr. Godin: On a point of privilege, I made no reference, but the unfortunate position is that his second contribution is no better than his first.

Mr. Skoreyko: Neither are his interruptions. These are the four questions I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is he not proud of the union jack? Is this why he wants to get rid of the red ensign, because it has a small union jack in the corner? Is he not proud of it? If he is not, why is he not? The state of Hawaii has the union jack on its flag. The people there are very proud of it and they refuse to accept any other design, despite the fact that there is not any country in the world more proud of its flag than the United States, or any part of the United States.

How can the Prime Minister justify shoving down the throats of Canadians a flag that does not have a cross on it? These are the three questions I would like to ask the Prime Minister. I talked a moment ago about the pride which Hawaii has in its flag, and in that connection here is an interesting clipping from the Edmonton Journal:

> Thousands of Albertans who have visited Hawaii must have seen widely displayed there a flag incorporating the union jack.
> It is, of course, the state flag of Hawaii: a union jack in the upper corner next to the staff and eight vertical stripes, three white, three red and two blue.

Mr. Moreau: What about the subamendment?

An hon. Member: Why the hell don't you get up and speak?

Mr. Skoreyko: I hear a chirp from the backwoods. I cannot identify the member because he will not stand. He has no guts. The article goes on to say:

> No nation treats its flag with more reverence than does the United States, and no state is prouder to be part of the U.S. than is Hawaii. Nevertheless, the incorpration of the union jack in the state flag of this "melting pot" of nationalities suggests that Hawaii does not wish to forget the British role in its history.

What was that British role in Hawaii's history? Captain James Cook, the English navigator, discovered the islands in 1778, and if it had not been for the attitude of the British parliament Hawaii would still be a colony or a holding of the British empire. The article goes on to say:

> It would be preposterous to charge that Prime Minister Pearson is not proud of the union jack.

I posed that question a moment ago, but I had very little or no response.

> But has he been unduly influenced by men who irrationally and perversely oppose the incorporation of the union jack in Canada's national flag? Certainly there is no national symbol anywhere that can rightfully evoke greater pride and reverence.
> Will the day come when the shortest trip Albertans can take to see the union jack proudly waving in the breeze will be Hawaii?

I ask the Prime Minister, what are his reasons? Is it that as a Britisher himself he dislikes the union jack? Why doesn't the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) get up and answer?

Mr. Godin: On a point of order, so that the house may understand the meaning of the remarks of the hon. member would he indicate is he suggesting—

Mr. Skoreyko: I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. Godin: —that this parliament should adopt the flag of Hawaii?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Is the hon. gentleman rising to ask a question or on a point of order?

Mr. Godin: On a point of order. So that the house be properly informed I would like the hon. member to indicate if he wishes this parliament to adopt the flag of Hawaii?

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, the hon. member rose and interrupted the speaker on what he said was a question, and the Chair sat and allowed him to proceed with his remarks, and then suggested the hon. member was rising on a point of order and gave him recognition. It is time he was put in order when he gets up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I did not at first hear the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. If he rose and posed his question to the hon. member who was speaking, without the consent of that member, then he was out of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Then why wasn't he ruled out?

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, you have been more than generous in the half hour I have been on my feet. I have been trying to explain to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin), and in very plain common language, what it is I am talking about, and he does not understand. I said I was posing four questions to the Prime Minister. Is he not proud of the union jack? Why should he be ashamed of it? Can he justify stuffing down the throats of Canadians a flag that does not have a cross on it?

In talking about the true meaning of the union jack to people of British ancestry, who have been connected with it for generations, I want to make brief reference to a newspaper article which is headed, "That Leafy Flag Repudiates the Cross," and I shall quote a few short paragraphs from it.

The article is by Frank Chubb, minister of St. Stephen's United church, Edmonton, and I think the quotation will be very relevant indeed. I am quoting it for the benefit of the hon. member who spent the last half hour interrupting me and who has finally left the chamber.

> It would be hard to conceive of a greater affront to us as a Christian nation than that of being informed arbitrarily that the cross must be removed from our flag.

I suggest this is precisely what is happening now as a result of an action taken arbitrarily without consultation either in caucus or in cabinet. As I pointed out in the course of my last speech, the article by Val Sears obviously had some significance because of the objections which were raised. This flag design was born over a bottle of scotch and soda. Now I can understand why they want to leave the cross out of it. The article goes on to say:

> If it symbolizes anything, the flag represents what the nation stands for. Has the idea of sacrificing for the good of others now become so unpalatable to us as a people that the cross must come out of our flag?
> If so, the prospects for our future as a nation have reached an all time low.

These are the views of a minister of an influential religious body in Canada. May I say, for the benefit of hon. members opposite, that I do not intend to quote at length. I just want to put on record one other passage from this article. This is what the writer says about the significance of the cross:

> We Canadians had preserved this rich heritage in the corner of the red ensign, the flag adopted by the Canadian government and people in 1945.
> Now Mr. Pearson says it must go.
> He seems to believe that three leaves off an eastern Canadian tree are more than adequate as a substitute for the three great crosses on our flag.
> Along with the crosses must go the coat of arms we requested from His Majesty King George V a scant 43 years ago.
> What a tribute to infidelity and fickleness.
> Certainly it is time for Canada to take on individuality and responsibility as a nation, but must a child disown its parents in order to achieve healthy maturity?
> I should think that the opposite is the case!
> The Canadian coat of arms on the red ensign traces our heritage back to 1,100 years before the birth of Christ. A Canadian worth his salt should be able to feel a bit of a thrill as he sees outlined against the sky these symbols of the glory from which he has sprung.

When someone pretending to "lead" the people of Canada suggests that we repudiate the cross and reject our heritage, when all he can offer in return is a handful of leaves, the time is ripe not merely for dissent, but for revolution.

These are strong words. These are strong feelings expressed by a man of the faith.

I now wish to deal for a few moments with a speech which was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). I do not want you to remind me about relevancy, Mr. Speaker, because I intend to be as relevant as the man to whom I am making reference at the moment, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not as politically blind and partisan, with the attitude of a bureaucrat—

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Skoreyko: He did, you must agree, refuse to fulfil his responsibilities as a deputy minister because of political partisanship. He resigned not only because he could not get along with his staff but because his staff did not particularly care for him. The only way in which he could vindicate his honour was to get elected to this parliament where he could again display his bureaucratic arrogance. But he is not going to get away with it.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a speech to this house on the sub-amendment and his total disregard for relevancy only indicated to me that he is completely ignorant of the moral, political, cultural and historic aspects of the question involved. He showed no concern about any of these aspects. His concern was merely: How best do I advance the Liberal party?

Mr. Dupuis: Out of order completely.

An hon. Member: What, the Liberal party?

Mr. Skoreyko: The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that while Quebec Conservatives sat on their hands—or, rather, I will quote from the article before me. It says:

While Quebec Conservatives sat on their hands, Mr. Sharp asked the opposition for the source of Mr. Diefenbaker's idea to modify the red ensign by the inclusion of a fleur-de-lis. He called it "a clumsy and gratuitous piece of appeasement—a bone thrown out to a troublesome minority."

These are his own words. Neither the Conservative party in this house nor any member of that party has ever used in reference to the French speaking Canadians of this country, the words "troublesome minority". The words were uttered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and they are disgusting for a minister of the crown to use with that bureaucratic attitude of his.

As I was going through some of the interesting clippings I have in my possession I noticed another article bringing to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the fact that he would not be able to get away with this partisan political attitude of his. This newspaper article reminds him that the arrogance of the Liberals helped to defeat them in 1957. Mr. Sharp, it says, revealed that it is one of the best Conservative assets today. How right he is.

In conclusion, I want to deal with one or two other aspects of this subject. I want to deal with the question of copyright as it affects the new flag. If the Prime Minister were to agree to a referendum, would parliament have the right to turn this matter over to the returning officers and ask them to include this design on the ballot during an election before the copyright has been cleared? I ask this because there was an article which appeared in the press very recently which I found most interesting, although I do not agree with some of the views which were expressed. The writer, Mr. Charles Lynch, said:

One of the unresolved problems confronting the government over the maple leaf flag is getting the design copyrighted.

When Prime Minister Pearson sent to the patent and copyright division here last week to find how many maple leaf copyrights there were he was told that 327 commercial firms hold a copyright on the maple leaf and 24 others have a copyright on three leaves.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that the course of action that would have to be taken by the federal government would be tantamount to the expropriation of a copyright. If this were the course of action taken in fact, I suppose that attitude on the part of the government would be no different from the attitude of the government in any "red" country, if you like.

It is not too many months ago, sir, that I read an article dealing with brand names and copyrights and how the cancellation of these copyrights affects business. My wife probably buys the majority of her meats and meat products from Canada Packers under the "Maple Leaf" label, but I am wondering if she could tell me who manufactures that particular brand. This was the concern of the advertising people, that literally thousands of women buy, not only food, not only clothing but all sorts of household commodities daily and identify the product by the copyrighted name. The minister is looking at me; I see that he agrees with me wholeheartedly. What, then, happens to Canada Packers copyright; a name they have maintained with a degree of dignity for years and years—"Canada Packers Maple Leaf" products?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman to tell him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: That's enough.

Mr. Skoreyko: If I may rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure there would be no objection to allowing me to continue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes there is.

Mr. Skoreyko: I had prepared notes sufficient for the alloted time. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, with due deference, that had it not been for the interjections of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) and a number of others, I would have had adequate time to complete my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I recognize the objection which the hon. member raises, but I am sure he will recognize that if he accepts a question, he accepts the question on his own time. On the other hand, if he is interrupted a number of times during his remarks, some allowance should be made for that time. The hon. gentleman's time was up eight minutes ago and I have given him that extra time because I was advised by the Deputy Speaker when I came to the chair that a number of interruptions had been made. I believe I have made a fair allowance for the interruptions which were made during the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Churchill: I am raising a point of order with regard to your statement, Mr. Speaker, that a member accepting a question accepts it on his own time. We will have to be protected by Mr. Speaker in this regard, because yesterday I did not accept questions from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), but he persisted in making a statement and was permitted to do so. So if we are to have questions accepted and taken out of our time for speaking, we will require the protection of the Chair with regard to interruptions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), who is as well or better acquainted with the rules than I am, will agree that if a question is asked of an hon. member who is making a speech, he has the right to accept or reject the question. I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that my own opinion in this regard is that if any hon. member wishes to ask a question of a member who is speaking, the member who is speaking has the right to accept or reject that question. I feel that no question should be asked until the member speaking has given his consent or otherwise. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret).

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Rinfret (St. James): Mr. Speaker, since mid—

[Text]

Mr. Nasserden: On the point of order that was raised, Mr. Speaker, I think it is also the accepted practice that a member should ask his question after the member who has the floor has completed his remarks; and this practice has not been observed by members on the other side of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, as regards the point of order, I should like to remind the hon. member who has just spoken that should his suggestion not to allow any member to direct questions to the member who is speaking be applied, his own leader would never be able to speak in this house, as he is always asking questions of other members right in the middle of a debate.

[Text]

Mr. Simpson: Whom did you get that from—Pick?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think it is the general practice of the house when a member is speaking for another member to ask a question; but it is still up to the member who is speaking to decide whether he will or will not accept the question. If the member who is speaking decides he is not going to accept the question, the member seeking to ask the question has no right to persist. The hon. member for St. James.

[Translation]

Mr. Rinfret: This house has been discussing since the middle of June the resolution introduced by the government, for the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag.

As early as January 27, 1960, when he was leader of the opposition, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson) stated clearly the position of the Liberal party on this flag question. At that time, he proposed to the then Conservative government to put before parliament legislation which, and I quote:

—if it were adopted by the representatives of the people, would settle the issue of our national flag; parliament would then agree to adopt a distinctive flag which, unlike the red ensign to which parliament has never given official recognition, could not be mistaken for the flag of the United Kingdom or some colonies and could be easily identified as the Canadian flag.

Is it not consistent that now that he has become the leader of the Canadian government, the right hon. Prime Minister should propose a resolution in order to give Canada a distinctive national flag?

Like many other members, the right hon. Prime Minister received a number of letters from people complaining about measures that might be taken to replace the red ensign. The Prime Minister answered to those bona fide correspondents that he wanted to assure them of his unqualified respect for the union jack and the red ensign and for all they represent of our history and traditions as symbols of freedom and democracy. Nevertheless, it is time that Canada should be given a distinctive flag which would have the top position on the mast.

Canada has been waiting for a flag long enough. I am both happy and proud to see that the government has now seen fit to take steps in that direction. Our confederation will soon be a hundred years old. Discussions on the flag have been going on for years, right from the very beginning of our confederation, and until now it has always seemed that no agreement was possible. Will any further delay in finally adopting a national flag make for better understanding?

With the coming of the centennial and the world fair, there are other reasons besides the basic ones for adopting a distinctive flag now. There is the matter of convenience which should not be minimized.

Indeed, it is inconceivable that this country could welcome millions of visitors to those great events without being able to fly a flag unmistakably its own.

Since every country has its flag, why should Canada be an exception? The flag is actually a factor of national unity, in peacetime as well as in wartime. If other proposed flags are controversial, it is all the more necessary to cast them aside and start anew with a new emblem.

Now, the other flags mentioned, which were not approved officially but only tolerated, give rise to controversy. Therefore, they should be discarded as distinctive flags. As a country,

Canada takes part in all important international conferences. It is a middle power, but with bright prospects for future development in every respect. And such a country would be without a distinctive flag? You will admit that this is paradoxical.

Former generations were cautious on this subject. They did not jeopardize the future. The government is now convinced that Canada should have its own flag and it gives praise to the previous leaders who, in their wisdom, refrained from tying its hands in this connection.

The time has come for Canada to choose a permanent distinctive flag that will be kept by future generations since it will have been given a "clear" and official status.

All the present differences will be forgotten if this house puts aside narrow considerations and sectional interests to take the proper decision which is quite simple, that of giving the country an emblem which will be respected both at home and abroad, an emblem that will confirm the good reputation our country enjoys throughout the world, as travellers back from Europe, Asia and Africa can testify.

It has been said that the flag issue was liable to create emotional rather than rational reactions. Mr. Speaker, if the flag issue can give rise to purely emotional reactions, it can also be objectively dealt with as any other problem. It is up to us, as members of parliament, to be rational. Now, to give the country a distinctive flag for reasons of convenience, especially to consolidate unity among Canadians, is not an emotional but a rational issue.

Regardless of the emblem selected, there will undoubtedly be few but vocal reactionaries and disgruntled people. It is not possible to satisfy everybody. Considering the information gathered by the members of the house as a whole and after thinking the matter over and listening to a debate which has been going on for several weeks, I am firmly convinced that the people of the ten provinces want a distinctive flag.

I think that an autonomous country such as Canada has been since the Statute of Westminster has to adopt a flag whose design will not be reminiscent of any other country. Why should the country's emblem include reminders of Canada's ties with England and not with France? On the other hand, if we were to adopt a flag representing the two former hegemonies, it would be necessary to load the flag with complicated symbols and it would still not satisfy anyone. It is better to eliminate the symbols recalling France or

England and thus not only prevent differences of opinion from continuing unabated but also prevent the new flag from becoming unacceptable to new Canadians who make up a large percentage of our population.

Thus we would have a common flag for the whole population, a flag which would not perpetuate the old quarrels we want to forget, which is a great advantage. The inclusion of symbols representing the motherlands would only feed old grudges. The adoption of a distinctive flag seems to be the only sound way to put an end to useless discussions on that issue.

The three maple leaves, the central element of the proposed flag, seem a logical choice since they represent Canada. Many pages of our literature, in both French and English, are devoted to the maple leaf. They contain many references to the maple tree which is quite representative of our country not because it is exclusive to Canada but because, due to its profusion and beauty, its praises have been sung by Canadian poets and lyrics writers.

Hon. members should not prolong this debate unnecessarily by lengthy discussions of details. That is why I prefer to stick with a distinctive flag containing three maple leaves rather than risk embroiling matters and putting off the selection of a distinctive flag indefinitely.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said in the house, on June 30 last:

> I believe Canada needs not only a distinctive flag but a distinctive Canadian spirit.

That distinctive spirit should be embodied in a flag whose judicial status is well established. It should represent all Canadians and, in my opinion, the three maple leaves flag should be the national flag of Canada and should prevail over all those which we had in the past.

The point here is not to please French Canadians any more than others, as suggested in certain narrow-minded political quarters. But if we take a look at history, we must admit that French Canadians have special reasons to favour the maple leaf flag, having been pioneers in the development of the west as well as the east, through their daring explorers and missionaries, laymen and clerics as well.

English speaking people of good will could not, any more than French Canadians, repudiate the distinctive flag proposed. Canada is the common country of the descendants of French and English pioneers. It has become gradually the country of immigrants of all nationalities who chose to come here to start a new life that had become impossible for them in their country of origin and gave Canada the best of their talents and industry. No one among those three groups should stand against the adoption of a flag which is long overdue. On the contrary, everyone should look forward with enthusiasm to the day when it will fly on high in the Canadian sky.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, this is my first intervention in the debate. I have had my name on the list of speakers for some time, but the list is long and it takes quite a while before one's name is reached. It is a pleasure to follow my hon. friend, the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), and I hope that the remarks I have to make although somewhat different, will be along the same lines of Canadianism that he has envisaged.

I have noticed that many members who have spoken in beginning their remarks have made personal references to their own backgrounds and the backgrounds of their constituencies, and I want to do the same. Many hon. members have referred to service in the first and second world wars and their association with the red ensign. I think I am one of the few, if not the only one in the house, who can say that my entire career at sea during the second world war, a very inauspicious career I might add, was spent serving under the red ensign. Those of us in the merchant navy, however, grew to honour and appreciate the old red duster.

For the record, I think hon. members will find that the red ensign was first officially used on British mercantile ships in 1707 and has been used ever since. The first instance in Canada of the use of the red ensign with the dominion badge or seal added was in 1892.

May I also refer to Saint John and make some brief remarks about this historic city. Many hon. members will, of course, associate Saint John with the Loyalists. We are very proud of our Loyalist tradition and it is becoming a greater source of pride every day. I think I should point out that for a considerable period of its history Saint John was under the French flag, a similar period to that when Annapolis Royal was under French rule, as referred to by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) the other day. Many people do not know this.

I recall that when a measure was introduced in the house in 1954 concerning historic sites the then minister of northern affairs, now premier of Quebec, did not realize this fact and promised consideration when I mentioned that here was a very good example of two eras of colonial control in a city. The Fort LaTour period to which I am referring extended from 1631 to 1645 and it was the first major French outpost in New Brunswick. Prior to that time there were two earlier phases of Indian life. The story of the first English settlement on the Saint John river more than a century after the LaTour-D'Aulnay struggle between two rival French traders is recalled by the well known trading posts associated with the Simonds, Hazen and White period. Thus, at Portland point in Saint John are significant historical phases in the lives of three racial strains, Indians, French and English. Each has played an important role in the history of our province. When to these are added the famous Loyalist settlement one has a good idea of the different strains in our city and province.

I think it is important to understand why the Loyalists came to New Brunswick. They were a unique group comprising many well educated men and certainly men of great principle. Not nearly enough credit has been given in our history books to these gallant exiles. Some have suggested that had they found in their midst in the United States a true leader such as George Washington they might have remained there and brought about a different course of history. But they did not hesitate. They brought with them their valuable possessions, their education and culture, but above all else their love of a monarchical form of government. They were not interested in republicanism in any form. That is why in New Brunswick and Saint John we have such a pleasant mixture of culture from which many can take a lesson. We have a pleasant blend of American heritage with a true love for the crown, not a blind obedience but an appreciation of the monarchy as a better form of government than a republic.

It is important to define what one means by "imperialism" and I go to the work, "Canadians In The Making", by Professor A. R. M. Lower. On page 349 he states:

> Canadian imperialism has never been simple; it can at one and the same time be bitterly contemptuous of Englishmen and warmly welcome the British connection. A newspaper in that most loyal of all Canadian cities, Saint John, could write, apropos of a book by an English traveller: "Canadians might never suspect how coarse, ignorant, conceited and, withal, amusing they are if talented Englishmen did not come out occasionally and write books about them." Imperialism was in its own way a kind of Canadian nationalism.

In supporting the subamendment put forward by the hon. member for Regina City [Mr. Bell.] (Mr. More) I want to say at the beginning that I feel a subject such as the flag should not have been brought up for debate in the house. I liken it to capital punishment. It is a very emotional subject. People take positions for different reasons and it is extremely difficult to get a truly free vote on such a subject. In addition, of course, bitter controversy enters the picture.

However, we are involved in a historic debate to which many good contributions have been made. I do not wish to single out any but I think that speeches both inside and outside the house have been worthy of commendation on all sides. I noticed that last night the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. McLean), a good friend of mine, made a contribution to the debate, and I give him credit for doing so. I do not agree with his thoughts. I think it must have been extremely difficult for him to make that speech. He is a member of the Royal Canadian Legion, active in the boy scouts, a veteran of the first world war and is of Scottish ancestry. His riding is almost completely associated with the British tradition. Yet he came out in favour of the new flag which, of course, means scrapping the red ensign.

I have always been interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) about a republic. I find it difficult to believe there is support for a republic in his riding and I can only say he is either foolhardy or he knows what his people are thinking. It strikes me that in a historic place like Lotbinière the people would certainly have great respect for the monarchical form of government.

I was also interested in the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) the other day. Everybody in the house knows he is a very active Anglican layman, and I say more power to him. But in his speech he disowned completely the red ensign and its historic traditions and connections with the Anglican church. He made absolutely no reference to it. I am not criticizing his stand but I think he should have tried to explain this change in his thinking.

We have also had, of course, the famous speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) which has been given so much attention. I can only say that it represented a walking of the plank such as we have not seen since the days of Captain Bligh. Hon. members may ask when I think the flag crisis became serious, and I should like to go back to the 1940's for a moment. I lay the entire blame on the Liberal party and their failure to provide proper, enlightened national leadership, particularly during the so-called Mackenzie King era. I say that they have failed even to grasp the essentials of nationhood and I intend to prove this point.

In his speech the other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed great solicitude for the future and fortunes of the Conservative party. I intend to demonstrate it is his type of membership in the so-called Ottawa establishment of liberal, with a small "l", civil servants, English speaking and British educated in most cases, which is more to blame than anything else for the division that has crept into the country. I intend to show that this group who typify this pseudo-Canadianism, and I include in it the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and any other members of this Ottawa hierarchy, willy-nilly accepted the Mackenzie King philosophy of the day, this misguided Liberalism of the first water that played with the constitution and turned our national life into the volcano of power politics to sustain at all costs the life of the Liberal party. These individuals were the henchmen, knowingly or otherwise who perpetuated the legacy of William Lyon Mackenzie King. The victims, Mr. Speaker, are you and I, the Canadian people, and we are paying for it dearly today in many ways, particularly in the departure of many of our symbols and traditions that go to the very root of our way of life?

Mr. Ryan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bell: Yes.

Mr. Ryan: How do you reconcile your words this afternoon with your party's slogan in the 1957-58 election campaign, "Canada first"? Is there an apple gone bad over there?

Mr. Bell: Well, I intend to demonstrate that the Conservative party has put Canada first, but not at all costs like the Liberals under Mackenzie King.

The flag, while it may give the foundation of our traditions is only an outward symbol. This deliberate policy of tampering with the distinctive emblems of our past history can only result in the weakening of the monarchy and, of course, our nationhood. The creeping republicanism that has been challenged so forcefully by Dr. Eugene Forsey can only result in turning this nation to republicanism. I wish to quote for a moment from Dr. Eugene Forsey's remarks which were made in 1955 in a radio broadcast on January 14. They show his foresightedness and they demonstrate the beginnings of the problems that you and I have to face. I quote his remarks:

> But why do I call all this "creeping republicanism?" Well, "creeping" it most certainly is; sly, slithering, serpentine. And I just wish I had time to recite to you the bad history, bad law, bad logic, the insults, the crass ignorance, the distortions of the dictionary, with which the government and its hangers-on have tried to defend the indefensible. They are almost beyond belief.
> It's creeping and it's "republicanism." It just doesn't make sense on any other basis. If it was all innocent, why the long years of stealth and secrecy? Why the flouting of law and constitution? Somebody has had some serious purpose in all this. It may not have been the government itself. Ministers may have just yielded to pressure. But, inside the government or outside, or both, the pressure has been there, steady, insistent, relentless. The people who applied it knew what they wanted: to root out familiar and distinctive terms which bind us to our institutions, so that they could remould them nearer to their hearts' desire. They would never have got as far as they have if more of us realized what the monarchy meant, and why it was worth preserving. But, that's another story: the melancholy story of how, for nearly 30 years, our people have been steadily and systematically miseducated about our constitution, and particularly about the role of the crown as the guardian of that constitution, the protector of parliament and the people against cabinet dictatorship. Fortunately, however, there have been many thousands who have never bowed the knee unto Baal; and there are signs now that many thousands more are beginning to understand what has been happening, and to resist. That resistance will spell the end of "creeping republicanism."

I mention that to show that the policy of Mackenzie King has been continued by his successors in the Liberal party. The Liberals, at times in our history, played an important part, but not as great a part as the party of which I am a member. They have played their share in our formative years, but someone forgot to tell them to stop.

Having blamed this creeping republicanism on Mackenzie King, it is only fair to ask why these changes were allowed to take place. Why is it that everything connected with our English background has to be removed? I refer not only to the designation of "dominion" which was removed from our telephone books, but even the word "royal" has been removed from the phrase "royal mail" on post office boxes. Even the word "British" itself now brings hatred and anger in some quarters. In my opinion, it is all the fault of incorrect premises, the assumptions centred around Quebec and our French traditions. In order to obtain Canadian unity we must accept French Canada as the basic, positive form of Canadianism, and English speaking Canadians must work to become identified with this type of true Canada. In other words, it seems to have become an established fact that no Canadian virtues are to be found in our Anglo-Saxon traditions.

As a witness, I call a book entitled "Freedom Wears a Crown" by John Farthing. This was an outstanding young Canadian who died at an early age. Like Dr. Forsey, he foresaw what was happening. I predict that as the years go by this will become a very famous book. This is what he said on page 87 of this book:

> It is of the essence of the Kingsian conception of Canadian unity, not only that such unity is to involve an harmonious relationship between the French and the English communities in this country, but that harmony is possible only by destroying all real sense of community among the English speaking people of Canada. They must find themselves as a people by ceasing to mean or to stand for anything in and of themselves, save what is compatible with a unity the terms of which are dictated by others. The English speaking people of Canada are to find unity and hence their soul by standing ready to relinquish every shred of their heritage and tradition, and to abandon everything that has hitherto given them a distinctive character and made them the not wholly contemptible people that they are.

Although I have made a great many references to Quebec, I feel it is English Canada and many of the leaders mentioned who bear a greater responsibility. If there have been meaningful contributions by English Canada, then they have been obscured. The leaders have failed and I charge the Liberal party with this neglect because, after all, they have governed this country certainly for a majority of years in recent times. It is not the fault of Quebec, let there be no mistake about it—it is not the fault of Quebec that no one knows what English Canada is doing. We do not know our own achievements, our goals and our frontiers. While I do not pretend to know what French Canadians want or where they are going, I am certain we English Canadians have lost sight of our objectives, of our culture and nationalism.

It may be also that Anglo-Saxon Canadianism has been too apologetic and too negative. It may be that we have advanced economically, but other movements have been stifled. This is why I am attempting to lay the cards on the table. We may not need a silent revolution, as is the case in Quebec now, but we do need a different type of Canada, one that espouses certain basic terms, not of one Canada or the other but in the traditions of each. I want to say that the leader of my party consistently, throughout the years, has stood for one Canada.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I quote once more from this book "Freedom Wears a Crown". Mr. Farthing has expressed this in a much better way than I could:

> —the people of French Canada are faced with the same basic issue as are their English speaking compatriots. We have to decide whether we are to become again a democracy functioning according to our constitutional idea and ideal of government, or whether we are to become a dependant republic. That is the basic issue of Canadian unity and those are the terms in which the question has valid meaning. It is also the first and all important question facing Canada, since the answer to almost every other question will depend upon the answer we give to it. The question belongs outside partisan power-plays. It is a matter far too serious to be subjected to appeals to popular prejudice on either side. It ought to be treated in a manner befitting an adult people mature in their political thinking.

Having said that about certain matters of French and English Canadian nationalism, I now deal briefly with what has been referred to as republicanism. I do not know what degree of republicanism there is in this country today. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) stood up in this house in answer to a question and said flatly he was a republican. He also said he was not a separatist. I find it very difficult to assess how a person could be a republican and not a separatist, but he has stated, as a member of parliament sitting in this house, that he is in favour of a republic. Evidently there must be some feeling for this in his constituency.

I call as my first witness a very distinguished French Canadian. I refer of course to Premier Jean Lesage of Quebec who, in the triumphant tour which we all recall he made of France in 1963, said in London, according to a dispatch in the Chronicle-Herald by Mr. Eric Dennis:

> Premier Jean Lesage of Quebec said here yesterday that the flames of nationalism in his province, fired by "a feeling of resentment over not getting a square deal" in the Canadian partnership were now on the wane.
> And at the same time he assured the British that "French Canadians as a whole looked to London and the crown as their great protector."
> "The French Canadian would be the last to join the United States if there was any move for Canada to be absorbed by the Americans," he added. "He wants to stay in the commonwealth. The French Canadian is a royalist. Never forget that."

I place this on the record with pleasure. It shows the division between the federal and Quebec Liberals on this matter of a republic, and it is also comforting to know that at least someone in Quebec is in favour of the monarchy.

As my last witness I recall the words of Lord Elgin who, in 1847, referring to the proper respect being shown at that time for French nationalism, asked:

> Who will not venture to say the last hand which waves the British flag on American ground may not be that of a French Canadian?

The main criticism that has been made in this debate has been in reference to the timing, and this is still the unanswered question as the days roll on. Why was the flag issue introduced in the middle of a busy legislative program, a program that was slowly showing some success? Why was it that the Prime Minister all of a sudden interrupted the daily business of the house and introduced the flag debate? Was it that the Queen's visit had something to do with the Prime Minister's decision suddenly to stop the government's business that was, after all, making some progress?

One thing is certain, and I say this to the senior minister presently in the house, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), we cannot be debating a flag in this house when the Queen is inspecting troops outside on the lawn of parliament hill. This is my argument; it is difficult to separate the flag from the crown because exactly the same arguments apply.

We hear a great deal these days about being broadminded. I may be old fashioned but I think there is too much broadmindedness in the modern world. This may be one of the reasons why we parents are failing, as evidenced by the many problems of our juveniles. Perhaps we have failed in our responsibilities to the youth of this nation in not bringing forth a proper nationalism with the necessary symbols that demonstrate the great strength of our system of government which is, as I say, in monarchical form.

While we fear the extremism that is showing itself across the border, and has been particularly in evidence in recent days, it is surely not wrong to stand for something which demonstrates the essential character of this country and protects, constitutionally at least, all that is French Canadian. I refer of course to the main theme in my remarks today, the symbol of the crown.

Let us remember that we chose in Canada as our political system the monarchical form of government. For one, I would like to see the crown on our flag if the red ensign is not to be. I think this would be a protection for our commonwealth link and it would demonstrate to all in this nation, particularly the youth, the system of government under which we live, and it would put the lie to all those who have false ideas of a republic.

We made our decision freely, both elements, the French and the English, that the crown, the cabinet and the Commons would be our constitutional form of government. We cannot abrogate any one of these three elements; and that is why I am extremely worried that any inroads on the crown, be it merely symbols or designations, or some serious change in the constitution itself, will drastically weaken our whole form of government.

To get back to my own position, I have stated at home and I repeat now that I strongly believe in the red ensign, or red ensign with modifications, and have for some time pledged my support to the Canadian Legion, the I.O.D.E. and the many other organizations that have argued for the retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag. I do not know the thoughts of all those in the maritimes but I am certain that the majority favour the retention of the red ensign, but I put this qualification on the record that if in some way it could be proven that the new flag of the Prime Minister is a final act of Canadian unity then we might have different thoughts. But as I have said, to me this suggests other steps and I feel it has caused serious misgivings, and that is the reason why many are digging in.

However, if the majority of the Canadian people indicate by plebiscite or otherwise a preference for the Prime Minister's design, unhandsome as this design may be, or any other design, I would accept it and I am sure this would be the wish of my constituency. I would also support any reasonable compromise that would come forward—and I notice today many of the newspapers, such as the Montreal Gazette, are calling for such a compromise. This could give us an opportunity to return home and obtain a better assessment of the views of our electors.

If a committee of this house were set up, as was suggested by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and later taken up by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) it would of course meet with my approval. We would be certain that by doing this an election would be avoided, and each of us could get down to the serious business of our country and make our long term plans for real unity in 1967 and the great future of Canada. There has been some criticism made of the type of debate. I took part in the pipe line debate a few years ago and at that time we did not apologize for any of the parliamentary tactics which were used. I think the same holds true today, even though the issue has not at this stage reached the same proportions.

I again call as a witness in connection with this matter of parliamentary tactics Dr. Forsey who, in the course of an address to the men's and women's Canadian clubs on June 19, 1956, in Edmonton—the home city of the hon. member who preceded me and who made such an excellent speech in this debate—had this to say:

> Construction is neither new nor vicious. It is, of course, "not by any to be taken in hand unadvisedly, lightly or wantonly, but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly," and from a deep conviction that it is indispensable in the public interest. Obstruction is a legitimate, recognized, time-honoured and essential part of the parliamentary system; in the last resort, with the government's power of dissolution, the only way of keeping parliament responsible to the people.

In closing, I merely wish to say that we in the official opposition are taking our action in this flag matter "reverently, discreetly, advisedly and soberly".

Mrs. Eloise Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, a flag is, and always has been, a symbol raised high, a focal point for those intense feelings of joy and grief, fear and faith, aspiration and courage felt both individually and shared simultaneously in a common and uniting experience.

The flag as a symbol has enfolded in memory for many people all the vivid colour of past deeply rooted experiences of national life. Sometimes it waves proudly on the stage of memory as an emblem of triumph and achievement; again, it may conceal crucial and painful events which some, understandably do not wish to relive. But whatever it means or does not mean to each of us in this place, we must all recognize the fact that for many it is deeply rooted in a sense of identity.

As a student, years ago, I remember a teacher suddenly directing a question to a fellow student: "How do you know who you are?" And the answer came: "Because I am the one who has had a certain set of experiences". We began to consider memory as a key to identity. The chain of experiences that contribute to identity are emotionally coloured and achieve importance in our lives depending on the intensity of their emotional content. The flag is bound by ties of emotion to some very important events in the lives of people.

In the course of our national history, this allegiance to a known and honoured flag has been—and especially has this been true in time of war—strongly encouraged by leaders and those who influence the lives of men.

If such a flag is suddenly lowered, emotions may flood forth whose intensity may well surprise both the individual and the nation. This is what we have seen happening before our very eyes during the past few weeks. More and more people have been realizing their close identification with a flag that is being torn aside, and feeling a sense of shock and loss of identity in the process. We must speak for these people. And the government must offer them something more than the assurance of its respect for their flag as a memory.

Some have said: "What is a flag? A flag is only what we make of it". This is true. This is what has happened down through the years with the red ensign. People have attached to it very deep emotional significance, the intensity of which was not always consciously realized. But when that symbol is threatened, the area of threat widens and deepens to arouse emotions that might well have slumbered, and we discover that it is no light thing to tamper with what lies deep within the hearts and minds of people.

One cannot sit in judgment, for who of us can judge? There is not one who does not have deep emotional and idealistic ties which involve objects and associated beliefs and circumstances; the flag is a prime example of this kind of attachment.

I am going to read some extensive comments from one letter I received from a constituent on this subject—a veteran of world war two. These are very interesting and thoughtful comments from an individual who plays a responsible role in the community, and who says:

> I am against the new flag. I am not violently against it at the moment, and yet my feelings are strange—it does not necessarily mean I am easy about it, nor that anybody can do anything they want. It is unsettling to feel that somebody can come along and interfere with it, pass a resolution and give us a new one. I wouldn't want to fight over it. And yet I don't want anybody else doing anything to change it. I think many people out here feel the same way.

Then the writer goes on:

> I feel they weighed this flag business on votes, not on the roots of the country or the sensibilities and deep loyalties of the people. When I see the red ensign, I don't think of Britain, I think of Canada. When somebody suggests getting rid of it I also see St. Andrew's cross in that flag, and I'm sure others see St. Patrick's cross and the cross of St. George. People say "Of course, your support of the red ensign is an emotional thing". If support for the flag we have is an emotional argument, then is it not also an emotional argument to attack it or suggest removal of it? If emotion is to be ruled out, then the emotions of the other side must be ruled out also.

Certainly it is an emotional thing. Canadians are not too demonstrative. We make use of our flag as much as we do, I think, because Americans are such flag wavers they forced us into it.

We are embarrassed when we sing O Canada or The Queen, but let nobody for a moment think we do not feel emotions about such things.

The flag does not determine the nation; the nation determines the flag. If Canada had used another symbol at Vimy Ridge, if another symbol had flown from her ships, airports and army depots during the second world war; if it had fluttered over our men in Hong Kong, Dieppe, Sicily, Ortona, on D-day; if our soldiers, sailors and airmen had been buried under it during the second world war, then we could all be proud of that flag.

No. Canada made the red ensign what it is today. Must we pitch over many years of work and sacrifice now?

He goes on:

Is a flag something that from time to time we invite an interior decorator in to have changed, to be brought up to date? No, it's not. Canada has many years of tradition invested in the red ensign and this must not be lightly discarded as we would an old sofa.

Is a commercial artist to choose our flag? Or is it not proper to let those who have sacrificed most keep the one they served under and would serve again?

He goes on:

Parliament must tread with care. There is still ample reason for feeling that men are moved today by certain honoured symbols just as they were moved in the days of the pipes and the claymore and the battle cry.

The idea boys would have nothing to do with this sort of factor; it's not scientific; it's not logical. But they are not dealing with chemicals, computers or statistics; they are dealing with human beings.

That is why our flag should not be controversial. It is above that; just as it is above our heads as it flies from thousands of slender poles throughout the country today.

Mr. Speaker, many members have very seriously and ably presented arguments to justify retention of the red ensign either as it is or in modified form. May I say, with all respect, I believe these arguments are not essential to the present situation, because the central fact remains that millions of Canadian people are not yet ready to give it up. That fact in itself, in a democratic country, should be sufficient reason to give the government pause and inspire it to pursue a different course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Jones: We are not really concerned with justification for allegiance so much as we are concerned with our clear duty to recognize and respect the reality of a continuing loyalty to a flag that signifies so much to so many.

Surely this capacity to accept and deal with a situation as it develops is one that is not foreign to politicians and governments. It is an important aspect of political life. One cannot say, "This should not be". The fact is, it is; this is the situation—and from the point of view of democracy it has to be dealt with in the light of what course is best for the Canadian people. And the voice of the people must be heard. I hope that even before consideration is given, for example, in the form of a plebiscite as outlined by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) there would be a decision made by the Prime Minister to refer this far reaching and troublesome question to a committee not subject to a time limit; for to invite speed here is to summon discord.

This place is not a show, and those who impatiently watch the deliberations in this chamber must not expect a glib and arbitrary disposal of problems which would slur over the rights and expressed desires of millions of Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Jones: On this important question of a flag for Canada, the onus is on the government to adopt a different course, a course in the direction of mutual respect and harmony; and on this path may discretion be the better part of valour.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in rising, as the spokesman of the people in my riding of Nicolet-Yamaska on the matter of a distinctive national flag.

As far as I am concerned, I am exerting the privilege loaned by the people of Nicolet-Yamaska—and I say loaned because the people of my constituency can at any time take away this privilege I have the right of exerting today—that is to be able to rise in the house as often as I want to express my views in all due freedom of speech and action.

At this time, the opposition is blamed without rhyme or reason for staging a filibuster on the question of a distinctive national flag. For the time being, the people, more particularly in the province of Quebec, believe that this discussion has already lasted four months. No, Mr. Speaker, this debate has not lasted so long as that, for we have hardly had 15 days of discussion.

I believe that I expressed my views on various occasions on the flag, and I have still not changed my mind, when I state that I am in favour of a distinctive national flag for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Vincent: On November 21, 1962, I mentioned in the house what I believed to be the five points we should consider before choosing a distinctive design which could be flown throughout Canada, in every province, and would also represent Canada in every country in the world.

The policy of the Conservative party is well known in this respect, and last Thursday, I was proud to hear the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), whom I have always admired—perhaps because I am particularly devoted to the cause of our farmers —tell the house which principles the Conservative party wants to see preserved when a distinctive national flag is chosen. First of all, he said that the flag should be acceptable to the majority of Canadians. Second, it should recognize our dual culture and be a symbol of our history. Third, the flag should have a religious significance. Fourth, Canada's political evolution should be accepted without revolution.

In 1962, I said first that I wanted this debate, which holds the attention of the Canadian nation, to be carried on with dignity and not to be made into a matter of political partisanship.

By the way, I would like to tell my colleagues who sit in this house that we must now discuss this matter and that when it has been decided, those who have not spoken should not range all over Canada and pit one race against the other, as has often been done in the past, and more especially in our province, when for 30 or 40 years we have heard about conscription and heard charges to the effect that a political party was in favour of conscription or war. If we do not want to play one race against the other, we must say immediately what we have to say, listen to the viewpoints of others and then walk hand in hand towards the ideal that we have set up.

If this first point is to be efficient, all political partisanship must be eliminated, so that the flag design which the nation will choose will be selected not by a single man but by a group representing all political parties, a group which has no reason to indulge in political partisanship by suggesting such and such a choice. That was the first point I mentioned in November 1962.

The second point I raised was the following: if all Canadians recognize the necessity of having a flag of their own, on the other hand they do not all agree on the flag design. All members are aware of that and they have received through the mails hundreds of designs for a distinctive national flag. But all do not agree on the design and that is why the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved an amendment to the resolution and the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) introduced a subamendment. By the amendment and subamendment, they ask the government to let the people decide the flag design. I shall revert to this question in a few moments.

The third point was the following: I am not one of those who want to ram a flag design down the throat of the rest of the nation. I agree that each group should try and have the rest of the nation understand that such and such design should be chosen.

At the present time we are discussing a design proposed by one man and consisting of three red maple leaves on a white field with two blue bands at each end. That design was chosen, as I said, by one man or by a small group without any previous discussion, not even at the caucus of the party involved or in the cabinet.

That design was chosen and they want to give it to the Canadian people. But when someone objects or gives his views on the design chosen, he is charged with being against a distinctive national flag. As far as I am concerned I do not like the design with the three red maple leaves, but I am for a distinctive national flag. I do not like this design, like several of my compatriots in the province of Quebec.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I should like to report a fact that happened in my home. When I arrived with copies of the flag with three maple leaves on a white shield and blue bands, my ten year old son asked me: "What is this?" I said: "This is the flag proposed by the government in the House of Commons." Then, he asked me: "What are those three things in the centre?" I told him: "Those are maple leaves." He answered: "Dad, we have maples on our farm. We have some in the yard and the leaves do not look like these. They are not the maple leaves we see here, in our yard, on our farm."

Honestly, Mr. Speaker, I admit that the remarks of that young boy saying they were not maple leaves made me think twice.

And they would like to adopt a flag, telling the Canadian people that those are maple leaves.

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Vincent: Certainly.

Mr. Dupuis: Does the hon. member think that the fleur-de-lis represented on the flag of the province of Quebec look like those he sees in his garden?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, to answer the minister, I shall say that, before I was elected as a member of the House of Commons, I did not think that a minister could be like the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville.

Mr. Dupuis: Answer my question—

Mr. Vincent: I thought a minister was quite different.

Mr. Dupuis: I asked you a very simple question. Answer it.

[Text]

Mr. Smallwood: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, surely the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) had no right to get up in the house without recognition from you and interfere with the speech of the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should mention to the hon. member that I have recognized the minister. I think the Chair can recognize an hon. member otherwise than by standing and calling on him by naming his constituency or his cabinet position. The minister got up and asked permission to ask a question, and this was granted by the hon. member who has the floor. I suggest that that was tantamount to recognition.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, my fourth point is this. A Canadian flag is a symbol of unity; it should not divide a nation. Now, when we have reached a compromise enabling us to choose a really distinctive Canadian flag, we can rest assured that it will be flown with pride in every Canadian province, including the province of Quebec, and honoured by the whole Canadian nation.

That is what I said in 1962 and what I am saying again today.

We must select a design which will unite and not divide the nation. We must choose a design which will be a rallying sign.

If we could decide upon such a choice, I, for one, think that it would be to the greatest advantage of all Canadians in every province of Canada.

My fifth point is this. I should like to point out once again that our flag should be a symbol of unity. Bearing that in mind, our flag should be so designed that it takes into account the aspirations of the two main groups in the country. It should reflect our sovereignty, our accession to the rank of independent state and show that we are free from any political link of subservience.

There is now in Canada a nation-wide group which cannot conceive a Canadian flag without the union jack being an integral part of it. There is another group on the government side which cannot conceive that Canada can have a distinctive flag without retaining the union jack as a second flag.

Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I feel that exactly the same question is now being discussed. Several, maybe all of my English speaking friends, attach prime importance to the union jack. A few want it on the new flag and others want it as second flag.

Would it not be possible to have, maybe not the union jack, but something that would represent it, for our English speaking fellow citizens?

When the Leader of the Opposition proposed some amendments to the flag Canada recognized by order in council in 1945, by including a fleur-de-lis, he did not want to appease French Canadians as suggested unadvisedly, in my opinion, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he stated:

> A clumsy and gratuitous piece of appeasement; it must have appeared to my French Canadian friends as a bone thrown out to a troublesome minority to keep them quiet.

Frankly, I do not believe that in proposing that a fleur-de-lis be added to a flag design, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition ever wanted to appease thereby the French speaking Canadians. He wanted to find a compromise, so that the two great founding races of this country could be represented on the same flag. He was looking for some common ground where, together, we could unite under the same flag.

Personally, I object to the union jack, in its present form, being shown on the distinctive flag. I want what the people of my riding want. I object also—and I speak honestly—to the fleur-de-lis being shown on the distinctive flag. But I might accept on the flag what the union jack means for my English-speaking friends and what the fleur-de-lis means for my French speaking friends. I would also accept on the distinctive flag symbols of our ties with our mother countries. Mr. Speaker, because of this proposal, I would not like my friends in the Liberal party to say or claim that I am throwing a bone to my English speaking friends.

For instance, if we could go back to the origin of our two races, we would find that in 1497 John Cabot came to Canada, more exactly to Newfoundland, under a royal mandate, flying the white banner with St. George's cross. Later on, when Jacques Cartier came and discovered Canada in 1534, he flew a blue pennant with a white cross. Each having a royal warrant, those two men came to discover this country, and this was the starting point of a great nation.

If we were able to take those two crosses representing the English and French flags, and place them on a white field symbolizing the vast snowfields of this country, the Indians and Eskimos, in short, if we could arrange those two crosses without giving either of them priority, to show that this is a union of two great races which we formed in this country, and that we propose to go on working for its prosperity, we should certainly obtain the support of all our people.

The union of those two races would form a circle, which is the sign of unity, and we would, because of those two crosses, obtain the colours of Canada: blue, white and red.

On this flag, we would have a cross, which is the sign of a Christian nation. As 97 or perhaps 98 per cent of Canadian citizens are Christians, I do not think that a cross on a flag could be dishonourable; on the contrary, I think that a cross on the flag would certainly honour the Canadian nation. In the central circle, there could be a green maple leaf, which would indicate a growing Canada. That maple leaf might have 10 points, because an ordinary maple leaf can have 9, 10, 11 and even 12 points. Those 10 points would represent the ten Canadian provinces, and if, later on, another province happened to join the big Canadian family, another point might simply be added, to identify the new province.

Such a flag would have neither union jack nor fleur-de-lis, but it would indicate what the union jack means to a great number of our English speaking friends.

We would have the white cross on a field of azure to remind us of our past and we would have a circle in the middle to indicate that we are a united people in a country represented by a green maple leaf.

We could then visit our schools and meet the students. We could explain to them the meaning of the flag by recalling the whole Canadian history. We could start with 1497, mention 1534 and go on to confederation in 1867. We could tell them about the confederation pact and finally we would say: We are a united people.

[Mr. Vincent.]

In my opinion, this flag would be first and foremost a flag accepted by the majority of Canadians. Moreover, it would recognize our dual culture and would symbolize our history. It would also have a religious significance and would acknowledge the political evolution of Canada, without being revolutionary.

Mr. Drouin: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Vincent: Certainly.

Mr. Drouin: Could the hon. member tell us whether he has rallied to his cause his colleagues of the Tory party and the leader of his party? Do they support his flag proposal?

Mr. Vincent: To answer my hon. friend's question, I must tell him this: If the leader of his party, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), had consulted even a group of members, such as the member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes—

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Vincent: It is not what the hon. member—

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As far as I am concerned, notwithstanding the statement made by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) I was consulted, and so were all my colleagues of the Liberal party, before the Prime Minister submitted his three maple leaf flag design to the house.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: I admit that the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes was perhaps consulted before the leader of the government brought in his resolution, but he did not say that he and his friends were consulted before the leader of the government introduced his proposal in Winnipeg to the newspapermen, or what he did before he submitted it to the cabinet. On that point, he may have consulted the hon. members of the Liberal party before introducing it to the house, but when he consulted his colleagues or his friends or the members of his party, everything was decided. In that, I feel that the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes approves me and that even if he had put forward objections as we did, there was no change to make; that was the one, and they had to support it.

I want to repeat once more, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Boulanger: Answer my question.

Mr. Vincent: Does the hon. member for Mercier have a question to ask?

Mr. Boulanger: I asked a question a while ago and you have not yet answered.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, having not heard the question I cannot answer it.

Once more, I wish to repeat this: at the present time, there are in the Liberal party members who will not speak on this flag issue. They will not speak on the second part of the resolution either.

I wish to tell them this: it would be much preferable that you say what you have to say here, in the house, instead of making all kinds of statements in the province of Quebec during the next federal election, in order to set one part of the population against the other.

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, because we meet at the present time organizers and members of that party who ask us, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce did the other day: What are you going to do to get elected in the province of Quebec, if you are against the three maple leaf flag?

But that does not mean that we are against a distinctive flag. And I would tell them this: It is not by flying a flag that all the problems we are confronted with at the present time in the province of Quebec will be settled. For 30 years, it paid dividends, for instance, to talk about conscription, but now, the farmers and the labourers want the country to look towards economy and not only towards emotion.

I even invited a group of members to spend a week in my constituency during the next election and to speak about the flag. Meanwhile, since my electors know my opinion on this matter, I shall speak about other things of greater importance.

What is happening in the province of Quebec is precisely that people realize that for too long, in the federal parliament, we discussed emotional matters only to do window-dressing and we forgot to discharge our responsibilities concerning economic matters.

I should like to quote from memory a speech made by Hon. Arthur Sauvé, former federal minister, father of the late Paul Sauvé, premier of the province of Quebec. Speaking at the college of L'Assomption, in 1931 or 1932, he said: "If we want to discuss politics in the province of Quebec, we must appeal to emotions—that is what the Liberals were doing at that time—while in other provinces, we must discuss politics and bring forth arguments."

Well, I believe that is a thing of the past in the province of Quebec as in other provinces. If we wish to discuss politics, let us use arguments and stop appealing to emotions and tell an hon. member: "Because you are against the three-leaved flag, even if you are in favour of a distinctive flag, you shall go down to defeat at the next election."

As far as I am concerned, I am and will always remain in favour of a distinctive national flag. I would be glad if, at last, the right hon. Prime Minister of this country would decide to convene a committee of the house. We would discuss the matter for a few weeks and I am sure we would be able to choose a design acceptable to all Canadians, or at least to the great majority of them.

If the committee is convened, I personally will propose the design I mentioned earlier, in order that all the members of the house may realize that by retaining what symbolizes the past of each race, we will have a flag which will unify the two groups and bring them closer together, in short, which will not divide them.

Moreover, if, as a last resort, I have to fight to have the three maple leaves replaced by one, as seen on this flag, especially of a colour which stands for a growing Canada, a united Canada, perhaps made up of two races—not only perhaps, but actually composed of two distinct races forming a great Canada, a complete whole—well, I shall fight to have those three maple leaves replaced by one maple leaf only.

If it is impossible for us, in this house, to make the Prime Minister understand that his three red maple leaf flag will not be readily accepted among the Canadian people, we should be able to make him realize that it is not enough to come and tell the people: "Here is a distinctive flag, do not bother about the design", because, once the people have the flag accepted and raised it, it will be too late to say, after a year or two: "Well, we should have had this or that on the flag instead of those three maple leaves". We must then accept it as is and never change it.

That is why we are exerting so much pressure and making these requests. We beg our colleagues of the Liberal party to exert pressure on the Prime Minister to set up a committee to choose a design which, as I said, would unite and not divide the country, in short, knit together into one unit all the elements of our country.

I am sure that my English speaking friends are prepared to make major concessions and that they are prepared, as I said earlier, while retaining what, for them, symbolizes their past and their origin, to find a design that will satisfy both groups and still be accepted by the majority of Canadians.

If this committee is established—

Mr. Choquette: Allow me to rise on a very brief point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of my hon. friend. I understand that much latitude has been allowed during the discussion on the subamendment. But I wonder whether it would not be in order to ask the hon. member if he is in favour or not of a referendum. Would it be in order to ask? Since he is proposing a design, it means he is against a referendum. If such is the case, let him say so.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member for Lotbinière, in the proposals relating to a plebiscite, mention is made of the red ensign, of a modified red ensign, of the three-leaved flag and of a one-leafed flag.

The hon. member asked me to give my opinion. If he had been present in the house when I began my remarks, he would have noticed that I expressed myself clearly on this matter. Therefore, I do not intend to repeat my remarks.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, when he said that I should limit my remarks to the amendment and the subamendment—

Mr. Choquette: Yes or no, are you in favour of a plebiscite?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Vincent: On that, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Choquette: I asked, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member was in favour of a plebiscite, yes or no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska.

Mr. Vincent: I would ask the hon. member for Lotbinière to read his speech tomorrow—

Mr. Choquette: I do not have time.

Mr. Vincent: —and when he has read it, I will ask him if he is for or against the union jack as a second flag for Canada.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to raise a point of order and after that, I will rise on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Vincent.]

First, with regard to the point of order, the union jack is not the subject matter of the debate right now.

With regard to the question of privilege, the hon. member asked me a question about the union jack. That is completely out of order and against the rules of the house. This is my question of privilege. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska has no right to ask me such a question, as we are not discussing the union jack at the present time.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière reminds me of a card player who prepares a bluff. He says: Do not look at my cards but I would like to know what there is in yours.

At all events, I would ask the hon. member for Lotbinière—it is very easy to answer—to tell us whether or not he will vote for the union jack as a second flag?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. member that he make his own remarks. I think it is not conducive to good order and debate in the house for an hon. member who has the floor to ask another member to make a speech. I have the impression that if the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) got up to reply to this question and went on for a few minutes, perhaps the hon. member for St. Mary might feel at that point that he had lost the floor. I suggest therefore that he complete his remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I immediately come back to the referendum and the four proposals in the subamendment. In my opinion, this is an excellent suggestion and it should be carefully considered. We must not forget the fact that we are going to adopt two flags for Canada and when the time comes—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, I rise on a point of order and it is unfortunate that it has not been done more often during this debate. When one of our friends opposite accuses us of trying to give Canada two flags, I maintain that it is false, absolutely false. There is no question of giving the country two flags but only one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no point of order and I would suggest that the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska continue his remarks.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, before I conclude, I should like to say that when the time comes to vote either on the flag issue, the referendum or any of the proposals contained in the amendment to the amendment, I will take my responsibilities. I will not run out as my Liberal friends did when the student loans legislation was put to a vote. Neither will I act as a rubber stamp as they did on the nuclear arms issue. I will take my responsibilities, thus setting an example for the Liberal members from Quebec.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Text]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: It being six o'clock I would like to ask the house leader what departments of the main estimates we will be taking tomorrow and Friday?

Mr. Favreau: On Friday we will be considering first the estimates of the Department of Industry, then the Department of Labour and then the Department of Public Works, but I should like to add that the Department of Industry estimates include defence production, atomic energy, national research, medical councils and the emergency measures organization.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, August 27, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—STATEMENT RESPECTING ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in response to a number of questions from hon. members I would like to make a progress report on arrangements under the Canada Student Loans Act. I have delayed doing so pending receipt of information from the provinces on whether they are participating in the plan and on the arrangements they are making to get the plan under way.

All provinces, the Yukon and Northwest Territories have now decided to participate in this plan, except the province of Quebec. As all hon. members knew at the time the legislation was before the house, the province of Quebec was intending to continue to rely entirely on its own comprehensive plan of student loans, bursaries and scholarships.

Appropriate authorities, as provided under the act, are designated by the provinces as the authority in the province for the purposes of the Canada students loans plan. Nine provinces and the two territories have provided us informally with the following names and addresses of the appropriate authorities which they are designating for this purpose. I will not read the addresses, but in most cases the address is in care of the department of education:

Newfoundland	Canada student loans authority
Prince Edward Island	Minister of education
Nova Scotia	Canada student loans committee
New Brunswick	Deputy minister of youth and welfare
Ontario	Department of university affairs
Manitoba	Department of education
Saskatchewan	Department of education
Alberta	Students assistance board
British Columbia	The British Columbia student aid loan committee
Yukon Territory	The students financial assistance awards committee
Northwest Territories	Superintendent of education for the Northwest Territories

Except in the case of Ontario, these appropriate authorities will be the only agencies in the province to which students should apply for certificates of eligibility. These certificates may be issued to students who meet the provincial standards on academic qualifications and financial need.

In Ontario, all universities and other specified educational institutions will be entitled to issue certificates of eligibility to students. These institutions are listed in the appendix to this statement. By leave of the house I should like to suggest that this statement be printed as an appendix to Hansard, but if hon. members feel this would not be appropriate it could be done in some other way. However, I think it would be convenient to have the whole matter dealt with in the same document.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For list of institutions mentioned above see appendix.]

Mr. Gordon: Ontario students applying for a certificate in connection with studies abroad must apply to the Ontario department of university affairs.

All the forms which we must provide in order that the plan may get under way will be sent out next Monday, August 31, to all appropriate authorities of the provinces and to the banks across the country. Regulations under the Canada Student Loans Act will be published in the Canada Gazette during the first week of September.

A brochure is being prepared which will tell students about the qualifications necessary to apply for certificates of eligibility and loans, how much they can borrow, how long they can take to repay, what the cost is likely to be and, most important, where they should apply in each province. This brochure will be printed and available next week for distribution in large numbers to the banks and, through the provincial authorities, to universities and other educational institutions. Copies of this brochure will be distributed to members of parliament.

Thanks to the wholehearted co-operation of all concerned, the Canada student loans plan will be launched, as promised, before the beginning of the academic year 1964-65. In this connection I should like to express the appreciation of the government to all the provinces, without exception, for their ready and helpful participation in our discussions, sometimes at short notice and at no small personal inconvenience to those involved.

Officials of the chartered banks have also co-operated in this endeavour and the government is grateful to them. May I also express a special word of thanks to the officials of several federal departments, including my own, who have worked under very heavy pressure to put this plan into effect at the earliest possible date.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of the statement he made at the opening of today's sitting, which is some little time ago now. I should like to ask the minister whether there have been any applications received by him from credit unions for certification under the students loans act, and if so, how many credit unions have made such applications and what action has been taken.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I last inquired, which was either yesterday or the day before, I think there were somewhere between half a dozen and ten credit unions which had written in to inquire about this matter. They are all being investigated by the department at the present time.

CANADIAN FLAG

LETTER OF MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO RESPECTING BUMPER STRIPS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he authorized any member of the government to solicit orders for bumper strips on which appear the three-leaf flag, and whether his attention has been drawn to a broadcast last evening over CHCH-TV by Mr. Geoff. Scott regarding a letter forwarded to various colleagues of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) in which it was suggested that members might sell at least 1,000 of these stickers to—

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Dupuis (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to service stations—

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think it would be advisable to let the right hon. gentleman finish his statement, so I may decide.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to sell at least 1,000 of these stickers to the most important service stations in the riding; the result would be better and would look less political than if the member undertook the publicity himself. I would like the Prime Minister to say whether he has any knowledge of this, and whether it is approved.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of it. I will discuss the matter with my colleague the Minister without Portfolio, and if there is any statement that should be made I will be glad to make it.

Mr. Monteith: You want to find out what the cabinet is doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At no time have I used public funds to distribute or urge members of parliament to do anything with regard to the emblems of the new flag. I understand that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is greatly interested in the new flag and in my activities, but I should like to make it clear, by rising on a question of privilege, that the question raised yesterday on television is unfounded. It was asked whether it is right for a minister to use public funds in order to advertise an emblem not yet adopted. My answer is no, it is not right, and I have not done anything of the kind. I would never use public funds for such a purpose.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly now, Mr. Speaker, a further question might be directed to the hon. gentleman. Did he send out the letter asking his colleagues to purchase, at $25 per thousand, these particularly attractive bumper stickers, and did he suggest therein "For information or orders call Mr. George Marshall, 992-2377", which is the telephone number of the minister in whose office Mr. Marshall occupies a position?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: My hon. friends asked me questions. Do they want an answer?

If you give me time to answer I will do so, and with great pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, the letter to which the Leader of the Opposition just referred is confidential. How did he obtain it?

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: You admit it, then.

Mr. Dupuis: No. You had better listen.

[Translation]

How did he get it? I do not know. But at any rate he fell into a trap, because I was sure his intelligence service would cause him to rise today in order to cause a sensation as he usually likes to do, by saying:

[Text]

State the facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition. Since he asked me questions in regard to the flag stickers, I have placed personally 50,000 of them. He is making the best publicity for the new flag he could ever hope to do in his life.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was reading from the broadcast of last evening. I ask the hon. gentleman how many of these confidential letters did he send out, and did he have much success with his colleagues?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: To answer the questions put by the Leader of the Opposition, I could quote many statements in order to prove to him that I had much success since he put his question. I will quote only one, to answer his question. It comes from a doctor, whom I have never seen, from Brantford, Ontario. Here is what he writes:

[Text]

Dear Sir:

If possible, I would appreciate receiving some bumper stickers of the new flag for which I enclose $5.

Be assured, sir, that there are many residents of Ontario who regardless of their ancestors' origins wish to see Canada truly united under a new distinctively Canadian flag.

[Translation]

And that doctor concludes as follows:

[Text]

I feel that we should be looking to the future and not to the past and that the proposed new flag is an expression of this feeling.

[Translation]

I sent him back his $5 cheque because I am not a merchant and I was glad to give him free of charge, as I always do, fine copies of this nice flag which the Leader of the Opposition likes so much.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, evidently the Prime Minister has information which he did not have before. Is it proper and fitting that a minister in his cabinet should be sending out messages to provide for the sale of bumper stickers, and make his office the place to which the returns are to be made? The Prime Minister is laughing, but does he regard it as proper for the office of a minister to be used for that purpose?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if it is proper for a senator and a member of the previous government to send out messages soliciting campaign funds from members of this government, I do not think it is too serious when a member of the government supports and advocates a resolution which is before the house and in which he believes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly I do not know anything about the letter which the hon. gentleman received—

Mr. Hellyer: Was it not on behalf of your party?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but I can think of no more appropriate place to get money, if you need money, than right over there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simpson: What's a hundred million?

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, I ask the Prime Minister this. Does he regard it as proper for a minister to use the services of his office for such distribution at a price, and under a plan whereby the people would be fooled? Because I am informed that the letter says, in effect, "If you could get it distributed by a garage man the result would be better and would be less political".

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have already stated that I will look at the letter and make a statement in the house if one is required. I am sorry my right hon. friend has not seen the letter to which I refer, but I will be glad to send him a copy. It is signed by Senator McCutcheon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, since the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has referred to the letter which is in my possession I should like permission of the house to table this letter.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give permission to table this letter?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should now like to ask the Prime Minister and all his associates whether they will table the letter in question that was sent to each and every one of them?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I understand my right hon. friend has a copy of the letter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, no.

Mr. Pearson: We have tabled the letter that we have. I think it would be quite appropriate, as I have not got a copy of that letter, if he were given permission to table it right now.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister not think it is completely disgraceful that the offices of a minister of the crown should be used for the distribution of literature concerning a flag which is not even the flag of Canada?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that it is disgraceful to waste the time of parliament in this way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am having a little difficulty hearing.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

I cannot let the Leader of the Opposition state that I used public funds to write that letter. I would say to him that, if he had taken the trouble to look at the confidential letter he has in his hands, he could have seen it was not written on government paper, but on personal paper which does not bear the government seal.

It is important to point this out, because it shows how the Leader of the Opposition can twist the facts around to suit his purpose.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, now that we have verification that what Mr. Scott said was correct, could I ask the hon. gentleman to table the letter in question, to which he has referred?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Since this incident began on television and in the press gallery, I should like to submit personally, after the orders of the day, a complete summary of the situation that will show the people how the Leader of the Opposition tries to find scandals where there are absolutely none.

[Text]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all the members of this house, and I refer to the remark by the Prime Minister that it was not a serious matter. I should like to bring this very serious matter to the attention of the house. When the Minister without Portfolio stood up and said he had sent a confidential letter, I think he made a false statement; because I have a photostat of the letter he sent and there is no mention of it being confidential. I should like the Minister without Portfolio to retract or make a correct statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I am going to advise my office right now to send me one of those letters and I will put it under the very nose of the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade).

[Text]

On a question of privilege—

[Translation]

The hon. member for St. Mary just said that I should withdraw my statement. I think he should withdraw his instead, because I have here a copy of the letter I sent to all Liberal members which bears at the top the word "confidential".

Of course it may be that his friends in the official opposition hid that word when they took a photostat of that letter because they were ashamed to use a document bearing the word "confidential". In any case, since the hon. member for St. Mary just said to the house that I lied, I would ask him to withdraw his statement, and I table herewith the document as the leader of the official opposition asked me to do.

I would ask the hon. member for St. Mary to withdraw his statement.

[Text]

Mr. Valade: I have nothing to retract, but the Minister without Portfolio should retract the imputations in his statement. He has accused the representatives of this house of taking out the word "confidential". I have mentioned in the house that I have a photostat of the letter the minister sent. I think the minister himself could have the word "confidential" on some letters which originally did not carry the word "confidential".

Mr. Monteith: I wonder if the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I tabled a document. I do not accept the point raised by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade). I am asking him to retract his words, as he said that I was not telling the truth to the house.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister without Portfolio with regard to this letter he has just tabled. Has it gone to any persons other than members of parliament; because I understood him to refer to a letter which he got from some person sending in $5 for these stickers. Is the minister in business now, not only serving members of parliament—

An hon. Member: That is right; he is in business.

Mr. Douglas: —but the general public? If so, I suggest to the Prime Minister that instead of keeping him as Minister without Portfolio he might create a department of notions and gimmicks over which he could put the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, if I need a partner in "notions and gimmicks", I will ask the leader of the New Democratic party to assist me in my duties.

Now, to answer his question, this letter was only sent to Liberal members. Of course my messenger delivered them; I would certainly not use the messenger of the Leader of the Opposition for this purpose, lest he should enclose some red ensigns.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before this letter is tabled we will need the consent of the house. Does the house give consent to the tabling of the letter?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister without Portfolio. There seems to be a question as to whether the minister is operating legally, and I am wondering whether he has obtained the necessary peddler's licence to conduct this business.

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Has the hon. member for Carleton approved of this action, and how large an order for stickers has he placed?

Mr. Pearson: I am impressed, Mr. Speaker, by the fact that there are various forms of filibusters.

[Later:]

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister without Portfolio. Is the minister remitting Ontario sales tax on the orders for bumper stickers which are being filled from his office?

Mr. Dupuis: I always pay my taxes.

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I would like to ask him whether he is aware that the bumper stickers being peddled by the Minister without Portfolio are very similar to the merchant navy flag of the Soviet union, with the red star of Russia and the hammer and sickle replaced by three red maple leaves?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely that last question should not be taken too seriously.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the Prime Minister then, and now is an appropriate time, whether the Minister without Portfolio has any duties other than chief huckster of Liberal propaganda on the flag.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could get on with the public business.

Mr. Monteith: Embarrassing, isn't it?

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question. Would he have with him some statistics concerning the number of speeches made on the flag issue to date and also a breakdown indicating those who spoke the most and the participation of each political party, so that the Canadian public will know where the responsibility lies for all this delay in adopting a distinctive national flag?

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. According to a statement issued by the national unemployment insurance commission employees association they are protesting to the Prime Minister about the salary increases which have been granted. They state that the salaries which have been approved by treasury board and cabinet are just half what was recommended by the civil service commission. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether this statement has been drawn to his attention, and can he tell the house whether it is correct that the salary increases granted for group B are in fact half the amount that was recommended by the federal civil service commission?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I cannot comment in detail on that, or indeed answer the specific question, but I shall be glad to look into it. I may say that the President of the Privy Council and I are receiving delegations on this matter tomorrow morning.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REPORTED INTENTION TO WITHDRAW UN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I may tell him in advance that it is not about Indonesia. In view of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, on its national television news last night, announced that the secretary general of the United Nations had decided to recall the entire United Nations force from Cyprus this month because of a lack of funds, can the minister tell us just what is the situation in regard to the UN force on Cyprus?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member for Greenwood had given me notice of his intention to ask the same question. The situation is precisely as stated in the house yesterday by the Prime Minister. The secretary general, it is true, was reported to have said that he would withdraw the force. However, the secretary general has said he did not make that statement. What he had said, at an earlier press conference, was that unless the financial situation, involving a deficit of $2 million, improved, he would have to give consideration to the matter.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs could tell us whether this government or he himself are making any efforts to encourage other nations to contribute the $2 million, which seems a very small sum for the whole of the peace keeping effort on Cyprus to depend upon. Is there anything being done to make sure that money is available?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The answer to the question is yes. We have made every effort, alongside other countries, to see that the deficit is met. I have hopes that this will be the case. I will be disappointed if it is not.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a further supplementary question. The Associated Press report is much more specific than the minister's answer indicates, unless this has been denied by someone. It states that secretary general U Thant said Wednesday night he will hand his recommendation on discontinuing a UN peace keeping force in Cyprus to the security council early next month. What I wanted to ask the minister was will this apply only to those participants who are being financed by the United Nations? Will countries like Canada, who are paying the cost themselves, continue to maintain forces in Cyprus? It seems to me that this would be quite practicable. Has Canada offered to continue the force there at her own expense?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We will have to look at this matter in the light of the recommendations made to the security council by the secretary general.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister has been reported in this morning's Globe and Mail as indicating that the Canadian government is planning to withdraw part or all of the Canadian forces now in Cyprus on September 26, will the minister comment on that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a decision, of course, that will depend upon the recommendation that will be made by the secretary general to the security council. At that time the Canadian government and other governments will give consideration to those recommendations.

Mr. Harkness: My question was whether the Canadian government is actually planning to withdraw troops, because the account in the Globe and Mail this morning certainly indicates this is the government's intention, if the minister was correctly reported.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The answer is no.

NATO—AGREEMENT RESPECTING EXCHANGE OF ATOMIC INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which someone on the government side might take as notice for him because I did not have time to give him notice. My question concerns a document which was tabled in this house on June 30 dealing with the exchange of atomic information between the United States and her NATO allies. I questioned the minister about it on July 8 and again on July 16. I would like to ask the minister whether he would later give to the house a more accurate statement than he gave on July 16, when he told me, as reported at page 5546 of Hansard:

> This agreement concerns the exchange of atomic information for the use of members in scientific purposes.

I had been asking whether the exchange had reference to defence operations. My additional question is this. Will the minister of external affairs refer to the message from the President of the United States to congress concerning this transfer of nuclear information, and apprise the house of the exact terms of that message, which deals with extending information to NATO allies in order that they may make more effective use of nuclear delivery systems?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to bring this to the minister's attention, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

GREAT LAKES—CONDITIONS IMPOSED FOR REINSTATEMENT FROM "DO NOT SHIP" LIST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Will the Minister of Labour carry a question to the maritime union trustees and bring back a reply as to whether Mr. Charles Turner, temporary president of the S.I.U., who was installed in this position by the trustees, is imposing, with full consent and knowledge of the trustees, arbitrary and unjustified conditions in writing upon seamen on the "do not ship list" as a condition to their re-employment in the industry?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Starr: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Minister of Labour express his view as to whether this arbitrary and high-handed method of exercising dictatorial control over the employment of seamen is in accordance with the task which has been given to the trustees by parliament for the restoration of democracy in the S.I.U.?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker, because I do not accept at face value the allegations contained in my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Starr: Then I ask the minister how he could accept this when he said he would ask the trustees whether they are directing such actions by the president.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agreed to ascertain the facts, not to accept the hon. member's version of the facts.

Mr. Starr: As a further supplementary question, and in order to help the minister and the trustees in bringing down an effectual report, I might say they could refer to a letter dated May 6, 1964, over the signature of Mr. Charles Turner and addressed to Mr. John Wood, Sr. of Verdun, Quebec.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—PAYMENT OF FEDERAL SHARE OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Could he tell the house whether his department has paid its share for all the works completed under the winter works program for 1963-64 by the municipalities of the state of Quebec?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to take up this matter at half past ten, at the next opportunity.

[Text]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SOFTBALL GAME FOR DAN MCIVOR TROPHY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Temple (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Prime Minister. Is he aware that last evening a team of members of parliament from all sides of the house succeeded in recovering the Dan McIvor trophy from the security staff softball team, by a score of 6 to 5, for the first time in 14 years? As a supplementary question, would the Prime Minister be good enough to agree to keep this trophy for all members of parliament?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I was not aware of this important information, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my hon. friend for bringing it to my attention. I only hope the morale of the protective staff will not be so shattered by this defeat that we will not be given sufficient protection from the galleries.

FINANCE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL ADVISOR ON TAXATION MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister appointed a special outside advisor on taxation matters and, if so, will he state what are the functions of this new outside advisor?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some months ago I received a letter from Mr. Arthur S. Pattillo, Q.C., chairman of the Canadian tax foundation, suggesting that with the work the Department of Finance will be faced with following receipt of the report of the royal commission on taxation, it would be desirable for the department to acquire some additional assistance on a temporary basis.

After considering this very helpful proposal the department decided this would be a good idea. We are grateful to Mr. Pattillo and the other members of the foundation for making the suggestion, and we propose to take on three tax experts for a period of a year or two to help with the implementation of the reports as they are received. I think the first appointment is the one to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. Martineau: As a supplementary question, will the minister state whether there was no one among the permanent officials of the department who could carry on the functions of this new outside advisor, and will he also tell us from what line of work this advisor has been drawn?

Mr. Gordon: This proposal was discussed with the officials of my department, who felt it was a very good one. The additional assistance will be attached to the department and will work with the permanent staff. The gentleman in question is a tax expert and a chartered accountant by profession.

Mr. Martineau: As a further supplementary question, will he still be drawing his pay from his regular employers?

Mr. Gordon: No, Mr. Speaker.

REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS AND EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the alarming increase in bankruptcies across Canada as reported in the press yesterday, he will now consider removing the sales tax on building materials and production machinery.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to relate the two subjects to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Monteith: Get the experts in quickly.

Mr. Gordon: If there are any changes to be made in taxation they will be announced at the time of the next budget.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): As a supplementary question, will the special advisers or assistants the minister has just mentioned be commissioned to advise him on that special tax?

Mr. Gordon: The assistants to whom my hon. friend referred will assist the minister and the department in translating into legislation such portions of the recommendations of the royal commission as the government may approve of.

Mr. Skoreyko: Does the minister not know that the number of bankruptcies across Canada, alarming as they are, have all happened in the retail business, of which small lumber yards constitute the greatest number?

Mr. Gordon: I would think that a highly exaggerated conclusion, Mr. Speaker.

QUEBEC—ESTABLISHMENT OF BANK BY CREDIT INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the government be prepared to consider a bill authorizing Quebec caisses populaires and other similar organizations to become shareholders in a co-operative chartered bank having an authorized capital of $10 million?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I think I shall have to take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

ASSISTANCE TO TEXTILE INDUSTRY TO OFFSET JAPANESE IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Do the Minister of Finance and his department intend to take the necessary steps to assist the Canadian textile industries, which are seriously affected in their business by some imports from Japan which have increased by 100 per cent in the last two years?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that the Canadian textile industry as a whole has not been in as healthy a state for many years. On the particular question that I referred to yesterday, dealing with the production of worsted cloth, I said that at the Japanese-Canadian ministerial meeting to be held in Tokyo next week this would be one of the subjects we would be looking into.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

AMENDMENT OF SUBSIDIES ON FEED GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. In view of the deep concern of maritime farmers, will the minister inform the house whether the revision in subsidies on feed grains, recently announced as an interim measure, will be amended so that Atlantic provinces' farmers can maintain their competitive position with livestock owners in central Canada?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the interim assistance measures that were announced at the end of July will be amended, but no final decision has yet been reached.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

USE OF NUCLEAR MATERIALS BY PRIVATE INDUSTRY FOR PEACEFUL PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. Is the government taking any action to release nuclear materials to private industry for peaceful purposes, similar to the action approved yesterday by the President of the United States?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): As hon. members all know, Mr. Speaker, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has over the years, as a major constituent part of its policy, been endeavouring to develop products of nuclear fission for peaceful purposes, particularly medical uses. This program has been highly successful and will be continued.

Mr. Aiken: I have a supplementary question. Do I take it from the minister's answer that no consideration is being given to a change in the nuclear power set-up in Canada?

Mr. Drury: Well, Mr. Speaker, no consideration is being given to any substantial change in the relationships of the Canadian government to other governments in the matter of nuclear power. If the hon. gentleman would be a little more specific as to what change he has in mind, perhaps I could answer him more specifically.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF IMPROVEMENT IN CONSULTATIVE ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address this question to the right hon. Prime Minister in his capacity as reporting to parliament on federal-provincial affairs. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister at the forthcoming federal-provincial meeting to initiate discussions relating to the improvement of permanent consultative machinery between Ottawa and the provinces, and could the Prime Minister relate to the house the nature of suggestions he might be making?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question, which concerns a matter of importance in which I know he has a particular interest. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that in addition to its purely commemorative session on September 1 next week, the Charlottetown conference will meet in regular session for only half a day, or at most a full day on September 2. The only item of substance on the agenda is the question of the amendment of the constitution in Canada. However, the conference will probably review also the calendar of federal-provincial conference meetings in 1964, and reference may be made in that review to any improvements which various governments might have been making in their internal machinery and procedures to facilitate federal-provincial consultation and co-ordination, in accordance with the recommendation of the federal-provincial conference in Quebec city last spring.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

HULL, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Alexis Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the construction and rental of buildings in Ottawa is being announced but nothing is being said about Hull. Could the minister tell the house whether he will have at least one building put up in Hull this year?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reply to the hon. member that it has been decided in principle to erect one federal building in the city of Hull. However, I am not in a position to say today what type of building it will be and which department will occupy it. As soon as I can, I shall communicate that information to the house.

Mr. Caron: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can we expect a decision this year?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I hope to be in a position to give further information regarding that building, in Hull, within a month or so.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTED CLAIM OF FORMER AGENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. The question relates to a tape recording of a radio interview between Ed Murphy and Cowlishaw and Macdonald in which Macdonald said that unless some action is taken by three o'clock today he intends to go across the country and "blow the lid off" the R.C.M.P. security system. Yesterday the minister said he would investigate this case. Has he done so, and is he in a position to make a statement?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): My answer was given in reply to a question asking whether I was investigating the case. It is obvious that in my capacity as Minister of Justice it is my obligation to do so. But the question whether the facts as alleged by either Mr. Cowlishaw or Mr. Macdonald are accurate is a totally different one, and I think I can only answer it in the words of a previous minister of justice in a former administration, words which I think are absolutely right and which I want to make my own. These are the words of Hon. Davie Fulton in answer to a question asked in the House of Commons on April 29, 1959, as reported in Hansard of that year at page 3152. I will take full responsibility for them today:

> I can only answer the question by saying that the government has consistently followed a policy of complete reticence concerning security work, which in such a case means that it must refuse either to acknowledge or deny allegations about the employment of secret sources for intelligence work.

I repeat that under my own responsibility I make those words of Mr. Fulton my own.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, following the answer given to my hon. friend from Danforth. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he would not agree that if it is true that a man is being discriminated against because of an association with the communist party which he undertook on behalf of the R.C.M.P., the government and in particular the Minister of Justice has a responsibility to clear this man's name in the circumstances?

Can I ask the minister if he accepts this principle and whether he is prepared to look into the matter on this basis? It seems to me it is not sufficient to tell us that a previous minister of justice said he must be reticent on this subject. If this man's statement is true, his good name is at stake. Surely the minister has the responsibility to clear his good name if the facts he gave to the public are correct.

Mr. Favreau: Evidently the question is predicated on an assumption. Therefore it is hypothetical. Second, it purports to ask for a personal opinion on my part. I must tell the house that the answer which was given by a previous minister of justice and which I adopted as my own is the same as was given by ministers of justice in still earlier administrations. This represents an attitude which in certain cases, I must admit, makes for certain apparent hardships. However, it is important and essential to the security of the whole of Canada that as far as these matters are concerned the same line of conduct be followed by this government as was followed by previous governments.

Mr. Douglas: Would not the minister be as interested in the security of this individual, whose livelihood is affected, as he would be in the security of the R.C.M.P.? Surely the individual has some rights; this is not a police state. If he has had an unfortunate association at the request of the R.C.M.P., and paid for by the R.C.M.P., surely his name should be cleared.

Mr. Favreau: Of course I never did refer, and I never would, to the security of the R.C.M.P. as such. This is a gallant body, each of whose members will always place his personal safety and security at the disposal of Canada. I was referring to the security of the whole of Canada, the country as a whole.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): If I may make an observation on the last statement made by the minister, there is certainly no problem more difficult than that of security. Anyone who has occupied a position of responsibility, either as minister of justice or as prime minister, realizes how difficult is that responsibility in this particular field.

However, is it not possible to get around the principle enunciated by the minister, if the facts are as stated, by a declaration by the minister that this man is, in fact, not a communist? Such a declaration, if it is the case, would remove any peril or difficulty in which this gentleman finds himself, and could not by any stretch of the imagination impinge or infringe on national security.

Mr. Favreau: This is a matter which would be difficult to determine, but I agree that a delicate situation is involved. I am, to an extent, comforted to learn from the newspapers and from press conferences that, in the words of the person concerned, Mr. Macdonald, he has in fact been expelled from the ranks of the communist party. At least that is what I read in the paper.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Can the minister tell us what steps he intends to take to prevent Mr. Macdonald making public the security provisions which are now in effect in relation to the communist party? As I understand it, Mr. Macdonald intends to make these arrangements public right across the country, and individuals concerned would be named. What steps does the minister intend to take to prevent this breakdown of security?

Mr. Favreau: Of course what is done, or what might be done, by any individual citizen is done, or would be done, on his own responsibility. As to what steps are being taken or will be taken to further the security of Canada, this is something which of course I am not free to divulge at any time, nor is any minister free to divulge this type of information.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has just said Mr. Macdonald has stated publicly that he was expelled from the communist party. Would the minister tell the house and the country whether he became a member of the communist party in the first place under instructions from the R.C.M. Police?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think this is covered exactly and completely by my first answer to the original question.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to take it from the minister's previous statement, when he referred to the responsibility of an individual in revealing R.C.M.P. security measures, and so on, that Macdonald is aware of their security regulations and their security operations to the extent that he can go out and make them known publicly?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, this question would not have been asked if my answer had been completely understood. Perhaps it was somewhat imprecise. I never said Mr. Macdonald was in possession of any such secrets or otherwise. What I said was that whatever any individual citizen purports to say in respect of what he purports to have done in the past or in the present will always be said under his own responsibility, and personally I could hardly prevent it.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Minister of Justice whether he is now in a position to give us a report on the peregrinations of Hal Banks. Has he any information from United States immigration authorities whether in the course of his departure from justice in Canada Mr. Banks entered the United States and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I have no information as to that although I must repeat what I said in the house previously, namely that the Canadian authorities are presently in touch with United States authorities to obtain whatever information may be supplied to us in this respect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the answer the minister gave a week ago, as I recall it. Surely in the time which has elapsed since that question was asked the minister has been able to place himself in a position to advise us whether the United States immigration authorities have given any information respecting this man.

Mr. Favreau: None has been reported to me, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice and concerns the whereabouts of Mr. Hal Banks.

Is the minister aware of the fact that Mr. Banks' property in Dorval, Quebec, is offered for sale for the amount of $110,000?

If so, could he not seek information from the real estate agent looking after the sale of that property as to the present whereabouts of Mr. Banks. I submit that this would be a way to find out where Mr. Banks is.

Mr. Favreau: I shall make a note of the question asked by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BURNT OUT PENSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Does he propose at this session to introduce a bill in order to increase the veterans' pensions?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question two days ago. I believe and hope I will have a recommendation to make before the fall, that is during this session, if possible.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works. In order to expedite the business of the house, would it be possible to turn out the lights in the house during the flag debate so that filibustering Conservatives may be prevented from reading their speeches?

[Text]

SHIPPING

SINKING OF SHIP IN HUDSON STRAITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The minister is quite ready to assist the Minister of Justice in answering some of his questions, and I wonder why he does not answer some of his own mail. For the last couple of months I have directed letters to him regarding the sinking of the S. S. Costello in Hudson straits. Could the minister tell the house what steps the department has taken to correct the wrong impression which is left abroad because of the sinking of the S. S. Costello?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman did not receive the letter I wrote to him about this matter some days ago, I will send him another copy of it, because it sets the matter out fully.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

PLAN FOR PROVISION OF SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister tell the house what proposals he intends to present to the commonwealth education conference this afternoon regarding Canada's part in the commonwealth scholarship and fellowship plan?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question. Later today I will be saying something at the conference about a program of senior fellowships and visiting educationalists' awards to be financed out of the appropriation provided in the estimates for the commonwealth scholarship and fellowship plan; also about the assistance, in the form of transportation to be provided to the African students' foundation, a Canadian organization which is bringing students to Canada from Africa.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Could the Secretary of State advise the house whether the government have received any report from the advisory committee on broadcasting; and if not, when they might anticipate receiving one?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have received no report, and as I said when I announced the setting up of the committee at the end of May, we are still hoping to get a report of the committee early in 1965.

FISHERIES

MARITIME PROVINCES—LOBSTER LICENSING PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Is any action contemplated by the minister in relation to the licensing procedure in the lobster industry in the maritime provinces, in view of the stand taken by the Shediac young Liberal association condemning the present procedure?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, my department is well aware of this situation, which has existed for a number of years, and I must say that it is presently under very active consideration.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—CORRECTION OF RADIO SPEECH BY LEADER OF OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege which I would have raised at the start of today's proceedings but the Leader of the Opposition, who is involved in it, was a few seconds late in getting into the house. That is quite understandable, but I did not want to raise it until he was in his place. I might also have raised it yesterday when the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg raised his point of privilege about a statement which appeared in Time, but as far as my question of privilege is concerned, it was not until this morning that I obtained the necessary transcript so as to be sure of the words used which I feel need correction.

I happened to hear the voice of the Leader of the Opposition over radio station CKPM here in Ottawa the night before last and again yesterday morning, when he made a statement in which there were two errors which should be corrected. I have obtained a transcript from Mr. Paul Taylor of CKPM, and I should like to read the words which I think should be corrected. At one point, referring to my open letter of August 12 to the party leaders, the Leader of the Opposition said:

> When I received his open letter, which was first given to the press—

—and so on. I wish to make it clear, so that all hon. members may know the facts, that I delivered copies of my open letter by hand—not through a messenger; I delivered them myself—to the office of each leader between nine o'clock and five minutes after nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, August 12. I personally delivered copies to the press later for release at eleven o'clock that morning. That is the first correction.

Canadian Flag

The other statement in the transcript I have in my hand arises out of the reference made by the Leader of the Opposition to the occasion when he offered to place my name before the house in nomination for the speakership of this house. He used these words:

For some reason known to him he refused to allow his name to go before the house—

The implication there is that I did not give my reasons. The Leader of the Opposition knows that I wrote him on August 24, 1957, setting out the reasons for my refusal. My letter was in reply to his letter of August 19, 1957, in which he made the offer; and he, the Leader of the Opposition, who was then prime minister, tabled both these letters in the House of Commons on October 17, 1957. They comprise sessional paper No. 178 of that session.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that nothing tremendous turns on these two misstatements, but it is my view that statements made in public by public men should be in accord with the facts.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO LEASES OF WATERFRONT PROPERTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is prepared to reply to the question asked him a few days ago regarding the leasing of some property on the Vancouver waterfront to Coal Harbour Investments Limited. At that time he said he would make a reply shortly. I do not want to take up the minister's time now, but can he give us any information on this matter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did make a reply, either yesterday or the day before, at the very end of orders of the day. I do not blame the hon. gentleman for not noticing it because it was one of three replies which were made at the same time. My reply was to the effect that there would be no lease of this property to anyone without the approval of the city of Vancouver.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Wednesday, August 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

[Mr. Knowles.]

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood).

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would call attention to the fact that the debate was adjourned last night by the Minister without Portfolio, and we should hear from him now.

Mr. Mandziuk: If he has anything to say.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Chair did not recognize him last night, although I notice that according to Hansard he did ask that it be declared six o'clock.

An hon. Member: He must be out selling stickers.

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, last night the Minister without Portfolio called it six o'clock, but evidently the hon. member's business has now become so important that he has not even time to stay in this house and complete his speech. We have always been looking for a label for the hon. gentleman, and I suggest we now call him the "minister of bumper stickers".

This letter which he sent to his colleagues is quite interesting and should be brought to the attention of this house. I have a photostat of the letter, which I should like to put on record. It says:

My dear Colleague:
If you are interested, I can procure—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not like interrupting the hon. member, but a copy of this letter has been tabled today and is available to any hon. member who wishes to see it. We have had considerable discussion about it. Perhaps the hon. member would confine himself to the subamendment.

Mr. Smallwood: On a point of order, this letter is referring to the subamendment because it deals with the three maple leaves flag which the hon. member is trying to advertise across this country. It is time some of this propaganda was brought to the attention of the Canadian people. This letter has to do with the three maple leaves flag and goes on to say:

—I can procure at a very special price: $25 per thousand stickers...of the proposed flag.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Smallwood:

I believe that every member should sell at least 1,000 to the most important service stations in his riding. The garage manager could then distribute them to each client who buys at his station.

Thus, the result would be better (and would look less political) than if the member undertook this publicity himself.

In my riding I have already placed 12 orders of 1,000 in the gas stations of 12 different localities.

For information or orders call Mr. Gordon Marshall 992-2237. (Only those orders of 1,000 decals or more will be accepted).

The hon. member told his colleagues that he had a special price of $25 per thousand for the proposed maple leaf bumper stickers. I became very interested in this subject this morning and made a number of phone calls. I found one place where I could buy them for $21 per thousand. Where is the extra money going? Is that extra money going to be put in the Liberal campaign fund? Is that party going to benefit in this way by pushing a proposed flag down our throats? These are questions the Prime Minister should consider.

I think the situation is disgraceful. I suggest the Prime Minister and his cabinet are engaging in a propaganda campaign in respect of this flag. If the Prime Minister walked into this chamber now and withdrew his motion and placed the flag issue before a committee I would be glad to take my seat. If he does not do so I shall continue to speak on this resolution at this time, and perhaps speak again on four or five other occasions.

Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate the second time I feel I am doing so with great responsibility. I am supporting the retention of the red ensign or a slightly modified red ensign. Canada has prospered for 96 years under the red ensign. The people of Canada have lived together happily, and we have witnessed intermarriage among the French, English, Ukrainians and many other nationalities. I suggest there is no excuse for the Prime Minister or anyone else at this time to cause the dissension across this country that is now being caused.

Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution before me which I should like to read. This resolution states:

Whereas the red ensign as the flag of Canada, is the symbol of:

(1) democracy,
(2) parliamentary government,
(3) justice and tolerance,
(4) freedom of the individual,
(5) freedom of worship,
(6) educational opportunity for all,
(7) initiative and industry, and whereas, under this flag and these principles Canada has been developed, and whereas, the red ensign was chosen as the flag of Canada by authority of an order in council September 5, 1945, by the government of Canada, and whereas, it was the flag used by the Canadian forces in the last two wars, and now in Cyprus and also carried by the Canadian teams in the Olympic games,

Mr. Speaker, I am expressing the feelings of millions of people in this country when I speak in support of the red ensign. Statistics indicate that nine of the ten provinces in this great country of ours support the red ensign as Canada's national flag. I am sure the people in that other province would also accept the red ensign were it not for the brainwashing which has been done by extremists and university professors, such as we see sitting in the cabinet across from us today.

Mr. Speaker, we in the Conservative party are being accused of filibustering. Let me say that we are not filibustering but fighting on behalf of the people in Canada who support the retention of the red ensign. The members of this party seem to stand alone in this house on this flag issue. We do not have the support of the members of the party to our left. I have a great deal of respect for the leader of the New Democratic party. I know he comes from a part of this country which is in support of the red ensign. That part of the country is not receiving much support from the N.D.P. members in this house.

What has happened to that great parliamentarian, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who likes to hear himself, even though he must resort to phony points of privilege in order to put his remarks on record? I am sure his constituents are going to be unhappy about his position in this matter.

What has happened to that great Social Credit party next to us? I give the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Cariboo credit for at least rising in their places in this house and taking a stand. What have the rest of the members of that party done?

What has that great parliamentarian, the hon. member for Red Deer, had to say about the flag issue? Mr. Speaker, I have a Time magazine bearing the date August 28, 1964 before me. I suggest that it is in Time magazine that that hon. gentleman takes a position. He makes his position known outside this house. According to that article Bob Thompson, for one, is fed up. I have received a letter from a Social Credit supporter in British Columbia who indicates that supporters there are fed up with Bob Thompson. The article in Time in part states that according to Bob Thompson:

"The Prime Minister and each of the minority party leaders were willing to come together on any reasonable compromise," he snapped. "Mr. Diefenbaker refused to consult with his own party—"

Mr. Speaker, that is a downright lie. I belong to that party, and we discussed this issue at each and every one of our caucuses. The hon. member for Red Deer should not make statements of that type across this country which are, as I repeat, downright lies. That hon. gentleman has contributed nothing to this debate. I know he comes from a red ensign supporting part of this country, yet he sits in his seat, when he is here, and contributes nothing to the debate except to hand out passes to a couple of undesirables to go in the gallery and throw blood on the floor at a time when our members were speaking in support of the red ensign.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it is in order for the hon. member to make such a vicious attack upon the leader of a party at a time when he is unable to be present.

An hon. Member: Why is he not here?

Mr. Patterson: My remarks would apply in respect of any hon. member, for that matter.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker I submit that is not a point of order. I am referring to that which appeared in a newspaper, sir. If an hon. member is not here it is not my responsibility. Perhaps I will not be here tomorrow. That hon. gentleman can read what is happening here as reported in Hansard, while out in his own constituency, and that is his decision.

The only sensible remark that has been made by a member of that party during this flag debate was made the night before last by the hon. member for Portneuf, who suggested that before individuals be allowed to stand for election they should be given I.Q. tests. I doubt very much that the hon. members over there would stand up to the I.Q. test.

An hon. Member: You would never get back.

Mr. Smallwood: If you want to make a speech go across the river and make it.

Mr. Speaker, let us hear from those members on the Liberal side of this house. We would like to hear from the Ontario members. We have heard from the hon. member for York-Humber and the hon. member for York East, who at least got up on their feet and expressed their opinions. The rest of those hon. members have sat quiet.

The Prime Minister, as a result of poor advice, has placed before this parliament the three maple leaves design flag, as mentioned in the subamendment and the resolution. This flag is not acceptable across this country. Why was the Prime Minister in such a hurry to place this flag resolution before this parliament? Surely there is a great deal more important business that should be dealt with by this house. The hon. member for York-Humber told us that this design was not placed before them in that party, or mentioned in their caucus, but was brought in in a hurry shortly after the Minister of Forestry attended the Quebec conference. Does this flag resolution have something to do with the government's proposed pension plan?

Mr. Speaker, I suggest the flag issue represents one of the biggest blunders that any prime minister has made. He now finds himself with little support for his flag across this country. I suggest he should now give further consideration to this whole matter. He has suggested that the design proposed could not be mistaken for the flag of any other country.

He stated that our present flag is too much like the British merchant flag, and we should get away from that. On several occasions I have mentioned that I have looked through the flag book. I am not allowed to display this, but if anyone cares to come to my desk and look at this flag he will find that the Russian naval flag closely resembles the one proposed by the Prime Minister. It has a white fly, the hammer, sickle and star in red, and a blue band on the bottom. Are we going to throw out our red ensign because it looks like the British merchant flag and accept a flag with the colours of the Russian naval flag? No; we are going to put up a big fight before we have to accept this.

I wonder why the Prime Minister fell for these colours. When we asked for the tabling of the correspondence referring to the flag we found this letter, which says that the communist party supports the proposal for a new Canadian flag. I will not read all this letter but it also says "We urge you to reject the proposal for a plebiscite." I am going to leave this thought with you today, fellow members in this chamber and fellow Canadians across this country. Think about these statements that have been put on the record today. If you doubt my word, get a flag book and take a look at that Russian naval flag. Then there is that communication. I am going to tell you today that if something is not done about this flag, if we are going to have this flag forced down our throats, then the next speech I make will be one in which I will put a lot more documents on the record and there will be some people with red faces before we are through.

Mr. Godin: After?

Mr. Smallwood: You did enough yapping yesterday. If you just sit on your seat and keep your brains warm you will be a lot better off. Nothing has split this country more than this flag issue. This process was started under the B and B commission, and now we have the flag issue to add to it. As stated by the hon. member for York-Humber earlier, there was no mention of the flag anywhere but in the province of Quebec. Out west we were offered $2 wheat, and I suppose in the maritimes they were offered a larger amount for fish or lumber. The people of Quebec resent the fact that they are being used as tools for political purposes. I have talked to many people from the province of Quebec. The French Canadians are fine people, and I have a great many friends amongst them. I have been through the province of Quebec, and when you get to the rural areas you find the farming people very friendly. They would like to see this government do something for them. They cannot eat a flag, but they could do with some assistance to agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture has not the legislation prepared yet, so we have to fight over this flag.

Only the other night several good French Canadians told me they were being embarrassed by the actions of these intellectuals, these Creditistes and the people who are speaking about the desire for this new flag. Quebec has a fleur-de-lis flag. Premier Lesage says this new flag will be their second flag.

An hon. Member: What about the third one?

Mr. Smallwood: Well, the Prime Minister will give them a third one, too.

Mr. Godin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. member tell the house where verification can be found for his statement about Premier Lesage? Was the statement made to him?

Mr. Smallwood: That is no question of privilege.

Mr. Skoreyko: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: We already have one question of privilege.

Mr. Smallwood: That is a phony point of order; he is usually yapping on these points of order.

Mr. Godin: This is a point of order. A member of this house is required to substantiate any declaration he has made by giving the source of that declaration.

Mr. Smallwood: If you had to substantiate your thoughts or declarations you would have a hard time, because you do not have any thoughts. I said I wanted to speak in support of the red ensign. I should like to place on record a portion of an open letter to the Prime Minister from Winnipeg:

Dear Sir:

Mr. Pearson, in his latest speech on the "Nation's Business", stressed two points: 1, the need for Canadian unity—2, the need for a "distinctive" Canadian flag.

Regarding the first point, i.e. the need for Canadian unity, everybody knows that the public controversy aroused to date by the introduction of Mr. Pearson's flag has reduced Canadian unity to the lowest ebb in our history.

Regarding the second point, i.e. the need for a "distinctive" Canadian flag, only Mr. Pearson seems to be unaware of the fact that we have in the red ensign one of the most distinctive flags in the world. Where it flies on Canadian embassies, no one fails to recognize it as Canadian. Only Mr. Pearson seems to doubt this. Yet Mr. Pearson's flag possesses no distinctiveness whatsoever, and can in no way be compared with our nation's flag, the Canadian red ensign.

I would say to hon. members here today that if they consider we do not have a distinctive flag they should go over to the front of the west block, walk up and down and look at the flags displayed there. They will see that the Canadian flag stands out from all the others that are there.

Dear Mr. Diefenbaker:

We have been greatly encouraged by your last pronouncement on the "Nation's Business" on television regarding the flag issue, and also by the news report that your party is continuing the fight for the red ensign.

The loss of the red ensign would cause a split in our nation such as we have never known before. This split added to the Pearson bicultural rift could spell the ruination of our future as a nation.

We believe that if the people of Canada fully understood the traditions represented by the symbols on the red ensign, they would overwhelmingly endorse its retention as our flag.

You and your party are our last hope for preserving unity. We, therefore, thank you for your continuing efforts on behalf of the great majority of Canadians.

These are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, for our support of this flag. There are more letters that I could read, but I see my time is nearly exhausted. I say, sir, this matter is becoming serious. Something must be done. The government got itself into this problem by trying to force the maple leaf flag on the Canadian people when they are not prepared to accept it. The next move is up to the Prime Minister. I am reminded of the old proverb which says he who is on the wrong track and will not turn back is a fool. I say to the government, you are on the wrong track and it is time you turned back and withdrew this resolution. You should accept the recommendation for a committee or a plebiscite or some means of letting the Canadian people choose the distinctive flag they want.

We hear a lot about our flag not being distinctive and not being known throughout the world, but I have a picture here of our soldiers over in France and the red ensign is flying as they march by. The time has come for the government to give very serious consideration to withdrawing the flag resolution. The Prime Minister will be looked upon across Canada with a great deal more respect than he is today if he does that, because people will know he has realized he made a mistake and is man enough to acknowledge it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would stand aside for the hon. member for Greenwood, who spoke to me about his wish to make reference to a sentence in somebody else's speech, which in my opinion he has the right to do under standing order 37, which says:

> No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood—

I understand he will be very brief, and that it is in the nature of a correction.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That is what I desire to do, to take brief advantage of the opportunity presented by standing order 37. Yesterday during the debate on this matter the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, as recorded at page 7304 of Hansard, made the following statement:

> I was also interested in the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) the other day. Everybody in the house knows he is a very active Anglican layman, and I say more power to him. But in his speech he disowned completely the red ensign and its historic traditions and connections with the Anglican church. He made absolutely no reference to it. I am not criticizing his stand but I think he should have tried to explain this change in his thinking.

[Mr. Smallwood.]

In the very brief contribution I did make to this debate a few days ago I did not disown the red ensign. In fact, on the contrary I specifically proposed that the red ensign be officially recognized as a symbol in Canada of the commonwealth. But what is a lot more important is the statement by the hon. member that I disowned the historic connection of the Anglican church with the red ensign.

So far as I know the Anglican church at no time has taken any stand whatsoever on what would be a suitable flag for Canada, and has no historic connection with the red ensign. There is no such thing as Anglican orthodoxy on this issue and the hon. member, as an Anglican, has just as much right to his view as I, another Anglican, have to disagree with him. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only one or two more sentences. I would like to remind hon. members in this house—

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order. This, I understand, is a point of privilege which the hon. member is raising?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, it is. Both the hon. member and I did not think it was important enough to raise right at the opening of the sitting, and I suggested to him that inasmuch as it concerned the flag debate he could ask the indulgence of the house for two or three minutes to correct what he believed was a misinterpretation of his statements.

Mr. Churchill: It seems a bit odd to me that rebuttal of statements made in the course of debate should be done by way of privilege on this occasion. Surely the hon. member can participate again and deal with any remarks made in the course of debate here by way of rebuttal. All he is doing now is smuggling in a rebuttal by way of a question of privilege. I think this is quite wrong. If it is to be the established practice of the house, then it is open to all members to do the same on any occasion when something is said with which they disagree. The hon. member should take his opportunity in the debate, and there will be other opportunities for him to make a rebuttal.

Mr. Speaker: The last part of standing order 37(1) says:

> —but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

I was interrupted for a moment, but I understood the hon. member was trying to explain a material part of his speech which may have been misconstrued or misunderstood, and I am sure if the hon. member would stick to that we would have no more trouble.

Mr. Brewin: I just have one or two more things to say, and that is what I was trying to do, to say I was misunderstood by the hon. member who said I had somehow or other abandoned Anglican tradition. I was about to finish my remarks by pointing out that the Anglican church of Canada itself, when it adopted its own flag or emblem, which I believe was approved by statute in this house, had incorporated in its emblem not one, not three, but in fact four maple leaves, coloured green, not red, and they were not conjoined. But there is no Anglican tradition that requires people of loyalty to the Anglican church to adopt any particular flag, and I deplore my hon. friend interjecting into this debate the reference to some supposed religious orthodoxy on the matter before the house.

The particular church we are both discussing has broadened out so that the old jibe is no longer true, that the Anglican church was the Tory party at prayer. I do not think we should have that suggestion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of order. The hon. gentleman knows very well that type of statement has no place whatsoever after he has participated in debate. While interested, as one of Baptist persuasion always is in questions of ecclesiastical orthodoxy, I do not think even that fact justifies what the hon. gentleman has done.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate because I believe the concern I feel is shared literally by millions of Canadians. My concern is for something more than the various flags we are discussing; my concern is for parliament itself.

I dearly wish it were possible for some kind of mirror to be installed so that all of us in this parliament could see what it looks like during the course of this debate. If we cannot do that at least I feel we should pay some attention to the reports we are getting from our people back home, the pleadings that are reaching us that we discipline ourselves to the point of reaching a decision on the matters that are now before us.

Canadian Flag

Last Saturday I had the privilege of spending the day in a lovely rural town in my own province of Manitoba. On that day I was not in my own constituency; I was in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns). It is an area that is Conservative. There was not any question amongst the people whom I met—and I met a good many at a social function—as to which flag they wanted. They wanted the red ensign.

But, Mr. Speaker, there was not a person present at the function I attended last Saturday in this Conservative red ensign area who did any flag waving or pressed upon me any ideas so far as the flag was concerned. Every person who spoke to me asked "What's wrong with parliament? What's wrong with you people down there that you talk on and on and on? Are you crazy? Have you got no sense, no discipline, no concern for what the people of the country think about parliament?"

My purpose in rising is to urge all of us in this house to take a very close look at ourselves and at what we are doing by this protracted debate, and by the character of the debate at times—people can read Hansard for this afternoon—to the institution of parliament itself. I plead with all my friends in the house in all parties, whatever may be their views on the flag, to realize that there is something more important than winning this debate, winning an issue, or seeing that one leader triumphs over the other. That more important goal is to maintain the dignity and the integrity and the importance of parliament itself. Hon. members know that I am a strong advocate of—

Mr. Bigg: Hairsplitting.

Mr. Knowles: —finding ways and means of disciplining ourselves so that we do not have protracted debates. That is so well known that I do not need to expand upon proposals I have made for the allocation of time by agreement. But hon. members also know it is my firm view that once a debate has started the rules cannot be changed in the middle of it; you cannot even use standing order 33, the rule for closure, without doing irreparable damage to parliament. And I say to hon. members, even to those who by continuing this debate are taking a course which I deplore, that if closure is imposed I will oppose it, because I think closure does damage to the institution of parliament. But I ask hon. members not to shelter behind the knowledge that closure will not be imposed, or behind the knowledge that enough of us will be opposed to the application of closure. I ask them not to continue with the kind of protracted debate which can do nothing but bring parliament into discredit and disgrace in the eyes of the Canadian people.

This is supposed to be the most important institution in Canada. This is where 19 million Canadians govern themselves.

Mr. Bigg: On a point of order, the hon. member is simply preaching at us.

Mr. Skoreyko: On a point of order, I understand that this house is engaged in a debate on a flag design. We are now being given just another superfluous lecture on the rules. We are well acquainted with the rules which govern this house. Let the hon. member tell us where he stands on the flag issue. That is the question before us.

Mr. Knowles: I ask anybody to read the speeches which have been made in this debate during the last few days and tell me what can possibly be out of order. Everything has been discussed. But the fact is that I am discussing this debate itself and I am asking hon. members to recognize that, important though they feel the subject is, there is something even more important, namely parliament itself.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is giving us what amounts to a lecture. We are supposed to be considering the flag issue, and here we have a lecture from this would-be schoolteacher who talks about a filibuster yet forgets that his own party filibustered for two years on the divorce issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has been generous in allowing a wide range of introductory remarks, and that applies to all members of the house in all parties. I do not see where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is out of order at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I do not resent the suggestion by the hon. member for Athabasca that I may be indulging in a little preaching. But if I am doing so, I am preaching to all of us in this house, no matter to what parties we belong or what stand we take on the flag issue. I am pleading that we recognize the importance of the institution as well as of the subject we are debating.

Mr. Bigg: Let the tailor tailor the cloth.

Mr. Knowles: I have done a little arithmetic to ascertain just what has been taking place in this debate. If my counting is accurate, and I believe it is, this is the sixteenth day of debate on the flag. During the 15 sitting days of debate which ended last night we had a total of 125 speakers. The breakdown—and the Prime Minister was asked a question about this on the orders of the day but he did not have the answers—is as follows: 3 from the Ralliement Créditiste; 7 from the Social Credit party; 5 from the New Democratic party; 28 from the Liberal party and 82 from the Conservative party.

Mr. Bigg: Just what part of the subamendment are you speaking on?

Mr. Knowles: Since the subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Regina City there have been 64 speeches. Until last night —I have not counted speeches made today— the breakdown is as follows: Social Credit, 4; New Democratic party, 2; Liberals, 7; Progressive Conservatives, 51.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles: This represents a fair amount of discussion on this issue; a total of 125 speakers, 82 in one party and 43 in all the others. But this is not all the time we have spent on this flag issue. On a total of 31 different days questions on orders of the day have been asked about the flag, and on a minimal basis the number of those questions is 145. In this figure I have not included second or third questions asked by any one member on the same day. In other words, all I have counted is the number of individuals who have stood on orders of the day to ask questions about the flag, whether one, two, three or whatever may have been the case.

Mr. Simpson: What was the breakdown there?

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry; I do not have the breakdown, but I will work that out as well. In addition, we have spent three private members' hours between five and six o'clock on matters relating to the flag. The flag question was also discussed in four of the overtime periods after ten o'clock or 10.30 p.m. Added to that, there were several points of order and questions of privilege involving the flag issue.

I suggest the evidence is overwhelming that we have thoroughly discussed this flag question from all its various angles, and that it ought to be possible for reasonable, grown people, after so much discussion, after so many days of deliberation, after all these attacks on the problem, to reach a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me we should consider the amount of time we are spending on this item in the light of our responsibility to the other measures which have to come before us. There is a long list of things on the order paper—

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member talks about other matters which should come before us. Why are they not before us? The government refuses to bring its legislation forward. It refuses to deal with the main estimates. It says "The flag issue, and nothing else".

Mr. Knowles: That is a good question to put to the government. I shall have something to say on that in a moment if the hon. gentleman will possess himself in patience. But I suggest that all of us have to take some responsibility. If we spend so much time on one issue, we are not able to get on to the others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: There is something else that is happening because we are spending so much time on this issue—and we spend time on all issues, apparently, in this parliament —and that is that we are abdicating our responsibilities as the elected parliament of Canada. There was an article about the establishment in the current issue of Maclean's magazine, by Peter Newman, that everybody is reading with interest. We are turning the government of Canada over to the establishment; we are getting rid of democracy by making parliament a sideshow that deals with things which are less important than the major issues that are before this country.

I plead with hon. members of this house to realize what we are doing, by the way in which we are carrying on this debate. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that any effort to impose any kind of closure on this debate will meet with my opposition. The rules for debate as they were when this debate started must remain until this debate is over. I ask hon. members not to confuse that with the efforts I am making regarding future debates; but I say that so far as this debate is concerned closure must not be applied to it. I plead with hon. members of the official opposition if they are not concerned about the image of the government, if they are not concerned about the fortunes of the party on the other side, to be concerned about the image of parliament itself.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: I should be very glad to.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the hon. member not agree that when the government or the executive pursues an arbitrary and a divisive course in its policy, the only recourse of the legislature is a continuation of discussion; and is this not the course that his party pursued in connection with divorce matters?

Mr. Knowles: Some members of my party pursued that course with respect to that matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. Don't get so excited; I didn't come to parliament yesterday. This whole party took that position with respect to the pipe line debate in 1956. As my hon. friend knows, what he has said is right in principle, and I will assert it; that if a government is trying to do something that members feel is completely inimical to everything the nation stands for—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: —yes, those who take that position should use what weapons they have at their disposal to try and prevent that happening. But I say two things to them. They must be sure they are right in the stand they take; and the other thing is that they must also remember there is such a thing as the right of a parliamentary body to make a decision.

My hon. friends of the Conservative opposition keep talking about the minority government ramming something down their throats. May I say to them that by their continuing this debate they are preventing a decision being taken; they are preventing our being given an opportunity to move an amendment for a single maple leaf, as they know we wish to do; they are preventing proper parliamentary procedures; they are preventing parliament from making a decision; they are preventing us from getting at other business; they are preventing us from running the country; they are turning things over to the establishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Now we see the plot.

Mr. Skoreyko: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat—

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry; I have not taken my seat.

Mr. Skoreyko: Well, I am on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: All right.

Mr. Skoreyko: The hon. member said that because this debate is being prolonged the government is being prevented from dealing with other business. It is my understanding, as it is his, that the Prime Minister of this country said that as soon as this debate was over we were going to take a recess. If the Conservative party prefers to put responsibility before recess, then we will stand the consequences.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I remind my hon. friend from Edmonton that the time for the recess has just about gone. May I also remind him that one day a week or so ago the Prime Minister, in response to questions we asked him, did agree that if we got this debate over during the time a recess was still supposed to come, he would bring on the pension legislation and let it go through the first stages so it could go to a committee before any recess. I submit that the argument that we are merely depriving ourselves of a recess no longer holds water; the recess time has gone and we all know there is not going to be any recess. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since we are here to do the business of the country, I think it is up to us to discipline ourselves so that we pay some attention to the business that really deserves our attention.

I want to say some things about this debate to the two main groups in this House of Commons. I am going to address myself first to the Progressive Conservative party and then I am going to address myself to the government.

Mr. Choquette: What about the Speaker?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) has made a very important objection.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, I think it might result in better progress in the house if we were to listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) without continued interruption.

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is obliged to address himself to the Speaker and not to the Liberals or the Conservatives.

[Mr. Skoreyko.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I quite enjoyed the interruption made by the hon. member for Lotbinière, who is technically correct. I was speaking in a rhetorical sense. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make certain suggestions to the members of the official opposition and then to the government and to its supporters. I trust the hon. member for Lotbinière will agree with my putting it that way.

Mr. Fane: That was his first lucid remark.

Mr. Knowles: First of all, Mr. Speaker—and I hope my Conservative friends will take this seriously, even if they do not like its coming from me—I believe they owe us in the house and they owe the country an honest, straightforward statement as to what their purposes and their intentions are in this debate.

Mr. Churchill: Well, Mr. Speaker, "honest" has an unfortunate imputation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) does not like my use of the word "honest", so I will take it out. I ask for a straightforward statement by the Conservatives of their intentions and purposes in this debate. Maybe there is some other intention than the two that occur to me, but it seems to me it is one or the other.

Mr. Bigg: What are yours?

Mr. Knowles: I am trying to get parliament back on the rails.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: One intention of the Conservative party in carrying on the debate at length—and the statistics I gave can hardly be denied—may be to discuss the matter thoroughly and fully, to bring up all the angles, to go into the matter from every possible aspect. That is a legitimate purpose. But if that is the purpose of the Conservatives, let them say so. If that is their purpose, they should be willing to agree to extended hours of sitting so there can be time for that full debate they feel to be necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: If that is their purpose, Mr. Speaker, I call upon them to say so and to take a position consistent with that purpose. On the other hand, if their purpose is to prolong the debate so as to prevent a decision being taken, I think they should say so, not only to us out in the halls—where they do say it to us—but here on the floor of the house.

If it is their intention to keep this debate going through all of September and into October; if it is their intention to keep it going until we get to the next interim supply time and thus force the government either to suspend the flag debate or to ditch it, I think they should say so.

If they have a purpose other than these two, then that is for them to say. But for us to go on from day to day and for parliament and the country not to know what this chamber is being used for is not fair to parliament, is not fair to the country and is not fair to the great history of this nation. I call upon them to tell us which of these purposes they are pursuing.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The ensign is part of that history.

Mr. Knowles: Is their purpose full and free debate? If so, we will co-operate in providing the extra hours to make this possible. But if it is to prevent a decision, let them say so, in order that the house may know where it is and what it has to cope with.

Now through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to say something to the government. If it is declared to be the purpose of the official opposition to have full and free debate, and if that is straightforwardly their position, I think the government should co-operate by providing the extra hours so that we can take a full decision. The government should make the declaration, in addition, that there will be no closure or any attempt to foreclose this debate.

Mr. Forbes: We have already seen through that.

Mr. Knowles: There is nothing to be seen through. I am speaking frankly and openly, and it is plain to be seen if hon. members will look at it.

Mr. Churchill: We are on extended hours now.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) says we have extended hours now, and that is right. But if the purpose is simply to have a free debate in order for us at some point to get to other matters, I suggest that we should be willing to extend the hours still further. We in this party are prepared to do that and I hope there might be the necessary consent to make it possible.

If the other reason for continuing this debate is the true purpose—if the aim is to prevent the making of a decision and that is made clear by the Conservatives—then I suggest it is up to the government to face that situation and to try to decide what to do about it.

I have three suggestions to make to the government. I have already made the first one but let me put it in different language. I suggest that the government should be prepared to sit it out. By that I mean that the government must eschew—I was accused of being a preacher so perhaps I can use that word—any thought of closure in any form. It must sit this debate out.

The second suggestion I make to the government is that it must keep the door open for any kind of conference which will resolve the issue. The last time the Prime Minister made a statement on the meetings of the party leaders he did say something to that effect at the end of his remarks—that the door would still be open. I plead that that door be kept wide open and that at any time when it is possible a conference should be held, either on the debate itself or on the design of a flag. It seems to me that referring the matter to a committee—unless all five men get together and agree on it—is just delaying the issue. If there is any chance of the five leaders getting together on some kind of compromise on the design, I hope that such a conference might be held at any time.

The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) who spoke earlier this afternoon asked me whether I was having any correspondence with the Legion in Winnipeg with regard to my position on this flag. Yes, I have had correspondence with the Legion officials in Winnipeg. It is the kind of correspondence which goes back and forth between people who, if they have different views, still respect each other. If I had known that that reference was going to be made I would have brought down with me the last letter I had from the Legion. There was one sentence in the last letter which I had from the Legion in Winnipeg which struck me rather forcibly. The writer of the letter, who was one of the officials of the Legion in Winnipeg, said to me—this was when he thought the issue was just about over—"It is too bad there could not have been some kind of compromise". I congratulate the Legion wholeheartedly for that position. I think it is wrong to suggest that the Legion is an uncompromising organization. In the Legion's own language is the comment that it is too bad there has not been a compromise. I urge the government to keep the door open for a conference at any time, either between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition or among the five party leaders, so as to achieve some kind of compromise which will produce a design. Toward that end, despite what has been said here, I am not concerning myself in these remarks with the design of the flag, because I do not think that is as important as finding a way to resolve the issue and thus save the good name of parliament.

There is one other suggestion I would make to the government, and I make it in as pleading terms as I possibly can. All of this is based on the second premise that the Conservative party will tell us that its purpose is to prevent action being taken. If that is the case then I urge the government not only to sit it out with no thought of closure, keeping the door open for conferences to take place, but also to arrange that from now on the flag debate take place on only three days a week. I should like to point out that I am trying to be reasonable and I am suggesting a practical proposition. I therefore propose that from now on we have one day a week on estimates, as is now the case, three days a week on the flag, and the other day, which I suggest be Monday, on other legislation. There is the Canada pension plan.

Mr. Forbes: It is not ready.

Mr. Knowles: There is redistribution. There is the railway legislation and there is the Bank Act. There is all kinds of other legislation. My hon. friend says it is not ready, but I urge the government to get it ready. The government did say a week or so ago that if this debate is over before the proposed recess we might have the pension plan. Let us get at that, and also at the national labour code. These matters have been promised since the start of the session and the list is a long one.

I believe that if there is no option but to sit out a long debate on this issue, with the resultant damage which I feel is being done to parliament in the eyes of the people, we could correct that image considerably and improve our position a great deal if each week while this debate continues we spend one day on estimates and one day on these other important items of legislation. Then if hon. members knew that the session was being planned in that way there would be no temptation to protract the debate on other legislation on Mondays or to protract the debate on the estimates on Fridays. In this way we could start to redeem ourselves and get some business through and make things look a lot better than they do now.

I do not mind the interjections and the points of order which have been raised during the course of my speech; a speech like this is bound to invite the kind of comments I have heard because I have been treading on toes. But I hope I have been treading on toes of members on both sides of the house. I understand the position of a government faced with a protracted debate—and I am not using that awful word that people do not like to hear—which is spelled out by the statistics I have given. Even if the government feels this is wrong and that it is being dealt with unfairly by the opposition, it is still the government. It is still responsible for parliament and it is still responsible to the people of the country for this institution, and it should lean over backwards to take the kind of steps which will make this parliament look much better than it has looked over these past three or four months when discussing this issue. The best way to do that is for everyone to agree to let the debate end and get on with other business. If we cannot do that, then I call on the government to accept the proposal which I have made and to limit the flag debate to three days a week, with one day on other legislation and one day on estimates. If we do this kind of thing and hold conferences among the house leaders regarding business, conferences on redistribution and on the Canada pension plan, and leaders' conferences on the flag, because we are reasonable and grown up people, I believe can do something to save this institution and make this present parliament, not one which will look bad in Canadian history but one which might yet be regarded as one of the better parliaments in the history of this country.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: I would be delighted.

Mr. Churchill: Does the hon. member not see that there is a principle involved in the flag debate, the principle being the preservation of our history and traditions, as exemplified in the Canadian flag which some people are anxious to discard?

Mr. Knowles: I think a much greater principle is involved. I do not find fault with those who feel as they do about certain designs for a flag, but I feel that the institution of parliamentary democracy is far more important, and it is that which we should primarily aim to save.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also agree that there is a further principle involved? We have heard a great deal from the official opposition in respect of a free vote. Would the hon. member not agree that hon. members should be allowed a free vote, and that this issue should be allowed to come to a vote?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I believe I answered that question earlier in my remarks. I think that parliament should, after a reasonable amount of discussion, have the opportunity of making a decision. I also think that some of the rest of us should have an opportunity to put our proposals before this house. Technically speaking, although the debate has wandered all over the place, we have been debating since June 15 a Conservative amendment and a Conservative subamendment. We would like a chance to debate a New Democratic party amendment to the main motion.

Mr. Churchill: At what length?

Mr. Knowles: For a reasonable length of time. I think one or two days would be sufficient.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit one more question? Does he not realize that the proceedings of this house, as well as the legislation that is brought before it, is the responsibility of the Prime Minister, and that when such legislation bogs down it could be completed almost immediately if the Prime Minister would allow this matter to be referred to a committee?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I accept the point made by the hon. member for Wellington South, that the responsibility for organizing the business of the house and for what happens in the house rests with the government. That is why I made my appeal to the government, that being faced with these difficulties in respect of this subject it ought not require parliament to spend all week on it. I think the committee idea is a possible one, but apparently the five leaders cannot agree on the terms of reference and the various arrangements. That is why I called upon the Prime Minister and the government to keep the door open for conferences of this kind.

If my hon. friend feels I have directed most of my fire against those who have kept this debate going, perhaps he is right; but I have also called upon the government, in spite of the feeling it may have that it is facing difficulties, and facing the kind of position it ought not to have to face, to realize that it is still the government's responsibility to find a way out of this mess. I believe if the government accepted my proposal, that one day a week be used for legislation, one day a week for estimates and three days a week for the flag debate, with the absolute understanding that there would be no closure of any kind, we would get along much better. Perhaps it would not be long under those circumstances before we could reach an agreement on a proper modus operandi.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman not think in fairness to the Prime Minister he should have reminded the hon. member for Wellington South that the Prime Minister indicated he and the leaders of the three smaller parties were agreeable to forming a committee; if there was a reasonable time limit on its deliberations?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked that question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am speaking to a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Has the right hon. gentleman not already spoken?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am rising on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have not already spoken.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope these remarks will be counted as his speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I advise the hon. gentleman that his summary is entirely incorrect. As far as the suggestion made by the other hon. gentleman, that his plan would be one that could be acceptable, I rise also to say that we will fall in line with that 100 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman replies, and since this discussion is being treated as a question of privilege, and my accuracy has been contested, I point out that when the Prime Minister gave his report, the leaders of the three smaller parties spoke, and the right hon. gentleman spoke. At the end of that statement the Prime Minister indicated that he had accepted the principle of establishing a committee, if there was a reasonable time limit placed on its deliberation. The right hon. gentleman himself confirmed what the Prime Minister had said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that Hansard will reveal the situation more clearly. There were two points made. I took the stand with respect to such a committee, that in view of the fact that the Liberal party has its major ally in the Creditistes, who are 100 per cent in support of removing the union jack, and that with two or three exceptions the general view held by the members of each of the other parties was that the union jack should be removed, while this party stands in favour of preservation of that part of our heritage and the heritage as well of the French, if the majority of that committee was to make a decision, the decision would be made before the committee started, on the basis of the representation on such a committee. If the decision was to be based on an 80 or 90 per cent basis, and that is the only way in which a flag should be imposed on the people, we would gladly accept that suggestion. That is our stand now. However, to say that whatever report the committee brought in and if it was only a majority decision, the debate should be limited, would mean that we are beaten in advance in respect of the stand we are taking.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, since my veracity has been questioned I feel I should put on record again the words used by the Prime Minister on August 21, which will be found at page 7113 of Hansard. The Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am in order, but I did not make any statement except on the facts of what occurred at the meetings. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition—and I am not complaining at all about it—referred to the suggestion that a committee should be established to look into this question. I think I ought to put on record that we on this side are not opposed to such a committee, but we do not think such a committee should meet for an indefinite period of time and thereby unduly delay this matter. In addition, we believe that the report of this committee should be subject to a time limitation of debate when it is received by the house.

In other words it is perfectly clear that the government as well as the leaders of the other three parties—quite a substantial majority of this house—were in favour of having a committee with a time limit, and a time limit on the debate afterwards. The right hon. gentleman uses words seeking to distort what was said, but he will not be able to distort the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to engage in an argument with the hon. gentleman, but when it comes to distortion, he is the past grand master.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not even in the same league.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right, you are in the bush league.

Mr. Speaker, the point I am making is this. There were two principles advanced in respect of the establishment of a committee. We believe that a committee could meet and consider this matter. I said three months should be the period beyond which a committee should not meet. The Prime Minister, as I recall, and I am speaking from memory, said that he thought three weeks, or thereabouts, would be sufficient. I said they should have a free vote, and then if the recommendation made by that committee was substantially unanimous there could be no question as to whether we would agree to a limitation on debate in respect of that committee's report. The view of the other leaders generally was that the usual rule should apply and that a majority should be sufficient. If we accept that and allow the 15 members of that committee to decide the issue we might just as well not have a committee at all, because it would consist of seven Liberals and one representative of each of the other parties. If only one of those members, perhaps the Creditiste member whose party is entirely united, were to decide in favour of removing the union jack and having no vestige of the union jack in the flag, then the committee would simply end there and then. When the matter came back to the house under those circumstances, we would not accept this recommendation. However, if it were substantially unanimous, there would certainly be a limitation and we would be glad to accept a limitation on the basis of a decision of a committee like that.

Mr. Knowles: I rise simply to refer to the question the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) asked me, and which started this last bit of demonstration. He asked me if I would make certain remarks about the position of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). I thought I had implied that in what I said, and if I did not imply it, then it has now been put on the record.

There is nothing more for me to put on the record with regard to that, but I should like to say that we have had a demonstration in the last few minutes of what we all know to be a fact, namely that we are at an impasse; horns are locked and we are in a difficult situation. In the name of all that is right in terms of parliamentary procedure, in the name of the people of Canada, I plead that we find a way out of this. Others have made suggestions, and I made some this afternoon which I hope will be taken seriously by the Prime Minister and by others, despite what has been said.

If I might summarize them quickly, I ask the members of the official opposition to state clearly their intentions; then I ask the government to take these intentions into consideration. If it is the second intention, namely to go on at length, then I urge the government to do three things: One, sit it out without any resort to closure of any kind; two, keep the door open for conferences and compromises; three, plan the week's business in the way I suggested, one day on other legislation, three days on the flag and a day on estimates. I believe if we did this we might start to make some progress.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Accepted here and now; it is up to the government.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I listened with amazement, as I am sure many other members did, to the lecture we just received from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Of all the people who should be lecturing the house about taking up the time of parliament, he should be the last. I should like to draw attention to the fact that in the 1952-53 session he took up one third of Hansard. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that when an hon. member gets up to speak in this fashion he should practise what he preaches. I should like also to draw your attention to the index from February 18 to July 31 in which you will find there are three full pages given to headings under the name of Mr. Stanley Knowles. The hon. member said that when he was referring to members taking a long time he might be stepping on people's toes, but I suggest instead of that he is stumbling over his own toes. In other words, he is asking for a double standard, one for himself and one for the other members of the house.

Now, Mr. Speaker, had I been given the opportunity to conclude my remarks the last time I spoke on this issue it would not have been necessary for me to take part in the debate at this stage. However, since no one on the treasury benches has replied to the questions I put to them concerning the new flag, and since no satisfactory explanation has been given to the country as to why we should be seeking to scrap our present proud flag, I feel these questions should be placed on the record again. I feel this very strongly, particularly since there has been little or no attempt on the part of government members to justify their stand on the flag. They show no great concern for the effect that the proposed political flag is having on our national unity. I should like also to look into the matter of the so-called free vote that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) now says will be taken on any division on the flag issue. I think one of his supporters, the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) expressed it very well when he said a resolution proposed by the Prime Minister and seconded by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) could not be considered other than a government measure, that it would be regarded as such during any vote that would be taken by his colleagues on the government side. The only way in which a free vote could have been achieved would have been for the Prime Minister to ask one of his private members to introduce the resolution. Had this procedure been followed, I am quite sure the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), who is a co-designer of the Prime Minister's pennant, would have welcomed the opportunity. He may have had some reservations because he is reported to have expressed some doubts as to its proper heraldry. I am sorry the hon. member is not in the house this afternoon—he was earlier—but I am equally sure the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) would have been glad to act as seconder. His great contribution to the flag debate has been recorded in Hansard by a series of, "Oh, oh's".

Now, the little matter of heraldry does not seem to bother the designer commissioned by the Prime Minister to design a flag for him. He is reported also in the press as saying that anyone who did not like the blue edges could cut them off. It does not seem to bother the Prime Minister because, in answer to a question he said Canadians could fly any flag they like. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it probably would be much more appropriate if the government were to give to each Canadian a new flagpole rather than a new flag.

While the matter of the flag that Canadians may fly is not too important to some people, I find that the majority of the people with whom I have talked or corresponded have a deep regard for our present national flag. This is particularly true of those who suffered the deprivations, illness, the humility and degradation of the prisoner of war camps. During a recent visit to my home constituency I talked to a Hong Kong veteran who had spent a long period in the prisoner of war compound on the island. He said he will never forget, nor will the Canadians with him ever forget, the day when the red ensign was once more raised on the flagpole over the prisoner of war compound. He said they knew on that day that freedom had come to them once again, and that peace and justice again walked hand in hand across the land once more.

I have with me a couple of typical telegrams which I have received from my local Legions. I think a lot of hon. members have received similar telegrams. One of these was sent to myself and the other is a copy of one sent to the Prime Minister. I believe that the Legions, their families and friends are, generally speaking, wholeheartedly in favour of retaining our present flag, and this is what the first telegram says:

> The Crystal City Legion have not changed their stand on regards red ensign and expect your full support.

The other telegram sent to the Prime Minister, with a copy to myself, says:

> It is the desire of the Canadian Legion branch No. 21 Manitou, Manitoba, that the red ensign be the national flag of Canada.

If a flag is to have any meaning it must symbolize first of all the people's pride in the nation's past achievements. It must symbolize their love of country at the present and their hopes and aspirations for its future. The part now so recklessly being played by the government with regard to our national unity will foster bitterness and division at the time harmony is so urgently required within the nation itself. Harmony is needed, not so much because we have to face any insurmountable problem but because we have lowered our eyes from the horizon of future greatness to quarrel and oppose each other over the picayune issues of the present.

In this regard I would like to read a news item from the Ottawa Citizen, reporting an interview with a visiting member of parliament from Britain, who discussed this very aspect of Canadian life. The article's heading is, "U.K. M.P. says petty issues hurt Canada," and it reads:

> Sir Edwin Leather, a Canadian born member of the British house of commons for 15 years, said Wednesday Canada faces a frightening domestic problem.
> [Mr. Muir (Lisgar).]
> The Conservative M.P., born in Hamilton, said the problem is that Canada has no really serious problems and petty issues thus are debated by government officials.
> "The most worrisome part of it is the contempt many Canadians are expressing against their government," he said in an interview.
> "And with the (French Canadian) separatist movement making itself heard, petty issues could tear the country apart because no one cares enough to do anything about it."

The Prime Minister by introducing the flag issue into the political affairs of the country at this time is contributing to that image of bitterness that the hon. gentleman mentioned, and is only adding fuel to the heat already engendered by other elements not too interested in national unity. His own members are taking little part in the debate, except to heckle as though it is of no consequence. They are accusing the opposition of a filibuster and in this way they hope to convince the Canadian people that we are wasting parliament's time. They also hope by these tactics to win the debate by default. Let me assure them here and now, and I am quite sure they will get this assurance from other members in this party, that they are not going to win anything this way. The Prime Minister has got them into the mess and he had better start looking for ways to get them out.

Now I have something to say in regard to a filibuster. The Winnipeg Tribune in an editorial in its issue of Friday, August 21, had this to say about the filibuster:

> Filibuster of Silence.
> The word "filibuster" may acquire a new political connotation before the flag issue is resolved. The Prime Minister used the word in the house August 4 to describe the tactics of the opposition, and it has been employed with increasing frequency by those in sympathy with his desperate plight in parliament.
> Oxford defines the word as meaning obstructionist. Mr. Pearson apparently intends it to mean "refusal to enter a debate." Hansard confirms this for there is no debate taking place.
> Some eloquent and profound speeches have been made by members of the opposition but the government benches remain silent except for occasional hoots.
> Nick Mandziuk (P.C.—Marquette) succinctly defined the parliamentary situation on August 12. In reply to an interjection he said:
> "A filibuster of silence."
> The opposition has offered the government many pertinent observations, has requested answers to perplexing questions, has invited participation in resolving sensitive problems, and has explored national unity, national history, and national purpose.
> But the government supporters refuse to discuss any of these subjects. As an historical episode it will make sad reading for the Canadians of tomorrow when they learn how a government attempted to convert parliament into a flag-making factory.
> The opposition's speeches at least will serve as a valuable record on what thoughtful politicians had to say about the state of our country in 1964. There will scarcely be a word of what government supporters thought for all Hansard has to record about them is: "Some MEMBERS—Oh, oh. Some MEMBERS—Filibuster."

A chill stubborn phalanx of inarticulate politicians is rallied around their filibuster flag and that's how history is made.

Yet we are talking about a debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) described this as being a debate. Where are the members of his group who have entered this debate? Where are the members of the government who have entered this debate? Where are the members of the other little parties who have entered this debate? Have they no idea of what their constituents want in regard to a flag? Have they no thoughts about what the country needs to resolve our unity between the two great founding nations? They have no ideas at all, Mr. Speaker. At least, if they have they are not expressing them.

As a matter of interest I would like to mention one more thing in regard to the so-called filibuster. The Prime Minister, in the last revised version of items he wanted dealt with before calling a summer recess, listed six items. Five have been dealt with and we are now on the sixth, the flag issue. The official opposition feels it is important enough to forgo the holidays in order that this whole issue will be settled in a democratic manner.

It has even been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) that the government bring forward other important legislation so that we can deal with that also. Yesterday he suggested that the farm loans legislation be brought forward, but we found in answer to that question that it was not ready, and there is a growing suspicion among opposition members that the government's other legislation is not ready either, and that in order to play for time its members sit there twiddling their thumbs in a filibuster of silence.

The Prime Minister and some of his colleagues seems to feel that the election promise made with regard to the flag supersedes all their other promises made at that time, despite the fact that it was conspicuous by its absence from the Liberal campaign literature, as the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) has pointed out. It certainly does not appear in the literature which was sent me by the Liberal candidate in my riding. I have a copy here. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, it is about 2 feet long by 6 inches wide. There is fine print on both sides and it is full of promises to the Canadian people. In all this fine print there is no mention of a new flag. It is not my intention to put any of these unfulfilled promises on record because I dislike having my speech cluttered up with trash—and no other name can be used to describe what is apparently nothing but Liberal propaganda.

The Liberal candidate in my riding was really kind. He sent me another pamphlet called "Prosperity and the Farmer". These two pamphlets are published by the national Liberal federation. If any member wants to get copies, the address is 251 Cooper street, Ottawa. Just reading this pamphlet would make any farmer full of anticipation. His mouth would water. However the farmers are still waiting for these promises to be fulfilled. Do you know something: There is nothing about a flag here. It did not offer the farmers a new flag.

An hon. Member: Wrong part of the country.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Incidentally it might be interesting to recall an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on August 13 under the name of Mr. Bruce West. This is what he had to say:

Have you noticed how well those new banners are holding up on the radio antennas of those brave souls who are leading the way in our trek out of the valley of colonial humiliation? What the Toronto soot and rain are doing to these pennants shouldn't happen to a proposed flag for Lower Slobovia. Even their most ardent supporters must be wondering a bit about these bedraggled banners which were recently rushed on to the market by some patriot with a fast eye for a buck. After only a few weeks in the breeze, they make a sorry comparison with the historic flag which has been flying in this country for the better part of a century. There's just something about a wet maple leaf on a tattle-tale grey background which fails to stir the pulse, and surely the designers of the proposed new flag must recognize this fact.

I see my time is running out and I must curtail what I had intended to say. The article goes on:

However, perhaps I and many other hundreds of thousands or millions of people in this country are wrong, as we have been told so often in rather rude and testy terms. If this is so, I would like to see it proved in a nation-wide referendum.

We are constantly being told that such a vote would cause widespread dissension in this country. What, pray, do we have now? It is hardly unity.

I am sure that many of us who now oppose the scrapping of our present proud flag now be willing to shut up and bow to the will of the majority if a referendum indicated that a new flag were desired by this country.

It might be painful, but not nearly so painful as the prospect of having this flag foisted upon us by a government which really gives its members no other choice but that of voting for the adoption of a new standard.

Now I should like to make a reasonable suggestion to the Prime Minister. I should like to suggest to him that he withdraw the flag resolution until such time as a Canadian government gets a clear mandate from the people on this issue either through a plebiscite or at the next general election. He himself has stated that the people would let him know the answer in no uncertain terms. Let the people give their answer first, before we start messing around with our flag. Unless the right hon. gentleman is prepared to do so he is destroying by a pressed vote what is in reality the very basis of our democratic process. We are not just an emerging nation which would expect a jungle leader to tell us just what flag we must have. We have many years of history behind us, and no flag chosen in such a manner could be considered acceptable to a highly developed, proud and civilized people. By pressing the flag issue to a conclusion, the Prime Minister is scuttling his own legislative program and, in the process, weakening the image of parliament. If our national symbols are to be chosen in this manner, without seeking majority opinion or without at least a willingness to compromise, a strain is being put on our national unity at a time when the utmost good will is needed on the part of every Canadian to ensure that we continue to develop as a nation under the pact created between the two great founding races and adhered to ever since confederation.

I have asked the Prime Minister to drop this issue in the interest of national unity until such time as the Canadian people have an opportunity to express their views either through a plebiscite or at the next general election. We all know where the Prime Minister stands on the flag question. He has made his views known, and he is adhering to them; otherwise the issue would have been withdrawn from the political arena long ago. But we have not heard much from the other hon. gentlemen on the front benches opposite. Mr. Charles Lynch says the Prime Minister's position is weakening in this regard. It would be interesting therefore if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), for example, were to give us the benefit of his views on this matter. Is he to be the only one in Newfoundland who will be flying this new flag?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member like an answer to that question now?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): No, after I have finished.

[Mr. Muir (Lisgar).]

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be delighted to give my views by voting if I were allowed to do so.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Then there is the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin)—

An hon. Member: That was a good long speech, Jack.

Mr. Moreau: Your members shouted him down.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): —representing a constituency where a recent survey showed 80 per cent in favour of the red ensign.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Scott: On a point of order. Yesterday, the Prime Minister, discussing the importance of the flag debate, told us it was the most important matter for decision before parliament and that it should take priority over such things as the Canada pension plan and all the other items on the order paper. If it is so important—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Scott: —I suggest it should take precedence over private members' hour, which is concerned with nothing but bills for the Bell Telephone Company and things of that sort.

Mr. Peters: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Peters: Let Bill S-27 stand at the request of the opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Unanimous consent must be given to the standing of this bill, this being an order of the house.

Mr. MacNaught: There is no agreement that Bill No. S-27 should stand.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, August 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-27, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Brown—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Number of directors.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, this special bill referring to the Bell Telephone Company of Canada has attracted my attention because of comments that I made in this house in December of 1962 and again in 1964 with regard to the contract between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. Before I make any comments on a matter affecting the Bell Telephone Company I would like to point out that there is no conflict of interest on my part. I am one of the 222 subscribers to the Tiny township municipal telephone system, and since it is a municipal telephone system the taxpayers of Tiny are the owners of the telephone system. We have no plans to sell the system to any other competitor, and as far as I know we have not been approached to make such a sale in order that they may affiliate their services with our very satisfactory arrangements in the township of Tiny.

This telephone system up on the shores of Georgian bay has approximately 200 French Canadian subscribers who are permanent residents of Lafontaine and the township of Tiny, and about 25 English speaking Canadians who are cottage owners in the district. I wish to declare my interest in a telephone company at this point so no one will accuse me of a conflict of interest.

I mentioned in 1962 that the president of the Canadian Pacific railroad and the president of the Canadian National railroad had written a joint letter to the minister of transport of the day, Hon. Léon Balcer, after they had lost a contract which they had held jointly for 30 years with the C.B.C. In the course of a letter to Hon. Léon Balcer it was pointed out that for three different ten year periods the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. together had rendered service in the transmission of sound to the 195 radio stations throughout Canada. In 1962 the C.B.C. called for tenders for this service and the C.N.R. and the C.P.R., two of the most efficiently operated organizations in the Dominion of Canada—and I would even go further and say two of the most efficiently operated organizations in the world—put in a normal tender based on their 30 years of experience.

You can well imagine, Mr. Speaker, their surprise when they were advised some time later that the contract had gone to a competitive system which was able to quote a price 25 per cent lower. It does seem to me that if there is an organization that can operate a business profitably at 25 per cent lower rates than the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. railroads, after their 30 years of experience in this particular field, we should turn the operations of the C.N.R. railroad over to that organization and probably they could cut the expenses of the C.N.R. by 25 per cent. However, the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. did not look at it in this manner. They wrote a letter to Hon. Léon Balcer pointing out that it was fair to the communications industry in Canada to have a competitor in the field who was able to put in a very low tender for this service and secure very high rates in other fields by representations to other boards or commissions throughout the dominion. The letter, signed jointly by Mr. Emerson on behalf of Mr. Crump, president of C.P.R., and by Mr. Donald Gordon, concluded by stating:

> Public long distance telephone rates in Canada are 50 per cent or more above comparable rates in the United States which are regulated by the federal communications commission.

I was appointed a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines this session and we had before us this original application for examination. Some very interesting news came out of the discussions we had.

The Chairman: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I wonder if he would indicate, for the benefit of the Chair, how the remarks he has made up to this time and which obviously he intends to make are related to clause 1 of the bill now before the committee. As the hon. member knows, discussion in committee should be strictly relevant to the subject matter before us, and it is not too clear to the Chair how these remarks relate to clause 1 of this bill.

Mr. Cowan: Sir, is clause 1 the title of the bill?

The Chairman: No. The committee is discussing clause 1.

Mr. Cowan: I thought we were on the title of the bill.

Mr. Peters: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will look at Bill No. S-27, you will see it is an act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. However, it is not only an act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada but is an amendment to a previous act which established by incorporation the Bell Telephone Company in the year 1880 by Bill No. C-67. I suggest that the hon. member is in order in making these remarks on clause 1. This bill is an amendment of a previous act that has been, as the chairman will note, amended on at least a dozen occasions over a period of years. This bill is an amendment to the Bell Telephone act. The hon. member is speaking to the general matter of the Bell Telephone Company and is therefore speaking, in effect, to the act that is being amended by this particular bill. I suggest the hon. member is in order.

The Chairman: I am afraid I cannot agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member. As he knows, I am sure, an amending bill does not, automatically, necessarily reopen the discussion on the original act that is being amended by the new bill. The hon. member on this occasion and, if I remember correctly, on a previous occasion suggested that because there is a reference in the marginal note to previous legislation, all that previous legislation is being re-opened by the bill that we have before us. Certainly there is nothing in the standing orders of the House of Commons that says that when we are discussing in committee a specific clause of a specific bill, the discussion can include the principle or the details of the act which is being amended. There are, of course, precedents to support the position adopted by the Chair. We had a very general discussion of this matter when we were on second reading before we reached the committee stage. But certainly at this stage we should limit our discussion to what is before the committee. That is the requirement of our standing orders.

Mr. Cowan: I had read this Senate Bill S-27 several times, Mr. Chairman, and I was of the opinion, and still am—I did not have it before me when you questioned me—that there was only one clause in the bill. Clause 1 says, you will notice:

1. Section 8 of chapter 67 of the statutes of 1880 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Colon. Then there are these words:

8. The business of the company...

And so on. I take it, therefore, there is only one clause in this whole bill. Am I incorrect, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Of course not; there is only one clause, but the clause deals with the increase in the maximum number of directors from 15 to 20. That is what this committee is asked to approve. As I said, on second reading there was very general discussion about the operations of the Bell Telephone Company. It was the feeling of the Chair at the time that we should allow a general discussion, but at this stage my suggestion to all hon. members is that the discussion should be limited to the specific matter before the committee.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Cowan: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I remember that during the discussion of this bill before the house the hon. member for Timiskaming asked in rather forthright terms: What is the need for increasing the number of directors from 15 to 20? I hope to be able to show that they need to increase the number of directors from 15 to 20 in order to be able to divide the profits faster. It takes them a little longer with only 15 men dividing them than it would with 20 working at it. That is the reason I rise to make a few comments on this matter.

I was pointing out when I was interrupted, that the public long distance telephone rates in Canada are 50 per cent or more above comparable rates in the United States. That is the flat statement of the president of the C.P.R. and the president of the C.N.R. Before the railways, canals and telegraph lines committee of this house I made some inquiries of Marcel Vincent, president, P. C. Venne, Q.C., vice president and R. C. Scrivener, vice president, with regard to the operation of their organization. One of the things in which I was interested was a statement which was made under examination by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) concerning the increased rates for local telephone service. We were told in the evidence given before the committee by the speakers on behalf of the Bell Telephone Company that when the number of telephones in a local service increases, the rate goes up. This was a rather surprising statement because many of us have had the idea that the rate is usually reduced for bulk purchases—that volume reduces the rate. Evidently the Bell Telephone Company does not work in that way, because as we were questioning their representatives it came out that the rate was raised locally as the number of telephones increased. Then I asked the question, reported at page 429 of the report:

The more telephones there are, the higher the rate?

Then the vice president of the Bell Telephone, Mr. Scrivener, gave this answer:

The higher the cost of providing the service and the greater value of the service.

That would show that as the number of telephones goes up the cost of the service also goes up.

A little further on in the proceedings I quoted this statement of Mr. Crump and Mr. Gordon to the representatives of the Bell Telephone Company, and I asked them whether they did not go before the board of transport commissioners and argue that because of the relatively limited number of telephones in Canada they had to have higher rates for long distance calls. Then this answer was given by the president of the Bell Telephone as reported at page 430 of the report:

> Whether the percentage is correct or not, the fact is that the rates are higher in Canada than they are in the United States. The development is not comparable at all; we have a very scattered population from one ocean to another.

The Bell operates in Quebec and Ontario; but they refer to the scattered population from one ocean to another, even though the population they serve is more or less concentrated in Ontario and Quebec.

When questioned as to why the rates were 50 per cent higher Mr. Scrivener replied:

> Because of the development in Canada, sure.

You thus have it that the local rates are raised because of the increased number of telephones; the long distance rates are high because of the very small number of telephones. If you ever saw a monopoly operating to perfection, Mr. Chairman, I would say that this is the perfect example.

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid I must interrupt the hon. member again. I have been listening to him in the hope that he would relate his remarks to the clause before the committee at the moment, but I must remind him of standing order 59(2) which says:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

What the hon. member is doing now is referring to the operations of this company, which to my mind is quite far removed from the subject matter we are required to discuss, namely the increase from 15 to 20 in the number of directors in the Bell Telephone Company. I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to the specific point.

Mr. Clancy: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that the hon. member is talking about something concerned with the expenditure of the taxpayers' money, which is always our concern in this house. Whether the company concerned be Bell or Saskatchewan Telephones does not matter; we are talking about spending the Canadian taxpayers' money and I think this is relevant.

Mr. Cowan: Perhaps I might develop my remarks and show the committee how busy the directors of the Bell Telephone Company are with all their multifarious activities, including the operation of Northern Electric Company. Perhaps it will then become apparent to the committee how vital it is that there be an increase in the number of directors in order to look after the multitude of duties they have imposed upon themselves—in the opinions of many, quite unnecessarily.

I thought when I mentioned that the rates are increased locally because the number of telephones increases, and that the long distance rates are increased because the number of telephones is limited that you would be interested in a statement accompanying the shareholders quarterly review of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, summer 1964 issue, in which the subscribers are given comparative rates to show how the rates have dropped for three minute daytime station to station calls from Montreal to Vancouver. In 1949 it cost $7 for a three minute daytime station to station call Montreal to Vancouver, and in 1964 it costs $3. This is a tremendous reduction, from $7 to $3, in a matter of 25 years. I am not too sure whether this is because of the tremendous increase in the number of telephones in Montreal and Vancouver—because we are told that it is because of the increased number of telephones that the rates go up—or whether it is because of a decrease in the number of telephones. The Bell has already told us that where telephones are scattered the cost must be high to cover the costs. They have explained some of the reduction in cost by pointing out that technological advances are benefiting all long distance telephone users, but when a caller requires personal service to ensure locating a particular person he waives some of the advantages of automatic operation and faces the effects of rising labour costs. Improved long distance service and rate reductions have been accompanied by rapidly growing use of the company's long distance facilities. Microwave systems can transmit large quantities of information over great distances and difficult terrain more economically than is possible with wire and cable systems. These are technological advances well known to the public of Canada, and they believe that they should be taken into consideration in setting both local and long distance rates.

In connection with this application for an increase in the directorate I would draw your attention to part of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways for 1963. The hon. member for Three Rivers knew when the contract was given by the C.B.C., after 30 years in the hands of the C.N.R. and the C.P.R., that between them these people would lose approximately $1 million a year in services. Mr. Donald Gordon, reporting for the C.N.R. in 1963 on telecommunications, stated that net income from all telecommunications services was $5.4 million in 1963, which was down $200,000 from 1962. Mr. Gordon points out that the C.N. telecommunications net income was down $200,000 from 1962. The C.B.C. contract, which the C.N.R. had lost was worth $500,000 a year to it.

The Chairman: I must again interrupt the hon. member and ask him to co-operate with the Chair. The Chair has brought his attention to standing order 59(2), which I will read again:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Certainly the hon. member will admit that what he has been saying during the last few minutes is entirely irrelevant, as far as the Chair is concerned, to the clause before the committee. There are rules of procedure which must be respected by all hon. members and I ask the hon. member's co-operation in referring as expeditiously as possible to the clause of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I find the remarks of the hon. member most timely. I believe that those remarks have something to do with these operations and with the particular clause that is before us. In fact, I am eagerly awaiting his further remarks in this regard so that we may then know something about this before it is dealt with by the house.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I point out that the bill now before us, respecting the Bell Telephone Company, provides directly for the addition of five members to the board of directors, an increase to 20. I think you, Mr. Chairman, should give some consideration as to why this board should be increased from 15 to 20 members. I suggest any increase in a board of directors is contemplated for one of several reasons. Surely a board of directors has a purpose and a relationship to the operations of the company. This company is asking for an increase of five in the number of directors. I think it is reasonable to our discussion to ascertain why the number should be increased by five, and the function to be performed by those additional members. I think we should be made aware of any situation that has developed in this country which would warrant such an increase.

It is my information that when a company requires an increase in its board of directors it is because of an expansion in the operations of the company or because the company is amalgamating with another company. Such a required increase might also be necessitated by a proposed increase in the capitalization or expansion of the company. I feel that members of parliament have a right and obligation to ask why a board of directors should be increased.

We have no indication as to who the additional five members might be. We do not have any information about their associations with other companies. I suggest the hon. member is not in a position to tell us who the members are or why they are being appointed. I think it is your responsibility, Mr. Chairman, to allow this discussion to be broad enough so that we may obtain answers to these questions. What purpose will these additional directors serve? What is wrong with the company at the present time, necessitating an increase in its board of directors? I suggest it is your responsibility, Mr. Chairman, to allow hon. members to find out, through the hon. member for York-Humber, whether or not the increase of five members to the board of directors of this company will be in the interests both of the company and the people of this country. I suggest, therefore, that the hon. member be asked to indicate why the officials of the Bell Telephone Company feel an increase in the number of directors on the board is necessary.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman who has just spoken should direct his question to the Minister of Transport. The hon. member will recall that not long ago he voted some $86 million to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways. Let us go back to where this whole thing started.

An hon. Member: The Minister of Transport is not here.

Mr. Clancy: He is not usually here, but that makes little difference.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking to a point of order. We were voting public money. The Bell Telephone Company is asking for an increase in its board of directors. It may well be that we are suspicious of its motives, but I should like to point out that the C.P.R. and C.N.R. set up a line across Canada at the expense—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Clancy: Direct your question to the Minister of Transport.

The Chairman: Order. I have listened with interest to the remarks made by hon. members on the point of order. Some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming are, in my mind, the type of questions that must have been raised and considered when this bill was before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I suggest that was the purpose of sending the bill to the committee. In view of the fact the bill has been before that committee and is now back for consideration by the committee of the whole house, we are bound by the rules of procedure. All I can do is read again for your guidance standing order 59(2), which states:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant—

I expect all hon. members will keep that in mind during the course of their remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaulé: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, questions have been asked in committee concerning this bill, and in view of the hazy answers given, I agree with the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that we are complying with the standing orders in discussing the reasons for this increase in the number of the company's directors.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Chairman, to end the discussion on that point, would the unanimous consent of the house settle the issue?

[Text]

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your comments, and those members who have participated in this matter, in an attempt to show the relevancy of my remarks in respect of whether there should be five more directors added to the board of the Bell Telephone Company.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that when the railways, canals and telegraph lines committee met I raised a question about the C.B.C. contract. I asked this question directly of the Bell Telephone representative although for some reason or other it was not caught by the official reporters. The question was asked at the end of that committee's meetings. I said, would one of the five new directors be a representative of the C.B.C.? The Bell Telephone Company representatives simply smiled and said, no, they had not given consideration to that idea. I thought such an appointment might have been a fitting reward for taking a contract from a crown corporation, such as the C.N.R., and giving it to a private organization, so that the crown corporation could show that it was down $200,000 next year in net revenue while at the same time it was down $500,000 in gross revenue. Perhaps that is beside the point.

Perhaps the increase by five in the number of directors of the company was necessitated by the company's great interest in the Northern Electric Company, which is considered by many as a subsidiary of Bell Telephone. During the meetings of the railways committee we made a number of inquiries relating to the connection between Bell Telephone and Northern Electric. The board of transport commissioners had made a report, shortly before the Bell Telephone Company made application for this increase, which indicated that Bell Telephone was entitled to own Northern Electric. In the evidence before the board of transport commissioners, a copy of which I have before me, appears repeatedly the statement that Bell Telephone Company owns 90 per cent of the stock of Northern Electric. By the time the parliamentary committee got around to sitting in respect of this application for an increase in the number of directors, as we were informed by those representatives who appeared, Bell Telephone Company owned 100 per cent of the shares of the Northern Electric Company. That statement is repeated two or three times in the evidence taken before that committee.

Mr. Chairman, several hon. members have commented favourably in respect of this application because there are manufacturing companies and offices of the applicant located in their constituencies. I should like to point out for the benefit of the members of this committee that there must be a riding in this Dominion of Canada in which there are employees of Industrial Wire and Cable Company. In respect of the reference to the board of transport commissioners in connection with Bell Telephone and Northern Electric, hon. members might be interested in knowing that most of the employees of Industrial Wire and Cable Company reside in the riding of York-Humber. I have good reason for participating in this debate, because of the interest of the employees of Industrial Wire and Cable. That company has an industrial factory located at the intersection of highway 27 and the Queen Elizabeth highway, in the township of Etobicoke part of which is in the riding of York-Humber. The Industrial

Wire and Cable Company acted as an intervenor in an application—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member. I feel his comments at this point are irrelevant but in any event his time has expired. I have taken into account the fact that there were several points of order. He has been given an additional seven minutes time to compensate for the time used in dealing with those points of order.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, when this matter came on before I had a chance to make a few remarks but I did not get an opportunity to make some remarks I intended to make. I do not wish to repeat myself, but I tried to point out then that I had read carefully the evidence before the committee of this house and was unable to find any sound reason for the request for the expansion of the number of directors. The answer was that they needed more leeway, they needed the vice presidents to get acquainted with the board of directors.

However, I want to deal with a broader aspect of the matter today. As the members of this committee are well aware the Bell Telephone Company is a privately owned monopoly in charge of a tremendously important service. Now, that fact is no reason for the refusal of any reasonable request when the company comes before this house. On the other hand, the fact that they come and ask for an increase in the number of directors enables parliament, and I think imposes upon parliament, an obligation to inquire as to necessity for the increase and to ask some other questions concerning the company's public responsibility.

It is well known to the members of this house that this is a private monopoly, but it is a monopoly with great public responsibility and public interest. This is partly served by making its rates structure subject to control and investigation by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. I am quite sure that the members of this house and the members of the committee do not want to usurp the functions of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. However, we have the right to inquire whether that degree of investigation is dealing adequately with the public responsibility of the Bell Telephone Company. I have a copy of the proceedings before the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. It is only, I think, about 600 or 700 pages, so I do not propose, in the time available, to bring all these matters before this committee.

This transcript concerns an application of Industrial Wire and Cable and deals with the matter raised by the hon. member for York-Humber, namely whether it was legal for the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, under its limited charter, to own shares of Northern Electric Company, a manufacturing company. Now, this question was dealt with by the board of transport commissioners and they held the Bell company legally entitled to hold these shares. What I think has not been called to the attention of the committee is that there was a further application made to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and, so far as I know, this has never been dealt with. Certainly, the committee has never been told whether or not it was dealt with.

As I say, there was an additional phase to that application and that was to find out whether the board of transport commissioners, by reason of the fact that the Bell Telephone Company owned all the shares of Northern Electric, was entitled to review the financial affairs of Northern Electric. This question was adjourned until the question of the legality of the ownership of the shares of Northern by Bell Telephone could be determined. This first question was determined, namely the responsibility of Northern Electric to account to the board of transport commissioners; but so far as I know, and I have the records here but perhaps the sponsor of the bill could tell us some time, the second question never seems to have been looked into.

We have a situation wherein the Bell Telephone Company comes before this house seeking an expansion in the number of the board of directors. We are not in a position to know whether or not, by reason of this link between Northern Electric, the manufacturing company, and Bell Telephone, this large aspect of the work of manufacturing is under any review by anybody, including the board of transport commissioners. I am not the first member of the committee to raise this question. It was raised by the hon. member for Broadview quite early in this debate, on July 18. He said he was not just concerned with whether or not this ownership was legal, but that he was concerned about the question of whether or not this publicly owned monopoly which is under the jurisdiction of the house and which is so important to Canada was, by reason of its ownership of Northern Electric shares, really under the control of this committee and of this parliament or whether a device, as it were, had been discovered whereby a substantial portion of its operations was not under any control at all. The hon. member for Broadview raised the question, but no answer was given.

It does seem to me that if this house is asked to increase the number of directors, with no reason given but the company's desire to have more leeway, then this house has a right to inquire whether or not, in fact, the application before the board of transport commissioners has ever been dealt with. The question remains open. I submit that before this bill is dealt with, that sort of question as to the responsibility of this company which affects the rights of so many people, should be answered.

Another question that I feel could be answered is the following: In many countries throughout the world they have not adopted either a complete system of private ownership or complete public ownership of a public monopoly. In Scandinavia they have adopted a system whereby there is partial ownership by a minority, and there are minority appointments to the board of directors. You have therefore a privately owned company with vast connections, but with representatives of the public on that board. I believe if the sponsor of this bill could assure us that some of the five directors would not be just people with business connections but rather that they would be people with responsibilities to the people of Canada, thus assuring to the public a greater degree of responsibility so that hon. members would have the right and opportunity to find out whether the rate structure was being adjusted in some way or other by arrangement with Northern Electric or other companies, he would find we were pleased to give our approval to the bill very quickly.

We have been told that the additional appointments may be vice presidents who are already serving the corporation. I would urge the sponsors of this bill, therefore, that they should seek to answer some of the questions I have asked and some of the questions aked earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Broadview. They should seek to assure this committee that this would be the result of the request. As I have said, I have read all the evidence in the committee and I could not find anything but the most vague statements that the company wanted more leeway. I believe the parliament of Canada is entitled to be treated with a little more respect by an organization with this wide, major public responsibility.

So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to obstruct the company's receiving any reasonable request that will add to its efficiency or to its responsibility to the public for the tremendously important service they give. However, until these questions are answered, and answered to the satisfaction of hon. members, I feel we should not pass this particular bill. Let them tell us why they need five directors. Let them tell us if the additional directors will add to the public responsibility of the board. Let them tell us whether Northern Electric, which is a wholly owned subsidiary, is to be subject to public regulation by the board of transport commissioners. If they answer these questions they might receive better co-operation from members of this committee, including myself.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, during the past few private members' hours I believe there have been attempts to talk out this bill, No. S-27. Members of the New Democratic party have suggested the appointment of five government directors, and there has been some suggestion of nationalizing the Bell Telephone Company.

In my opinion the Bell Telephone Company is one of the most efficient and well run companies in the country, and is better run privately than it would be as an arm of the government. It may be that at one time or another most subscribers to the company have felt they have not been fairly treated by persons answering their complaints. Generally speaking, however, the company is acutely aware of its public image and is sensitive to the quite frequent charge that it is a monopolistic giant and that it is callously indifferent to complaints from its subscribers.

I have a suggestion which might satisfy the objections of members of this committee and which would at the same time be of advantage to the company. I believe that eventually an ombudsman type of individual should be appointed within the Bell telephone organization, and possibly appointed on the recommendation of the federal government. Such an ombudsman individual would shift much of the burden of criticism which the company itself bears now, and such an appointment would meet the objective of the New Democratic party in their suggestion for the appointment of five directors by the federal government.

I have no desire to delay debate on this bill. I simply feel that if the company and this committee gave consideration to the appointment of an ombudsman within the Bell organization it would be a way out of the impasse that we seem to have reached on this bill.

Mr. Scott: As the hon. member for Greenwood has said, Mr. Chairman, we do not want to delay unduly the passage of this bill, but the questions we are raising are serious ones and we want to have answers to them from the sponsor of the bill. We are all impressed by the Bell company, the importance of the good work it does and the good public relations it enjoys throughout the country. We are not the slightest bit interested in holding the measure back, but the hon. member for Greenwood has raised a very serious point that I believe it is incumbent on the committee to discuss, and I do not see how we can do that until we have some information from the sponsor of the bill.

It is obvious that the bill is not going to pass this evening, and I hope between now and next week the sponsor of the bill will get in touch with whoever had him sponsor it, will raise with them the points we have raised, and that he will come back next week, or whenever we reach the bill again, and make a statement with regard to the matters we have raised.

To refresh his memory, our main objection is that this is a private corporation managing a very large section of the public business, and we are not convinced that it is proper for such a corporation wholly to own a subsidiary when that subsidiary's financial statements are not available for public scrutiny. It is widely suspected in the electric business in Canada that Northern Electric has a two-price list, one for the Bell company and one for everybody else, and there is a wide suspicion a lot of profits are being hidden in this wholly owned subsidiary.

Before passage of the bill we would like an undertaking from the Bell company and Northern Electric that their financial statements will be made available for scrutiny and examination by members of this committee. We do not think this is unreasonable. After all, the Bell Telephone Company has been granted a very important monopoly by this chamber and it has a very serious duty to the public in general, as indeed to the members of this committee. Therefore because of the fact that this wholly owned subsidiary's financial statements are not available we want to see them and satisfy ourselves that there is nothing wrong with the financial relationship between Northern Electric and the Bell company.

[Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie).]

The hon. member for Greenwood also indicated our view that we think it is a reasonable proposition that members of the public should have representation on the board of directors. Indeed, we intend to move an amendment that three of the directors be appointed on recommendation of the lieutenant governor in council. I think the public ought to have representation, rather than bank directors and presidents of other corporations. I would like to see educational institutions represented on the board of directors. In short we want to see—

Mr. Macdonald: Would the hon. member permit a question? Which lieutenant governor in council?

Mr. Scott: I am sorry, I meant the Governor General. We feel it would be in order for appointments to be made on the recommendation of the Governor General, and we hope the sponsor of the bill will go back, put these two propositions before his principals and let us know what their answers are. I want to emphasize as strongly as I can that we are not interested in holding up the bill just for the sake of holding it up, but we are thoroughly convinced both these propositions are sound and that they raise very serious questions with regard to the matter. We will not let the bill pass until we do get serious consideration of these two very important proposals.

[Translation]

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Chairman, I too should like to make my contribution to this debate on the bill now before us and which provides for the appointment of five additional members to the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

I wonder whether such an increase in the number of directors would make for a more efficient administration of the affairs of this company.

Apparently, according to several members I have already heard, the manner in which the company is run leaves something to be desired.

For my part, if I were convinced that the addition of five directors would change in some way the administration as it is now, I would be willing to let the bill pass as quickly as possible.

On the other hand, I wonder whether this would improve the situation.

At any rate, in our districts, we take exception to the manner in which this company is administered and to the service it provides.

For instance, in the Beaupré district of my riding of Charlevoix businessmen and business concerns in small towns located ten, 12 or 15 miles from Quebec city have to pay long distance rates for their calls to Quebec city. This adds up to huge amounts and hinders the development of our area.

To prove my point let me read a resolution passed by the various councils of our municipalities. Here is the resolution introduced at the regular council meeting of the municipality of St. Féréol:

Whereas the residential and commercial development of the Beaupré coast is contingent upon free telephone communication between the municipalities concerned, on the one hand, and Quebec city on the other, it is moved and seconded... that the municipal council of St. Féréol support whatever action the telephone division of the Beaupré coast regional development committee sees fit to take, such as the sending of a petition to the Department of Transport in Ottawa."

That resolution was moved and passed by the municipal councils of Chateau Richer, St. Ann parish, St. Ann village, Beaupré—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must remind him, as I did for members of the committee who spoke before him, that comments made at the committee stage must be strictly relevant to the clause under consideration.

I would therefore, ask the hon. member for Charlevoix to refer to standing order 59 (2) of the House of Commons which stipulates that speeches in committee of the whole must be relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The clause under study at this time is clause 1 of Bill No. S-27, providing for an increase from 15 to 20 in the number of directors of The Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

I therefore invite the hon. member to limit his remarks to that very thing.

Mr. Bélanger: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, but notwithstanding what you have just said, I think that it is possible to link my previous remarks to the bill under considersation. As a matter of fact, we are being asked to allow the Bell Telephone Company to have five more men on its board of directors.

To my mind, this is done for two reasons: Either because there are more profits to divide, or because the management has to be improved. That is why I am trying to show that the management of that company is inadequate, and that this condition should be remedied as soon as possible.

It is inconceivable, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the seven parishes in the county of Montmorency should suffer for two more years from the inertia of this company, which refuses to establish a free telephone exchange system between those communities and Quebec city. This hinders the economic development of that area by forcing businessmen and companies to pay exorbitant prices for their telephone calls.

The treatment we receive, over there, is truly remarkable, when everybody knows that communities 60 and 80 miles away from the city of Montreal have the advantage of a free telephone exchange. Now, on the Beaupré coast long distance charges must be paid for calls to Quebec city which is only 22 miles away.

That is why I should have been remiss, as representative of that area, if I had not risen in protest against such a situation when the bill was introduced.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on Bill No. S-27 concerning the Bell Telephone Company of Canada which wants to increase the number of its directors.

I must say that we are not, in principle, against the increase in the number of directors of this company. It is a private company and it is generally admitted that it has rendered great service to society. We want to respect as much as possible the principle of free enterprise; we want free enterprise to remain in Canada.

If free enterprise, as our friends were saying a moment ago, is too ambitious, if it goes too far, if it denies the rights of the community, the government must step in.

As long as this company does not go beyond its rights, that it is not prejudicial to the community, it must be protected, because free enterprise, or private enterprise, is still the best. Nobody can prove that state enterprises are better than private enterprises.

We are then in favour of private enterprise. But if, once again, this private enterprise is too ambitious it rests upon the government to intervene and see to it that it does not hinder the progress of the community in general.

If the rates of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada are too high, it is again up to the authorities concerned to intervene. If this company makes large profits, the government in turn, levies taxes. Speaking of taxes, I believe the purpose of taxes is to cut down the profits of any private company.

We are glad to share in such a project. We wish, in every respect, to maintain private enterprise in Canada. We are not against any private enterprise or any monopoly so long as monopolies do not deny the rights under which they have secured privileges.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am saying again that I wish the Bell Telephone Company of Canada would understand the situation. I know we are doing this company a favour by examining its problems.

It was said, a while ago, that this company was a subsidiary of the Northern Electric Company, a subsidiary of the American company, and so on.

Although this company is a subsidiary of the American company, it nevertheless operates in Canada and all the income derived from this business goes back to its shareholders, and if the latter make large profits, they are in turn taxed all the more under the Income Tax Act.

In any event, I still think that, in spite of all, it is fair to protect this private enterprise.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the question to be raised at 10.30 o'clock this evening is the following:

[Translation]

The hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise): Labour conditions and winter works—inquiry as to whether the federal government has paid its share.

[Text]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Joseph Slogan (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, in this House of Commons I think I am better known as a listener than as a speaker, but I make no apologies whatsoever for rising to make a contribution on this flag question. Indeed, I had a very nice speech prepared, but after the lecture we received from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this afternoon I think that even before I make my introduction I should make some observations upon the contribution of that hon. member. It was not unusual for him to adopt the attitude of preaching to the House of Commons about the sins of other parties and other members. He said that we were wasting time, that we were lowering the standards of parliament, and so on. But indeed, Mr. Speaker, if we look at the index of Hansard I have no doubt that this hon. member occupies as much space in the index as I for one occupy in Hansard as a whole. I believe that neither the Liberal party nor the New Democratic party are in any position to lecture to the Conservative party about wasting time in the house. The Liberal party in the 1962-63 session proved themselves to be a more obstructionist party than perhaps we have ever witnessed in this house. Even at the time when the New Democratic party, or the old C.C.F. party, was just a minor group of eight members I think they took more than their share of space in Hansard. Certainly the party to my far left, the Creditistes, and the New Democratic party still, when we consider their numbers, take up much more time in this house and space in Hansard than any of the other parties.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is idle for a person to preach to us when he has only to look back on the sins of his own party in this house. I think especially of what has already been mentioned, the divorce blockade—not by a major party but by a minor group in this country, and particularly two members who saw fit to hold up divorce bills in this house, not for 15 or 16 days, but indeed I think it could be measured in terms of months and sessions, and perhaps even years, inflicting personal hardship upon the people who were affected and who had a right to come to this House of Commons to ask for relief.

I believe the hon. member really destroyed his own case, too, when he suggested that we should stop talking so we could vote on the subamendment and the amendment in order that his party could introduce their amendment; in other words, so we could start talking on their amendment. To me that did not sound as though he was wanting an end to the debate in order that we could get on with other legislation. It was not a very convincing case that the hon. member put forward, to my mind.

Mr. Skoreyko: Typical Knowles tactics.

Mr. Slogan: Then he talked about extending the hours of sitting of the House of Commons. Indeed, this has already been done, and already in the country we are receiving criticism because the attendance in the house is not as it should be when we sit through the noon hour on Fridays. When it comes to his argument that we should get on with other legislation, surely the hon. member realizes it was only at the insistence of the opposition parties that the government was finally forced to bring in their legislative program. We asked for and passed the legislative program which the government wished passed before a recess. If we are occupying the time of the house at a time when we could be on the beaches and in our cottages, there must be a principle behind what we are doing, because certainly we do not do this just because we want to talk.

Mr. Skoreyko: Stanley wouldn't understand the principle.

Mr. Slogan: The hon. member talked about the number of speeches that have been made in this house by the Conservative members, and so forth. Surely, Mr. Speaker, on a matter of principle such as the flag everyone in this house should feel obliged to speak. He should feel obliged to speak because of the fact that he represents people who I am sure would like to know how he is representing them in this house, and because he has a conscience of his own. Also may I remind the hon. member that there are still a large number of members of this party who have not contributed to this debate at all. These are some of the factors I wanted to raise regarding the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, there was nothing in his speech suggesting the setting up of a committee of the House of Commons to which this question could be referred, which would clear the decks for action in this house on other legislation. In fact, we agree with many of his constructive suggestions, such as the idea that one day in the week should be left for legislation. I believe the house leader of our party has made suggestions, perhaps not identical but similar in their purport, and I know the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said he was prepared to accept here and now the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so far as the bringing in of legislation is concerned. Now it is up to the government to agree to that suggestion and to start bringing in that legislation for which we have continually asked. But where is it? Perhaps it would not be such a bad idea if the Prime Minister of this country sat in on this debate now and then in order to appreciate some of the feelings which are being generated and some of the suggestions being put forward by hon. members of this house, because certainly they could result in a solution of this problem.

Mr. Skoreyko: The member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

Mr. Slogan: I do not want to spend my whole time discussing the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Speaker. I have listened to many of the speeches made in the house in this debate and I must say that in my opinion they have been far above par. I believe this debate as a whole, considering its length, has been of a quality which we have not seen in this house for many years. Certainly the members of this party could roll out a lot more in the way of emotion and argument than they have. I believe they have been very moderate; I think they have put forward good suggestions; their speeches have been very sincere. I am pleased to note, also, that many of the members of this house who very seldom speak have been prompted to speak in the debate because of the way they feel on this question. I must say that those members have made a distinct contribution by the manner in which they spoke and they are a credit to their constituents.

I am sorry to see there have not been more members on the government side who have spoken. Some of them have been very facetious in their interjections. I would feel from their interjections that they think they have more brains in their seats when sitting than when on their feet. I can assure them that their interjections do not measure up to their expectations.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not say this for myself but I trust the hon. member can indicate to the house what change in the design his discourse will bring about.

Mr. Slogan: I am very happy the hon. member is listening so attentively to my speech; if he will contain himself I will get around to that question very shortly.

At the beginning of this debate we had a very broad participation on the part of the members of the Liberal party. Although they were saying that we were filibustering they were almost making speech for speech with us. Then apparently the Prime Minister lowered the guillotine and there was a wall of silence on that side of the house. This was brought to the attention of the public and we are now treated to the spectacle of one speaker per day, so that we cannot say that they are completely gagged. Although some members opposite are very facetious others are very attentive. I have watched their faces during some of the speeches which have been made on this side of the house. I think they have convictions of their own and I wish they would talk about them. I am wondering why they do not. Are they afraid to express their opinions or do they not have any convictions? Are they so divided on that side of the house and so lack conviction that they have nothing to say? I wonder whether they feel that they are representing the opinion of their constituents by their silence. Not all of them are silent. There is the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) who has courage indeed. He made one of the greatest indictments of a prime minister which I have heard in this house. Among other things he said that the caucus was not consulted about the flag, that it was a decision brought in from the top.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) spent most of his time yesterday afternoon interjecting during the speech of myself and other members in this house. He is doing precisely the same tonight. I would ask you to restrain him or ask him to make a contribution in this flag debate, please.

Mr. Smallwood: Go and lick some stickers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows as do all hon. members, that an hon. member who has the floor is entitled to speak without interruption. I hope that is kept in mind.

Mr. Slogan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind these interruptions because they reflect only upon those who make them.

[Mr. Godin.]

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): You know where they come from.

Mr. Slogan: I have already dealt with the contention that we are delaying legislation. We are asking the government to bring forward legislation so that it can be dealt with expeditiously, as was the legislation which has already been passed.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) is one of the few frontbenchers on the government side to participate in this debate. As reported at page 6956 of Hansard he said:

> No one with respect for our parliamentary institutions would wish to contribute to the filibuster now under way.

The word "parliament" itself derives from the verb "to speak". I am most surprised that the minister, who perhaps was used to exercising bureaucratic power before he became a minister, is now trying to gag his own members and withdraw them from this debate. If they did speak they could make contributions, and I think speech by speech we would inch toward some sort of conclusion which would be acceptable to this parliament as a whole and to the people of Canada.

I must mention the speech of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) because he made some very constructive suggestions. In our amendment to the motion we have asked for a referendum. Then in our subamendment we have made some specific proposals regarding the questions which could be asked relating to a design in such a referendum.

In this connection I should like to refer to a radio broadcast quoted many times here which the present Prime Minister made on December 29, 1961. He was asked: "How would you poll the people on this?"—that is, the flag question. The then leader of the opposition replied: "We would poll the people when we have a general election, and if they don't like the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for that of any other country they will let us know in no uncertain terms". I agree with this point of view which the leader of the Liberal party expressed at that time.

I also think the people of Canada agree with it because there have been a large number of letters and representations to the government asking for a referendum. I refer to the Ottawa Citizen of June 4 where in an article by Norman Campbell headed "10,000 send views to P.M." one of the categories the letters fell into was those calling for a referendum on the flag question. So certainly the view of the then leader of the opposition was supported by the people.

Then in the Ottawa Journal for June 16 there is the headline over a Canadian Press dispatch: "350 ft. ensign petition to P.M.". I might just quote shortly from this article, which says:

> A petition bearing 17,873 names, mainly from Toronto and southern Ontario communities, was left at Prime Minister Pearson's office Monday urging a national plebiscite on the flag question.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that the geographical areas referred to are mostly represented by members on the other side of the house.

I am not an Orangeman but I have an article here from the Saskatchewan Leader-Post of June 18 which is headed: "Orangemen ask Pearson for flag referendum". I also have an editorial from the Telegram of August 22 under the caption "Ask the people". It goes on to say:

> The voice of the people can be heard on this issue only through a national plebiscite...
> Here is a matter which touches the hearts, the emotions, the loyalties of virtually all Canadians. A parliamentary vote that would destroy the country's flag would leave deep and festering scars for years to come.

So there is certainly the feeling among the people of the country that they want to have a voice in the selection of the flag which will fly over them.

Perhaps the reason they want to have a voice is the manner in which this flag resolution has been brought before the House of Commons. I want to return for a moment to the radio interview which I mentioned given by the then leader of the opposition on December 29, 1961. He was asked: "But you do think the country needs this symbol to hold us together?" and he replied: "Yes; I think it would be a good idea to have a distinctive Canadian flag in the interests of national unity". I emphasize the words "in the interests of national unity". We just have to look at what has happened in this country since the Liberal party took office to see that if there is anything which is needed in this country it is national unity. Unfortunately, everything which this government does tends to divide this country further and further. In another answer the Prime Minister went on to say: "We should try to solve these problems in a manner which will create the minimum of division and the maximum of unity". That is a good way of putting it, and I agree. I think that if we are going to bring in a new national flag it has to be done with a minimum of division in this country, and certainly the Prime Minister of today is not living up to his words of yesterday.

When the Prime Minister was asked: "What about Quebec; would they want the fleur-de-lis on it," Mr. Pearson said: "Well, we would have the Quebec members of our cabinet decide what the design would be". Perhaps it was the Quebec members of the government that designed this flag.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit me to ask him whether he is aware of the fact that the Prime Minister categorically denied ever having made that statement? I am sure he would not want to repeat something that was misreported and categorically denied by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Is it necessary that hon. members of this house must listen to the Minister of Transport, who is completely ignorant of the facts?

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the interjection made by the Minister of Transport. I think probably I am one of the more placid members of this house. I was not aware of the fact that the Prime Minister had denied this statement. I believe this report was taken from a tape recording, but if the Prime Minister did not make that statement, I will withdraw the remark, or at least indicate that I am sorry I ever mentioned it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Churchill: This was a tape recording.

An hon. Member: Good night Jack.

Mr. Slogan: Later in this interview the leader of the Liberal party was asked: "What is your conception of the new Canadian flag?" Mr. Pearson said, regarding the design: "Well, I am not going to tell you what the design should be." Mr. Pearson then went on to say: "The government will make up its mind. If I am going to be the head of the government I am not going to tell you what the design is." That does not make very much sense.

I would like to quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Star, May 20, under the headline "P.M. Told Newsmen of Flag Decision". I suppose he must have changed his mind. Perhaps it would be more clear if I quote a few short lines from this article, because I think this has a bearing on the question. This quotation relates to that meeting of the Prime Minister and newsmen who were called to his home for the unfurling of what was referred to as "his choice", the three maple leaves design. He said——he was prepared to have the government stand or fall on the maple leaf flag.

The Prime Minister was careful, however, to make clear that the flag on the mantle was his personal choice.

When we now refer to the three maple leaves design as the Pearson pennant, or something of that nature, I certainly do not think he would now say it was not his personal choice. I am wondering whether it would not have been much more democratic for perhaps a caucus to make that choice, or a committee of this house.

Not only is the motion before the house in the name of the Prime Minister sponsoring a flag design of his own choice, but the Prime Minister said to this House of Commons that if we do not accept this flag then we are going to have an election. I have never heard anything more close to political blackmail than that statement.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a headline which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on June 18. The headline states: "Regards Both Flag Votes as Confidence Tests: P.M.". Perhaps I might also refer to an article that appeared in the Toronto Telegram of July 20, written by Ronald Collister headed: "Accept My Flag or Else . . . Warns a Defiant Pearson". The article then states:

Mr. Pearson is laying down the law, with fire and fury, after the breakdown of all-party talks on a firm agenda for the next month.

In the Montreal Gazette of August 24 there appeared another article under the heading: "Free Flag Vote, Pearson Calls Off the Whips".

Mr. Speaker, perhaps there is a reason for this turn of events. I have before me an article written by Patrick Nicholson, which appeared in the Quebec Chronicle-Telegram on August 12, 1964. The heading is: "Election on Flag Could Kill Libs".

Perhaps all these headlines are really related one to the other. I think there must be a compromise in respect of this question. Although some might call these compromises retreats, I think the compromises are good. Perhaps one can properly come to the conclusion that if the compromises are necessary they are good. The Prime Minister did not give too much consideration to the whole situation in the beginning, or he would not have had to change his mind so many times. The fact that he is still openminded and willing to change his opinion I think represents good news for this parliament. I think more changes will have to be made.

[Mr. Slogan.]

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to refer to the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) calling for a referendum. I think I have produced evidence showing that there is support among the people of Canada for this position. What might the result of such a referendum be? In my personal opinion I do not think a plebiscite should be held immediately. I agree with the original view of the leader of the Liberal party, that the time to call a referendum is at the next election. If the next election is held a year or two from now I think that would be an appropriate time to hold a referendum, because by then all the emotion that has now been created may well have subsided and we would be able to obtain a more accurate reflection of the views of the public than could be obtained today. I recall one politician who on many occasions said, when the sea is whipped up into fury and the waves are riding high, surveyors do not measure the height or depth of the land, but wait until the sea is calm. Perhaps that thought has some application to this present situation.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer now to the results of some polls which have been held. A Canadian Press dispatch in Winnipeg of June 29 appeared in the Ottawa Citizen and states:

A flag poll at the eight-day Red River exhibition here saw 41 per cent of 15,000 persons indicate a preference for the red ensign as Canada's national flag.

That poll was not conducted by the Conservative party, but was sponsored by the Manitoba New Democratic party. It showed 32 per cent of those polled in favour of a tri-maple leaf flag, 15 per cent in favour of a new flag with one maple leaf, and 12 per cent in favour of a new flag with some other design. Seventy four per cent of those polled favoured a national referendum on the flag. Certainly if one requires a sampling of public opinion, that is it, and it indicates that we should hold a referendum on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, in the Evening Telegram of June 10 appeared an article under the heading: "Flag Straw Vote Ends...Ensign 773; New Flag 332". I believe that poll was held in Newfoundland and should be of special interest to the Minister of Transport.

In the Montreal Star of July 21 appeared an article under the heading: "Red Ensign Advocated by 149,465". Perhaps I should read a short part of this article, which states as follows:

> The office of the state secretary has received 149,465 signatures on letters and petitions since July, 1945, favouring retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag, the Commons was informed yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, I think that article gives some idea of what the people of Canada are thinking, and would indicate why a referendum should be held on this flag issue. I do not think the Liberal party should be afraid of a referendum or plebiscite. The red ensign is leading in nine provinces.

On a national basis, as has been pointed out, the figures are, red ensign, 27.9 per cent, maple leaf flag, 39.6 and others, 15.4. Certainly, they have nothing to fear if they feel the people of Canada really want this three maple leaf flag. This is the way to get it, to have a referendum.

In this party we have generally supported the red ensign. I am not speaking here solely as a supporter of the red ensign. I think I can be a little broader in outlook, Mr. Speaker. Last December I conducted a survey in my own riding, and this was before all the emotions had been stirred up. The survey was quite a wide one but there were some flag questions included. At that time, 10 to 1, the people of my riding were in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. The margin was something like 52 per cent to 48 per cent in favour of the red ensign. However, since that time, since the time the three maple leaf flag was unfurled, there has been a considerable change on the part of those who wanted a distinctive flag other than the red ensign. Many of them have now decided to support the red ensign because they feel it is a far superior design to the one proposed by the Prime Minister. I agree with them because, personally, I do not like the three maple leaves. I would prefer one maple leaf.

I believe we, in this party, are being very broadminded. I do not believe we have been such diehards, because not only are we suggesting a referendum but our subamendment provides a wide scope for the questions to be placed on the referendum. We have given four choices to the people of Canada. The first is the red ensign. The second is a modification of the red ensign. The third is the three maple leaf flag, and the fourth is a single maple leaf flag. Since this proposal has been made in the subamendment there have been a number of speeches made in this house in which the suggestion has been made this question should be referred to a committee. I am wholeheartedly behind this idea. I believe that this party would be prepared to accept a reasonable deliberation by such a committee. If the government insists on a time limit so far as the committee is concerned, certainly that would be no stumbling block.

I feel that one of the things the committee could consider would be a design that might have almost unanimous approval. If such unanimity were reached and such a flag were brought back to the house, I believe it could be adopted without too much debate and there would be no need for further reference to the people. If the small group of members comprising this committee were unable to agree, then perhaps they could clarify the questions that should be asked on this referendum. Of course the red ensign question is very clear. The question of modifications on the red ensign could be considered by this committee and perhaps they could suggest a modified red ensign that could be placed on the referendum. Then we have the three maple leaf flag. It could be considered as it is or perhaps suggestions may be made to modify it, such as those made by A. Y. Jackson. Perhaps his design could be considered, and a final recommendation brought forward. Then we come to the one maple leaf design. Of course, there are hundreds of one maple leaf designs. Perhaps if this committee could not agree on a design they could at least narrow down the number of one maple leaf designs. All these designs could be put on the ballot.

Then I believe the committee should report to the house and this question should be put to a referendum. This issue should be taken out of the House of Commons and referred to the people as a whole. If even a small group cannot decide amongst themselves, then we in this larger House of Commons have little hope of reaching agreement on a design. I feel that if this committee chose these four designs and then the people declared themselves on those designs, the design chosen by the people would automatically become the flag. I think the suggestions made from this side of the house are worthy of consideration. I believe the very fact that we are willing to give the people this scope, and are willing to accept the decision which the people may make, whatever it may be, certainly shows that we are not so stubborn or so rigid in connection with one design that if the people of Canada as a whole voiced their opinion, we would not be willing to accept it.

Surely that is the spirit of compromise. I do not believe we have to apologize for it. I think that is the spirit in which we must consider this question. I see my time is running out, Mr. Speaker. Incidentally, the Winnipeg Free Press, which is certainly one of the greatest supporters of the Liberal party, says in its editorial of August 21:

> Thus a national flag is being born in the worst possible circumstances—in political bitterness, party strife and parliamentary manoeuvring. The outcome could easily be a flag that would be looked on by many not as a symbol of national unity but as a political flag of divisiveness and controversy.

Farther down, the editorial reads:

> Why could not Mr. Pearson—in the hope of securing some harmony within parliament—ask to refer the flag motion to a parliamentary committee composed of representatives of all parties?

Then, it goes on:

> —it would give parliament a voice in choosing a national flag...

And farther down it says:

> —would make a start towards restoring public respect for parliament.

What we are asking, Mr. Speaker, is being asked in the spirit of compromise which has been accepted by the leader of the Liberal party and the Prime Minister, by shifting his position from time to time. I do not consider it is dishonourable to do that. I think he must shift his position once more if he is really interested in the unity of this country. I am not so old and so bound to tradition that I am unable to sense that I must exhibit a spirit of understanding and compromise, if this nation is to emerge united and strong after this debate. I am not so young that I do not feel a sense of loyalty or devotion to the symbols which have signified and represented something of the richness and uniqueness of my country. I recall the credo of the Progressive Conservative party which is contained in the phrase, "The vision to create, the courage to retain." I think if anyone searches within himself for a guideline to direct his thinking to contribute more to the interest of Canada and all Canadians, then that is a very worthy one to remember. I think if we directed our thoughts along the lines of that phrase, we could contribute more to the interest of Canada and of Canadians than if we were to apply any other philosophy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is difficult, if not impossible, to achieve a unifying symbol in a country that is itself not unified. This was stated in one editorial. Perhaps it was the thought of the Prime Minister that at this time when the very threads of confederation seem to be bursting, that the various opposing elements in this country could unify behind a symbol of Canada such as a flag. This may be a legitimate desire on the part of the Prime Minister in introducing this resolution. However, just as the bicultural commission, instead of unifying the country has already tended to crystallize the English and French apart from one another, and at the same time has sent a wave of nationalism through the other ethnic groups which was not evident before, so the introduction of the flag resolution has tended to divide this country along Anglo-Saxon and French lines.

Because of this, like many speakers before me I deplore this debate taking place. I deplore that the Prime Minister has not seen fit to postpone the flag debate until there is more evidence of unity in the country and when the rallying around a flag would be more natural. The introduction of a flag should be at a time when jealousy and distrust and hatred are at their lowest ebb. That is not the case today.

Because I am neither of Anglo-Saxon nor of French origin, I deplore more than most the fruitless, the useless and the damaging forces that have been set forth in this flag debate. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) has already expressed not the joy but the sadness of those of us who are considered the third element in Canada to see the two factions at loggerheads with one another, especially when these two factions, whether accurately or inaccurately, are considered the founding races in Canada.

Also, in making a contribution to this debate I would like to say that too many Anglo-Saxons and too many French people forget that they are not the only ones in Canada. Today, just as in this House of Commons, every group is a minority, with the Anglo-Saxons, the French, and the other groups combined forming almost equal factions. The fact that Canada is a country of minorities has often made me feel proud because I could see so much unity in the diversity about us, until lately. I grew up in the west where people settled in colonies of Ukrainians, Germans, Polish and French, and it may be interesting to note that in my own riding I have more Indians than I have people of French origin, although we do have a few communities of French people—and I may say they are very fine people.

I might digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to read a letter from one of our original citizens, the Indians. This letter is significant because it comes from one of the seven Indian chiefs I have in my riding, a man who was a past chief of the Indian Brotherhood of Canada, and in his letter he says:

> I have just returned from a meeting in Winnipeg. We were shown the proposed new flag. None of the chiefs like it. They wanted to know where the union jack was. It is the flag of our Queen and should be part of the flag of Canada. All of the chiefs in Manitoba wanted the red ensign to be the official flag of Canada. Please speak for us on this point.
> I am enclosing a petition of the people on my reserve.

In the Toronto Telegram of June 13 there was a letter to the editor from a Peter Jackson, headed "Indian Treaties in Jeopardy." It read as follows:

> Apart from other aspects of the flag situation in Canada, as an Indian I am deeply concerned about the apparent determination of the government to impose a new national flag on the Canadian people.
> I am fully conscious of the significance of the union jack in some form to the majority of Indians in Canada. Most of the treaties which Indians signed included a reference to the "flag", then the full union jack, and the final approval of these treaties involved the presentation of a flag to the Indian tribes concerned as an earnest of good faith.
> The present proposal of a flag bearing only a few maple leaves is very disturbing as it appears to place in jeopardy the treaties signed in the past for "as long as the grass grows, the sun shines and the flag flows in the breeze."
> Certainly no Indians, nor Eskimos, have been consulted about a Canadian flag, and, for Indians at least, it has a greater significance than to any other people in the dominion.

Perhaps this again is a reason why we should have a referendum.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Churchill: Let him go on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret there were some noes, so the hon. member does not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestions made this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that we be given an opportunity to express ourselves fully, would it not be wise to let those who are participating in this debate have extended time to do so, rather than being chopped off by those who are not participating at all?

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may make a suggestion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clancy: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest that we do allow the hon. gentleman to continue his speech, and that we agree to sit for that many extra minutes after 10.30 so that no time will be lost.

[Translation]

Mr. Perron: Mr. Speaker, for at least 15 days now, we have had the opportunity on many occasions to listen to various speeches which are a continuous repetition. I think we are so used to the same things repeated by many hon. members that, in my opinion, the hon. member who now has the floor should have had plenty of time to express his views. Consequently, since his time period has now expired, I object once again to its extension.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is obviously not unanimous agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, in my opening remarks, I should like to say that I do not approve, nor does my party, of the delaying tactics which were used, starting December 17, 1962, to prevent the then prime minister to complete the answers he had started to give to the then leader of the opposition.

Mr. Habel: Judgment has been passed on that.

Mr. Valade: We recall the incident very clearly. We are not going to resort to tactics which we did not approve then and which are not approved now by the people.

Those who think that we are filibustering by taking part in this important debate are unfair and are only showing their lack of interest or, worse still, trying to explain their silence to the house and the people.

Mr. Plourde: You are the ones who do not care.

Mr. Valade: After only 15 days of debate, nobody should speak of obstruction regarding a matter of such importance. We, of the opposition, are conscientiously doing our duty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valade: —as honestly as possible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valade: —and I would even go so far as to say, in reply to the Creditistes who have just uttered those sounds, that we have never contradicted ourselves on such a vital issue as the choice of a distinctive Canadian flag.

On the contrary, it is those who refuse to speak in this house—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Valade: —it is those who refuse to take a stand according to their conscience—

Mr. Caouette: May I put a question to the hon. member?

An hon. Member: Certainly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Mary has the floor and, obviously, he does not wish to reply.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like, at this time, to ask a question—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. Mary has the floor.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, the reason I do not wish to reply now to the hon. member for Villeneuve is that I intend to do so in the course of my speech, which is the thing to do, because we of the official opposition are getting sick and tired of hearing the irrelevant remarks some people are making instead of taking their responsibilities, in this house, on such a vital issue, one which should bind the conscience of every member, as this proposal of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Valade: I repeat that those who are not that conscientious and who prevent a member of the house from expressing his views on that project fail to discharge their responsibilities, not only toward their own party but also towards those who elected them to be represented honestly and conscientiously—

Mr. Perron: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Beauce raises a point of order.

Mr. Perron: In my opinion, the hon. member for St. Mary is not entitled any more than the others to impute motives to members of this house.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I submit that the point of order is as stupid as the hon. member who raised it, because we did not take the position in this house of preventing any Creditiste member from speaking in this chamber.

Mr. Perron: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Valade: I submit that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Beauce raised a point of order again.

Mr. Perron: Yes, Mr. Speaker. When the hon. member for St. Mary says that they never prevented any other member from speaking and from saying what he had to say, I want to recall to him that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr Churchill), the opposition house leader refused the member for Villeneuve the privilege of continuing a speech after the time limit granted to him.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, as for the point of order, I wish to say that all those interruptions have taken about three or four minutes of my time and I would ask you to allow me a few minutes longer after my time is up.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the hon. members opposite that I do not intend to show as much moderation in my remarks as my colleague who has just resumed his seat, for he does not have to put up with this flow of propaganda organized by the Liberal machine—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Valade: —so that this flag issue may become simply and purely a partisan issue.

Mr. Caouette: Talk about the subamendment.

Mr. Valade: I am coming to it and I can assure you that you will be surprised.

Mr. Caouette: Let us hear it.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, throughout all the years I have been in this house, I never had to read my speech, but in view of present circumstances and of possible misinterpretations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would ask you to call the hon. members to order. I take this opportunity to tell them that when the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), who is assistant whip of the Liberal party, read his speech, we did not interrupt him in any way at any time.

Mr. Choquette: Because he made an intelligent speech.

Mr. Vincent: We let him read his speech to the end. I would therefore ask you to call the hon. members to order. They should be as polite with the members of the opposition as were the latter with the government supporters.

Mr. Valade: I wish to point out to the many visitors listening in the galleries that the members of the Liberal party and the minor parties behave like school children during this debate on the flag issue. They show partisanship in their interjections, because instead of rising and stating their point of view, they have incessantly interrupted and insulted me, but I do not worry because they are too low to reach me. I think that they show the depth of their genius and their broadmindness.

Mr. Speaker, the debate on a national distinctive flag exceeds in my opinion the scope of ordinary legislation coming under administrative responsibilities. It is a question which affects those who are not affected by a piece of legislation and I am thinking of those who, on account of their age, are out of the reach of existing laws. The choice of a distinctive national flag has this characteristic; it concerns every citizen of Canada for centuries to come.

What we should deplore most is the turn taken by the debate because of the blunder made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in steeping the flag issue in political partisanship. The introduction of the resolution as an ultimatum including the adoption of two flags in the statutes of Canada as well as two national anthems—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: —is, at once, unacceptable to any member worthy of this name.

Mr. Speaker, there is no point of order; it is all part of dilatory measures of obstruction.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is prohibited to read a speech and, what is more, a speech written by someone else. It is obvious that this speech was written by Mr. Allard.

Mr. Valade: This is a kind of stupidity which shows the hon. member's personality. Not only does he annoy his own government, but he annoys all hon. members of the house and the people who elected him; they will get rid of him, I am convinced, at the next election, because he has shown no seriousness in any of his interventions. If he had the courage of his convictions, he would stand up after me and endeavour to justify himself by suggesting a means to solve the dilemma in which the Prime Minister himself placed us, by his own will and awkwardness. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to yield to those dilatory tactics taken by government members to shorten my time. We are all well aware of those tactics.

Mr. Choquette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member be kind enough to resume his seat?

Mr. Choquette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat and I would suggest to the hon. members for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) and Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) that perhaps it would be favourable to the progress of our business of the house to forget for a moment the personal remarks exchanged between the two hon. members and to restrict ourselves to the consideration of the subject now before the house.

Mr. Valade: I am precisely establishing a preamble but since the beginning of my remarks the government members and the members of the splinter parties have been continuously interrupting me. I did not make any attack against any member. I am here to submit a viewpoint and, as a member, I have the right to be respected. Mr. Speaker has the duty to silence those who want to muzzle me. Besides, I do not intend to be impressed by such manoeuvres and such tactics.

Mr. Choquette: Who wrote your speech?

Mr. Valade: If the hon. member happened to be elected by having his speeches written, at least he should not accuse others—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have never read a speech in this house at any time, still less a speech written by someone else.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I say that it is the practice and the custom that when the Speaker rises, members must resume their seats.

Once more I urge both hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and restrict themselves to the consideration of the resolution now before the house. I would ask the hon. member for St. Mary to deal with the proposal under study.

Mr. Valade: I am precisely dealing with the resolution and the subamendment, and I think that much scope has been given to all members of the house, and especially to the hon.

members for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) and Carleton (Mr. Francis) and to all other government members. I do not understand why those ridiculous interjections are made by Liberal members.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have not yet spoken in this house on this question.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. One member only can be recognized at a time. The hon. member for Carleton has the floor on a question of privilege. Perhaps he should be heard first.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It should be pointed out to the hon. member for Carleton, just as a lesson in procedure, that he did not make this interruption from his seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He is now speaking from his own seat.

Mr. Francis: I wish to point out that I have not participated in the flag debate so far. I understood the hon. member to say I had.

Mr. Valade: I think the hon. member is now making an interruption.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to go on to say that if we are now facing a difficult situation in this house, it is because the man who received the Nobel peace award, since it was said that he had showed great qualities as a mediator on the international scene—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Valade: I am glad to hear this applause, because that man, as I was saying, proved to be unable to settle, in his own country, a situation as delicate as the flag issue and he introduced in this house a solution that produced confusion.

If I accuse the Prime Minister of such misconduct, it is because he was very keen on introducing under his own name a proposal which should have been kept outside party lines.

However, he is not the only one responsible. Pressed by the panicky mob of his supporters who saw their political ambitions fade away at the thought of a general election, he abandoned principle for partisan strategy.

Mr. Speaker, our country has never experienced so much uneasiness as it has since this Liberal administration took office.

Retreats, reversals, abdication of principles have shaken the confidence of the people in the authority of the government, and separatism exploded under this irresponsible administration.

Why, Mr. Speaker? Because French Canadians felt they were let down by co-operative federalism and by the retreats of the Prime Minister.

How can the Canadian people have confidence—

Mr. Choquette: Who wrote this speech?

Mr. Valade: —in a man who, on May 19, 1964, said about the flag:

> I have pointed out, and I think I should make it quite clear, that when the government submits to parliament a matter of policy—

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order.

Mr. Valade: —parliament must—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière has raised a point of order.

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order. I ask that the lights be put out in order to prevent the hon. member from reading the text written by somebody else.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, there is no need to put out the lights, the hon. member is already in the dark.

Mr. Speaker, I was just going to say that the Prime Minister, when he introduced his resolution on June 19, stated that a principle was involved and that the government would stand or fall on the decision of the house.

And now that man, going back on that principle, told us a few days ago: The vote on the flag issue will not be considered by the government as a vote of confidence.

As stated by Mr. Claude Ryan in that same editorial of Le Devoir of August 22 last:

> We wonder if a man is serious when he says, one day, that there is a principle involved in a certain question and, the next, changes his views.

Further on, Mr. Ryan states:

> We sincerely believe that there is nothing more serious than the public reversal by the head of a state on a question of principle.

Not only has the Prime Minister contradicted himself on a question of principle, but he has lied openly. This charge is not made by myself but by two of his colleagues, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis) and the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), who said as much during their participation in the debate, when they stated that the Prime Minister had not told the truth when he claimed that he had consulted the Liberal caucus on the choice of the three maple leaves.

Mr. Speaker, why did the Prime Minister not think of including in his flag a symbol showing that our country is Christian?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valade: I see that some people shrink at the thought of including a Christian symbol on the flag, but that does not surprise me on the part of some hon. members opposite.

Mr. Speaker, would the reason be found in the news item published in the great Montreal paper La Presse in 1955, on the second page—

Mr. Choquette: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Valade: Toronto, 1955. Press release of the Canadian Press.

> The Hon. Lester B. Pearson, Canadian secretary of state for external affairs, stated yesterday evening that he doubted that organized Christian religion would be able to unite the peoples of the world.

And he listed the weak points which prevent Christendom from accomplishing such a task.

> Past experience makes us question the importance of the part played by organized Christian religion in recognizing that interdependence of nations, which will lead to greater unification in the world.

And the release adds, that, according to Mr. Pearson:

> The truth is that after 2,000 years, Christianity remains the religion of a comparatively small minority. Though missionary zeal is often praiseworthy, adds Mr. Pearson, it often results in contempt for other people's beliefs.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the reasons which perhaps caused the Prime Minister to omit in his distinctive Canadian flag design all Christian symbols which might honour this country among Christian nations.

Mr. Choquette: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Valade: Certainly not the hon. member for Lotbinière, who would be too stupid to do so.

The Prime Minister has sown the seed of mistrust, and he has shaken—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Valade: —he has shaken the confidence of the people in the function—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Lotbinière raising a point of order?

Mr. Choquette: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

A lot of things have been tolerated in this debate. But now the hon. member is accusing the Prime Minister of lying. Earlier, he called the hon. member for Quebec East a fool and now, he is calling me an idiot.

I understand that when he is reading the speech of Mr. Allard, his vocabulary is more proper; but when he speaks on his own, he loses his head and uses coarse language.

I ask him to withdraw and to speak as a parliamentarian and not as a member of parliament who will be defeated in the next election.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege—

[Text]

Mr. Skoreyko: I cannot see, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A question of privilege has been raised by the hon. member—

Mr. Skoreyko: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before the two hon. members who are now standing proceed any further I would ask them to resume their seats. Would the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) kindly resume his seat. The Chair should be allowed to make a ruling immediately. I believe no question of privilege has been raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette). I do not think the epithet used by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) is unparliamentary.

Mr. Skoreyko: With great deference, Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege I would say that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) took offence at the words used by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade). The hon. member for Lotbinière said the hon. member for St. Mary used the words "a fool". If the hon. member for St. Mary recognized certain qualities in that particular member, I do not see why he should take offence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that very little has been added to the question by the intervention of the hon. member. A ruling has been made that there is no question of privilege. The hon. member for St. Mary has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Villeneuve rise on another question of privilege?

Canadian Flag

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, here is my question of privilege. While the hon. member for St. Mary talked about Christianity and the need for more Christianity in Canada giving us quotations of 2,000 years ago, he called the hon. member for Lotbinière a fool. I say this. Although for the last 2,000 years the same Bible has been preached in Canada and elsewhere, there are still people like the hon. member for St. Mary who incur damnation every day.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the co-operation of all hon. members not to raise alleged questions of privilege or points of order to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor and who is entitled to be heard without interruption.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all members on this side of the house. My question of privilege arises out of the remarks of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) when he referred to reading speeches in this house. I want to point out that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. McLean) the other afternoon never took his nose out of his notes, and that is a far cry from what the hon. member who now has the floor is doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. For the third, fourth or fifth consecutive time, there is obviously no question of privilege whatsoever and I fail to see how hon. members' privileges are affected by the point raised at this time. I again ask the co-operation of all hon. members to allow the hon. member for St. Mary to continue his remarks uninterrupted.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I now rise on a question of personal privilege myself. I would like to submit to Your Honour that I have been continually interrupted while making my speech.

I have been insulted, although I do not care from which corner these insults come. I think these people are causing more disruption and obstruction by their interventions in these proceedings than we ever did in the house. I think the time they have taken by these interferences should be given to me to compensate for the injustices now being caused to me.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry for having said—First of all, I did not use the words imputed to me by the hon. member for Lotbinière to the effect that I said that the Prime Minister had lied. I said that it had been said by his own colleagues.

I am sorry for having said that the hon. member for Lotbinière is a fool and is completely lacking in intelligence; I am sorry for having said that the hon. member for Villeneauve is lacking judgment. I never spoke so many truths in so short a time. I hope that the house will put up with me.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the Prime Minister because of the procedure he followed in introducing this resolution in the house, sowed distrust. He shook up forever the confidence of the people for the function he represents or which he should represent.

The man who once said:

That he preferred to live under the communist yoke rather than be killed by the atomic bomb——once again showed an uncommon weakness.

If the Prime Minister was not afraid to face an election, he would not have backed down. Therefore, it is not judgment which motivates his decisions, but fear. And fear is a rather bad adviser.

The Prime Minister was, at first, afraid to lose face. That is why he did not consult the party chiefs. He was afraid of an election, and that is why he sullied the matter of principle. He was afraid of being overthrown by his own members on the second part of his resolution, with regard to the adoption of the union jack as a second flag; that is the reason why he avoided the confidence vote.

The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) has become the official propagator—I mean official propagandist—of the Liberal government—

Mr. Choquette: Not propagator, but propagandist. You do not know how to read.

Mr. Valade: The hon. member for Lotbinière does not understand what I am saying—

Mr. Choquette: The hon. member for St. Mary cannot read.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Lotbinière is a neurotic, I shall ask him to leave the house or to respect those who have the floor, as well as your authority.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to prevent the stupid member for Lotbinière from interrupting me at every turn for nothing.

Mr. Choquette: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, we are all fed up of hearing the hon. member using abusive language and insulting everybody, calling one stupid and the other idiot.

I cannot understand that you should have ruled that such language was parliamentary. The hon. member uses coarse language when he does not read the speech of Mr. Allard. I would ask him to read correctly the speech written by Mr. Maurice Allard; that is all I want. He should abide by the rules, be polite and refrain from using coarse language.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. Mary.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, now that the show is over, I will proceed with my remarks.

For the past few days, service stations have been able to write to the Prime Minister, attention of the Minister without Portfolio, to obtain at low cost, pennants, flags, beer mugs and shields with the three maple leaves of the Prime Minister.

If supplies run short, the minister may import some at short notice from Japan, because deliveries are made very quickly.

The three-leaf flag has become a profitable business for the traffickers of the country. The government has suddenly become a distributor of souvenirs. It is even surprising that the Minister without Portfolio is not seen with a cart in front of the parliament buildings auctioning the Pearson's proposal to visitors.

We, on this side of the house, want a distinctive Canadian flag—

Mr. Choquette: Now, you are reading much better.

Mr. Valade: You are now speaking better yourself.

As far as I am concerned, I shall vote for a distinctive flag of which we can be proud, a flag that we shall display with pride, that we shall respect and which will be respected throughout the world; in short, a flag that will make us feel Canadians first and foremost.

But how could we be proud of the Prime Minister's suggestion if it has to be forced upon us by a majority vote when it has been soiled by the partisan ambitions of the Liberals or by amateur hucksters.

If the Prime Minister is really sincere about his distinctive Canadian flag project, he should leave partisanship out of it. He should accept alternatives reflecting the aspirations of the Canadian people in this matter.

I have expressed my views several times on this question. Several Conservative members expressed their views on it in the house between 1958 and 1962. Those many suggestions on a Canadian flag were made by Conservative members who were then in power and not afraid of assuming their responsibilities, and they were respected by the leader of their party, the then prime minister and present Leader of the Opposition.

Never did we get, from the Liberal opposition of the day, any suggestion for a distinctive Canadian flag, but we, the Conservatives, got down to work.

We began to find a solution to that problem which had been neglected for 22 years, under the careless Liberal administration of our friends opposite.

Mr. Speaker, we now have to deal with a subamendment—

An hon. Member: About time.

Mr. Valade: In my opinion, it is imperative—and I think my friends' time will not be wasted—to bring to light now the conflicting stands taken by certain hon. members or party leaders, just to show to what extent this debate has managed to distort the objective we should all strive to achieve.

On the question of the referendum, for instance, the Ralliement Créditiste have actually disowned their past and their constituents. The member for Villeneuve, a few moments ago, intervened in the debate and he accused the opposition of trying to filibuster in this debate by proposing a referendum.

Now, on March 5, 1963, during a meeting he held in Montreal, with all his candidates of the island of Montreal, he said that if his party came into office, he would call a referendum on the question of a national flag within six months. And here is the man and his party—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish the hon. member for St. Mary would have the honesty to quote word for word what I said about a distinctive national flag in 1963, because he is mistaken. Someone else said that within six months a plebiscite or referendum would be requested or held to choose a flag. If the hon. member for St. Mary claims that the hon. member for Villeneuve himself requested a plebiscite, he is lying barefacedly before all hon. members of the house.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to have the charges laid by the hon. member for Villeneuve withdrawn because, according to Beauchesne's, when an hon. member rises in the house, he is responsible for what he says and if he must submit evidence to support his remarks, otherwise he can be accused of lying.

Mr. Caouette: Give us proof.

Mr. Valade: In reply to the hon. member for Villeneuve, I have here an article from the March 5, 1962 issue of La Presse, which reads thus:

Mr. Caouette's promise.
A referendum within six months on the flag issue.

It is written out in full and for the future guidance of the hon. member for Villeneuve, here is what it says:

Six months after coming into power, the Créditistes will ask the Canadian people, by way of a referendum, to choose a distinctive national flag.
Such was the statement made on Sunday afternoon by Mr. Réal Caouette, national associate leader of the Social Credit party, who was the chief speaker at a big Social Credit meeting in Montreal.

Should the hon. member wish me to keep on reading, I will give the names of all the candidates attending that meeting.

Mr. Caouette: Name them.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Valade: I think that when the hon. member for Villeneuve accuses me of lying, I wonder who is the liar in view of the evidence. I shall not require an answer, for charity's sake.

Mr. Speaker, on this matter of a referendum the hon. member for Villeneuve is not the only one who has taken a contradictory stand. On January 23, 1961—and I see the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) taking out his references—on January 23, 1961 in the house, the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, seconded the former member for St. Boniface, Mr. Laurier Régnier, who moved a bill to provide for a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian distinctive flag. The Minister without Portfolio supported this resolution; but now that he is a member of the cabinet, he rejects the proposal for a referendum. Such a contradictory stand is not in accordance with the soundness and sincerity we should bring into the debate concerning the adoption of a distinctive national flag.

I believe that if our hon. colleagues on the opposite side, as well as the members of the smaller parties, have not got enough courage to rise in this house and express clearly and positively their points of view on the flag issue, but are satisfied with mere interjecting or charging the official opposition with filibustering, I believe they are dishonest and their present stand is contrary to the dictates of their conscience, for in taking such an attitude, they only prejudice the cause they should support, that is to gain the confidence of the people in their members by discharging their responsibilities and their duty as representatives of the people and the Canadian population.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The hon. member has been wriggling for 20 minutes—

Mr. Dupuis: No, for 45 minutes.

Mr. Caouette: —for 45 minutes—

Mr. Choquette: This is Mr. Allard's speech.

Mr. Caouette: We do not know where he is heading. Could he tell us exactly whether he is in favour of a referendum? In favour of a distinctive national flag?

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Caouette: What does he favour? We wish we knew.

Mr. Choquette: That is something you would have to ask Mr. Allard because he is the one who wrote that speech.

Mr. Valade: If the hon. member cannot see what I am getting at, we know even less what he stands for since, he is now against a referendum whereas he was in favour of it during the election campaign. The same thing goes for the Minister without Portfolio. At the time, he was in favour of a referendum; now he is against it.

By expressing my opinion on this question, I am taking my responsibilities—

Mr. Caouette: Which question?

Mr. Valade: —and I am exposing the treachery of those who make believe that they are sincerely opposed to the Conservative proposal.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member for Villeneuve to remain seated and to stop bothering me. He can speak after I am through and I shall answer—

Mr. Caouette: And I am going to give you a good licking too.

Mr. Valade: The Créditiste candidate lost his deposit in my riding.

Mr. Caouette: Wait until the next election.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I was speaking precisely on the subamendment, that is on the referendum and my hon. friend is wondering why I do not deal with the matter under consideration. Then if the hon. member is dishonest enough to impute to others the faults he may have made himself, he should have the courage to repeat his statement and assume the responsibility of his assertions. If he does so, I will summon him before the committee on privileges and elections.

An hon. Member: As the union nationale.

Mr. Valade: I know that the hon. member for Lotbinière is a pain in the neck for the Prime Minister and parliament and I hope he will have medical treatment before too long.

Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister had appreciated that before introducing the flag resolution, it would have been better first to agree on the definition of the term which in my opinion give rise to all his troubles, he would have realized that it was necessary to determine what is meant by the word "distinctive".

For some of my English speaking compatriots, the word "distinctive" has quite a different meaning than for French speaking people.

For them, it can be an alteration of the red ensign, with also a symbol reminding us of the participation of French Canadians on an equal basis. If they are sincere—and I think they are—they are entitled to this opinion. But I feel that while respecting this viewpoint, we must admit that it is neither in harmony with the desire of the majority of the people nor able to establish a real Canadian spirit and to unite all ethnical elements in our country.

For us, French Canadians, this word "distinctive" means something which would not include any sign or symbol of dependence on another country.

We want to be first of all Canadians, proud of our origins, proud of our history. Confident in our future, we ought to accept nothing less than a flag which would be truly ours, which nobody might confuse with another one. Hoisted throughout the world, it will have to be the symbol of a nation on a par with the great powers. And it will open for us the doors to international discussions on an equal basis.

A flag including a foreign emblem would be likely to lower our prestige in the world. It would prove that we are not yet free from our colonial status, while in fact the Statute of Westminster of 1931 freed us from this stigma.

How can we talk of repatriating our constitution if we have not acquired yet the patriotic maturity required?

Do we suffer from a lack of patriotism? Should we not put our country above everything else? If we are able to answer yes readily to all those questions, we cannot accept anything but a truly distinctive national flag without any symbol of subservience.

But if our heart, our feelings, our attachment are not entirely centred on our country, we are not mature enough to ask for a truly Canadian flag and we should talk even less of total Canadianism.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to submit to the house the ten commandments we would be wise to observe if we want to reach a settlement on the flag question. Perhaps I should have submitted them earlier, for our hon. friends opposite would have then controlled their temper.

The commandments would be as follows:

1. Establish our good faith, explicitly.
2. Speak on behalf of our constituents, courageously.
3. Avoid offending remarks, conscientiously.
4. Eliminate the racial question, obviously.
5. Avoid claiming that a Canadian distinctive flag is a concession to Quebec, naturally.
6. Co-operate in finding an acceptable solution, sincerely.
7. Express our views, freely.
8. Refrain from distributing the three-leaf flag indiscriminately.
9. Liberals should express their views, honestly.
10. Do our duty as we should in this parliament assembly.

Mr. Choquette: And the hon. member should sit down, slowly.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, to end this deadlock, the Prime Minister should accept an alternative; he should prove his goodwill to the people by withdrawing his three maple leaves and accepting a compromise meeting the wishes and the aspirations of the Canadian people.

Many hon. members found quite enticing the suggestion made the other night by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent). In fact, many colleagues told me they were quite ready to accept a flag bearing one green maple leaf which would in a way recall the history of our country, a symbol which would not be a symbol of division but one of national unity. The maple leaf identifies Canadian people everywhere in the world, as at the Olympic games for instance. When our athletes go abroad, they wear a maple leaf on their uniforms and this is how they are identified as Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Valade: The maple leaf is an accepted symbol, but there has never been three maple leaves on coats of arms, jackets or uniforms of our representatives abroad. And I hope that the Prime Minister, if he wants to show his sincerity in coming to an agreement on that question, will accept this alternative and change his flag so that it will be acceptable everywhere.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, obviously I do not intend tonight to speak on the merit of the resolution which is before the house. I plead guilty; I was the first to object, for the purposes of the discussion which followed the introduction of the subamendment, to speeches foreign to that measure.

Therefore, tonight I will keep strictly to the question of procedure, that is to the question of deciding which procedure must be admitted in a effort to put an end to the debate which has been going on for so long already.

[Text]

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made certain suggestions about the conduct of the business which, if I am restating them correctly, were as follows: First, the official opposition is to state clearly their intentions in this debate. Then, he asked the government to take those intentions into consideration. He then urged the government to do three things: 1. To sit it out without any indication of closure of any kind; 2. To keep the door open for compromise; 3. To plan the week's business from now on with Mondays taken for legislation, Fridays for estimates and the other three days for the flag debate. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) commented on this suggestion in these words: "Accepted here and now; it is up to the government."

In the early part of his speech, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that if the official opposition wanted a prolonged debate for the purpose of bringing out every aspect of the flag question the hours of sitting should be extended. I am going to respond to this suggestion here and now on behalf of the government. We would, of course, be glad to get on with other legislation. We think the best way of doing that is to get the flag debate over with. But if that is not possible, we are not prepared to have the time available for the flag debate in each week reduced.

However, there is one way in which the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could easily be carried out right away. The government would be prepared, if the house will agree, to sit on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, in the evening, eight to midnight. In this fashion the number of hours available for the flag debate would not be reduced. The government then would be only too happy to reserve Mondays for other legislation, on the understanding that the flag debate will be concluded by the end of September.

Mr. Monteith: Go away; by the end of September.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Same old nonsense.

Mr. Crouse: Just a different type of closure.

Mr. Favreau: I am asking all hon. members to give serious thought to these proposals. I shall try to arrange a meeting of the house leaders of the various parties, tomorrow if possible, with a view to seeing whether they could not be put into effect next week. I hope this ready acceptance by the government of suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be ample evidence that the government is keeping the door open and is ready to consider any reasonable course in relation to the present debate.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, as has been quite obvious, it was not my intention to enter this debate at this stage of the proceedings. I think it has been amply demonstrated that my colleagues in the New Democratic party take the same stand. However there comes a time when your concern for your country can no longer allow you to remain quiet. Certainly, the performance of this parliament from the time it opened last February, and more and more in recent months and weeks, leads anyone who has any concern for his country to stop and do some thinking. I think this concern is very well summed up in an article that came to my desk today, and what surprises me is that I think this is the first article this particular writer has ever written with which I could agree. I am referring to Mr. Lubor J. Zink, and I would like to read his article at this time. He says:

> It is safe to assume that, as a result of partisan exploitation of dormant nationalistic sentiments, the flag controversy is by now seen by many Canadians as a symbol of English-French rivalry. In this perversion of the search for a distinct expression of Canada's final stage in her evolution from colony to full independence, most Quebeckers tend to regard the ensign as a reminder of English dominance which they are no longer willing to tolerate. Conversely, English speaking Canadians are led to believe that the maple leaf flag denotes Ottawa's betrayal of all they hold sacred in their heritage. The new flag, they are told by those who call it sneeringly "Pearson pennant," symbolizes Grit abject appeasement of and sellout to the French.
> All this sowing of nationalistic mistrust, which cannot but produce a harvest of hatred and strife, is done by allegedly rational men motivated by visions of a strong, united Canada.
> One cannot but wonder what goes on the in the minds of these blindly partisan politicians when in the same breath they deplore the fanning of nationalistic ferment in places such as Cyprus. There they say irresponsibly inflamed passions must give way to reason. The world cannot tolerate old enmities to play havoc with peace.
> At home, apparently it's different. And when the P.M. at the request of an opposition M.P., calls a meeting of party leaders to see if some acceptable way out of the impasse could be found, the attempt is described by his chief political rival as a sign of weakness.
> In this atmosphere no honourable compromise seems possible, unless the electorate shows more sanity than its elected representatives and forces them, through grass root pressure within each political party, to stop acting like a bunch of Makarioses.

I cannot help but wonder, would we have reached the situation we find ourselves in at present if, for example, we had a system like they have in Norway, where the calling of an election is taken out of the hands of the prime minister, where the calling of an election cannot be forced by an obstinate opposition, where they have a party system similiar to ours but where they hold an election every four years, and in the interval they run the business of the country and do not fight the next election every day in the house of commons, as we have seen here for months past.

How did we get in this position? It started out with the stupidity of the way the Prime Minister introduced the flag resolution, where he used his position to present his own choice of a flag and tried to shove it down the throat of the House of Commons when, by admission of one of his own colleagues, it was not even cleared in his own caucus. I cannot think of anything more stupid.

I will say that it is to his credit that he has had the common sense to back away from the position he took originally. I wish the same common sense would be shown by others. But just what happened from there? Then the ball was tossed to the Leader of the Opposition, and obsessed with his mad idea that by some design of destiny he is supposed to be prime minister in 1967—Sir John A. in 1867; Sir John D. in 1967—because of this madness he appears to be prepared to destroy this parliament and with it to destroy this country by turning English against French and vice-versa.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I thought you had a little sense.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Unfortunately I thought some of the others had a little sense, but they have proven they have not.

After five months of frustration in this present session we had the rare good fortune of having the Leader of the Opposition ill for two days and away from the house, and in those two days, as everyone knows, we accomplished more than we had in the two previous months. Then a week or two after that we were blessed again. The Prime Minister went to England for a week, and during that week we cleared everything but three items of the order paper.

I think that the best thing we could do, both for the benefit of this house and the country, is if we could send both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition away for two weeks. Then maybe we could get on with the business of the country.

Mr. Knowles: Send them to Hull—spelled H-u-l-l.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I can possibly best sum up with a few words of doggerel:

The Flag Furore of '64.

On parliament hill, we now have a bill
To provide a new flag for our land.
Letters thick, letters thin just keep pouring in Urging M.P.'s to take up a stand.

With Mike's maple leaves three many do not agree
Some like one, some a dozen or more,
While some would go back to the old union jack,
Some dropping the ensign deplore.

But I hope you'll agree, as you listen to me,
We have more urgent problems than this.
Automation we've found makes the workless abound,
Our economy's still hit and miss.
It would take some vast sums to clear up our slums,
We need medicare, pensions and all,

Canadian Flag

And we surely are fools if we think that our schools.
Can cope with our children this fall.

As on this we reflect I most strongly suspect,
That all this flag fuss and furore;
Has been started I'll bet to make people forget
The grim future we all have in store.
If we don't toe the line, while still there is time,
A red herring, upon a smokescreen,
Is the suitable rag we should wave for a flag,
In a country that just might have been.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) has raised the level of this debate from a non-partisan level, perhaps it will change the line of approach that I had intended to take during my intervention at this time. Then also we had one of those rare occasions during the course of the flag debate when we had an intervention on the part of a minister of the crown, in the person of the government leader of the house. Unfortunately, as usual, he has completely misinterpreted the mood of the house and he has, as I understood the observations that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made this afternoon, completely misunderstood the purpose of those observations. The solution propounded by the government leader of the house is a continuation of legislation by exhaustion.

He made a grave mistake last spring by keeping the house continually in session over the Easter period.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dinsdale: It was the first time in the years I have been here that members of this house were not permitted to return to their constituencies where they could get in touch with reality and refresh their viewpoint of the problems of the nation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that what is wrong with the official opposition?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am quite willing to admit that the fact we have not had an opportunity to renew contact with our constituents has resulted in the sort of mood, the intransigent mood, which prevails at the present time. But if this is a problem with the opposition, how much more must it be a problem for members and supporters of the government who seem to be completely out of touch with public opinion in this nation?

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Legislation by exhaustion does not improve the processes of democracy. It is a Pavlovian technique used when the brainwashers want to break down the resistance of those they want to convert to their own opinions. I would have suspected that this suggestion might have come from the minister of propaganda, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) because this seems to be the function he is carrying out as far as his responsibility in the cabinet is concerned.

I had intended to continue this discussion along the lines pursued by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this afternoon. He was offering to the government a way out of the impasse into which they have led parliament at this time. Certainly, as we have seen during the course of this debate, by the reaction in the country as reflected in the press and other media of information, the government should be looking for a way out. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was presenting his academic viewpoints on the paralysis of parliament at the present time he was reminded that it is the responsibility of the government to control the business of the house, and he agreed that such was the case. I asked him a question. I asked him if it was not true that when the executive arm of government, without consulting its own caucus, without consulting its members, decides to bring an issue before parliament which is not only dividing parliament but which is also dividing the nation, that the only recourse which the official opposition has in such circumstances is to bring a sense of reason to the government by means of a continuation of discussion.

There was a conference on peace, order and good government held at Couchiching a couple of weeks ago and Mr. Speaker was good enough to circulate some notes arising from that conference. I intend to quote from page two where some observations are recorded by Dr. Crick, a political scientist from the old country who was invited to speak. The document reads:

Dr. Crick agreed that a system of government should be flexible and reminded the audience that politics is the art of the possible.

I might observe at this point that the government of Canada has placed parliament in an impossible position because it has presented this house with an issue which is bound by the very nature of things to bring about divisions which are always beneath the surface in a country which can only persist as a nation on the basis of unity in diversity. Later, Dr. Crick emphasized—> —that the functions of the institutions of the government must take account of the changing responsibilities of government, and he felt that the present crisis in British government was due to the fact that the capacity for opposition is weaker than at any period in British history. Parliament, he said, should be a continuous election campaign, a permanent hustings, and it was up to M.P.'s to supply efficient and effective criticism continually.

This is precisely what we are endeavouring to do at the present time. But parliament consists of more than the opposition. It consists also of the backbenchers supporting the government. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned with the fate of parliament in the present circumstances or during a period of a continued minority, I think he should be equally concerned about the disdain which the supporters of the government are displaying, as far as their responsibilities in this chamber are concerned. They are continuing what the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) referred to as "a filibuster of silence". This has been the subject of comment in a leading article in the Winnipeg Tribune, which I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must have seen. This silence is expressive of the worst kind of arrogant disdain for their responsibilities to their constituents. Of course I can understand their silence. They are able to say little on this issue because, as the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), recognizing his own responsibilities as a member of this house, told us, neither he nor any of the government backbenchers had been consulted on this matter. I suppose that if it were not for the rigid discipline which is maintained on the opposite side of the house they would have some observations to make on this subject which would be of interest to this house. But in the circumstances they have nothing to say.

It is more difficult to understand the silence of those who sit on the treasury benches. So far, only one minister has broken that silence, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), except for the intervention tonight of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) which was not by way of throwing light on the reasons parliament had been brought to the present impasse, but rather was to offer more of the same legislation by exhaustion, an offer which will only intensify the unhappy mood which prevails in parliament at the present time.

It would seem that even members of the cabinet were not consulted on this matter, because they are not silent on the hustings even though they are silent in this house. Mr. Speaker, I read a voluminous quantity of speeches made by members of the cabinet in various parts of this nation. Indeed so many of these speeches cross my desk that I must confess I do not have time to read them all. I have had come into my hands a most interesting series of speeches made by members of the cabinet on the very subject under discussion in this house—speeches made outside the house, not in this chamber where they should have been made—and I hope to be able to put some of this helpful and useful material on the record before I conclude my observations here tonight. Obviously, with backbenchers remaining silent and members of the cabinet remaining silent, it is easy to understand why there is protest not only in this house but across the nation over the design of a distinctive national flag, to use the classical phrase, that has been presented to this house, and also the method by which it has been presented. These are the main points that have emerged in the discussion up to the present time. This is why members of the opposition are trying to be helpful in providing avenues of escape from the difficulty into which the government has gotten itself. This is not even a party flag. This is not a flag that has come out of the careful consideration of a party caucus, that has been carefully considered by the cabinet. This is a personal flag, a personal design. I do not know who were the advisers to the Prime Minister on that particular design. We know that my very good friend, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) was one of the heraldic authorities who advised on this matter. I would be suspicious of objectivity in this regard, because while the hon. member for Leeds is a very good friend of mine, he indicated during his term in opposition in this house that he was also a very zealous partisan.

Since the flag was introduced into this house there has been a lack of consistency in the government's dealing with the matter. It has vacillated in the most uncertain and confusing manner. It was brought into the house with all the bombast of electioneering flamboyance. It was said that the flag would be flying by July 1 and the challenge was issued to the opposition to move a want of confidence motion in connection with the flag. This is not the way to deal with an explosive subject of this nature. This is inviting difficulty in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Then, Mr. Speaker, the opposition, realizing its responsibilities in such a divisive matter refused to test confidence in the government on the question. The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) accuses the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), as he did just a moment ago, of wanting an election on this issue. If we had wanted an election, we would have accepted the challenge of the Prime Minister when he invited us to move a want of confidence motion on the flag issue during our dealing with supply. The question of an election is not at stake. I could not understand why the hon. member introduced this particular thought tonight, because while it is true that the Prime Minister took fate by the forelock and said the destiny of the government would depend on the decision with regard to the flag, he again vacillated, has backed down, and an election is no longer in question on the issue. What is in question is whether the government is going to continue, to quote the immortal words of the Globe and Mail, "parliament and Canada on a collision course on this vital matter".

As the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) indicated the other evening, the concession of returning to a free vote, taking off the whips in this matter, has come too late because positions have hardened; most hon. members on the government side have declared themselves, some with great searching of souls, as was indicated by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos) who spoke the other evening as one of the few government representatives in the debate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this concession is quite meaningless.

The question that arises is, just how are we going to get out of this present difficulty? Perhaps before we proceed to that question we should ask how we got into it. This is the question propounded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tonight. I think it is a product of the bureaucratic mind. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that if parliament does not sort itself out we are going to transfer power to the establishment.

Mr. Knowles: We have done so already.

Mr. Dinsdale: Well, Mr. Speaker, this has been going on for a number of years in this country. The seat of power is being gradually removed from the floor of the House of Commons to the offices of the bureaucrats. This process of erosion is assisted by the silence of the government; by backbenchers who refuse to get up and express themselves on this matter. In these circumstances, this is inevitable. But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre forgets that there are no less than six members at the highest level of the establishment who occupy cabinet positions at this time. I believe in the Maclean's magazine presentation of the Canadian establishment six of the present cabinet ministers were given the highest accolade; they were called mandarins, and the Prime Minister himself was described as one of the members of the establishment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask this question. Perhaps the difficulty is that the establishment is too closely identified with the government and this is why they cannot see the wood for the trees. This is why they have precipitated parliament and the country into the present unhappy impasse to which we have been directing our attention.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: If, as he says, the establishment is so closely related to the party in power, does not that make it all the more serious for parliament to follow any course that seems to give more and more power to the establishment?

Mr. Dinsdale: As the hon. member himself said this afternoon, it is the government that directs the course of parliament. The opposition can only direct its attention to the business that is placed before parliament by the government. As we all know, the opportunity for the opposition to initiate business in this house is restricted to the private members' hour. I think my hon. friend, who has been most active in this area of parliamentary interest, is fully aware of what a frustrating and ineffective aspect of the work of parliament is this particular part of our procedure. So if it is a case of power being transferred to the establishment, we are faced with this unhappy situation—the establishment is closely interlocked with government from the Prime Minister down.

I think we are all aware that the bureaucratic mind is something like the scientific mind. In fact, I think one of the tests of mandarin stratification in the Maclean's article was the necessity of being a Rhodes scholar, and most of the Rhodes scholars operating in the Canadian establishment majored in social science studies. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the bureaucratic mind is very closely related to the scientific mind, which endeavours to reduce multiplicity to unity. But unfortunately if this process is carried too far in the political realm it leads inevitably to totalitarianism, or at least an overweening power of the executive arm of government. This can make tyrants out of those who merely aspire to clear up the mess. This has been demonstrated over and over again whenever democratic bodies around the world have reached the impasse we have reached at the present time.

Our constitution is dedicated to the fundamental premises of peace, order and good government; and I would remind the house that in order to have peace and order you have to have good government. I do not think we have good government, certainly on this issue which is before the house at the present time. You cannot resolve the problem of national unity in this country merely by making a quick change in symbols. This is political primitivism at its worst. As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), a wise and experienced member of this house, said the other day, it is political ignorance on the part of the government to think that by a sleight-of-hand change in the symbols of this nation they can resolve all the problems of national unity which have been with us ever since confederation. This is to ignore the problems of regionalism, of our vast geography, of the ethnic multiplicity, which was referred to by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Slogan) tonight, and all the political differences. We have five parties in this house. Indeed, we might say we have seven parties, because there is not unanimity within all the party ranks, as I shall point out in a moment.

On top of this we have endeavoured to apply a political system, a parliamentary system which grew up in a unitary state, to a federal state, but with all its peculiar problems. Some have objected to the idea of a plebiscite or a referendum because they say that this has never been used in the mother of parliaments in Great Britain. But the mother of parliaments is a unitary state. There they have a homogeneous population. They have social homogeneity which we do not have in this country, and whenever in Canada a government has been foolish enough to raise an issue on controversial matters as fundamental as this one before parliament they have inevitably resorted to the referendum technique. Again this was the technique of the Liberals back in the early years of the world war. No leader who understands Canada would proceed as the Prime Minister has on this matter.

We have not only advocated a plebiscite as a way out so that we might get on with the business of the country. As has been pointed out in the debate tonight, the leader of the Creditistes was also in favour of a referendum when he spoke at a rally in Montreal on March 5, 1962, as reported in La Presse. Said the leader of the Creditistes:

> Six months after taking power the Creditistes will propose to the Canadian people, by way of a referendum, the choice of a distinctive national flag.

But we have gone beyond that now. We are suggesting a parliamentary committee which, if it was the intention of the government to proceed with this matter, is the way we would normally proceed in the house, instead of making a narrow partisan and political issue out of a controversial subject. The door is still open, and all that is necessary is to have a parliamentary committee representing all parties in the house, as recommended by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), get together and try to come to some consensus so that we might resolve the divisions that are all too obvious in this house and across the nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the only serious intervention on the part of a cabinet minister pointed out all too clearly that this was an explosive and divisive subject. He referred to filibusters and all the rest of it, but his main thesis went beyond this point. He referred to the division which has arisen in the Progressive Conservative party on this matter. He shed crocodile tears over the subject. But what about the division in the Liberal party which has appeared in this chamber? We have heard members supporting the government most critical of the way this subject has been handled. I am not going to repeat what the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) has said, but he referred to decision by a rump convention. He also referred to no consultation with members of the party and no announcement in the campaign literature, and so forth.

There is also a division in the Social Credit party. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) the other night did not take a stand either way. He quoted some letters and said, in effect, that some of his friends are for this and that some of his friends are he said: "I am for my friends". That is the classical example of the answer which is given by politicians when they do not want to make a decision on a controversial matter. There is also division in the New Democratic party. The only party which has demonstrated solidarity forever on this matter is the Creditistes, which is a party dedicated to extreme viewpoints and issues in this country. I think that speaks for itself.

While the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has not spoken in this debate, he has had things to say on the subject of a distinctive flag over the years. I want to get around now to discussing some of the speeches which have been made outside the house by ministers of the crown. This matter was before Canada in 1954, when the prime minister of that day, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, a responsible leader who knew the political pulse of the nation, refused to proceed with an issue which had been brought forward by a backbench member of the government at that time.

Then again, even before that, I have a report appearing in MacLean's magazine for February 1, 1954, dealing with the debate of that year and it quotes the now Minister of Transport when he was a member of the establishment.

Mr. Churchill: Was he a mandarin?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, he was a mandarin. The article says:

> It didn't come up again until 1944 when another Mackenzie King government proclaimed that the Canadian red ensign should be Canada's battle flag, borne by the troops on D-day and after.
> On V.E. day the following year came another occasion when the issue was almost settled. Prime minister King was in San Francisco preparing a broadcast to the Canadian people. He thought he should put in something about the flag.
> Jack Pickersgill, then special assistant to the prime minister, asked "Why don't you tell the people this is Canada's national flag, and have done with the argument about it?"

That is in quotations in Maclean's magazine, the article written by Blair Fraser.

An hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Monteith: He is trying to think one up.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Fraser goes on:

> Alas, he was too blunt. People who have read Mackenzie King's diary report that on that day King recorded the incident with the comment that he wasn't going to have such a delicate matter settled by a brash young secretary.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was 20 years ago. I was only 40.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Dinsdale: You're still in the foolish forties.

> Instead he contented himself for the moment with authorizing the use of Canada's battle flag on the peace tower and on other public buildings at home as well as abroad.
> Four months later came the order in council which did proclaim the red ensign our distinctive national flag.

That was the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), a very prominent member of that government. Back in those days he spoke out about what he thought as a Canadian.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is something of an historian himself and presumably made an honest living in academic life. I do not think he would want to distort the record. That is not precisely what happened. I made no speech whatsoever about that, but I did have a private conversation with Mr. Mackenzie King in a hotel room in San Fransisco. Mr. Mackenzie King decided it would be a rather good idea to fly the red ensign on the peace tower on V.E. day. I thought that was a good idea too because it seemed to me it was rather more distinctive of Canada than the union jack, which was flown up to that time.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member making a speech, or is he speaking on a point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My understanding is that the hon. minister wanted to ask a question.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like the minister to make a speech in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was trying to liven up the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, he represents the province of Newfoundland in this house and I am sure the premier of that province would like to hear the minister declare himself heartily in favour of the three maple leaf flag.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do so. I declare myself heartily in favour of the three maple leaf flag or any flag with the maple leaf as the distinctive Canadian emblem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister hopes to get around this difficulty by making these typical political dissimulations in respect of the two flag concept. Hon. members opposite have criticized us for discussing this matter in a responsible way and say: Let us vote on the matter. They think a simple vote is going to resolve the difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dinsdale: I would remind hon. gentlemen who are braying from the back benches that the difficulty, the division and the problems of this nation will only begin when parliament makes a decision in such a hypocritical fashion in the hope of getting around these difficulties and divisions by using the two flag concept.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a very serious question. Does the hon. gentleman really believe in the dictatorship of a minority, or does he think the majority has a right to make decisions?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: They are braying again from the other side. Mr. Speaker, I believe in intelligent and honest discussion of these matters rather than the catcalling that has gone on across the way during the course of this debate. I look right in the eye of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) when I make that remark. He was looking with simulated scepticism as I made that statement, Mr. Speaker.

There have been speeches made in respect of this important issue outside the house by ministers of the crown, and I refer to a seminar that was held at the University of Manitoba last March 7, before the government was even thinking about bringing the flag before parliament as a red herring issue. The Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) took part in that debate. One caption in the Alumni Journal reads:

> Mr. Sauvé's "good sense", Mr. Pepin's "charm and wit" set the stage for a day of intensive and interesting discussion of the problem—Canada, one nation or two?

Let me quote what Mr. Sauvé said on that occasion in my native province, the province of Manitoba. He said:

> Let us not concentrate on what divides us...two nations or ten nations. Let us concentrate on one Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what we are asking this government to do, instead of playing around with the two flags, and all those other things which are designed to divide this nation. If we have two flags we will then have symbolic separation, and that is hypocrisy of the worst kind. We would then have separatism symbolized by the presence of two flags.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and quote the remarks made by the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé). His solution was not a national flag. His theme involved a national economic policy. He said we must forget about these other extraneous matters and concentrate on an economic policy which will bring about the unity of this country. He referred to the particular economic difficulties of the province of Quebec. He then went on to support enthusiastically one measure or economic policy introduced by the former government designed to deal with this particular difficulty. He then said:

> So we have to change, and the only way to change is to have the federal government take the initiative in doing things. One field which we have been slowly working is ARDA,—

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister in that they have been slowly working that field. We introduced ARDA and had resources development going full steam ahead until this government moved in with its propaganda and gimmick techniques, and tried to substitute those things for economic progress.

In the one minute which remains, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said:

> What constitutes a nation is...having accomplished great things in common in the past and having the wish to accomplish more in the future.

That is what the hon. gentleman said on Wednesday, March 7, before the government even thought of the flag issue as a red herring technique. I agree with him heartily.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten thirty?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

LABOUR CONDITIONS—QUEBEC—PAYMENT OF FEDERAL SHARE OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon on the orders of the day, I asked a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to the incentive winter works program set up a few years ago in order to provide assistance, through municipalities, to the great number of unemployed and, by the same token, to their families, during the winter season considered as an off-season for workers.

I wanted to know if the government had paid its share for all works performed under this program during the 1963-1964 season, because several persons, namely the mayors and secretaries of municipalities in my county, have asked me why they have not yet been paid for those works already completed since April last. Those people enquired from Quebec, and Quebec suggested that the delay was due to Ottawa.

Now, I would like to know whether it is true that the federal government delays the payment for those projects, and for what reason.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that the situation is not peculiar to my constituency, for I find in the newspaper La Frontière of Thursday, August 20, 1964, on page 10, the following article:

No payment made on $300,000 worth of winter works in Rouyn-Noranda.

Settlers and workmen in twelve parishes of the Rouyn-Noranda county, in which winter works were completed in April last, are still waiting for their pay.

In most parishes, the Rouyn banks financed the major part of the works, so that the workers might receive part of their salaries.

Note this word: part of——their salaries. But the backers of those projects expect that the provincial government will give them the money to reimburse the advances granted by the banks.

According to provincial authorities, five parishes were to be paid on June 15, and seven others on June 20. Now, none of those twelve parishes has yet received any money.

The amounts due by the provincial government, under the federal-provincial agreement on winter works to fight seasonal unemployment, would amount to $300,000 in the county of Rouyn-Noranda only.

Meanwhile, the grocers, butchers, and business people who granted credit to the labourers and settlers, now begin to press them for payment.

As you know, the work has been completed since the end of April.

Those labourers hope to be paid before new winter works begin for 1964-65.

We know that the winter works incentive program was set up to assist those who otherwise could not find a job during the off season. Most of those people have families to support and children at school and besides, they are not free from illness any more than others. They needs money to buy the necessities or obtain the services they need but, in most cases, that joint plan did them more harm than good.

During the last week end, an elector of my riding came to see me to explain the situation he was facing, like those who live in the same community and took part in those works, and that is the case of almost every community in northwestern Quebec.

[Mr. Laprise.]

In the municipality of St. Vital de Clermont, in Abitibi West, work started around December 3, 1963 and ended on April 30, 1964. A first payment was made on June 9, 1964 and the balance has not been paid yet.

Like many others, that municipality could not get credit from the caisse populaire or the banks in La Sarre. Consequently, those people had to work all winter without salary, without income, and some of them had enough stamps to be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. On the other hand, the unemployment insurance offices in Rouyn or Val d'Or refused to pay them benefits since there was work available in their parishes; others who otherwise could have secured help from the social service were refused for the same reason. Go and cut branches or shovel snow.

Now, it happened, Mr. Speaker, that those day labourer settlers went to their general merchant, their supplier, and he was kind and even charitable enough to sell on credit all through the winter, but when the first part of the works was paid on June 9 last, the merchant took everything and kept everything, and we cannot blame him for it.

However, the poor unemployed have nothing yet, as usual. That will have to be changed because there is a class in the twentieth century civilization, in that affluent century of ours, for whom it is always "nothing".

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Labour and the government to find an arrangement with the province of Quebec and the other provinces so that those who participate in unemployment work will be paid regularly every two weeks. They are like everybody else; they are entitled to the salary they need to support their family.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I will get a satisfactory answer.

[Text]

Mr. James A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) put a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen), and though I have not been able to get the exact wording of it, the question appeared to me to be, has the federal government honoured all of its obligations under the 1963-64 municipal winter works incentive program?

The figures that I have been able to obtain are not broken down province by province. However the federal government has approved projects up to $52 million and payments made to the provinces to date amount to $17,694,000. Claims on hand and in process of payment amount to $5,529,000. Of course the payments are made by the federal government when it has received claims from the provincial governments. I would assume if the province of Quebec is behind in making these claims to the federal government it is in no different situation from the other provinces.

As can be pointed out, only something more than $17 million has been authorized, and the reason the payments have not been made is simply that the claims have not come in as certified; but all claims received since August 7 have been paid.

The federal government makes its contribution only when the province has certified that these undertakings are capable, under the legislation, of receiving the payments. It is regrettable if these employees have not been paid for the work they have done; but though we regret it, it is not within the competence of the federal government to direct these payments. We only make the payments as the claims are received. The department would be very interested in endeavouring to see to it that payments are made as the work is performed but that, of course, would require some further negotiations. I will certainly bring this to the attention of the department again.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, August 28, 1964

The house met at 10.30 a.m.

FINANCE

VEGETABLE OILS—TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON REFERENCE NO. 131

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I wish to table copies in English and in French of a report by the tariff board on reference 131, which covers oilseeds, vegetable oils and related products. I am tabling also a transcript of the evidence presented at the public hearings held by the board.

This report contains recommendations relating to oilseeds, vegetable oils, oilcake and oilcake meal. I assure hon. members that these recommendations will be carefully considered by the government. May I urge any interested parties who wish to comment on this report to do so promptly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF CYPRUS FORCE—TURKISH TREATMENT OF GREEK CITIZENS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I have two questions to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs. First, is he in a position to advise whether it is generally expected that the United Nations force in Cyprus will be withdrawn, a conclusion indicated by some words and expressions used yesterday by the President of the United States?

The second question has to do with Canada's position within NATO. May I ask the minister whether in view of the strong feelings of Canadians of Greek origin the government of Canada, as a NATO member, has protested to the Turkish government regarding its treatment of the Patriarch Athenagoras and the expatriation of Greek citizens in Turkey? Protests have come from our good citizens of Greek origin in this country and it is for that reason I ask this question, as well as to bring about an assurance that there will be no exacerbation of the relations between two NATO countries by reason of charges such as those which have been made by Canadian citizens.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the statement made by the President of the United States in connection with the Cyprus force. Nothing has come over my desk this morning in this connection. I indicated yesterday that it is not the intention of Canada to withdraw its contingent from the United Nations force. That is a decision to be made following action by the security council on the recommendation, among other factors, of the secretary general. Any remarks attributed to the secretary general that refer to a possible withdrawal, arise only because of his desire, shared by Canada, that the necessary funds be made available to enable the force to carry on what continues to be, in the language of the head of the government of Cyprus, among others, a very needed presence in the island.

With regard to the position of the Patriarch and the representations made by what my right hon. friend calls good Canadians citizens of Greek descent—and I agree with this characterization—we have impressed on the government of Turkey the desirability of not taking any step with regard to the Patriarch and other Greek citizens in Ankara that would in any way exacerbate the situation. I fully agree with my right hon. friend that it is most desirable that no action should be undertaken that in any way complicates the position of our two NATO partners. It is for this reason that from time to time I have been careful, in response to questions, not to say anything that would in any way affect our association both with Greece and with Turkey.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Might I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government of Canada specifically informed Turkey that in the opinion of the Canadian government and people anything in the nature of persecution against the Patriarch and the Greek citizens in Turkey should be discontinued, and should certainly receive the disapprobation of the Turkish government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we have made the strongest representations to Turkey, as in another context we have made representations to the government of Greece, that they should not undertake any act that would excite the people of either country in respect of a situation so sensitive. I discussed this matter with the foreign minister of Turkey on two different occasions. I must say that in both instances the Turkish foreign minister denied the allegations which I put before him pursuant to representations I had received from a number of quarters, including certain Canadian citizens of Greek origin.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of repeated reports late last evening and this morning over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which suggest that Archbishop Makarios is going to continue to object to the carrying out of the terms of the treaty among Cyprus, Greece, Turkey and the United Kingdom concerning the replacement of Turkish troops over the week end, can the minister give the house any information as to whether the attitude of the archbishop is likely to change or whether the Canadian government has made representations to Greece and Turkey in this regard? Could the minister also tell us whether he has any information as to what the Greek government might do in the event that Turkey commences to replace its troops presently on the island with other troops, and what would be likely to occur if the archbishop attempted to resist this with armed force? Would Greece come to the archbishop's assistance or not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this detailed and involved question has to do, I suppose, with the proposed rotation of part of the Turkish contingent in Cyprus. The contingent there is stationed in accordance with the treaty among Greece, Turkey and Cyprus which was signed in August, 1960 and which provided that both Greece and Turkey would have the right to station on the island contingents numbering 950 and 650 respectively. The reported action of the head of the government of Cyprus is one which has been noted by the Canadian government. The secretary general has advised us that this is one of the matters he hopes to discuss in Geneva when he arrives there later today.

Mr. Nesbitt: Just one thing. I realize I put a number of details into my question, but perhaps the minister could tell us whether he has any information as to what the Greek government is likely to do should the Turks insist on carrying out that term of the treaty and intend to rotate their troops this week end, and should the head of the government of Cyprus attempt to resist that with armed force.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman does not, of course, expect me to be able to give an answer to that question. I cannot say what the Greek government will do, but I can say that in my judgment both the Greek and Turkish governments have within the recent period been displaying a commendable measure of restraint. I would sincerely hope that the position taken by the government of Prime Minister Papandreou, which represents a constructive attitude, will be maintained. I trust that both of these members of the NATO alliance will continue to avoid further complication with regard to the situation in Cyprus.

NATO—AGREEMENT RESPECTING EXCHANGE OF ATOMIC INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is now prepared to answer the question I put yesterday. He had unfortunately left the house, but I am sure he would want to clear up the situation and correct the misleading information which he gave to the house on July 8 and July 16 with regard to the exchange of atomic information.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just learned after coming into the house, when yesterday's Hansard was sent to me by one of my officials, of the question which my hon. friend asked yesterday. I am sorry I had not seen it previously, because if I had I would have dealt with it earlier this morning.

Of course I do not agree with what my hon. friend has said, that there was any inaccurate information. What I said was that there was an exchange of atomic information for the use of members—that is, members of the NATO alliance—for scientific purposes.

Yesterday my hon. friend referred to a message of the President of the United States. I shall table this message, and I think my hon. friend will see that while my statement in this house was not detailed, it was certainly not an inaccurate statement.

Mr. Churchill: May I direct the minister's attention to the answer he gave on July 16, when I asked him this question with regard to the document tabled:

> Is it not true that article III deals with the development of defence plans, the training of personnel and the employment of methods of defence against atomic weapons, as well as matters affecting the delivery systems of atomic weapons?

The minister said in reply:

> —it has nothing to do with nuclear weapons as such—

—and then went on to say it was just with regard to the exchange of atomic information for the use of members for scientific purposes. I suggest to the minister that this is not the information which the President of the United States relayed to congress, in which he said:

> This expanded area of information is needed to enable our allies to make effective use of nuclear delivery systems...This new agreement thus represents a logical and useful step in our continuing and varied efforts to ensure wider allied participation in NATO nuclear defence.

The question I asked on July 8 and then on July 16 was, what are the implications for Canada in this, and the minister was not clear in his answer. He is under a cloud, and I want him to clear himself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says I am under a cloud. He should know, because my hon. friend is continually under a cloud. I may say to him in the best of humour that this morning he is clearly in a fog. But I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman information on this matter.

Mr. Churchill: The minister is, of course, very cheerful. I realize that. But the fog has thickened. I asked him to give us a clear and decisive statement with regard to this matter. Has this exchange of information to do with the advancement or fuller employment of nuclear weapons rather than being just an exchange of atomic information for peaceful purposes?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I point out that I was only aware of the hon. gentleman's intervention a few minutes ago. I propose later to make a statement which I think will satisfy him. He says the fog is thicker. He will not mind my saying it is not only the fog that is thickening.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE ON DESALINATION OF SEA WATER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a very brief question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government accepted an invitation from the United States government to participate in a conference on the desalination of sea water, to be held in October of 1965?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am at sea on this subject. I will have to get some information.

HOUSING

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF ONTARIO ASSOCIATION OF AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General in his capacity as minister responsible for housing, and I also have a question for the Prime Minister. In the absence of the Postmaster General perhaps I can put both questions to the Prime Minister.

In view of the alarming revelations contained in the report given to the government yesterday by the Ontario association of housing authorities regarding the housing conditions of hundreds of thousands of younger and elderly families, will the government give consideration to the imaginative program set out in this report?

My other question also arises out of the report and it is the one which I have for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister consider the suggestion that there be appointed a full time minister of urban affairs and housing? Perhaps the Postmaster General could serve well in that post and somebody else could be postmaster general.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as the first part of the question is concerned, I have had that report brought to my attention and it is receiving the careful examination of the government. Any steps that might be required will be taken, but I do not propose to make any announcement until we have had a chance to formulate them.

With regard to the second part of the question, concerning the establishment of a ministry of urban development, I do not think I can say anything about that at this time, Mr. Speaker.

COMBINES

REPRESENTATIVES RESPECTING AUTOMOBILE PARTS AND ACCESSORIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Last Wednesday I asked him if he intended to do something about the brief submitted to him recently by the national automobile products dealers association. Can he give me an answer now?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will answer that question at the next sitting of the house.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH FRAUDULENT BANKRUPTCIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Does he intend to propose amendments to the Bankruptcy Act to prevent fraudulent bankruptcies from increasing?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I said to the house that the Bankruptcy Act was now under consideration. A first bill will soon be introduced in the house and more general legislation will be submitted first to experts and then to parliament.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Does the minister propose to modify the administration of the Bankruptcy Act in order to permit the establishment of an anti-fraud squad, as suggested yesterday by Mr. Donald Jupp, president of the Canadian building association?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, the necessary measures to be taken under the act in order to prevent more adequately fraud in bankruptcies are a problem which, among others, is now under consideration and to which I am personally giving very serious thought.

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can he tell the house whether he has received since yesterday any information about the Canadians' friend, Mr. Hal Banks who cannot be found?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Laprise.]

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—STATUS OF PERSONS CONCERNED WITH NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Melville inquired about two gentlemen who were purported to have come to Canada to take part in the newpaper labour dispute in Toronto, possibly as professional strike directors.

I have made inquiries and have ascertained that the two men in question, George Hogan and Robert Ameln, are official union negotiators and have come to Canada at the request of the Canadian local union for the purpose of assisting the union in its negotiations with the newspapers. As such, these men were legally and properly admitted in accordance with section 7 (1) (h) which provides for the entry of people engaged in legitimate professions, trades or occupations for the temporary exercise of their respective callings. As long as these two men remain in the category in which they were admitted there is no action the Department of Citizenship and Immigration could take in the matter.

Regarding the inquiry by the Leader of the Opposition as to what direction was given to the three Toronto newspapers in respect of certain persons from the United States employed by the three newspapers in question, the newspapers were directed to arrange for the immediate departure of all ten persons involved, and all these persons left Canada by July 27. No suggestion was made to the newspapers that these persons were to be given the option of applying for landed immigrant status.

INDUCEMENTS TO ENCOURAGE ENTRANCE OF DOCTORS, NURSES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would he consider offering incentives or other inducements to encourage doctors, nurses and laboratory technicians to come to this country to relieve the very severe shortage that has developed?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I feel that this is an excellent suggestion, and I will discuss with the officials of my department what arrangements could be taken to facilitate the admittance of these specialists in Canada.

INQUIRY AS TO OFFICES IN FRANCE AND ITALY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Since the minister has announced that he is considering the reorganization and the expansion of his department, could he tell us how many new immigration offices he intends to open up in France and Italy and whether he proposes to do so in the near future?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are revising our immigration program in Europe and reorganization will include an increase in the staff of our regular offices in Paris and in Rome. We are also considering the opening of new offices to improve the service given to European immigrants.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has evaded the issue and has not answered my question.

Could he tell us why his department has seven immigration offices in England and five in Germany but only one in France and in Italy? Does he intend to redress such a situation so as to bring in a more equal proportion of the various European ethnical groups?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence and in view of the fact that this is very important to a large group of people in this country, I should like to direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture on August 20, and especially in view of the strong protests of farmers and dairy organizations in Canada, will the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Agriculture to call a special emergency meeting of dairy farmers and organizations to consider immediate action before the house adjourns?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss this matter with the minister immediately.

PROPOSED MARCH BY FARMERS ON OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) is away, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is he aware of the fact that the Quebec farmers intend to march on Ottawa as well as on Quebec and if so, will he take the necessary measures to meet these farmers?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not myself aware of this particular march on Ottawa.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT OF CYPRUS CONTINGENT—CANCELLATION OF CHANGING OF GUARD CEREMONY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask the minister if it is proposed that the first battalion of the Canadian Guards will replace the Van Doos in Cyprus later this month; also whether he is considering the cancellation next year of the changing of the guard ceremony by the second battalion?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the first battalion is the stand-by battalion for the United Nations. Consequently if rotation does take place it will replace the first battalion of the Royal 22nd regiment. An advance party will be going forward on September 7 so they will be familiar with the situation there in case rotation is authorized.

In respect of the changing of the guard ceremony by the second battalion on parliament hill, no thought has been given to this particular problem. I had not really had it drawn to my attention very forcefully until I read about it in the newspapers. There are some problems connected with training that are self evident, but it is also recognized that this is one of Canada's very important tourist attractions and that it is a source of pride to both Canadians and visitors. I can assure my hon. friend that all these factors will be very carefully weighed before any decision is made as to any change.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the government consider the employment and training of university students to perform this ceremony in future years, as is done at Fort Henry in Kingston?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I suppose there is no reason why we should not consider that at the same time we are thinking about the over-all problem. It would, however, involve some additional expenditure, and this would have to be discussed very carefully with the other members of the government who are responsible for the national budget.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister used the phrase "if rotation takes place" with regard to the force in Cyprus. Is he contemplating withdrawal of the force, or is rotation not to take place if the force is continued?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made that clear; but there is in the meantime the extension of the mandate which will take place on September 27, I presume, and if that occurs rotation will proceed as planned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Skoreyko: My question has been answered, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Minister of National Defence, to clarify an answer he gave a little while ago to the hon. member for Pictou. It is understood that the minister's executive assistant has announced that the ceremony of the changing of the guard will be continued throughout 1965. Will the minister therefore confirm this?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I am sure he has made no such statement. The matter will be reviewed next spring in the normal course, and a decision will be announced at that time.

Mr. Martineau: You had better check on what he said.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would like to call the attention of all hon. members to the fact that the question period started today at 10.41.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not quite see the relevance of that statement. The question period is not limited except on Wednesdays.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence answered the last question by saying that no change is being made, as far as he is concerned—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Skoreyko: —with respect to the changing of the guard. I want to know from the Minister of National Defence whether he is going to pay any attention to the ridiculous editorial that appeared in the Citizen yesterday under the name of Christopher Young. Is this going to have any influence on the minister's thinking?

An hon. Member: Who is Christopher Young?

Another hon. Member: A nephew of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hellyer: I have not seen the editorial, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESERVE ARMY STRENGTH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister give an authoritative statement to the house regarding the proposed over-all strength of the reserve army for the future? Is it to be 30,000 or some greater or smaller number?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the associate minister made that point perfectly clear in evidence before the special committee on defence.

Mr. Churchill: I am asking for a statement to be made in the House of Commons. Statements made in committees may be all right, but I am asking the minister to let the house know, and let us have it recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure that when the committee reports to the house, the report will make some reference to that particular point.

Mr. Churchill: Well, Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the minister shows a shocking disregard for the House of Commons. I am asking for public information. I want an authoritative statement from the Minister of National Defence with regard to the proposed strength of the reserve army. The Associate Minister of National Defence has been uncertain in his mind with regard to this and has given confused statements to the members of the defence committee. What is the authoritative statement, so the members of the militia may have some understanding of the situation for the future?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the associate minister made an authoritative statement to the special committee on defence and I would have expected the hon. gentleman, who has a considerable interest in these matters, to have read it before now.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I am surely within my rights as a member of this house in asking for an answer to a legitimate question. All I want to know is, what is the proposed limit to be set on the reserve army? The Minister of National Defence should be able to give that answer. And I have a supplementary question. If there is to be a limit set, where will the reduction take place? Is it to be a reduction proportionate to the people now enrolled by provinces in the reserve army, or is the reduction to be specified in certain selected areas?

Mr. Hellyer: I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as the flag debate has been resolved and a decision taken, we will be able to get on with other important business—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: —including consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. We will be glad to answer all questions at that time which are directly related to the estimates of the department.

An hon. Member: He doesn't know.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is a flagrant abuse—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: And I am not going to be shouted down by members on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: One of the purposes served by parliament is to get information for the people, and that is what I am asking for today. This is a legitimate question. The minister is refusing to give this information. It is a flagrant abuse of the rules of this house, a flagrant abuse of his authority as a minister, and I enter this protest against the refusal of the Minister of National Defence to give essential information to the people of this country. The information I am asking for affects our defence arrangements; it affects our reserve army, the citizen soldiers of this country. Why can we not have this information?

EQUALIZATION OF PAY FOR PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I directed a question about a week ago to the President of the Privy Council with regard to the situation of some employees at the Dana station and he said he would have a reply for me. I wonder whether he has it at this time.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being looked into, but I am sorry the information by way of reply is not yet available.

CANADIAN FLAG

CONSIDERATION OF DESIGN AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Does he intend to consult provincial premiers on the flag issue when they meet here in Ottawa next week?

Mr. Robichaud: In Ottawa? In Charlottetown.

Mr. Valade: In Charlottetown.

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the meeting is in Charlottetown, and the flag question is not on the agenda.

Mr. Valade: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister discuss this question with the premiers if some of them bring up the subject?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think any useful purpose would be served by a formal discussion at this time at this particular conference.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): A supplementary question on the flag, Mr.

Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has taken note of the design suggested by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, a non-union jack design, and will the government give serious consideration to that design?

Mr. Pearson: I have taken note of a great many designs, including that one.

[Later:]

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio and ask him whether he or his office has been in contact with any firms or importers in regard to the importation of three leaved flags from Japan.

Hon. Yvon Dupuis (Minister without Portfolio): I am not a Tory; I buy Canadian.

Mr. Churchill: Insulting.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): I would like to direct a supplementary question. Has the minister been in contact with any firm that has a patent or copyright on the three maple leaf design with regard to its use on the Pearson flag?

Mr. Dupuis: That question is completely out of order.

Mr. Webb: The minister has said he is Canadian. I wonder whether he would not consider flying the Canadian flag, the red ensign?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dupuis: I will be very happy to fly the Canadian red ensign until the moment comes that we decide to have a distinctive flag without the emblem of any other country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio, who just stated that he is a Canadian and buys mostly Canadian products, whether he agreed with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) when the latter decided recently to purchase three submarines from England and military equipment from the United States?

Mr. Dupuis: The reply is the same as the one I gave a while ago; the submarine question had been decided by the Tories who were here before us.

[Text]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which is supplementary to the one asked a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. In reply to that question the Prime Minister said that a large number of flags were being considered, particularly the model proposed by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. Can the Prime Minister be interpreted as saying that consideration is being given to proposing a model other than the one which is the object of the resolution before the house at present?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we have a resolution before the house which deals with this matter. When it is disposed of, then we can decide what other steps are required, if any.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since most hon. members wish to reach a solution on the flag as soon as possible, would the Prime Minister give special attention to the proposal of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent), which seems to have been approved by several members on all sides of the house?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I certainly hope there will be a decision as soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR NATIONAL SURVEY ON NUTRITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was served notice of it two or three days ago, and in her absence possibly her parliamentary secretary could answer.

In view of public reports that lack of a survey of Canadian food habits and health standards is hampering research workers, and in view of a statement attributed to a spokesman at the Department of National Health and Welfare that there is need for a national survey of nutrition, a contention with which I heartily agree, would the minister consider authorizing such a survey to be made so the necessary work could be done in this highly important field, and so we as Canadians would not have to rely on the statistics gathered by authorities of the United States of America?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will take up this matter with the department and the minister, and try to have a reply early next week.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF WINTER WORKS PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Minister of Labour. Is he considering the possibility of re-establishing the winter works period from October 15 to May 31, as previously, instead of the dates in effect last year, that is, from November 1 to April 30?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, this change is not under consideration, although there are other changes presently under consideration.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

HULL, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Yesterday, in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), who wished to know whether the department intended to have at least one building built in the city of Hull, the minister stated that, in principle, it had been decided that perhaps one building would be built in Hull.

This is my question. Is the minister ready to accept the responsibility for the fact that Hull, which is right across the river, should be treated as a poor relation as compared to Ottawa?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely—

Mr. Caouette: In principle.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is precisely why I stated yesterday that the government had decided Hull should have its share of public buildings under the proposed construction program.

When I said yesterday that the decision had been made in principle, it was because I could not actually specify what building would be erected in Hull. But it has been decided that Hull would have a building.

I further stated in reply to a supplementary question, that within a month I would be in a position to give specific details.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell us whether in principle this building would be the new mint?

Mr. Deschatelets: I cannot add any further details to what I stated yesterday, but in about a month I think I will be in a position to make a statement on this matter.

In answer to the question of the hon. member for Villeneuve, this will meet a need which has been felt for the last six years.

[Text]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

POLICY RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF SMALL POST OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. The former government instituted a policy of building small post offices across Canada costing less than $25,000. Is it the intention of the department to continue this program under the winter works program this year?

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this policy is being maintained. However, if the hon. member wants further details, I would advise him to direct his question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) who decides where these small post offices are needed.

I think the Postmaster General will be in a position before long to give the house the details of the present program because the Department of Public Works has received from him a list of these post offices, the building of which will be completed before the end of next winter.

FINANCE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL ADVISOR ON TAXATION MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Yesterday the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue asked a question of the Minister of Finance regarding the appointment of certain advisers on taxation. I do not want to go into this question any further except to ask whether these appointments have been made. If the appointments have not been made, could the minister say whether the identity of these persons has been determined and when they will begin their duties?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition is adding to the fog or not, but so far only one appointment has been made, and that has been announced. I am hoping to announce some further appointments as soon as suitable people have been found.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One appointment has been made, and the purpose is to examine and give consideration to the recommendations of the royal commission on taxation. I would ask why the appointments should be made now, having regard to the fact that Mr. Carter, the chairman of the taxation commission, allegedly has informed the government that there will be a delay of six months in the presentation of the report. What will these gentlemen be doing in the meantime?

Mr. Gordon: The chairman of the royal commission, Mr. Carter, had previously advised the government that the report would be ready this fall. Therefore, in preparation for it, I was seeking staff who would help the government to implement such recommendations as might be approved. So far I have succeeded in finding one such person and he has been appointed.

Yesterday the chairman of the commission came to see me in my office and informed me that the commission had run into difficulties and that the completion of the report would be delayed about six months. I am now considering whether to use the individual who has been referred to—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who is he?

Mr. Gordon: He is Mr. James Brown of Montreal. He can assist in preliminary work in connection with this matter, and I expect we shall decide that this is in the public interest and that he should take up his appointment in October.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): I wonder if the minister would tell us whether, in accordance with well known precedent, these outside advisers will have access to budget secrets.

Mr. Gordon: I find that question rather unnecessary.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

An hon. Member: And embarrassing?

Mr. Gordon: Not embarrassing, no. I would remind the hon. member that as the pressure of public business increases, it would probably be a good thing for governments to take advantage of any expert help they are able to obtain from time to time. I hope nothing will be said in this chamber which would discourage public spirited Canadians from accepting appointments of this kind.

Mr. Martineau: I wonder whether after his long diversionary tactic the minister would mind answering yes or no to the question I asked him. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the minister was about to answer my question. If he has forgotten it, my question was simply—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In my opinion the question was out of order, and I think the minister should not answer.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Does the minister think the new appointments will be any improvement on the others he made before?

Mr. Gordon: I think they are all going to be excellent appointments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the minister taking such a friendly attitude this morning, may I ask him whether in view of the success enjoyed by the three wise men he imported for his first budget he intends to ask their advice in connection with the next budget?

Mr. Gordon: I do not know whether other people have noticed it, but it has occurred to me that since the right hon. gentleman's hands were removed from the economic levers of this country there has been a rather noticeable improvement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Taxes have gone up and the deficits are about the same as ever. But the minister has not answered my question. Surely he does not intend to discard the three wise men he imported to produce the first budget which turned out to be such a mess.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman has indicated that he is finding difficulty in procuring the specialists he needs as counsellors. I wonder if he could inform the house how he proceeded to appoint this first expert, so that other persons could apply in the same way.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): In view of the announcement that there will be a delay of six months in the tabling of this report on taxation, does the minister still intend to await this report before making any substantial changes as far as the tax structure of Canada is concerned?

Mr. Gordon: Perhaps I might defer answering that question until the time comes to present the next budget.

[Later:]

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him, with regard to his new appointments, whether any of these men will be tool engineers, so the tax on production machinery can be properly supervised?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, it would be premature for me to answer that question, as they have not yet all been appointed.

WORLD BANK PROFITS FOR LOANS TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he is yet in a position to reply to the question I asked the other day with respect to the proposal to use the profits of the World Bank for the furthering of educational and agricultural programs in underdeveloped countries.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): There will be a meeting in Tokyo the week after next to discuss this matter. These discussions will take place at the annual meeting of the World Bank. As far as Canada is concerned, we have informed the president of the World Bank that we think this is an excellent idea and that we will support it fully.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRANCIS—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE BY MEMBER FOR ST. MARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. In the course of last night's debate the hon. member for St. Mary is reported in Hansard as having said—

Mr. Churchill: What page?

Mr. Francis: Page 7366.

An hon. Member: What date?

Mr. Francis: I am quoting from yesterday's Hansard, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member said:

> Not only has the Prime Minister contradicted himself on a question of principle, but he has lied openly. This charge is not made by myself but by two of his colleagues, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis) and the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), who said as much during their participation in the debate—

Mr. Speaker, I have not participated in the flag debate, and I brought to the attention of the hon. member earlier in the debate the fact that I had not participated. In the course of reading his remarks the hon. member made this totally erroneous, fallacious, completely irrelevant remark which in no way represents my position and is a gross distortion.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, if I said that the hon. member for Carleton had spoken and I accused the Prime Minister of lying, it was because these were the words used by one of his colleagues. I withdraw the remark that the hon. member for Carleton said this, but I think the hon. member for York-Humber said it. It also underlines the fact that the members on the opposite side of the house do not wish to speak in the flag debate.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I have never made any such accusation in regard to my lifetime friend, and I never will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY

1. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $4,677,100.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that if there were a few less private conferences proceeding in full tilt we might be able to hear the minister make his statement.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Chairman, as was done on the last occasion when the various branches for which I am responsible to the house were called, I suggest that perhaps under vote No. 1 I might also make a statement on Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, the national research council, the Department of Defence Production and the atomic energy control board. This was the procedure followed the last time my estimates were under consideration, and I think it might be helpful to the committee if this procedure were followed again. It worked quite well the last time. If that is so I would be glad to proceed with an initial statement on the Department of Industry.

I should first like to review briefly the present economic situation in so far as it concerns our manufacturing industries. Production, employment and shipment of Canadian manufacturing idustries reached record levels in 1963. Volume of production rose by about 6 per cent, employment by 2 per cent and the value of factory shipments by 8 per cent. The factors mainly responsible for this continued strong growth were a rising domestic demand, of which a larger share was supplied by Canadian manufacturers, and increased exports of manufactured products. In 1963 the exports of secondary manufacturing rose sharply and were 16 per cent above those of 1962. At home, consumer demand continued to increase and purchases of consumer goods were 5 per cent higher than in the previous year. At the same time outlays by businessmen for capital goods rose 7 per cent, although there was some slight reduction due to accumulations from 1962.

The greatest increases in production took place in the motor vehicle and related industries. Motor vehicle production rose by nearly one quarter and the parts industry increased by the same proportion. Other notable production increases included 14 per cent in the rubber products industry, 15 per cent in synthetic textiles, 12 per cent in electrical appliances. Above average rates of increase took place in such key industries as primary iron and steel, textiles, chemicals and industrial machinery.

Present indications are that Canadian manufacturing will continue to expand in 1964. Domestic demand is expected to be strong. Factors such as the continuing growth in personal income and a sharp increase in housing completions, as well as the build-up in 1964 capital spending programs which was outlined in the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on July 28, will ensure a further increase in domestic demand for Canadian manufactured goods. Some industries, such as automobiles, steel, rubber and certain sectors of the textiles and chemical industries are now operating virtually at full capacity, and until additional capacity is created the rates of growth may not show substantial increase.

Capital expenditure plans show that considerable additional capacity will become available late in 1964 or in 1965. The plans of businessmen for investment at the beginning of the year involved increases of 40 per cent in capital spending in the primary metals industries, principally in steel, 45 per cent in the textile industries and 26 per cent in the transportation equipment industry. Recent announcements by a number of industries indicate the increases now planned will almost certainly be considerably greater than was at first thought. Another factor which will determine the rate—

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I might ask the minister if he has available extra copies of the report from which he is now reading, which would help us on this side who would like to follow him. If he has not I wonder whether in the future he would provide us with extra copies, since this is not a statement off the cuff. The minister is reading a statement and it would help us if he let us have copies, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration did.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think it is rather unusual for copies of statements made in the house to be distributed to all hon. members.

Mr. Skoreyko: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration did it.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member for Edmonton East, when he spoke in the flag debate, gave us advance copies of his speech.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, as usual the hon. member is reckless with the truth. I used no text at all. I had a few editorials in front of me, and the hon. member knows that.

The Chairman: Order. If the Chair is being asked to comment on this matter, my understanding is that when a minister makes an opening statement on his estimates he usually reads from a prepared text, and I believe it is unusual to have copies of such statements circulated, certainly among members.

Mr. Skoreyko: I agree that it is not done on many occasions, but the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration provided us with copies of his speech. I only ask for the same courtesy that is shown to the press.

Mr. Drury: I have no extra copies, Mr. Chairman, so perhaps the question is a little academic.

Another factor which will determine the rate of manufacturing growth is the extent to which Canadian producers are able to increase the domestic content of final products, such as automobiles and electrical goods, and the extent to which manufacturers are successful in obtaining a larger share of the growing Canadian market for capital goods and other products which are still imported in substantial quantities. The encouraging growth of Canadian manufacturing is attributable to a considerable extent to the steady improvement in the competitive position of Canadian producers. Sales abroad of manufactured goods have increased markedly during the past few years and have contributed to the growth of certain sectors of manufacturing.

Turning now to consider the Department of Industry, hon. members will recall that in November, in connection with the estimates for the last fiscal year, I spoke of dividing the work of establishing the new department into three phases: (i) organizational planning, (ii) staff recruiting and (iii) operations. I said at that time that the first phase was essentially complete, and staffing and recruiting was under way. By July 13, 1964 a total of 290 officers and supporting staff had been recruited, including offers of employment which have been made by the civil service commission and which have been accepted or for which acceptances are pending although the persons involved may not yet be appointed. This number of 290 represents 45 per cent of the total approved strength of the department.

Recruiting started at the senior levels, and directors have now been appointed for each of the ten branches concerned with particular industries, as have most deputy directors. In some branches, such as aircraft and electronics, there were substantial numbers of experienced personnel available from within the civil service, and consequently these have larger staffs in being at the present time. In other branches we have been fortunate in recruiting a nucleus of well qualified personnel from industry. I should, however, inform hon. members that recruitment has not progressed as fast as was initially contemplated. I will make a further comment regarding this matter when the administration vote of the department is under detailed discussion.

Administrative services and advisory functions, such as personnel, legal, financial or other general support services, are being provided by the Department of Defence Production. However, provision has been made within the organization of the Department of Industry for certain key functions not available from defence production, the main ones being an economic advisor and a scientific advisor together with a small staff for each. The scientific advisor and the economic advisor have recently been appointed.

Although the process of staffing the department is still underway, sufficient progress has been made to enable work on the third or operational phase to be initiated and carried on concurrently. The automotive and automotive parts incentive plan and the area development agency's program to attract manufacturing industries to the designated areas of high chronic unemployment are, of course, two of the major programs which have been undertaken. These programs have received wide attention. I would, nevertheless, like to say a word or two about area development in relation to the designated areas.

[Translation]

As most members know, 35 national employment service areas were designated last September as areas of slow economic growth and high unemployment. The purpose we had in mind was to stimulate quickly the establishment of new manufacturing and processing enterprises in these areas; and in this way to give immediate relief to the situation of chronic unemployment prevailing in these parts of the country. Members of this house should bear in mind that the initial designation planned to bring about quick results and meet an emergency situation, is to be regarded as only a first step in a long term program to assist the economic expansion in those areas where it is most needed.

The emphasis on unemployment criteria as the prime factor in designation, while highly desirable for maximum impact in the short run, is obviously not the full answer when we consider a more complete approach. Other factors such as underemployment and the inefficient use of manpower resources must be taken into account in assessing the progress of one area with another. With this in mind we are presently engaged with the Departments of Finance and Labour in making a detailed and exhaustive review of criteria for designating areas in order to take into account these and other factors which will enable us to single out those areas where special efforts will be required over the years if they are to participate more fully in the general prosperity of the country.

Our efforts to stimulate economic development in these designated areas by means of tax incentives for new enterprises are meeting with success. According to the intentions which were indicated to us, more than $245 million of capital is to be invested in new businesses in 23 out of 35 designated areas and more than 9,000 people are to be employed in 103 businesses. These figures do not take into account the tremendous boost that will be given the construction industry in the areas concerned, nor does it take into account the impact it will have on service industries which will be established as a result of new industry moving into an area.

Notwithstanding these results, the same rigorous review given to criteria for designating areas will be given to incentives and I can assure hon. members that every effort is being made to develop even more effective incentives to improve the economic fortunes of designated areas in a fundamental and lasting manner.

A number of other projects are also being undertaken jointly with industry groups. Detailed reports prepared by two technical furniture missions, one to Europe and the other to the United States, have been published and made available to the industry generally. The membership of these missions consisted of representatives of the furniture industry specializing in the fields of design, materials, production, management and marketing, and they studied the latest techniques in their fields which are being applied in Europe and the United States. A series of regional conferences have been organized under the sponsorship of provincial governments and the furniture industry to meet with members of the missions in order to study the application of their findings to the industry in Canada. Such meetings have been held in Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver.

A design award program to encourage the development of improved design concepts for structures using steel was recently worked out jointly with the structural steel industry. The awards will be sponsored by the department and will be made annually.

All of the ten main branches of the department are working with the Canadian tariff and trade committee, considering briefs submitted by industry respecting the forthcoming GATT tariff negotiations.

The department has been receiving a steady flow of requests from industry, provincial governments, trade associations and other groups respecting a wide variety of industrial subjects. The department has been able to provide information and expert advice regarding most of these matters. This service is one of the valuable contributions which the department is offering to groups interested in fostering the development of manufacturing industry in Canada.

[Mr. Drury.]

As may be seen from the estimates which have been tabled, the largest item is vote 5, supporting the development aspects of the Canada-United States defence production sharing program. The purpose of this vote is to sustain technological capability in Canadian defence industry by supporting selected defence development programs. It has stimulated employment activity to a marked degree. Its benefits include the retention of technically trained people in development work, and it has assisted companies to maintain pace with the growth of technology in industry.

It will be recalled that the Canadian-United States defence production sharing program was initiated in 1959 to provide for more efficient and economical use by both countries of their defence industries and to offset the need for substantial Canadian procurement of certain United States weapons systems. This program, in which Canadian industry is given the opportunity to compete for production of U.S. military equipment, requires a high level of technological capability in industry. To retain this capability, a level of development activity has been required which is beyond that which has been supported by the Department of National Defence in recent years.

The development sharing program originated as a result of recognition of this need by both the Canadian and United States governments. The future role of Canadian defence industry otherwise would have been confined to the production of the more simple items of hardware, and our ability to contribute to equipment programs for the defence of North America would have been seriously weakened.

Since 1959 the Department of Defence Production has provided substantial sums to assist Canadian companies to undertake development projects for both United States and allied programs. This development sharing activity in support of the production sharing program has served to maintain some development activity in the defence industry. Many of these development sharing projects, of course, had their roots in earlier Department of National Defence research and development projects to meet Canadian military requirements.

Beginning with the current fiscal year, the vote has been transferred from defence production to the Department of Industry. The transfer took place for the practical reason that many of the people in the Department of Defence Production, who in the past have been responsible for this form of assistance to industry under the development and production sharing program, have now largely been absorbed into the Department of Industry, which has assumed responsibility for the over-all development of Canadian industry. This vote, however, continues to be devoted to the development in Canadian industry of defence items for export.

The department's expenditures for this purpose, which began at an annual rate of $1.8 million in 1959, have now reached a level of $19 million, after having experienced a growth rate of approximately 100 per cent per year. This $19 million of Canadian government expenditure is, of course, only a portion of the total cost of the programs involved. Some $25 million additional will be provided from industry funds and by the military of the United States and allied countries.

The five year period it has taken to achieve the present level reflects the amount of time it takes to find good projects which can be expected to result in eventual sales of the developed product. It is also indicative of the amount of time involved in the relocation of technical people from stand-by occupations back to important development projects. There has been the closest co-ordination with the Department of National Defence in this program.

The response of Canadian industry in the past to Canadian military research and development requirements, and more recently to the challenge of the development and production sharing program, shows that our companies have the management, research and development ability to respond and offer unique products which are acceptable not only in Canada but to other countries. These developments include the Buffalo aircraft, PT-6 aircraft engine, the CL-84 aircraft, CL-89 surveillance drone and the OT-4 engine.

The Buffalo is a turbine powered version of the Caribou I which is being developed for evaluation by the United States army under a cost sharing arrangement among the department, the United States army and the Canadian contractor. The PT-6 is a 600 horsepower turbo shaft engine. The CL-84 is a vertical and short take-off and landing aircraft employing the tilt wing deflected slip stream principle. The CL-89 is a battlefield surveillance drone, the development of which is being financed jointly by the Department of Industry and the British government. The OT-4 is a stationery gas turbine engine which is being developed for evaluation by the United States navy under a cost sharing arrangement between the department and the United States navy.

My department's efforts in the development field are co-ordinated with the national research council program for industrial research assistance and with the defence industrial research program initiated in 1961 by the defence research board. In the defence field, considerable success has been achieved by the defence research board industrial research program in originating new scientific concepts as a basis for new development programs.

Although vote 5, development expenditures of the Department of Industry, and the associated research expenditures of defence research board in industry are related specifically to defence products, hon. members will appreciate their importance to Canadian industrial capability generally. The upgrading of our technological capability in such fields as aircraft and electronics through these defence oriented programs is of great significance to the future capability of these industries to compete in world commercial markets.

I should now like to say a word about the estimates of the Department of Defence Production which, as hon. members will understand, are linked with those I have just discussed. They appear at page 86 of the blue book.

Mr. Lambert: May I interrupt the minister at this point. I am wondering whether we are not steadily entering into a field that is rather too extensive. I certainly appreciate the connection between the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Industry, but I hope we are not going to get into atomic energy and other fields because, as my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton East has pointed out, the minister is in a field that involves statistics to a considerable extent. Hon. members do not have the minister's statements before them; therefore their discussion of these estimates is perhaps not as cohesive as it might be. They will no doubt ask questions about matters which the minister has covered in his statement, and obviously they cannot take down the points. Personally I do not think we should deal with two departments at the same time. I would much rather that we confined ourselves now to the Department of Industry.

Mr. Drury: I can understand that point of view, and my suggestion to cover both departments was made with the desire to be helpful. I do not have copies of these statements for hon. members, and because they do contain some statistical information I thought it might help if I were to make both statements at the outset so they would then be available to everybody rather than dealing with these operations seriatim. If I make these statements now covering the items I have outlined I think it will expedite the business of the house in the long run, and help members.

In my statement today on the estimates of the Department of Defence Production I should like to speak not only of the primary responsibilities and accomplishments of the department in the field of defence procurement where, under the provisions of the Defence Production Act, the minister has exclusive authority to buy or otherwise acquire the defence supplies required by the Department of National Defence, but also to report on some of the progress that has taken place in the Department of Defence Production since the last time I presented the estimates of the department.

In my view we have had a very productive period of study, planning and organization, together with the implementation of certain undertakings which reflect these activities. There has been a great deal accomplished in the department, and this work has involved certain highly important areas. One of the primary activities of importance has been the organization of ten operational branches based on major industrial groupings. These branches, which carry out both the procurement responsibilities of the Department of Defence Production and the industrial development responsibilities of the Department of Industry, are aircraft, electrical and electronics, machinery, shipbuilding, clothing and textiles, materials, food products, wood products, chemicals, and mechanical transport. In certain instances, for example aircraft and shipbuilding, departmental procurement branches have been in existence since the establishment of the department, but in other cases it has been necessary either to reorganize existing procurement units or to establish completely new branches.

Another important activity involves the service branches of the department. These branches, which might be generally described as financial and administrative, have been made responsible for the provision of appropriate services to both the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Industry.

In the course of my estimates statement last year I referred to those recommendations of the royal commission on government organization, the Glassco commission, which involved the Department of Defence Production and which had been approved by the government. These recommendations provided that the department should be made a central purchasing agency to serve all departments and agencies of the federal government, both civil and military, other than the commercially oriented crown corporations. In addition, the government approved recommendations that the department be given the responsibility for certain additional activities associated with procurement, including responsibilities relating to the development of standard specifications, the development of warehousing and materials handling services for all departments other than the Department of National Defence, and for establishing a traffic advisory group to improve traffic management throughout the public service.

As a result of the consideration of these recommendations the concept has emerged of an integrated supply service by which the existing procurement and service branches of the department will be augmented by branches that are responsible for such matters as specifications, cataloguing, regional purchasing, warehousing, traffic management and quality assurance.

Another recommendation of the Glassco commission which I discussed in my statement last year, and which at that time had already been implemented, was the transfer and the control of certain branches from the department of public printing and stationery to the Department of Defence Production. Consequently during the past year the activities of the procurement, purchasing and stores branch have been integrated into my department.

During the past year an international programs branch was established within the department to consolidate the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation with those of our departmental personnel who are concerned with the Canada-United States defence development and production sharing program and the field of overseas defence exports. I shall discuss these matters in greater detail later on in my statement.

I hope that in these general remarks I have succeeded in giving some indication of the activities that have been going on in the department in addition to the carrying out of the primary responsibility, which is the provision of defence supplies for the Department of National Defence. It has been an important year, and I anticipate that the present year will be most important too. Changes of the nature of those I have mentioned require detailed study and planning and cannot be carried out overnight. However, I might mention in this regard that in addition to taking over the procurement, purchasing and stores functions of the former department of public printing and stationery, the department is presently carrying out certain purchasing activities for a number of departments and agencies, including the departments of citizenship and immigration, public works, the civil defence college and the world fair corporation. This activity is in addition to issuing approximately 150,000 contractual documents with a value of almost $800 million.

[Translation]

I would like to set out now some aspects of our procurement responsibilities. In my opinion, it would not be practical to review all our procurement programs, but I want to call your attention on several fields of activity which might be of special interest to you.

In the aircraft field, the main manufacturing programs at this time concern the Starfighter F 104G and the training plane Tutor CT 114. The Starfighter F 104G is a version of the CF 104 now used by the Royal Canadian Air Force. The manufacture in Canada of about 140 planes of this type, including motors and radars, navigation, flying and ranging systems, will be financed jointly by the Canadian and American governments under the mutual assistance program. The CT 114 is a two-seater jet for basic training; 190 planes of this type and also the J 85 motors which will equip them are being made in Canada for the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Among the other great production programs, there are the CHSS 2 helicopter and the Cariboo I aircraft. The helicopter is in the course of being delivered to the Royal Navy of Canada where it will be assigned to anti-submarine warfare. Of the 24 aircraft ordered so far, four were built by the American contractor and the others are being partly built and assembled in Canada. The Cariboo I is a twin-engine aircraft STOL (short take-off and landing) designed and developed in Canada. Up to the present time, 207 such aircraft have been ordered, nine for the Royal Canadian Air Force, 164 for the American army, 16 for the Indian army and 18 for the Royal Australian Air Force. Moreover, many types of aircraft the demand of which is not sufficient to allow economic production in Canada have been ordered from American contractors. Among them there are the CH 113 and CH 113A helicopters which have been ordered for the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Canadian army, the CH 112 light helicopter, reconnaissance aircraft, for the Canadian army and the C 130E cargo aircraft for the Royal Canadian Air Force.

In the electrical and electronic field, the responsibilities of our electronic branch in matters of procurement and production have been increased this year by the transfer to that branch of the procurement of electrical materials which were formerly under the general purchases branch.

Besides the continuing procurement of radar systems, fire control communications, navigation and identification systems for the 104 program, certain needs concerning the CT 114 aircraft and the CHSS 2 helicopter for the navy must be looked after. A number of navigation devices of a new and advanced design, a data registering device in case of accident and an instrument to locate the site of a crash, all in the course of development through our defence exportation program, will be integrated as far as possible later in these production programs.

Electronic training aids remain an important item and simulators are still being manufactured for the governments of Germany, Italy and other European countries. Shipments to the governments of the Netherlands and Belgium have been completed without delay.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. minister to call the attention of the house to the fact that his time has expired and that he cannot continue with his comments without the consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, we are willing to let the minister complete his remarks, but only as regards the Department of Defence Production. I do not think we could accept that the minister gave an account of the work done by the emergency measures organization or other agencies for which he is responsible in this house, for I feel we have enough on our hands for the time being. I agree to let the minister complete the statement he is now making.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Mr. Drury: I agree on that, Mr. Chairman.

A great variety of communication material for land and sea will be procured for the three services to support their modernization programs and further material has been ordered to improve the stationary communication system within Canada.

The needs in operation and maintenance material of the Mid-Canada line have decreased following the closing of about half the stations. Another decrease has been noted with regard to auxiliary contracts for the Pinetree line stations.

The rental of communication circuits operated on a commercial basis to maintain the administrative and operational link between the military establishments in Canada continues on a large scale.

During the past year, two other destroyer escorts were completed as well as a tanker for the navy and an hydrographic survey ship. Construction of a research ship for the naval laboratory on the Pacific coast has been continued.

Four destroyer escorts have been built under the modernization program for those vessels. A contract has been awarded for the modernization of a fifth destroyer, whereas the contract for a sixth will soon be let. The modernization program will go on for a few years until every destroyer escort has been transformed.

With regard to development work started for the national defence department, I want to mention a few projects, and, more particularly the building of a 180-ton hydroglider prototype, the design and plans as well as the final development and construction of which are taking place in Canada for our navy. This will require skill in the fields of aviation, electronic and shipbulding.

Furthermore, contracts have been awarded for the development and production of a series of satellites to complete the Alouette program of the defence research board. The main object will be to develop and produce a new Sonar and other antisubmarine detection systems for the Royal Canadian Navy and air force.

[Text]

I should like to make a reference to Canada-United States defence development and production sharing program. As my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already reported, a meeting of the Canada-United States ministerial committee on defence took place in Washington on June 25. Our joint defence development and production sharing program was one of the subjects discussed, and I am pleased to take this opportunity to confirm that the full support of both governments was reaffirmed for continuation of the program with the agreed objective of assuring maintenance of a long term balance at the highest practicable level in reciprocal procurement of items of mutual defence interest by the United States and Canada in accordance with principles established by agreement with Mr. McNamara in June 1963. A special study of the factors affecting this cross-border procurement is being undertaken with a view to assuring maintenance of the rough balance over the next few years.

While historically the balance of this cross-border procurement of defence equipment has been in favour of the United States, increased participation by Canadian industry in United States programs under our joint program has resulted in a swing of the balance in favour of Canada. Recent Canadian procurements in the United States such as the M-113 personnel carrier and C-130 aircraft have reduced this Canadian advantage, and present indications are that over the next year or so the balance will tend to swing toward a position favourable to the United States. It is in the light of these trends that the study I have referred to above is being undertaken, since it is possible for Canada to look to United States sources for economical supply of certain defence requirements only with the assurance that the rough balance will be maintained.

A very significant aspect of the program is the development sharing agreement. A memorandum of understanding on development sharing has recently been concluded between the United States and Canada which provides arrangements for participation by Canadian industry in United States defence development projects on a cost sharing basis. The projects being undertaken under this agreement are conducted in private industry with costs being shared by United States and Canadian governments and the Canadian firms concerned in appropriate case by case arrangements.

Beyond our Canada-United States program there has been increased emphasis on extending our efforts toward collaboration with our European NATO allies and other friendly countries in the field of defence development, research and production and in bilateral defence trade. An important recent activity was the third meeting of the Anglo-Canadian committee on co-operation in defence development and production which met in London May 25 through May 28. Following that meeting, members of the Canadian team visited other European NATO countries to discuss extension of Canada's bilateral trade in defence equipment.

To sum up, increased emphasis is being given both to continuation of our joint program with the United States and to defence export activities with other NATO and allied countries. To this end, as I have already mentioned, the international programs branch was established to provide central guidance and direction for all the departmental activities associated with these United States and overseas programs.

With regard to the actual votes in this year's estimates, hon. members will note that the most significant increase over 1963-64 is found under vote 1, covering administration costs and grants paid on crown owned defence plants in lieu of taxes. This increase is almost entirely attributable to the establishment increases which have been made necessary by the additional departmental responsibilities that I have outlined in my statement. There has been a decrease in anticipated expenditures under vote 5 for the establishment of production capacity, and there is no change in vote 10, which covers the establishment of qualified sources for the production of component parts and materials.

Vote 15 covers the requirements of the directorate of printing which was made a responsibility of the department in July 1963. The present estimates reflect the reorganization which has taken place during the past year as a result of the transfer and control of certain branches of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery to the Department of Defence Production, and the only item where a significant increase is shown under this vote is that covering plant equipment and replacements. Over 30 per cent of the equipment at the Canadian government printing plant is beyond 20 years of age, and accordingly it is essential that some modernization be effected in order to produce work as efficiently as possible.

This year the estimates covering the development aspects of the Canada-United States defence development and production sharing program are included under vote 5 of the Department of Industry. These proposed expenditures have been discussed in conjunction with the consideration of the estimates of that department.

As requested by hon. members, I will speak separately about the votes provided under section B of the Department of Defence Production estimates relating to the emergency measures organization.

Under section C of the defence production estimates provision is made under vote 35 for the expenses incurred by Defence Construction (1951) Limited at a lower level than the previous year, which reflects a further reduction in the operating costs of this agency which coincides with the reduction in the construction program required by the Department of National Defence.

Similarly, votes 40 and 45 to cover the unrecovered operating costs and capital requirements respectively for Canadian Arsenals Limited show a marked reduction in anticipation of the possible sale to private industry of several divisions of this crown company.

In closing these remarks I would like to refer to the final paragraph of section 6 of the white paper on defence, and in this regard would quote as follows:

> Defence expenditures can make a contribution to the efficient development of manufacturing both for the domestic market and for export and, in so doing, contribute to the general growth of Canada. Programs to establish and improve production sources will continue. The closest co-operation between the armed services and the Department of Defence Production will be maintained in order to promote efficient purchasing practices and to see that Canadian products are used wherever that is feasible.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hales: I think we must realize at the outset that the minister was confronted with a difficult task in presenting the main estimates of this department, inasmuch as there are so many branches for which he is responsible. It seems to me that to load down one minister by placing so many branches under his jurisdiction shows very poor organization indeed on the part of the government.

As I understand it, the Minister of Industry is responsible for the following departments: the Department of Industry, the Department of Defence Production, the atomic energy control board, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Canadian Arsenals Limited, Canadian Patents and Development Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, Defence Construction (1951) Limited, the emergency measures organization, national research council, Polymer Corporation, public printing and stationery, and the queen's printer; some 14 departments. This in itself is not fair; it is not good business organization, and it is humanly impossible for any one minister to have all these departments under control.

I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Edmonton East was a good one, namely that when a minister introduces estimates of the complexity of those that have been placed before us this morning, we should at least have a copy of the introduction by the minister under item 1. I think this would be a very good idea to follow on future occasions.

This raises another question. I should like to impress upon the government once again that we have an estimates committee in our house organization. This government has not seen fit to set up the committee on estimates; they have not called that committee, and they have not referred to it any of these departments. When one considers the remarks of the minister with regard to vote 5 of the Department of Industry, having to do with the United States-Canada cost sharing program, which is a tremendous undertaking in which millions of dollars are spent, one cannot think of a better department to be referred to the estimates committee than this.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, today we have the first opportunity to look into the estimates of these many departments. And above all things, we are expected to criticize and investigate a new department that has been set up, namely the Department of Industry. However, with the time at our disposal we will just have to do the best job we can with this tremendous list of departments.

The minister started off by giving us a résumé of the great increase in trade, productivity and the volume of sales in Canada today. I would ask him to just recall a few things that were done in the past few years. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee by pointing out what we did when we were on the government side of the house, but much of this great increase in productivity, trade and development in Canada today is due to many of those things which the Conservative party put into operation in the last four or five years.

I need only mention a few of them. There was the great trade crusade that was put on by the Department of Trade and Commerce, when the minister of that day said to the trade commissioners "Off with the striped pants and on with the overalls, and get out and sell our exports". This is what was done, and the results were tremendous. We set up the national productivity council immediately upon taking office. We only need think of the winter works program, the great assistance given to the maritime provinces of $25 million a year which was later increased to $35 million; the vocational training schools program; the great sales of wheat. Remember the millions of bushels of wheat that were left on our doorsteps, and we got out and sold them to the countries of the world. Then there were the loans to farmers, grants to hospitals, and so on. I could mention others. These, Mr. Chairman, were the things that helped to bring about the high degree of prosperity that Canada is experiencing today, I would not want the house to forget them.

We are now considering the minister's estimates. I have listed all the main items, and I notice that under atomic energy, the emergency measures organization, national research, defence production, industry and public printing his estimates show an increase of $24 million over last year. When we come to the individual votes I am sure hon. members will want to question why there is this tremendous increase of $24 million over the estimates of last year.

In speaking of the economy of the country the minister mentioned automobile parts and transmissions. I wonder whether he realizes that this was brought about by the study made by Professor Bladen which resulted in the Bladen report. Professor Bladen came forth with a formula that was so simple that it is hard to understand why someone did not come up with it sooner. It was done under a Conservative regime; we appointed Professor Bladen; we instituted the Bladen commission report. We did this with regard to transmissions and car engines to start with, and the Liberal government has simply followed on with the same program and extended it to automobile parts. It simply means that for every engine or transmission part that is imported into Canada and put into a car which in turn is exported out of the country, the manufacturer of the car receives a remission of the duty on the importation of that particular part. This has been a tremendous help to the automobile industry in Canada. It will be interesting to see what stand the minister takes when he sits down at the table with his United States counterparts who are at the moment deciding whether Canada should be allowed to continue this particular program.

The minister spoke about the great competitive position in which Canadian industry finds itself today. I wonder how much better this position would be if the Liberal government had not imposed the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery. I am sure it would have been much better.

Then the minister dealt with the organization of the Department of Industry. In this respect he set before us one of the greatest empire building programs in the history of this government, in the setting up of the Department of Industry. He said that at this time they have recruited a staff of 290 people and this represents only 45 per cent of the staff that will be engaged. This is what I understood him to say. This means that before too long the staff will be up to 500 or 600 people, and the department was only set up last July.

I do not think I need take up the time of the committee in explaining our party's position in regard to this department. We thought the work that is being done for industry by this department could have been done quite well by the Department of Trade and Commerce, which could have been called the department of trade and industry, if necessary. I realize that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association made representations to the Liberal government to set up such a department, but I do not think they had any idea that it was going to cost the taxpayers of this country something in the order of $24 million to operate it. I think they would have been just as happy if the taxpayers' dollars had been saved and the same work had been done by a department that was already in existence.

What did they do in order to get staff? They came out with a booklet asking people to join the Department of Industry. Twenty thousand booklets were printed at a cost of $2,140, and they were spread all over the country. That was one of the minor expenditures. Then they rented a new building at a cost of $384,000 a year which has 119 private offices, 59 shared offices, 29 general offices and 21 miscellaneous areas, as outlined by the minister in Hansard for March 4, 1964 at page 530. I say this is a wonderful example of empire building. However, the taxpayer has to pay for it now that it is set up.

The minister went on to talk about area development. I could take all the time which is allotted to me to discuss this particular branch. The designated or depressed area system is under the jurisdiction of this branch. In case there is any misunderstanding I take full responsibility for what the Conservative government did in the designation of depressed areas. We instituted this scheme. These areas which were set up as designated or depressed areas were a result of the recommendation of the people in those areas. In other words, we as a government said to these people "If you find difficulty with the economic problems in your area, come to Ottawa and we will look into them, and if we think it is necessary we will designate yours as a depressed area". But, no the Liberal government took the opposite stand. They took the labour statistics, looked at them on a sheet of paper, and then went down the list and picked out the areas. The people in the particular areas had nothing to say about it, until the day an industry went to one of these areas and said to the officials there "We believe you are a designated area, and we think we would like to locate here".

These 35 designated areas have been set up across Canada. On different occasions I have spoken in this house about the problem existing in my own area, and I will not take the time of the committee by going into it again at this point. I would simply say that the designated area of Brantford lies plunk in the heart of an industrial area in southwestern Ontario which includes Galt, Kitchener and Guelph. The government picked out Brantford as a depressed area, and this makes the whole program very discriminatory and contradictory.

The criterion adopted is unfair. It is set up in such a way that municipal and provincial autonomy are disregarded, and the industrialists are not satisfied with it at all. The only industry interested is one contemplating moving into such an area and benefiting from these great concessions. It is discriminatory to the areas surrounding. In my community one industry was establishing itself in the city of Guelph; at least the foundations for the building were in. Then this particular industry heard of the concessions offered in Brantford, and moved over to that city. Other industries have also done this. The city of Galt is in the process of losing an industry to Brantford. I would ask the minister to remove Brantford from the list of designated areas immediately. The people in that community want no part of it, and it is discriminatory to the very roots.

The minister has promised on various occasions to look into the criterion adopted; he has said that it would be reviewed and something would be done about it. He said today that the criterion was not satisfactory, and I was pleased to hear that. The minister has admitted the criterion is not satisfactory, and I repeat that it certainly is not. As hon. members know, it is based on a six month period, on the percentage of unemployment during six months in the summertime. I submit it should be over the whole year. For example, in the city of Brantford, where the big industry is farm machinery manufacturing, for six months over the winter this machinery is produced and in the six months during the summer production eases off while the equipment is sold. This is one example which makes the criterion unsuccessful.

The minister said it has had good results, and I hope it has. The commercial industries which move into these depressed areas would have no doubt located somewhere else in Canada. The object of the scheme, of course, is to create employment in a particular area; but when this is done in a place like Brantford, working people simply motor from Galt or Guelph to Brantford and it does not ease unemployment at all. The whole business of area development must be very carefully scrutinized. The criterion should be changed, and I hope that before too long the minister will do this and put it on a much fairer basis than at present.

The minister went on to talk about trade missions, and in particular those respecting furniture industry and design, and the meetings which were held in various parts of Canada. I am at a loss to know how this is done under both the Department of Industry and the Department of Trade and Commerce, because I cannot see anything except overlapping, confusion and added cost. The Department of Trade and Commerce holds these meetings. They also hold trade fairs. They had a great trade crusade, and now here is the Department of Industry overlapping and doing the same thing. I hope I am wrong about this, but it appears to me there is a tremendous amount of overlapping.

The minister spoke under vote 5 about the U.S.-Canada cost sharing defence arrangement, which is a tremendous undertaking. This involves a large amount, and I hope some day this matter will be referred to the estimates committee for complete study. The program is very complicated. I spent some time with the deputy minister in charge of this program, and I must confess that we only scratched the surface. There is a lot more to be learned about it, and I confess I know very little about it.

I now turn to the Department of Defence Production. The minister referred to the transfer of people from that department. When we considered interim supply on August 4 I spoke about the Department of Industry, and at that time mentioned the fact that we had been told that when the Department of Industry was set up people would be transferred from trade and commerce and defence production to industry. We may not have been told in so many words, but we were also led to believe that the staffing costs would not be too great. However, when we looked at the figures for these departments we found the over-all cost of operation of defence production showed an increase of $2,036,980 between 1962-63 and 1964-65. The Department of Defence Production staff was increased by 168, so there could not have been very many transfers made.

On interim supply I then went on to point out how confusing the situation seemed to be because of the apparent overlapping among the Department of Industry, the Department of Defence Production and the Department of Trade and Commerce. I asked many questions during the debate on August 4, and suggested that the minister should answer the questions at this time. When the minister made his introductory statement today I expected that he would answer many of those questions. It may well be that he will do so at a later stage of this debate.

The minister stated that his department was following the suggestions made by the Glassco commission, and I was very pleased to hear that statement. I feel the Glassco commission recommendations are excellent. It would seem to me that the minister is taking steps to convert the Department of Defence Production into a department of purchasing and supply. In making these changes I think it is folly and poor business to hire new and additional staff. I think the staff of the department being converted should be transferred to the new department, but for some reason this does not seem to be the case. Very little thought is given to the cost and it seems that someone just says to go ahead and do it, spend the money and the taxpayer will have to pay more. I think that practice is nothing more than folly, and is morally wrong. I think when a department is reorganized its staff should be moved from the old department to the new department.

Mr. Chairman, the minister referred to Defence Construction (1951) Limited. This corporation was set up in 1951 to look after construction and procurement for the Department of National Defence. This corporation's estimates are lower, and I think they should be because there is less and less work to do in view of the present changeover position of the national defence program.

Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the public accounts committee and remember the Auditor General bringing certain cases in respect of Defence Construction (1951) Limited to our attention. As an example of what he found, I have picked three specific cases out of his 1963 report. The first example is referred to at page 150 of the Auditor General's 1963 report and relates to the authorized payment of $12,985 to a contractor because of delay in plans for construction. Another example involves the authorization of a $36,604 payment necessitated by delays and changes in design. This payment was in respect of a project at Camp Petawawa. The third example relates to the expenditure of $16,315 resulting from a delay in the supply of electric power to a project to extend water and sewage facilities at Greenwood, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be something in the operation of this department which is not as it should be. There are many other observations which one could make and to which the minister made reference in his introductory remarks. There are other estimates which will be dealt with specifically at a later stage of this debate, and I am sure many other members of this party will be particularly interested.

Mr. Chairman, with those few introductory remarks I shall take my seat. I hope as the debate on these estimates continues many interesting observations will come to the attention of the minister. I conclude by repeating what I said at the outset. It is a great mistake for this government, or any government, not to make use of the estimates committee, which is a part of our parliamentary procedure. I do not understand why this government did not set up this committee and refer the estimates of some of these departments to it. When the next session is under way I hope that committee will do what it is supposed to do, so the time of this house is not taken up considering a great number of minor details which could be discussed by the committee members.

Those are my general observations, and I hope to take part in some of the other discussions later on during the debate.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to echo the remarks of the last speaker in relation to the Department of Industry being of importance to a large segment of the Canadian economy. I also feel that the minister should not be burdened with the responsibilities of those other departments under his ministry. The department for which the minister is now responsible at one time was under the ministry of defence production, and was considered to be a full time job, and one of the most important. The responsibility for administering this department has now been added to the burden carried by the Minister of Industry.

Mr. Chairman, many Canadian people will be looking to the minister for a much more forthright and frank statement about the Department of Industry and what is intended to be done in the future than he has made today. His is a department of resources, and I refer to the use of labour and production in a way that will provide advancement in the field of industry, in the form of assistance to those areas of Canada which have not been as fortunate as others. To date I believe this department has failed, as have most of the resource departments of the federal government, to give the leadership to the people in those areas which they can rightly expect. This failure is also true in respect of the Department of Forestry. That department in my opinion has been a complete flop as far as the development of the forest industry in Canada is concerned. The department of mines has also been a flop, in that it has given little encouragement to the mining industry in Canada.

This failure has probably occurred as a result of the lack of leadership. The lack of leadership I feel is a result of the lack of proper distinction between the responsibilities of the federal and provincial governments in these fields. That situation is not true of the Department of Industry, and for this reason we should be entitled to expect a great deal more.

Mr. Chairman, I am particularly interested in that branch of the Department of Industry relating to area development. I represent an area that is not a designated area. If the hon. member who has just taken his seat asks that the city of Brantford, which is a designated area, be taken out of that category he should bear in mind that that is an area which has obtained a great number of new industries. Brantford now has 29 new industries. Maybe he is saying that the plan was so successful in the Brantford area that they no longer want to presume upon the Department of Industry and are willing to share the wealth with other areas.

My problem is that the area I represent, particularly Teck township and the town of Kirkland Lake, is not a designated area. I would ask why it is not. There is very little difference between the town of Timmins, the Rouyn-Noranda area and the township of Teck and Kirkland Lake. These areas are very similar in nature and depend entirely upon mining. All of them have experienced a decrease in their labour forces because of the curtailment of mining operations; yet Noranda and Timmins have been named designated areas.

I asked the minister the other day if some consideration was going to be given to Teck township and Kirkland Lake. I am aware of the fact that the Department of Labour has more to do than any other department with the designation of these areas, but certainly a recommendation from the minister of the Department of Industry would be helpful because that department is aware of the results achieved in designated areas and the reasons other areas should be designated. There should be some statement why Kirkland Lake has not been designated and why the assistance available to sister communities on both sides is not available to it.

When I asked a question the other day the minister said he did not intend to intervene in this particular instance. Yet the Financial Post for August 22 contains an article headed "New Medicine Coming for 'Weak Job' Areas". The subheading is:

> Drury team moves into phase II, plans whole raft of sophisticated remedies to cure "inefficient" use of labour force.

The article goes on to say:

> "We are going to have to develop the industries that are natural to the areas," an official sums it up. This is probably going to be much easier than the more ambitious program to cut down on underemployment. Here the area development agency will be sailing in uncharted waters. Officials of the Department of Finance and Labour are joining with the industry men in search for ways of finding and working on these pockets where the work force is being used inefficiently.
> It is far too early yet to guess how they will tackle the problem. But so far as the Department of Industry is concerned this is much more the sort of work it was set up to do than just moving industries into unemployment areas. In the long run, the officials believe, it will be on their success or failure in this field that the area development agency will be judged.

I have been very cautious about saying anything with regard to the Department of Industry or the area development section of the department because it was my hope that this agency in particular would provide some of the assistance that we in northern Ontario need to solve our problems. I am sure that when the Department of Industry was set up the officials were aware of what had been done by the former government and particularly what had been done by the governments in the maritimes. Because of the depletion of resources in my area and other mining communities a large unemployment factor resulted, and these communities found themselves completely unable to utilize the resources they had or to find capital to develop new resources. As was done by the maritime provinces, these people came to Ottawa with their hand out asking for assistance in the form of subsidies.

I think the people of the maritimes should be given full credit for the fact that through the Atlantic development agency they were able to do something for communities like Springhill. I have had the opportunity of visiting Springhill several times in the last few years. The mining industry there disappeared completely because of a disaster. The people of the community set up an agency whereby money was provided to industries that would settle there. It was not done, as the minister has said, on the basis of finding industries which could be tied in with the resources of the area. That is an obvious consideration but, more important, they brought in industries that had no connection whatever with the former industry. I was very pleased to be able to go through the new battery factory and the new woodworking factory which is producing prefabricated houses. It is also interesting to note that several new coal mines are being developed in the area which are not related in any way to the very large company which carried on coal production there for so many years.

It seems to me that the people of Springhill have not found the situation as disastrous as they had anticipated. New industries are being brought into the area, and it would appear to me as an outsider they have gone a long way toward solving their problems. Now that they have taken the first step with assistance from the Atlantic development agency they will be able to take further steps on their own and other industries will follow.

We in northern Ontario carried much of this country for many years. The income from the gold mining industry during the depression years is well known to those with an interest in the history of our country. That industry provided a great deal of employment and a large part of the income in the province of Ontario in those years. There are few industries today in which you cannot find workers who during the depression went to northern Ontario or northern Quebec, found jobs and as a result paid income taxes and supported their families in other communities throughout the country. I believe that the contribution which was made by that area over a long period of time is well known.

It is interesting to note that in 1931 there were 2,894 miners employed in the gold mines. In 1932 the figure was 3,197; in 1933, 3,272; in 1934, 3,455; in 1935, 3,513 and in 1936, 3,687. The number rose to its maximum in 1939 when there were 4,440 miners working underground in mines in the township of Teck. But in 1963 the figure was only 1,282.

The need of assistance has been made more imperative by something which has happened, although it was not as great a disaster as occurred at Springhill. In one of the mines at Kirkland Lake a severe series of air blasts occurred on August 14 with the result that two miners were trapped and lost their lives. Their bodies were not recovered until August 25. The mine has not yet been able to assess the damage and is completely closed down except for a few people engaged in cleaning up operations. No decision has yet been made as to what is going to be done.

I suggest this is an additional indication that the situation in Kirkland Lake is most serious and warrants consideration by the department. But we did not hear the minister say that such consideration would be given. A delegation from Kirkland Lake is meeting the Minister of Labour today, and I hope they will be able to convince him that the situation in that area is sufficiently critical to justify the inclusion of the area when areas are being redesignated this fall. Unfortunately in this area workers in agriculture, farming and the forest industry were removed from the jurisdiction of the unemployment insurance office in Kirkland Lake and placed in the tri-town area, with the result that the actual situation in Kirkland Lake is not apparent from the unemployment insurance commission figures.

I asked the minister several days ago what assistance would be given to the Timmins area to help in developing the Gulf Sulphur project recently established there. I was surprised to find out that the assistance the department was willing to offer hinged again on the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the small assistance it can provide, a small consideration by the Department of Finance, and really no understanding by the Department of Finance as to what it was going to be able to do in relation to developing this industry. Yet this is something that would provide enough employment for the town of Timmins so that it would no longer qualify for designation as a distressed area.

Incidentally it would provide all northern Ontario with secondary industry, because if we can process the minerals in this area it will provide employment for a large number of men. I am told that the handling of ores from Texas Gulf in that area, over 300 million tons, would employ 20,000 employees in the smelter complex, and this in turn would provide many jobs in secondary industry. Still the department is not in a position to decide what it will do about it.

You may find it surprising to learn that a company like Gulf Sulphur is not unlike a company such as Cleveland Cliff, because in many instances a company finds it impossible to undertake a multimillion dollar complex for the development of mineral resources on its own, and has to work out arrangements with other companies or agencies to find the capital necessary to establish a refining industry.

That is what we expected the Department of Industry to do, and I had considerable faith in the ability of the deputy minister to instigate surveys to find out the potential of an area, something which is referred to in the Financial Post of August 22, in which it stated it was indicated by officials of the department that they would be able to decide what was the potential of an area, that surveys would be conducted according to the arrangements outlined in the booklet issued by the Department of Industry when it was seeking recruits. In my opinion all this should have been done by now.

To northern Ontario, the maritimes and many other areas this is the most important department of government and is the one that can make the greatest contribution in the shortest period of time. The minister did not announce whether he was going to initiate controls over industry. I do not think there will be any argument when I say that every time a new industry goes into the city of Toronto it creates an added liability on the resources of that city. A factory going into the outskirts of Toronto will overtax its already overtaxed school system. The city's transportation systems are vastly overtaxed and new factories put a further strain on them. I believe the Department of Industry has a responsibility to calculate these liabilities.

If the department wants to bring any type of industry into northern Ontario we will provide that industry with all kinds of concessions, but it is unfortunate that under the free enterprise system industry is reluctant to take advantage of any offer made by municipalities outside metropolitan areas. The reason is that industry believes it must centre its factories in the major areas of consumption. I have talked to industrialists who say they figure an area must be able to consume 80 per cent of a factory's production, whether it be corn flakes or radio parts, before they would be interested in establishing a factory in it. If this is true then obviously the only thing a manufacturer can do is establish his factory in a major centre of consumption, which means in the golden horseshoe or in the Montreal area.

This may be very satisfactory from the manufacturer's point of view but it is damned unsatisfactory from the point of view of areas built on a natural resource and which find that natural resource being depleted. It is all very well for the minister to say, as his officials have said, and I am sure with his agreement, that they are going to concentrate on those areas whose basic resources can be used to develop secondary industry. In the main this will not apply to resource areas of currency or precious minerals, where the mines are facing depletion and their closing is only a matter of a few years hence.

I have some knowledge of the lumber and forest industry in Ontario, where for a number of years I represented a segment of the forest industry in negotiations with many of the companies involved. Many of these companies are nearing the end of their existence in their present localities because reforestation has not taken place, and most of the communities that were supported by the forest industry have no other resource. This is true of Renfrew, Pembroke, Temagami, Latchford and Blind River—all through the whole white pine industry where the resource will not be rebuilt in our lifetime. It will be 70 or 80 years before the natural resources of these communities can be replaced, and none of them are willing to wait that length of time. Certainly we should not wait for our centennial as an occasion to rebuild them as ghost towns, as was done in Dawson City.

I would ask the minister to give us a résumé of what the department has done in the relocation of industry. In this respect we have a lesson to learn from other countries because Canada's problems are not unique. They have been explored and solved by many other countries. In Sweden the authorities take industry into areas of underpopulation, but the minister has said that we are not interested in taking industry into unemployment areas. For that matter I am of the opinion that we are not interested in taking unemployed people into other areas but should concentrate on improving areas already settled and on spreading industry across the nation in order to give benefit to all areas.

Relocation of industry has been a very serious part of industrial programming in the United Kingdom, which has an act governing the relocation of industry. In fact many of the promises made by the Liberal party to give assistance for the relocation of industry are not unlike the program undertaken in England, but you cannot relocate industry solely by co-operation with industry because you will find industries have no intention of going into areas in which they are not interested.

It took one terrific factor, the wage factor, to move industry out of Toronto into the towns of Barrie and Orillia, whereas in England the authorities solved this problem by saying to companies, "If you want to expand, the department of industry will give you a permit to expand in areas of large unemployment where the social services are in excess of the needs of the local communities." They held out a carrot by offering concessions in a financial sense. They gave tax concessions, and the department of finance ruled that companies would not be able to draw on undistributed profits unless they were putting them into an area for which the department was giving them licences.

Take, for example, the Ford plant in Great Britain. Ford did not go into its present location because it wanted to, but because it was asked to. The authorities in Britain were greatly concerned about rebuilding certain areas of the country which, since the war had fared less well than others, economically, particularly those areas in the northern midlands which had been adversely affected by changing conditions in the textile industry. Consequently industry was invited, or directed, to places where the necessary public services such as schools, roads, hospitals and so on already existed, in addition of course to large numbers of skilled workers with housing to accommodate them. I think this system has brought great benefit to the areas concerned.

Here in Canada, one of the areas where a similar arrangement could be followed is northern Ontario. We are not situated a great distance from potential markets. We have the facilities—housing, hospitals, schools, and so on. We have the northern Ontario institute of technology. There is the Ontario-owned railway which could be used for the subsidized transport of industrial products to the main centres of consumption. We have all these advantages. We also have the people. In Kirkland Lake, a town of 17,582 persons, only 1,282 are employed in the mines, virtually the only occupation open to them. It is up to the minister to decide, in conjunction with his colleagues, that he will designate this area and use it as a showcase for industrial development. There are advantages here which exist nowhere else. Since the beginning of the war, this community has existed by reason of emergency gold mines assistance payments, receiving each year grants to the tune of about $13 million. We have made concessions. The town has made concessions, and the whole country has made concessions. If the present minister would take a look at this $13 million and agree to put this kind of money into the establishment of new industry in this area we would be happy if he were to cut off E.G.M.A. payments tomorrow. I say this because we are not happy about carrying an industry which has no foreseeable future, or whose scope is very limited. We are interested in industries which have a future, which will grow with the community and allow the community to grow with them. Steps can be taken immediately in this direction. I will certainly support them. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I will defeat any of his party's candidates in that area for years to come if this government neglects to do something for communities where there is obviously so great a need.

If no action is taken along these lines, then the hon. gentleman's government is not worthy of support. The minister has the ability. There is nothing wrong with it. His talents in administration have been proven for many years. Certainly, Dave Golden is one of the most capable administrators this government has. If these two men are unable to do anything about this situation it means the cabinet is not interested in the Department of Industry. If I have any justification for being here, it is to see that this department does the job for northern Ontario which it was set up to do. And if the hon. gentleman's colleagues will not support him in this effort, and if he is not prepared to make a more active presentation with regard to these issues, and to the case of northern Ontario in particular, then I hope the government is defeated in the near future, regardless what the reason is. I am confident that the very existence of the people of northern Ontario depends upon their getting federal assistance to develop industry in the area. The future in northern Ontario depends on this, just as people in the maritimes are dependant on this department for their future existence.

The government should not consider this department as being a department of the second rank. I believe it should be considered immediately as one of the most important departments of the crown. It is the department with the greatest future. It is the one which in my opinion offers the greatest opportunity. The distressed areas need strong leadership to put them back in the field of production so that they can make their contribution to the payment of income tax and the other forms of tax which support the finances of the central government. We in Kirkland Lake are not interested in drawing unemployment insurance; neither is any other community in northern Ontario. We are interested in paying heavy income tax and this will only be possible if the Minister of Industry can provide us with the means of employment which will allow us to do so.

Mr. Lambert: Since this department received some attention in the interim supply debate a few weeks ago my remarks today will be shortened because it was definitely the intention of the official opposition at the time that since the main estimates were not coming forward we would discuss the departments as though this had been the case. For this reason, my remarks this afternoon will be limited.

First, I can only agree with what was said by my hon. friend from Wellington South (Mr. Hales). As I have said many times in the past, I believe the estimates of a department such as the Department of Industry should have been referred to the committee on estimates. I think the department itself might well recognize the wisdom of this course. After all, this is a new department which is still feeling its way and I think it would be a good thing for the senior officials, as well as for the government and the minister himself, if the opportunity had been taken to explain, before the committee on estimates, the way they were going.

I cannot agree with all the hon. member for Timiskaming said, but I certainly agree that there is implicit in the erection of the Department of Industry a great potential. I myself thought initially that this department could have been maintained within the Department of Trade and Commerce. I can only agree with the criticism put forward by the hon. member for Wellington South that a great deal of this work could have been done under the one department. Since the criticism has been made, I will limit myself in that regard.

The minister painted a glowing picture of the economy as though the present situation had been brought about by the beneficence of the Liberals—they had merely to come to power for all to be well. Obviously, the hon. gentleman did not consult the Minister of Finance who is aware that the improvement began in 1961. Indeed we could point to a number of factors to explain why the minister was able to quote the statistics he did this afternoon.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, we all agree that Canadian manufacturers are much more active today than they were a few years ago. I believe the pegging of the dollar at 92½ cents gives manufacturers in this country a definite advantage. I do not think there is any manufacturer or any responsible minister who will deny that this move has given Canadian industry a considerable lift. Second, there has been through the aegis of the Department of Trade and Commerce, initiated some years ago and continued by this administration, a much greater activity on the part of its trade commissioners. This fact and the various trade fairs that have been organized have helped our industry.

I would say, too, that Canadian manufacturers are much more active abroad, not necessarily only because of incentives provided by the government. There has been a great change in their own attitudes, and I believe we must pay considerable tribute to the management in the majority of industries, and to labour, for approaching this problem from a sensible point of view. Management, who were faced with a very gravely declining international and domestic market, decided they would have to modernize; they would have to cut costs; they would have to do away with outdated methods, rebuild, re-equip, and place some restriction on the withdrawal of earnings. I believe this is one particular step that we must encourage; we must encourage industry to plow back earnings into productive capacity. This is one of the criteria used to justify a tax cut.

Labour must also assume its proper share of responsibility in this regard. It is not only a question of rates of labour, but it is the responsibility of labour, as distinguished from management, if you will, not to make unreasonable demands, although they have a right to share in a just proportion of expanded earnings. But we must first of all realize there will be no opportunity for greater employment unless there are additional capital facilities to absorb additional labour, and there must be correspondingly additional sales. I do not care how much you get people to work; you can put thousands upon thousands of people to work, but if the goods are not sold at a profit or a fair return, the enterprise is bound to fail and those people are not going to continue in employment.

Therefore we must give management the encouragement to retain earnings for the replacement of capital production facilities, whether they be new, for expansion or for replacement. Second, as I have said, I believe both management and labour must exercise due restraint, bearing in mind that it is only with an economically viable capital that we are going to get not only continued economic activity but expanded economic activity. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, labour and management must approach this problem with a real degree of sense of responsibility.

Having said that, I think we must turn to the remarks of the minister. I do not think he had seen an article that appeared in the business section of the Globe and Mail this morning, entitled "Boom continuing, but weak spots mar some fields". We must realize that our economy goes forward, not necessarily at an even pace but some sectors go ahead further than others. The statistics the minister gave us this morning were interesting, particularly those with regard to household appliances, furniture and automobiles. However, Mr. Chairman, I believe that if the minister had reference to certain surveys which were conducted very recently he would have a better understanding of the situation. I will quote comments in regard to these surveys, which indicate that perhaps a degree of caution might be introduced at this point and in order that the figures the minister has placed before us can be viewed in their proper perspective. I quote from this morning's business section of the Globe and Mail:

> Producers of household appliances and furniture have had little to crow about since spring, when the government stimulated winter housebuilding program came to an end. Retail sales of furniture and appliances, seasonally adjusted, fell 6.3 per cent between April and June.

I continue reading this article:

> The decline appears to have been centred chiefly in such big ticket items as refrigerators, television sets and record players. The demand for electric stoves and washing machines continued to rise, but not enough to offset what appears to be a developing weakness in the market for consumer durables as a group.
> The pattern of demand for household equipment has been disrupted by the winter building incentives—which are to be offered again in the 1964-1965 season—but it seems that market saturation also is a factor.

I would warn the minister that reliance on statistics up to, say, the end of April or the end of the fiscal year, March 31, in this particular sector will be distorted, much as the over-all building picture is distorted if it stops as at March 31. This is because there was an artificial stimulation for the period December 1 to March 31; I believe the minister would be the first to recognize this. Therefore a general conclusion arrived at on a short period base for these indices of industrial activity can be very misleading. This is all I shall say in this regard, Mr. Chairman.

I now pass on to the question of the underdeveloped areas. The minister said that in 23 regions some $245 million of investment had taken place in plant or projected plant and that some 9,000 men were being employed. There immediately comes to mind the question that the only worth of this program is with regard to what increase it has created over and above normal development. If this is all that has happened in these regions, I would say again that there is a distortion. But if it is $245 million of additional, over the normal, development that one could expect, then I say it is all very well. However, Mr. Chairman, I think the question as to whether this is the whole picture or is an increase must be answered. I realize that because of the time lag that is required from the time you make a decision to build a plant to the time when you are employing people, when you are in production, many months can elapse. One cannot look for miracles overnight in industrial stimulation. This applied to some of the other programs instituted by the former administration, which were cut off I think much too soon. Insufficient time had been allowed to give them the opportunity to show true results.

I should now like to deal with the area development agency. The hon. member for Timiskaming has almost made this a compulsory economic planning unit, and the comparisons that he made with the United Kingdom are, I think, improper, in that dealing with Great Britain we must remember this is a very small country and the costs of moving populations are very small, as are the costs of moving plant. These costs are relatively small compared to this country. We cannot take something and say we will transfer it from some area in the Atlantic provinces to another area in western Canada, although western Canada is fortunately blessed with few underdeveloped areas. What I am concerned with is the cost of this overhead to Canadian industry as a whole. How many people are employed in the area development agency, and what have been the expenses of its administration compared with the results obtained? This is a very important question to which we should get an answer because, as in business, you cannot undertake a mammoth sales campaign unless it results in gain. If it results in no increase in sales then it has just been a great waste of money. That is the criterion on which we must measure the efficacy of the government program so far as area development encouragement is concerned.

I was glad to hear the minister in his opening remarks indicate that the criteria on which the 35 areas had been selected were not quite the right ones, and that there could be a considerable improvement. Without wishing to claim that I am one of those who said "I told you so", I think this danger was pointed out to the minister at the time. I am hoping that he will come up with some much more worth-while and viable yardsticks for a determination of an underdeveloped area which can come under this particular tension.

So far as the Department of Industry is concerned, the minister indicated that he had a staff of around 250 to 275. However, when we look at page 177 of the book of estimates we see that the paper establishment for the coming fiscal year will be 573. It is very instructive to note that of those 573 some 261, or nearly 46 per cent, are to be officers with a minimum salary of $10,000. So the minister is obviously not running a department of low-paid personnel. I realize he has to compete with industry. Although he has a lot of directors of various branches, I realize he cannot get directors from industry to assist industry unless he offers these salaries in order to encourage them to enter government service. But let us not think that this is going to be a cheap operation. At the present time it is almost composed of as many chiefs as Indians, if I might use that very slangy phrase.

I would repeat what has been said by my hon. friend from Wellington South, that I would have thought we could do the same sort of job, and perhaps a better job, by concentrating this whole complex within a section of the Department of Trade and Commerce and renaming it the department of trade and industry, if you want. This could have been done at much less cost in numbers of personnel, as well as office space and what-have-you.

Now let me turn to defence production, as I have a few matters to raise in this regard. With regard to the ten purchasing branches which the minister has set up—I think that is correct, but having taken just a brief note as he went along it is a little difficult to be sure I have all the detail—this is perhaps a refinement of what existed before. True enough, if defence production is to become a central purchasing agency perhaps there is justification for this division of the Department of Defence Production, each section under a director, and so on. The proliferation of the hierarchy is evident in all sectors. What further concerns me is the matter of warehousing. I should like the minister to give us an explanation as to how warehousing will be controlled. Is the department going to take over warehousing from, say, the Department of National Defence which has huge warehouses? To what extent will they take over warehousing on behalf of public works, northern affairs, or transport? I am not too sure, but I have a feeling that in its first steps towards a central purchasing agency the department is caught in a sort of a tug of war with other departments which may not wish to give up the purchasing establishments which they have at the present time. We know that certain of the departments have very extensive purchasing agencies with technical staffs to back them up. I must confess I fully agree with the Glassco commission in this respect. I have come across more of the lesser departments, shall we say, whose purchases are not as great as others. I do not include in this the Department of Transport or the Department of Public Works, but there are others which have their technical engineers, and they are buying equipment. They have their own people to assess and to determine whether graders, draglines and cranes, and what-have-you, are of a certain value, and whether the new bids are based precisely on what they want. I think that a lot of this could be telescoped into a proper, efficient purchasing agency. But let me give one word of caution: It must not be up to the central purchasing agency to decide necessarily whether the item concerned is required. After all, are we setting up just another establishment alongside to query and evaluate what a department has already done?—because that is merely duplication. After all, a department, if it is going to enter into the purchase of major equipment, must justify itself to treasury board. Certainly the purchasing agency must not then set up a third body for evaluation purposes. This has applied to some extent, I think, to defence production. It has unfortunately crept in at times in defence construction. It must be something that the minister should always watch.

With regard to defence production sharing, I recall that one of the problems which the defence committee ran into in Europe last November was that each of the countries had something to say about defence production sharing. Each country felt it should have a greater share within the NATO complex. I realize I am only telling the minister something he already knows, but we found each country had its own aspirations. That is all very well, until you run into the dominant NATO partners, who themselves have their own aspirations in the production of defence equipment. This is a very complex point and I do not know whether there is an ideal solution. I think it is just a case of pushing as hard as you can, and trying to struggle on. Ideally on paper, and perhaps in editorial columns, it looks as though it is a very easy thing to achieve; but having talked to the defence people in these countries and to our friends the Americans and our own people, it does become exceedingly difficult.

The Canadian army is now using one weapon manufactured in France. I understand this weapon was purchased under the standardization procedure. It is very well to obtain this kind of equipment, but I understand it is difficult to obtain the technical information required. Unfortunately the French government, or the manufacturer is very reticent about providing technical information. When this information cannot be obtained it is very difficult to maintain the equipment or carry out further workup procedure. These manufacturers or governments may feel perfectly justified in the attitude they take, and I am not suggesting the French government or manufacturer of that particular weapon is alone in this regard. However, I think if we are going to enter into defence sharing programs everything must be put on the table. There must be complete co-operation between the partners, because if something is being held back because of a fear that one partner will suddenly commence to manufacture a specific article, this mistrust within the spirit of co-operation in the alliance will doom the whole program to failure.

Mr. Chairman, the minister in his opening remarks referred to the use of a general supply ship, and I am sure he had in mind the Provider. We have heard some very disquieting rumours about the Provider. I was on that ship and found the whole supply idea novel. It certainly represents a departure from normal supply patterns, in that we have lumped together various supply requirements in the one ship rather than having specialized ships doing specific things, which is the practice followed by larger navies. I should like the minister to tell us what corrective measures will have to be made in respect of the Provider in order that it may function more efficiently in the role originally intended. Some of the equiment on the Provider I understand is not functioning properly. I am not criticizing the minister in this regard nor the principle of this ship because I realize this whole concept is new and perhaps has not worked out as well in practice under actual conditions as may have been hoped. I think we must be reassured that this was a proper venture, and that whatever difficulties have occurred will be corrected so the ship can take its proper place in the defence picture.

Mr. Chairman, because of the restricted activities of Defence Construction (1951) Limited, other than in respect of maintenance of our defence establishments, obviously we have reached the point where we must decide whether this corporation is required. Surely we are not going to expand our airports or army barracks, and with the cutback in our forces there will be a lesser requirement for this corporation. Surely this corporation will not be maintained merely for the purpose of constructing a new national defence headquarters. I should like the minister to tell us why Defence Construction (1951) Limited is being continued. In the event that it does remain in operation I should like the minister to tell us what experience his department has had in respect of time and material payment bonds, the use of which was brought into the picture in respect of tendering on government construction projects about two or three years ago following a series of several very unfortunate incidents. I understand subcontractors were not being paid by prime contractors because these went into bankruptcy and abandoned projects which the government had to take over and complete one way or another. I am concerned primarily with time and material payment bonds because it took three years to convince treasury board and senior government officials in certain government departments that this practice should be followed. I would appreciate receiving all the information the minister can give me in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure there will be other items in respect of which we will ask questions. I hope the minister will bring down the appropriate senior officials so that we will have the necessary information available at the time we are dealing with particular items. I think perhaps the minister will understand why we did not want him to deal with every branch on item No. 1 of his estimates. I am sure the minister will bring his officials of the various departments and crown corporations or agencies for which he is responsible, so that we may obtain information readily.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I value this opportunity of making a few brief comments about the operation of this very important department. The first spokesman for the official opposition made some reference to the usefulness of referring estimates of this type to an estimates committee. Since I have had the privilege of being here I have considered that estimates, certainly in the initial stages, could be considered much more effectively by various committees than by immediately commencing our consideration in this chamber in the committee of the whole. However, I must say that to have these estimates, this type in particular, studied by a blanket committee on estimates would not be the most effective way of considering them. If this is the type of procedure to be followed, and I hope we will arrive at this stage at some relatively early date, it should be changed so that estimates of various departments are referred to a committee comprised of members particularly interested in the specific topics to be considered.

I may also say in passing that I think note should be made of the fact that the previous government was not in a hurry to set up a committee on estimates to study the estimates. Certainly there was no such committee set up during the 1962 parliament, and, if I am not mistaken, no committee was created during the greater portion of the period in which the previous government was in office.

Mr. Chairman, I was pleased to hear the praise of the hon. member for Wellington South in respect of the Bladen report and formula. I find it curious, however, that the hon. member indicated the great degree of simplicity in this program, in view of the fact it apparently took the previous government some two years to do anything about it by way of implementation. I think I should point out briefly that the implementation of this formula was only in respect of transmissions, and the program was to last for only one year. It is to the credit of the Minister of Industry and the present government that the plan which has now been set up covers the whole range of automotive manufacturing and is to be in effect for a period of some three years, which is the period the industry itself believes is necessary before it will be possible to have a truly useful and beneficial effect on the economy of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I must say I was somewhat surprised to note also that spokesmen for the official opposition felt that secondary industry in this country had not yet reached the point where it merited as much attention from the federal government as the fields of agriculture, mining and forestry, all of which I will readily admit are very important to the economy of this country. Each of these fields has a separate department of the federal government to look after its interests. Each of these departments has several thousand employees and, in fact, in the case of the Department of Agriculture the number runs into tens of thousands. I would not think that a staff of 400 or 500 people is too large to help to look after the needs of secondary manufacturing in this country, a phase of our economic development which now encompasses the employment of some one million people. In fact, the latest edition of the Canada Year Book indicates that in 1960 it employed some 21 per cent of the labour force and was responsible for some 26 per cent of the gross national product.

Instead of criticizing what is really more or less a tentative beginning in bringing the attention of the federal government more fully to bear on this important segment of our economy, I think the opposition should have called for even greater attention by the federal government to this field of activity, an attention which can only be provided in a truly effective manner through a separate department and a separate minister. As I have said, Mr. Chairman, if the forest industry, the mining industry and agricultural industry are sufficiently important to require separate departments with separate ministers, surely the time has been reached when secondary manufacturing now plays such an important role that it must have a vital, effective department of the federal government to give it the proper attention it needs.

I think it should be noted that there has certainly been no real criticism from secondary manufacturing itself with regard to the fact that this vital department has been set up and is now operating. In fact, quite contrary is the case. The hon. member for Wellington South has suggested that for this vitally important segment of our economy employing some one million people an expenditure of $24 million is too large, but it should be noted that of this $24 million some $19 million is, to quote from the estimates, "to sustain technological capability in Canadian industry by supporting selected defence development programs". I hope the hon. member does not mean that the official opposition is opposed to this vital work of the federal government. In fact, this would apparently leave only $4½ million for the actual operation of the department itself and, with one million employed in secondary industry, this means in fact an expenditure of about $3 per employee. I must say I do not think that is too much for a phase of our economic activity that is so important to the country.

While some reference has been made to the attempt of the previous government to do something about areas of slow growth and chronic unemployment, without attempting to indulge in a detailed critique of these efforts at this point I think it should be recognized that the tentative steps they took in this regard were generally recognized as useless and ineffective by those directly concerned—the people in secondary manufacturing industries. I refer particularly to the very slight results from the double depreciation program. I think it must be reiterated that a very important feature of the present government's approach to dealing with areas of slow growth and chronic unemployment has been the creation of criteria which, though they may be subject to improvement, have been set up in a fair, open and equitable manner and may be applied in the same way in any area of our country.

I think it is quite well known, Mr. Chairman, that the area I represent has been included in this very important program, and I want to say at this time that as far as I am aware there has been no criticism of this program and the benefits which have flowed from it already from my community. On the contrary, there has already been not only a considerable degree of praise from the community but also of actual success in getting our community moving forward once again.

As an example of the interest of the local industrial and business community in this program, I would point to the very successful industrial development seminar which was held in Windsor at the end of March and which was attended by some 250 leaders of business, industry and the accounting and legal professions primarily from the Windsor area itself for the purpose of learning more about how the community of Windsor could take advantage of this very important program. It should be pointed out once again, as I have had the privilege of doing already in the house, that this seminar was carried on under the joint sponsorship of the Windsor chamber of commerce, the Windsor and district labour council, the Windsor industrial commission and the greater Windsor foundation. It was a splendid example of the true spirit of co-operation that exists at the present time between all segments of the Windsor economic and industrial community.

It should be pointed out that to a great degree the expansions that have been announced and are under way in the Windsor area as a result of this very important and useful area development program have been undertaken by local firms. I think this helps to show the interest that can be generated in the areas concerned because of the new incentive program. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee one or two examples of what has happened since the program went into effect. I want to refer to one or two brief extracts from the Windsor Daily Star. On August 7 the Windsor Star had an article reading in part as follows:

> A prediction that construction in Windsor during 1964 will reach $20 million, an all time high, was made today by city building commissioner Patrick Maguire.

Another article which appeared on August 20, 1964, reads in part as follows:

> Windsor's building department is lagging about a week behind in processing building permits because of the unusually brisk pace of construction this year, Patrick Maguire, building commissioner, said today. The department issued permits worth $600,000 Wednesday. So far this year, more than $10 million worth of construction has been cleared through the building department and officials will not be surprised if this figure is doubled by the end of the year.

I must say that a large part of the building development has been in the form of commercial building, apartments, factory expansions and stores, all of which are eligible for the fast write-off of depreciation which the government has created as a part of its area development incentive program. I am sure the committee is also aware of the plant expansions that have been announced for the Windsor area since this program went into effect. One hon. member quoted from an interesting article in the Financial Post with reference to the new General Motors plant which will employ almost 2,000 people in the Windsor area. Other expansions have been announced. Just from memory I can recall the L. A. Young expansion, the Kelsey Wheel expansion, the International Tool expansion, and there are others as well, all of which came about only after this program was announced. While members of the official opposition may attempt to claim that this was perhaps due to some form of coincidence or to some type of program which they attempted to set up, I think it goes beyond mere coincidence or any efforts of the official opposition when we look at the fact that this prosperity, which exists in the Windsor area at this time, and which did not exist in any way whatsoever, unfortunately, because of the neglect of the previous government, came into effect only after the present government took office. The Department of Industry was established, the area development agency was established and the tax incentive program was established, and this program is already doing so much for my own community of Windsor.

Mr. Hales: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gray: When I finish my remarks I would be happy to receive questions. There was some suggestion made by the hon. member for Timiskaming that we should have greater regard to approaches taken in other countries, when it comes to the location of industry. I think that at least in part he is making a very useful suggestion. However I would point out that in Sweden, so far as I have been able to determine, their emphasis is directed more on moving people to jobs than jobs to people. Their major emphasis is on mobility of labour, and so far as I have been able to determine there is very little in their program to encourage industries to move into areas of slow growth.

They have nothing similar to the English program of, in effect, making it necessary for firms to go into certain areas through the granting or withholding of building permits. That leads me to another point, to remind this committee that because England is a unitary state, with one parliament dealing with all aspects of national life, they are in a position to use methods with regard to the location of industry which, for constitutional reasons, would not appear to be available to the federal parliament.

The main activity of the English parliament in so far as making it necessary for firms to move from one area to another, or stay where they are, arises out of the fact that they have legislation which makes it possible to grant or withhold building permits, something which in Canada would appear to be under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

When we deal with this important subject we should be sure to take measures which are clearly within the competence of the federal parliament, so that if we do create plans to help industries to expand in certain areas and move into certain areas we will not create programs which will lead only to complicated constitutional disputes, rather than to industrial expansion in areas of slow growth.

It should be clear from the measures already taken that the present government is interested in encouraging the location of industries in areas of slow growth and chronic unemployment that still may exist in this country. While it may be suggested that this type of measure might lead to some form of increased costs for individual firms, this must be balanced against the over-all economic cost to the entire country of having certain areas remain areas of slow growth with high welfare costs and high unemployment insurance costs under which many of these areas remain in their present state. If we balance the economic cost to the entire country against the cost of measures of this type, put into effect by this government, I think it will be readily seen that this is something which even from the sheer economic point of view is most necessary and valuable to the country.

I might point out, however, that the incentive approach, the tax incentive approach used so far by the government, is something which helps prevent uneconomic industry from going into areas of the country where it should not go because the use of the incentive measure means the individual firm itself makes the decision rather than the government and, second, for these measures to have the most beneficial effect it is necessary for the firms which locate in the areas in question ultimately to make some form of profit, which helps prevent firms which do not have a sound economic future from locating in areas of slow growth.

In conclusion, while this department has already made a most useful and constructive beginning, there is no question that there is more that can be done, and I want to mention one point briefly here. I am referring to the area of public relations. It would seem to me that the programs this department is administering at present, and is going to be called on to administer, depend for their success on having as many of the people in this country as possible know enough about them so that they will be able to take advantage of them, and of course the public generally needs full information about the operations of the programs of this department so that it can assess its value to the country.

It would seem to me that up to now the department to an unnecessary extent has kept its light under a bushel. I recognize this is because some of the programs it administers involve tax incentives and that there are requirements of secrecy in existing law. However I hope that in future the department will do more to encourage firms which qualify for the incentives to announce that they are taking advantage of them, or to get permission from these firms to make the announcements itself. As an alternative, in future, once the firms make the announcements, in a way that appears to a certain extent in that very interesting article in the Financial Post to which I referred, the department should take greater steps to spread this information throughout the country and put it in the hands of people in the business and financial communities who would be interested in it.

I must say that as yet, in spite of the good work that has been done, a lot more can be done in the area of public relations. I just mention one example. I do not think enough persons know as yet that if an area, because of improvement in economic conditions, because of improvement in employment, may leave a status where under the existing criteria it will be removed from the list of designated areas, the firms which qualify for the incentives, either the accelerated depreciation or the three year tax holiday, will be fully entitled to take advantage of these incentives for the full statutory period provided by law. There is no reason why such a community should really be concerned about at some time not being on the list of designated areas because, if that is the case, because of the specific criteria which have made it necessary to place that community on the list, it will mean there has been sufficient improvement in employment and economic conditions so that the community has now begun to catch up with other areas of the country and can stand on its own feet. This type of thing should be brought more fully to the attention of the business and financial communities, and to some of the areas that might be removed from the designated area list.

I hope that the Department of Industry will not be afraid to continue to take vigorous and effective steps, even more vigorous and effective steps, to assess the development of secondary industry in the country. There has been a negative type of criticism of the department in this chamber today, but I think that generally the secondary manufacturing segment of our economy and the people employed in it will welcome and support measures taken by the government and the department to continue to strengthen secondary manufacturing, and thereby take very important steps to maintain and increase employment and production in this country.

Mr. Hales: Would the hon. member not agree that the institution of the Bladen commission's report by the Conservative government did more to help the employment picture in Windsor than any other single factor?

Mr. Gray: If the previous Conservative government had actually instituted the Bladen report I would agree with the hon. member. Unfortunately, that government did not have either the courage, or the interest in the Windsor community, to do so. After two years of continuous pressure by my hon. friend from Essex East, to which I added my own voice when I had the privilege of being elected to this house in June, 1962—

An hon. Member: Another speech?

Mr. Gray: I am answering the hon. member's question. Perhaps he wishes now that he had not asked it. What happened was this. In effect, the Conservative government brought forth a small mouse, a very limited application of the Bladen principles only with regard to automatic transmissions. It was a program which was to last only one year, and representatives of industry said it was not long enough to do anything meaningful for the automobile industry in Canada. The development to which the hon. member referred began only after the present government brought in a plan which reflected the Bladen principles, and applied them to the entire range of automotive manufacturing over a term of three years so that industry could really take advantage of the situation.

Mr. Hales: But would the hon. member not agree that the Bladen report was instituted in 1962 and that it took effect on engines and transmission parts?

Mr. Gray: I will agree that there was an implementation of the report only to cover automotive transmissions and parts. It should be to the eternal shame of the Conservative government and its supporters that it took them two years to do that, when they should have applied the principles of the report to the whole field as soon as it came out.

Mr. Stenson: I think the department whose estimates we are now considering is one of the most important departments to come before us. I am sorry there are not more members present on the government side of the house to give the minister their support. There are six of them in the chamber. That is how interested they are. Even the whip is not here.

With regard to these estimates, may I say I am at a loss to understand how this department can operate efficiently, spending the amount of money it does, and how it has aided industry in this country, or will aid it. The minister, like the hon. member who preceded me in this debate, the hon. member for Essex West, spoke about our flourishing economy. That, Mr. Chairman, is a direct result of good legislation and planning by the former government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stenson: I should like to ask the hon. member for Essex West if he considers the devalued dollar of any help to Windsor?

Mr. Gray: Would you like me to deal with it now?

An hon. Member: He opposed it.

Mr. Stenson: Some time ago I asked the minister if his staff would be drawn from the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Defence Production and he assured me this would be the case. Yet the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce have increased by approximately $9 million this year. The Department of Industry itself has a budget of $24 million, and if we look at the estimates of the Department of Defence Production, we find they have only decreased by the amount of $1,857,000. So we can presume that this new department is costing the country, taking into account the increase in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, a total of $31,200,000. It is most interesting to note this increase. I know many people in the country must be wondering what the government is doing with this money. Certainly industry is wondering what assistance it is getting from the department.

The hon. member for Essex West referred to this increase. I should like to call to his attention the fact that the work of the department under consideration was formerly covered by the defence department and by the Department of Trade and Commerce. So I consider there has been a direct increase of $31,200,000. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association is extremely unhappy about the tax which has been placed on production machinery. Governments often blame the mounting tax burden on the demands made by electors. But this was not the case when the Department of Industry was set up. The people did not demand it, neither did industry demand it. I feel it is an attempt by the government and the civil service to hinder free enterprise in industry. So far, I feel, it is a dictatorship imposed on industry, and that it is not at all necessary in this country.

The scheme to set up factories in designated areas has been a failure. In directing industries to cities such as Windsor and Brantford, discontent has resulted throughout the rest of the province of Ontario. The concessions granted to industries in designated areas are questionable. How much assistance will they be to them? New industries starting in any locality usually find their profits fairly small in the first two or three years.

In answer to a question I put on the order paper regarding industries operating in designated areas, I was told that there were seven or eight industries in production and of these not one had yet received financial aid. It will be interesting to see just how much they do receive over the next two or three years. The Department of Industry with this legislation has left a bad taste in the mouths of industrial promoters, municipal councils and provinces which have worked hard to promote industry in their own localities. Here again we find municipal governments and provinces being dictated to by a department here in Ottawa.

I should like the Minister of Industry to explain to the house what his department is doing in regard to research facilities in industry. What industries are receiving aid? How many men are working on an examination of imported items not manufactured in Canada? Is there a branch set up to advise industry regarding the manufacture of such products? I wonder how many industries would take advantage of these facilities if they were available. I think that many Canadian industries have these facilities in their own plants at the present time?

Another question I should like to ask the Minister of Industry is this: Has his department made any studies regarding the decentralization of industry, that is, the bringing of industries from centres of large population to smaller centres? Two or three weeks ago, a Toronto firm announced that it was moving its Port Hope operation to Toronto. Did the department consult this firm and try to have them stay in Port Hope? The same thing has happened in my constituency.

With regard to foreign ownership, I feel direct interference by the federal government in this situation is a negative approach. United States firms and others are primarily responsible for the great industrial advance which has taken place in Canada. United States companies have set up plants in Canada and have trained many Canadians in their skills and techniques. It has not occurred to many Canadians that we are being presented with golden opportunities to learn the tricks of these trades that are being brought into Canada so we can gradually use them in the development of Canadian owned industry.

Correction of this situation must of necessity be a long range project. Encouragement should be given to every Canadian firm that can muster the resources to get started, so they can prove they have the required skill and fortitude. This should be in the form of relief from taxes, until they are well established, and the best equipment should be made available to them at the lowest cost; financing should be made available on reasonable terms and in amounts proportionate to the progress that they make with the resources available.

I consider the further development of secondary industry to be of prime importance to the future economic welfare of Canada. A high level of activity in the primary industries of Canada, such as mining, pulp and paper, agriculture, and so on, with their correspondingly high level of exports is excellent for Canada's financial stability; but these industries do not provide jobs in proportion to the dollar value of their output. Secondary manufacturing industry is the major provider of jobs.

To encourage the development of secondary manufacturing I suggest the government start by removing the most detrimental forms of taxation. At the moment I would class the sales tax on production equipment as the worst, not because of the actual tax rates but because of the complexity and uncertainty it introduces into the operation of this industry. It is my opinion that increased export of manufactured goods is necessary for the expansion of our secondary manufacturing industries. Canada must import large amounts of industrial equipment and other items, the manufacture of which cannot be sustained on Canadian volume alone. To balance this it is imperative that we manufacture many items on a high volume basis so that we can successfully export, and in so doing can easily compete in the home market. In this way we could supply the Canadian market at a much lower price than when these items were imported.

I spoke in the house regarding the Fisher Gauge Company and I warned the government that if this tax on production machinery was retained, this company would be forced to move part of their manufacturing plant to the state of New York in the United States. The other day in the house the Minister of Finance made the statement that this move was prompted because of the high excise tax on their products going into the United States. I have here a letter that the president of this firm wrote to the Minister of Finance and I would like to read parts of it into the record. It is addressed to Hon. Walter L. Gordon:

> Your recent statement in the House of Commons that our firm was establishing a plant in the United States because of the U.S. customs tariffs and not because of the Canadian sales tax came as a surprise in view of the effort that we have made to advise the government of the effects of this tax on firms such as ours.
> I wish to state emphatically that our establishment of production facilities in the state of New York is primarily because of the detrimental effects of the Canadian sales tax on production in Canada. The U.S. customs tariffs and other factors are secondary considerations. The present tax situation will permit us to continue the manufacture of machines and tools in Canada, providing that they are not used to turn out products in this country. If you can spare a few minutes of your extremely valuable time to read further, I will explain why this is so.

He goes on for several more paragraphs, but I am just going to read the last three:

> The regulations require that tax must be paid if a tool is used to produce an article in Canada, whether the article is exported or not. However, if we move the tool across the border and use U.S. labour and material, we will be exempt from the tax and spared the headaches of its administration.
> We have recently built a tool costing many thousands of dollars. After producing and exporting less than one hundred dollars worth of castings from it, a design change made retooling necessary. Nevertheless, because this tool was used "for production" in Canada, the tax must be paid, being a direct loss to us.
> I am sure that you will see that this intolerable situation left us with no alternative but to set up production facilities outside Canada.

This is just one industry. How many others are affected and will be taking the same steps? As the Minister of Industry knows, our industries in Canada are British or American owned in a good many cases. This tax will affect their Canadian plants in the same way, and it is a serious threat to their economy in this country. However, these industries have a choice. If the manufacturing conditions are not healthy in Canada, they can switch to their United States or British plants. That is what this Canadian industry had to do, namely move to the United States. I believe that the United States plants will not use our plants in Canada to manufacture their goods, but will use their own plants and import their products into this country instead of having them manufactured here.

Cannot the Minister of Industry see what is already happening across the country? Not only is the Fisher Gauge, a Canadian company, moving, but in the Peterborough Examiner recently there was an announcement that Canadian General Electric would move into the European field. The vice president and general manager of the Peterborough plant has often spoken of the keen competition from overseas suppliers, and any added taxes on production increases the threat of losing these markets. This type of legislation on production machinery is just one of these added costs.

When other countries are going ahead industrial-wise, are we going to sit back and put up with a government that puts up roadblocks and hangs millstones around the necks of our industries? The other day in the house the minister announced the construction of a new atomic energy power plant in which Ontario hydro, the Ontario government and the federal government are taking part. Everyone seemed happy to hear this announcement. However, Mr. Chairman, I feel that private industry should have been given a chance to bid on this contract. I know that Ontario hydro could have received a fixed price in regard to this nuclear power station. The estimated cost of the station is $266 million. That is just an estimate and we do not know how much more it will cost. It will probably run over that amount, rather than under it.

I should like to ask the minister how long this government is going to subsidize Atomic Energy of Canada Limited while ignoring private industry, with the facilities it has set up to carry out this work? I am referring to Canadian General Electric, who I am sure would have been interested in making a firm bid on this type of station. The Department of Industry should take a look at this matter.

I feel that private industry could have built this nuclear electric power station at a fixed price and completed the work for less money and in less time than Atomic Energy of Canada. Private industry cannot be encouraged to develop if government controlled industries are given these contracts without fixing a set price and are subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. Just last Wednesday the United States government released to private enterprise whole atomic material which will create a full-fledged private nuclear industry without federal competition.

I think Atomic Energy of Canada should get out of the field of building nuclear power plants and leave it to private industry.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, in order that we might have some orderly arrangement I was wondering whether the minister would like to make some report to the committee on these two departments, industry and defence production, before we get into the many other items which he may wish to speak on or introduce.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I was going to wait until all the questions had been asked in general speeches before endeavouring to answer.

Mr. Hales: On these two departments?

Mr. Drury: Yes, on the two departments. A question was raised here about Atomic Energy of Canada Limited on which I have not yet made a statement. I understand the desire is that we should proceed with just the two departments at the moment.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, just the two.

Mr. Drury: Are there any more questions to be asked about the departments of industry and defence production, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Doucett: Mr. Chairman, may I say I fully realize the problems that the minister has with a department such as this, but it has been said by other hon. members that his department has developed very rapidly by way of taking on a very large staff. Some 248 employees have been taken on during the last few months at a cost of some $3,614,000. This is a fairly large amount of money for such a new department to be spending in so short a time, and an envisaged expenditure for this year of over $24 million seems to indicate that the expenses are mounting up.

This is probably the way in which many new departments have developed into a size which probably is far beyond immediate demands. If we look over some of the information he has given us we find that 105 persons have been employed at a salary of over $8,000 a year. There are 142 employees receiving salaries below that figure. I am wondering whether his department within a few months of its organization needs a staff of that size, involving this huge expenditure. What are these men doing? The department has only one office outside the city of Ottawa. Do the rest of the employees travel throughout the Dominion of Canada? We got along in Canada for many years without such a department, and now within a few months we find this huge army of employees and a contemplated expenditure of several million dollars. This seems to indicate a little more than the normal growth which should take place within so short a time.

I do not think we should be empire building when there are so many other urgent matters of importance to consider. If it can be proven that this is going to develop the economy of Canada, produce markets in the world and add to the industries of our country, then that is a different matter, of course. However, I just wanted to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and to say that the expenditure and size of the department seems out of all proportion to the time it has been in operation.

Mr. Stenson: Mr. Chairman, when I referred to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited I felt it tied in so closely with industry, on which the minister made a statement, that it was appropriate to mention it. That is why I hope he will have something to say, after he makes his statement on atomic energy.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, from what we have heard so far in the comments from this side of the house, it is quite obvious that there is a question in the minds of many of us whether this new Department of Industry is actually going to be able to justify its added cost to the government. I think the question is: Will it add more to the national economy of Canada than it costs the taxpayer? I know very well the government and the minister feels that it will indeed do this. I hope he can justify this feeling, and I wish him every success in his attempts to do so, but I think he should realize that this is a question which will crop up certainly with a great deal more force next year when we have more figures on which to base our opinions.

Nevertheless I do feel the costs are excessive. One of the preceding speakers thought there were something like 105 executive personnel involved. My figures are a little larger than his; my count is 125 executive personnel. I estimate—and this is all I can do, of course, because I do not know exactly how much each individual is being paid—that on the average the cost will run somewhere between $1.5 to $2 million for executive personnel alone. The minister pointed out that he already had 290 officers—I do not think he means just executive personnel—which represents 45 per cent of the total strength. So indeed we have a case of empire building once more. I think it would be well for him to realize that this government is being tagged with the accusation that it is enlarging the civil service establishment at a tremendous rate; and undoubtedly the minister will hear more of this. Therefore I hope he can justify the expenditure he is incurring through the establishment of his new Department of Industry.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about the policy of designated areas. I think we all understand that the purpose of placing some areas in a designated category is to rehabilitate these declining areas. I wonder whether the present method followed is the most economically feasible one. I understand that Sweden is following an entirely different procedure, moving the people to places where industry can and will operate most efficiently. I feel that is the proper procedure to follow, and I am sure if assistance can be provided to people in moving from one area to another, many will do so, although others may have very strong roots and prefer to remain. I am sure the vast majority could be persuaded to move to areas where development of industry is logical. I do not think the method followed by this government is a particularly efficient or economical way of carrying out a good idea.

In this country we will certainly face a great deal of development within a relatively short number of years. Many areas are close to markets, and have other advantages, such as the ready supply of fuel. The area from which I come has an immediate supply of gas, oil, salt, and also potash which is becoming very important to our economy. I am sure potash will become more important to our economy within the next two decades. I hope the existence of potash in my area will encourage the development of a chemical industry there, just as was the case in Germany. I think that modern industrialized Germany owes a great deal to the development of the potash industry there. I think a similar development could take place at other points in the west where these potash deposits are located. I am very happy to say that the government of Saskatchewan did not approve a plan to build a pipe line to carry the potash to Chicago. I hope that government never does approve of such a plan, because if such a pipe line were built, neither the federal government nor any other government would be able to develop that industry in this country as it should be developed.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that we should allow the economic forces to work a little more than we have allowed them to work. In this connection I should perhaps mention the heavy water plant industry. As a result of a recent visit, I appreciate the needs of the maritime provinces, and I think everything we can do should be done to develop industry there. Nevertheless, having regard to where heavy water plants could be developed economically, considering the enormous quantities of coal which can be obtained very cheaply by strip mining in Saskatchewan, I think it would have been more economical to have constructed that plant there.

With those few comments, Mr. Chairman, I should like to conclude by again emphasizing that I feel the designated area policy is good, but should not be used to prevent industry from locating in areas where they would be closer to the source of supply of raw materials and can operate more economically. Second, I would warn the minister that in future he is going to have to answer the question as to whether the Department of Industry actually warrants the expenditures now required.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I had thought the hon. member for Essex West, having taken part in this debate, would have covered the several things I intended to say, and thereby obviate the necessity of my getting to my feet. That hon. member represents a riding adjacent to my own, and is interested in industrial problems which are similar to those experienced in my area. However, sir, when he spent three quarters of his time on a partisan, political theme, and the rest congratulating his own government and this department, he left a great deal to be brought to the attention of the Minister of Industry.

The hon. member pointed out in no uncertain terms, and I agree with him, that there is a tremendous increase in building and expansion of industry in the particular area to which I have referred, although not nearly as much as we had hoped. Perhaps I may dare to suggest that this expansion, in spite of the hon. member's claim, was partially occasioned by the government's pegging the dollar at 92 cents, which encouraged business to take advantage of the then existing situation, before taxes were increased. That fact had as much to do with the industrial activity that has taken place as anything else.

Having made those remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring two specific problems to the attention of the minister. I hope in his reply this afternoon he will give consideration and answers to both problems. I am sure his department is well aware of the first one, and I assure the minister that we know he is following the proceedings with a great deal of interest. The automobile industry is very much concerned about the attitude of the treasury department of the United States in respect of tariffs on the importation of Canadian parts into the United States. I wonder whether the minister could make a statement this afternoon which would allay the feelings of deep concern on the part of the officials of the automobile industry in respect of this very serious problem? I understand the secretary of the treasury in the United States is taking this situation under very active consideration. Any statement the minister could make this afternoon in this regard I am sure would be welcomed by the entire industry.

The second point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is one which I brought to the attention of the house on an earlier occasion. I should like to ask the minister whether he or the officials of his department have taken cognizance of the differentiation on freight rates in the entire area of southwestern Ontario, and the great discrepancy in transport costs east and west. May I assure the minister that it is the concern and the opinion of various chambers of commerce and leaders of industry in that particular area that if something can be done to equalize transportation costs east and west this would go a long way towards encouraging not only expansion of present industry in that area, but would encourage new industry to locate there. Certainly when there is such a differentiation in rates it works a direct hardship on industry in the particular area, and does encourage industry to move further east.

I should like to ask the minister whether he or his departmental officials have taken this fact into consideration and, if not, whether he will assure us that he will consider the problem and intercede with the Minister of Transport on behalf of local industry? I have brought the situation to the attention of the Minister of Transport, but it is my opinion that to date nothing has been done about it in a concrete way. I am concerned about this situation, as are the officials of industry there, and I am sure that concrete steps taken to alleviate this situation would do much not only to help the major industries located there but also subcontractors. No doubt major industry is in a position to arbitrate rates that are beneficial to them, because of the tremendous amount of freight they are moving, and thereby can circumvent this differentiation to some extent. That does not assist small industry in my area. Quite to the contrary, small industry is penalized by the additional cost of moving freight and their lack of ability to negotiate equal relief in this area.

Mr. Minister, I hope in the course of your reply this afternoon you will be able to comment briefly in respect of these two particular problems facing industry in our area. I refer to the uneasiness of the automobile industry and parts suppliers because of the latest tariff development, and the manner in which transportation costs are creating definite hardships for industry in southwestern Ontario.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from an area in Quebec which is considered to be one of the main industrial centres, I could not very well refrain from making a few comments concerning the Department of Industry.

First, I should like to inform the minister that St. Hyacinthe and the surrounding area have the most stable and qualified labour force one could find anywhere. I also wish to ask him to use his influence, while reminding him that, if ever he is short of a place to direct new industries, the city of St. Hyacinthe will always be the ideal location for them. Indeed, he could guarantee those companies making representations to that effect the same success now being achieved by industry already established there.

At this point, I wish to call the attention of the minister on a report published in Le Devoir of August 3, 1964 by Mr. Jean Pierre Fournier. It seems that Mr. Fournier agrees with several members that the new Department of Industry has not brought the results that people were entitled to expect. In fact, if the results obtained up to the present are compared with the estimates of the department, it is realized that the little relief the Department of Industry may have brought cost a lot to the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Fournier's article is entitled:

The designated areas: a failure?

Here is what it says:

The limited information given to the House of Commons by the Minister of Industry, Mr. Charles Drury, about ten days ago, shows in a convincing way the futility of the federal policy of fiscal discrimination designed to favour industrial development in economically depressed areas.

Although that policy has been in effect for about a year, only nine firms have already advised the government of their intention of establishing plants which will give jobs to a total of 1,265 workers in all the areas eligible for tax incentives. Out of those nine plants, three will be established in the province of Quebec and will provide jobs for a total of 87 men;

Mr. Chairman, we were certainly entitled to expect much more than what the Department of Industry is presenting today, a year after it was set up.

I cannot help but remind the minister that during the election campaign of 1963, according to a pamphlet I have here, the Liberal party promised to create 250,000 jobs a year in order to meet the needs of the increasing population. Now I wish to remind the minister that the needs felt during the election campaign are more urgent now, and the people clamour for new jobs in order to earn a livelihood.

A quick look at the information contained in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965, will show that 301 new employees have been recruited to provide the staff of that new department. Looking at the salaries paid, we find that the minister was rather generous for those who were fortunate enough to be employed in that new department.

It seems to me that we could very well come to the conclusion that the minister is building up what could be called a patronage empire. I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that that is not what the people are expecting, quite the contrary; they are expecting the Minister of Industry to do his part in carrying out the various programs promised during the last election campaign to promote employment in Canada.

That department has been in operation for a year already. I feel it is high time it should do something.

Just think, Mr. Chairman, that only nine industries have shown any intention of establishing new plants. Incidentally, that does not mean nine new industries; they are nine companies which have expressed interest in that measure.

Just think also that those industries would create only 87 new jobs.

Therefore, you would be justified to conclude with Mr. Jean Pierre Fournier that this new department is a complete failure.

Since it is recognized that the minister has a great number of job-creating ideas, I take this opportunity to ask him to implement some every day of the week; I suggest to him also to ask his officials to make extraordinary efforts so that Canada, and the province of Quebec in particular, will get the industries they urgently need.

In addition, I should like the minister to tell us in which Quebec communities the new industries will be established and whether they will be located only in designated depressed areas.

When I have that information, I will probably have other questions for him.

[Text]

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to say a few words. Most of what I intended to say has been fairly well covered, but I should like to say to the minister that I do not believe the yardstick used in assessing depressed areas is a good one. I do not believe it is as broad as it should be. I do not think that unemployment, summer or winter, is a complete indication of the situation. I think you also have to know certain other facts. I think you have to know why the area is depressed. Why is there a blight on industry? What caused it? I think we must also know certain other things such as what preparations have been made in the field of sanitation. What about water pollution? What about sewage facilities? Is the water supply adequate? I think you also have to consider transportation. Right at the present moment there is one industry moving out of a town in my area, and one of the reasons given is the high cost of transportation. I do not believe that the minister can do a good job without assessing all those facts.

I do not see any point in going into a so-called depressed area and building it up, erecting schools, churches and facilities, only to find out that it still has the disease that caused the problem, with the result that at the end of a period of 10 or 15 years the facilities constructed in school and hospital housing and which cost millions of dollars, are not being used.

I wonder whether the minister has taken a long look at some of the smaller industries that do not seem to be able to get the help they should get from the government. They are not getting the direction they should receive. This is a very important factor in decentralizing industry and getting employment out of the huge city areas.

I want to speak to the minister on another matter which I brought to his attention previously, namely the taxing of certain parts of a machine. I brought a specific instance to his attention where a manufacturer was producing a machine but one part of the machine could not be purchased in Canada.

Nobody would offer to make it at a price which would make the complete machine competitive. For that reason I believe this is a part that should be allowed to come in tax free, and I look to the department and the minister to do something about this matter.

Another matter I wish to draw to his attention is something else I have also discussed with him previously, the question of some machines which in some instances are tax free and in other instances are not. I have a good example of this concerning people right across the street from each other in a manufacturing area. One of the firms buys a machine and pays 11 per cent tax on it, while the other company buys a machine and does not pay any tax. This matter was brought before the department and the officials said they could not do much about it. Surely these companies are creating work, and if a machine is free in one particular case it should be free in the other. I have reference to the Mosley giant shear, where one company buys a similar machine tax free and the other does not. It is used to cut scrap iron into sizes suitable for melting. I hope the minister will look into this or have the Department of National Revenue look into it to see that these inequalities are removed.

If you are going to set up industry and build an empire, you don't want a lot of impediments on the wheel. This is what the minister is operating with today, and I think he is operating the same way in choosing depressed areas. I do not think his officials have taken public health and associated problems into consideration, and I believe the Canadian taxpayer deserves a better deal than that.

[Translation]

Mr. Frenette: Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the house to make some observations concerning the estimates of the Department of Industry, because several of my colleagues probably also wish to get some information from the minister.

I listened with tremendous interest to the statement read by the Minister of Industry, at the beginning of the discussion on his estimates, on the situation prevailing in that field in Canada.

I congratulate him for his enthusiasm while he read his statement, giving us a description which I hope is on a par with the situation as regards industry.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Listening to him, it seems that everything is fine and dandy, that our economic situation is particularly brilliant, that the industrial growth is progressing, in brief, that we are now in the midst of an unprecedented wave of prosperity. At one time, we could have thought we were in an advertising agency to promote immigration to Canada.

However, I noted the information given to the house by the minister. It goes without saying that it is only a summary report of the activities of the department during the year, but on the other hand, that report suggested that there is some hope and that we can expect a substantial improvement in the industrial picture and, therefore, in the field of employment also.

Contrary to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) who seemed to reproach the minister for not appointing several new officials to ensure the orderly administration of his department, instead of blaming him, I must commend him for it, because the minister seems well disposed and willing to face up to the responsibilities entrusted to him when he accepted to be Minister of Industry or when the department was set up.

The hon. member even mentioned that he found the salaries high. I disagree with him once again, because I feel that if officials of that department are well paid, they obviously deserve even more. I put all the more trust in their competence if they are well paid. Since they decided to leave private enterprise to serve the government of Canada, it follows logically, it seems to me, that they have decided to forgo promotions which they might have expected if they had remained in private industry and that leads us to expect a noticeable improvement in that respect.

However, there is a particular point on which I want to dwell longer. Other hon. members did it before me but I feel obliged to add some remarks of my own, especially with regard to the designation of surplus manpower areas.

It goes without saying that the designation of these areas is far from being perfect. I readily understand the method used by the Department of Industry, in co-operation with the Department of Labour, to look after the designation of these areas.

I could appreciate that the most accurate data available had to be used as a base for the designation of these areas. However, the practice is now approved and subject to improvement.

Once again, and I am perhaps optimistic, but I place confidence once again in the minister and his officials in the matter of reviewing the designation of certain areas, taking into consideration factors which came to their knowledge since this designation.

First, it must be taken into account that the statistical data of the various offices of the national employment service do not necessarily reflect the unemployment situation in a given area. There are surely particular needs in certain areas served by employment offices sometimes located in cities which are quite remote from the affected areas.

May I at this time, Mr. Chairman, make special reference to the Portneuf area which, in my opinion, suffers from the fact that it is located between Quebec and Three Rivers, which are relatively far from certain centres of the Portneuf area.

Inasmuch as the needs of Three Rivers as well as those of Quebec city and Shawinigan, are not the same as those of the Portneuf area, the citizens of the Portneuf area are at a grave disadvantage.

Therefore, I think that the department ought to make a more detailed analysis of the statistics issued by the various employment offices in order to review the designated areas which may benefit from certain tax incentives that are now put into force.

Consideration should also be given, in designating those areas, to the economic situation which exists there. The people's wish to use all available natural resources should also be taken into consideration.

I appreciate the fact that it is hard to come by a solution and that this rather abstract problem is a headache for the officials who are entrusted with the designation of the labour surplus areas. The situation is so serious that departmental officials should be strongly encouraged to look deeper into the causes of unemployment in order to find the remedies which could be applicable in certain areas in particular.

I was pleased to hear the minister state, a while ago, that designated areas will not necessarily remain so for an indefinite number of years, but that their status may be revised from time to time.

Then, when he has an opportunity to reply to the questions put to him would the minister mention the new criteria to be used to designate these labour surplus areas? On what basis will such areas now be designated? What will be the standards and the criteria used to designate such areas?

Again, may I insist on the fact that some areas, like that of Portneuf, are located between urban centres and are consequently far from the unemployment insurance office where workers go to register; consequently, statistics do not show the real situation as concerns unemployment.

This is a new department, and it goes without saying that the minister is quite willing to accept any suggestion made to him. We must not only seek long term solutions to the serious unemployment problem which prevails more particularly in eastern Canada, but also try to find immediate solutions to such problems. Mind you, I quite agree that the department should seek to develop a vast program to check unemployment, but I am also of the opinion that more immediate solutions should be sought to cope with this problem which unfortunately has prevailed for a long time.

While we are dealing with suggestions, I would also like to urge the minister and his officials to study also the progress made in the field of automation. The serious problem of automation is increasing so rapidly that even industrial promotion does not create enough new jobs to fight unemployment. Therefore, something new will have to be found, something more cogent and efficient.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) made a remark earlier today which seemed rather whimsical. He said to the minister, that, if he was still trying to place an industry, the county of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot would be happy to receive it. I shall go one better than the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. In the district of Portneuf, we do not expect to get the dregs and wait till the minister is in a plight, but we cordially invite him to promote the establishment of industries in our area, because it is easy to find qualified labour there, and we also have easy access to a road and waterway system as well as other advantages which certainly deserve to be considered by some industries.

The minister has given us some information with regard to the possible establishment here of a French automotive industry. Now, we hope that the minister will do his utmost to insure the success of that project, that he will work diligently towards this aim, and make every effort to have this industry set up in the area most likely to promote the growth of that French industry.

May I suggest to the hon. minister an ideal site for that industry. As a matter of fact, Portneuf is an ideal industrial site. In addition to highway and railway services, it offers a deep-water wharf built nearly ten years ago at a cost, to the federal government, of $4 million and which, in spite of everything, is still unused.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, for the minister's information, I should like to give certain specific details about this deep-water wharf, located in Portneuf, which has yet to be used. At low tide, it is 37 feet high, which means that 10,000-ton ships and, needless to say, smaller ones, can berth there easily and quite safely. That is a priceless advantage and one which is readily available. It can accommodate ocean-going vessels as well as coasting ships. An industrialist can ship his products directly throughout the world without going through other ports and even receive raw material from Europe or from any other country.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make this small contribution during this study of the estimates of the Department of Industry. I know that the minister is well disposed; on the other hand, I realize that the means at his disposal are very limited. I trust him all the more, however, because he seems willing to surround himself with able officials who are determined to carry out their responsibilities.

In conclusion, I hope that the minister will see to it that new criteria are established for the designation of areas with surplus manpower and that with the help of his officials, he will succeed in finding a more realistic formula likely to relieve unemployment in eastern Canada and more particularly in the province of Quebec.

[Text]

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, I have here a Department of Industry press release regarding the appointment of R. H. Dorrett as regional officer, area development agency, assigned to the western provinces. Mr. Dorrett was industrial commissioner for the city of Regina, part of which I represent in parliament. He was a fine industrial commissioner and I find no fault with his appointment by the Department of Industry. Perhaps the minister has already explained just what is involved in the position of regional officer, area development agency. If he has, I will be able to read it in Hansard. I am interested to know just how much attention the Department of Industry is paying to industrial development in the west, particularly in Saskatchewan; how Mr. Dorrett fits in with this development, and how he can help it to expand.

[Mr. Frenette.]

The hon. member for Kindersley mentioned potash mining in Saskatchewan. There is considerable development in this respect in my constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. In the area around Moose Jaw potash development has taken the form of solution mining instead of the regular shaft mining. Can the minister tell the committee whether there are any tax arrangements or other assistance which apply to shaft mining but do not apply to solution mining; and if there are, will he take steps to remedy this situation?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers the various questions that have been asked, and before any other hon. members speak, I wish to say a few words in connection with the Department of Defence Production. Really the comments made and questions asked today have not come to what I think is the root of this department, and that is the question of its reorganization and the work it is doing.

I believe this department is one of the hangovers from the days of the second world war, and to the average person, the person on the street, and to a good many members there seems to be no real reason for its existence. We do know that there is a certain amount of stand-by equipment to be maintained—I refer to defence production equipment—and that certain stationary requirements and duties have gone into this department; but there has never been, certainly since I have been here, and that is a little over seven years, any detailed inquiry by the house or by a committee of the house into the actual work that the Department of Defence Production is doing, or what it is accomplishing on behalf of the people of Canada. We have skirted around the question today and I would like to ask the minister a few direct questions, if I may.

The first item, Mr. Chairman, is this. If the name "defence production" is now a misnomer, is consideration being given to renaming the department so as to give it a name that has some relation to the duties it is performing? If it is not a misnomer, then what is the department producing? As far as I can gather, nothing is actually being produced by the department and the production is done merely under the direction of the department and not by the department itself.

I think a case has been made out today for a complete examination of the work of the Department of Defence Production. It was the subject of an examination by at least one commission and we expected there would be some reduction in the number of personnel, some reduction in the expenditures, and an effort to bring under control what seems to me and to many others to be a colossus of administrative effort, with insufficient productive capacity and result.

I should like the minister to advise us whether there is any intention of reducing, cutting back, to the capacity of the department the personnel it employs. I notice, for example, that while, as has already been pointed out, a number of people from defence production were expected to be moved into the Department of Industry, this is certainly not shown in the estimates of the department, under the two sections of vote No. 1. Whereas last year, 1963-64, a total of 1,887 people were employed, for the upcoming year the number is 2,194. That is an increase in personnel of 300, in a department which has been questioned as to its usefulness for the job it was originally set up to do. I would like to know why there is an increase in personnel. At first I thought perhaps it was the addition of the directorate of printing; but I find they are separately detailed in the estimates. I can see no direct reason why there should be this increase of 300 personnel in the department.

It is not unusual for a member to be speaking about something of which he has not full knowledge. I admit that in my case. I will state, though, that on many occasions I have made the effort to find out what the department is doing, and in most cases have been unsuccessful. I believe the need for a referral of the estimates or the operations of the department to a parliamentary committee has been established. I would hope the minister would take some opportunity of doing so—not just explaining to us here this afternoon the reason for the increase. I think the whole scope of operation of this department is due for a re-examination. I have not any doubt in the world that everybody in the department is doing a job and the best job they can. This is not the point of my argument. If the department is not doing the job for which it was originally set up, if it is not so required, and if it is not given other duties, then an effort should be made to transfer people to the Department of Industry or other departments. I thought this was the place where this could have been done.

However, Mr. Chairman, unless I misread the estimates of this department and the estimates of the Department of Industry, there has been very little transfer; in fact, there has been an increase of 300 personnel in one department and over 200 in the other. I congratulate the minister for managing to put himself at the head of such a tremendous administrative machine. I merely ask him, what is it doing?

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a few words with regard to some remarks made by the minister this morning, namely with regard to the setting up of a group of experts to further our talks under GATT. I would like to sound a word of warning to the minister at this time. I feel a great deal of harm can be done to allied industries in Canada. I am now talking of various import quotas for farmers and people who grow fruit and vegetables. I hope that when the minister and his group are furthering their talks with GATT the experts will take time off to go over very carefully with the Minister of Agriculture the effect of any reductions in specific duties.

My reason for saying that is this. Let me give two specific instances. If you look at the duty on fruits and vegetables over a period of years you will see the impact of GATT when it first came into effect. If you go back to the early thirties you will find that up until 1935, quite marked specific duties existed on certain soft fruits and vegetables throughout Canada. From that time on there took place a watering down. I do not want to be political about this, but it occurred under a Liberal administration. Then when GATT came into existence Canadian producers were put in a rather invidious position simply because of large exports to this country from the United States of fruits and vegetables.

Then from 1957 on there was quite a change, in that the government of the day saw fit to increase the duties. For example, duties were increased on certain soft fruits and vegetables such as asparagus and onions, which are grown in my area. Potato quotas were made more workable and as a result Canadian farmers were put in a much better position. In other words, this was done to stop this flood of United States imports.

I should like to be sure that the minister understands that it is all very well talking about industry on a large scale, but if you make any changes in GATT, either to lower tariffs because of markets elsewhere or to get into other countries' markets, it should not be done at the expense of the farmer. He is in an extraordinarily poor position if he does not have specific duties protecting him. I might also mention the protection of fair value for duty.

I said I would give two instances. I think it is only fair also to refer to turkeys at the present time. I understand the removal of the quota on turkeys was because of a fear of retaliation by the United States and others throughout GATT. In 1955 and 1956 there were 10 million and 12 million pounds of turkeys respectively brought in. In July 1957 import controls were put on which restricted the import of turkeys to one million pounds each quarter, or four million pounds each year. That worked very well until last year.

I see the minister is rising. Perhaps he has not been following what I have been saying.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I had been following but I just wanted to assure the hon. member that I have nothing to do with quotas or restrictions on the import of turkeys. This is entirely outside the scope of the Department of Industry, as I think it properly should be. The Department of Agriculture is very well equipped to handle this particular problem, and to endeavour to duplicate the functions of that department in one relating to manufacturing industries does not seem to be quite appropriate.

Mr. Pugh: I am rather glad the minister interjected because it only proves what I have thought all along, that he was not listening to the tying in of the negotiations with GATT. To reiterate what I said previously, the minister specifically said this morning that a team of experts was being geared to deal with GATT. I suggest that while dealing with GATT he should also talk it over with the Minister of Agriculture. I mentioned specific things which had been done through the years up until the commencement of GATT, and how this affected our fruits and vegetable industry.

All I am saying to the minister is this. Do not do anything with regard to making changes in GATT which might help industry to the detriment of the farmer. I am pointing out the specific instance of what happened in August last year, when it was feared that there might have been retaliation in GATT because the quota for turkeys was chopped to four million a year. Up to August of this year over seven million pounds of turkeys have already been brought in, and this has upset the industry tremendously. When the minister is in his office trying to help industry throughout Canada he should attempt to do so in conjunction with the other members of the government, and in this case specifically the Minister of Agriculture. I hope he will talk over any tariff changes which might have an adverse effect on the farmers and fruit growers throughout Canada, and specifically in my own area where the turkey industry is suffering badly. If we take off duties on onions and potatoes and soft fruits, and change the quotas on asparagus, and do not pay attention to fair value for duty, then we are in a bad spot.

I am glad to see that the minister has been paying attention to what I have just been saying, and I know he will use his good offices in this respect.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, in rising to say a few words on the estimates of the Department of Industry I should like to remark on the glowing way the minister referred to the export investment goals which have been reached during the last few months. I know that with this many responsibilities he has one of the heaviest loads that any cabinet minister has to carry in the present government. I might also say that he did not forget to carry part of that political load which cabinet ministers sometimes also carry.

With regard to the goals which he said had been reached, particularly in reference to investment in new plant and machinery, when you take a look at the figures the actual increase amounts to little more than the increase in taxes levied by this government in the first budget of the present Minister of Finance; and little more than the normal expected outlay for the reproduction of plant to meet the needs of automation in the changing complex of industry today could be attributed to the figures which have been given by the minister. I would also point out that even if there had been an increase in those figures at the present time the new Department of Industry could hardly expect to take any credit for that increase, because they have been in existence for about only a year.

I was very interested in the minister's reference to designated areas and the area developed criteria. I should like to remind the committee and the minister that that was one of the criticisms offered from this side of the house at the time he first brought his measure before the House of Commons several months ago. What was said on that occasion is still true, and the discrimination that has taken place as between one community and another has not contributed to that orderly development of industry in this country which should be the concern of any government having the welfare of all areas of the nation at heart.

The member for Essex West made some reference in respect of what has taken place in the Sudbury area. He referred to the Bladen report and stated that that report should have been acted upon as soon as it came out. I should like to say I believe the government should study the reports made from time to time before it takes action. Indeed, sir, if we were to look at the other reports which have come forward to the present government referring to other matters I believe they would indicate that study is necessary before action can be taken in respect of those particular matters.

Mr. Chairman, there are those who have suggested that the estimates of this department at the present time indicate that too much is being allotted to it. As I look at the figures of the various branches of the department that are concerned here it occurs to me there has been some juggling of the departmental estimates in an attempt to create the impression that this government is doing something for industry that was not being done previous to the creation of this department. Indeed, sir, that is an impression that I cannot understand, and does not have regard for the facts. I can understand that the minister would like to claim the credit for the expansion and progress that has resulted from the devaluation of the dollar, and I understand his effort to attribute some of that expansion to the creation of his department as well as perhaps to the efforts of the remnants of those other departments now included under industry, but I do not think he will fool very many people in Canada today.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the whole concept of area development, as laid down by the government, has led to an artificial interference with the orderly development of industry in the nation. Certainly when we look at the figures given to us by the minister it can be said that very little of the investment that has taken place in the past year in Canada in industry is anything more than that compelled by the normal competitive factors of world markets today.

I should like to draw attention of course at this time to what has taken place in the province of Saskatchewan, and particularly in the area around Saskatoon where there is the prospect of the development of the potash resources, and the possibility of a chemical industry. I hope that the minister will try to bring the policies of this government to bear in an attempt to aid in that development. I remind him that the whole matter of the freight rate structure enters into that particular situation. I remind the government also that in the province of Saskatchewan the south Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project will soon be a reality, and with the resource of power and water the province will have at that time, together with the potash deposits and the prospects of a chemical industry development, we believe this is one area of Canada that not only deserves but will require the very careful attention of the government in the immediate future.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to say anything more, except that I think with hardly a year of activity under the belt of the minister in this department we can hardly at this time assess the progress he is making. I believe perhaps during the next session it would be a good idea to refer the activities of this department to a parliamentary committee, if for no other reason than to give some publicity and knowledge across this country to the scope and mission of this department in so far as the government's plans for this department are concerned.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, a considerable number of questions have been asked and various suggestions offered. I should like to say that I welcome the suggestions made and have listened with interest to the criticisms offered, although I do not necessarily agree with all of them. I will endeavour to answer at least some of the questions posed.

The hon. member for Lanark asked about the duties of the officers of the department. That was the subject of a parliamentary question some time ago and a long written answer was provided on June 9 in response to question No. 1,251. I refer the hon. member for Lanark to that answer.

The hon. member for Peterborough made mention of the fact that the Fisher Company had decided, by reason of taxation policies, to have its company locate in the United States. While I agree with his description of the events, namely that the subsidiary manufacturing operations are being undertaken by the Fisher firm of Peterborough to supplement the manufacturing operation they are carrying out in Peterborough, and to this degree expansion of their operations is taking place in the United States rather than in Canada, I think the reasons given to me by the Fisher firm are perhaps not quite the same as those given to and recited by the hon. member for Peterborough.

The fact of the matter is that in respect of equipment, materials or products manufactured in Canada for export, and in fact exported to the United States, none of the taxes complained of are payable. Indeed if they have been paid they are all remitted. So by moving to the United States there would be no savings of taxes. There would, however, be a very significant saving in duty. As the Fisher officials explained to us, they wished to save the payment of United States duties by having the fabrication or completion of the products done in the United States. This makes good economic sense.

Mr. Stenson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. minister a question regarding taxes? I pointed out that the company would have to retool and set up a machine to produce the product that would be shipped to the United States. If the company kept that machine in Canada and manufactured the part in Canada, shipping it to the United States, it would have to pay tax on the machine. The tax would be considerable in relation to the cost of the item. I have this part in my hand and it sells for three cents. The cost of retooling and setting up the machine is $12,000. The company would have to pay 8 per cent tax, and if after January 1 the tax was still in existence, it would have to pay another 3 per cent. This company is still trying to maintain the business in Peterborough, but how can they get around that situation? If they instal the machine in Canada, manufacture and ship the part to the United States, they will have to pay tax on this machine. I do not think that argument is fair to this company.

Mr. Drury: There is no question that taxes on production machinery bought for use and employed in Canada are payable, and there is no remission on any part of those taxes by reason of the output from the machine going abroad. To this extent what the hon. gentleman says is entirely correct.

He also asked what industries were receiving research and development assistance. There is contained in the estimates a substantial sum provided for the maintenance of technological skills in Canadian industry, the so-called vote 5. The industries involved are generally speaking in the aircraft, electronics and armament fields. The amount of assistance to date since the inception of the program is some $38 million payable to some 32 companies in respect of 62 defence development projects. That is under the heading of vote 5.

[Mr. Drury.]

In addition, there is the defence industrial research program of the defence research board on which expenditures to date amount to roughly $5 million. Some 50 projects in substantially the same categories of industries are the beneficiaries of this development assistance. Another source of help is the industrial research assistance program of the national research council. Expenditures to date have amounted to approximately $2½ million on some 80 projects and the beneficiaries of this particular program cover the entire section of Canadian industrial activity. All three of the programs I have mentioned are co-ordinated, studied jointly and duplication avoided through the operation of interdepartmental committees on which representatives of these agencies sit.

Mr. Stenson: Could I ask the minister if the names of the industries receiving this aid are available?

Mr. Drury: I think they are probably published in the public accounts and have been for a number of years. If the hon. member wants us to go back over the years and tabulate the names of the companies I will be glad to see he is furnished with this information.

The hon. member for Kindersley made reference to the location of the heavy water plant. While I will not comment on his views as to where the plant should or should not be, whether it would be more appropriate to have it in Saskatchewan or where it is going to be in Nova Scotia, I would point out that the choice of location was made by the company which put in the lowest bid for the manufacture of this heavy water for government account, and that the location of the plant was not in fact determined by the federal government but rather by the bidder for the underwriting on the 1,000 tons of heavy water that we require.

I was interested to note that while the same hon. gentleman rather feels that the best economic or social solution to our unemployment problem is to move people to work rather than to move work to people, there were other participants in the debate who did not share that view. I think I will let him settle his differences with them rather than try to argue the question myself.

The hon. member for Edmonton West asked some questions regarding performance bonds in respect of Defence Construction Limited. I think he indicated that in the past security for the performance of work had been demanded in the form of a cash bond, and that as a result of his insistence or urging, perhaps, it is now possible to furnish bonds of another character. This has been in operation successfully for the past few years and it represents from the contractors' point of view a preferable and less expensive alternative than the furnishing of cash security, which sometimes is financially difficult. I am told that these bonds are required to a value of 50 per cent of the amount of the contract, and I think everyone will agree this is a very substantial cash requirement to have to find in addition to other problems in financing a contract. I am given to understand that the system is working well and to the satisfaction of Defence Construction Limited, and the contractors.

The hon. member asked about warehousing and suggested that the Department of Defence Production may be taking over warehousing from the Department of National Defence. It is not. The Department of National Defence is continuing to do its own warehousing for its own purposes, as it has done in the past in installations constructed to meet its own particular needs. However, in respect of warehousing operations contemplated for the balance of the government agencies to be performed by the Department of Defence Production, a very profound study has been carried out of warehousing needs and the techniques of most effectively doing the job, and arrangements have been made with the Department of National Defence that where they have facilities and space available for warehousing on behalf of other departments or agencies of the government this will be used on a co-operative basis. But warehousing by and for the Department of National Defence will continue to be done by that department.

The hon. member also asked what the story was on the Provider. As hon. members will recollect, this is a supply ship designed to provide replenishment at sea facilities for the Royal Canadian Navy. A number of difficulties arose during the course of construction and necessitated some repairs and some changes being made to the ship following her delivery for trials to the Royal Canadian Navy. A substantial amount of information was provided on July 6 in reply to question No. 1321 indicating the terms of the contracts, claims made against the government and various figures of cost. However, the major faults which were discovered during the sea trials are being rectified by the contractor and at his expense. Following rectification of these major faults the navy will endeavour to work up the efficiency of the vessel.

I am told there is one other troublesome problem relating to vibration in the stern of the vessel. This, however, is a design rather than a construction problem and the navy hopes to give study to this when the major deficiencies have been made good by the contractor.

I think it was the hon. member for Wellington South who made mention of the fact of three observations made by the Auditor General in relation to Defence Construction Limited. These were all in connection with contracts executed some years ago, in 1961 and 1962, and do in fact represent payments by Defence Construction Limited to contractors over and above the total firm price of the contracts, for errors or changes made necessary by the crown. I think most members would agree that where additional expense is occasioned to a contractor, by changes to a plan or an error in a plan on the part of the crown, it is up to the crown in having these changes made to reimburse the contractor the cost of such rectification.

The hon. member also suggested that one might use the designated area program statistics based on a 12 months rather than a six months period. I should point out that the six months or summer period was explicitly chosen in selecting criteria for the designated area program to avoid the factors which would be introduced on a 12 months basis by winter seasonal unemployment.

As hon. members well know, there is a very extensive and, I hope, successful winter unemployment assistance program under the aegis of the Minister of Labour, and this is the series of programs which are designed to cope with the problems of seasonal unemployment, whereas the designated area program is not in itself or of itself supposed to operate to counteract seasonal unemployment. It is supposed to counteract chronic, continuous unemployment; and consequently if one looks at the statistics on the period of the year which is unaffected by a seasonal unemployment he is likely to get a more accurate and less distorted picture.

The hon. member for Saskatoon wondered whether I could not make a statement on automotive parts. Much as I would like to, and interesting, though complex, as this subject is, hon. members will appreciate that this question is now sub judice in the United States, and until such time as the commissioner of customs, who now has under advisement a plea made by some U.S. manufacturers for the application of countervailing duties against Canadian imports, has made a finding on this, it would be highly inappropriate for me to make observations on the state of affairs in this regard.

The hon. member also observed on the inequity, inequalities, the distortions of freight rates. This is something of which not only I but the officials in my department are very conscious, although we as a department do not have primary responsibility in this field. Basically the question of freight rates is one for the Minister of Transport and his department, but there is no question about it that freight rates in Canada are now a very significant, and will come to be an increasingly significant, determinant, not only in the location of manufacturing industry but also on its profitability and on its economic success; and just as one general observation I would point out that we have had a freight rate structure which contains a number of artificialities, productive consequently of a number of distortions.

It is extremely complicated, even more complicated than the Customs Tariff, and does require a serious examination. It suffers from one fundamental defect which is perhaps incurable, and that is that the rates are geared so as to rise with the amount of manufacture going into an article—the more an article is manufactured then the higher is the per pound freight rate. This has the effect of encouraging manufacturing establishments to set up as close to their final markets as possible, and consequently as far away as possible from the source of raw materials. If we could be successful in inverting that structure in terms so that rates per pound declined with the degree of added value this would induce manufacturers to locate close to the source of raw material, rather than to the markets, and this would have the effect of producing a powerful incentive to move industry in a northward direction from the United States. However to do this to the freight rate structure is a little implausible to suggest. It may be nice in theory, but unfortunately it may not be too practical.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot quoted an article by Mr. Jean-Pierre Fournier in Le Devoir. Mr. Fournier concluded, and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot agreed with him, that the area development agency had been a distinct failure by reason of the fact that in its history to date only nine companies had been set up in Canada, or rather had declared their intention to set up business in the designated areas, and of these three were in Quebec employing a total of 87 men.

[Mr. Drury.]

Were these facts true I would agree both with Mr. Fournier and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. Unfortunately the premise is entirely wrong. As I outlined in my remarks, and these curiously enough were part of the observations I made in French—perhaps the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot can understand my English better than my French—I pointed out, and I am not translating, that in 23 of the 35 designated areas new enterprises representing an investment of $245 million capital, and designed to employ in excess of 9,000 people, numbering in total 103, have declared their intentions to set up in the designated areas, and to come into commercial operations so as to take advantage of these tax concessions. This is substantially far removed from Mr. Fournier's basic assumption of a total of nine companies employing 87 people. I shall repeat those figures—103 companies representing new capital investment of $245 million, to furnish employment to 9,000 people in 23 of the 35 designated areas have declared their intention to come into commercial areas have declared their intention to come into commercial operation so as to take advantage of the incentives. If the assumptions of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot were correct, I would agree that the plan had not been a success. But I think it has achieved more than that.

A number of members suggested that the critera for the selection of designated areas should be changed. I have undertaken on a number of occasions to have this reviewed and the matter is currently under review. I hope to be able to make a report later in the fall on the outcome of this review by the officials and by the government. It is complained that the program is discriminatory. As I have said on previous occasions, it is. It is designed to be discriminatory. It is designed to provide additional advantages to those areas which suffer from high, chronic unemployment, and to provide these advantages over other areas which are more fortunate and which do not suffer from high chronic unemployment. If endeavouring to assist such areas by incentive measures is discrimination, then this program is discriminatory, and it is intended to be so.

The hon. member for Portneuf made a number of suggestions for which I am grateful regarding factors we might take into account in establishing criteria. While I do not undertake to accept all of his suggestions they are interesting, and will be considered. But they do present some difficulties. The hon. member also expressed the hope that the government would play its full part in encouraging enterprises for the manufacture of motor cars of French design in Canada. This we have been doing; this we are doing, and this we will continue to do.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka suggested that a fundamental re-examination of the work of the Department of Defence Production should be undertaken. As I indicated in my opening remarks, the entire scope of the work of the Department of Defence Production is undergoing alteration now as a consequence of the recommendations of the royal commission on government organization, and I did endeavour to indicate some of the things which are being done. As a consequence the Department of Defence Production will be, in effect, the supply department for the government, and the name which it now proudly bears will be inappropriate. It will therefore have to be changed, but this of course would require legislation and we have a heavy legislative program of priority items to get through before we can reach this one.

A number of members have referred to the staff, and to the size of the staff, of the Department of Industry. As I said in my opening remarks, we have not been as successful in recruiting staff, in terms of speed anyhow, as was anticipated, at the time these estimates were prepared. We have been insisting on high quality, and consequently we have not got the numbers at the rate we had hoped. We have been able to achieve the quality. As a result, I should like to introduce an amendment to vote 1 of the estimates of the Department of Industry. In recognition of the rate of progress which is being achieved in recruiting personnel for the Department of Industry, I would ask my colleague, the Secretary of State, to move:

That vote 1 be reduced by $600,000.

Mr. Lamontagne: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: Would the Chair not put the question at the end of the minister's remarks on item 1, because this is an amendment to item 1? Perhaps it would be better to have it put at that time.

Mr. Drury: This is item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Industry and I hope that my remarks on item 1 of the Department of Industry are now complete.

Mr. Lambert: If that is so—

Mr. Pugh: Before we vote, I wonder whether the minister would care to make any comment on the suggestion I made with regard to GATT.

Mr. Drury: I have not very much to add to what I said earlier. Needless to say, in putting forward its views as a department to the interdepartmental committee on tariffs in connection with GATT, we shall have in mind the desirability of not recommending courses of action which would have a deleterious effect on any sector of the economy whether it be fruit growing, turkey raising, or the production of worsteds. I think my officials are as responsible as any of our citizens and that they will bear in mind the undesirability of inflicting damage or hardship on any segment of the community.

Mr. Pugh: I take it this will be the policy for the government with regard to changes in GATT, and that this will be the policy given to those who are to carry out this work under the minister.

Mr. Drury: Bearing in mind the responsibilities of others, that will be the policy of my officials in the context of this work. I do not want to give the hon. member the impression that I am giving some kind of guarantee that in no circumstances will there be any tariff changes made which would adversely affect, for example, turkey growers and fruit growers. I am not doing this, because I am not responsible for this question of tariffs, as I tried to explain. Tariffs on fruit and turkeys are the responsibility of somebody else. But I can assure the hon. member that my officials will be fully responsible in the exercise of their duties to provide advice.

Mr. Ricard: We have learned recently that Japan intends to send to Canada textile commodities in increased amounts. I come from a city where the textile industry is the major industry and I should like to know what the minister's attitude is toward protecting our textile manufacturers. We have textile factories which are particularly interested in the manufacture of shirts and, from what I gather, shirts are to be imported in greater numbers than ever before. The same applies to shoes and shoe manufacturing. I should like to urge the minister to do all he can to protect our workers because it is just as important to protect the industries we have already as it is to bring new industries here. If we do not do this, I think we are missing the point. At the same time, I should like the minister to tell us what he plans to do to protect our textile industry.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for both the exhortation and then asking me for an account of my stewardship. The hon. member will recall a long statement made by the Minister of Finance a couple of days ago on the particular question of the entry of Japanese goods into Canada in the past, and indeed in the future, and his concern over the matter of textiles, which he undertook specifically to raise on his forthcoming trip to Japan for the interministerial council meeting. He is seized of the importance to the textiles industry of not allowing excessive entry of textile goods into Canada. This is a view which I quite naturally share. I should say, however, that I think perhaps the basic cure for our problems in this respect, not only in the textile industry but in other Canadian industries, is to increase efficiency and effectiveness of productivity. This is the main problem to which the department is going to address itself. Not only must we be able to satisfy a domestic market with domestic production—and we could achieve this by the imposition of high tariffs—but to be successful and grow we must also export. In order to export we must be able to meet world or export prices. To do this we must increase our efficiency. If we can increase our industrial efficiency to the point where we can meet world prices in exports, we do not need to worry about high tariff protection against imports.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister's oversimplification of the one point I was trying to make, when I suggested we could put more people to work by bringing the people to the work and not the work to the people, was perhaps my own fault. Perhaps I oversimplified what I was saying. However, I was trying to indicate that if the economic advantages of location, of supply of raw materials, power, and so on, are not available in a particular area, and if the taxpayer is required to subsidize industry to go into that area, in the long run we are going to find that the advantages of having the industry in that area will be overbalanced by the advantages in the areas to which it should have gone; and particularly they will be overbalanced by the advantages that industry has in other countries, which I would suggest would lead to the ruin of the industry in the long run. I think this is the reason for Sweden adopting the other policy, and I think it is a wise policy to adopt.

The other point I was endeavouring to make was that the new areas which hope to develop in this country—and there are a great many of them—are being, frankly, discriminated against by this legislation. While I realize that something needs to be done for the people in the areas where the work is required, I think that great care should be taken to see that the newly developing areas are not in this manner discriminated against.

Mr. Stenson: Mr. Chairman, I have just two questions. With regard to designated areas the minister was holding up the summer months. Would he take into consideration places like Windsor and Brantford, which have high employment in the winter months due to the auto industry and agricultural implements being produced in those areas? If the minister had considered the winter months in relation to Brantford, I think he would have reached a different conclusion. The auto industry does not have layoffs and is tooling in the summer months. I wonder whether the minister would take this into consideration when studying the question of designated areas?

I have another short question, Mr. Chairman. The minister just mentioned that we had to have production efficiency to gain exports in the world markets. Does he not feel that if he took off the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery, this would be the first step in that direction?

Mr. Drury: I am not sure I agree that this should be the first step, Mr. Chairman. Clearly, if the 11 per cent tax were to be removed this would lower the costs of production; there is no question about that. However I think it is a noteworthy fact that even with the removal of exemption from tax there has been a very substantial and a very satisfactory rate of growth of the gross national product, and growth of exports, too. I will not for a second argue that if the 11 per cent tax on production machinery were removed, the costs of production would go down to some degree. Whether it is essential that we do this in order to maintain our position in the export markets of the world is perhaps another question.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested to hear the minister express the interest of himself and the department in transportation problems. May I, after the minister's general statement, pursue the matter one step further? Can the minister tell the committee whether there are any particular experts in the field of transportation who have been added to his department, or whether there is a particular part of his department that is devoted to the study of the transportation question in relation to the development of industry? In other words, Mr. Chairman, has there been any specific approach to this matter by his department?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, we have engaged the services as traffic manager of a one-time employee of Dominion Tar and Chemicals, who I think enjoys as high a reputation for ability in this particular field as almost anybody in Canada.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, may I pose one further question to the minister? Would the minister take under consideration the application of some corrective measures in the field of transportation, particularly where a designated area is concerned, and consider this as one of the methods that might be employed to erase such an area from the field of chonic unemployment?

Mr. Drury: This suggestion might be a little difficult to put into practice, and complicated to work out; but we will certainly have a look at it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stenson: Mr. Chairman, the minister referred to the economy and the way industry is going ahead in this country. In view of this I would ask the minister, does he have in mind the trade imbalance we have with the United States at the present time, which is growing all the time?

Mr. Drury: I am not aware of the precise figures, Mr. Chairman. I do know that as a direct consequence of a substantial increase in economic activity in Canada our imports from the United States have risen materially over the past six months. This is to be expected. It is part of the job of the Department of Industry to try and see that Canadian industry progressively moves in to take up this increasing consumption in Canada, rather than by increasing imports.

[Translation]

Mr. Frenette: Mr. Chairman, as the minister said earlier that he would make a statement next fall in respect of designated areas, could he tell us if he will make it before the beginning of the winter works period?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the program of the Department of Labour will begin on November 1. We are hoping to receive our reports just before then; we may not be lucky, but we shall try.

Item as amended agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

1. Departmental administration, including the care, maintenance and custody of stand-by defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling and grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors, $15,324,200.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, before we get into item No. 1, I should like to raise a few questions which are actually dealing with vote No. 15. Since they are really concerned with the administration of the minister's department I should like to clarify the position of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, particularly the handling of contracts with regard to public printing and publication of books.

The transfer of powers here is rather intriguing and I should like a clear indication from the minister as to what has happened in this regard. I should like to refer to orders in council P.C. 1963-1254 dated August 21, 1963; P.C. 1963-1450 dated August 3, 1963, and perhaps the last, February 3, 1964, P.C. 1964-156. The first question I would put is this. Is the Minister of Industry, qua his position as Minister of Defence Production, in charge of public printing and stationery in so far as calling of tenders and awarding of contracts is concerned? Second, what is the amount of contracts awarded in the current fiscal year as related to public printing without tenders having been called, either publicly or by invitation? There are two categories there. There may have been invitational tenders to, say, three or four approved printers. How many are there in that category, and how many contracts have been given outright on the basis of negotiation, if any?

With regard to the order in council of August 21, 1963, I should like to ask: Was there a transfer made of the supervision and control of purchasing, procurement of outside printing, and so on, to the Department of Defence Production? I presume this comes—although this is not clearly indicated—from the department of public printing and stationery, but is the minister satisfied that the order in council so states? The order in council of October 3, 1963 refers to the "responsibility for the procurement of print for books and publications". That matter is transferred from the Department of Defence Production to the department of public printing and stationery. Does this mean that there had been a transfer of part of the responsibility from the department of public printing and stationery to the Department of Defence Production in August of last year, and in October there was then a segment carved out of that group and retransferred back to the department of public printing and stationery? Is that the explanation of this order in council? Because otherwise it means that somewhere along the line in the past defence production had some responsibility for the procurement of print for books and publications. I should like a careful and detailed explanation of that order in council.

Then might I ask: Is the committee to be satisfied that the order in council P.C. 1964-156 is the final order in this series of exchanges, or has it been superseded by any other order in the interval? That order in council is a transfer to the Secretary of State for Canada of the powers, duties and functions (1) of the Minister of Industry relating to the Department of Public Printing and Stationery. I was wondering how there was any responsibility on the part of the Minister of Industry in regard to this, in that the original transfer on August 21, 1963 is from the department of public printing and stationery to the Department of Defence Production. How does the Minister of Industry have any powers or functions relating to the department of public printing and stationery if they were never transferred to him? They may have been transferred to him qua Minister of Defence Production, but unless there is an order in council missing in this reshuffle, the Minister of Industry is transferring something which he never possessed. I should like to have that point clarified.

My penultimate point is: Who has jurisdiction over the printing bureau? Is it the Minister of Defence Production, is it the Minister of Industry, or is it the Secretary of State? Where does the officer who occupied the position of queen's printer fit in now? I am referring directly to Mr. Duhamel. What precisely is his authority and under whose jurisdiction is this gentleman? Or has he in this shuffling about been trimmed of powers like one would lop off branches from a tree in the spring?

I should also like to know who is the person responsible for the control and the awarding of printing contracts. Is he an official who was formerly with the department of printing and stationery, or is he an official in the Department of Defence Production or the Department of Industry? However, my main question is: Does the Minister of Industry feel he has authority to deal with any printing contracts? Because unless he comes up with an answer which says there is a missing order in council, there is something very much adrift. The transfer seems to have been from the department of public printing and stationery to the Department of Defence Production and then somehow from the Department of Industry to the Department of the Secretary of State. I cannot understand how that ever came about.

Mr. Drury: Perhaps at the outset I should try to divide the printing business, if I can call it that, into two clear sections. One is the production of books, pamphlets and other things, which are the product of the printer, among other people, and forms, letterheads and other products of the printer, which hardly would qualify as books and pamphlets. Basically the way things are now organized is this; the production of books and pamphlets, including the procurement of print, therefore, is the responsibility of the man known under the legislation as the queen's printer, concerning whom indications have been given that he is to have his name or title changed to queen's publisher. He under the Secretary of State runs really in its entirety the business of selection, editing, printing, by whatever means necessary, distribution, and sale of books and pamphlets. This is the job of the man to be called the queen's publisher.

Mr. Lambert: Has this position actually been created at the present time, or is it to be created?

Mr. Drury: The position of queen's publisher is to be created and it will require a legislative enactment. The functions are now being carried out by Mr. Duhamel, who is known officially as the queen's printer. His title, as I say, will be changed. He is carrying out these functions but not under the new title.

In addition to that there is the non-book, non-pamphlet printing and stationery business involving the editing, printing and distribution of printed forms and printed work not qualifying really as books or pamphlets but including, however, Hansard and all the publications of parliament. This operation includes the setting of the print, the running of the presses, the proofreading for Hansard, and a number of other things which are now done by the printing bureau. This is the responsibility of the Department of Defence Production, and the Department of Defence Production has as its minister the Minister of Industry.

This then is the situation. All the elements in the production of print in book or pamphlet form are the responsibility of the queen's publisher, or the queen's printer, responsible to the Secretary of State. All the mechanical printing operations done by and within government establishments is the function of the Department of Defence Production, which is responsible to the Minister of Industry.

How did we get into that position? Order in council, 1963, 1130 of July 25 provides for the transfer to the Minister of Industry of the powers, duties or functions of the Secretary of State under the Public Printing and Stationery Act. The Public Printing and Stationery Act can be found in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. I am not sure of the date of its enactment. That order in council brought under the Minister of Industry the queen's printer, who then had the responsibility for the printing of books, pamphlets, provision of stationery and the mechanical printing within the government.

The next step was order in council No. 1254 of 1963, dated August 21, which transferred to the Department of Defence Production the control or supervision of the procurement, purchasing and stores for the branch of the department of printing, the production branch, the outside printing production branch, and the supporting services of the departmental secretaries branch and the administrative services branch, from the department of public printing and stationery. This included the printing operations in the bureau in Hull and the procurement of stationery, pencils, paper and the rest of it. It took this responsibility away from the department of public printing and stationery, and put it under the Department of Defence Production. That department is in turn responsible to the Minister of Industry.

The next step was order in council October 3, 1963, No. 1450, which transfers from the Department of Defence Production to the department of public printing and stationery the responsibility for procurement for printing of books and publications, and the procurement of print.

Mr. Lambert: Was that restored to the department of public printing and stationery?

Mr. Drury: Under the provisions of the order in council the items I mentioned were taken from the department of public printing and stationery, and that includes all printing both inside and outside, and the procurement of print inside and the procurement of print outside.

Now, this purports to pass back to the department of public printing and stationery the procurement of print for books and publications, but not the procurement of print for stationery or forms. This final order in council for 1964 is No. 156, dated February 3, and transfers to the Secretary of State for Canada the powers, duties or functions of the Minister of Industry relating to the department of public printing and stationery, which had been circumscribed in its activities to editing and procuring the print for books and publications.

Mr. Lambert: I think I understand the situation now. Order in council No. 1130 is the order in council that was missing in the chain I had. That is the order in council which placed something under the control of the Minister of Industry.

Mr. Drury: Perhaps if I had just referred to that order in council I could have avoided that long explanation.

Mr. Lambert: I thank the hon. minister for giving that full explanation because I think the pattern is now clear in respect of the framework relating to these transfers. I would remind the minister that I did ask other questions in respect of individual responsibilities.

Mr. Drury: In respect of the hon. member's specific question dealing with contracts for print for books and publications that have been let without tender during the past period mentioned, perhaps I should say that this is under the jurisdiction of the queen's publisher, who in turn is now responsible to the Secretary of State, and his estimates will be dealt with when the estimates of the Secretary of State are called.

Mr. Lambert: The minister did not let any contracts for printing without tender when he had jurisdiction back in 1963?

Mr. Drury: There was a short period during which I was responsible. I can only say I do not recollect having let such contracts but I will do a check if the hon. member would like me to.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, all right.

Item agreed to.

Emergency measures organization—

20. Administration and operation, $2,600,000.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, it was agreed that votes 20, 25 and 30 would be stood and that we would consider these items along with atomic energy and the national research council.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

35. Expenses incurred by Defence Construction (1951) Limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence and procuring the construction of such other projects as are approved by treasury board, $2,318,000.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, the minister has answered some questions that were raised with regard to Defence Construction Limited. As far as I am concerned, I believe everything was answered except that I do not recall the minister saying anything about the future of the corporation. Has any decision been reached on the future of the corporation, and whether or not it will continue?

Mr. Drury: The committee will remember that the royal commission on government organization looked into the agencies of the government which were engaged in administering and dealing with real estate of one sort or another, including the construction of buildings. One of the agencies covered was Defence Construction Limited. The committee reviewing the Glassco recommendations is looking, inter alia, at Defence Construction Limited in this particular context, and one would hope that in the not too distant future they would have a report to make.

Item agreed to.

40. Canadian Arsenals Limited—administration and operation, $2,500,000.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there is a substantial reduction in the amount of the vote here and the minister might indicate how that comes about. Second, where is the major work being done in Canadian Arsenals in the manufacture of weapons and ammunition? Third, has a substantial proportion of this work been transfered to private industry?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, vote No. 40 shows a substantial reduction in 1964-65 by comparison with 1963-64. This reduction is in anticipation of the disposal to private industry of a number of Canadian Arsenals plants, and advertisements inviting bids for these appeared in the newspapers last spring, specifically for the Val Rose plant just outside of Quebec near Valcartier camp, which has been devoted to the manufacture of small arms ammunition, the Valleyfield plant just outside of Montreal, which has been devoted to the manufacture of explosives, and the Long Branch plant of Canadian Arsenals Limited located on the waterfront in suburban Toronto, which has been devoted to the manufacture of small arms. Bids were invited for all three.

Bids have been received and are now in the process of being reviewed with a view to concluding, we hope, a satisfactory arrangement whereby the government will be able to divest itself of the ownership of these three establishments with suitable safeguards for guaranteeing (a) continued production for government of Canada account of arms, ammunition and explosives of the qualities required by the Department of National Defence; (b) adequate arrangements for the security of tenure and continued employment of the present Canadian Arsenals staff and an assurance they will not be unreasonably cast out and (c), the offering of an appropriate price related to the value of these properties.

I hope that in the not distant future we may be able to make an announcement in this regard. If we are unsuccessful in securing adequate and satisfactory bids accompanied by suitable guarantees for these three properties, then perhaps the optimism which the figure of $2,500,000 reflects may not have been justified.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I do not know on just what hypothesis the officers of Canadian Arsenals and the government are proceeding, but it seems to me that the market for this type of establishment, with the conditions imposed by the minister, is extremely limited. It might be limited to one or two concerns. A good friend of mine, formerly in the armed services, went into the business of manufacturing small arms for sporting purposes and I know he found that the market in Canada was not particularly good. If a plant like that failed because the Canadian market for arms of this type is not sufficiently large to be able to compete with larger firms like Remington, Winchester and others in the United States, as well as the excellent arms production from Belgium and Great Britain, I am wondering what anticipation of sale there can be. After all, these plants are not for dismantling or conversion to some other use. If they are to continue to supply small arms to the government in the future, surely they will have to be kept within very narrow production limits. Therefore I am wondering what really honest anticipation there can be in this regard.

I noted the other day a report that there had been some difficulty between Canadian Arsenals and Canadian Industries Limited, I believe, concerning the manufacture of substandard small arms ammunition by one of the Canadian Arsenals plants. I think this also requires some explanation and I shall sit down now in order to give the minister 30 seconds.

Mr. Drury: What the hon. gentleman says is entirely true. The conditions imposed on the prospective purchaser of the small arms plant to which he has made reference will make it less attractive financially to him than if there were no strings involved. As a consequence of these limiting conditions we would expect to have to lower our sights as to the price we might get. But, provided the capability to manufacture small arms in the quantity indicated is retained, the purchaser is quite free to use the facilities for commercial purposes. This does not necessarily limit him in this particular plant to the manufacture of small arms or rifles. He can manufacture anything he wants. I would agree there are few purchasers in Canada who could contemplate operating that plant for the manufacture of small arms alone on a profitable basis. It has to be made use of for purposes other than purely small arms if it is going to be operated successfully. This is what we are working toward.

So far as the substandard ammunition delivered by Canadian Arsenals to C.I.L. is concerned, about which reports appeared in the newspapers, I am advised that what was defective was the finish. It appears that a higher finish on high velocity sporting ammunition is required than is demanded by military specifications for military ammunition, where perhaps the purchaser is not as conscious of elegance as of reliability. Because of the different standards of elegance required by C.I.L., both C.I.L. and Canadian Arsenals are now in consultation on adjustment for a higher price to cover the higher finish.

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy control board—

1. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $159,000.

Item stands.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, may I direct your attention to the fact that it is five o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

AGRICULTURE

AMENDMENT OF SUBSIDIES ON FEED GRAINS

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, would the house be agreeable to reverting to motions, as I have a short statement to make?

Mr. Churchill: Related to what?

Mr. Sauvé: A statement I promised the house yesterday on feed grain assistance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the house that the government has authorized certain modifications to the new interim feed grain assistance policy announced in the house on July 24 last. The modifications are as follows:

1. The new rates will become effective September 14, instead of August 31.

2. A new zoning system will be applied in all eastern Canada.

3. There will be no balance of transportation cost greater than $2 per ton by the least cost method of transporting grain.

4. The assistance now provided for transportation will remain, with adjustments within provinces to equalize balances of transportation cost where they exist.

5. Separate and higher levels of assistance to apply on millfeeds and screenings transported by rail or truck to certain maritime destinations have been provided for.

6. The payment of storage costs in the Halifax elevator one month earlier in the fall than elsewhere in eastern Canada is provided for because of the extra time required to build up stocks in that area for winter use. Storage payments at Halifax will commence September 15 rather than the October 15 date which applies elsewhere in eastern Canada.

7. Separate and higher rates of assistance will be paid for this winter only on grain moved to certain maritime destinations by rail during the period December 1, 1964 to April 30, 1965.

8. The rates announced for British Columbia on July 24 last will remain the same.

There appears to be some misunderstanding with respect to this new policy. This is an interim policy to make necessary adjustments and remove certain inequities in the policy which has been in effect up to date. As I have indicated, adoption of a permanent policy must await the report of the house committee on agriculture, on feed grain price differentials, which subject was referred to it on June 24, 1964.

As payments of freight assistance will be allowable to shipments by trucks, and as more transportation competition occurs, the farmers will have even further reductions in costs, which is an important consideration and one which seems to have been overlooked by many people.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that we have this statement at this time in view of the minister's easy familiarity with the subject of feed grains for eastern Canada, but I am also a little concerned that it was deferred until five o'clock on Friday afternoon because those people in this party who are primarily concerned, and who have the greatest interest and knowledge of this matter, are not here. The same can be said of other parties. I am hopeful that the minister did not purposely defer his statement until this time, rather than making it this morning when those people who really know something about this subject would have been here. I trust that this practice will not continue, of coming in with statements on motions at five o'clock on Friday afternoons.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member can raise the point that this should be deferred to another time on the grounds that members are not in the house. Hon. members interested in matters of this kind are expected to attend the house, and if they are not here perhaps they should explain to the house why not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the minister was about to reassure the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Sauvé: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) I said:

> Mr. Speaker, the interim assistance measures that were announced at the end of July will be amended, but no final decision has yet been reached.

It was not until this afternoon that we could come to a final solution, and I am very sorry I had to make the announcement at this time, but this will come into effect on September 14 while the policy announced on July 24 would have come into effect on August 31. Therefore in order to give time to the trade and the people involved to make the necessary adjustments I was forced, with great regret, to make it now. I would have preferred to have made it earlier.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) I think a comment in reply ought to be heard. Surely the purpose of an order paper and the purpose of designating various pieces of business is that those particularly interested will be present at a particular moment and be prepared to answer the comments that are made. There was unanimous consent given a few minutes ago, and I think it most unfair for the hon. member to make such a comment, that everyone should be ready at all times. That is not in accordance with the orderly carrying on of business in this house, and I think the comment was unnecessary.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group welcome this announcement as a temporary adjustment and some improvement in freight assistance policy, no doubt as a result of the government's finally listening to the representations made from the opposition benches on behalf of farmers; but we look forward to a final and more definitive policy after the agriculture committee has reported to the house.

Mr. Rynard: Just one point—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I believe it is the custom of the house to have only one comment from each party in connection with a statement made on motions.

Mr. Churchill: What about the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, of course, there was a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), and if it is necessary to say so I would state there was really no question of privilege, and I would suggest to hon. members that we now proceed with the business of the house.

It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

Mr. Walker: I wonder whether, in an attempt to gain some time, the house would agree to stand all the bills as they are listed on the order paper—the first 24 items—and then proceed to item 25.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed? This, of course, would include one of the items which involves a resumption of debate. There would have to be unanimous agreement that this particular item stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CONFISCATION OF NETS AND GEAR

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo) moved the second reading of Bill No C-73, to amend the Fisheries Act (forfeiture floor).

He said: This bill contains two main features. One is a principle which simply states that there should be a limitation on the power of confiscation contained in section 64 of the Fisheries Act. The other feature is a suggested application of this principle with respect to the amount of limitation, and a method by which the limitation should be determined.

The bill suggests that the power of confiscation be limited by granting an exemption from forfeiture, and that the amount of exemption should be the same as that provided in the income tax act with a basic minimum exemption of $1,500. This amount may seem to be somewhat low to hon. members from British Columbia, but it was chosen for two reasons. One reason is that it illustrates the principle of the bill. The second reason is that the exemption laid down in the income tax act represents the minimum income for the survival level of a man and his dependants, or at least we assume this is how the exemption is justified in the Income Tax Act. I would however point out that these are mere details which can be modified at the committee stage, should the committee think this necessary in the light of further consideration. It is to the principle of the bill that I wish to draw attention now, because this is the important part of the measure, and after all it is with the principle that we are concerned on second reading.

In considering the principle of this bill the first and most obvious question which comes to my mind is this: Why limit this confiscatory power? Why not abolish it altogether? I may say I think a good case could be made out for the abolition of confiscatory powers as far as the Fisheries Act is concerned. However this is a principle which is to be found in other legislation, the Customs Act, and the Excise Act, for example. It is also to be found in some provincial game laws. Possibly a case could be made out for the retention of these powers in connection with the Fisheries Act, but I wish to emphasize that the present bill asks only that they be limited.

The second question which comes to mind is this: Why should minor breaches of the Fisheries Act be treated differently from minor breaches of other laws? If a man commits a minor offence the usual procedure is for him to be brought before a court of justice where punishment is meted out in accordance with the magnitude of the crime. The person concerned is either fined or sentenced to a term in jail. But in cases under the Fisheries Act the penalty does not stop there. For a very minor offence a person can be hailed before the court of law, fined, and in addition face the confiscation of his property. This procedure seems to violate a basic concept of justice, namely that punishment should fit the crime. In the case of a big operator, a person who has a large fleet of ships, if one ship is confiscated he still has plenty of other ships left, which he can continue to operate to carry on his business. But take the case of a little man who has only one boat or half a dozen nets. If that one boat is taken from him, or if those nets are confiscated, he is left with nothing with which to earn his livelihood. There is a wide discrepancy in the manner in which this penalty bears on a rich man as compared with a poor man.

I should like to give one or two examples to show why I felt it was necessary to bring this bill before parliament. Two or three years ago one of my constituents set his herring nets in a position inside the mouth of a river in accordance with fisheries regulations prescribed, with the approval of the Minister of Fisheries of that day. Apparently the district fisheries officers had the power to move those stakes back and forth as they wished. Anyway, the officers moved the stakes further out and then the nets were in a position where they consituted a breach of the regulations. What happened was that this man's nets were confiscated by fisheries patrol officers in the patrol boat. They were kept a considerable time before the case was brought before a magistrate. When eventually the case came before the court, the magistrate dismissed it and held that no offence had been committed. But by the time the nets had been returned they were all mildewed and completely ruined. So although this man was legally innocent he had really paid a severe penalty—a much harsher penalty than would have been imposed by way of a fine for an offence of a similar nature.

To illustrate my point, Mr. Speaker, I might give another example of what befell a number of salmon fishermen in my riding. In my province there is an extremely idiotic regulation. I have not the time to describe it to the house now, but to show hon. members just how idiotic it is, it means that two fishermen can set their respective nets of the same size 100 feet apart in a particular spot, and one man's net is legal while the other man's net is illegal. This foolish regulation was dreamed up many years ago but was not enforced for a long time. Long before Newfoundland became part of Canada it had never been enforced. In 1949 Newfoundland became a part of Canada, and right up to 1957, when the government changed, it had not been enforced. The next administration did not enforce it. Only now, within the past year or two, has it been decided to enforce this particular regulation.

The regulation provides that you can pick a point, that on one side of this point your nets must have a mesh of 5 inches, while on the other side of the point a 4½-inch mesh is permitted. This law had never been enforced for years and years and years. The fishermen had nets with a mesh of 4½ inches; they were the only ones they had; they had no money with which to buy other nets, and they knew from experience that the others would not be any good anyway. So, as their livelihood depended on it, they set their nets in the water, and along came the patrol boat and confiscated all the nets. These poor fishermen were left without any means of earning their livelihood. This is a very serious matter for them, Mr. Speaker, because they have been pushed out of this means of earning a living. I suppose they are existing on provincial relief or some other form of assistance. This salmon fishery constituted the bulk of their income. Their total net income was probably not more than $700 or $800 a year and perhaps $600 of that amount was derived from the salmon fishery—and that was taken away from them.

This was justified by the department in terms of conservation—"We must conserve our fisheries". But, Mr. Speaker, there are many, many other ways in which salmon are taken illegally in other nets of this size and the department does not bother at all; it just happened to single out these poor, unfortunate fishermen. I personally asked the department to supply me with evidence and information to show that this method of fishing was actually having some effect which was detrimental to conservation. I have never received any information or evidence that it had any effect at all on conservation. I cannot see how it could, Mr. Speaker, because I know from personal experience that ten times as many salmon as would be caught by these fishermen are caught by other means, in cod traps and in other ways. Therefore, what these poor fishermen were catching was really a drop in the bucket; yet they were singled out for action by the Department of Fisheries.

I am one of those people who believe that a human being is the most important thing in this world, Mr. Speaker. If I had to choose between a human being and a salmon, or the whole salmon industry, I would choose the human being, because according to the philosophy to which we say we subscribe, the human being is paramount and we must conserve him. He has to conserve himself regardless of any other consideration—and this was the only means these people had to earn a livelihood.

We must bear in mind that although parliament vests these tremendous powers in the minister, in the final analysis the powers are exercised by very minor officials who are far removed from the original source of power; and very often they are not qualified, either by training or experience, to wield such great powers or to appreciate fully the consequences and the end results when these powers are improperly used. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, when these powers are used to deprive an individual of his means of earning a livelihood, by way of punishment for a very minor offence, it goes far beyond the concept of justice and amounts to petty tyranny.

This bill suggests a remedy, but it is a remedy only. Doubtless it can be improved in a number of ways. I would hope, therefore, that this bill would be sent to a committee for further consideration and improvement. Today we who are here in this house at this moment have a choice. We can send this bill to a committee, we can take action to remedy this problem, or we can talk the bill out. If we take this latter course, we will not be doing any credit to ourselves either as a government or as a parliament, because our action will amount to a condonation of the evils which I have described. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a very reasonable one. It asks only for the very minimum of safeguards against the tyranny which the Fisheries Act now permits and which I know from personal experience has too frequently occurred. I hope all hon. members will see fit to support it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, there are just a few words I should like to say in connection with this bill. I will immediately disclaim any connection with the fishing industry; but I have, as a lawyer, some observations to make with regard to the purpose or the objective that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Carter) is trying to accomplish with his bill. I find it a little strange that the hon. gentleman, in his capacity, has to present a bill, in that he could not convince his ultimate colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), of the justification for his cause. I realize what he is trying to get at is the average fisherman who gets cleaned out by one of these seizures, and he has nothing else.

We know that under, for instance, the Excise Act where there has been illicit manufacture of alcohol, the vehicles used in the transportation of the goods or the equipment used in the illicit manufacture of alcohol are forfeit, and there is nothing in the way of an opportunity, as under the Customs Tariff Act, to put up a bond which is the equivalent of a fine when goods are forfeit, in order to exempt the vehicle from seizure.

I can readily see why the hon. gentleman pointed out that when waiting for a magistrate to dispose of a case the equipment is of no value. You might as well give a man the death sentence, because he loses his all. There is no doubt there must be some control and a penalty imposed on improper and illicit fishing practices, but I am wondering whether, in the case of these individuals, the penalty should be so severe.

I am also wondering why, within the legislation of the province of Newfoundland, there would not be something which is akin to the exemptions act of the province of Alberta. I should like to see any federal authority trying to impose the seizures provided for in this act in the province of Alberta in face of the exemptions act of that province, which exempts from seizures and sale the basic holding, shall we say, in so far as land, in so far as an automobile and in so far as personalty and tools of trade. You cannot touch them.

I know I have resisted some seizures under the Income Tax Act precisely under this particular heading in the exemptions act of the province of Alberta. I think there may be some parallel legislation in other provinces which comes under the heading of property and civil rights. We know that property and civil rights is under the complete jurisdiction of the province. When occupying a position on the other side of the house I had occasion to have amended by the government proposed legislation because the government were running into this particular trap. In effect it is a brutum fulmen in that it is of no power whatsoever, since it steps beyond its jurisdiction.

Having said that, and while expressing full sympathy for the hon. member, I think there are grounds in this particular case for providing, shall we say, an umbrella for a particular individual. After all, a breach of the Fisheries Act is in the same category as a breach of the Excise Act or Income Tax Act. These are civil matters. They are not in the nature of a criminal act against the person of an individual where we provide for certain sanctions under the Criminal Code. These are actions against the crown. The crown imposes these regulations, true in the public interest; but I am wondering whether this is almost tantamount to the old provisions where one could be hanged for the theft of a shilling. The penalty here is far too severe. As the hon. member pointed out, what happens to his equipment if after a series of delays he is found not guilty? What would happen to the fish? Would they sell it? I suppose it is sold immediately, because if it was returned to him after he is released I am afraid it would be a little odorous. However, I must express a word of warning to the hon. member. I think his proposed amendment to the act is also a little loose in that if there is going to be a seizure in the case of perishables, an immediate disposition must be made in order to realize on the value of the articles concerned. Or if they are going to seize nets, and so forth, they must take care not to damage them, because until a man is found guilty he is not to be presumed guilty and be penalized right from the start. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's legislation would require a little dressing up to impose this sanction on the court. I do not think the responsibility entirely rests with the individual to be honest and just, but that the administration of justice must also be expedient. Justice delayed is justice denied.

Having now embarked on a certain sea with which I am not familiar I will not say anything about the problems of the fisheries; but as a lawyer concerned with the administration of justice I certainly commend the hon. gentleman for the principle he is trying to advance in this bill and I would support it.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) is to be congratulated for bringing this bill forward because I think it does open up for discussion in this house something which may very well over the years not have had much thought or consideration by the members of this house generally. It may result, perhaps, in some of the members who come from what I describe as non-fishing constituencies, at least in the commercial sense, and who do not understand the fisheries, taking a closer look at the Fisheries Act, in which case I would not be surprised if some of their reactions were similar to my own the first time I had occasion to look through it.

The Fisheries Act as it stands, rightly or wrongly, is really a very harsh and strong act. I have more than once remarked that if we were to show the same concern for the protection of human beings as we show for the protection of fish as set out in the Fisheries Act we would have to do a lot of revision to the current laws as they stand on our books. Having said that, I think everyone in this house, certainly anyone with any knowledge of the importance of our commercial fisheries, recognizes the need for adequate laws to protect and to conserve the fishery resources of this country, and for regulating the manner in which fish can be taken and placed on the commercial fisheries market.

I recognize there are a great many differences in the traditions and needs of fisheries laws and regulations as between the part of the country from which the hon. member comes and the Pacific coast. Our fisheries by and large are of a different nature. I have to confess that in my years as a member of this house I have had very few complaints brought directly to my attention as to the manner in which this act has been administered by the fisheries department and the fisheries officers of British Columbia. Indeed I think it is only right to say that by and large they have administered this act in a very fair and equitable manner, and some of the harsher penalties which the act provides are rarely, if ever, carried out as a result of prosecutions in the courts of British Columbia. Nevertheless, the hon. member has raised a very real problem and has attempted by this bill to provide a solution to that problem. I am not at all certain that his proposal of creating a floor, under which confiscation cannot take place, would be particularly practicable in the part of the country from which I come. Putting the floor at $1,500 would not in most cases protect from seizures the actual boat and gear of the average fisherman in British Columbia, although the amount could be more in respect of a married man with dependants, as it is under the Income Tax Act.

I am not sure how one could seize half a boat, or a quarter of a boat, or, for that matter half a net or a quarter of a net.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that hon. members should be prepared to give careful consideration to the principle advanced in this bill. I note that the hon. member sponsoring the bill suggested the possibility of referring it to a committee of the house, I presume the marine and fisheries committee, for study and report. I certainly am happy to support that kind of suggestion.

If the same kind of penalties were applicable to other fields, for example in respect of offences committed under the motor vehicles acts across the country in a way comparable to the Fisheries Act, in which seizure and confiscation is provided, I am sure there would be a great hue and cry, because a great many people would be likely to have their automobiles seized or confiscated for offences no more serious than those provided in the Fisheries Act, which can involve seizure or confiscation. I think this bill certainly deserves the support of the members of the house and should be given consideration, particularly in respect of the principles advanced.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from one section of the act to indicate the kind of powers that are vested.

Section 7 of the act, for example, provides in the first line that the minister may in his absolute discretion do so and so. There are not very many of the statutes that this parliament has placed on the statute books of this country that provide a minister of the crown with this kind of absolute power. I think this is something which should not go unnoted by hon. members of this house.

Mr. Speaker, I have often thought if I could find time to do so I should like to engage in a little historic research in respect of the genesis of our present Fisheries Act. I have the feeling that it came to its present form a number of centuries ago in the days when poaching a private fishing preserve was considered to be one of the most serious offences an ordinary citizen, not able to call himself lord or baron, could commit. I feel that some of the concepts applied at that time may have been carried forward without our having given very much attention to them.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to again emphasize, as someone who is concerned with the conservation and development of fisheries resources in this country, that I feel we need an act which will properly protect these resources and properly regulate the manner in which various individuals should be allowed to take the products of the sea. I hope that the house will agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member, and that someone will be prepared to move that the subject matter of this bill be referred to a committee for detailed study and report back to the house. In saying that, I think it would be a good idea to have members such as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on the committee, because he has some knowledge of the implication of laws and their relationship to basic human rights, so that the committee would not be entirely composed of members from fishing constituencies who would just discuss the subject matter among themselves.

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully and with sympathetic attention to the remarks made by the hon. member who has sponsored Bill No. C-73. I must say that he has shown in his remarks and in the drafting of the bill a great deal of compassion for fishermen. Fishermen are in a class of people which deserves our understanding and our praise. As we all know, fishermen lead lives of hardship and danger and yet more often than not their rewards are not commensurate with their labours.

The purpose of Bill No. C-73 is to amend section 64 of the Fisheries Act by adding two subsections, 5(a) and 5(b). Section 64 (1) of the Fisheries Act, as amended in 1961, is divided into 12 subsections. The first subsection deals with the seizure of vessels and other articles. Subsection 2 deals with the custody of the seized articles. Subsection 3 deals with perishable goods. Subsection 4 deals with the proceeds of the sale of seized goods. Subsection 5, which is the one of interest to us now, deals with the act of forfeiture.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us proposes to add two subsections in order to limit the basic exemption by a floor, to a minimum of $1,500 and up, based on the income tax exemption. As the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) has stated, the purpose of the amendment would be to render less drastic the impact of confiscation. I must say at the outset that the goal proposed by the amendment is appealing. I think it has some merit and deserves careful consideration. However I believe that the bill itself should be examined in light of the Fisheries Act as a whole. We know that the Fisheries Act, as I see it, is to promote conservation and preservation of fish, as well as to ensure the protection of fishermen. The regulations relating to forfeiture are not directed toward the fisherman who is lawfully engaged in his operation, but are aimed at those who would act in breach of the regulations and could be convicted of an offence. I think therefore the laws are directed toward protecting the law abiding fisherman against those who would use unlawful means to fish, as a consequence of which the lawful fisherman may be deprived of his catches.

Mr. Carter: It should be a sensible law.

Mr. Dubé: I agree entirely. The penalty of forfeiture is a drastic one but it is not exclusive to the Fisheries Act. As was said this afternoon, forfeiture exists under the Excise Act and other federal acts as well as under provincial fish and game, and liquor acts. I would agree that the penalty should be in proportion to the offence. I would admit also it would be unfair, brutal and inhumane to seize a vessel for a very minor offence. No one would accept that a fisherman should be deprived of his means of livelihood for the mere commission of a petty offence. But the act does not say that.

Section 64 does not state that the convicting court or judge shall order that the vessel or article be seized. It provides that the convicting court or judge may order. In other words, the section is merely permissive. It means that the authority is there to punish grave offenders. The authority is there as a warning, a deterrent against major offenders. The authority is also there as a protection for law abiding fishermen. Moreover if a convicted person feels that a forfeiture penalty is excessive he may appeal to the minister and he may also appeal under the provisions of the Criminal Code. Section 75 of the act is very clear in this matter. It reads as follows:

> Persons aggrieved by any conviction for any offence under this act may appeal by petition to the minister, who may remit penalties and restore forfeitures under this act; but when a conviction takes place or an order is made by a justice of the peace or fishery officer for the payment of money or dismissing an information or complaint under this act, nothing in this section prevents any person who thinks himself aggrieved by any such conviction or order or dismissal, the prosecutor or complainant, as well as the defendant, from the right of appeal that he has under the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to summary convictions.

It must also be pointed out that the Fisheries Act was extensively revised in 1961. Before 1961 fishery officers had arbitrary powers of confiscation, and confiscation was automatic following conviction. But the 1961 revision of the Fisheries Act has changed all this by taking away the powers of confiscation from fishery officers and giving these powers to the courts, where they now rest.

I would also submit that the effect of having the proposed floor of $1,500 in my humble opinion would be to nullify completely the value of the section where the item seized was of a value less than $1,500. The explanatory notes of the bill are not entirely correct in some particulars. The first sentence reads in part as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to put a floor on the penal power of the crown—

I submit that this is not correct. The crown has no penal power whatsoever in this matter. The penal power rests solely with the court, and section 64, subsection 5, spells it out very clearly by using these words:

> Where a person is convicted of an offence under this act or any regulations, the convicting court or judge—

In other words, it is not the minister or his agent or any fisheries officer who would order forfeiture. This power lies solely in the judge who may or may not do so. The act does not say he shall: It says he may.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would that not reinforce my argument that this matter would really come under property and civil rights, and if it ran counter to any exemptions in any province it would be a nullity since the magistrate acts under provincial authority?

Mr. Carter: Would the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member says that the power does not reside in the officer but only in the courts. Does the act say that the fisheries patrol boat officers must lay a charge before taking the fisherman's gear and nets? Does the Fisheries Act say there is a time limit within which the matter must be brought before a court? How is the man protected? The fisheries boat officers take his gear out of the water and they can keep it, with the result that his gear is ruined before the matter comes to trial.

Mr. Dubé: I do not deny this at all. I am just saying that the explanatory notes are not correct in stating that the penal power rests with the crown. It does not rest with the crown, but with the court. I do not wish to take too much of the time of the house. I only wish to say that all these points I have mentioned should be considered. In concluding I must commend the sponsor of the bill for his devotion to the cause of fishermen.

Mr. Knowles: Now you know how we feel.

Mr. Herridge: It was a very fishy argument.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply this day]:

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY

1. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $4,677,100.

[By amendment: Less $600,000.]

5. To sustain technological capability in Canadian industry by supporting selected defence development programs, on terms and conditions approved by treasury board, and to authorize, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, total commitments of $50,000,000 for the foregoing purposes during the current and subsequent fiscal years, $19,500,000.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

A—Department—

1. Departmental administration including the care, maintenance and custody of standby defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling and grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors, $15,324,200.

5. For the establishment of production capacity and for capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to the approval of treasury board, $1,046,000.

The house met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MANDZIUK—OBSERVANCE OF 1964 AS SHEVCHENKO YEAR

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I beg leave of the house to draw to the attention of hon. members an event in history important to all Canadians regardless of their ancestry, but in particular to those of Ukrainian racial origin. The Ukrainian branch of the Canadian family tree has designated 1964 as Shevchenko year to celebrate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Ukraine's poet laureate and national hero, who was born on March 9, 1814.

Some hon. members will recall that three years ago, on March 10, this house honoured my compatriots by granting me leave to address it briefly on the solemn occasion of the centenary of Shevchenko's death and to commemorate the unveiling of a statue in his honour on the grounds of the Manitoba legislature on July 8, 1961. The unveiling ceremony was performed by the then prime minister of Canada, the present leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), in the presence of some 40,000 people. Hence this is the year of celebration of his birth in Canada, the United States and in the whole free world. Last June the former president of the United States, General Dwight D. Eisenhower, unveiled a magnificent statue of Shevchenko in Washington, D.C. in the presence of some 100,000 people. Our own C.B.C. showed a part of this ceremony, and it thrilled the hearts of my compatriots.

On Wednesday of this week in Winnipeg His Worship Mayor Juba is issuing a proclamation declaring the 5th, 6th and 7th of this month as Shevchenko days in Winnipeg, and during these three days thousands of Canadians of Ukrainian and other origins will converge on the capital of Manitoba for three days of deliberations under the guidance of the Ukrainian-Canadian committee. On Sunday September 6 these people will again march to the foot of his statue to pay homage to him and to dedicate themselves to the ideals of freedom they enjoy in this land, freedom for which Shevchenko prayed and fought but which was denied him and his people in their native land.

Shevchenko was a writer and poet who proved to the world that the pen is mightier than the sword. His prophetic exhortations gave birth to and have kept alive the vision of national unity and of his people's aspirations for independence. He was a patriot of the Ukraine but he was not a narrow minded nationalist. His fiery words, for which he suffered banishment to Siberia, condemned the imperialist policy and oppression of all Slavs by Moscow.

This branch of the Canadian family are again marching to the foot of Shevchenko's monument to proclaim to all their fellow Canadians that they bring to this nation their heritage, their ideals which have guided their race through a thousand years of turbulent history, ideals and visions which Shevchenko crystallized in his poetry and whose works became their national bible. We want our fellow Canadians to share him with them, to share his visions, to share him with all who are oppressed.

Our fellow Canadians may wonder why such universal adoration is given to this man here in Canada and in the free world by those who were forced to flee from their native land but who found a ready welcome and freedom elsewhere. Their complete loyalty is to the new motherland, but they are concerned about the land of their fathers. Shevchenko gives the answer in a poem written in prison before his banishment to Siberia. May I give you the English translation:

> It makes no difference to me,
> If I shall live or not in Ukraine
> Or whether any one shall think
> Of me 'mid foreign snow and rain,
> BUT
> It makes great difference to me
> That evil folk and wicked men
> Attack our Ukraine, once so free,
> And rob and plunder it at will.
> That makes great difference to me.

I thank you, sir, and this honourable house for giving me an opportunity of saying these few words on such an important occasion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is one occasion when

I find no difficulty whatever in agreeing with the hon. member for Marquette. Only yesterday I gazed at the statue to which he referred in his remarks in the grounds of the legislative building in Winnipeg. We all know that next week, when the Ukrainian-Canadian committee will be meeting, there is to be a great manifestation at that momument.

As the hon. gentleman has very rightly said, this will be a demonstration by Canadians; by Canadians who have not forgotten their origins or their past and who are demonstrating that in this new land to which they give their full loyalty as their homeland they can still maintain the traditions which they brought with them. And that, of course, is one of the bases on which our Canadian nationhood is being built.

But, as the hon. gentleman very rightly said, Canadians, United States citizens and people of the free world generally would not have the same devotion to Shevchenko if he had merely been a Ukrainian patriot. It is because he was the champion of the aspirations of all men everywhere for freedom, aspirations that are sometimes deeply submerged by tyranny, and these aspirations for freedom transcended, as the hon. member has said, narrow national boundaries, that this great poet is revered all over the free world; and that in his native land, which is not free in the sense he understood freedom, his memory is revered and keeps alive the hope that one day there too the freedom of which he spoke so eloquently, and to which he devoted his life, will reign.

MR. THOMPSON—REPORTED STATEMENT IN "TIME" MAGAZINE

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, August 26, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg on a question of privilege raised a matter regarding a report in the news magazine Time, as it related to a quotation from myself, and at that time said I was either talking through my hat or I had been misquoted by this magazine article, and that I should completely dissociate myself from it because, he said, that statement was a complete falsehood. Checking on the article to which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg referred—and by the way I have the highest personal regard for him—I find that the article quotes these words:

"Mr. Diefenbaker refused to consult with his own party or to consider any reasonable compromise himself. His proposal for unanimity would give him the power of veto, and the lack of any time limit merely prolongs the agony. He disregards completely the normal democratic process of majority rule."

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not always agree with the reporting of this magazine. In fact many times I find myself in disagreement with it, but on this occasion I find that they have quoted me, so far as I remember, exactly as I made this statement in reply to a question from a reporter for this magazine. I was not talking through my hat, nor can I dissociate myself from this statement because, as I understand it, it is a statement of fact.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is necessary to go back briefly, to review the situation by way of explanation, to August 4, the date I believe the party leaders first met in the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member need not go beyond that statement wherein he said the Leader of the Opposition did not consult his caucus to prove himself entirely wrong. Any time spent going back to explain that situation would be completely wasted.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: He can be very easily proved wrong by every member sitting on the Conservative benches.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In my opinion the hon. member for Red Deer is entitled to give a short explanation, but not to review a long historical series of incidents.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, if the hon. member for Red Deer wishes to open this question it should be done in debate and not on a question of privilege of this kind, because that is a violation of the rules of the house. This should only be done in debate, and an opportunity should be available to him within a very short time to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members would like to know whether in my opinion there is a question of privilege. On June 10, 1964, I had to deal with certain statements or words uttered outside the house, and on that date I gave a rather detailed opinion, it seems to me, in which I quoted United Kingdom authorities referring to the fact that the authority of the house supersedes that of the Speaker in the case of occurrences which have taken place outside the house and that in respect of incidents which take place outside the house it is the house itself which has the authority and responsibility of resolving any question of privilege. These reasons are set forth in detail at page 4141 of Hansard of June 10, 1964.

In the light of the circumstances as I have them at this moment I do not see that there is a bona fide case of privilege.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to make a lengthy statement, but I believe you stated at the time this question of privilege was raised that I would have the opportunity to answer for myself. All I wish to do is state the facts that are directly behind the statement found in Time magazine. My statement will not be lengthy. If hon. members do not want to hear the actual basis for the statement in Time magazine, which is true, I cannot help that.

Mr. Nowlan: Again on a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Thompson: On August 4—

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has a matter to raise I say it should be raised in the debate and not as a question of privilege at this time, particularly in view of the fact that Your Honour has intimated there is no question of privilege before the house at this time.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion there is no question of privilege. There may be a serious grievance, but certainly not a question of privilege at this time.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there are no further questions, before calling orders of the day I should like to refer to the matter which concerns the hon. member for Red Deer. On August 26 an alleged question of privilege was raised, and I suggested at that time, after a little discussion:

> It seems to me that we should await the return of the hon. member for Red Deer.

That is to be found at page 7277 of Hansard. Later on the same page I said:

> Certain allegations have been made. Let us hear both sides of the story before we reach a conclusion.

According to Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms citation 127 (3):

> When a statement is made affecting an honourable member which he denies, Mr. Speaker thinks that the house will feel that the honourable member has a right to make an explanation on a personal matter. He will not exceed an explanation of the particular matter.

It seems to me at this time that it would be only right, in view of the commitment in effect given by the Chair, that the hon. member for Red Deer should make a short declaration, if he feels so inclined.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to state that the one criticism of this newspaper article in question is that it gives the implication that the leader of the official opposition never consults with his members. I had no intention of giving that interpretation to what I said. I was speaking to a specific point that had been raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg.

Mr. Speaker, the situation behind this question is that on August 4 the Prime Minister called a meeting of the party leaders to consider a proposal that had been made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, regarding a way to solve the difficulties for the immediate moment, and also give some definite formula for concluding the flag debate later on when the house would resume after a recess which he had suggested.

Without breaking any confidence that we have in respect of this meeting, I believe it is general knowledge that we could not come to any agreement. As a result I made an alternative proposal. This alternative proposal was not original with me, as I read it in a leading editorial in the Montreal Gazette that morning. It seemed a very reasonable suggestion by which all members of this house could honourably get out of the position they found themselves in, and which was becoming increasingly difficult with each continuing day of the debate.

Very briefly this suggestion was that the three maple leaves should be replaced with a single maple leaf, and the amendment to the motion bringing this to pass would be made by a member of the opposition; that the union jack be replaced by the red ensign to represent Canada's membership in and our belonging to the commonwealth, and that the Prime Minister should take steps to immediately declare all votes as free votes in the house.

We discussed this suggestion at some length, and at that meeting it was agreed that each of us would take this suggestion back to his party members. I did not regard this in any way as a matter of confidence, because one could hardly talk it over at one's own caucus on that basis so I did what we had agreed to do. I took the suggestion back to our party caucus and we discussed it. I went even further than that. I notified my own constituents that such a proposal was before us, and recorded in the Red Deer Advocate, the newspaper of my home town, on August 8 a brief summary of what I have just said. I did this with the idea of getting a response back in order that I should have some sense of what my constituents would think about this particular suggestion.

I was dismayed some days later, I believe on August 12, when the hon. member for St. Mary stood up in this house on the orders of the day and asked the Prime Minister the following question, as reported on page 6719 of Hansard:

> Would the Prime Minister agree to a meeting of the leaders of the five political parties represented in the House of Commons to discuss the Canadian flag?
>
> That meeting would be called to reach a unanimous decision on the choice of a distinctive Canadian flag, other than the three maple leaves, which would then be submitted to the house by the Speaker, in order to dissociate that matter from any political partisanship—
> —and that, within a set period.

In reply to this question the Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, we have already had useful meetings with the party leaders, and I hope this procedure can be continued.

Then the right hon. leader of the official opposition rose and said:

> I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. There was no question raised at this one meeting or at any meeting regarding the nature, kind and design of a flag. I am sure the Prime Minister, in answering as he did, did not intend to leave that impression.

Mr. Speaker, I was not only confused but upset by this statement, because to me it was in direct opposition to what we all knew had taken place at the first meeting, and on which we had acted, I think in good faith, in bringing this to the attention of each of our members. I was also disturbed by the fact that many members of the Conservative party were coming to me and others of our party, asking if there had been any discussion regarding an alternative design.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to rise, but if this be your ruling then I presume anyone in the house may rise and discuss this matter; because this goes far beyond the question of privilege. This is an exculpatory statement by one who finds himself in a difficult position, having learned what the people of Red Deer think of his attitude, and it is quite out of keeping with the question of privilege. We are not concerned whether he was amazed or deceived.

Mr. Speaker: I hoped the hon. member was drawing to the close of his remarks, because it seems to me we have had quite a long explanation of a matter which has taken too much time.

Mr. Thompson: I am practically through with my statement. I am not in a difficult position with regard to this matter except that on the basis of my own conscience I want the facts to be known not only to the house but to the people of the country generally. This is why—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again, but this is really not the time to enter into a debate. A short explanation is called for, and I am wondering whether the hon. member could bring his remarks to a close fairly soon.

Mr. Thompson: I will end them by saying that I mention this only because it was the basis behind the report in the press to which reference has been made. I simply say in closing that my assumption that members of the Conservative party had not been consulted in regard to this matter was verified by the admission of their leader on at least two occasions that he had not done so. Mr. Speaker, this is the explanation behind the report, and it is a statement of fact.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I certainly am doing my best to accommodate all members, but it does seem to me we could leave this matter where it is resting at the moment and get on with the business before the house.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, you say that we should leave it for the moment, but when is it to come up again? The hon. member for Red Deer has just resumed his seat after making a final remark that his statement is a statement of fact. When the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg raised the question in the house he did so on the basis of the statement that the Leader of the Opposition had refused to consult with his own party or to consider any reasonable comprise. I as a member of the Conservative caucus and many other members were fully aware of the situation. This statement is an unfounded lie, and the hon. member should dissociate himself from it, because in his early remarks he said he never meant to intimate any such thing.

MR. LAING—STATEMENT RESPECTING VANCOUVER VETERANS HOUSING PROJECT

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. It arises out of a series of questions addressed to the Postmaster General on Tuesday last, as found on page 7228 of Hansard, especially a question directed to him by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich which, if left unanswered by me, could in my opinion reflect upon my integrity as a member of parliament.

I have responsibilities as a member of parliament in addition to my responsibilities as a member of the government, and in respect of the Fraserview housing matter I have such responsibilities and intend in the future to discharge them as a member of parliament. I made a commitment at the time that I would do my best to obtain an adjustment in the selling price of the properties. An adjustment has been made in the selling price of the properties, and since the decision was taken by the government I will stand by it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What properties?

Mr. Laing: Fraserview housing. I think these are matters where the interpretation of what is right must be made by oneself and the defence of one's integrity must be made by oneself. I thank the house for giving me the privilege of doing so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY TO TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 8

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the meetings of the house leaders do not always produce conclusive results. We had a meeting this morning, part of which will have to be adjourned to a later date, but I am pleased to report that we agreed on at least one thing which is of importance both to the members of the house and their families, and the staff of the house. All the leaders, in the names of their respective parties, have agreed to the suggestion of the government that this house should not sit on Labour day. I therefore ask for an order of the house: That when this house adjourns on Friday September 4, 1964, it shall stand adjourned until 2 p.m. the following Tuesday, and that the relative standing and provisional orders be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house it is so ordered.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BANK ROBBERIES

Question No. 1,565—Mr. Barnett:

1. For each of the last ten years, how many people in Canada have been convicted of bank robbery and sentenced to serve terms in the penitentiaries of Canada?
2. How many persons are currently in the Canadian penitentiaries as a result of convictions for bank robbery?
3. What is the average length in years of the sentence they are serving?
4. What is the estimated cost per person, per year, for maintaining these persons in penitentiaries?
5. What is the estimated annual amount taken from banks in bank robberies?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. In the Canadian penitentiary service, for treatment and statistical purposes, the crime of bank robbery is classified as armed robbery.

People in Canada have been convicted of armed robbery and sentenced to serve terms in the penitentiaries of Canada in the following numbers for each of the last ten years for which statistics are available: 1954, 159; 1955, 171; 1956, 147; 1957, 93; 1958, 192; 1959, 187; 1960, 268; 1961, 294; 1962, 229; 1963, 204.

2. Statistics are not at hand on the numbers of persons in the penitentiaries by the types of crimes for which they were convicted.

3. The average length in years of sentences served by persons who have committed crimes of armed robbery is 4.2 years.

4. The estimated cost per person, per year, for maintaining these persons in penitentiaries is $2,800.

5. This information is not available.

BRUSHING CONTRACTS, WABAMUN INDIAN RESERVE

Question No. 1,600—Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson):

1. Since 1961, how many brushing and sale of right of way contracts have the Paul's band of Indians of the Wabamun reserve entered into, and the value of each contract?
2. Have there been any claims made for unpaid debts with regard to or arising out of these brushing contracts?
3. Has the Indian affairs branch made any attempt to see that the claims were just and fair, and if settlements could be made, and, if so, what steps were followed?

Questions

4. Has there been any meetings with the Indian affairs branch, the chief and council of the band, and a Mr. Couch?

5. Was there a meeting between the three parties concerning the debt owed Mr. Couch on March 21, 1963; were minutes kept of the meeting; and was general approval given at the meeting authorizing the collection of debts owing Mr. Couch?

6. What is the total amount in the band funds of the Paul's Indian tribe at the Wabamun Indian reserve?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. Since 1961, the Paul's band has approved of the sale of the following rights of way: (a) in August 1961 to Canadian Delhi Oil Company for a pipe line right of way across part of Buck lake Indian reserve 133C in the amount of $2,029; (b) in September 1961 to the Calgary Power Company for a power line right of way across the Wabamun Indian reserve 133B in the amount of $12,560; (c) in June 1963 to the municipal district of Stony Plain for widening a road through the Wabamun Indian reserve 133A. For this land the band is being paid at the rate of $100 per acre but the total amount will not be determined until the final survey has been approved.

Paul's band did not enter into any brushing contracts directly with the purchasers of these rights of way. However, the purchasers agreed to employ members of the band in any clearing and brushing operations which were undertaken.

2. Credit was apparently advanced to individual members of the Paul's band by Mr. J. C. Couch, a storekeeper of Highvale, Alberta, in anticipation of being paid from wages received from brushing and clearing operations, interest payments, and other sources of income. Mr. Couch subsequently advised that a number of individuals had failed to settle their accounts with him and he asked for assistance in collecting the amounts owing.

3. As the arrangement for credit between Mr. Couch and the Indians concerned was a private matter, it was made clear that the Indian affairs branch could not assume responsibility for payment. Mr. Couch was also informed that the Indian affairs branch could neither use the funds of the band for the settlement of individual debts nor direct that treaty moneys, interest payments, pension cheques and other moneys payable to Indians be used in payment of their debts. However, arrangements were made through the Edmonton Indian agency office for Mr. Couch to meet the band council and members of the band in an effort to assist him to have the accounts settled.

4. Yes.

5. A meeting was arranged between the band and Mr. Couch on March 21, 1963, at which the superintendent of the Edmonton Indian agency was present and minutes were recorded. At this meeting the Indians authorized Mr. Couch to attend a band meeting on April 30, 1963, when cash payments were being made so as to give him an opportunity to approach those owing him and arrange settlement of their outstanding accounts.

6. The total unexpended balance as at July 29, 1964, is $341,037, comprising a capital account of $326,204 and a revenue account of $14,833.

BANKRUPTCIES

Question No. 1,629—Mr. Peters:

1. How many bankruptcies have been registered with the superintendent of bankruptcy for the years 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964?

2. How many in each industry in the designated years?

3. What was the average value in each category in the designated years?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. The following is the total number of bankruptcies in Canada reported to the superintendent of bankruptcy for the calendar years 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962 and 1963 as well as the approximate total for the first four months of 1964: 1959, 3,238; 1960, 3,641; 1961, 3,511; 1962, 4,297; 1963, 5,189; 1964, 1,965.

2. The number of bankruptcies estimated by the dominion bureau of statistics in each industry is as follows:

Year	Primary industries	Manufacturing industries	Construction industries	Transportation communications and other utilities	Trade	Finance, insurance and real estate	Services
1959.....	81	374	449	76	906	36	307

FACILITIES FOR CIVILIAN AIR TRAVEL, B.C.

Question No. 1,661—Mr. Barnett:

1. What, for each fiscal year since such expenditures began, are the amounts spent in British Columbia west of the Cascades for the construction, maintenance and operation of facilities for civilian air travel, including both ground facilities and air navigation aids?

2. What, in addition to amounts included in the above, is the estimated cost of facilities constructed originally for the Department of National Defence which have since been transferred to civilian use?

3. What is the estimated annual value of facilities provided for civilian air travel at Comox airfield, in so far as such expenditures are not made directly through the Department of Transport?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Expenditures by the Department of Transport for fiscal years commencing 1945-46 on construction, operation and maintenance of airports and air navigation aids, west of the Cascade mountains in the province of British Columbia, are as follows:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1945-46	$ 274,000
1946-47	462,000
1947-48	1,014,000
1948-49	1,206,000
1949-50	1,140,000
1950-51	1,131,000
1951-52	1,855,000
1952-53	3,224,000
1953-54	1,905,000
1954-55	1,821,000
1955-56	3,597,000
1956-57	3,762,000
1957-58	4,945,000
1958-59	9,540,000
1959-60	9,458,000
1960-61	5,568,000
1961-62	8,554,000
1962-63	9,067,000
1963-64	5,687,000

2. In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned:

Location	Estimated Cost
Abbotsford	$3,770,011
Cape St. James	55,000
Massett	50,000
Patricia Bay	7,081,453
Port Hardy (does not include buildings transferred to C.A.D.C. in 1944 and 1946)	6,733,423
Prince Rupert	2,100,000
Sandspit	100,514
Sea Island, Vancouver	5,419,294
Sumas	201,550
Tofino (does not include buildings transferred to C.A.D.C. in 1946 and 1949)	6,331,816

3. The facilities at station Comox are for military use and there has been no extension of these facilities to provide for civilian air travel. Landing and other fees are recovered in accordance with D.N.D. aerodrome fees regulations, PC 1962-70, 18 Jan. 62.

ROY FAIBISH

Question No. 1,691—Mr. Francis:

1. Does Mr. Roy Faibish hold any position at the present time with the C.B.C. or with any branch of the government, or any crown corporation and, if so, what is the nature of Mr. Faibish's duties and responsibility?

2. Did Mr. Roy Faibish appear as a witness before His Honour Judge Harold W. Pope acting as a commissioner under part 1 of the Inquiries Act?

3. Has Mr. Faibish issued any public statement in connection with the following statement in the report of His Honour Judge Pope's inquiry (page 45) "It is also rather difficult to justify the action of Mr. Faibish in ordering the payments to be made when he apparently had no knowledge of the information in the hands of the director which caused him to feel that any investigation should be made"?

Questions

4. If Mr. Faibish did issue a public statement in connection with the above findings of Judge Pope, when was it made and what is the text of it?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the office of the privy council as follows:

1. Yes, Mr. Faibish is engaged on a term contract basis in the television service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a program researcher, script writer, film director, and interviewer.

2. Yes.

3. The government is not aware of any such public statement.

4. Answered by 3.

COMPLETION OF KINGSTON PENINSULA TRAIL, N.B.

Question No. 1,730—Mr. Fairweather:

1. What is the anticipated date of completion of the Kingston peninsula trail under the roads to resources program in the province of New Brunswick?

2. How many miles of road remain to be rebuilt?

3. How much money will it cost to complete this joint program?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The planning and scheduling of all works under the roads to resources program is a responsibility of the provincial government. The agreement signed with the province calls for completion of all projects by March 31, 1969.

2. The total length of the Kingston peninsula loop is 40 miles. To date, 22 miles have been reconstructed and 16 miles have been paved. The province has not requested approval for any additional work and the only work outstanding is the completion of the Devon Construction Co. Contract for grading of a 10.8 mile section between Chapel Grove and Bayswater. This contract is 60 per cent complete.

3. The estimated cost of the work on this road is $2,000,000 and the total value of the claims which have so far been submitted and paid is $1,154,532. Of this amount, the federal government has paid $556,050.

IMMIGRATION OFFICES ABROAD

Question No. 1,734—Mr. Dionne:

1. How many immigration offices are maintained abroad by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

2. How many persons are employed in each office and what is the salary of each?

[Mr. Francis.]

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. 33.

2. See attached schedule.

ARDA PROJECTS, BRUCE COUNTY, ONT.

Question No. 1,736—Mr. Loney:

What projects in the county of Bruce under the ARDA program are being considered at this date by the Department of Forestry?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): To date, the province of Ontario has submitted the following project proposal which involves both the counties of Bruce and Grey:

Project No. 6025, acquisition of 4,800 acres of a high wildlife potential area for the establishment of a managed hunting area for public use, located in the townships of Amabel and Albemarle.

NATIONAL DEFENCE STANDARDS FOR CONCRETE BLOCKS

Question No. 1,739—Mr. Smith:

1. What standards are required by the Department of National Defence for concrete blocks made by the autoclave method?
2. Are the same standards required for concrete blocks made by methods other than autoclave?
3. How many manufacturers of autoclave blocks are there in Canada known to the Department of National Defence?
4. What are the names and addresses of these companies?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. The standards required by the Department of National Defence for concrete blocks cured by the autoclave method are those contained in American society for testing materials specifications C.90 and C.129 for load bearing and non-load bearing block respectively. In addition the maximum allowable shrinkage is 0.035 per cent and the moisture content on delivery is limited to 30 per cent of the total potential absorption of the blocks.

2. Yes.

3. Twelve.

4. (a) Canada Iron Foundries Ltd., Montreal, P.Q., (b) Capital Concrete Products Ltd., Iroquois, Ont.; (c) Cindercrete Products Ltd., Regina, Sask.; (d) Cooper Block Ltd., Toronto, Ont.; (e) Day & Campbell Ltd., Hamilton, Ont.; (f) Deeks-McBride Ltd., Vancouver, B.C.; (g) Edmonton Concrete Block Ltd., Edmonton, Alta.; (h) General Concrete Ltd., Hamilton, Ont.; (i) Hoffman Concrete Products Ltd., Gatineau Point, P.Q.; (j) Primeau-Argo Block Co. LIGHTHOUSE DESTRUCTION, ADVOCATE HARBOUR, N.S.

Question No. 1,743—Mr. Coates:

Was the old light house and other buildings associated therewith at Advocate Harbour, N.S. destroyed by officials of the Department of Transport and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The old wooden building became unsafe to continue to support the automatic light and, as it was beyond economical repair, it was replaced by a steel tower.

TRADE WITH JAPAN

Question No. 1,747—Mr. Deachman:

1. What was the total value of goods imported from Japan in 1963?
2. What was the total value of exports to Japan in 1963?
3. What was Canada's trading position or balance with Japan for 1963?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. The total value of imports into Canada from Japan during the calendar year 1963 was: $130,471,048.

2. The total value of exports from Canada to Japan during the calendar year 1963 was:

3. The balance of trade between Canada and Japan during the calendar year 1963 was: an export balance of $167,424,426.

DEPOSIT OF INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS IN LOAN AND CREDIT INSTITUTIONS

Question No. 1,750—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

With reference to an announcement by the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that 300,000 Canadian employers will now be able to deposit, at their local banks, their employees' monthly income tax deductions, will the government take steps to allow small and average employers who deal with the caisses populaires and the credit unions to deposit these income tax deductions in their savings and credit co-operatives?

2. Will an agreement to this effect be made with the federations of caisses populaires and credit unions?

[Translation]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): 1 and 2. This arrangement extends only to those organizations carrying on banking business under a federal charter and which have clearing facilities.

The caisses populaires, credit unions and others which extend checking privileges to their customers may arrange with the particular bank through which such cheques are cleared to process the remittances.

*IMPORTS OF NEW FLAGS FROM JAPAN

Question No. 1,754—Mr. Valade:

1. How many tri-leaf flags, such as the one suggested by the present government, have been imported into the country from Japan or elsewhere?
2. What is the name and the address of each of the importers?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Flags are not classified separately as such in import statistics, and hence no figures are available. Imports are recorded of the material, but this is not broken down into the use to which the material is put.

2. Unknown—see answer to part one.

[Text]

*IMPORTS OF NEW FLAGS

Question No. 1,756—Mr. Crouse:

Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce advise if quantities of the three maple leaf flag have been imported into Canada from (a) Japan (b) other countries and, if so, what are the numbers and value of imports referred to in (a) and (b) above respectively?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Flags are not classified separately as such in import statistics, and hence no figures are available as to quantity or source. Imports are recorded of the material but this is not broken down into the use to which the material is put.

*PRICES OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,759—Mr. Fisher:

1. Is the store which sells government publications in Ottawa retailing the main report of the Rowell-Sirois commission at $6.50 when its basic price is listed at $5 and, if so, for what reasons?
2. Is the Creighton study for the same commission selling at $2 when its marked price is 75 cents and, if so, for what reasons?
3. Is the first volume of the Glassco commission report selling at $7.75 when its marked price is $6 and, if so, for what reasons?

Questions

4. On whose authority are prices increased on government publications above the list price?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. Effective January, 1963 a 30 per cent across the board increase in selling prices was applied to all government publications.

2. The selling price of the Creighton study was originally set at 75 cents per copy when printed in 1940. The price of $2 was set on the reprint made in 1963 based on higher printing costs and in line with the pricing policy.

3. Same as (1) above.

4. Approved by T.B. minute 604954 of January 17, 1963.

SHORE IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM, YARMOUTH, N.S.

Question No. 1,769—Mr. Crouse:

Is the government giving consideration to carrying out an improvement program along the shore line between the new government wharf and the Bluenose ferry terminal at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia and, if so, when will this program be commenced?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Yes, the matter is now under investigation but it is not yet known when the work will be carried out.

ELECTRIC LAMP TENDERS, SCARBOROUGH TOWNSHIP, ONT.

Question No. 1,770—Mr. Scott:

1. Has the government received representations from the township of Scarborough public utilities commission, or from the township of Scarborough, itself, regarding the possibilities of an infraction of the Combines Investigation Act concerning tenders for electric lamps and, if so, what was the nature of the response to them?
2. As a result of these representations, was an investigation ordered under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and, if not, what other action was taken by the government?
3. What are the results of the said investigation pursuant to the terms of the act?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1, 2 and 3. Such representations have been received from the public utilities commission which has been advised of the position taken by the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act on the subject of identical tenders as set out at pages 23-24 of his annual report for the year ended March 31, 1961, and in his testimony before the standing committee on public accounts of the House of Commons on December 6 and 9, 1963. The general practice, however, is that no information is given out as to whether a particular inquiry has been or is being pursued with respect to a particular group of companies or individuals unless and until a report is published.

CONSTRUCTION OF CAUSEWAY, LABRADOR-NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,777—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

Does the government propose to study and carry out the construction of a causeway between Labrador and Newfoundland which would join this province to the continent and to build a section of the trans-Canada highway, railway lines and electric power installations there, at the same time improving the climate of the gulf, the St. Lawrence and the Saguenay river regions, all of which at lesser cost than the St. Lawrence seaway project?

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): No.

*INSPECTION OF NORTH BY MEMBERS

Question No. 1,791—Mr. Fairweather:

Are plans being considered which would enable members of parliament to participate in an educational and fact finding inspection of the Yukon and Northwest Territories so that they can share the advantages derived from such an experience by the recent trip of ambassadors and senior government officials?

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The minister returned last night from a working, fact finding, nine day tour of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. He was accompanied by six foreign ambassadors to Canada, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress and seven leading Canadian businessmen, in addition to some of his departmental officials and advisers. The purpose of the trip was to engage their collective experience in appraising Canada's policy in the north and to acquaint them with northern problems. The minister is considering including members of parliament on such a trip in the future.

OWNERSHIP OF WHARF, YOUNG'S COVE, N.B.

Question No. 1,792—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Is the wharf at Young's cove, Grand lake, New Brunswick owned by the government of Canada or of New Brunswick?
2. If the wharf is owned by Canada is it available for purchase by private individuals?

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. By the government of Canada.

2. This is under consideration.

*CIVIL DEFENCE POLICY

Question No. 1,797—Mr. Fairweather:

Will the Minister of Industry take an early opportunity on motions to make a statement about the government's current attitude toward civil defence and if the provincial and municipal responsibility in this regard has undergone any fundamental change recently?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): A statement regarding the government's current policy in regard to civil defence will be made at the time of the study of E.M.O. estimates by the house in committee of supply.

The provincial and municipal responsibility toward civil defence has not undergone any fundamental change recently. They are requested to continue planning with a greater emphasis, however, being placed on their capability to cope with peacetime disasters.

The hon. member may wish to refer to minutes of proceedings and evidence Nos. 7 and 8 of the special committee on defence which contain a detailed statement which I made to the committee as well as a considerable amount of information about various facets of the program.

REPORTS OF RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Question No. 1,800—Mr. Prittie:

What is the status of the several reports of the restrictive trade practices commission to the Minister of Justice for the year 1963-64?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Reports received from the restrictive trade practices commission during the period January 1, 1963, to August 31, 1964, the date on which each was submitted and action taken thereon are as follows:

Concerning the manufacture, distribution and sale of drugs	Jan. 24, 1963.

The recommendations contained in this report together with those in the recent report of the royal commission on health services are receiving careful study and any decisions will be made known in due course in the proper way.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Of an alleged combine in the matter of a call for tenders by the town of Duvernay for the construction of sewers and water mains	Dec. 16, 1963.	Informations have been laid and the date for the preliminary hearing has been fixed for October 20, 1964.
Concerning the sale of plumbing and heating supplies and related products in the city of Montreal and elsewhere in the province of Quebec	Feb. 7, 1964.	The report and evidence have been referred to counsel with instructions to proceed with the prosecution or other proceedings unless he comes to the conclusion that the evidence is insufficient.
On the production, distribution and supply of newspapers in the Sudbury-Copper Cliff area	Feb. 26, 1964.	The commission concluded that there had not been any reprehensible monopolistic practices and therefore no abuse of a monopoly position. After discussion with counsel to whom the evidence was referred, it was decided that no proceedings would be instituted.
Concerning the distribution, supply and sale of plumbing supplies and related products (Alberta)	June 24, 1964.	Preliminary discussions have been held with counsel who is being instructed to proceed with prosecution or other proceedings unless he comes to the conclusion that the evidence is insufficient.
Road surfacing in Ontario	July 13, 1964.	The report and evidence have been referred to counsel with instructions to proceed with prosecution or other proceedings unless he comes to the conclusion that the evidence is insufficient.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to oral question No. 1,429 put on the order paper July 6 last concerning an inquiry announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) about the interdependence of various areas of Canada.

I respectfully submit that the Prime Minister's office could easily answer this question and that there is no conceivable reason why no answer has yet been given.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): I will be glad to bring the hon. gentleman's observations to the attention of the Prime Minister's office to see whether something can be done along the lines he has suggested.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—ARRESTS IN CONNECTION WITH ATTEMPTED THEFT OF ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with reports in the press to the effect that over the week end in the Montreal area a group of individuals in search of arms met resistance. Can he say whether those who were apprehended were members of the F.L.Q.? Is he in a position to say what steps the federal government is taking in view of the apparent resurgence of subversive activity and the evidence of determined and well organized forces working against law and order? Is he able to say whether any of those arrested or being sought, if not already arrested, were allied with any subversive groups in the past?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I know the right hon. gentleman made a lapsus. I must say I am pleased to note, in the interest of Canada, that I have not been promoted to minister of finance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I apologize to both ministers.

Mr. Favreau: I have had occasion to discuss this matter this morning, and at this moment I am in a position to give the following information. This is a Montreal city police investigation, and assistance is being rendered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Four men have been arrested by the Montreal city police who have not as yet released the names of those individuals; the names will not be divulged before the coroner's inquest has taken place. Investigation is being continued toward the apprehension of the one man who escaped.

In view of the stage which the investigation has reached at this point I do not think I would be justified in divulging more than I have just said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was wondering what possible reasons there might be for the minister not being able to tell us whether those individuals who have been arrested are or have been members of any subversive organization. If they were, that would naturally bring them within the ambit of the right of the mounted police to investigate.

Mr. Favreau: One will readily understand that if a request is made, or was made, by the police authorities immediately responsible, that is the Montreal police—although, I repeat, the R.C.M.P. are lending all possible assistance—it would not be proper for me to release any information with respect to the persons arrested, especially as one arrest still has to be made. I would point out also that the names of the parties arrested have not yet been divulged.

VISIT TO OTTAWA BY NEW ZEALAND OMBUDSMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is also directed to the Minister of Justice. It follows some three questions I have asked in the course of the past few weeks of either the minister or the Secretary of State and relates to a distinguished guest who is visiting Canada at the present time to speak to the bar association in Montreal. I am referring to Sir Guy Powles, the New Zealand ombudsman. Are arrangements being made for Sir Guy to meet with the committee on privileges and elections? Has an invitation been extended to him?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Sir Guy Powles has been communicated with, and I am pleased to advise that arrangements are being made for him to meet with members of the committee on privileges and elections on Wednesday, September 2, at 3 p.m. There is still some formal confirmation to be obtained from the New Zealand authorities, but tentatively the engagement is set for that date.

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue and perhaps in his absence the acting minister might reply. Hal C. Banks is still a Canadian, for income tax purposes, and as it now appears that Banks has no intention of returning to Canada, at least voluntarily, has the minister taken steps to see that the assets belonging to this man are not entirely removed from Canadian jurisdistion?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I could take this question as notice.

Mr. Pugh: In taking it as notice, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the minister that time is of the essence, and these assets may well vanish out of Canada just as the body of Hal C. Banks has vanished.

Mr. McIlraith: I am quite appreciative of the hon. member's question and its implications, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice on the same subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Justice have fresh news concerning Mr. Banks' whereabouts?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say I have no more news now than I had the last time I replied to questions in that connection. However, I have much more information about Mr. Banks' house, which has not yet disappeared from Canada, than I have about Mr. Banks himself.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister got in touch with the real estate agent who looks after selling Mr. Banks' property?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I am not personally in charge of the investigation, but I will say that all necessary steps are being taken to ensure that Mr. Banks does not evade directly or indirectly our Canadian laws; we are doing all we can to prevent him from doing so.

[Text]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): As part of the running account regarding Mr. Banks—

Mr. Nowlan: Who is running?

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Banks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —is the minister in a position to say whether after all this time the R.C.M.P. have been able to ascertain from the department of immigration of the United States if the ambulant Banks went to the United States; and if so, when?

Mr. Favreau: In relation to the running account on one who is running, I am not in a position to submit further information on the question which has just been put. As soon as some is obtained I will volunteer it to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that answer mean that the government of Canada, with all the forces it has at its command, has not yet found out from the United States authorities whether Banks crossed the line into the United States? Is that what the minister means? Because if it is, it shows there is not very much anxiety as to the whereabouts of Banks.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter into debate with the right hon. gentleman, but there are limits to the information which is available about the number of persons crossing the border from Canada to the United States. It is quite plausible that this type of information is much more difficult to obtain in a definite fashion than on the surface would appear.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Might I address a related question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I should like to ask the minister, now that it would appear that at long last Mr. Hal Banks has disappeared from within our borders, what steps, if any, is the minister taking to make sure that he never comes back again to Canada.

Mr. Pugh: They are taking every step.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I have already mentioned it to the house, any American citizen can leave Canada without having to submit a report to the immigration authorities.

On the other hand, as Mr. Banks has the status of a Canadian resident, Canadian immigration officers have been instructed to ask him, when he returns to Canada, the reason why he left the country. We will then be in a position to know, from the answers given by Mr. Banks, how his leaving the country could affect his Canadian resident status.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister expect Mr. Banks to be back soon?

Mr. Tremblay: We all hope so, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF HON. M. J. COLDWELL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. My question relates to a former member of this house who is esteemed by Canadians from coast to coast. I refer to Hon. M. J. Coldwell. Are the reports correct that the R.C.M.P. has investigated Mr. Coldwell? If so, when and why?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): In view of the interest which I knew the house would have in this matter I asked the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to look up their files. A thorough search has been made, and I am pleased to report that never has the R.C.M.P. investigated Mr. Coldwell or found cause to do so.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): All of us are delighted to hear that, because it looked to me like a form of slander on the part of the person who made the statement, of a nature beneath contempt.

I would ask the hon. gentleman this. Did Macdonald, at the time he was allegedly associated as an undercover man with the R.C.M.P., take an oath of secrecy?

Mr. Favreau: This, as the right hon. gentleman will agree, is a totally different question from the one which was just put to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As far as this question is concerned, I must stand by the answer I gave last week; because whatever answer I might otherwise give would either expressly or implicitly confirm or deny any allegation made by Mr. Macdonald.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

TORONTO—CANADA COUNCIL GRANT TO CREST THEATRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Secretary of State. In his absence perhaps I might address it to the acting minister. Has the Secretary of State made representation to the Canada Council toward continuing its grant to the Crest theatre, Toronto, the pioneer in modern Canadian theatre and the training ground for many of our stage and television personalities?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the Secretary of State so that he in turn may bring it to the attention of the Canada Council. The hon. gentleman will realize that the constitution of the Canada Council is such that the government can do nothing except pass on representations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMPLAINT RESPECTING CONDUCT OF PROTECTIVE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as leader of the house. I would have preferred to address it to you, Mr. Speaker, but the rules forbid my doing so. It is in connection with a letter which appeared in the Saturday, August 29 edition of the Ottawa Citizen over the name of Mr. John Thompson, assistant editor of the Lake of Two Mountains Gazette. In this letter statements are made about the protective staff of the House of Commons. They are referred to as "pompous asses", as using threats and intimidation, abusive language, and so on.

In view of the fact that this staff deals with up to 15,000 people a day, and all of us who have been here for a number of years have found them to be competent and courteous, will the minister investigate these charges with a view to refuting them?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I do not think I need make an investigation in order to refute these charges. I do so right now.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to make one statement of fact. The average attendance this summer has been in the neighbourhood of 6,000 a day. Frequently on week ends it has reached well over 15,000 a day, and the overall attendance has approached 700,000 tourists this year as compared with half a million last year.

INQUIRY AS TO ABSENCE OF MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Would he tell the house how many of the 13 ministers absent today have gone to Charlottetown?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): I think most of the absent ministers have gone to Japan. The Prime Minister has gone to Charlottetown and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice really should have gone with him, but his devotion to the house was such that he is not going until tomorrow.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister say where the other ministers who are absent have gone?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to take a census, Mr. Speaker, and let the hon. gentleman know tomorrow. Most of them are here.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be permitted to supplement the answer I gave a few moments ago. I should have added that my hon. friend the Solicitor General did not go to Prince Edward Island with the Prime Minister. He is there to receive him, as I am sure all hon. members would consider appropriate in the circumstances.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

USE OF MAILS FOR DISSEMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Last week I addressed a question to the minister asking whether his department was giving consideration to making illegal the distribution of "hate" literature without the return address being on the outside of the envelope, and the minister said he would give a report to the house on this matter.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the investigation is not completed. In further reply to the hon. member, however I might say that there is a quasi-judicial investigation involved in all these cases. You have to know the contents of letters before you can determine whether or not their contents are scurrilous or indecent in character. Since you cannot find out what is inside until the letter is open it is very difficult to legislate in this particular field. The matter is under careful consideration not only by my department but by the Department of Justice. However, since each case really has to be determined on its own merits, it is practically impossible to give any general answer to this problem.

AVAILABILITY OF STAMPS BEARING LIKENESS OF QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Is there any reason why in various post offices the only 5 cent stamp available is the one with the three maple leaves on it, and customers cannot get stamps bearing the Queen's head?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question I can only say that the three maple leaves appear in the Canadian coat of arms, and I think it is proper that they should appear on a stamp. It is the emblem of Canada and the base on which our coat of arms rests. This issue has gone out as the first of a series of 13 which feature the floral designs of the provinces and the territories. The maple leaves design is the first of this series and we have already had the trillium of Ontario and the garden lily of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Don't forget B.C.

Mr. Nicholson: No, B.C. is on my list, as well as the violet of my native province of New Brunswick, the trailing arbutus—mayflower—of Nova Scotia and the dogwood of British Columbia. All post offices should have, in addition to three maple leaves stamps, a supply of stamps with the Queen's head on them, but I will certainly look into the matter as suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Webb: A supplementary question. I thank the Postmaster General for his answer, but he assured me similarly a couple of weeks ago. However, during the past couple of weeks the city of Hamilton has been flooded with the new stamp, and at the main post office and at two branch post offices there are no 5 cent stamps available except the ones bearing the maple leaves.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. gentleman will remember that when he put the question some 10 or 12 days ago I said that if he or any other member of the house or any other person has information that stamps with the Queen's head on them are not available to let me know. To date I have received no such communication from any member of the house.

ISSUE OF NEW STAMP WITH INSCRIPTION "QUÉBEC LIBRE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Postmaster General. A question was asked of the Postmaster General about the use of official mails in Quebec without the necessary stamps. I understood the minister at that time to say he was going to look into this situation and possibly report further.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know there is no free use being made of the mails, other than by franking privileges enjoyed by members of parliament and a right of use conferred by statute. There is a free mailing privilege given by statute to certain newspapers in respect of mailings within specific distances of their places of publication. I have had no notice of any situation such as that referred to by the hon. member, but if he will give me particulars I will be glad to look into it.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. minister the fact that I gave him a sample of the situation the other day.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has read Hansard he should know that I gave him an answer.

TRADE

CONSTRUCTION EQUIPMENT—SALES TO RUSSIA BY CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES OF U.S. COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I was intending to address my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I trust I will get an answer from the appropriate minister here today. In view of the fact that American owned Canadian manufacturers of heavy construction equipment have been instructed by their United States parent companies not to sell the Soviet union any of their products which appear on the United States embargo list, which action has also prevented this Canadian industry from being represented at Moscow's current exhibition of construction and building machinery, will the minister inform the house of the government's attitude toward this unwarranted interference in Canadian affairs, and whether a protest has been forwarded to Washington?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think the attitude of the Canadian government is well known, namely that Canadian corporations should be free to sell around the world, governed by and in accordance with Canadian government policy; and that there is and will continue to be the most strenuous resistance to endeavours of outsiders to control the sales activities of manufacturers of Canadian products. I am not aware of the particular circumstances raised by the hon. gentleman and will be glad to have them looked into.

NON PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN GHANA FAIR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a question was directed by the hon. member for Wellington South to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on August 26 relating to participation by Canada in the forthcoming trade fair at Accra.

In response to the question raised by the hon. member I wish to inform him that serious consideration was given to the invitation to participate in the trade fair to be held in Accra in February, 1965. A relevant consideration was that in February, 1962, the department held an all-Canadian trade exhibition in Accra on behalf of 87 Canadian manufacturing firms. In the light of this, and having in mind the need to ensure maximum results from our trade fair exhibits and the relative priorities of the Canadian export community in the Canadian trade fair program, it was not considered appropriate to participate in this particular fair.

GRAIN

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICES FOR WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on August 25 the hon. member for Melville asked how soon the Canadian wheat board might release the purchase prices for wheat and coarse grains. I am glad to be able to say that the Canadian wheat board have advised that information on prices has been forwarded to the elevator companies, and this information should be in the hands of all elevator agents at the beginning of this week. Agents will make payment to producers for quantities of grain in storage since the beginning of the crop year as soon as the information on prices is received.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Does he know if the Prime Minister received, last Friday, from the national association of employees of the unemployment insurance commission, in convention in Toronto, a telegram of protest against the recent salary increases granted civil servants? If so, can he tell the house if the government intends to do something about the request of that important group of civil servants?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look at that question and see what reply can be made tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

CHATHAM, ONT.—PROPOSED CLOSING OF ENTOMOLOGICAL LABORATORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence perhaps the parliamentary secretary will take it as notice. My question is based on local reports of last week concerning the proposed closing of the dominion entomological laboratory at Chatham, Ontario, by the Department of Agriculture. My question is, will the minister assure the house that no firm decision will be made by his department in this regard until ample opportunity has been given to the local agricultural groups affected to present to the minister the reasons for their opposition to the closing of this laboratory?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question. I will bring it to the attention of the minister on his return.

ATTENDANCE OF FORESTRY MINISTER AT RURAL REDEVELOPMENT MEETING

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Could he tell the house whether he attended during the last week end an organization meeting of a rural redevelopment committee?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, Saturday and Sunday I was in Gaspé to attend the first general conference of the regional council of economic development for the Gaspé peninsula and the Magdalen islands.

BRIDGES

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—ASSISTANCE FROM ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as spokesman for the Atlantic development board. Since Saint John has an application before the board for assistance for a harbour bridge, and since we learned today that Halifax has decided in favour of a second bridge, would the minister check on the Saint John application and see whether grants for second bridges could not be made to both these major cities? I ask this because the board, although Conservative formed, is becoming more liberal every day in its distribution of contracts.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not need to make any check; I know quite well the status of the matter. The Atlantic development board has made certain recommendations to the government which are under active consideration at this very moment. That is with respect to Saint John; there has been no application with respect to a second bridge in Halifax.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TORONTO, ONT.—DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO STRIKING NEWSPAPER EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Labour but I notice that neither he nor his parliamentary secretary is in the chamber at the moment. Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister would ask the minister to give the house an explanation as to why the members of the international typographical union now on strike in Toronto are being refused eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could not answer that offhand, but I will be glad to draw the matter to the attention of the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRAINING IN CANADA OF TROOPS OF NATO COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether arrangements have been made, or are being made, for special training for troops from Germany or others of our NATO allies at Camp Shilo, Manitoba.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are no arrangements that I know of. There are some negotiations, however, in respect to the possible testing of some equipment in a winter environment.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask by whom?

Mr. Hellyer: By the German army.

REPORTED DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION TO COMMUNIST AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Will he make inquiries about a statement made by a Mr. Macdonald to the effect that a wireless operator in his department would have given secret information to a communist agency in this country?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen Mr. Macdonald's statement, but I shall be glad to investigate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN FLAG

OPPORTUNITY FOR AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ALTERNATIVE DESIGNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the house leader or to the Acting Prime Minister. Will the government consider giving the house the assurance, when the votes on the subamendment and the amendment which are now before the house have been taken, that there will be no motion, on the government side at any rate, for the previous question before the various parties have had an opportunity by amendment to test the house on alternative designs? I have in mind such proposals as those from the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, the hon. member for Danforth, and so on. I ask my question in the belief that if there were this kind of assurance there might be a willingness to let some of the votes take place.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the hon. gentleman has put a hypothetical question which normally would not be answered at all, but the hon. gentleman had the assurance of the Prime Minister before this debate began that there would be an opportunity for all hon. members to express the views they wish to express. It is a fact—a notorious fact—that some of the hon. gentleman's friends wish to propose a design different from the design proposed by my right hon. friend. I would not like to think that a Liberal government would want to deny them the chance of doing so, any more than a Liberal government would want to deny to any hon. member in any part of the house the chance to express in a vote his views on this matter.

IMMIGRATION

ITALY—IMPRISONMENT OF CANADIAN CITIZENS REFUSING MILITARY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister been informed that Canadian citizens of Italian origin of military age, who on occasion return to Italy for a holiday, have been thrown in "chokey" if they did not answer the call for military service in Italy?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No. Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that, but I will make an inquiry and report to the hon. member.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALVIN MACDONALD—REPORTED LISTING AS COMMUNIST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement made by Mr. Calvin Macdonald that the Department of Veterans Affairs has listed him as a communist and because of this he has been unable to obtain work for two years? I ask this question of the minister because this is completely foreign to this department and its objectives.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the circumstances, but I will certainly make an inquiry into them.

SHIPPING

REMOVAL OF WRECKS FROM WATERS NEAR BRUCE PENINSULA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like in my capacity as Minister of Transport to reply to a question the hon. member for Bruce asked me a few days ago—which will be found at pages 7062 and 7063 of Hansard—about the Maitland Clipper, which the hon. member said was removing antique wrecks of historic value from the waters off the shores of the Bruce peninsula.

I am informed that this ship is under charter to Treasure and Salvage Divers Limited, and that they have been informed that the Canada Shipping Act does not enable the department to grant or withhold permission to engage in salvaging, but any wreck recovered must be delivered to the receiver so that it may be disposed of in accordance with the Canada Shipping Act. I am also informed that the activities of the vessel are under careful surveillance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF IMMIGRATION AND JUSTICE ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice in his position as house leader. Will he consider bringing forward the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Justice at an early date so we may look into matters of major importance concerning new Canadians, in the light of certain policies of the government that in my view put us on the verge of being a police state? Would he arrange for early discussion of these estimates?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration have been called already and they have been discussed. I think it is in the interests of the country that I should pursue the policy I have begun to apply of calling a new department each Friday so that members will have the chance to deal with important and urgent questions with respect to each of the departments at least for one day, pending such time as we finally dispose of the estimates.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister call his own department?

Mr. Favreau: I am afraid my own department is not entered yet, and the supply motion in this respect has not been presented to the house. I should like my estimates to be included, and as soon as the next supply motion comes forward I think they will be.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Thursday, August 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this marathon debate in the sure and certain knowledge that many of the points I wish to make have already been made, and that some of my brilliant ideas may have already been committed to the permanent record; but I think my ideas on this subject should be placed on record. I shall be using half an hour of parliament's time, whatever that represents in money, and as repetition has always been rather abhorrent to me I hope I shall not say again many of the things that have already been said. Yet I am not completely out of sympathy with the prolongation of this debate until some semblance of sanity takes command of the situation.

For those who are not completely satisfied or not satisfied at all with the proposed flag, what other alternative is there but to continue to raise objections to the form in which this flag is proposed and to indicate that one more member at least has very strong views in this regard? I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there is a certain amount of impatience in the country, in the press and even among members of the house with the extension of this debate beyond what seems to be a reasonable time, and on an issue that has nothing to do with our economic or social problems. I share this impatience, but the alternative of total surrender appeals to me even less.

The Prime Minister, who achieved public notice originally for his diplomatic ability, seems to have found one issue which he cannot or will not negotiate. I can understand his fears with regard to giving in a little and then a little more and finally becoming overwhelmed with objections to his plan. I see the position of the Prime Minister at the moment as somewhat like that of the driver of a team of runaway horses, hanging onto the reins with both hands and afraid to let go one hand so he can pull on the brake which would save him. This is a simile which is familiar in many stagecoach westerns, but it strikes me that it represents the present situation exactly. The brake in this case is a better procedure for establishing a distinctive Canadian flag than by a simple majority vote in the House of Commons on a single flag design. I hope the brake will be found before the whole stagecoach overturns.

All of us, I believe, are affected by our racial and historical backgrounds in our approach to the question of a flag. My ancesters came to this country from northern Ireland 115 years ago. They brought with them at that time a strong loyalty to the crown and to the empire, as it then was. That loyalty has continued to be strong in the subsequent generations, and is strong in the riding which I represent. It is not unanimous in my riding but it is a strong feeling, and I find myself in the rather fortunate position, which some other hon. members do not seem to enjoy, of being able to speak for my riding in one voice as my constituents would have me speak. I am thinking particularly of other hon. members who feel they should speak as they think the decision should be made regardless of whether it is in agreement with the feelings of their own people or their own personal beliefs.

In spite of the backgrounds that all of us have brought to Canada, I think I speak for everyone when I say there is only one ultimate loyalty, and can only be one ultimate loyalty, and that is to Canada. I am sure I speak for all my constituents and for a good many, if not all, Canadians when I say that.

Most of our people have come to accept the red ensign as the flag of Canada, not because it bears the union jack but because it is our flag. The difference may seem to be subtle but it is very real. I believe this is where a lot of the problem originates; not because it is a flag with the union jack, or whatever there might have been on the flag we learned to respect in school and later, but because it is our flag. That is one of the reasons it is difficult to get a change of opinion among many people as to what the new flag should be or whether we should have one.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that most of the people I represent would accept another flag, in spite of their personal preferences, if it had general acceptance and would unite our country in its goals. That is my own position. It must by now be apparent that the proposed new flag in the main resolution does not carry the general support either of the house or of the public. From what I have heard it carries the majority in the house, at least if the votes that have been indicated are correct, but that does not mean that it carries general acceptance. The majority is not enough in this country, and it never has been.

The rights of the minorities were strongly protected at the time of confederation. They were protected to the point where it was one of the basic tenets of Canadian confederation that the majority should never be able to overrule the minority on any of the questions which concerned the person, the individual. This is the basis of confederation; therefore in this particular issue the question of a flag which affects each one in a personal way cannot be settled by a simple majority vote.

The best evidence of the fact that the flag does not command a great and overwhelming enthusiasm in Canada is the effort of the Minister without Portfolio to drum up support for it. It has been very obvious in the last few days, from the questions and the answers received to them, that there is not the acceptance in Canada of the flag the government would like to see, particularly if the minister has to go out and sell it after it has been flown in so many places. I have seen it on car aerials; everyone has seen it. Surely it does not have to be sold. If it has to be sold then I cannot see that it has any general acceptance.

It is my own personal view that Canada should have a new, distinctive flag, and that before 1967. Furthermore, I am confident that a design can be found which will be generally acceptable. I have seen several proposals and I really believe some of these have the strength, the design, the purpose, and the historic symbols which would be acceptable. I only mention in passing the type of proposal made by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. Perhaps it is not completely acceptable as it stands, yet it represents something that could join us together. There are others also. I have seen several designs, and I am not picking one or the other. However, I do believe that such a design exists, a design which would satisfy those who want to retain the elements of the British background, and those who want a new flag. I think it can be found, and I am going to propose how it should be done.

To speak for a moment of the Canadian red ensign, I have taken a consistent view throughout this debate and in my public statements that unless and until some other acceptable design is found, the red ensign must remain and continue as the flag of Canada. We have to do this. We cannot exchange, as has already been stated by several hon. members, one group of dissatisfied Canadians with another. There is no future in that.

I have one other belief which I want to state. Some may believe it heresy, but I do not believe that our boys in the services fought and died for a flag. I believe they fought and died for their country, and I stood beside enough of them to know. However, I know they did fight under the red ensign, and there is no reason to haul it down unless it can be replaced by something which will give us what they died for, and that is a greater and better country.

I would like to make a few comments about what I believe to be the real and fundamental cause of our differences and difficulties in connection with the flag. I want to ask first whether all this fuss over a flag is over the flag alone, or does it represent something deeper? I believe the hard core of the difficulties in this matter is exactly the same as it was at confederation 100 years ago, and 100 years before that. It is exemplified in the views of those people who see the development of Canada as a struggle for the ascendancy of one racial group over the other; and in spite of 100 years of partnership there has been precious little willingness or ability to bridge our differences. The proof of this belief is that the presence or absence of the union jack in a new flag is the real point of difference. Unless there is some unanimity of thought and some great desire to build a better nation, I do not think we can get together on this problem.

It has been said earlier in this debate that Canadian unity is an objective of this new flag. I ask, where are we to find this unity? Certainly it is not in forcing the choice of a majority upon an unwilling minority by a parliamentary vote. Neither is it in asking the people to make a decision on one or two designs chosen by political parties. Neither is it to be found by forcing the view of the majority on a minority by means of a plebiscite on stated questions or on stated flags. I believe we should first find out whether Canadians generally want a new flag. If so, then parliament will have to set up a committee to make an irrevocable decision. I believe such a committee should be an extraordinary one set up to deal with an extraordinary situation. It should be broadly based, and it should represent the many conflicting views held across this country. A time limit would have to be set upon the deliberations of such a committee—

Mr. Godin: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not realize that this was done 20 years ago, when a committee sat for two years on this question of a national flag?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, I realize that; and I realize that after it had sat, the Liberal government of that day decided to take no action on the recommendation. I think that answers the question. The committee voted 23 to 1 in favour of a certain flag but the government would not accept it. The wrong approach was taken; there was no prior agreement to accept the decision of that committee. I would ask the hon. member, if he has not already made his contribution to the debate, to make it after I have sat down.

Mr. Godin: On a question of privilege I must advise the hon. member that I had occasion to make a speech on this issue, but I do not wish to take part in the filibuster.

Mr. Churchill: How many years ago? Twenty years ago?

An hon. Member: In this debate.

Mr. Aiken: The hon. member has used the word "filibuster". That expression was used on several occasions by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he made his speech recently. I took the trouble to look up "filibuster" in the dictionary to find out what it really meant. I was considering using the same word myself; because if we are conducting a filibuster I think we should admit it. But we are not. This is not a filibuster. I intend to read to the hon. member the definition of "filibuster" and perhaps he will understand that he is using the word incorrectly. As described in Webster's third edition it means "the use of extreme dilatory tactics by individuals or groups in an attempt to delay action by a majority in an assembly".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Precisely.

Mr. Aiken: I disagree entirely with the hon. member about that. I say there have not been extreme dilatory tactics used. Some members opposite do not want to have a debate on the flag. They wish us to simply vote on it. But I think this is one of the most important issues to have come before this parliament for many years.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Aiken: I do not intend to get into a debate with the hon. member. He will have a chance to make his contribution when I sit down.

Mr. Godin: It might be helpful to the hon. member if he were to listen to me. It might shorten his speech.

Mr. Aiken: I did not hear that last comment, but I assume I did not miss very much.

An hon. Member: Nor did anybody else.

Mr. Godin: Why refuse to hear it?

Mr. Aiken: I shall continue by saying this. I know some of my colleagues in this chamber are anxious to have a new flag. They will say that a committee would merely cause delay and result in no action being taken. They are looking back, as is the hon. member for Nickel Belt, to a previous Liberal administration 20 years ago.

Mr. Godin: On a question of privilege.

Mr. Aiken: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Godin: I think the truth should be known. The committee which sat 20 years ago was not a Liberal committee.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to know what kind of a government it was, then. Other words have been used to describe it, but I thought it was headed by a Liberal prime minister.

Mr. Godin: To be completely truthful about this, the committee referred to by the hon. member was not a Liberal committee; it was a house committee composed of members of all parties.

Mr. Herridge: As a member of that committee I must inform the house that it had a Liberal majority.

Mr. Aiken: I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West. Not only did the committee have a Liberal majority, but so did the house. I only wish to say to those who think nothing would happen, that it would be much better if two years from now we were to have a unified country than it would be to have a divided country with a new flag. I think that is the essence of the problem now. Furthermore, if the fear of delay is so great, is that not an admission that there is something to be lost and that there are arguments against the adoption of a new flag?

I wish to conclude my remarks by outlining my views on the vote which will take place when the debate on the subamendment is completed. In order to do this I will have to express my views on the main motion and the amendment, not in detail but in summary. As I stated, I do not believe the proposed new flag has the general support of the people of Canada, and I shall be obliged to oppose the main motion. I can support the amendment because it is broad enough to include my proposition that we should determine the single question whether or not a new flag is wanted by the people of Canada.

The subamendment contains four proposed questions, none of which include the question I should like to see proposed, that is, the alternative that another flag may be considered and another design substituted. The four questions which are there relate only to the proposed flag and to the retention of the red ensign. However, the wording of the subamendment reads "that among the questions to be placed before the people" shall be the four which are detailed. I think this does not exclude the suggestion I have made, and I shall be able to support it. I should, of course, like if possible to support the subamendment moved by my hon. friend from Regina City.

In conclusion may I say we are engaged in a debate. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at the end of the question period repeated words which the Prime Minister had used earlier. He said he wanted every member of the house to have an opportunity to express his views on this subject. If this is the case, Mr. Speaker, how on earth can it be called a filibuster? I do not believe I am engaging in a filibuster; but if it is a filibuster, and if it will produce some change in the obstinate stand the Prime Minister has taken on his three maple leaf flag, then I am privileged to have been a part of it.

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of the subamendment before the house I do so as an elected representative whose responsibility is, I feel, to convey to this parliament the consensus within the riding and on behalf of the people within that riding. It is my intention to vote in favour of the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City and seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk, the subamendment being that the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:

> And that in any such plebiscite, among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:
> 1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
> 2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritage of both founding races?
> 3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
> 4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion I will endeavour on behalf of my constituents to convey not only their feeling of support for the Canadian red enstign, but I will also strive to assure them of their rightful opportunity to declare their choice, whatever it may be, concerning a national flag.

In addressing myself to this motion I would refer to a statement reported in the Canadian edition of Time of March 15, 1963, which states that the Prime Minister at a press conference for foreign language editors in Toronto, when replying to the question "What would happen if the Liberals failed to achieve a majority", had this to say; "In that very unlikely event, all good men will have to come to the aid of the country". I repeat that statement made by the leader of a minority government, that in the unlikely event of that result all good men would have to come to the aid of the country, and I say that statement was never more applicable than it is today.

If the Prime Minister was sincere in his concern for all good men and women; if he was sincere in his desire to maintain unity and shape the destiny of our great nation for generations to come, then I say the Prime Minister should heed his own words and let the people come to the aid of the country and voice their opinion concerning a national flag. Never before in the history of Canada has such an issue affected so many people. Never before has an issue become so emotional, and never have so many people expressed their opinions pro and con, or actively taken a stand or engaged in a campaign to support the issue, which is the choice of a new, distinctive Canadian flag.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the flag which flies over the Canadian people, whatever that flag may be, should be a flag chosen by the people, a flag that the people respect, a flag that the people consider represents our democratic freedoms and our way of life; a distinctive flag, representative of the history and heritage which we cherish; not a flag chosen by a political leader, a flag purported, rightly or wrongly, to be the personal choice of one man, a flag which is now considered to be merely a political pennant; not a design accepted, mistakenly, as a tangible form of appeasement to a group who desire only, and with justification, to attain recognition of their culture and heritage and who strive to attain national unity which will afford them the respect and recognition they so justly deserve as one of the two founding races in early Canada. Mr. Speaker, I quote an excerpt from the Amherst Daily News of Friday, December 29, 1961:

Q. You say the Liberals are working on a design.

Mr. Pearson replied:

Oh, there are hundreds of designs. But it would be the responsibility of government to make up its mind which design it would submit to parliament.

Q. How would you poll the people on this?

To this question the Prime Minister replied:

We would poll the people when we have a general election. And if they don't like the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag which can't be mistaken for that of any other country, they'll let us know in no uncertain terms.

If the government would agree to this method I am sure the Prime Ministers words would be very well justified. The people are desirous of making known their feelings in no uncertain terms. At the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I stated that it was my intention to assure the constituents in my riding that they will have their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag. This opportunity can only be afforded through a national plebiscite. To vote in support of the motion I feel is the only democratic procedure this parliament can follow to determine the right action which will legislate for time to come a flag emblazoned by accepted symbols, a Canadian flag of the people and chosen by the people.

In urging that this issue be placed before the people for their decision I wish to present certain communications from the riding I represent, that will substantiate the stand I have taken in support of this motion. The first communication states:

I wish to register my plea with you to uphold the red ensign as Canada's flag.

Please do all in your power to give everyone a chance to voice their wishes by voting on this issue.

I would repeat that request, Mr. Speaker:

Please do all in your power to give everyone a chance to voice their wishes by voting on this issue.

The following letter is from the Cape Croker Indian reserve:

As a member of the Cape Croker L.O.B.A. 1132, in your riding, I wish to state my stand in defence of our Canadian ensign.

Our flag, the ensign, is a truly distinctive Canadian flag. The red background challenges any country in the world to try to better our freedom, equality and democracy. The union jack in the honour position honours all treaties, alliances and pacts up to the present day, and the Canadian coat of arms flying freely in the field signifies the freedom and equality of all people in this great country.

We do have a democracy. We do have the right to vote. No one man or one man's parliament can decide Canada's future or fate. The fact that Mr. Pearson does not choose to accept this Canadian way of life is certainly sufficient reason for knowing that his choice of a flag would not be fit for democratic, freedom loving Canadians.

I reiterate what has been said before. We do have a democracy. We do have the right to vote. No one man or one man's parliament can decide Canada's future or fate. A veteran who wrote this letter to me had this to say:

As a Canadian citizen and a resident of Bruce county, I feel it my duty to write to you and express my feelings, and my family's feelings, regarding all the "bunk" and "ballyhoo" about a Canadian flag. We already have a Canadian flag, a copy of which I enclose.

It is recognized as well as any flag as the "Canadian flag". When our convoy arrived in Scotland in November, 1941 the first thing I noticed in the harbour was a green maple leaf on the funnel of a ship and our Canadian flag, the red ensign, at the mast. Long may she fly.

Are we to deny this veteran the right to vote in support of his choice of a national flag, a right for which he fought, served and sacrificed during the last war? Many Canadians will never be persuaded or convinced to accept a flag other than the flag which now flies proudly over our land. For many, such as the mother who wrote this next letter, there must be the opportunity to confirm their opinion at the polls:

I feel very strongly that the Canadian red ensign represents so much common sacrifice that we cannot sit idly by and see some other flag forced on us by any minority group. Therefore we trust that you, our elected representative, will use your good influence to bring this matter to the attention of those concerned. One of my sons sacrificed his life under this flag of ours and I feel I want no other.

No personal political pennant would ever be accepted by this proud mother.

By conducting a plebiscite we will give to those Canadians other than the descendants of the two founding races the opportunity to exercise the freedoms and rights which are theirs; the freedom to make their own decision and the right to endorse the same, either as native born Canadians or as new Canadians who have attained citizenship in the land of their choice.

One group of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, which must be heard and considered by the administration of this country is the Indians. I represent two Indian reserves in my riding, and they feel that the flag proposed by the Prime Minister completely ignores the flag under which their treaties and pacts were signed. Vernon Jones, a former chief of the Cape Croker band, thinks all Canadians should have an opportunity to accept or reject it. This Indian constituent has been most adamant in expressing his feelings. He says:

We are looking forward to retaining our flag the red ensign. We are natives of this country and have great respect for the flag which we went through two world wars under, so I say hands off the red ensign. We are known as the red men or red race, so I feel we are represented on the ensign. So I am writing you hoping that French flag will never fly because we are not represented anywhere on it. We have not yet surrendered and that is all the white flag means to me.

So we are asking you to ask Mr. Pearson to forget about his flag, because we don't see how he can fly it without some bloodshed. Some of us are willing to fight and die for our flag and Mr. Pearson wouldn't want discontent in this country.

Another letter which I have received from an Indian reserve sets out in some detail the concern of the Indian for the retention of the red ensign and the union jack. This letter says:

Dear Sir:

It is with great concern that I view what I call the Pearson flag. Looking back in history, the Indians of Canada have, with good reason, fought for the union jack and the red ensign.

[Mr. Loney.]

In the war of 1812 we fought for the British. The world war of 1914-18. The last world war of 1939-45. In the above mentioned wars many of our people did not come back. The transition of the independence of Canada was not felt by our white neighbour as it was by the Indian. As an example, while the supreme tribunal was the privy council of England, we felt secure that an independent tribunal was or had the guardianship of our treaties.

Since the Supreme Court of Canada became the final court, the Indian has lost the right given him under the Jay treaty, agreed upon by the British crown, the United States and the Indians of North America (treaty No. 166).

When this treaty was presented to the Supreme Court of Canada, it was nullified, on the grounds that the war of 1812 nullified all treaties between the U.S.A. and Canada.

Although that war did not directly concern the Indians they are the ones who paid the penalty.

All or most of our treaties end with: these provisions are to hold good, as long as grass grows, the water flows and as long as the British government is in existence. If the union jack is deleted from the Canadian ensign it may be disastrous to the rights guaranteed the Indian by that flag.

The people will not accept a flag without voicing their opinions either by a vote or through the representations of their member of parliament. Yet we had been told at one time by the Prime Minister that we must accept his flag or he would take this issue to the country. Why, if the government are not afraid to face an election over this issue, do they endeavour to suppress the representations made by members on behalf of constituents who favour other than the three maple leaves design? If they are confident that this is the design favoured by a majority of Canadians, why then do they fear expressions of support for another flag by members from this side of the house and label them as filibustering? I have had letters from constituents stating that the writer will not respect in any way a flag considered to have been rammed down the throats of the people.

If we are a true democracy, then we must have the mandate of the people. If we have a parliamentary government, then we must place this issue before those who sent us here. If there is to be justice and tolerance, then all Canadians must be allowed equal opportunity to their opinions. And if there is freedom of the individual then we who sit in this house must ensure that freedom will be upheld.

Like my colleagues I have received many letters and petitions with regard to this issue. Are the Prime Minister and those who sit on the other side of the house going to ignore these expressions of public opinion, such as those voiced by the Royal Canadian Legion and the Legion women's auxiliary, organizations like the I.O.D.E., women's institutes and other church groups? Will the protests of the Canadian corps, the Canadian patriotic association and ethnic groups go unheeded? What reply will be given to those who express personal opinions or actively support a flag other than the three leaves design?

I refer now to the many individuals who have seen fit to contact their member of parliament: the elderly in the nursing home, the war widow, the farmer, the new Canadian and ministers of the church. Many of these communications, such as the following, are brief and to the point:

Dear Sir:

I am not one of those ungrateful Canadians of British ancestry who would care to dump the red ensign, rather I would like to retain it as our national flag.

Communications such as I have read at this time have continued to come in as this debate has progressed, and they run to many pages. Of the many petitions, letters and resolutions among them, there is a common expression for the retention of the red ensign and a desire for the opportunity of expressing opinions at the polls. This resolution of the ladies auxiliary says:

We the members of the ladies auxiliary of the Canadian Legion would like to voice our opinion of our flag.

We would like the red ensign flown over Canada for our flag, always.

I have a copy of a letter which was addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) which reads:

The undersigned lodge of the ladies Orange benevolent association duly moved and resolved, we petition you Mr. Prime Minister, and the government of the dominion of Canada in respect to Canada's flag.

We do petition herewith, and desire it to be known it is our firm desire to keep the union jack as the flag of Canada. If a distinctive flag must be adopted, let the Canadian ensign, which has already become known around the world, be the one chosen.

The ladies Orange benevolent association continues to loyally support Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada and the flag of our empire, our beloved union jack.

Requesting your due consideration to the above resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to convey the feelings in the riding of Bruce. Speaking personally, I would repeat in this chamber what I said recently in a speech regarding the flag—for those who served under this flag I have respect and appreciation for their sacrifice in defence of our country. This is the flag under which I myself would be proud to serve, and as a father I would be proud to see my sons serve under the flag which is recognized as being symbolic of the Dominion of Canada since 1867.

Mr. Speaker, I stand firm in my support of the Canadian red ensign. However, if the Canadian people see fit to choose another flag I will recognize and respect that flag as a patriotic Canadian. I ask, though, that this choice of a flag be given to the people of Canada.

In closing I say to the Prime Minister, all good men will have to come to the aid of the country.

Thank you.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have participated in any of the debates relative to the proposed adoption of a new flag for Canada. I should like to say to my colleague from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) that I think he was far too modest in his opening remarks when he somewhat deprecated the kind of contribution he was going to make. I found his points, as usual, extremely well taken, carefully thought out and helpful, and the kind that a good parliamentarian should make from time to time.

I had the same reaction to the speech of my colleague the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Loney), which was also thoughtful, positive and helpful.

Mr. Speaker, it is an unfortunate thing that we have a development in Canada, much of which is the responsibility of a press which probably writes its material a little too quickly, and is over conscientious and concerned about deadlines, which has led them to believe that any item discussed for any length of time by the people's representatives is in some way an indication of obstruction or delay. One gets the same reaction from the press comments about the speech from the throne; it is said that it drones on and that all members go over the same sort of things. Such writers are forgetting that before our assembly was an assembly of responsible government, it was a representative assembly in existence to represent the people of the country. When we have these things developing which stir and stimulate public opinion it would be strange indeed if the public's representatives passed their days in silence. I think it is extremely useful to have the kind of contributions which have been made to this debate. I am proud of the fact it is colleagues of mine who have carried the major burden of this debate, and who have led the public in the discussion of this very important question. I am proud of them.

In the main, the contributions that have been made have been helpful and have sought to minimize an unfortunate action and an unwise decision of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the government, which has clearly endangered the unity of the country. We have always had this problem in Canada. Always we have had to have wise and good leadership which could prevent the cleavages from becoming so deep that they could not be healed.

It is appropriate that this House of Commons be directed along the lines which the two hon. gentlemen have suggested, and on this day, when we come prepared to turn our thoughts to the anniversary of the great Charlottetown conference which took place 100 years ago tomorrow, and which the Prime Minister is very properly attending as the representative of this house and his government.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time unity has been threatened. The situation was not easy 100 years ago. Many times since we have had problems that have created grave danger. I think it is incumbent upon us to make sure that no utterances of ours will do anything to pit one Canadian or group of Canadians against another so as to weaken the always frail fabric of confederation which binds this great but heterogeneous country together.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) was kind enough to express concern about the party to which I belong, and to give us advice. I am not one of those who are considered excessively partisan. Sometimes I am told that I am not sufficiently partisan; but as he was advising us I was thinking of an even greater danger. I would hope that his party would not contribute to the kind of thing that the great Sir John Thompson spoke about as the greatest threat which could befall the political life of a country such as ours. Sir John Thompson, one of the three great Nova Scotians who became prime minister of Canada, said something that strikes me as being extremely apropos at this very moment. He said:

> "The one calamity above all others which stands before this country is that political divisions should follow the division of race or the division of religion. The one danger which menaces the future of this country and the union of this country, now so happily being accomplished, is that men should stand arrayed against each other on the question of government, because they differ with regard to religion, because they differ with regard to race.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to this situation as one which we must all avoid.

I thought too that a colleague of mine, the hon. lady from Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Wadds), not long ago picked up the very same theme that one of our great statesmen of the 1890's enunciated, when she said:

> Let us clarify what we mean by unity—not rigidity, not force physical, or legislative, but understanding, a concentration on our common purpose, not on petty irritations, hurts and pride.
>
> We speak of national unity as if it were a building we have to construct quickly, preferably cheaply, and certainly without aching muscles and red-rimmed eyes. A building which once constructed will shelter us from all modern harm.
> Unity is only partly physical, mostly mental and emotional, ever changing, ever demanding, but so worth while.

We today, Mr. Speaker, are striving for a measure of unity. We are trying to reach a solution that will not irritate, that will not cut deeper the wounds that might have been made. That is a big part of the effort which is being made by the opposition party, the oldest party which Canada has and the party which was founded and based on a great understanding, a co-operative working arrangement between the leaders of the two founding races of this country. This is what we are seeking. This is the kind of suggestion that we have in the subamendment in our efforts to come to a decision on this matter, and if we have to discuss the matter at great length let it be discussed at great length, because it is a very important matter.

The higher value of a parliamentary institution is not speed and efficiency. The higher values by far are democracy, compromise, consensus and the proper serving of the people we represent. I believe that the party of Macdonald and Cartier, the party which took the lead in confederation 100 years ago tomorrow, was wise in its suggestion that once the error was made by the Prime Minister the whole matter should be put to a plebiscite. I believe that a plebiscite has become a good and useful thing, an important contribution to salvaging all that we can from a situation that was created by the government and especially, I am sorry to say, by the Prime Minister, a man for whose career and personality I have always had the highest regard. It is unfortunate that he, who in a long and fruitful career was so successful in reconciling differences, so adept, so skilled, so devoted in finding solutions among opposing suggestions, should be the very man in this year 1964 who has interposed one of the great divisive factors in Canadian politics. It is all the more regrettable because it was all so unnecessary, so unfortunate in its timing and so damaging in its method.

The house is naturally having difficulty in following the lead of the government in this matter. I am one of those who in happier, calmer times would have sought to suggest to his people that perhaps our country could well do with a distinctive flag. I am one of those who would be prepared to say that the symbols which are dear to me could be retained by me and my people without necessarily being retained on a flag. We would all do much by way of compromise. But faced with the situation that was presented to the house and the country, even those who belong to that school had no other choice but to oppose, and I can do nothing more than oppose with voice and vote resolutions A and B.

There is something more to a plebiscite than a mere effort to find a consensus which the house is not able to produce, although that is surely a part of it. The house is clearly divided, deeply divided on this measure which has been brought before us. There is something more to a plebiscite than the fact that the people of the country should have the most thorough and complete participation in the adoption of a symbol—and the flag is a symbol. That is a big part of it. But there is something else. It is an unfortunate thing that we have seen political partisanship develop about the design, and throughout the country we hear the expression "Pearson's pennant". It is an expression I have never used, nor do I intend to use it. I do not think we improve our public life by such remarks any more than we did much for Canada by the expression "Diefendollar", something which I think is now very hard to obtain for reasons which we shall not discuss in this debate.

But the selection of a symbol for the country is not the kind of thing which a minority government does, and when it is succeeded by another government, either majority or minority, then has its choice set to one side. It would be ridiculous to have various prime ministers and various parties with their flags. We do not want a Liberal flag or a Conservative flag or a Pearson flag or a Douglas flag. We want a Canadian flag. So I think that on this important matter we should do that which other countries do in a constitutional way—entrench a decision once taken by a parliament. And to bring the decision of parliament to the people for their vote will give to it the greatest permanency, because we know that no parliament can bind its successor and a mere resolution on the order paper followed by a vote would not give that permanency which a plebiscite would.

I am one of those who believe that in this instance advocacy of a plebiscite is extremely apropos and is essential to a proper solution of the problem which is before us, because we want a flag upon which there is not only a consensus but with regard to which there is a realization that it is going to be ours for a long, long time. I agree with the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Loney) that we should honour any flag which is adopted. I avoid expressing my artistic reaction to the flag envisaged in the resolution before us because it contains symbols that could conceivably be used in a flag which would be adopted. I am convinced in my heart of hearts or, to use an old expression, I have a feeling in my bones that the flag set out in the resolution will never fly officially in this country. I believe this is in the cards. But I am not convinced that in the decent processes of democracy, along the avenues of compromise and down the paths of good will and understanding, some sort of new flag may not emerge. If it is adopted properly, honourably, democratically and fairly I am prepared to honour it and to encourage my children to do so. To find a method we have suggested the plebiscite, and I commend my colleague from Regina City for the suggestions which he has put forward. The four choices have been read. There are those who believe a plebiscite should contain more, but I would be a little happier if there were fewer choices.

The question, "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?" is a very appropriate selection for the first question. I have never understood those who maintain that the Canadian red ensign is not a distinctively Canadian flag. I have had some few opportunities to be abroad, to attend the United Nations and other places, serving this country in some small way. Never have I seen the slightest hesitation that the Canadian ensign was in fact the symbolic representation of our country. Therefore I believe that whatever happens—and I am going to talk about the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken)—the Canadian red ensign cannot and should not pass from use in this country until the people of this country have had a right to express themselves thereon.

It is unfortunate that sometimes we have allowed ourselves to get into that frame of mind whereby we have no flag at all. Of course we have had a flag, and it has had legal status. It has had recognition, and it is ill advised to suggest otherwise. If it is unsatisfactory, that is a different matter. Let us find avenues to explore that question; but we get nowhere by presuming that the Canadian red ensign is not in fact and in law the flag of this country. I personally find it a rich and colourful flag. I thought the beauty of this parliament hill on Dominion day, with 66 flags flying, was most impressive.

The Canadian red ensign is rich and appealing. It has history, but perhaps to some it has things which bring a negative response. Perhaps some people find there things which point to a period in their ancestors' history which was disturbing. If I thought only of the days of Culloden I would not think too much of the union jack either, because never was there more butchery than was practised by the arrogant Sassenachs of the south against my ancestors of the north. But I do not see that in the ensign. I see in the ensign an evolution of one of the greatest political communities the world has ever seen.

I see there this country which led the world in the evolution of dominion status. I recall too, and it was only proper that it should be, that French speaking subjects of the crown many years ago were given civil and political liberty that English speaking subjects of the crown in England itself were not given. I see there the struggles of Robert Borden against some pretty thick-headed people in the colonial office. I see through the years the evolution of the commonwealth, where Borden pressed the case for equality among the members of the commonwealth, and where one of Borden's successors, our own Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), in another stage, successfully pressed the case for equality of peoples within the commonwealth.

These are things we can see, and perhaps we Canadians have failed in not becoming a little bit more emotional about the symbols of our existence. I heard the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) say the other day that the young people of this country, the vast majority of the younger generation, sought a distinctive Canadian flag. That may well be. Possibly we have failed, especially those of us who were educators, to point out to them the distinctiveness of the flag we have. Certainly our American cousins are not remiss in expressive nationalism, if we might call it that, and we may have failed in this through neglect.

It should be to the young that the national symbol means the most. Like the hon. and gallant member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) who spoke the other day, we express our personal preferences; we then move on to pledge ourselves to support a solution which is arrived at by ourselves and our colleagues in the proper way.

I would suggest that when we arrive at a distinctive flag, either through the means suggested by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) or through a simpler or more elaborate plebiscite, we will be able to pour upon that symbol the emotional affection which many Canadians feel for the Canadian red ensign and for other symbols which have been used in this country.

I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary North, the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) and others, and referred to a little while ago by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, of referring the matter to a committee for serious, careful study is an excellent one, a committee which would function while the House of Commons, its parent, would deal with other matters of equal but different urgency. I would hope that that committee would be able to make preparation so that it would overcome some of the mistakes which were made by the Prime Minister and the government in his and their exercise in flag unfolding.

I would think if this committee would call to its aid as counsel—if I may use the American expression—two heraldists, two historians and two artists we would avoid the terrible shock which many artistic people felt when they saw the symbol before the house in the main resolution. If this were done it would be a useful step. I would hope that, after careful deliberation and thoughtful consideration, such committee would come out with a pretty widely accepted design, and the next step would be for that design and the Canadian red ensign to be submitted to the Canadian people in the next general election.

If that were done the Prime Minister would have fulfilled his commitment in having brought forward the matter of a distinctive flag. The House of Commons would have fulfilled its duty by bringing order out of confusion, unity out of division and agreement out of bitterness, and then the people of Canada who are the ones who must have the final voice would be able to express their opinions. This I think would be something of which Canadians could be proud. This would be a fine preparation for 1967. It was recognized that a mistake had been made. It is a mark of greatness to recognize errors and I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has made a profound one. I believe there is a widespread feeling in this country—I was about to say "in his party", but I would not presume to go as far as that; I do not know—to this effect. But, I would be greatly surprised if this deep feeling had not permeated his party as well.

I can see a committee of this house doing useful work. I would hope it would be selected with the best of intentions; that it would have a vice chairman from the Conservative party. I would think that a distinguished gentleman such as the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) might be given the second place on such a committee and I am sure the government could nominate some distinguished member from its own side, such as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) or the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Pennell) who could give leadership to such a group in considering some of the ideas put forward. We have witnessed, I think, a real expression of serious concern among the Canadian people that this matter should be dealt with, that it should be dealt with properly, and that there should be no surrender to political expediency and no excursion into partisan, racial or religious bitterness. We want no part of any of this. No member can be accused of failing in his duty if he stands up and makes clear his opposition to some of the efforts which have been made in this chamber with regard to the flag proposal. I think the House of Commons can come out of this with its reputation enhanced as the great forum for the expression of Canadian opinion. Is there division here? Is there disagreement? Of course there is, because this is what we find among the Canadian people.

The best thing would have been for the Prime Minister never to have made his move. Better he had done other things. Better he should have moved to bring us into the organization of American states. I would have followed him in that, by voice and vote regardless of what any of my colleagues chose to do. Better he had found some way of reforming the Senate, as was promised in 1893. That is a long standing promise. But this action having been taken, there is still room for a little reaction, a little reconsideration, much give and take. I can see at the moment no better arena for this than the microcosm of the house itself, which is a house committee. Such a committee, untrammelled by rigid time limits—I believe there would be a sufficient sense of seriousness among its members that it would not be necessary to lay down an arbitrary time limit—would, in my opinion, be well qualified to find a solution to this problem. I think there is a feeling among our people that a solution should be found but that it should not be a partisan solution, a mere rushing to a vote in the House of Commons. I cannot help recall a saying by Sir Robert Borden 50 years ago that some who were most anxious for votes in the house were least anxious for them in the country.

The Prime Minister is not here—he is in Charlottetown where, to tell the truth, I should like to be myself. But I do appeal to him to retrace his steps as far as necessary, because otherwise he will leave a record which will mar a great contribution to Canada. He is a diplomat. He is a man who, I still believe, is a great Canadian. The little series of bunglings among various cabinet ministers is unfortunate and regrettable. And seemingly it is eternal. But what is more important is something which strikes at the very vitals of the country, namely national unity. And if the Prime Minister could come out of this with his genius for compromise, retrace his steps and accede to the pleas of those who are sincere in their submissions, then out of this unfortunate division may come another example of Canada's ability to work together when the chips are down, party with party, race with race and creed with creed. If so, the flag debate was well taken up and, if so, we shall have proven ourselves. I think, Mr. Speaker, we can do it.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Before I proceed with my remarks in this historic flag debate I should be remiss if I did not draw the attention of the hon. members of this assembly to the very fine, scholarly, academic and thought-provoking speech we have just heard from the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: It is regrettable that a man with his vision and foresight could not be in that great city of Charlottetown today with other members of the house.

Mr. Churchill: Duty comes first.

Mr. Hales: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in making this contribution to the debate I will be brief. I spoke on July 3 in this house. At that time we were engaged in a flag debate which was to terminate at the end of five days. I spoke on July 3, just two days after Canada celebrated its 97th birthday. The subject of the flag was very much in the thoughts of all Canadians at that time. We had portrayed to us on the front lawns of this building a memorable display of 66 Canadian red ensigns. I said then that I would vote in favour of the Canadian red ensign but at the same time I realized there were many Canadians who had other views on this matter and that I would be in favour of a referendum to try to settle the problem. I also said on that occasion—and if I might be pardoned for quoting what I said:

> It would be very simple and inexpensive to hold a plebiscite. It could be held at the time of the next federal election at little expense. You would simply walk in to vote, be given a ballot with the names of the candidates on it and you would be given another slip of paper with three or four flag designs in colour and you would simply mark an X opposite the one you preferred. I believe the method adopted in the province of Alberta, which is referred to as the transferable vote, could be adopted whereby you mark your choices first, second and third. There would be no problem in that regard. I know each Canadian would say, "I will be loyal to the flag which the majority of Canadians choose."

And later in my speech I said:

> I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he is bound to bring in a new flag he should start over again with a clean sheet. He should set up a non-partisan committee to represent Canada and introduce a new design for parliamentary approval, not a government design. If he does not want to do that, he should withdraw the resolution that is before the house now. This is the last day of debate, at the moment. He should allow the members to reassess the whole issue during a summer recess. Let us go home to our constituencies; let us think about this very serious matter. Let it simmer a bit and then come back and decide where we go from there.

As I read those words again, Mr. Speaker, I think how much better it might have been had we taken the recess and come back here to reassess this very important problem. What has happened since? Many hon. members have spoken in this house. We have heard many very thought-provoking speeches. I think of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Doucett); and, yes, even the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) and many others. These men spoke with sincerity, with beliefs, with ideas, with feeling in their hearts, and gave suggestions to this honourable chamber as to what they thought ought to be done with regard to selecting a distinctive flag for this country. This is the seventeenth day of the flag debate. I hear it said—it is said to me quite often—"Why is this flag debate going on so long?" I would remind hon. members and the people of this country that the United States recently debated the American civil rights bill for 72 days. I am sure our debate is every bit as important to Canada as that debate was to the citizens of the United States. We should endeavour to maintain unity, bring our peoples closer together and give to all a greater feeling of national identity and purpose. These, Mr. Speaker, are the things we have to try to bring about in this debate.

Much has been said about the cost to the taxpayer of continuing parliament while this debate is in progress. May I remind you, sir, that most of the costs of this house are on a yearly basis, so whether the house sits or does not sit adds little to the cost of its operation. I would agree that those who are employed on a sessional basis represent an added cost. This may involve secretaries. However, Mr. Speaker, over the past few years parliament has been sitting so continuously that they have been on a yearly basis anyway. Therefore, it is a minor cost to the country for such sessional help as the page boys and the cleaning staff. There may be a small extra cost in connection with paper for Hansard, and printing; but apart from that I can see no additional cost to the operation of this house in discussing such an important subject as we now have before us.

Members are here because they are sincere in their purpose; they are here to debate this great cause and this important subject that is before us. So, Mr. Speaker, the debate has continued. We have heard briefly from some hon. members of the other parties. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) favours a new flag. In his case it is the Pearson tri-leaf if necessary but not necessarily the Pearson tri-leaf; he would prefer a single leaf because this, he says, would symbolize unity. For the Social Crediters, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) says flatly that a minority government has no mandate to impose any flag upon the people of Canada, and he demands a referendum. Then there are the members of the all-Quebec group, the Creditistes. The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) has pledged support to the Pearson design. Again there is contradiction and dissatisfaction, because he says, "We are not satisfied with the proposed design; we would prefer another. Anyway, the flag will not strengthen unity".

Then even the Prime Minister himself has doubts on this matter. I wish to refer to just one of the many contradictions in his speech, when he said, "When the house has come to a decision members will abide by it and do all they can to obtain its universal acceptance". In other words, "Accept or face an election; and having accepted, help sell it to the country". What a flag—conceived in secrecy, sired in coercion and born to be sold. On the subject of being born to be sold, we heard all about this the other day when the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) was questioned about the sale of thousands of tri-maple leaf bumper stickers. He took it upon himself to circulate from his own government office, with his own government help, an advertisement asking his supporters to buy these maple leaf bumper stickers by the thousands. So it was certainly born to be sold. To realize this we only need look at the great promotion that has been brought about in the sale of this flag from newsstands and other places of business; how they have been flown on the aerials of cars, and so on. There has been a great promotion in order to put this tri-maple leaf design before the people of Canada.

We have had a subamendment put before the house by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More). This subamendment was simply introduced in his good thinking to bring to the attention of the house how a plebiscite could be held. Among other things, what would be on this plebiscite or this ballot which the people would receive when they went to vote? I do not like to take up the time of the house, but the four points included in this subamendment were:

1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritage of both founding races?
3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

These suggestions, amongst other things, were included in the subamendment he put before the house. Public opinion in regard to this matter has crystallized in the last few weeks, Mr. Speaker. I would humbly suggest that there is no argument whatsoever as to whether Canada should have a distinctive national flag. I believe this is practically universally accepted. We should certainly have it for our centennial, which is just a few years away—our 100th birthday in 1967. Indeed, we should have had it many years ago, and it is regrettable that the Right Hon. Mackenzie King in 1945 when he, by order in council, said that the Canadian red ensign would be the official flag of Canada, did not stop there; but he went on to say "to be flown from government buildings either within or without Canada". If he had left out of his statement that last little clause this matter would have fortunately been settled in 1945.

I think we have failed badly in our educational and training fields. We have not taught the children in our schools about Canada's flag, how to draw it, and the history behind it. This has been forgotten and overlooked, possibly because it was never officially declared to be Canada's flag. This minority government and its appointed Prime Minister saw fit to introduce the flag resolution that is now before this parliament, and rightly or wrongly they must bear the full responsibility, because the parties on this side of the chamber did not bring it in.

The government of the day saw fit to bring this resolution before the house and I should like to quote what the Prime Minister had to say in this introductory remarks on June 15, as reported on page 4318 of Hansard. He said this:

> The government's responsibility is to decide on policy, to present that policy to parliament for consideration, and they hope support, and to stand and fall on the decisions parliament takes. If parliament decides that it cannot support a government on a matter of major policy, our system does then provide for a referendum, a referendum to the people in an election.

So that point was made quite clear in the introduction of this flag resolution.

I commend the Prime Minister for his aspirations and desires in this regard. We have only to note one paragraph a little later on, when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I believe that a national flag of the kind described in this resolution, that will be exclusively Canadian, will bring us closer together; give us a greater feeling of a national identity and unity. Today especially, as Mr. Massey has reminded us, we need faith and confidence in ourselves as Canadians, with pride in Canada, devotion to our country. I believe that the adoption of this resolution will help to produce that result. If I did not deeply and sincerely so believe, I would not be introducing it into this House of Commons.

However, more and more each day his aspirations, goals and desires are not achieved. If his goal in this case is that of national unity and if that is what he wanted, it is abundantly clear without a shadow of doubt that some other method to achieve this aim must be sought.

The problem seems to arise from two sources, as I see it. As I said before, there is no doubt but that people do want a distinctive Canadian flag. However the problem which confronts this parliament is, first of all, how this resolution was introduced, and second the particular choice of the proposed flag.

With regard to how the resolution was introduced, I think that if a poll were taken it would bring out the fact that practically everybody disagrees with the method of introduction of this resolution. Let hon. members opposite ask some of their sincere and loyal supporters, or the members of their own party, whether they agree with the method of introduction of this resolution. The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) had this to say on August 24, as reported at page 7180 of Hansard:

> I would point out that we never saw any details of this flag until Votes and Proceedings of May 26 were issued on May 27. The opposition saw this design as soon as we did. If this denotes that the Liberal party caucus has given its approval to the design in question, I would like to know when it did so. I attended all the caucus meetings and the design was not shown and, as I say, we did not see it until Votes and Proceedings appeared on May 27.

I cannot understand why or how a party would expect to have unanimity and support for the introduction of a flag resolution even before its own members were consulted. The same hon. member also said that at many of their meetings the Liberal party never discussed the question of a new flag. It was never an election issue in many parts of Canada. In my own riding the flag was never an issue in the election campaign, and I am sure there are many hon. members here who were never asked to declare themselves on the flag issue; nor was it an issue in their election platforms. There is plenty of evidence to show that this resolution does not have the support of the members of the party which introduced it.

This brings me back to the same point, that it was not so much the problem of the flag as its method of introduction, this take it or leave it attitude: This is for Canada, this is what we are giving you and this is what we want you to accept. It seems to be a known fact that the Prime Minister has received thousands of letters pointing out that he has gone about this in the wrong way. I think there is no doubt but that this is the way this great problem has arisen, namely the method by which the resolution was introduced, and second, the choice of the flag itself. I sincerely believe that if a more attractive flag had been chosen, one with a more artistic design or with more history and tradition behind it, it would have been more acceptable. At the same time I realize there is a difference of opinion over the choice which was made. There may be many who like it, but there are many more who do not like it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is parliament to deal with this problem? What must be done? A very important matter has to be decided. I say it is up to the Prime Minister, who is the leader of the government, to make the move and to decide what he feels is best in this regard. I was very happy to hear the Prime Minister say that a free vote would be taken among his members. This is a reversal of his previous stand, but I commend him for it. On May 19 last the Prime Minister made it clearly understood that the life of this government depended on the outcome of the flag question. He said, as reported at page 3337 of Hansard:

> I have pointed out, and I think I should make it quite clear, that when the government submits to parliament a matter of policy—and this is certainly a matter of policy—the government must stand or fall on the result of the decision of the house.

However, three months later he came before this house with an entirely different position and said that any vote on the flag question would not be considered by the government as being against party discipline and there would be no question of an election, whatever the result of the votes. So the whips are off; the way is clear. It is a free vote.

On July 3 I challenged many of my good friends on the Liberal side of the house to rise in their places and express their views on this very important matter. I challenged the hon. members for Durham (Mr. Honey), Brantford (Mr. Brown), Renfrew South (Mr. Greene), Carleton (Mr. Francis), Wentworth (Mr. Morison), Halton (Mr. Harley) and Hastings South (Mr. Temple) to rise in their places and give their views. I now challenge them again to get up in the house and make a speech on the flag, because as I say the whips are off and the way is clear. I know that, sure as I am standing here, the constituents in their ridings want to hear from them.

I suggest it is not enough that you be a spectator; your constituents want you to declare yourselves and take a stand. I know what my constituents would think of me if I did not make some observations during this debate. Being aware of the fact that the vote is to be a free vote they would ask what is stopping me from expressing my views and why I do not declare myself. They would say: Now that you are being allowed to vote freely, we want to hear from you and know your stand on this matter.

Mr. Speaker, we have only heard from 27 members out of 128 in the Liberal party. There are 101 members on the government side of this house who have not declared their stand on this flag issue.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, may I interject? That is perhaps slightly untrue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I direct the attention of the hon. member for Norfolk to the fact that the hon. member for Wellington South has the floor, and he should first seek permission of that hon. member before interrupting to ask a question.

Mr. Hales: I will give him that permission, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roxburgh: Thank you. The hon. member stated that the constituents of the members on this side of the house do not know anything about the stand we take. It so happens, and I speak for myself, that I have written my constituents personally, and that letter has appeared on the front page of all the newspapers in my area. The people know exactly how I stand and why I take that stand. I direct the hon. member's attention to that fact. Thank you ever so much.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that interjection on the part of my hon. friend from the town of Simcoe. He and I are graduates from the same alma mater, and I have great respect for him and appreciate what he said. However I should like to ask him why he has left it to the press to make his stand known rather than voice his opinion here in the House of Commons where it will be recorded in Hansard so that everyone will know exactly his position?

Mr. Speaker, we have heard from only 27 Liberal members. There are 101 Liberal members from whom we have yet to hear. We have heard from only one cabinet minister, plus the Prime Minister of course, in his introduction. In respect of a major historical debate on an issue of such importance to the people of Canada why do we not hear from members on the front benches, and from more members supporting them on the government side? I do not understand why there is such a delay in their expression of opinion, now that the vote has been declared a free vote.

I feel it is my duty, as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, to recommend any procedure which, if followed, may aid us in solving the impasse which confronts this parliament. The people of this country are tired of hearing about the flag debate. They want the debate concluded, and we should do everything we can to suggest ways of solving the difficulty. I might say that we have already done so. The leader of this party has moved an amendment to the main motion, proposing a plebiscite. I have heard the pros and cons in respect of such a plebiscite, but I must say that the only democratic way of deciding such an important issue as this is by a national referendum. Many views and ideas are held by the people of this country, and even families are split on this issue. The provinces are also divided on it. Therefore I feel the only democratic way of handling the problem is by allowing the people themselves to decide by plebiscite. The people could go into a quiet booth, mark their ballots and make their own choice.

Mr. Speaker, I realize there are arguments against holding a plebiscite. I have suggested that a plebiscite be held, and have heard people say that we are the elected representatives sent to Ottawa to take a stand and to make a decision. I think the answer to that argument is that this is a very important issue, involving a moral and personal choice, which 265 people out of 20 million could not decide. How are we going to have unity in this country if the decision is made in that way? This choice, once made, is not one that can be changed every two to five years, or as the government changes. Once this issue has been decided the resulting flag will remain as Canada's flag for all time. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that we must allow the people of Canada to settle this important issue by means of a plebiscite.

Many people suggest that by holding a national referendum we will divide the country. I think this whole matter must be taken out of the political arena. I do not think a choice by plebiscite would be as divisive as a choice by 265 representatives here in the House of Commons. I think if a committee is formed to decide on the designs from which a distinctive flag is chosen by plebiscite, there will be very little division. I think the committee, as suggested by many members, would be of great potential value, and perhaps should be composed of seven members from the Liberal party, five members from the Conservative party, and one from each of the N.D.P., Social Credit and Creditiste parties, making a total of 15. I do not think it would be necessary, but perhaps a similar arrangement could be made in respect of senators, making the membership of the committee 30 instead of 15.

Mr. Speaker, I think the whole flag issue should be sent to that proposed committee for consideration and report to parliament within a reasonable time, perhaps three to six months. If that committee after its consideration could report unanimously back to this house, the debate could perhaps be limited to five days. If the report to the house was based on a committee majority of 80 or 85 per cent I think that report would receive the support of all parties. If that committee was unable to come to a unanimous decision, or a decision of an 80 or 85 per cent majority, this matter should then be referred to the people in the form of a plebiscite. The duty of the committee would then involve a decision in respect to the flag designs which would appear on the ballot for the plebiscite.

I would go one step further and suggest that once the plebiscite had been held and all ballots been cast the ballots should not be counted on a regional basis, but sent to Ottawa and counted on a national basis, so that no area or province in Canada could be associated with a choice in respect of a specific design. The decision would have been made on a national basis only.

As a member of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, I have done my best to make some recommendations and suggestions which I feel it is my responsibility to present to the house. We are at an impasse. We are at a point where parliament must make some decision. After talking to the people of my riding, other members of the house and friends, and having done a little soul searching on my own part, I think these are the best recommendations I can make to the leader of the government whose responsibility it is first and foremost to make a move so that the impasse will be broken.

I must make it clear to the Prime Minister and his supporters that, above all, members of the official opposition want a strong Canada made strong by each province, Quebec being one of them. As a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition it is my responsibility to try to suggest some way for the government to get out of the impasse. An explosive situation it is. The people of Canada want the flag debate ended and pressing legislation attended to. Therefore I beg the Prime Minister to accept the ideas, the compromises, the suggestions that have been made to him not only by myself but by many other hon. members. I appeal to him to take them to heart so that his record will not be marred for all time.

[Mr. Hales.]

Mr. Hahn: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hales: Yes.

Mr. Hahn: I am asking this question purely for information. The hon. member suggests it would be possible to have a plebiscite with all the ballots being sent to one central point so that no one would know how any part of the country had voted. Would it not be necessary to identify the ballot boxes right back to the polls so that you could ensure the validity of each of the ballots, and carry out a check with regard to ballots issued, ballots used and so on? In other words, does the hon. member really think it is possible to send all the ballots to Ottawa as he suggested and still ensure the ballot count?

Mr. Hales: I think that is just a technical problem that can be overcome. I am sure it could be worked out, in the same way as all the ballots being sent to one central point in a province. They could all be sent to Ottawa. My thought is that we want to get away from the regional idea because we do not want to know what part of Canada voted for one flag and what part voted for another.

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the amendment to the amendment which deals specifically with the question of designs to be submitted to the Canadian people in a plebiscite. Before making any remarks in this connection I should like to refer to the fact that when I spoke on August 13 I was not allowed to finish the remarks I had planned to make, and since the subject matter is quite pertinent at the present time I should like to conclude what I had intended to say then. I wish to refer to a suggestion I was going to make on August 13 to the Prime Minister and which I assure you, Mr. Speaker, is intended to be helpful.

I want to say to the house, to the Prime Minister and to the government that I believe this matter can still be settled. In my opinion the procedure would be to appoint a committee which would be entrusted with the selection of designs for reference to parliament, with parliament then being asked to approve a flag on the basis of a two thirds majority vote. I do not know whether anyone remembers what I said at that time, but simply to remind the house may I say it was my suggestion that no decision of parliament on a question as important as a change in the flag, which is tantamount to changing the constitution and certainly of equal importance, should be made on the basis of a bare majority but rather on the basis of at least a two thirds majority. I was about to say at that time that the matter could then be completely removed from the partisan political realm. From time to time the committee would bring designs to parliament until one was found which was acceptable to two thirds of the members. Those views which I had intended to express at that time are applicable to the situation which exists now.

It could be argued that this would be tantamount to a Conservative party veto, and I acknowledge that it is. But I do say to the house categorically that the Conservative party does not yield to anyone, certainly not to any other party, in its desire to do any and every necessary thing to contribute to the unity of this country. That is the question which I believe is before us at least to a certain degree—the unity of the country.

Many other developments have taken place in the period of a little over two weeks since I last spoke and I am going to refer to them later. Just before I resumed my seat two weeks ago I had been expressing disappointment over the fact that more ministers had not participated in this debate. I wondered why they had not spoken in defence of their position as members of a government that has submitted a resolution to the house which, from every point of view except urgency, is the most important resolution submitted to the house since I have had the honour to be a member.

Important, yes; urgent, no. It is important because it represents much to many Canadians. To some it represents their participation in two world wars. To some it represents their participation in the first world war and their recollection of that war. It brings to mind the betrayal of treaties. It brings to mind the rejection of the proposition that the pledged word of nations is of no account. It brings to mind the rejection of the principle enunciated by the German chancellor of that day that a treaty was merely a scrap of paper. I would remind the house that Britain and France fought hand in hand in that war, that France was invaded and Britain honoured her commitment and rushed to her defence.

To some people it represents memories of the second world war. It represents the recollection of a long period of training and then the events of D-day and subsequent events. To some citizens it represents the sacrifice of life itself by a member of their family. In the shire town of my native county a man and woman live today who lost two of their three boys in the battle of Britain, when Britain stood alone. They wish to keep alive the symbol of sacrifice contained in the union jack.

My mail continues to contain many messages urging reconsideration by the government of its apparent desire to discard and destroy our present distinctive flag, the red ensign. With all the conviction of which I am capable, I urge the government to reconsider. I am, however, not hopeful that they will. But letters are continuing to come to me and I believe they will go on. Many people found it difficult to believe that the union jack would be completely eliminated from the government submitted design.

As I said, this is the most important resolution to be brought before the house since I have been here. I do, however, deny the urgency of it. As a matter of fact in my opinion it is not urgent. It is something that should be carefully considered by everyone within the sound of my voice now and who may be in this chamber at any other time.

I repeat it is most astonishing, most disturbing and most astounding that ministers of the crown have not taken part to a greater extent than they have in this debate. This debate has been boycotted by ministers. It is a matter of the throwing away of symbols which have been used for many years; it is one of the most serious things, and I for one am not able to understand or comprehend it. Every minister should get up and explain this. It is our duty to demand that they do, and it is their duty to do it. This they have not done, and I state here and now they should have the courage to speak in this debate and make an attempt to justify their position.

One minister has spoken, one in 25. In my opinion he is one of the best known ministers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). He spoke relative to the subamendment and I have some comments to make regarding his remarks. The particular paragraph, among others, to which I refer and take exception, is in that portion of the minister's remarks found on page 6963 of Hansard for August 18. These are the words:

> I invite my hon. friends opposite, and particularly the Leader of the Opposition, to abandon their negative role, which gets its best representation by this futile subamendment and which is doing so much damage to his party—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): If you get any consolation out of that you are welcome to it.

—and for that reason to the country, and join with the Prime Minister in achieving another great step forward in our development as a nation.

I have not neglected to quote the last phrase, since it obviously is his own biased and prejudiced opinion. I might have done so, but I do not care to quote the minister out of context. I now refer to his argument. I take exception to his statement that the role of the opposition is negative, especially in this subamendment. That is not the case.

In support of this contention I quote the subamendment. It is positive, very positive. It is most definite. It makes concrete suggestions relative to the designs to be considered by the Canadian people in a plebiscite. It enumerates them, a, b, c and d, and it leaves room for more. For information and emphasis I quote the subamendment:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:

"and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:

1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?

2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?

3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?

4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

That is the subamendment referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as being negative. I ask this house and I ask you, sir, is that not positive? It includes the so-called Pearson flag as one design. It includes the red ensign. It includes a modified version of the ensign. It includes a one maple leaf design. What could be more positive? What could be more explicit? I draw the attention of the house to the use of the words, "among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following;" in other words the subamendment is not restricted to the four choices that are indicated. More may be added if in the opinion of the government there should be more. I would rather expect that there might be more designs which it would be considered advisable to submit to the Canadian people, and ask for an indication of their preference.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also referred to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that a more distinct and more prominent fleur-de-lis might be contained in a modified version of the ensign, and I quote his words as found at page 6960 of Hansard:

To the people of Quebec this suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition—and I have heard it echoed by a number of speakers on the other side, none of them French Canadians—must have appeared as a clumsy and gratuitous piece of appeasement; it must have appeared to my French Canadian friends as a bone thrown out to a troublesome minority to keep them quiet.

I resent the suggestion of the minister that this constitutes appeasement. It does nothing of the sort. It constitutes a recognition of the facts of history, history that has been recorded not for 100 years, 200 years or 300 years, but for 400 years. That is the recognition that this accords. The minister said that this is a question of appeasement. The only thing I am going to give him credit for is making a speech and stating his view. He is far ahead of most of his colleagues in that respect, because that is more than any other minister of the government, excluding the Prime Minister, has done in this debate.

What is the cause of this silence, which might properly be considered a filibuster of silence?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): There is one thing about this: They are listening to me a lot more attentively than they do to the hon. gentleman with his back to the wall over there. Is it because they cannot justify their position? Is it because they were not consulted? Is it because they are afraid of the next general election that they do not wish to have their views recorded on Hansard and then be obliged to face the people? Are they afraid to explain and justify their stand?

Those are the questions which they might properly answer, and if they disagree with these assertions let them get up and say so in this debate. Some of them are noted for their vocal ability, and some for very little else. Let us hear what they say and see how they look.

In a previous speech I referred to the fact that there was little if any record of any commitment by the government during the last election to bring in a distinctive flag. The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), himself a Liberal, has confirmed my assertion. No Liberal has disputed him, no Liberal has answered him. Therefore I submit that what they should have done, if they wanted to bring in a design different from the one we have been using, was to go back and see what there was by way of examination and investigation of this particular thing.

I find that in the years 1945 and 1946 a committee studied the whole question of a flag. We have men in this chamber who were sitting here when the debate on setting up that committee took place. We have men in this chamber who were members of the committee itself. We have men who were members when the committee reported. I have indulged in some research on the subject, and I am going to give the house the facts which have come to light in my examination.

First of all I want to give the names of the committee members, and I quote from page 256 of Hansard for March 26, 1946. The hon. members of that committee were:

Messrs. Beaudoin, Blanchette, Castleden, Emmerson, Gingues, Gladstone, Hackett, Hansell, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Herridge, LaCroix, Lafontaine, Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario), MacNicol, Martin, Matthews (Brandon), McCulloch (Pictou), McIvor, Reid, Smith (Calgary West), Stanfield, Stirling, Thatcher, Warren, Zaplitny.

Those were the members of the committee. And I should like to point out respectfully to the house, because it is of some interest, that there are two members of the present parliament who were members of that committee—the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). This brings me right to the question I was discussing two weeks ago when objection from certain Liberal members in a certain quarter of this house caused the Acting Speaker to rule I did not have unanimous consent to continue. I find that the hon. gentleman was a member of the 1945 committee, an extremely good reason for asking the Secretary of State for External Affairs why he has not given us the benefit of the information he must have secured as a member of the flag committee in those years. Why has he not been impelled to contribute to this debate and tell us about the findings of that committee? Why has he not given this house some idea of the points raised by the various people who appeared before that committee? I fail to comprehend his silence. Surely, he will speak up before this debate closes and tell the house the determining factors which led to the selection of a design for a national flag at that time. We shall await with interest the remarks of the hon. gentleman on this subject.

But we are fortunate in one respect. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) is a member of this parliament and he was a member of that committee in 1945-46. He has not been compelled to maintain silence, and he has not maintained silence. He has spoken in this debate, and hon. members will find his remarks recorded at the beginning of page 4888 of Hansard for Tuesday, June 30, 1964. The part of the speech to which I refer will be found beginning in the second paragraph of the second column at page 4890, and I can do no better than refer to those remarks. He stated that no single party which has placed a proposal in its program for a distinctive flag for Canada had ever defined what it meant by a distinctive flag. So far as I am concerned, we are using a distinctive national flag at the present time. It is the Canadian red ensign. I acknowledge that everyone does not agree with this proposition. The hon. member for Kootenay West suggested that this had added to the confusion and to the division which exists even within parties with regard to this matter. He suggested that the situation emphasized the need for adoption of unusual procedures so that the final result may be satisfactory to the people of Canada. There is nothing wrong with that. He then mentioned that he was a member of the committee whose job it was to bring in a design, and he proceeded to discuss other matters which I think are of great interest. He told us that the committee heard many people, including representatives of the college of heralds, or persons informed about the procedure of the college of heralds. He told us that after all those who appeared had been heard, the committee considered 2,700 designs submitted by various people. There was a great deal of interest in the question. Now I will pass on to the house the recommendations of the committee of that day:

That this committee recommend that the national flag of Canada should be the Canadian red ensign with a maple leaf in autumn golden colours in a bordered background of white replacing the coat of arms in the fly, the whole design to be so proportioned that the size and position of the maple leaf in relation to the union jack in the canton will identify it as a symbol distinctive of Canada as a nation.

That was the recommendation of this committee after the examination of 2,700 designs. Here was a committee, composed as I have stated, which brought in its decision by a virtually unanimous vote. To make this clear, I might tell hon. members that the committee reached this conclusion by a vote of 23 to 1. That, without question, constitutes virtual unanimity. At least, that is my considered opinion on the point. Among the members of that committee were representatives from all the provinces of Canada and from both founding races of this country. They were people whose background is similar to the backgrounds of many hon. members of this house today. They constituted a cross-section of the membership of the house at that time and I believe they can be considered, as far as their various interests were concerned, to reflect a cross-section of the parliament of today. I cannot understand why the recommendations of that committee were not implemented. That would have solved this question for all time.

Well, I suppose it might be said that 19 years have made a difference and that the reason which justified the committee's conclusions then do not exist now. I do not agree. I believe the reasons which brought about the conclusion in 1946 were present then and are present today. There is no reason why a flag based on the committee's recommendations should not be put forward as the flag of Canada. This is one of the recommendations of the subamendment.

I stress the need for permanency. It has been referred to by my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) this afternoon. We in this parliament surely do not want the recognition of a symbol which we think another government might discard. This selection would conform to the second choice mentioned in the subamendment. I would advance the idea that since this design was considered 18 years ago as being appropriate, surely it is appropriate now. Was it ever considered, I wonder? No one seems to know. It is a question we should like to have answered. Again I wonder why some ministers have not spoken. I wonder why the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) and the minister of northern affairs (Mr. Laing) who represent British Columbia, have not spoken. Will they get up in this house and say that British Columbia approves the so-called three leaf Pearson flag design?

Incidentally, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) was a member of this house in 1946 and I presume he had knowledge of the report of the committee at that time; I am unable to find any record of his disagreeing with the report. However, 18 years after, apparently he does not agree with it. I should like to have him explain to the house the reason for his change of mind and change of heart. There are other members here who were members of the house at that time, but they do not need to do any explaining. One is my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cardiff) who spoke, and spoke well, in this house a few days ago. He advocated the setting up of the committee 18 years ago and he was undoubtedly in favour of the report of the committee when presented. He still favours the adoption of the flag design which that committee recommended. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) was a member of the committee then. He undoubtedly supported the acceptance of the committee's report which brought in the recommendation to which I have referred. He too has spoken in this debate, expressing the same opinion as he held 18 or 19 years ago. That is not all. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was a member of the house at that time.

He undoubtedly favoured the design recommended by the committee. But he did more than that: He moved a second amendment to the motion to set up the committee at the outset, in which he proposed that they be instructed to include the union jack in a prominent place in the design of the flag recommended to parliament. The Speaker of the day ruled that amendment out of order. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we know that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has not changed his mind; he has no explanations to make.

A further examination of the record of the parliament of 1945-46 reveals the name of Mr. Benidickson, the man who I presume is my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. So apparently he has had a change of heart, because he is now against something which he supported 18 years ago. It would be interesting to have him get to his feet and explain the reasons for this. Then we have the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard). Presumably he favoured acceptance of the report also. As I said before, that included the design as given in the speech of the hon. member of Kootenay West, which I have just quoted. The hon. member for Ottawa East might properly explain his change of mind also. Last but not least we have the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has not participated in this debate. Rumour has it that he will be voting for the design of the Prime Minister, the government and the Liberal party. He voted for the setting up of the committee in 1945-46; he voted to accept the report of the committee. But now, according to rumour, he has changed his mind and is going to vote for the design submitted in the name of the Prime Minister. I wonder whether he would like to explain to the house why he has changed his mind, or does he wish to deny that he is going to vote for the Prime Minister's design, and declare that he will vote for the subamendment?

I do not wish to overlook many people, Mr. Speaker, so I should like to have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) take part in the debate. Since coming to this house I heard him at one time, when he was on this side of the chamber, declare unequivocally his preference for the flag which floats over the peace tower of this building. That was within the last four years. He has apparently changed his mind. It would be of interest to all hon. members if he were to give his reasons; and I am sure it would be of special interest to the premier of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Last, but certainly not least, there is the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh). Where does she stand? I am one of those who expect much from her. Surely changing the flag of a country is important enough that she should contribute to the debate and explain to the house and the people of this country her reasons for wanting it changed. Let us hear what these people are going to say, if anything.

Some time, Mr. Speaker—I will not say when—there will be a vote on this subamendment. It provides for a reference of the matter to the people of Canada and, as I stated previously, it leaves room for the inclusion of other designs. Let the people decide. That, surely, is non-contentious. What is wrong with that? If our hon. friends opposite think they are right, why do they not let the people decide? They say, "It is our duty to do it". Nothing could be further from the truth. In the apparent arrogant refusal of most members on the government side of the house to participate in this debate we see the ultimate in political irresponsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): The people of this country may not remember much of what we say there, but they will never forget that most hon. members opposite said nothing. A few days ago we listened with attention and respect to the speech of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). His speech placed emphasis on this particular point. Among other things, he said:

> We on this side have wondered how it is that so many people in Canada are staunchly entrenched behind the red ensign, a fact we did not expect, people who would otherwise have fondly and readily welcomed a new distinctive flag. It is because they are afraid, and have gathered under the ensign in fear and apprehension of one thing—the division of this nation. They fear the division and separatism about which they have heard.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York East expresses as a fact that they fear and apprehend a division of the nation. I say that the hon. member has brought to the attention of this house a most important point and one that deserves a tremendous amount of thought and consideration by every responsible member, because it suggests in its language that when people are fearful and apprehensive about their nation, and subsequently about themselves, their families and the future of their families, they seek comfort and protection in something that has come down through the years, because it is one of those things they need in the circumstances I have just described.

So what do they do? They reach for the red ensign. Those are the words of the hon. member for York East and they are also my sentiments, Mr. Speaker. I emphasize that they are the words that hon. member uttered in this chamber, because he said that when people fear something and are afraid the country will be divided, they reach for the red ensign—which means something to them and is an emblem that has come down through the years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): And Mr. Speaker, this is the symbol this government proposes to scrap, discard, and destroy. Yet the hon. member for York East very properly points out that in his opinion the symbol for which people reach is the red ensign. Where could you find a better, more potent argument for the retention of the red ensign and the things for which it stands? It has been many times tried, never denied, and willing to be tried again.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member deserves the commendation of this house for the point he has brought out and the opinion he has expressed concerning the unity of the nation, even though I find it difficult to believe in his conclusion, which was that he would support the government sponsored design. Yet I recognize his concern for national unity and express my own similar concern. Where we differ to a tremendous extent is with regard to the means we think are necessary to bring about that unity.

So we have the union jack as one of the symbols with regard to which we seek authority to vote, and I do not need to emphasize its significance.

It is the emblem of liberty, truth and justice. Who is there here willing to do away with his rights to justice as a citizen of this country? No one. Liberty and truth are also important words in the lives of each and every one of us.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on but my time is nearly up. My last words in these few remarks are simply these. It seems to me that this question may and can be solved if only it is approached in a proper state of mind and with a proper attitude. Let us forget what constitutes a political advantage of a temporary nature and remember that the eyes of Canada are on what this parliament does in connection with this most important matter. If we have a few days on other business and then return, this might be a proper course to consider. But in my concluding remarks I deny once more the urgency of the matter. This matter is not urgent. It would be much better to resolve it in a proper way, so that this nation will go forward united, in the years to come, than to tell us that we must resolve it in a week or two and in the wrong way. Those, Mr. Speaker, are my concluding remarks.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to take part in this debate, may I say that, like the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) I too spoke on July 3 and at that time expressed my personal views on this resolution. However I feel it would be proper that I put on record the views and opinions of many of the people who have written me in regard to this subject.

Before commencing to put these views on record I would again emphasize that the statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on behalf of the government, that the reason the government are trying to expedite this issue is because of an election promise is ridiculous. It only proves once more the inefficiency of the government in planning and preparing legislation. In this way they are trying to conceal their inability and inefficiency. To prove that the Prime Minister said the reason for this issue being brought up at this time is that it was an election promise. I should like to refer back to last August 25, when a question was asked of the Postmaster General with regard to a statement attributed to the minister of northern affairs in the last election campaign. The Postmaster General replied that these statements were just election promises and did not carry any authenticity—in other words, that they would not hold any water. I might add that this promise was only made in chosen spots in Canada.

[Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).]

For no other reason than to persuade the government to turn down the resolution, I would invite them to visit the city of Peterborough. In front of the J. J. Turner works, manufacturers of flags, there are three flags, the union jack, the red ensign and the proposed maple leaf flag. These flags were mounted at the same time, and I would invite any hon. member of this house or any citizen to go to Peterborough and observe the three flags flying there today. Sir, the new proposed flag is a filthy, dirty brownish colour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Webb: Hon. members can say "oh, oh", but if they are interested they can drive down to Peterborough, where they can see it for themselves. The other flags have retained their beauty.

Mr. Moreau: Made by another manufacturer.

Mr. Webb: I should like to refer to a statement by the Rev. Gordon Smyth in a sermon delivered in the Parkdale United Church in Ottawa. He said:

> It is impossible to cut symbolism out of the affairs of men and nations; the roots go too deep. If a man were to resolve never to use a symbol again he could not shake hands with a friend, put a ring on the finger of his bride, kiss his child or take the sacrament. Human nature requires symbols. The heart craves after some tangible expression of the intangible. The mind is ill at ease until it casts into a material form something of the mysterious emotions of the soul.

May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned at the dinner hour I was endeavouring to put on record the views of many Canadians from all walks of life who have written to me. However, during the supper hour I could not help thinking how grateful and appreciative many members on the opposite side of the house are, or should be, to this party for taking the stand that we have not or will not let the Prime Minister or government railroad or bulldoze this legislation through.

Having known personally many of the members on the opposite side of the house I am aware of some of their views and opinions. Sir, many of them are of the same opinion as we are on this side. However, Mr. Speaker, those members have been lucky. They are not muzzled because they are vicious, but because the front benchers know of their views and what the outcome would be if they expressed themselves. They know that the outcome would be detrimental to the government. Time and time again our members have requested members opposite to speak on this resolution.

Mr. Habel: Oh, oh.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says "oh". I would class him in the same category as that hon. member who announced today in Montreal that he is not going to attend the House of Commons again, but will boycott it until such time as the flag resolution is passed.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would not like the hon. member to classify me in any way, except as a real Canadian who wants to have a flag as soon as possible.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I was classifying the hon. member with one of the members of his party who made a statement in Montreal today. I am glad to hear the hon. member say that he is a real Canadian. We are all looking forward to hearing his speech on this issue.

Mr. Habel: You have asked me a question and I will answer it right away.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer again to the hon. member who made a statement in Montreal today, and suggest that he is neglecting his duty, which is to be in attendance in this house to present his views on the flag issue rather than to make statements to the press to the effect he is going to stay home and boycott the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, you will remember the embarrassing position in which many members were placed when this resolution was introduced. I well remember the week end that members were instructed to scurry back to their ridings and attempt to pacify their constituents. I also remember when they returned to this house they did so with their tails between their legs, because the constituents had told them what they thought. Since that time they have been embarrassed.

Mr. Moreau: I know where you come from.

Mr. Webb: The hon. member is making his usual contribution to this house.

Mr. Habel: I can make a better contribution than that, which you will be able to understand.

An hon. Member: Give them hell, Moe.

Mr. Knowles: Is this one of those high level debates?

Mr. Webb: The hon. member says he knows where I come from, Mr. Speaker. God only knows that there is no one any more proud of his heritage than I, and that is something the hon. member cannot say.

Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was quoting from a statement by the Rev. Gordon Smyth. I should now like to carry on with that statement, which reads as follows:

> Why, then, is the issue of our national symbols so explosive? Because it has not been set in the context of the significance of religion, alike in history and modern life. The fundamental importance of religion in the development of the human race may be more clearly recognized if we consider certain possible divergences from history... Let us suppose that Christianity had remained a racial sect. Let us suppose that Charles Martel had failed against the Mohammedans at the Battle of the Pyrenees. Let us suppose that French missionaries had not shared the lot of settlers along the shores of the St. Lawrence. Let us suppose that saddle-bag ministers of the gospel had not helped to bring law and order, education and courage to English speaking Upper Canada. Let us suppose that the Fathers of Confederation had brought to their conferences only shrewd, practical, bargaining points, with no spirit touched by common allegiance to the founder of Christianity...
> And yet Canadians cannot afford to be either smug or complacent. Too many spurn the lessons of the past. Too many echo the pernicious sentiment that "whatever is, is right." Too many fail to realize that to believe in "the easy buck" or "the mood of the voters" is a disastrous philosophy which, in the long run, catches up with them. Too many are unable to accept the facts of history because, unlike citizens of other nations, they no longer know those facts.
>
> Such a statement from a child just may be understandable. But what of a deputy minister of citizenship and immigration who recently referred me to his office since he was not sure what Victoria day is called nowadays?
>
> All this has a bearing on the explosive issue of national symbols. It would appear that anything goes, provided it goes. That is just a point. Anything just does not go from the long term point of view. The Americans learned this the hard way in the civil war over the federal power versus state rights 100 years ago. Shades of trends in Canada. Latterly I have been discussing the matter with numerous English speaking members of parliament.

I would commend this to many members opposite.

> They are practically of one accord. They are frustrated. They are pessimistic. They privately resent the fact that while French Canadians vigorously assert their right to symbols of their own, they would seemingly deny a similar right to meaningful symbols for the nation as a whole by seeking to rub the federal slate clean of 'the British connection'. They keenly resent all this privately and yet most of them publicly proclaim "peace, peace" when actually there is less and less peace. "The voice of English Canada is silent", they say sadly. They fail to add that this includes their own voices. This is not healthy. It is the symptom of a dread disease.

This is a major lesson out of the past. The past! Permit me to quote from a statement by Dr. Eugene Forsey who requires no introduction to people acquainted with public affairs. Exclaims Dr. Forsey:

"This government is firmly committed to the basically bicultural character of our country, yet it proposes a flag which contains not the slightest reference to any culture whatever, even agriculture. If the country is basically bicultural, then the flag should be basically bicultural too. Everything human, every vestige of our history, everything distinctively Canadian, except a piece of vegetation, has been carefully excluded."

Of course, it is realized that Canadians have carried the insignia of the maple leaf on their uniforms in time of war. However, this has been played up out of all proportion. The Royal Canadian Legion knows this. What segment of the population is in a better position to know? What segment deserves as much respect? Those whom we call veterans wore the maple leaf but they did not follow the maple leaf into battle. They followed ideals symbolized by the union jack and the Canadian red ensign. I have a notion that if they have gone on record as favouring the parliamentary definition of the ensign as the national flag this is not to rub the noses of French Canadians in the victory of General James Wolfe on the plains of Abraham but rather to affirm those precious elements in both cultures which we have in common.

What is the common denominator? Not something taken from nature, but from human nature. Not just maple leaves from trees found on this continent outside of Canada as well as inside our borders, but a human, living symbol unique in our particular part of the western hemisphere. I refer to the monarchy. I have in mind the crown. I have in mind that crown which Sir Georges Etienne Cartier extolled as the protector of the rights of French Canadians and which Sir Wilfrid Laurier extolled time and again. Are there English Canadians who feel that this symbol is outmoded? Are there French Canadians who feel that this symbol is merely an Anglo-Saxon emblem of superiority?

I do not doubt it. Unfortunately it would appear so. I have even been told by a parliamentary expert in heraldry that a crown above the cluster of maple leaves on the proposed flag would not be suitable from the heraldic standpoint. This expert stated that by the same standard the stars and stripes would fail to get a pass mark. Tell that to the average American! Moreover, the broadcast indication that a special banner may be prepared, with the union jack and the crown for commonwealth occasions, is little more than a sop. It would wither on the public vine if even given a chance to grow in the first place. Look at what has happened to the 24th of May. This used to be regarded as empire day. It should have evolved into commonwealth day. However, what is it now? I have already indicated that a deputy minister of citizenship and immigration had to refer me to his office and to the list of statutory holidays to find out what the occasion was. At any rate, it certainly is not commonwealth day.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not empire day either, and never was.

Mr. Webb: You had a request this afternoon to make a speech, so your turn is coming.

Never was there a juncture in national affairs like the present crisis to spark a grasp of what the Right Hon. Vincent Massey said out of his far flung knowledge of this land in the capacity of governor general. In his book entitled "On Being Canadian" Mr. Massey has written: "The supreme contribution to the cause of our unity is made by the crown. Nothing else with us stands above all controversy, represents equally all the elements which make up the state and preserves the vital factor of continuity in our national life." The wisdom of these words should be superimposed above the popularity of maple leaves on our proposed national flag. The alternative is even greater division. The omission of this symbol will result in the sort of natural protest and feeling of injustice in many parts of Canada which many in Quebec still manifest toward a certain political party over the conscription issue of 1917.

May I say in passing that at lunch hour a gentleman spoke to me who had just returned last evening from a tour through Quebec. He said he had seen as many red ensigns flying in Quebec as any other flag and I say, thank God for that.

The omission of this symbol will cause the Canadian red ensign to continue to be flown over the legislative buildings and institutions of a majority of the provinces from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

It is with this prediction, this warning, in mind that I quote from the Kingston Whig-Standard. The Whig-Standard can hardly be branded as either a Progressive Conservative or socialist newspaper. The fact of the matter is that its president, Hon. W. Rupert Davies, is a Liberal senator in the upper house. A recent editorial in that newspaper dealt in no uncertain terms with the flag issue. This editorial was bluntly captioned, "Sold Out!" It said in part, as follows: "There is one thing sure: Nobody is forced to recognize a flag or symbol and this new, synthetic product will be refused recognition by many millions of Canadians. Mr. Pearson has issued a challenge to Canadians. He is betting on the weakness of parliament to sustain him in his decision to sell us out. This is a bitter day for Canada."

What an indictment! May it be reversed by a strong parliament fearless of the shocking threat of an election held over its head. May parliament remember that at the time of the coronation Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent explained why Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II of Canada was officially acclaimed on capital hill as defender of the faith in these words: "Because this is a Christian country."

May parliament recall the vision of Hon. George Brown, a Father of Confederation and a prophetic Grit, which he referred to in these famous words: "Our scheme is to establish a government that will endeavour to maintain liberty, and justice, and Christianity throughout the land."

Not long ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) had a letter printed in many papers across Canada. I would like to read one of the replies to his letter:

Sir: As a very ordinary and old Canadian, may I reply to John R. Matheson, M.P. for Leeds, in your columns.

Though I was not born in the U.K. or Canada, I have Canadian citizenship papers; and, along with over 43,000 Canadian volunteers, I saw active service, against the Kaiser in France and at sea, and against Hitler, in France and other countries and at sea...

Seemingly the Liberal spokesmen are trying, by half truths, to justify a complete break with the founders of the Canadian nation...

Surely this repudiation of the past is also breaking the fifth commandment: "Honour thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God has given thee."

Here is another editorial headed:

Our Lord was sold for 30 pieces of silver: our flag—the emblem of our relationship to Him—for 75 Quebec votes.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Webb:

Thus one more symbol of our Christian and British heritage—

I am not ashamed.

Mr. Habel: You should be.

Mr. Webb: If you want to see who should be ashamed, take a look in the mirror.

Thus one more symbol of our Christian and British heritage is being taken from us. Will the throne be next?

To millions of Canadians the union jack is a symbol of everything worth while in life. In it our history, our traditions, and all our hopes for the future are enshrined and, in it, too, are embodied all those intangible things of the spirit which are more precious than life itself. Of even more importance, is the fact that it is the true banner of the cross—the emblem of Jesus, the Christ, our Savior and Lord who died on the cross, for us.

Now, for party advantage and by political chicanery, this sacred symbol is to be taken from us. This is a grievous wrong which will bring sorrow and heartbreak to millions.

The result of this action may not be long in coming.

An hon. Member: You are a good reader.

Mr. Webb: I would rather read than have unreliable words spout from my mouth all the time.

Few nations, and certainly not Canada, can survive such a drastic break with its past. The resentment against Quebec is deep and bitter and steadily mounting.

Even more serious is the fact that, in rejecting the union jack, we are rejecting the symbol of that special relationship to God given to nations which officially acknowledge Him by using His Cross as their emblem. Further, in a world of turmoil and aggression, we lose the protection which that relationship provides.

The three crosses, as arranged on the union jack, form the first and the last letters of the ancient Hebrew alphabet (Sinai script). As such, they correspond to Alpha and Omega which is the name of God as it appears in the book of the revelation. Thus, in ancient Hebrew letters, the union jack is the monogram or name of God. Any nation having that name is safe from invasion or destruction under God's promise "No weapon that is turned against thee shall prosper."

Thus, by rejecting the union jack we are not only repudiating that special relationship to God which is our birthright, but are taking ourselves out from under the protection of His name into the appalling dangers of the coming Armageddon.

Only Satan can gain anything from such incredible folly.

Mr. Orlikow: Who is the author of that?

Mr. Webb: The Toronto district branch of the Canadian British-Israel association.

Mr. Fisher: Your friends, Bert.

Mr. Webb: I only wish hon. members opposite were as concerned about the future of their country as are the authors of these articles.

An hon. Member: You are more concerned about Great Britain than Canada.

Mr. Webb: Here is a letter from another gentleman, Mr. Aylsworth, who wrote to the Prime Minister as follows:

I earnestly desire to retain the red ensign as the official flag of Canada....It is conceivable to me that those who wish to remove the union jack from the flag of Canada also wish to secede from the commonwealth. I am opposed to any institution or ideology operating within the commonwealth which is unfriendly to the commonwealth as a whole.

Here is another by Mr. Hughes:

Keeping the jack in Canada's flag is definitely our job, our obligation. As a first world war veteran, I prefer the red ensign, but will settle for the jack and one maple leaf.

Here is a petition signed by a family in Tamworth:

The three maple leaves has no meaning to the Canadian people.

Mr. Deschatelets: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prevent the hon. member reading these letters but under the rules he should provide us with the names of the people who sent them, and also the addresses.

Mr. Webb: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I thought I had.

Mr. Deschatelets: You said a family.

Mr. Webb: The Lockhead family in Tamworth, Ontario.

An hon. Member: What about Mr. Hughes?

Mr. Webb: Of Verona, Ontario.

The three maple leaves has no meaning to the Canadian people. It is a flag we feel the Canadian people will never accept. Let the people have a vote and speak for themselves. ...We want to see a united Canada.

Mr. R. A. Dean of Norwood, Ontario wrote:

For the life of me, I cannot even imagine changing the red ensign...It is rather sickening to think that sane people should be compelled to even consider something so blank in its entirety.

Mr. William Young of Tamworth wrote:

Regardless of what the government brings out as Canada's new flag, I still will recognize but one flag, and that is the red ensign. ...

Mr. Stanley Ball of Verona wrote:

It is our opinion there should be a plebiscite at the next election in order to give the people a chance to express their wishes on the flag question.

Mrs. A. Wilkes of Denbigh wrote:

I am a mother who lost her son in world war II and had four boys who served in the war. I would like to say I do hope you try very hard to retain the red ensign as our flag. Everyone with whom I have talked say they don't want the flag changed. Who wants three maple leaves? It looks like something made in Japan. If the red ensign was good enough for our forefathers and for the thousands who fought and died in two world wars it's still good enough to fly over Canada.

Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Potts of Stirling wrote:

I protest vehemently the idea that a few ambitious representatives of Canada's millions can speak for me on the flag issue. I protest that even a majority vote will change my flag and I loathe the situation whereby political expediency can dare to challenge our historical standard. I am not pro-British, anti-Quebec nor have I an axe to grind. I am a Canadian of mongrel blood perhaps, but if you can take my personal tax cheque, if you can take my son to fight for you, if you can name the ways I may forfeit my freedom for breaking the laws of the country, you can damned well listen to my opinion. Can anyone be asinine enough to believe that we Canadians are so limp that we will accept the silly little school-girl pennant as our flag? This pennant will never be my flag, Mr. Webb. Multiply me by hundreds of thousands and tell your cohorts to look to their jobs.

Here is another letter from John Starke of Norwood:

The red ensign is the flag we have loved and used for many long years and I hope we will for many more.

It is heartening to note that the representation we are receiving from our people in favour of our stand for the red ensign is increasing daily. Speaking as one who represents these voters in this house, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we will speak many more times on the subject if we have to.

Finally, I wish to quote part of a letter I have just received from Mr. J. Edward Armand of Picton, Ontario:

The reason I know the cross-sectional ferment among the people over the flag, and the disgust and discouragement with parliament, guilty or innocent, is because my professional income must be supplemented by wide commercial travel.

Not long ago, when this flag issue was introduced, one of the members opposite came into the house wearing a large flag on his garment displaying the Prime Minister's proposed flag on a plastic or metal pin. It is interesting to find out that when this same member goes back to his riding, the flag disappears. I ask hon. members: What kind of attitude is this?

In closing, may I say we know that the Prime Minister has been misled. We realize that he has been misled by some of his advisers; but it is not too late for him to change his ways. Responsibility for this debate rests with the other side of the house. All they have to do, over there, is withdraw their resolution and the debate will be at an end. One more retraction would not mean anything to this government, because already the government will go down in history as the donkey government; they have taken more steps backward than forward. Their sole objective since they came to power has been to create one carrot after another to hold in front of the voters. Like the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) I intend to vote in favour of a plebiscite which would enable the Canadian people to decide this issue. I think it would be only right and proper that all the ballots should be sent to a headquarters either here in Ottawa or in some designated city. If this were done, no one would know how anyone in a certain section of the country had voted, or how the majority of votes had gone in a particular area. We do not want to know how people in a particular part of the country voted. We want to know how Canadians as a whole voted. We want a united Canada, and that is what we are fighting for.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): It had not been my intention to take part in this debate, but I think the house will be interested in a few observations at this point from one who takes an objective view of contentious issues.

I have just returned from a ten day visit to my constituency where I had the opportunity to meet a good number of my constituents. I am always interested in finding out what the average person is thinking in relation to what is happening in parliament. I have discussed this flag issue with a good many people. I must say that my conversations clearly indicated that the soundest way in which to settle this matter would be by means of a plebiscite.

I wanted to find out how public opinion was reflected in other ways, so I went into a number of stores and asked: Are you selling the Prime Minister's flag? And on every occasion they said: What do you think; do you think I want to go bankrupt? I cannot find this design being sold anywhere. That is the situation as I found it in my constituency.

I returned to Ottawa during the latter part of last week and I must say I was somewhat surprised, after a little investigation, to find a situation existing here in Ottawa which further confirmed the opinion I have expressed previously in this debate, that the only fair way to settle this matter was through a national plebiscite. I suggest that such a plebiscite could be held at the time of the next general election at which point persons would have an opportunity to express their opinions on this matter. I suggest that if it were put to them at such a plebiscite the great majority of the Canadian people would willingly accept the decision. We are all democrats, although at times when I look across the other side of the house I have my doubts.

Some two months ago, when this flag was first introduced and the model first flown on parliament hill and on the flagstaff of the Prime Minister's residence, naturally there were persons who were interested in purchasing flags and selling them. At that time, the sale price in Ottawa was $1. That was the general price. I went and inquired of the joke shop on Bank street, which was selling quite a few. Now that the debate has gone on for some while, and people have had an opportunity to think this matter over, what has happened? Since my return, I have inquired how the flags are selling and I find that the price had dropped to 79 cents. Then, later they dropped to 59 cents. At the conclusion of the exhibition, I found that a gentleman who had a store there was trying to get rid of them for 19 cents. Mr. Speaker, I think this clearly indicates a growing lack of interest in the flag proposed by the Prime Minister even in the capital city.

I respect anyone's point of view, but I say this is a good indication of the necessity for giving the Canadian people the opportunity to express opinions on this matter. After all, in the capital city a great deal has been done to support the Prime Minister's flag. I believe he has had the support of a good many individuals in more or less indirect ways. I think persons prominent in the government have done what they could to arouse interest in this flag. But now we find that the price has dropped from $1 to 19 cents. I have always found from experience that when an article begins to drop in price it is because there is no demand for it. That is just what is happening at the present time.

That is all I wish to bring to the attention of the house. This is concrete and conclusive evidence that support for the Prime Minister's flag is dropping rapidly, even in the capital city of Ottawa. On this account I would urge the right hon. gentleman to accept the proposal put forward by the opposition, that a national plebiscite be held so that the Canadian people may themselves decide this important issue which goes beyond the realm of economics and beyond the realm of legislation of other types; it strikes to the roots of the people's loyalties and sentiments. The Canadian people should be given the opportunity to decide for themselves the Canadian flag they wish to have in the years ahead.

Mr. J. E. Madill (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate at the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) I make no apology. Had the flag been an election issue and a plank in the Liberal platform during the election of 1963, whereby the people of Canada could have expressed their views, I would have taken a different viewpoint. Since it was not, except, as one would surmise, that possibly a different front was presented to our French speaking Canadians in Quebec than was presented to the other nine provinces in Canada, I feel it my duty to speak on behalf of the constituents of my riding and express their views and ardent desire to maintain the red ensign.

The introduction of the amendment and subamendment are the only possible opportunities accorded members to voice their opinions. I have a letter sent by the dean of Mount Royal College, Calgary, Alberta, to the hon. member for London (Mr. Irvine), and I am going to read a short excerpt from it:

> While I was in New York this summer, I was asked to address a group on "Education in Canada". In order to refresh my memory I went down to the Canadian consul's office at 680 Fifth avenue, (9th floor, I believe) for a bit of information. They gave me an envelope which they call a teacher's kit. This contains a large political map of Canada; speeches of prominent Canadians, (e.g. Lester Pearson, Paul Martin, Paul Hellyer, Walter Gordon);—

I do not see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) listed here:

—a booklet, summarizing the geography, climate, etc., of Canada; and a thicker booklet giving all sorts of facts about the country; and a Canadian flag (enclosed). It is to be noted that this is described as "distinctive of Canada".

The brochure enclosed with the letter is entitled "The Canadian Red Ensign" and it says:

The flag now used as distinctive of Canada is properly described as the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly. The flag consists of a red field, with the union jack in the first quarter, next to the staff. The inclusion of the union jack signifies Canada's association with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations. The coat of arms bears the emblems of the four countries from which the original settlers of Canada were chiefly drawn—the three lions of England, the lilies of France, the lion rampant of Scotland and the harp of Ireland—together with a branch carrying three maple leaves, the special emblem of Canada.

The Canadian red ensign may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government within or without Canada.

It is also appropriate for the Canadian ensign to be flown within or without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

It is indication enough, when this kind of brochure is put out in the United States, that this government did think the red ensign was a distinctive Canadian flag. I have received all kinds of petitions, copies of which have been sent to the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne). They are addressed to the Secretary of State of Canada and are headed:

We the undersigned respectfully request the Canadian red ensign, which has been authorized by four governments of Canada during the past 70 years by order in council P.C. 5888 and signed by the Governor General on September 5, 1945, be retained as the flag of Canada.

It is very interesting to look over the names that appear on the petitions. Evidence that this was not an election promise in my riding during the last election campaign is clearly indicated by a signature here of one of the nominees at the Liberal convention, and another name is that of one of the Liberal organizers in my area. There are also a good many other names which indicate that these people did not expect this issue to be initiated by the government.

The announcement—or, I should say, the political speech—made by the Prime Minister at the dominion Legion convention at Winnipeg was very ill advised and controversial, being given in the memorial ritual opening ceremonies. I happened to be in Winnipeg for that convention and my personal feeling was that he was very ill advised to make a political speech and try to choke the Legion members with the new proposed flag. Had it been debated on the floor of the convention the legionnaires would have taken a much different attitude. One thing this government has failed to recognize, I would say, being a veteran myself, is that 70 per cent of the supporters of this government are legionnaires; and not only that, but the armed services are pretty strong supporters of the government. It is very surprising to me that they would consider killing the hen that laid the golden egg.

I have many telegrams here. To mention only a few, there is one from C. C. Sparling, the dominion president of the Legion. This telegram reads:

The Royal Canadian Legion at its 20th biennial convention in Winnipeg overwhelmingly endorses the Canadian red ensign and asks your unqualified support of its stand.

I also have a telegram from the outgoing provincial president of the Ontario command of the Legion, which reads:

Dominion convention Royal Canadian Legion Winnipeg May 21st approved Canadian red ensign as Legion's official flag to be flown over all Legion branches and commands now and in future. Ontario command 525 branches and 86,000 members request your consideration in support of Canadian red ensign at time of vote in parliament on flag question.

That is signed by A. H. Adams, president, Ontario command, Royal Canadian Legion.

I also have a telegram from the zone commander in my own district, J. H. Hackett, which reads:

Zone II wishes your support in maintaining red ensign.

I also have a letter from practically every branch in the riding of the ladies auxiliary and the Canadian corps, all asking for support of the red ensign. I have letters from the women's auxiliaries, the I.O.D.E., the Canadian-British Israel association of Ontario, and women's institutes. This represents a large voice of the people of Canada, and their feeling is that the Canadian red ensign should be maintained.

I should like to quote a letter from a nationally known figure, a veteran of the last war and a man who has done a great deal for crippled children in Canada. I am sure he is known by all hon. members. I refer to Conn Smythe of Toronto. He says:

The enclosed article is both interesting and informative.

The article to which he refers is entitled "Symbol of Unity" and is taken from the Veterans Advocate of August, 1963. The letter continues:

The red ensign has been authorized as our flag by four governments of Canada during the past 70 years, the latest being by order in council (P.C. 5888) September 5, 1945.

The statement that our flag is not distinctive is, to say the least, erroneous. There can be no doubt in the minds of the Cypriots, Greeks and Turks, when they see the Van Doos and the red ensign, as to where these troops come from.

In the Olympic games the whole world is represented and when Canada sometimes wins a gold medal everybody knows, when the red ensign is raised to the masthead, that Canada has won a world's championship.

With the continued world-wide success of Canada as a country, and the extraordinary individual feats of Canadians under this flag, it might not be amiss to wonder who or what is behind this movement to haul down our flag. We should be on our guard that we as Canadians are not being led up the garden path.

I will read part of this statement entitled "Symbol of Unity", but may I first mention the editor's footnote. The article is by Brigadier Ian S. Johnston, C.B.E., D.S.O., E.D.; chevalier, legion of honour; croix de guerre, and the footnote is: "Here is the most mature and thoughtful presentation on a Canadian flag which has appeared during the prolonged, needless controversy. It is worth reading no matter what personal views you hold". This statement reads, in part:

Canada now has 19 million people, but over two million of them are not native born. It means a serious leavening problem for the assimilation is complicated by our growing pains, but Canada is in fact a country with an honourable past where the problems of religious and racial differences have already been resolved. Canadians have developed a greater tolerance than we perhaps ourselves realize.

Few factors could be more effective in fostering and enhancing this than a thoughtful appraisal of the elements embodied in the Canadian ensign, which has played the role of our official Canadian flag since before the Kaiser war.

When its design is examined dispassionately without prejudice or unreasoned emotion, it can be seen that every desire of our multiple religious, racial and cultural backgrounds is answered.

If we aspire to religious and racial tolerance and the attainment of our national objective by negotiation, while maintaining loyalty to ideals rather than narrow nationalism, then our Canadian ensign represents us in a manner that no simple combination of colours or numbers could do.

A flag with great depth of meaning capable of representing our complex idealism, it also represents our varied traditions and cultures, but single aspiration of the Canadian people as a whole, in a manner which a new design could not possibly match.

By understanding the ensign through a study of the elements in the flag, we may better understand ourselves, and will see that all of us proclaim it as our symbol of unity, the ideal flag for a country like ours....

A flag should be emblematic of its people, and this is clearly achieved....

Why is this group of devices called an "ensign" rather than a flag? A flag is a piece of cloth used for signalling or other purposes such as denoting danger, surrender, pestilence or all clear. An ensign may be a flag or other device, but it has the special function of denoting identity and is a rallying point. In our case it is interesting to note that the word is derived through the French word "enseigne".

The very complexity of our flag is a virtue. It represents ideals, and ideals are not simple matters. Here is a flag that has wealth of meaning and inspiration for each one of us according to our bent. A true student of heraldry can discover in it far more than is suggested above.

The people who own to this flag are the independant sons of the partnership of great peoples. The religious and racial tolerances we represent were achieved only at great cost.

While we negotiate, we do so only with honour and remain loyal to the death to our ideals. If civilization is to survive Canada must cherish her spirit of brotherhood, and lead the way against narrow nationalism.

Twice, without hesitation, our young men have fought under this flag and given their lives for the righteous cause against narrow nationalism.

Our interest is the common good, the brotherhood of man—a modern concept to be achieved only in a country held in reserve by the Creator for just such a people.

This is what we are—that is what our ensign proclaims us to be.

I should now like to place on record a clipping from the Victoria Daily Colonist dated August 8, 1964. It is entitled "Feet of Clay".

Mr. Pickersgill: You have already read that page.

Mr. Madill: You probably would not know the difference anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor would you.

Mr. Madill: This article reads:

The Commons summer recess has gone the way that seems to afflict Victoria's summer weather; there won't be any. Having got its interim supply bill through at last, and for three months instead of two, parliament will sit well into the fall.

The assumption is that the Commons will then recess and prepare for a new session. That is, once Mr. Pearson has rammed his new flag into the statute books. He acts like a schoolmaster who won't let his form go home until it bows to his wishes.

In the present impasse that hamstrings parliament and sees it sitting through the hot months of an eastern summer the prime Minister displays the petulance so often associated with persons of weak character. He seems to imagine that a show of authority is an indication of strength, even when a diplomatic way out of the dilemma is offered him.

Where does the blame for the present parliamentary stalemate lie? Solely in Mr. Pearson's obduracy over the flag issue. This is the core that keeps parliament sitting and the normal business of the country held back from speedy progression.

This has been evident ever since he introduced the flag resolution. To begin with he held the threat of an election over M.P.'s heads, did they fail to pass the flag measure, which was tantamount to holding a gun at their heads and depriving them of unbiased decision.

In fact, the long sitting hours are just another indication of the same thing.

He refused a free vote on the subject. While blaming Mr. Diefenbaker for non-compliance he has now prevented the compromise suggestion that would delay the contentious flag bill to a fall session by insisting on an unacceptable time limit to its debate.

It is not obstructionism on the part of Mr. Diefenbaker that is at fault but the Prime Minister's insistence on having his own way.

Mr. Pearson says he is not prepared to call an election on any of the current issues facing parliament, the flag of course being the main one. Is he afraid of the result? This would probably be the quickest and most salutary solution to a parliamentary stalemate that grows worse with each passing day.

The country has been told that an election would split it and create national disunity. The lack of unity presently so evident in relation to Quebec dissidence and to the question of a new flag could not be greater. An election in fact would clear the air by either giving Mr. Pearson a majority mandate, and thus enabling national acceptance of his policies, the flag included, or rejecting his regime in toto.

But Mr. Pearson is bent on following his own stubborn course, although one wonders how much longer the smaller opposition groups can abide such intractability and the debilitating and unsatisfactory situation thus forced on parliament. The former U.N. diplomat of high repute certainly reveals his feet of clay. Stubbornship is no substitute for statesmanship.

This is a democratic country and the only way it can continue to be democratic is by our exercising our freedom of speech in this house. I hear the word "filibuster" used continually lately, but I think it dates back quite a bit to before the commencement of the flag debate. I have a little item here contributed by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Beer) and which appeared in the Orangeville Banner. I see he is in the house so perhaps he will not mind if I give him a little publicity. The article is headed: "Peel representative explains filibuster", and I will only put on record a short extract:

Flaws in Canada's parliamentary system came to light early last week when one opposition party proved it could bring parliament to a standstill. In an obvious move to delay debate on the flag issue, it entered into a speech making marathon on the type of business that does not call for a vote on specific issues: interim supply.

I could not help but notice that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) made his speech it reeked of the word "filibuster".

Mr. Speaker, at a time just before we normally would have taken Easter recess, simply because the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) stood for his rights in this house and objected to a bill involving $140 million being passed without debate, three of our hon. friends to the left in the New Democratic party spoke continuously. I do not know why that was not classed as a filibuster. In fact, I noticed in the next week some of those hon. members were absent.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Would he explain to the house why the Conservatives are speaking at a time when we are waiting to settle two Conservative amendments?

Mr. Madill: For one reason, we are waiting to hear your speeches. If you were listening to my earlier remarks you would have heard me say that we are speaking at the invitation of the Prime Minister.

Getting back to the subamendment, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a portion of an article written by Charles Lynch which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on August 22. You probably will not want to hear this either, but Mr. Lynch states:

The red ensign is now stronger than ever.

If not above the battle, it at least flew over the battlefield—and its position seems considerably stronger at summer's end than it was at the beginning.

Mr. Pearson is ready to throw the design of a new flag back into committee—a far cry from hopes that it could be flying by July 1, or for the royal visit in October.

The only thing that has happened to the ensign during the summer, apart from the fact that its sales have boomed, is that the government is reportedly ready to substitute it for the union jack as the symbol of Queen and commonwealth, with perhaps a crown substituted for the coat of arms in the fly.

Say what you like about the Tory filibuster led by Mr. Diefenbaker, it has taken its toll of the government's position on the three-leaf flag, as is evident by Mr. Pearson's willingness to compromise.

In terms of the House of Commons, it has been an effective political manoeuvre.

Whether it has been as effective in terms of the country remains to be seen.

The filibuster was aimed at the three-leaf flag, and the three-leaf flag is in trouble.

Mr. Speaker, had the flag been sent to a committee at the beginning and a free vote given to hon. members I am reasonably sure the flag debate would have been concluded. This is another occasion of the cart being placed before the horse or, shall I say, another case of trial and error.

The hon. member for London (Mr. Irvine) offered constructive criticism the other day, and I think he made a worth-while contribution when he suggested that a committee should select several flags and present them to the country for a choice, and that no government would stand or fall on this issue. This flag issue is now beyond the depths of understanding of a great number of people, and we would not want this type of debate to take place every time a controversial issue is raised. We certainly would not want this type of debate to commence every time the government changed.

As a veteran I feel strongly in support of the red ensign, and I intend to maintain that position even though I would compromise in order to maintain the unity in this country which is vital to each and every one of us sent here by our constituents.

An article appeared in the Toronto Telegram on August 22, which sums up the situation very well, and I think it is worth quoting for the record. The article begins:

Ask the people.

The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.

No decision of the House of Commons, by free vote or otherwise, to strike our historic ensign and replace it with a pennant of the Prime Minister's choosing can be construed as expressing the consensus of the nation.

The voice of the people can be heard, on this issue, only through a national plebiscite.

None would seriously suggest that all controversial issues before parliament should be resolved by plebiscite or referendum. That is not the way our system works. A government having received its mandate, pushes ahead with its legislative program and stakes its life on its success or failure.

But the flag issue is different.

Here is a matter that touches the hearts, the emotions, the loyalties of virtually all Canadians. A parliamentary vote that would destroy the country's flag would leave deep and festering scars for years to come.

Too big for compromise.

It is far too important to be settled by parliamentary compromise.

Though Prime Minister Pearson has given extraordinary priority to the flag legislation, he did not make it a central part of his campaign when he was seeking election. True, he promised a new flag within two years.

There was no suggestion that parliament would be presented with a single, peculiar pennant design and be told that this must be our flag.

If there had been such a proposition, it is quite possible that Mr. Pearson's minority representation in the House of Commons would have been considerably smaller.

It has been said that a plebiscite would be divisive. This is nonsense. Nothing could have been more divisive than the Prime Minister's introduction of the issue as a matter of high priority.

By doing so, he has made the national flag a partisan political issue. If he succeeds in forcing it on the country, it will be looked upon by thousands of Canadians as a political badge. It will fail to receive the honour and respect that belongs now to the ensign.

Mr. Pearson, as an act of compromise, has announced that he would allow a free vote; that is, individual members would be allowed to vote as they like outside the discipline of their parties.

This is a move in the right direction—or, it would have been had it been made earlier.

Vote can't be free.

At this stage, with party lines hardened, it is difficult to conceive of a truly free vote.

Having shown, belatedly, a willingness to retreat from his earlier stubborn demands for the banner of his choice, he now should go one step further and measure public sentiment by plebiscite.

Perhaps Mr. Pearson fears the outcome of such a testing of public opinion. Letters and petitions expressing determination to retain the ensign have been impressive.

There is no reason why this obstructive and divisive bill should not be shelved pending a reference to the people. There is no urgency. Most Canadians outside Quebec appear to be quite satisfied with the flag we have now. In Quebec, the matter is of little importance as there they fly the Laurentian flag with its white cross and fleur-de-lis.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has been reading for the last four or five minutes an editorial in toto. I suggest hon. members may make references to editorials but should make their own speeches in this effort at filibuster.

Mr. Madill: I could do that, but I think perhaps what I am doing is hurting the hon. members' toes worse than if I made my own speech. Mr. Speaker, I am almost finished, and I will then be glad to listen to that hon. member read or make a speech, however distasteful.

The article I was reading continues:

Until Mr. Pearson softens his stand, the opposition is justified in continuing a modified filibuster. As distasteful as such devices are in parliament, no other method seems practical in the face of Mr. Pearson's stubbornness.

The way out of the parliamentary impasse is clear; a plebiscite to end the long debate and to allow parliament to get on with more important legislation.

Canadian Flag

I have one further comment to make, Mr. Speaker. I hope a Canadian flag means more to that hon. member sitting on the opposite side than a symbol on a bathing skirt, or a sticker on a bumper. The Canadian flag means something more than that to me, and I hope it means more to the hon. member. Thank you.

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to bring before this house the feeling of the majority of people in my constituency. This is the first time I have spoken during the flag debate, and I have no apology to make for taking up the time of this house. I feel that every member of this house should speak during this debate.

I should like to say a word or two about the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). I feel he should be congratulated because he is the first cabinet minister to speak on the flag issue. I think we should hear more from cabinet ministers if they feel so strongly about the three maple leaves design. The minister accused the Conservative party of carrying on a filibuster, and I should like to read from the beginning of his remarks. As found on page 6956 of Hansard he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I have hestitated to take part in this debate, not from any lack of conviction but because no one with respect for our parliamentary institutions would wish to contribute to the filibuster now under way.

I do not believe this was his true feeling, for later in his speech he said, as found on page 6961:

> During the last few days I have made a point of listening to the speeches made in this debate both on the subamendment and on the amendment which is still before the house... I must say that all those to whom I listened spoke with great sincerity. They stated with sincerity their convictions about a Canadian flag, and this is as it should be. I have no quarrel with that.

Why did he start his speech by accusing this party of a filibuster? I feel he was sincere in his speech and I believe that everybody who has spoken in this debate has been sincere. Everyone knows that when the Prime Minister introduced the flag resolution he expressed the hope that everyone wishing to speak on it would be able to do so. Yet every time he comes in the house he accuses us of a filibuster. The majority of the people in nine of the provinces do not feel it is a filibuster, nor do I think the people in the province of Quebec feel it is a filibuster.

I agree that no party should obstruct the business of the house. I also agree that no one man should tell this country what flag we are going to fly for the next generation, for our children and their children. I do not think that one man should get up in the house, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did, and criticize any other member and any other party. Since I have been a member of the house I think he and his party have certainly used more of parliament's time than the party I represent.

I do not believe that any member of the house should ask for closure, as the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) did several days ago. I should like to ask the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) if he supports this view, but I see he is not in the house at present. I should also like to ask the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) whether he supports closure. In this regard I should like to quote from a memorandum that he sent to his constituents in which he said:

> The people of Canada have never been asked nor have the people said they want a new flag other than the red ensign. The chief electoral officer should be notified that the opinion of the people is necessary to settle the matter and, therefore, should proceed to have a vote taken by way of a transferable ballot on which a number of choice designs, including the red ensign, are manifest.

It is a two page memorandum and it is very interesting. I wonder whether the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency read it before he made his speech.

To go back to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I should like to compliment him because he said he would not support closure or any action of that type in the house. But I should like to point out the fact that he claimed it made his blood boil when people spoke disparagingly about the three maple leaves. How does he think the people who support the red ensign feel when they see the Liberal government trying to tear down the red ensign? The minister says we need a spirit of tolerance, and I say to the minister that is what the Conservative party is asking the government for. We are asking them to show tolerance in choosing a flag for Canada. While the minister was speaking he left me with the impression that he felt only the Liberal government could bring in a flag for Canada. I say that if the flag resolution had been presented to the house properly the country would never have been divided on this issue.

The Ottawa Journal summed up the question of the flag in an editorial in today's issue when it said that the real task is to produce a flag that will unite the nation, and that whether this takes a month or four months is relatively unimportant. My correspondence has consisted of several hundred letters in favour of the retention of the red ensign and only six letters in favour of the new maple leaf flag. I have a letter here from a lady who has asked me to support the three maple leaves. She lost her only son in the last war and her brother in the first war. I appreciate letters of this type, but for this one letter I have received 100 letters asking for the retention of the red ensign. Many of the letters I have received supporting the red ensign intimate that the writers would be willing to accept a modified version of the ensign, if this is what is needed to unite Canada; but in most cases they point out very emphatically that they cannot accept the new flag proposed by the Prime Minister. This is a good reason why we should have a plebiscite or a committee set up to consider the flag.

Since the flag resolution was proposed to the house we find that all across the nation people are showing an interest in the Canadian red ensign that has never been shown before. Red ensigns are now being flown from private homes, factories and other places of business, and cottages. When I go home on the week end I sometimes have a chance to go to the lake and every cottage is flying a red ensign or a maple leaf flag. There is another member in the house who has a cottage on the lake and he has been flying the one maple leaf flag. Two or three weeks ago the flag was taken down, but when I went there last Sunday he had it flying at half mast. So I do not know what to expect next week. It might be the red ensign, and I hope it will be.

The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) referred earlier this evening to the flag manufacturer in Peterborough. This is an old, established firm which has been doing business throughout the dominion for years. In the last four months this firm has sold as many red ensigns and union jacks as it did in the previous five or six years. This is further proof that the house should be very careful before it selects a national emblem. We need an emblem that will unite us. We need an emblem that will evoke respect, loyalty, affection, an emblem of which all Canadians will be proud. Most Canadians feel that the red ensign has accomplished this, but I know these people are willing to compromise in order to have unity in the country. If the majority of members of the house feel that we need a new distinctive Canadian flag I believe that if they are sincere they will ask for a plebiscite or for the setting up of a committee to design a flag acceptable to all.

Speaking in this house last week the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) asked the government to consider a design that would represent the English and French population as well as the rest of Canada. Designs of this type should be considered. The house must come up with a design that will unite the country, not one that is going to divide it. His was a very interesting speech and I would like to quote one paragraph from it:

> That is why we are exerting so much pressure and making these requests. We beg our colleagues of the Liberal party to exert pressure on the Prime Minister to set up a committee to choose a design which, as I said, would, unite and not divide the country, in short, knit together into one unit all the elements of our country.

I believe this is the feeling of the people in Quebec today. The flag proposed by the Prime Minister is certainly not acceptable to the majority of people in Canada. If Quebec chooses to be represented by the maple leaf or fleur-de-lis, and I respect them for that, the rest of Canada should have a choice as to their symbol. As confederation approaches its 100th birthday we realize across the country that we need Quebec and that the province of Quebec needs the rest of Canada if each province is to prosper and progress.

Last week I had a family from Detroit, Michigan, visit me in the house and they listened to the flag debate. Later on in my office their nine year old son said to me, "Mr. Stenson, we could solve the flag debate for you. You join our country and we will put another star on our flag for you". If this should ever come to pass, and I hope it never does, it will wipe out all the tradition and culture of our country. Canada certainly does not want to give up its heritage and traditions, for if it does confederation would be meaningless.

As we approach the centennial year and the world fair in Montreal, we find we have a selling job on our hands, to sell this fair across our country. But if the Prime Minister thinks the new flag will promote unity and sell the fair to Canada, he is very much mistaken. This feeling has been growing in the last few months. Let's not let it get out of hand because it is not fair to the province of Quebec: it is not fair to the rest of Canada. Let the house set up a committee which could bring forward suggestions for a flag—four or five designs—and then let the people pick their flag by a plebiscite so that they will feel they have had a part in picking their design, as is proper in a democracy.

Our Prime Minister has turned a deaf ear on the Royal Canadian Legion of Canada. Although not a veteran myself I feel I have a responsibility to the veterans in my constituency and to every Legion branch across Canada. Can we forget so easily that since 1914 over one million men and women fought to preserve our democratic way of life, fought to preserve the red ensign? How can our Prime Minister turn a deaf ear on their pleas to retain the flag which they fought for, when over 100,000 men and women made the supreme sacrifice? The majority of veterans in Canada and their families, who account for several million of our total population, will be very bitter toward any government that scraps the red ensign completely.

I would like to read a short letter published in the Peterborough Examiner, sent to me from an adjoining riding represented by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey). He asked me to use this in my speech if I spoke in the house on the flag. I feel it is a little too strong so I shall only read part of it:

> Our government will, beyond a shadow of doubt, break faith with all who sacrificed so much during the two world wars if it takes away our flag. The idea of parliament not allowing the Canadian people the right to choose their own flag is nothing but dictatorship—
>
> If a new flag is chosen it will have to have a name. If the one with three maple leaves is chosen it will have to be called "The Triple D."
>
> The first leaf will be called dictator because of the way the flag is being introduced.
>
> The second leaf will be called division because it has already divided the nation.
> The third leaf will be called destroyer because our freedom and rights will be destroyed.

I feel this design and the way it was brought out is creating a division in our country today, and I would like to say a word to the Prime Minister, that he is not being fair to our veterans. Who else in our dominion have more right to give their opinions about the flag than those people who fought our wars for us? This is another reason why we should have a plebiscite.

I am sorry the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) is not in the house this evening because I wish to mention some parts of her speech. She had this to say:

> I think we, as members of parliament, should look at this whole question, regardless of our personal feelings in the matter, regardless even of what we think the majority of our constituents want.

She is taking the same attitude as our Prime Minister. It is quite evident that what their constituents want is unimportant to them. The hon. lady also stated:

> A referendum, Mr. Speaker, is only really suitable in a culturally and socially homogeneous society.

I consider this utter nonsense. A person is either in favour or not in favour of the flag, regardless of his cultural or social level. Every Canadian is worthy of a vote in this plebiscite.

I would like to refer the hon. lady to an article in the Peterborough Examiner headed, "Incensed Legion Writes Pearson About New Flag".

> Cobourg Legion, branch 133 with 500 members, is "incensed" over the possible plight of Canada's war memorials with the advent of Prime Minister Lester Pearson's maple leaf flag.

A letter in the same newspaper states:

> The Cobourg branch of the Royal Canadian Legion has written to the president of the dominion command asking that some thought be given to the matter of the position that the many war memorials throughout Canada would be placed in should this proposed flag be forced upon us, who do not feel the desire to have the change.
>
> For our protection and for those who feel alike it is suggested that the dominion government enter into some guarantee to the general public that all memorials, wherever placed retain the same scheme of draping that they at present have.
> That places designated as a gift of the government or as a war memorial—people that now fly the Canadian ensign or the union jack be so authorized to continue.
>
> That the next of kin of those whose names feature upon roles of honour in churches, public halls and such places be asked their respective opinions on a majority basis before any change of drape is allowed.
> This letter is written, at the wish of more than 500 members, who feel that they have given some of the years of their lifetime in the service of their country and who now continue in the service of the Royal Canadian Legion as true sons of Canada, sworn to obey the laws of our country and to protect the servicemen and their families to the best of their abilities.
>
> Yours very truly,
>
> J. M. Gaiger,
> Public Relations Officer,
> Branch 133, Cobourg, Ont.

I would like to ask the hon. member if she feels she has a better right to pick a flag for Canada than these veterans she represents in the house? With all due respect to the hon. lady the veterans and their families were not mentioned in her speech. They were bypassed completely and they are the people who should be making the decision—not a political party.

Scores of organizations in Canada representing millions of Canadians have passed resolutions and are sending them to the government. They are requesting the retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag. These signatures come from people in every province in Canada but they are being ignored by our Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). The right hon. gentleman stated that if the government were forced into an election he would make the flag an issue. I disagree with this. I believe our flag should never become a political football. I believe it should be kept free of politics. In my opinion, the free vote which was announced came too late because members of the Liberal party had been whipped into shape before the free vote was ever announced.

The Prime Minister realizes that every member has received letters and telegrams from Canadian Legion branches all across Canada. I know that these Legion branches and their members would be very fair with the government if they were approached in a proper manner and asked to sit down and help decide on a new emblem which would help bring about unity in our country. I also feel that every province would be fair about this if approached in the proper way. The English speaking people do not want a flag forced on them and I know that after listening to this debate the people of Quebec would not want to force an emblem on the people of this country which the majority of them cannot accept.

The members of the Canadian Legion are not the only ones whose opinions have been disregarded. I have here a letter which I think has been put on record several times before. It is from 12 people. One of them is Mr. D. G. Creighton, professor of history at the University of Toronto. Another, Mrs. Dyde, of Edmonton. Another signatory is Dr. Eugene Forsey, director of research, Canadian Labour Congress. Three of the signatories come from Peterborough, and this is why I am mentioning this letter. They are Mr. T. H. B. Symons, president of Trent University which will be opening in Peterborough this fall. Another is his assistant, Mr. Denis Smith. The third is a former member of this house, Mr. Walter Pitman, head of the history department of Kenner Collegiate. Mr. Pitman is a man very well regarded both in this house and in the city of Peterborough. This letter was sent to the Prime Minister on May 27. I will read two or three paragraphs from it. It begins:

> We have thought deeply about the flag issue, and believe it necessary to write this open letter to you as an expression of our common feelings. May we emphasize that we do not speak as political partisans, but only as concerned Canadians representing several parties.

Later on, the letter says:

> We are not in the position of a country with a revolutionary tradition, creating itself anew; we exist because we have inherited the past without a revolutionary upheaval. It is false and dispiriting to adopt a flag which subtly ignores the truth of our own nature. This is not the kind of symbol to rally a bewildered and demoralized nation.
> We respectfully suggest that you withdraw the maple leaf design for the time being, and that you convoke at once a private meeting of the parliamentary leaders of all parties to agree upon a new design which asserts our history. We profoundly believe that the present proposal will only deepen the spiritual malaise of Canada.

If the Prime Minister had sat down with these gentlemen or with the leaders of the parties to consider this question further we should not now be engaged in this long debate which is doing this country no good.

I have another letter here, this one from a young man. I do not believe the young people are supporting a new flag in the way the Liberal party would suggest. It says:

> I am proud of your stand on the flag issue. I have never voted Conservative, but I assure you you will have my full support in any national referendum, or should Pearson shove it through parliament in the dictatorial manner which he proposes, I would stand behind you to the fullest.
> I am in my early twenties. I speak for the young people of this community when I say: Keep the red ensign.

May I say that before this debate concludes I should like to hear more from supporters of the Liberal party. I should like to hear from cabinet ministers. I should like to hear from members representing Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. I should like to hear from more members from Ontario.

An hon. Member: Do not forget British Columbia.

Mr. Stenson: I should like to hear, also, from more members representing Quebec constituencies. My deskmate has spoken on the subject, and I have referred to that speech. As I say, I would appreciate hearing more speakers from Quebec. I cannot help but feel that their constituents are interested in a referendum or in having this issue sent to a parliamentary committee where there would be both representation from this house and from the Senate. In this way a national symbol could be chosen which would not be labelled a political pennant. It would be one fairly chosen by the people of this country, one which would link us together for the next hundred years, one we shall be proud of when we open our fair in the centennial year.

I feel that if this flag resolution is settled properly this country will remain united and become even stronger in the future.

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): On June 17, 1964, I spoke on the resolution concerning a distinctive Canadian flag. At that time I gave many reasons why we should continue with the Canadian red ensign. As a 100 per cent Canadian of German descent 125 years ago, I felt that in accordance with our democratic way of life I should express my views according to the dictates of my conscience, regardless of political leanings, and other pressures so prominent during the debate of such an important question.

In talking over this question with many of my constituents during the odd week end, I found support for the new flag as well as for the Canadian red ensign, and for that reason I came to the conclusion that a plebiscite or referendum should be held during the next election so that each and every Canadian could express his own opinion. Such a vote in my estimation is just as important now as was the referendum on conscription years ago. I am sure we all realize that when such a vote is taken we as sound and loyal Canadians will abide by such a decision and bring unity to our country, probably to an extent we have never seen before.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said in this house that every member should have the opportunity to express his views on this important question. Up to the present time most hon. members on the other side, many of them in the government, have not done so. Why? Because it is my sincere belief that the flag they have chosen fails to express anything significant. In other words it is not an emblem or representation of anything real. So far, when any one of our members rises to speak on this issue all we hear from across the floor are the familiar words "Carried" and "Question". By making such remarks hon. members opposite are going contrary to the wishes of their own leader, who said all members in the house should be heard. It is their obligation to rise and make themselves heard so that the people in their constituencies may know what their opinions are on this important question. Then if a referendum should be held we could be guided by their suggestions or expressions of opinion.

The vote of the people is by far the fairest way in which to settle this problem once and for all. Millions of people in Canada believe this is the only way of seeing as far as possible that this is not made a partisan issue. It has been suggested in certain quarters that a free vote of members or senators should be allowed. But as I explained in my previous address to this house, there would be a natural tendency, human nature being what it is, for government supporters to vote for their government's own design, and it is far from certain that a vote in the house on any issue of this nature would really reflect the feelings of the people of Canada. No doubt the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) had the following words in mind when he brought in an amendment in favour of holding a plebiscite. The May issue of the Royal Canadian Legion journal had this to say:

> In a free, democratic country, where public opinion is neither regimented nor suppressed, instances occur when the people are stirred to the innermost depths of heart and soul. Then it is that government by the people, for the people, is given true effect by a national vote on the issue at stake, and on that only.

I was impressed with the remarks made by my good friend the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More), as I was by many other speeches that have been delivered since this debate was brought forward. Like the hon. member for Regina City, I believe that his subamendment has a great deal of merit, because we need to have further clarification. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we need to know what the plebiscite would be on. Let us look over this subamendment and carefully scrutinize its important points:

1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

The hon. member for Regina City has given the voters a wide scope for their choice, and I believe it is the most democratic way of solving this problem. No matter how we look at this great flag issue, we are reminded of the Gardens of the Dead. The commonwealth war graves commission annual report, so well prepared by this wonderful group of men, deals in considerable detail with the commission's work in all parts of the world where members of the armed forces of the British commonwealth are buried. How many Canadians realize that no less than 1,106,380 men from commonwealth countries fell in the first great war and are buried in 15,386 different cemeteries. In world war II, 580,058 men from commonwealth nations made the supreme sacrifice and are buried in 15,551 cemeteries which also contain, however, 7,220 1914-1918 war graves.

I mention this fact, Mr. Speaker, "Lest we forget", and second so that we do not forget the many Silver Cross women whose hearts are still bleeding for these men who have been gone now for almost 50 years. I mention the Gardens of the Dead for the simple reason that they refer to men who fell in the first great war and in the second great war from commonwealth countries, of which we are proud to be one. With this in mind I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I was terrifically impressed with the flags floating outside the west block, where the third commonwealth education conference is being held at the present time. The red ensign, representing Canada, stands out above and beyond all other flags, having beauty and distinction.

An hon. Member: And you can't mistake it.

Mr. Weichel: And, as one hon. member has said, you cannot mistake it for any other flag, even at two miles or four miles distance. May I ask all those who wish to tear down the red ensign to give serious consideration to the part it has played in the growth of this great nation of ours. At the turn of this century thousands of immigrants left their homes in Europe with the hope of making a new life in Canada, and after the first world war another great immigration wave gave our population another tremendous lift. Then once again after the second world upheaval, Canada again became a haven of refuge and a chance for a new life.

Hon. members, I say to you that the magnet, the beacon, the beckoning light that brought those people to our shores was the red ensign. Hopeless and discouraged by conditions in their own lands, these new Canadians recognized in the union jack, an integral part of our flag, a promise of justice, freedom and opportunity for all men. We must never in any way appear to repudiate the part that the Magna Carta and the British parliamentary system have played in our development as a nation. As I said in my previous speech, Mr. Speaker, when I was wounded in the first great war the greatest people in the world to me at that time were the English, the Scots and the Irish. I was taken to hospital, and after four years of war I was treated in just the same manner as any man who was wounded in the 1914-18 war. From the bottom of my heart I say that the English, the Irish and the Scots are amongst the greatest people in the world.

As I left the parliamentary restaurant tonight my eyes wandered over the framed portraits in the adjacent gallery. I looked at the portraits of Gladstone, Pitt, Churchill and all those other great British prime ministers. If we are determined to uproot all our traditions and symbols, we should consider turning the faces of these men to the wall. Mr. Speaker, it might be well to remember that of Canada's male population of 30 or more years of age there are 25.6 per cent, or 1,056,768 veterans, according to the 1961 census. If we included the dependants of these men it would make these figures look quite impressive. The total of veterans includes all males who reported service in world war I, world war II, and the Korean operation, whether or not their service was with the Canadian forces.

Lest we forget, these men represented every province in Canada from Quebec, the maritimes and all across this country to British Columbia. The unity and co-operation of these men brought success to the army, the air force and the navy. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe for a minute that all these fine men are in favour of the continuance of the Canadian red ensign; but I assure you that a great majority will show how they stand if a plebiscite is forthcoming. Let us not be deceived, as facts always tell the truth in regard to such an important question.

Remembrance day is just around the corner. It plays a big part in such an important issue, as we should remember in these few hours before the flag is settled once and for all. It would be well to reflect on what Frederick E. Elmslie says in his circular for poppy day and Remembrance day, namely that Canada was not built in a straightforward, cut and dried manner, but rather has suffered cuts and bruises in its growing up. We are not a new country without a flag. Many countries have taken centuries to accomplish what we have done in 97 years—strangely enough, much of it under the red ensign—and during these years of growth, Canada has always tried to make the world—as her men are today, serving in many parts of the globe—a better place for all of us in which to live.

It seems to me that abolishing the Canadian red ensign is as if one were to propose a bill to abolish the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, because the musical ride originated from men riding as a pastime on Sunday afternoons. Yes, and how would the suggested new flag represent the thousands of people who reside in hundreds of square miles in our country where there are no maple trees? Nearly all the speeches in this house have explained the red ensign and what it stands for. Why design a new flag when the ensign already has on it three leaves on a white background?

Mr. Speaker, it is rather hard to make a speech when there are so many others going on over there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Weichel: Surely not all suggestions which are made are improvements or represent progress.

What surely could be more uniting than the fact that working side by side to build this great country in one century have been Indians, French, English, Negroes, ethnics and Jews, people who fought, shed their blood and immortalized the bloody beaches, trenches and battlefields of the world so that we might have what we now possess? I could bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker—a fact which you already know—that at the battle of Ypres 50 years ago green Canadian troops attacked, and later many of them choked and died as a yellowish-green fog of poisonous chlorine filled the trenches. I can recall many battles waged under similar circumstances, all of which demonstrate the terrific sacrifices made by our brave men, our brothers and cousins and friends under the red ensign for their country and for upholding freedom of religion, freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

I can well remember, Mr. Speaker, serving in the front line trenches with Indians, French, Negroes, ethnics and Jews made up of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faiths, and when any of these men were wounded no one questioned their religion or race. When someone was wounded all of his pals came to his assistance, showing the true value of fellowship, companionship and unity. These and others are the type of men who should have a real say about our future flag. A plebiscite would give them this right. Thousands of our comrades will never come back to tell us about the horrors of war, but we certainly know some of them paid the greatest price—death. Is this in itself not enough to make the ensign official? Or was this, the greatest of human sacrifices, meaningless and wasted?

The least we can do now is to show our humble gratitude, reverence and respect. I say in all sincerity: Let the ensign alone and make it official. If the ensign was not distinguished in the beginning before the wars, it certainly was distinguished after the wars. Canada's sons have fought and died under the ensign for our freedom. Surely it is now unquestionably distinctive, and distinguished enough for us. Lest we forget, remember for a moment before a decision is made.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I make no apologies for rising to take part in this debate because it is no ordinary debate. The subject under discussion at this time is the flag resolution, the amendment and the subamendment and is something which will not be dealt with by every parliament. When parliament passes a bill and the legislation concerned does not do the job it was designed to do, then the following session or the session after that parliament can bring in amendments to correct the deficiency. The flag is different. Once we adopt the flag, that flag will be here to stay for scores of years, even centuries. Therefore it is most important that this subject be thoroughly debated, and I would certainly like to see more members from the government benches rising to take part in this debate.

So far, Mr. Speaker, there have been many outstanding speeches, but I do not intend to start naming those who have made such excellent speeches. Incidentally, all of the good speeches have been coming from this side of the house because, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) said, on the other side there is a filibuster of silence.

I am in the same position as that of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), the hon. member for Marquette, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) and many others. I do not belong to either one of the founding races, and I belong to a different nationality than they. Both my parents came from Iceland, a small island in the north Atlantic which is of great importance to the western world. Iceland is a country with the comparatively small population of 185,000 people. It is a country which cherishes freedom and democracy. Great Britain is referred to as the mother of parliaments. Iceland can truly be called the grandmother of parliament because Iceland established the first democratic parliament in the world in the year 930. The old Icelandic sages indicate that Leif Ericson came to North America in the year 1000, which is a long time before Columbus discovered America in 1492.

I have indicated that both my parents came from Iceland. My father came as a young boy in 1886 and my mother at the turn of the century. Both my wife's parents also came from Iceland. They came to this country because they felt there would be greater opportunity here than in their own native land. I am sure that practically all those who came to this country are glad they came. They have made a living for themselves and have fitted into this country very well. Incidentally, the first Icelanders when they arrived in Canada settled in Ontario briefly, and then settled in Gimli, Manitoba, where they were given a tract of land which was designated as an Icelandic reserve. This was in October of 1875, and the Icelandic reserve started at Boundary Creek. They were given land along lake Winnipeg and some islands in lake Winnipeg; and they were actually a sovereign state. They remained a sovereign state and had their own self-government, establishing their own schools during those years. However they became very loyal to this country and have participated very actively in everything.

I was surprised the other day to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) give the members of the House of Commons a lecture about the length of debate. In fact I got the impression that he thought debate should be limited, although he did specify that this specific debate now in progress should not be limited. In view of all the talking he does in this house I feel he is not on firm ground when lecturing the house about the length of the debate. I suggest to him that if there were 265 members like himself in this house, who love to talk, no session of parliament could be completed, and certainly would not be completed within the year. If members like that hon. member wish to contribute to the reformation of parliament they should commence by restraining themselves. People who love to talk generally do so for the sake of publicity.

Mr. Speaker, the only suggestion referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) referred to was that in respect of extending the sitting hours. The Minister of Justice made an amazing speech last Thursday during this debate. He suggested that his party would be willing to consider other legislation on Monday, provided the hours of sitting were extended on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays from eight until midnight. I should like to point out that during our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Industry on Friday afternoon, attendance in this house was very poor. At one time there were five members present in the government benches, and for a time there was not a single member of the New Democratic party, of the Social Credit party or of the Creditiste party in this chamber. Before these members commence to suggest longer hours perhaps they should attempt to sit in this house and pay attention to what is taking place.

The amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is:

> That all the words after "that" in line one be deleted and the following substituted:
> "As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag."

I certainly feel that every member of this house should be able to support that amendment.

The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) proposed:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:
> "and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:
> 1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
> 2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
> 3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
> 4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?"

I was very pleased while listening to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) to hear him say he had been back to his riding and the people with whom he spoke urged him to support the suggestion that a plebiscite be held.

I was not away as long as that hon. member but I did spend a Saturday and Sunday in my riding. The people with whom I spoke certainly are in favour of a plebiscite. They feel we should move on to more important business and settle this flag issue by referendum at the time of the next general election. That would not be too costly and would certainly settle this question once and for all.

Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West relate his experience in respect of the three maple leaves design flags that have been flying here in the capital city, and I certainly agree with his theory that once the price of an article is cut, that is an indication the demand is decreasing. When the price of an article is cut down as low as 19 cents I would suggest that is an indication there is practically no demand. Surely this is a clear indication to the Prime Minister and the treasury bench that they should act on this subamendment and refer this issue to the people.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that there are people in my riding of many racial origins and backgrounds. The 1961 census shows a total of 50,320 people in the federal constituency of Selkirk, broken down as follows: British Isles, 15,790; French, 3,747; German, 3,506; Italian, 57; Jewish, 122; Netherlands, 1,220; Polish, 3,304; Russian, 242, Scandinavian, 6,847; Ukrainian, 7,922; other European, 1,437; Asiatic, 118; native Indians, 5,765, and others and not stated, 243.

There are many religious denominations in my riding including Anglican Church of Canada, Baptist, Greek Orthodox, Jewish, Lutheran, Mennonite, Pentecostal, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, Ukrainian (Greek) Catholic, United Church of Canada and others. These people with this variety of background and religion in this part of Canada live together, work together and play together in peace, understanding and harmony. They all think of themselves as Canadians first, and think in terms of one Canada. These people are tolerant and understanding. They are not rigid or inflexible. They believe in principles and they believe in God. They believe that symbols should be steeped in history and tradition. These people are all loyal to the flag of Canada.

The red ensign, as has been pointed out by many previous speakers, has been used by Canada since confederation, and was declared as Canada's official flag by order in council dated September, 1945. The thought of destroying or removing this flag arouses deep emotions in many people. This is the most controversial and emotional topic that has come before parliament since I came here in 1958. I fail to understand the Prime Minister in his determination to force this issue, despite the knowledge of the tremendous opposition to both the method by which this resolution was introduced and the design itself. For the Prime Minister to continue this stand is nothing but straight dictatorship. The opposition has moved an amendment proposing a national plebiscite, and a subamendment suggesting the form of that plebiscite. These suggestions have been made in an attempt to extricate the Prime Minister from the dilemma in which he finds himself.

I should also like to point out that I have received a great deal of mail in respect of this flag issue. I have received far more letters on this subject than on any other, and all the letters with few exceptions have expressed favour for retention of the red ensign. I have received only one letter from my constituents favouring the three maple leaves design. All the others are for the red ensign and oppose the suggested flag. I believe every Canadian Legion branch in my riding has written supporting the red ensign and requesting that it be retained as the flag of Canada.

I do not intend to read the letters I have received except one short one from Homebrook in my constituency. It reads as follows:

> I hear on this morning's radio that the flag issue is again to the fore. Am enclosing clipping which expresses my sentiments. I certainly will never fly Pearson's choice for a flag. Our family and neighbours always flew the red ensign and I would not object to some symbol being added recognizing French contribution to our country.
> Shame on all those who would forsake the flag which represents all that has protected us for hundreds of years. How long will it be before they tire of this new flag?

In his letter he encloses a letter that appeared in the Western Producer of July 16, 1964. I think it is appropriate that I read that letter too because this gentleman said that it expressed his opinions. The letter to the Western Producer is headed "Flag Won't Promote Unity" and reads as follows:

> Though I have never been a rabid sentimental flag waver I find I did not realize just how much the old flag meant to me until the almost certainty of losing it forever was brought home to me by recent events.
> For more than 60 years I have observed it flying from many a flagpole all across the country. Always the sight of it brings to me the same feeling that comes to me when I see and hear a flight of Canada geese winging on their way—a mystic sense and realization of the immensity of our country and its past history. To me the old flag is more than an old bit of bunting. It stands for and exemplifies the hopes and aspirations of many generations of every ethnic group who have sought for and found security and happiness beneath its folds. Unfortunately it is an historial fact that to a large section of our population the old flag or even the red ensign is and always has been obnoxious for reasons that are quite obvious.
> For this reason and the fact that our present federal government owes its very existence to these people we are to have a new flag of strange design thrust upon us, a design that features prominently three maple leaves. Most of us in western Canada have never seen a genuine maple leaf, yet this is supposed to convey a feeling of unity from sea to sea.
>
> The government is evidently determined to pursue this matter to its ultimate end—a new flag. Quebec must be appeased no matter how many other feelings are hurt.

We cannot prevent the institution of a new flag —but no one can make us love or respect it. Nor will it promote unity. More likely the reverse.

George Watson.

I have many more letters I could read but I will go on with something else. As I said, I have received many letters from my constituency and all of them ask for the retention of the red ensign, except one in favour of the new three maple leaves flag.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Stefanson: The odds are at least 100 to 1 so maybe you would like to read it. There are some questions I should like answered. Who asked the Prime Minister for a new flag? That question has been asked before but no answer has been forthcoming. I know that the Prime Minister visited Selkirk during the 1962 election campaign and again in the 1963 election campaign, and he certainly made no mention of a new flag during either one of those visits. He made one specific promise in Selkirk in 1963 which was reported by the Canadian Press. He promised to establish a committee of inquiry to investigate the effects of railway branch line abandonment, but to my knowledge such a committee was never established. However, I suppose in that regard we should accept the view of the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) who said the other day that when you are in opposition and trying to get enough members to form the government you make promises to get votes, but after you assume office it is not necessary to fulfil those promises. The Prime Minister was in opposition at that time and I suppose he was only trying to get himself elected to office.

The Prime Minister has indicated that he promised a new flag within two years. I would suggest that the promise of a flag is in the very same category as the promises to which the Postmaster General referred the other day. There is another question I should like answered. Why did the flag issue become urgent all of a sudden and take priority over all other legislation? This question has also been asked before but certainly no answer has been forthcoming from the Prime Ministre or anyone else on the government side.

Mr. Nielsen: Politics.

Mr. Clancy: They have got no legislation ready.

Mr. Nielsen: Just a smokescreen.

Mr. Stefanson: Is it a coincidence that this piece of legislation became urgent shortly after the visit or safari of the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) and the Prime Minister's chief adviser to Quebec city last April? According to Time magazine, when they made that visit to Quebec city they almost collided with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), but he was shooed out another door because he is too clumsy and has not got the technique or the finesse to be able to negotiate with the premier of Quebec.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Is that three flag Jack?

Mr. Stefanson: Did this visit have something to do with the flag question becoming urgent? If it did, the people of Canada certainly have a right to know and there should be an answer forthcoming.

Mr. Nielsen: There never will be. No answers; all promises.

Mr. Stefanson: Many editorials have appeared supporting the stand we have taken in asking for a referendum as set out in the subamendment and the amendment. However, I only want to read one short editorial because I do not want to take too much time in this regard. Many editorials have appeared in newspapers across Canada saying that the only logical answer, the only fair proposition, is to refer this matter to the people and let the people decide what type of flag they want. In today's Toronto Telegram there is an editorial headed "Stop It" which reads as follows:

The flag debate has gone on far, far too long. The Canadian people are wearied of it and people abroad must be looking at the performance of our 26th parliament with sniggering amazement.

Prime Minister Pearson's stubborn insistence that the Pearson pennant, or some modification of it must be approved before parliament rises is reckless and extravagant of time and money. The issue could be dealt with fairly if Mr. Pearson would agree to a plebiscite through which Canadians from coast to coast could express their preference for retention of the Canadian ensign or some new banner. The cost and inconvenience involved in such a poll would be less than that occasioned by wasted hours in fruitless debate and the stalling of parliament's business.

If Mr. Pearson is afraid of loss of face in taking this course, the matter could be put in the hands of an all-party committee. The recommendation of the committee then could be incorporated in a plebiscite.

It has been said that a plebiscite would be divisive. The late prime minister Mackenzie King did not hesitate to call a plebiscite on a far more explosive issue—military conscription—in the emotionally charged war years.

That article certainly suggests that the Prime Minister should accept the subamendment and the amendment, and that he should refer this matter to the people themselves. It also refers to a committee. These suggestions have been made in the house.

An hon. Member: Seven more minutes.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you saw fit to call attention to the remarks being made on this side of the house in support of the speaker. For the last five minutes the speaker has had trouble getting himself across—

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. MacInnis: —because of the continuous interjections like the one we have just heard. I think it is about time members on this side enjoyed the same privilege as members on that side, and that they be called to order when it is absolutely necessary that they should be.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to point out to the hon. member that when the Chair called for order it was calling on members from the other side of the house.

Mr. Hahn: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is back from his extended holiday, I would point out that his remarks have been preventing me from hearing the interesting speech to which we have been listening.

Mr. Stefanson: That certainly was no point of order.

People in public life generally have the same aims and objectives. They may approach these in a different manner, but one of the objectives of those in public service is to improve the lot of their fellow man. This flag controversy is making many people unhappy and is creating bitterness and hatred. Surely these are not the aims and objectives of any public servant.

In view of this I would strongly urge the Prime Minister to withdraw the resolution at this time. He would be doing his country a great service if he would do this. Many millions of Canadians are unhappy with the method the Prime Minister has used in introducing this resolution, and many millions are also unhappy with the proposed design. They feel that it is a sickly and insipid looking flag.

Some say the design is not important, but I say those people are wrong. The design should have a meaning, should be distinctive in appearance, and should be something which the majority of Canadians want and will respect. When a new flag is chosen by parliament it will fly from flagpoles in this country for many years, perhaps even for centuries to come. This resolution is not like other pieces of legislation. When parliament passes an act, and then a few months later it is found not to be doing exactly what it was intended to do, an amendment can be brought in to correct it. Not so with a flag. Therefore extreme care should be used in the selection and adoption of a new flag.

A flag should not be associated with any political party, and the design should not be associated with any one individual. The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) has clearly indicated that the selection of the proposed design was not submitted to the Liberal caucus before being introduced in the House of Commons. It has been pointed out that the design is the personal choice of the Prime Minister. Seeing that it is his personal choice, it then becomes labelled with the government of which he is the head, and also with the Liberal party. It has therefore become a political flag.

Many thousands of Canadians have written to their members of parliament urging them to do everything in their power to prevent the adoption of the proposed three maple leaf flag. I firmly believe that these people are right, that the adoption of this proposed three maple leaf flag would be a calamity. It can only bring about division, disunity and dissension. I feel that it is my duty, and the duty of every member of parliament, to adopt a course to prevent this from happening.

When the time comes when the majority of Canadians want a new flag, let us act in a mature manner and select one flag, without any thought of appeasement to any region or section of the country. The manner in which the resolution was introduced clearly indicates the lack of understanding of the situation by the government, and also its indecisiveness.

It has been suggested that the matter of a flag became urgent through the pressure of the premier of Quebec. It has also been suggested that the inclusion of the second flag in the resolution was at the request of the premier of Newfoundland. Be that as it may, the timing of the introduction of this resolution could not have been worse.

The appointment of the royal commission on biculturalism and bilingualism was completely wrong. The expenditure of the taxpayers' money on this type of commission is unjustified. With a population such as we have in Canada, with so many racial origins, there is no room for this type of commission.

Since it was appointed it has certainly stirred up the pot. Also, with the extremists and separatists movement having been active in Quebec during the past few months and receiving nation-wide publicity, the introduction of a flag resolution was looked upon by many millions of Canadians with suspicion and disfavour. Under this type of climate it is impossible to get any resemblance of unity, support or respect for the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister.

Before the Prime Minister introduced the resolution he said there would be a free vote on this subject. Later he reversed that decision and said his government would stand or fall on this resolution and, if the resolution were defeated, he would take it as a vote of non-confidence and call an election. A few days ago he again reversed his decision and now says there will be a free vote. But it was ably pointed out by the Liberal member for York-Humber that there could not be a free vote on this resolution, that the resolution stood in the name of the Prime Minister and was seconded by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau). It therefore was a government motion and no free vote could be held.

If there is a general desire on the part of the Prime Minister for a free vote, he should withdraw the resolution and have it resubmitted by a backbencher. Many members have made suggestions and recommendations to help the Prime Minister and the government get out of the impasse in which they find themselves. The amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to hold a referendum or plebiscite, was moved for this purpose. Having been denied the right of a free vote in parliament, and the proposed flag having become a political flag, and with the impasse the government find themselves in, the only proper and honourable course to follow is to refer this to the people themselves and let them make the choice. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) spells out more clearly how the ballot could be taken, and I have many editorials here supporting the stand that a plebiscite should be held.

I would strongly urge members from all parties to support the subamendment. This would put into operation the most democratic principle of all, where the decision on a flag rests with the people themselves. This could be done most easily and economically at the time of the next general election. Once the vote was over, I feel certain that practically every Canadian would be willing to accept the rule of the majority, which would leave this country united and strong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 10.30 this house stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 1, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACQUARRIE—ANNIVERSARY OF CHARLOTTETOWN CONFERENCE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the house to an event of national importance and historic significance which occurred in my constituency. Exactly 100 years ago, at two o'clock in the afternoon of September 1, 1864, the Charlottetown conference was called into session in the legislative council chamber of Prince Edward Island. Later that afternoon the official delegates from the maritime provinces agreeably and readily opened the conference doors to their fellow legislators from Canada and, by setting aside the smaller plan of maritime union and discussing a greater federal union instead, the conference delegates of 1864 laid the foundations of the great and free dominion whose people we collectively represent in this chamber.

As with other gatherings, Mr. Speaker, before and since, the Charlottetown conference illustrated that many human endeavours begun poorly may end brilliantly. Delegates from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were not met by their island hosts, and there was not sufficient hotel space for the Canadians. Not surprisingly, the Prince Edward Island government was criticized by the press for its inept and inhospitable performance. But again, not surprisingly, the government had its explanations; the Nova Scotia delegation arrived earlier than expected, the New Brunswickers later and the Canadians in greater numbers than had been anticipated. Happily, history records that these little slips were soon quite overborne by the lavish hospitality which the islanders in succeeding days extended to their visitors.

Many at the time were unimpressed, Mr. Speaker, by the actions and utterances of the politicians of 1864, but others more perceptive appreciated more fully what was taking place in their time. The Charlottetown Monitor viewed the conference as "perhaps the most important event—as far at least as the future destinies of these colonies are concerned—that has occurred during the present century". It hoped that the delegates' deliberations would "culminate in the creation ... of a great nation in this western hemisphere of which neither we nor our remotest posterity will ever have cause to be ashamed".

May we today, Mr. Speaker, as we honour the fathers of our nation, drawing strength from their devotion, inspiration from their accomplishment, and example from their performance, go on to preserve that which they bequeathed us. Of them it was later declared, "Providence being their guide they builded better than they knew". Of us may it be said "They destroyed not what their fathers left them, rather did they ever cherish, strengthen and extend the nation which faith had conceived and wisdom constructed".

As one of the representatives of the cradle of confederation, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity of saying these few words, inadequate as they are in relation to the magnitude of the event they are intended to honour.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. MacNaught), I should like to echo the words of the hon. member for Queens, my fellow academic, and I will not in the least attempt to differ with him about the historical view he has given to the house this afternoon. Indeed, the hon. gentleman is a lily I would not attempt to gild. But it did occur to me, sir, that since at Charlottetown a meeting is taking place to commemorate that original meeting of the founding fathers which, whatever the welcome may have been at the beginning, seemed to be very hospitable before the close if one can judge from the accounts of the food and other dainties which were consumed at the time, I doubt whether these latter day statesmen would have as strong stomachs as the original Fathers of Confederation, though I am sure they have just as strong hearts.

I do think, sir, that on this day we should look forward to even greater development than we have seen in that century that has passed.

It did occur to me, sir, that the house might wish to have the opening address which is being made in Charlottetown today by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister added not in the record but as an appendix to the record in commemoration of this day—a day, I might add, very much happier than that day a quarter of a century ago that all of us remember when that terrible war started from which the world is still recovering.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of address see appendix.]

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East) presented the third and fourth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the fourth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—REPORTED STATEMENT BY FORESTRY MINISTER RESPECTING ARDA PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry. It has to do with the serious agricultural situation, particularly in the province of Quebec. I would ask him what he meant when in a speech at Ste Lucie, Quebec, he is reported, as found in Le Soleil, to have made this statement:

Mr. Sauvé explained to a couple of hundred farmers that the task would be difficult—

That is the task of bringing ARDA into full and factual achievement.

—once the new program was put into effect because "at that moment the game of politics will come into the picture".

What did the minister have in mind in that regard, and what are the difficulties he anticipated by the use of those words?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, at that time I was not referring to ARDA but to the problems of eastern agriculture and the new outlook that would be necessary to solve those problems; that would be very difficult political decisions to be taken by all parties concerned, provincial and federal, and that there would be political opposition to some of the proposals which would be made because some people might benefit from contrary views for political ends. I have not in mind any particular party or people, just the straight game of politics as we know it in the provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What were the particular proposals the minister had in mind as he placed them before this gathering, and what particular political interference would there be in the application of such a non-political plan as the one which was set up under the distinguished leadership of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle?

Mr. Sauvé: I was not referring to ARDA but to the problems of eastern agriculture, as mentioned in the eastern farm survey which was tabled in the house about two months ago. All the problems were mentioned in this report; I brought it to the attention of the people. We were discussing the general situation of eastern agriculture. I was not speaking of ARDA. I did not divulge any of the proposals we intend to make to the provinces for the renewal of the agreements.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry.

In establishing his farm program for eastern Canada, does he propose to take into account the political consideration to which he referred in his speech?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that extremely serious problems will have to be worked out when the federal and provincial governments advance proposals to find a solution to the farm problem of eastern Canada.

When we have proposed those solutions to the people, there will undoubtedly be some who will have opposite views, which is entirely normal. Never in the statements I made in Ste Lucie de Beauregard did I talk about anything except the normal game of politics. I have not seen the report or newspaper clipping which the Leader of the Opposition holds in his hand, but I am sure that I did not say anything wrong there.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. A few moments ago, if I am not mistaken, the Minister of Forestry said: Politics as we know it in the province of Quebec.

Could the minister tell us—

Mr. Sauvé: No.

Mr. Ricard: When reading over your blues, you will find those words at the end of your first reply to the Leader of the Opposition. You said: "As we know it in the province of Quebec."

Does the minister mean by this that such a situation only exists in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Sauvé: I never said that, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Forestry. Is the minister undertaking an unusual recruitment drive for technical personnel in view of the expected expansion of the activities of his department?

Mr. Sauvé: No, we are dealing through the civil service commission in the normal way.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Forestry.

Could he tell us if one of the decisions he is supposed to take in co-operation with the Quebec government and which, as he put it, might not be a popular one is consistent with the rumour now going around to the effect that the federal government and the Quebec provincial government would be advising a fairly large number of farmers to leave their farms and go into some other industrial fields?

Mr. Sauvé: I do not know anything about such rumours or decisions, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

TURKEYS—REIMPOSITION OF QUOTAS ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has any progress been made since the minister told the house that he would look into the very difficult situation faced by the turkey growers of Canada?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am meeting the turkey people at their annual meeting in Winnipeg on the 14th. The hon. member will be pleased to learn that there has been no importation of turkeys in the past 12 to 14 days.

[Later:]

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture. On August 26 I asked the same question and the answer was about the same. He said:

> —I shall be at that meeting to explain to these people why we do not feel we should impose these quotas at this time.

If the minister has an explanation for the people at this meeting, would he not give it to the house?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, if I have time I will be glad to do this, but it will take about an hour.

DAIRY PRODUCTS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING CONDITION OF INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and its urgency is based on the logical concern of eastern dairy farmers over the recent statement in the house by the minister. I should like to ask the minister whether, since he made his statement in the house on the eastern dairy industry, he has consulted individual dairy farmers or officials in his department. Does he feel that the eastern dairy industry is in better shape today than it has been in the last 15 years?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I still feel that the dairy industry is in much better shape than it has been for some time. Nevertheless we realize that there could be great improvements, and we are working toward this end.

Mr. Grafftey: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister's point of view expressed after having consulted individual dairy farmers, and whom did he consult before he made his statement to the house?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I just looked at the dominion bureau of statistics reports.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Did the minister consult the Prime Minister before the latter's departure for Prince Edward Island concerning the possibility of calling a meeting of dairy producers and representatives of farm organizations in order to establish, before the house adjourns, an emergency policy concerning the dairy industry as requested by farmers?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to meet with organizations of dairy farmers at any time in so far as their problems are concerned. If I may be permitted, I think I can reply to this question best by reading briefly from an article which appeared in the Family Herald weekly, although it is not altogether too kindly toward this side of the house. The article refers to the dairy problem and states:

> What is Harry Hays up to? In mid July the federal agriculture minister told cattle breeders at Waterloo, Ontario, that the list of government business at the fall session of parliament will include a new dairy program.
> "We are now working out a whole new approach to Canada's long-standing dairy problem"... "As you can imagine, I'm sure, this is a complicated and delicate job and one which we must work out in close co-operation with all the provinces—"

I could go on and read quite a bit more, but the last paragraph I think would be of interest to the hon. member. This article is written by one of the members of the parliamentary press gallery, and he says:

> With the industry healthier today than it has been in years, one wonders why Mr. Hays has chosen this moment to act.
> —David Suderman

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. After the minister's statement about the dominion bureau of statistics, does he now feel that Marie Antoinette's statement "Let them eat cake" should now read "Let them read statistics"?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Minister of Agriculture say whether he has taken steps to meet with the farmers who have announced a march on Ottawa?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, we should be very pleased to meet them if and when they march.

[Mr. Vincent.]

QUEBEC—INCREASE IN FEED GRAIN PRICES FOLLOWING SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Can he explain to the members of the house the reason why the price of feed grain and their by-products must rise in consequence of his policy of subsidizing truck transportation?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, August 28, I announced to the house that a number of amendments have been made to the policy of payment of transportation costs for feed grain. Those amendments will become effective on September 14.

The hon. member will find details of this policy on page 7439 of Hansard for August 28, 1964.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Minister of Forestry tell us whether a farmer making use of his own trucks for transportation will be getting those subsidies? If so, what steps should he take to take advantage of them?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, this is a technical question. I shall give a detailed answer to the hon. member tomorrow or the day after.

FINANCE

REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS AND EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Due to the alarming increase in business failures during the month of July, as reported in this morning's Globe and Mail, will the minister not consider rescinding the sales tax on building supplies and materials and on machinery and equipment, or at least cancelling the additional tax due to take effect at the end of this year?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I read the account in the morning paper. There has been an increase in the number of bankruptcies, due in large measure I believe to the overexpansion of certain smaller firms and some medium size firms with inadequate capital, prompted by the general expansion of business activity. I do not relate the basic reasons for these increases to the other question my hon. friend raised.

Mr. Monteith: As a supplementary question, the same article pointed out that such an increase in bankruptcies in Canada was in direct contrast with the situation during the month of July in the United States, where there was actually a decrease in the failures, and I am wondering if, since that country has introduced tax reductions and Canada has increased taxation this would not have a great deal to do with it.

Mr. Gordon: I am not sure if that was a question or just a wonderment on the part of the hon. member.

Mr. Monteith: It is a question. I am simply asking if the minister would not agree with this assumption?

Mr. Gordon: Certainly not, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Will the minister refer this matter to his new outside advisers?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I don't know if that was a serious question.

Mr. Martineau: Sure it is.

Mr. Gordon: The various commissions that have been looking into business and financial activities in Canada, and the Canadian tax foundation, have advised that the Department of Finance staff should be strengthened, and I am taking their advice seriously. I think it is important advice, and if the staff of the department can be strengthened I think it will work out to everybody's advantage.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that he is enlisting at present additional staff to advise and assist him in the preparation of his next budget, has the Minister of Finance considered inviting representatives of the working class as well as farmers' representatives to assist him in that work, in order that the views of those two important social groups be represented and can permeate into the ivory tower of his department?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, first of all the individuals we are recruiting for the department are to assist departmental officials in respect of the recommendations that will be forthcoming from various tax commissions in Canada. In answer to my hon. friend's question, I will most certainly welcome all the help and advice I can get from labour organizations, agricultural organizations or any other organizations in this country that will improve the economy of this country still further.

OILSEEDS—TARIFF BOARD REPORT RECOMMENDING FREE ENTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance in connection with the recent tariff board report. The minister must be aware of the board's recommendation that would allow oilseeds, including soybeans, flax and rapeseed free entry into Canada despite the fact that farm organizations and I have strongly opposed this. Could the minister look into this situation to see that no injustice is done?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I was required to do, I tabled the report of the tariff board in respect of this matter within the prescribed period, and when doing so I asked any interested party who might have any views in respect of the report or recommendations to submit those views to me. I can assure my hon. friend that such views will be given most careful consideration.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. I asked a question of the Prime Minister on Thursday which he promised to look into, and in his absence I would like to direct it today to the President of the Privy Council. I wish to ask him whether he has had time to look into the allegation by the national unemployment insurance employees association that the salary increase granted to group B employees represents approximately 50 per cent of what was recommended by the federal civil service commission. Has the minister had time to look into that, and can he give the house an answer?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will realize that an answer to his question in the form in which he asked it involves giving information about the recommendations from the civil service commission. These recommendations are, by a decision of this house, held to be confidential. That decision was confirmed by a vote of the house in 1960, so I cannot answer his question in the form in which he asked it.

However, if the hon. member is dealing with the general matter of the pay increases in group B, recently announced, I can add by way of explanation that on Friday of last week the Prime Minister and I received a delegation representing the staff side conference of the public service. The staff side conference made certain representations and presented some additional arguments and data, and that matter is receiving consideration at the moment.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question may I ask the minister whether this means that the salary increases which were granted are now going to be reviewed in the light of the representations which were made, and that there is some hope they may be revised upward?

Mr. McIlraith: Well, all the additional representations made at that meeting, together with representations from one or two other organizations that are not represented in the staff side conference, will be given full consideration and a decision will be taken on the whole matter.

Mr. Douglas: By whom will this review be made; by a committee of the cabinet or a treasury board committee?

Mr. McIlraith: The treasury board is a standing committee of the cabinet.

Mr. Douglas: Then it will be the treasury board which will do this, not a special select committee?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know how much detail the hon. member wants me to give about the processes of the government in arriving at a decision of this sort, but I presume it will be a treasury board decision, dealt with by the full cabinet.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR MEETING RESPECTING VETERANS PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I do so because of a telegram I received only a few moments ago. I would like to ask the minister whether he will accede to the urgent request of the Fraserview veterans for an open meeting with himself as their federal M.P. and a representative of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to discuss their housing problems, in view of the recently announced and soon to come into effect government policy on increased rentals and home purchase prices.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatsoever to seeing any of my constituents at any time. As a matter of fact I have met this particular group before, sometimes when the hon. member for Vancouver East was present. It would be my hope that he could also attend when I meet them again.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF ONTARIO ASSOCIATION OF AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General?

Could the minister tell us if he has read the report on public housing submitted recently by the Ontario association of housing authorities, and if he intends to present shortly a program to improve the lot of a great number of ill-housed families in Canada?

[Text]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I cannot truthfully say I have read the full report. It has several hundred pages. I can say that I have read parts of it; I have read the conclusions; and I have read an analysis prepared for me by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I would like to assure the hon. gentleman and the house—and if the hon. gentleman will read the report himself he will see this is so—that a great many of the recommendations contained in this report have already been incorporated in the amendments to the National Housing Act that became law in late June of this year. Others of the recommendations have been incorporated in the complementary legislation passed by the province of Ontario earlier this year. The others that have not been dealt with will receive careful consideration.

THE MINISTRY

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES FOR FAMILIES AND FRIENDS OF MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister tell the house whether it is a common practice with this government to put at the disposal of ministers going on trips for the government a coach for their families and friends? I refer to trips on government business.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not a common practice, and the hon. gentleman might be more specific and perhaps commit this question to writing.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

TORONTO—CANADA COUNCIL GRANT TO CREST THEATRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Has he yet transmitted my question of yesterday concerning the Crest theatre to the Canada Council; and if so, has he received any comment?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member has been transmitted to the Canada Council but no answer has yet been received.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is waiting for a reply and comment in this regard, would he also ask the Canada Council where they hope to secure actors for all the centres for the performing arts that are being built as centennial projects, if the grant to the place from which the actors come is to be discontinued?

Mr. Lamontagne: I will, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TORONTO, ONT.—DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO STRIKING NEWSPAPER EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Labour. I would like to ask it again now that the minister is here. Could the minister give us any explanation as to the reason for the I.T.U. strikers in Toronto being ruled ineligible for unemployment insurance?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the insurance officer, reviewing the applications for benefits by the persons employed in the composing rooms, came to the conclusion that a substantial stoppage of work had taken place and this had been due to a labour dispute. For that reason the insurance officer disqualified this group from receiving benefits.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether it is true that the unemployment insurance commission have sent questionnaires to the publishers, and that if the answers to these questionnaires show that an 85 per cent production has been resumed, will they then be eligible for unemployment insurance?

Mr. MacEachen: I have no information as to the existence of a questionnaire, Mr. Speaker, but I do understand that just as soon as the insurance officer satisfies himself that a substantial resumption of work has taken place in this particular area of activity, the applications for benefits will be reconsidered. I will attempt to get information with respect to the questionnaire.

Mr. Scott: I have one final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is seeking this further information, can he ascertain how the unemployment insurance commission decides whether there is a substantial resumption of work? I understand the questionnaires have already been sent out and are sitting on the desks of the publishers.

Mr. MacEachen: The insurance officer will probably consider the restoration of normal working conditions and the disappearance of what apparently is still considered to be an emergency situation in the working operations of the newspapers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING MEMBERS AND STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It has to do with sordid and, if I may use language within the restrictions of parliament, scurrilous statements made by one Macdonald which cast aspersions on all members of this house who were members in 1961, as well as on the staff of parliament. This was a general allegation that was made. Believing in freedom of speech as I do, and as I know the hon. gentleman does, is it the opinion of the government that the allegations that have been made constitute a disparagement of the House of Commons and its members and a contempt of this house?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that I read the same press report of these utterances as the right hon. gentleman. I read it immediately before coming into the house and have had no chance at all of discussion with any of my colleagues. Moreover, it is well known that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are absent in Charlottetown. It would not have been possible therefore, I think, for the government to form any opinion on this matter.

I must say, speaking as a member of parliament, that I think it is a perfectly shocking kind of allegation to appear, and quite frankly I am most reluctant to believe that it has any kind of substance whatsoever. When we think of what was said by this same person about Hon. M. J. Coldwell, which was refuted completely yesterday, I think his credibility as a witness has been somewhat discredited already. However, I do think it is a matter on which it would not be the government but the law officers of the crown that would form an opinion as to whether any kind of appropriate action could be taken which would not in any way endanger the right to speak foolishly and recklessly, which is one of the prized possessions of free people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the summation on the part of the Acting Prime Minister is an excellent epitome of freedom; but freedom does not, of course, include the right to libel in general or in such a way as actually to cast a shadow on all the members of this house and on all the staff of this house who have been here since 1961. Personally I am not concerned about contemptible statements of this kind, but I do think the minister should bring this matter before the Prime Minister, and any decision made by the Prime Minister in his position as custodian of the rights and prerogatives of parliament will, I am sure, be in the best interests of us all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite agree with the right hon. gentleman. I would go further and say that I believe the only way in which there should be any abridgment of freedom of speech is by the rule of law; and while this house is frequently referred to as a court, it is not a court in that sense. The only proper place for the adjudication of questions as to whether freedom of speech has turned into offensive licence is in the law courts of our country, and I hope no decision of that kind will ever be made anywhere else.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the implications of this to all members, may I ask which member of this House of Commons is going to take the matter to a court of law?

Mr. Pickersgill: If there is anything actionable I am sure the right hon. gentleman, whose view I accepted, is quite correct when he says that the Prime Minister as the leader of the house should give consideration to the matter in consultation with the Minister of Justice. I am quite sure that it would be for them and for our colleagues to decide whether it was proper for action to be taken, what kind of action should be taken, and in what jurisdiction.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he is aware that donations to the organization known as Underdog are exempt for income tax purposes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge either of the organization or of the question the hon. gentleman refers to, but I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue will look into this point.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister, when considering this matter, would also consider looking into the responsibility for republication of this type of scurrilous material by the press and whether, consistent with the freedom of the press, anything could be done in that regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I assume the utterance itself and the diffusion of the utterance are matters which would have to be considered together. It is quite true that this person would perhaps not be very widely heard if there was no reporting of his remarks by people who have greater financial resources than he appears to have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, most of us do not object to being reported.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact the right hon. gentleman frequently complains about the way in which he is reported.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have had assistance in that regard from the Minister of Transport on several occasions.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALVIN MACDONALD—REPORTED LISTING AS COMMUNIST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is an excellent point to answer the question asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury yesterday with respect to Mr. Calvin Macdonald and his statement accusing the Department of Veterans Affairs of listing him as a communist and preventing him from obtaining employment.

First of all I want to assure the hon. member as well as the house that the Department of Veterans Affairs does not, has not and will not deal in this fashion. It does not list people according to ideological or political concept. Second, it has never prevented Mr. Macdonald from obtaining employment. Quite the contrary; over a period of time attempts have been made to assist in his rehabilitation including attempts made to locate suitable employment for him.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL TO ACCEPT CHEQUE DRAWN ON CREDIT UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reg Cantelon (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration of which I have sent him notice. The minister has received a letter from the credit union league of Saskatchewan having to do with contract bonds between the department and contracting firms. I quote one paragraph:

> Our information received from the manager of the Meadow Lake credit union indicates that your department has refused to accept a certified cheque on the credit union and insists that such a cheque be drawn on a chartered bank.

My question is, will the minister remove this discriminatory provision against credit unions?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I am not personally aware of the letter to which the hon. member refers. However, I should point out that procedures in respect to tendering and security deposits are governed by the government contracts regulations. These regulations, applicable to all departments, provide for security deposits in the form of certified cheques drawn on banks to which the Bank Act or the Quebec Savings Banks Act applies.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Speaker, supplementary to my recent question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, I understand the regulation to which he referred, but my question was, would he see that this regulation is removed?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that those regulations are under consideration at the moment. However, I will bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

PROPOSED UNION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Has he received any communication from the premier of New Brunswick relative to his proposal made at the Charlottetown conference that there be a union of the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any communication, and the Prime Minister's office has not advised me of any which has been received, but I will make inquiries.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EQUALIZATION OF PAY FOR PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Has he a reply to the question I asked him the other day with regard to the prevailing rate employees at Dana?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The question the hon. member asked had to do with the difference in prevailing rates paid to certain government employees in Dana and in Saskatoon. On investigation we found that in some classes of employment the rate was the same in Dana as in Saskatoon but that in other classes there was a difference. As a result we are having the whole matter looked into by the Department of Labour to see whether there should be a revision of the rates in the classes where there is a difference. I do not have that answer, because it will take some weeks for that process to be completed, but it is being considered now.

REPORTED INTENTION TO DISBAND SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN REGIMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of National Defence. My question is based on an article appearing in the Estevan Sun Advertiser of August 27 and a telegram I received from Estevan today. Can the minister say there is no basis for the rumour circulating in western Canada that the South Saskatchewan Regiment, with its glorious war record, is to be disbanded?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, decisions in respect of reorganizations of the militia have not yet been taken.

REPORTED DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION TO COMMUNIST AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) asked me to make inquiries about a statement made by Mr. Macdonald to the effect that a wireless operator in the Department of National Defence would have given secret information to a communist agency.

After investigation in the Department of National Defence it appears that there is no report indicating that a wireless operator in the department has given such secret information to a communist agency.

INCOME TAX

HAL BANKS—STEPS TO ASSURE RETENTION OF ASSETS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue with reference to Hal Banks, income tax and the question I asked yesterday. Has the minister taken steps to see that the assets belonging to this man are not entirely removed from Canadian jurisdiction?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary yesterday, I would like to indicate that Mr. Banks' whereabouts is not known to the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue, and that there is a question as to whether he is still a resident of Canada for income tax purposes. While it is not in the public interest and is contrary to the Income Tax Act to reveal information about Mr. Banks' income and taxes that may be due, since it is a matter of public record, I can inform the hon. member that there is a hypothec registered against his property in favour of the crown to secure taxes due.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF SERVICE AT REGWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can he announce any decision in respect of keeping the important port of entry at Regway, Saskatchewan, open on a 24 hour basis after September 14?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, may I take this question as notice.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that we are in the month of September, and now that our recess is just around the corner—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I refer, of course, to the Christmas recess—during which week of this month will the resolution respecting the revised version of the Canada pension plan be placed on the order paper?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take up my hon. friend's question with the house leader.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that as long ago as April 23 the Prime Minister promised that we would proceed with this matter as soon as the constitutional amendment had been agreed to?

An hon. Member: What's a promise?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, the rhetorical question just asked by my hon. friend is one, of course, the answer to which everyone in the house knows. As my hon. friend is well aware, the difficulty is that the program of the government has been brought very much to a halt by virtue of the action of hon. members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Miss LaMarsh: The order paper is already filled with very important matters which we have not been able to deal with, and it is thought there is really very little to be gained by adding more items to the order paper now before those already there are dealt with.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister not realize that it would be evidence of the government's readiness to go ahead with the Canada pension plan if it would at least put the resolution on the order paper?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to repeat that the government is ready and willing, and with a little co-operation from the other side we will also be able.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the legislation now ready?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am in a position to say this. I do not have a copy in both languages on my desk, and I will have to check.

Mr. Monteith: A different story.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR NATIONAL SURVEY ON NUTRITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On Friday last I asked her a question with regard to a national survey of health and nutrition. Is she in a position to answer the question today?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My parliamentary secretary gave me the question which was asked the other day. I should like to say that I noticed the newspaper report suggesting that there should be a national survey of nutrition in the country. I am advised that members of my department have been in consultation with officials of the Department of Agriculture and the dominion bureau of statistics, and that they have been looking into whether there is any value to be derived from having a national survey.

It is quite true that in Canada we do not have the kind of information that is available in the United States, and the effect of not having such detailed information is being thoroughly reviewed. It is appreciated that such a survey would take considerable time and staff and would be very costly. It will also have to be determined whether this is the most effective way to use the staff and resources we have available.

I can only say to my hon. friend and the house at this time that the departmental study is not sufficiently advanced for me to take any final decision in the matter.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED INTENTION OF CANADIAN FIRMS TO ESTABLISH U.S. BRANCHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. It stems from a newspaper report of an interview in Toronto last Thursday with Robert W. Latta, industrial development director of the Buffalo area chamber of commerce. The report reads in part as follows:

> He said that 7 of 17 firms he canvassed in Toronto this week were interested in setting up branch plants near Buffalo. He plans further trips here to meet officials of another 37 firms.

Could the minister's department not get in touch with these firms to try to encourage them to stay in Canada, manufacture here and export their products so as to help our export trade, which we need so badly, between this country and the United States?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, while there will probably be some difficulty in ascertaining the names of these firms, since I assume the industrial development officer from Buffalo is not going to make their names available to me so I can work against him, I will be glad to look into the matter and see what we can do.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Monteith: Surely you have enough employees to find out something.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BATCHAWANA, ONT.—ASSISTANCE TO FAMILIES FACING EVICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration concerning the Indian families at Batchawana in the Sault Ste. Marie district who have been served with eviction notices by Scott Misener Steamship Company Limited.

In view of the statement by the local parish priest that these people lack the financial resources to protect their interests properly in court, can the minister assure the house that the Indian affairs branch will be given the necessary authority, encouragement and financial resources to make certain that the rights, privileges and desires of these Indian Canadians will be fully protected in court?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, after making inquiries I found out that of the 250 persons who might be affected by the company anxious to take over their properties, only 47 were Indians coming under the Indian Act.

I understand that those 47 persons can avail themselves of all the advantages provided by the department for a location in the two reserves already allocated to the Indians living there.

On the other hand, I am informed that the 47 Indians coming under the Indian Act consider themselves as forming part of this group of 250 people and they wish, as individuals, to assert their claims to those properties.

As far as I know no request has been submitted to the department for legal or financial assistance, in order to put forward the group's views to the company wanting to take over the properties in question.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Monday, August 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, at 10.30 last night when the house adjourned I was speaking in support of the subamendment to the amendment to the flag resolution, and had not quite completed my remarks.

At the conclusion of my remarks last night I was urging all hon. members to lend their support to the subamendment. I strongly urge some member of the government to rise in his or her place and indicate the government's support for the subamendment, for if someone did this we could immediately move on to other urgent business. However, on reading Mr. Newman's article in the Toronto Star yesterday it would appear that the government has no legislation ready. Under the subheading "No Bills Ready" Mr. Newman says:

> The Conservatives' filibuster has not, as is generally believed, prevented parliament from dealing with a backlog of essential legislation. The Liberal administration, unaccountably, has no major bills ready for debate. The pension plan, which was supposed to be the showpiece of the Liberal's first year in office, is now in its fourth sad mutation.

It does seem inexcusable that the government has no legislation ready. It is further proof of a mismanaged and badly organized session. The Prime Minister and the government house leader have to take full responsibility for this. The order of business is in their hands. The Minister of Justice entered the debate last Thursday when he suggested the extension of the hours of sitting. This shows a lack of understanding of the situation.

This is the 139th day of this session and so far there has been no recess. I urge that some consideration should be given to the welfare of the staff. I merely wish to point out that the Hansard reporters, the Hansard staff generally and others are working under pressure and against time. If orderly recesses were arranged it would be much better for everyone concerned. This is another indication of the mismanagement of this session.

Our Indian citizens have not been consulted about the flag. Their wishes have not been taken into consideration. The Indians do not like a flag which does not contain the union jack. They are afraid that removal of the union jack would mean that the treaties they have made with the Queen would also be done away with. Anything which gives rise to fears or suspicion in the minds of people should be avoided.

The only logical and reasonable approach to this issue is the holding of a referendum. Many members have stressed the need for unity, and have pointed out that a flag should unite people. There is no point in changing the present flag until our people plainly want a new one and until there is an agreement among the majority on a design. If such a flag, when selected, would tend to bring about a greater degree of unity, then it would serve a useful purpose. The present proposed flag does neither of these things.

If the Prime Minister believes that the flag proposed in this resolution would bring about unity and respect, then I suggest he accept the subamendment forthwith and pass the matter on to the people for their consideration. I have faith in the tolerance and understanding of the people of Canada. I believe that any decision they themselves make will help the ties that bind and result in a stronger and more united Canada. I personally want to see a free, strong and united Canada. There is no room for dictatorship or dictatorial methods in our society. Let us forthwith pass this issue over to the people for them to make a decision. Then parliament can move forward and take action on the many important pieces of legislation which should be dealt with and which affect the economic well-being of every Canadian.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was impressed at the opening of this sitting when the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) and the Minister of Transport, as Acting Prime Minister, recalled the days of 100 years ago when we saw the beginning of the action which culminated in the British North America Act and brought about the uniting of Canada with Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

It is well to recall the events of those days at a time when we are discussing a matter of great importance to Canada, to her people, to her destiny, and above all to her unity now. And it is well to recall the difficulties of those days for many, especially for the faint hearted. The position was one of defeatism. There were separatists in those days, too. There were annexationists who believed that the ultimate destiny of Canada was to join the United States. Indeed, as the house very well knows, from 1776 under the articles of confederation Canada had the right and the prerogative to join the 13 colonies on an equal basis on the terms under which they entered their journey into history as the United States of America.

One of the matters dealt with during this conference in Charlottetown might well have been consideration of a general agreement by the premiers of the provinces and the Prime Minister of Canada on designs, or on a design, for a national flag for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, that was not to be; for the Prime Minister had seen fit months ago to determine his design and to determine, as well, that parliament should accept that design or face an election. It took three months for the Prime Minister to realize that the bludgeon, the threat, would have no effect on Her Majesty's loyal opposition. When he found that to be the case he decided he would in fact grant a free vote.

The Prime Minister and the premiers are meeting. I hope they will be able to achieve the repatriation of the constitution. We almost succeeded and would have done so but for one or two comparatively minor matters to which objection was taken by the province of Quebec and, even more so, by the province of Saskatchewan when that province was under a socialist government. Now there has been a change. It is not for me to discuss the merits or demerits of that change, but there has also been a change in the premiership, and the new premier has agreed that action may be taken. So we may hope that after the many failures of the past we shall attain now, with the assistance of the tremendous contribution made by the minister of justice in my administration, that which has eluded Canadians for many, many years.

It is well to recall the speeches of 1864 and 1865. Some today talk about Canada being two nations. That did not represent the views of John A. Macdonald or Georges Étienne Cartier. It does not represent the views of two members of the cabinet today. The Minister of Forestry has come out foursquare for one Canada, and the Minister without Portfolio has stated that he believes this is one nation and not two. Also I recall that another member of the cabinet, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, ridiculed the view I expressed of one Canada and said it was nothing but a futile slogan; but in the intervening months two members of the cabinet have broken with the views of other members of the cabinet in this regard, and it is worthy of note that they are both from the province of Quebec. Indeed, they represent the views of Macdonald.

I quote Macdonald's words in 1865 at the third session of the provincial parliament of Canada:

—it seems to me as to them, and I think it will so appear to the people of this country, that, if we wish to be a great people; if we wish to form—using the expression which was sneered at the other evening—a great nationality, commanding the respect of the world, able to hold our own against all opponents, and to defend these institutions we prize; if we wish to have one system of government, and to establish a commercial union...obeying the same sovereign, owing the same allegiance....if we wish to be able to afford to each other the means of mutual defence....this can only be obtained by a union of some kind between the scattered and weak boundaries composing the British North American provinces.

I suggest that hon. members also read the speech of Cartier, the embodiment of French Canada and its aspirations, made on February 7, 1865. He dealt with the discussions that had taken place:

The matter resolved itself into this, either we must obtain British North American confederation or be absorbed in an American confederation. Some entertained the opinion that it was unnecessary to have British North American confederation to prevent absorption into the vortex of American confederation. Such parties were mistaken. We knew the policy of England towards us—that she was determined to help and support us in any struggle with our neighbours.

Those days and those fears of course no longer exist. Then he went on to say:

The absorption of this province into the United States had long been contemplated, as would be seen from the 7th article in the original draft of the constitution (American).

Then he referred to article 7, which ends up with these words:

But, except Canada, no other colony shall be admitted into the confederacy without the assent of 11 or more votes, as the case may require, by the confederation being extended.

Then he said:

As early as 1775, the French Canadians were solemnly addressed in a proclamation by General Washington, who called upon them to abandon the flag of their new masters, inasmuch as they could not expect anything from those who differ from them in language, in religion, in race, and in sympathies. But what was the conduct of the French Canadian people under these circumstances —what was the attitude of the clergy and the seigneurs? It was the right in treating this chapter of our history, to render justice to whom justice was due and it was truth to say that the seigneurs, forming as they did, the educated class of our population at that early epoch, had fully understood that the object and aim of those who appealed to them was the downfall of the monarchical system in America.

Then he went on to say—and these are not his words, they are mine—they had not been moved. Then he said:

Incited by these motives, and encouraged by the advice of many friends of liberty among you, the grand American congress have sent an army into your province—

Then he dealt with the reaction of those who but a few years before had found themselves in the position of having lost. They joined; they stood. Then he said this:

The question for us to ask ourselves was this: Shall we be content to maintain a mere provincial existence, when, by combining together we could become a great nation...a great nation could not be formed—

—unless there was a joining with Lower Canada—

—in great part French and Roman Catholic, and Upper Canada...English and Protestant——the other provinces mixed.

That was their aim. That was their purpose. That was their dream, and I think that purpose and that objective are as true today as when they were uttered by the Macdonalds and the Cartiers, repeated by the Lauriers and the St. Laurents and by the Lapointes throughout the years of Canadian parliamentary life.

Today I am going to review something of the elements that have been brought before this house so powerfully by so many members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in recent weeks. I read in the press, I hear from the voices of those who see nothing good in any stand the Conservative party takes, criticism of parliament today and criticism of the speeches made. I hear the strident voices of criticism saying the speeches have been boring. No one can say I participated except for 25 minutes, so I have been a listener; and I say to you, sir, that in almost a quarter of a century of membership in the House of Commons I have not seen or heard more consistently good speeches than have been delivered here, coming as they were from the heart, coming from the soul, and coming from the feelings and traditions that we support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not talking about hon. gentlemen opposite. Their contribution has been the contribution of the hon. member for Lotbinière, who has led them. No longer is he to be with us, Mr. Speaker. The voice of interruption is to be stilled. For the last two weeks he has been rotating from seat to seat, apparently representing a new leadership on the government side, because certainly they have not shown other leadership in this regard. They have been silent. Why, the silence of the sepulcher does not exceed the silence of a government under attack.

And do you know why they are silent? Well, hon. gentlemen sometimes reveal the reasons they are silent when they speak outside the house. The hon. member for Port Arthur has a program on television, and he has been able to mobilize hon. gentlemen from all parts of the house. I regard it as a most interesting program, "Fisher's Frolics," and I do not say that disrespectfully because I say that he is able to draw out—I think the expression is "draw out"—the truth, by that bedside manner he exhibits.

It is amazing what he has been able to achieve. Do you know why they are silent, Mr. Speaker? I am not going to read it all, but if any hon. gentleman would like it tabled I would be glad to do so. He had an interview with two Liberal members on August 2, and he started out by saying of them:

> Neither in my opinion is a rubber stamp—

In other words "there are no rubber stamps here." They gave their experience. They talked of these great men who occupy the front seats of Liberalism. They spoke of it, and what did they say? They seemed to detect an attitude of domination. They believed these great men should have their say. Let me quote one hon. member.

An hon. Member: Name?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said "They have a special place". He was referring to ministers:

> It was said, I won't say where it was said, I'll say very recently it was said by a minister to a backbencher, "You are not the same as we are".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: The typical attitude.

Mr. Diefenbaker: "You backbenchers, you are made of other stuff. In fact", said the hon. member—these are the very words he used—"How dare you say you are the same as we are?" The hon. member occupies a prominent place in the ranks of Liberalism opposite. Then another spoke and he said in effect, "Well, we don't know what is happening. We never know what is going to take place. They don't tell us anything". Then he said:

> Our people are amazed when an order is issued and they will call you up and say to you you know about these new wharfage charges. No, I don't know anything about them. Yet they could defeat me, but somebody initiated them that even the minister doesn't know too much about.

There is where he touched a tender nerve. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite would like me to read some more. Even the Minister of National Defence is mentioned. This Liberal member said, in effect, that the minister could not trust them:

> He didn't even trust it to be typed by the establishment.

The minister had to make his notes in his own handwriting, otherwise he might have been overwhelmed. Then he said:

> I know how people tick and this is the trouble in Ottawa.

One of them said the trouble in Ottawa is that they don't know what is happening. Mr. Speaker, now you are beginning to see why it is these people are silent. They are strong, silent men who make their observations from a seated position because they are afraid to stand up.

Sir, never have I seen anything approaching the attitude of this government. Only one minister apart from the Prime Minister has spoken. The Minister of Justice has made two general observations. Why is this, sir? These two members to whom I have alluded, who bared their souls to the Canadian people on television, who opened the secret recesses of their innermost depths, say "We don't know anything about these things because we belong to a different category". That is why they are not speaking. Two of them spoke, the hon. member for York-Humber and the hon. member for York East; and what they said was tremendously revealing. It indicated that nobody knew anything about what was going to be brought forward.

I am now going to deal with the course that was taken by the Prime Minister. I am going to be very restrained in my observations regarding him today, in his absence, because there will be other opportunities, I am told, for me to speak before this matter is concluded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We would like to know, not what the private members had to say; not the digits referred to by the two hon. members, but who were the four English speaking ministers who sold the Prime Minister on this flag design. There is one of the great mysteries. Mr. Stewart of the Montreal Star said over the C.B.C. that this was so. Who were they? I do not want to embarrass anyone, but the information I have is that two of them come from Toronto and one from the Pacific coast. I immediately absolve the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I designate the Postmaster General, because he came up with the three maple leaves on a stamp. I am going to deal with that, because what he said in April was different from what he said last week in this regard.

Who were these four? Why don't we get this information? These men deserve to have their names perpetuated in the annals of parliament. They showed the Prime Minister something that he never showed to his members until after he had revealed it at a siesta at 24 Sussex drive. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that he placed this design over the fireplace and said "I hanker after it". On the basis of recent experience he is hankering after something else at the moment.

Mr. Pugh: A handkerchief.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister said he hankered after it. These members had it given to him, and they cannot defend it. That is why they are silent. Why was this matter rushed before the house? What happened? To whom did the Prime Minister make promises? We don't know. In the month of February there was no reference to this matter in the speech from the throne; several weeks later there was no reference to it among the priorities.

Mackenzie King knew what a matter like this would do to the unity of this country. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent knew what would happen. Why was this matter suddenly brought forward? Never at any time in the election campaign had the Prime Minister said that by a distinctive flag he meant one from which was removed the union jack. There was not a word about that. That impression was left in the province of Quebec, but not by the Prime Minister. In other parts of Canada it did not appear in the program or in the advertisements, and I have them here. There is not one word. This parliament has no mandate and this government has no mandate to do what they are trying to do.

I am going to deal, Mr. Speaker, with some of the frenzied fantasies of the press and radio in their criticisms of the Conservative party for the stand they have taken. For who else is going to stand with us? Is it going to be the hon. gentlemen of the New Democratic party? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on January 12, 1964 advised the Legion in Manitoba that he was for the red ensign. He has changed; a metamorphosis has come over him in recent months. Will we get from that party the support of any more than two, three or four members in this regard?

Mr. Peters: Let us vote and you will find out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the Social Credit party? We have yet to find out where they stand, with the exception of one or two members. We want to know.

Some hon. Members: Let us vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ah, they say let us vote. Mr. Speaker, that illustrates above everything else the philosophy of the people who have said that. That is what they say under alien forms of government, just "vote". We know where the Creditistes stand. I look at my hon. friend the Minister without Portfolio and recall some of his statements regarding the leaders of the Social Credit party and the Creditistes. It must be the words of love and affection he spoke which now bind them to the bosom of Liberalism.

Mr. Dupuis: Are you jealous?

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I point out this fact. There are matters of immediate consequence on which action is needed. For example, what about the economic situation of which the Minister of Finance speaks so blandly? What about the pension legislation? We had an explanation of that when the question was asked, "Have you got it ready? If so, put it on". Why do not the government bring in that legislation? Are they changing their minds again for the third time?

Mr. Monteith: The fourth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For the fourth time. Where is the legislation promised by the Minister of Agriculture. This is legislation which is going to bring about a new heaven and new earth agriculturally. Where is this legislation? We are not holding up anything, and hon. members opposite have not anything to hold up except themselves. There is not one iota of truth in the suggestion that we are holding anything up. We are holding up—

Mr. Mandziuk: A vacation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would say to my hon. friends opposite that all of them have qualifications for drama in an animal field. What are we holding up? We are holding up the government—

Mr. Peters: Right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —on behalf of millions of Canadians. We are putting up a meaningful fight for a meaningful flag for Canada. We have said, and I repeat, in the addresses given by hon. gentleman in this party that we have always stood for a distinctive flag; but never at any time did the Conservative party, any more than the Liberal party, openly contend for anything other than a flag which was called distinctive by Mackenzie King and by Louis St. Laurent. Do you know where they made their mistake? They let their sycophants believe there would be a token fight and they would push this thing through and achieve what the Prime Minister wants as a personal flag.

The hon. member for York East revealed something that must be of interest to hon. members in various parts of Ontario and elsewhere when he said "We did not expect that there would be such a strong feeling on the part of Canadians". Mr. Speaker, Gallup polls cannot convey the soulful things of life. Where would Canada be today so far as the flag is concerned if it were not for the fight put up by this party standing alone?

I intend, sir, to call the great parliamentarians of the past to give their views as to a government endeavouring to push through something that the people generally do not want. They have played with parliament. They want the people to believe that all this legislation which they have in their minds but which they have not been able to translate into legislative form would be brought in if only we abdicated our responsibilities. They misconstrued the attitude of the people.

A few weeks ago the government were talking about an election. They said that was the reason we were fighting. We have made it perfectly clear that this is not so, because this is not the kind of issue upon which a general election should take place. But that is what they said. Today the Minister of Transport said in effect that the achievement of freedom demands the right of free speech. He is one of those to whom the press and radio have been most free in their free speech, and they have never heard me take a stand against it.

I ask, and parliament has the right to ask, that both sides be given not an expurgated edition, not a translated interpretation, but actually the other side of the equation. We have not been able to get that so far, but someone has stated that the stand we are taking is getting through to the people. I do not know how it is getting through, but whereas three weeks ago there was criticism, more and more the attitude in every province, including the province of Quebec, indicates that the importance of this debate is finding its way through.

Mr. Speaker, they have been assisted by one United States magazine that masquerades in Canada as Canadian, but which week after week reveals one side of the equation. We have had our experience in the past, in 1962 and 1963, with extraterritorial interference. Let me interpolate here. There is an election campaign now on in the United States. Canadians should use that same discretion regarding an election in that country as we ask from them for Canada.

It has been argued that Canada does not have a distinctive flag. She had one, as was said in parliament by Mr. Ilsley, now the chief justice of Nova Scotia. The red ensign flying over parliament from 1867 to 1904; the red ensign was declared to be the flag for the army overseas in 1943; the red ensign was declared in 1945, until parliament otherwise directed, to be Canada's national flag. I have heard some say "But think of it; the Prime Minister brought this matter before parliament rather than doing it by order in council". Mr. Speaker, he could not do it by order in council, because that order in council of 1945 stated explicitly that a change could only be made by parliament.

Sir, I summarize these few general remarks I have made by referring to an article by Guy Lamarche in magazine Maclean's, September edition. Mr. Lamarche was speaking of our country and, reading from the translation, he said:

> Here, we deliberately chose to adopt a national flag under the worst possible conditions...
> Not only should we have waited, but it should have been orchestrated and executed with brio as an important step in our adolescence.
> It was a question of public relations and I cannot understand how the image makers of Mr. Pearson, who work so hard to make us swallow their productions, were unable to convince the Prime Minister that at least in the matter of the flag, the public interest demanded that they should be allowed to make a success of it...
> Instead of this, they spent their time saying the flag was a question full of sentiment and emotion, going right to the heart of every Canadian; and then nothing at all was done to reach the heart and sentiment of these Canadians...

Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to apologize for or explain in respect of the stand we have taken. This is not a frivolous or captious stand. This is a stand based on abiding principles. I say this to you, and through you to the government. We in Her Majesty's loyal opposition are here to all intents and purposes standing alone in this house, but we do not represent a small minority of the Canadian people. Sir, we have a responsibility, and the government tries to becloud the issue by saying they have got legislation ready. Mr. Speaker, no arteries of legislation are being stopped when the government has no legislative items ready. We have passed all the legislation that has been brought before parliament—

An hon. Member: What about redistribution?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —except redistribution. Everything has received consideration, and the only reason redistribution was not passed is because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre decided he wanted to change the ideas of the government regarding appointments being made, one by the prime minister and one by the leader of the opposition. There was also a question raised as to the relative tolerance that should exist as between urban and rural areas. We showed signs of being able to come to an agreement. We suggested 20 per cent was too low. What about Mr. Lesage in the province of Quebec; what did he do? He raised this to 25 per cent in his province, according to the press.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman has suggested that the only piece of legislation the opposition held up was redistribution. Does the right hon. gentleman think that a minority in the house, if it disagrees with something, has the right indefinitely to refuse the majority the right to express its views through a vote?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will receive his answer in a few moments, when I deal with the words of a parliamentarian with whom I am sure the hon. member will agree, irrespective of his feelings. I refer to Right Hon. Mackenzie King. I will deal with that subject when I reach it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not make the question clear to the right hon. gentleman. I should make it clear that I was referring in my question to the redistribution matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has a way about him, and I do not take him any more seriously than he sometimes is taken outside the house. I did say to him courteously that I would deal with his question, but then he ran away from it by asking another question.

Mr. Speaker, he brings me to this position. In spite of all the Liberal mythology in relation to parliament being brought to an impasse, who brought it here? Did we bring in the Prime Minister's personal choice? Did we prevent him bringing in legislation regarding the economy, the necessity of expansion of trade, and the subject of the question raised by the hon. member for Perth, in reference to the declaration of national goals? Who brought about division within this country? Who created it or, if not created, who added the fires to division? We have never seen anything to equal the separation, the division, the antagonisms expressed within our country that we have seen since the present government came into office. One of the major reasons is this: They promised everything and they have executed little or nothing.

It was not the Conservative party that had the separatists. It was not the Conservative party that had an hon. member in their midst who would abolish the Queen and remove the British connection. I thought that hon. member was speaking for himself, but in the last 10 days it is apparent that he has become a paragon of perfection as he moves around, interrupts and receives the warmest plaudits from those who I would have thought would have contemptuously spurned one who expressed views such as he is expressing.

Did we bring about the bitter division? Sir, this parliament has a great responsibility. Some newspaper editorials say: Mind you, the Prime Minister made a mistake, he should not have got us into this, but the opposition is terrible because it dares to stand against his personal desires. Sir, we have no excuses to offer. An hon. gentleman says, should it not be brought to a vote? Shades of Laurier and Borden. I have two volumes here that I am sure will take their place alongside the volume on Mr. King that was edited by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

I make an appeal to the government. I know it is late to do it but we have a sacred trust. Do not let us continue this course and build up controversies for the future. We believe that policy should bring Canadians together rather than disintegrate them. All of this was encouraged by the Prime Minister when he made that speech in the month of April after the election, in which he said he believed in two nations. That is when the trouble began. In other parts of Canada it was explained that he really had not meant it. In the House of Commons one Friday he came forward with a commission to investigate separatism but when he saw the effect of it somebody issued a press release that night.

Who has been building up false hopes for the people? What about the wild and unrestrained statements that have been made by influential men not in the Conservative party? It is not being anti-Quebec to say that certain men have spoken in a way that cannot help but divide this country. Yet when one takes that stand it is argued that one is anti-Quebec. Not at all; I have never in my life uttered a word that could be so construed.

I go back to 1924 when I took a case in the province of Saskatchewan on behalf of French school trustees. I was told: Do not take it; it will cause you difficulty in the future. Sir, I have never failed to take the stand which I believed was necessary and proper. When I spoke, as did many members of the N.D.P., regarding the injustice done to the Japanese Canadians, their only offence their colour, I was alone among my colleagues. When in June of 1940 I made a speech for the first time in the House of Commons I appealed then for a Canadianism. At that time terrible criticisms were being uttered against those of German origin. I said: These people are Canadians. It was not popular to take that stand.

I recollect what happened in 1961 and 1962 when I said that we must have a colour-blind commonwealth. What did hon. gentlemen opposite say? They said that I lost favour with the United Kingdom; but today this is accepted. Speaking for this party and the government of that day, I said to the British people in 1962: You have full right as an independent country to join the common market but you have responsibilities to the commonwealth which you yourselves have admitted and we ask you not to forget the institution that above everything else in the world represents something that no other group of nations has ever been able to achieve. I was criticized; I was bitterly denounced. Do you hear any of those opposite saying today that they want to get into the common market? Today they are using the arguments for which they criticized us. Great is the experience of public life when you see people sitting opposite who in the month of May, 1962, said that nothing more terrible had ever happened than the pegging of the Canadian dollar but who now embrace the heresy of those days as their own.

One must take a stand. One cannot always be on the side of a majority, but when there is a great principle at stake parties have a responsibility. A very prominent Conservative wrote me and said: Don't fight them, they are thirsty for this flag; let them have it and when a change of government comes bring in your own flag. The hon. gentleman says, let us get to a vote, because he has the artificial certainty of a quiescent majority with him. Sir, that is not parliament, as I will show when I refer to the words of Laurier.

I want to see this institution not derided, not downgraded. There are one or two who are doing so whose knowledge of democracy is not in keeping with their enthusiasm for condemnation of the Conservative party. The relation of parliament to public opinion is a serious matter. That is why the press has its place. The elector requires and is entitled to a fair and impartial view of what is going on in parliament. I ask you, sir. Is it a fair division when the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, on the day when two speeches were made, one by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) and the other by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) speaking from the wells of experience, those wells from which his people have drawn their sustenance and power for a thousand years, should devote to one speech eight times the amount of attention devoted to the other?

An hon. Member: Typical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is one-sided. No one can argue that it is not. And you will never build a Canada if information is to be denied when it is critical of a government, but given first place when it consists of the declarations of a government. I speak realizing that what I say may be misinterpreted. But I do not want to be misinterpreted. I want to say this finally and unequivocally—that only now, in the last week or so, is the feeling getting through to the people.

I should like to read what some of the hon. gentlemen opposite are hearing from their constituents. "Get to a vote". Yes. If they would heed the call of their constituents it will be of interest when they do vote. We must work for national unity. We did. When were in office, we tried to unify. We made the House of Commons a living place when we installed the simultaneous translation system. Today there is a degree of exchange which never took place before in this house. We did not contribute to separating the people of our country on the basis of race, religion, or province against province. Somebody will argue: Oh, if you only fall in line with this and allow the three maple leaves, all will be well. Mr. Speaker, the niggling knife would still continue. I said I would be restrained in what I have to say in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) because I will be able to say more when he is back. But I find it difficult to explain why, knowing in advance that there was going to be division, he got into this and carried his supporters along, the speed of the caravan being determined by the right hon. gentleman.

I do not intend to follow on this occasion the sinuous course the government has followed. The Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) is not here; I will have some reference to make to him when he is. But I simply point out in this regard the fact that what has happened is now being blamed on us, because we dared to stand. Well, last evening I read the words of Ulysses, which are the embodiment of our attitude—"strong in will to strive, to seek, to find and not to yield". Members opposite thought they would dominate us by a campaign of vituperation the like of which I have not seen in this land. I do not complain, but I point out that this is the situation. Sir, why did they do it? Why did they act? Why did not the Prime Minister, unless he wanted to make a political matter of this, go to the leaders of the various parties before the seeds of dissension had been planted by his aggressive speech in Winnipeg to the Royal Canadian Legion? Can we not sit down together and talk things over? Was there any attitude of compromise when, knowing that he had a multitude with him, he could ride roughshod? We said, no.

Sir, have we a national flag, a distinctive flag? I ask you to turn to the answer given by Mr. St. Laurent as prime minister in 1951, on November 21 when he was asked the question:

> What steps are being taken by the government with respect to the adoption of a distinctive national flag?

To that question, his answer was: "See order in council P.C. 5888 of September 15, 1945."

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Why did they do this? What did they think they would achieve? Why do they now try to blame us for standing in the way of one of the most barefaced attempts in Canadian history to overwhelm an opposition which represents millions of Canadians? Again, I ask the question: Why? You do not choose a flag that way. You do not change a flag in the systole and diastole of political controversy following an election. This is something for Canada's next hundred years. Yet the government decided for political purposes —that is what La Presse said—for the prospect of votes, to bring about a stifling of the outpouring of the spirit of millions of Canadians. And they did it by fooling the people of the province of Quebec. I have had a great deal of correspondence from that province lately and the question asked me is this—

What is the constituency of my hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is one of my afflictions; I can never remember the names of constituencies. I have not that kind of memory, though hon. members opposite may have it. But I remember the great things, and the great principles, and this is something they might bear in mind.

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can you imagine hon. gentlemen opposite—I would like to identify them if they would let me know who they are, so that they would be on the record—when we are discussing a matter of importance to Canadians as a whole indulging in that kind of exhibitionism?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no identification. Their silence is their own rebuke. What they are trying to do is to cover up their failure to act on so many matters that desperately need to be solved, and they bring up an issue of an emotional nature to conceal their failure.

I do not want to impose anything on the people of Quebec. I have acted for the French Canadians through the years. As one gets on to my time in life he can look back. I have acted for them throughout the years. I know them. I do not want to impose. That is not the spirit of 100 years ago today—to impose. Neither do I want them to say to the rest of Canada. "We must do this." I am sure they do not have that view. This is not a country that can be governed by the imposition of brute force.

Sir, I speak with more emotion than usual when I think of what is being done to this, my country. I am of mixed origin too. I am not one with a colonial viewpoint. Conservative prime ministers and leaders from Macdonald to date have not been colonialists. They have led the way on behalf of an independent nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I read the editorials in Le Devoir I do not think the people of Quebec are prepared to accept the synthetic lure artificially contrived by the Liberal party in the form of this flag design, obviously to conceal its inaction in meeting problems of agriculture, unemployment and the like. It is not too late yet for the government—and only the government can act.

The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Clancy) mentioned a wedge. I ask them not to drive this wedge deeper. Why pursue this course? I ask hon. members opposite, can't you do something with this government in spite of the revelations made by two hon. members as to the impotence of private members? Can't you do something for Canada? Can't you stop this? I know Canadians as a whole would appreciate action in this regard.

This is one of the most frightening problems facing Canada today. It is one that should cause men to think; but who gets the blame? They blame us for daring to stand against them. They used the mailed fist and we stood firm, and we intend to stand firm.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sir, when I say that, I also want to add that we are prepared at all times as Canadians to hold out the right hand of fellowship in a spirit of compromise, for after all this is a country where compromise is of the essence, so long as compromise does not violate principles.

I have not forgotten the question put by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). I shall come to that rather too soon for him.

Mr. Pickersgill: You cannot come to it too soon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was one of the devotees, one who was described by pamphleteers as the power behind Mr. King. I see he wags his head in a horizontal position. Such modesty is unusual even though unvoiced. Sir, on August 11, 1944, near the end of the war, I spoke immediately before the prime minister, who was my member. We had that relationship of member and constituent that did not always bear the relationship of Damon and Pythias, but Mr. King had his views. Let me read what he said. In my remarks, I mentioned that, when our men came back from overseas, let them be Canadian. I am not going to quote my speech. I have never made a habit of doing that, but I preceded him, contending that we should build Canada with Canadians, maintaining the constitutional rights by assuring to those of us in whose veins flowed blood not entirely British or French equal rights as citizens, equal rights as Canadians, and Mr. King said:

> May I say to my hon. friend that in that I am in entire and wholehearted agreement with him. I cannot express too strongly the feeling I have that some of these practices which have been carried on by the census branch for statistical purposes, or possibly for ethnological purposes—I believe that is the way it is described—might be done away with. I would be happy to join with my hon. friend and with any others in seeking to do my part to see absolute recognition, or recognition made in an absolute way of men and women who were born in this country, and those who have become Canadian citizens being regarded as Canadians first, foremost and all the time.

Sir, what do the three maple leaves typify? The Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) in his speech to the philatelic organization, said one stands for the British, one stands for the French and the other stands for the other racial origins. He never got to telling them what the centre one stood for. It was nonsense.

Were they thinking about other ethnic groups in Quebec in 1868 when they came out with their coat of arms? Were they thinking of them in Ontario? Not at all.

As a matter of fact this flag was first placed on a stamp as a result of the action of the Postmaster General after he took office. He told us the other day it had been decided in July of 1963. That is what he told the house, but he forgot what he said in the month of April. I will read what he said then, according to Southam news services:

> Postmaster General John R. Nicholson, however, said he knew nothing about this design representing the new Canadian flag, although he chose the stamp and decided its colours himself after entering office last February 1.

Ten days ago he told us he had nothing to do with it, that it had been decided before any question of a change of flag was being considered. Then listen to these words:

> Mr. Nicholson admitted that it had been proposed that the stamp be issued with the maple leaves red on a white background, but he decided to try a little background colour.

"I thought of that pale blue they use in the United Nations flag," he said—

I say to him, on the basis of his statement of April 17, that this was just part of the propaganda to soften up the Canadian people.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Good.

Mr. Nicholson: The right hon. gentleman is glibly suggesting that the statement I made here in all sincerity is not true, that it is hypocritical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say either of those things.

Mr. Nicholson: I did say the maple leaf design was chosen in or about the month of July, 1963. The records of the Post Office Department show that. I did make a modest contribution to the final design when I learned, through technical advice, that there was a question of whether a red stamp on a white background could be picked up electronically. After I became Postmaster General I directed that a colour change be made from a white background to a blue background. That is the simple explanation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is a simple explanation but it is far removed from the explanation of April 17 that appeared in the Canadian Press. But I am really not concerned about that, because all the minister has succeeded in doing is assure the house that he was not one of the four wise men who induced the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to accept the three maple leaf design.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. If the hon. gentleman would—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking if the right hon. gentleman will permit me—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

An hon. Member: He isn't speaking to the subamendment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition is making a speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) said I am not on the subamendment. I am glad he raised that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know the right hon. gentleman suffers from the same defect I do, that of hardness of hearing; but that does not excuse his misrepresenting what I said. I asked the right hon. gentleman, very politely, if I could ask him a question and I made no other remark of any kind. And I was denied the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hasten immediately, Mr. Speaker, to say that if the hon. gentleman says he did not make that remark, I accept it; but it just shows the influence he has on backbench members, one of whom has a voice that sounds very much like his, apparently in emulation. I was reading what Mr. King said, and I would have thought it would have commanded the attention of the Minister of Transport. Mr. King said:

> And may I say this to my hon. friend, that he has touched upon a very real subject, when he speaks of men who have fought and died as Canadians, irrespective of race and religion. I regret much to see in this country at the present time some gentlemen who are in positions of high respect, and who know better, seeking to raise matters of creed and race, with the suggestion that things are being done for people of one area rather than for those of another. May I say to this committee that if anyone wishes a battle on the question of whether we are to have one part of this country singled out as non-Canadian as against what by others is said to be Canadian, no one would welcome that fight any more than I would.
> And anyone who raises the question of race to prejudice anyone of another race in this country is doing the greatest disservice that can be done to Canadian unity and to Canadian nationality. And not only do I wish to see our people recognized as Canadians, but I also wish to see a Canadian flag recognized in this country. I would like to see it the flag that our Canadian men are fighting under today. We have a Canadian flag unfurled in battle today by our very brave men in Italy and in France. I think in time the people of this country of Canada will say we want to have as a Canadian flag the flag they are carrying in battle today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is No. 1. Then they say we have not a distinctive flag. That is not what Mr. King said. And what did Mr. St. Laurent say? I want to nail down these misconceptions and falsifications that are being bandied about. Mr. St. Laurent said on November 13, 1945, with regard to a distinctive flag and a design for it, that any such design should include the union jack in the upper left corner. That was Mr. St. Laurent. Was he any less a Canadian for saying that? Then he went on to say that the question of a flag "should be lifted above the plane of partisan politics." Sir, how much I agree with that view. This design was put forward by the Prime Minister for political purposes and now, finding himself in difficulties, who is blamed? We are blamed for not letting him do that. What a hypocritical stand to take. Let me read further what Mr. St. Laurent said. They say that to have the union jack on the flag is a mark of subservience and domination. What did Mr. St. Laurent say, as is reported at page 2096 of Hansard:

I do not think any member of this honourable house would quarrel with that statement.

He is referring to the preceding statement, whatever it was:

The union jack is a symbol which represents much that is best in the heritage of all those who derive their traditions and their culture from western Europe.

Then he said:

I do not believe that any of us in this country at this time regard the union jack as being a symbol of conquest or a symbol of subjugation. It is under the union jack that the institutions of this Canadian nation have grown and developed and have brought us to the point where now, and for a good many years now, the dominion is and has been an autonomous state subject in no phase of its domestic or of its external affairs to any other authority—

Then he quoted with approval Mr. King's words to the Canadian Legion.

Mr. King assured the Legion officers that, so far as he was concerned, the new Canadian flag should certainly contain the union jack. It might be debatable whether a single maple leaf in the fly would be preferable to the Canadian coat of arms at present incorporated in the Canadian red ensign, but it would be unthinkable to have a flag for this dominion that did not contain the union jack.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was Mr. King's stand, and certainly throughout his life he stood for independence, and strongly stood for it. In this regard Mr. St. Laurent said:

I am prepared to say now that I for one fully share the views expressed by the prime minister to this delegation, the legionnaires—

There are those who tell you, sir, and try to lead Canadians to believe that we are pushing something on Quebec. Who was in the cabinet then? Mr. King was the prime minister, there was Mr. St. Laurent, and Mr. Lesage was in the cabinet. Did we have anything to do with this flag that was recommended, with the fact that the red ensign should be the flag—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, surely the right hon. gentleman realizes that Mr. Lesage did not come into the cabinet until Mr. St. Laurent had been prime minister for several years?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is one time that the hon. gentleman's memory regarding this question is correct. But Mr. Lesage was in the house. Did he raise any objection?

Mr. Nielsen: He was honestly silent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was never one not to speak what he thought. I have placed these quotations before the house, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of answering this kind of propaganda that the Liberal party has disseminated, namely that we are trying to push something on Quebec. It was done when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. The Minister of Transport was the grey eminence—although not grey—behind Mr. Mackenzie King.

I was asked by the hon. gentleman what the attitude would be as to an opposition that stands for the things that it believes in, in principle. I do not refer to questions of ordinary, every day economics but to matters that affect a nation, its well-being, its future —everything that we hold dear. I would ask him to read the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because they represent a viewpoint that cannot be gainsaid. He pointed out during the course of his statement in this House of Commons when the house was discussing the navy bill, debate on which lasted for months and months in 1912-13, that an opposition has the right to act when there is a question of principle at stake. In the course of his remarks he dealt particularly with what had happened in the past. In 1912 the Conservative party under Sir Robert Borden brought in legislation to provide for naval assistance to the United Kingdom. Sir Wilfrid has always been regarded by friend and foe as a great parliamentarian. I read from the "Life and letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier", volume 2. I have Hansard in my office, but not having brought it down with me I will read from this volume. At page 409 the following appears:

Amendment after amendment was made, only to be voted down.

That was by the Liberal party of the day.

Every naval commander from Noah to Nelson was quoted and quoted again. Conservatives ceased to speak and Liberals spoke double time. Tempers rose, interruption was frequent, the Speaker "named" members, and still little progress was made with the bill. Finally, the government decided to force the bill through under closure.

That is when Sir Wilfrid gave not only Canada of his day but posterity the answer to those who talk of filibuster. They did not use that expression then. Filibuster is an Americanism; obstruction was the expression used in those days. The Conservatives said they were being obstructed; therefore the rules had to be changed. Sir Wilfrid went on:

We have heard it stated that these rules are antiquated. I do not admit that at all.

Then he went on to deal with that and continued:

Sir, these rules are to be swept away, they are to be ridden over roughshod; they are to be put aside, and we are to have the gag substituted for them.

Then he uses these words, and I would recommend them for the edification of the souls of hon. gentlemen opposite:

As I have said, there are some occasions on which there is a cleavage between the majority and the minority, and then there is an easy remedy, an easy solution. The remedy is not closure; it is not the application of brute force. The remedy is an appeal to the people. The people, after all, are the judge and the jury. The people, after all, are the parties to pass judgment as between the government and the opposition, as between the majority and the minority;...

When we come to discuss these constitutional questions, these questions of public policy, the best authority after all is the authority of history.

Now mark these words:

Confederation will have been in existence 46 years next July—

—that was in 1913—

—and how many times has there been obstruction during these last 45 years? Just four times before this year. Let me recall them. There was obstruction in 1885, in 1896, in 1908, and in 1911, and after I have mentioned the causes for the obstruction on these several occasions, I shall have furnished the most complete justification for the attitude we have taken upon the present occasion.

I am not admitting obstruction of course; I am just quoting what was said by Sir Wilfrid.

We introduced the reciprocity measure on the twenty sixth of January,—

—that was in 1911—

—and on the twenty ninth of July we had not yet been able to obtain even a preliminary vote upon it.

Then the house sat to exhaustion. I do not know how many times it sat all night and all day, but Sir Wilfrid was on the receiving end at that time. He continued:

We had been met at every step by obstruction from the Conservatives, then in opposition; dilatory motions of every kind were made, speech after speech was delivered day in and day out, even in the dog days of summer. I did not complain; I did not whine. Two courses were open to me. I could have done as is done today by the prime minister; I could have introduced the closure and said that we must carry on the business of the government and that consistently with our dignity, we could not allow obstruction. But there was another course open to me and that was an appeal to the people; and I advised my colleagues to give the honourable gentlemen of the opposition opportunity of appealing to the people. We appealed to the people and we were defeated. Heaven is my witness that I would rather stand here today, defeated and in opposition by that appeal to the people, than stand over there in office by the power of the gag...

Let me repeat to my right hon. friend: As you sow so shall you reap; as you are fair, so shall you meet with fairness; as you are unjust, so shall you meet with injustice...

The poison—

—that was the poisoned chalice—

—that he offers to us today will come to his own lips at some future day.

Then he went on to say that in looking back over the history from 1885 on, in every case the opposition was right. And we are right today.

I would ask the hon. gentlemen to read what Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to say in this regard, because he sets out in detail that the stand taken was in accordance with the historic rights of an opposition when a matter affecting not only the economy of the country but the future and unity of the country was brought forward to the house.

Then in 1912 the Conservatives did something that I have never been able to understand, nor do I try to defend. They brought about closure. They pushed through the navy bill. And what was the result? They got it through after weeks and weeks of argument and it went to the Senate. The Senate refused to agree that the navy bill was necessary. Sir Robert Borden forgot all about that, because he knew the stand that was taken then by the Liberal party, in the light of the events as they came to him subsequently, was the right stand. Sir, I am going to ask hon. gentlemen to read what Sir Wilfrid said, and read what Sir Robert Borden said in that regard as well. Both agreed that the opposition had the responsibility, when it speaks on a matter of great principle for the voiceless of the country. It has the right to take a stand.

Sir, I still ask the government to give consideration to ending this situation and let the members get back to their constituencies to find out what their constituents are thinking. Let us get together. I suggested the establishment of a committee. If we had set up a committee in the first place, instead of the flag being introduced as a personal thing, I think we would have come to some conclusion and agreement. I think we would have finally decided on something that would be generally acceptable, as did the committee of 1945-46. There were just as strong feelings expressed before that committee was set up as there are now, and the vote was 23 to 1.

Sir, I ask hon. members to read what Sir Wilfrid said on April 9, 1913, in this regard when he set out in detail what I have been trying to impress upon this house, that the essence of government is consent, not domination, not brute force and not a steamroller.

The government thought all it had to do was bring this resolution in and the opposition would say, "This is wrong", but would then retreat. That is not the way to bring in a matter that is above politics and above partisan considerations, or to use the words of Mr. St. Laurent, that transcends the parties.

Sir Wilfrid gave four examples, and said:

> Let me recall them. There was obstruction in 1885, in 1896, in 1908, and in 1911, ...
>
> There was obstruction in 1885. In that year the government of Sir John A. Macdonald introduced a uniform franchise bill for the dominion. Up to that date the franchise had been under the control of the several provinces, each province having its own franchise. While in two or three provinces there was manhood suffrage, in the others there was a diverse franchise, and we of the Liberal party thought this system was the best. ...We compelled Sir John Macdonald to accept many of our proposals.
> There was obstruction in 1896, and what was the occasion of that? The government of that day undertook to deal with the Manitoba school question, which had been for six long years before them, and had been debated and debated again. The government did not dare to give a decision on the question until at last in 1896, in the dying days of a moribund parliament, it introduced a measure for the purpose of giving satisfaction to the minority;... We fought that measure and we obtained what we were asking for.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said they made them feel—> —that a grievous wrong had been perpetrated on them.

>
> We obtained what we were asking for.
> There was obstruction again in 1908, and what was the occasion? The government of which I was the head had introduced an election measure providing for voters' lists... We offered a compromise, which was accepted. The obstruction on that occasion...came from the Conservative party. I found no fault with it; I never whined.

Sir Wilfrid then mentioned the other occasion of obstruction in 1911 and said:

> We introduced the reciprocity measure on the 26th of January, and on the 28th of July we had not yet been able to obtain even a preliminary vote upon it.

He said he did not object to that, because that is the essence of parliament in respect of matters that affect the sentiments of people and their welfare.

Sir, I suggested that there should have been a committee set up. I still think a committee should be established. We believe the people have a right to a say in this matter, and that is the essence of our amendment and our stand. We think there should be a roll-call of Canadians. In other words, we suggest this matter has never received a mandate from the people.

The amendment of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) sets forth certain questions that might be placed before the people. A referendum would not be costly. It could take place at the next election, and this issue could be removed from partisan considerations. That suggestion was put forward. A similar course has been suggested on one or two occasions in Canadian history. However, with the desire to help, but without being browbeaten by threats of an election, the suggestion was made to establish a committee. I think such a committee could come up even yet with a recommendation, but it would have to have time. I do not like in camera meetings, but if you are going to have this kind of a committee, and if it can ultimately arrive at a recommendation which is substantially unanimous, then in the interest of all, anyone who had strong feelings would not have to answer directly for that stand. I think the recommendation of a committee should receive the support of an 80 per cent majority. I say that because you cannot impose a flag on a people. A flag is something to look up to, it is not something to look down on. Therefore, it must represent the consensus.

Sir, I made an offer, and many of my colleagues have spoken, that I would pick the representatives of the Conservative party from those members who have not spoken, so there would be no frozen opinions, but I am not going to place this matter in the hands of a committee unless there is an agreement that any recommendation of that committee must represent substantial support. If perchance political considerations entered into the deliberations of such a committee, and if 66⅔ per cent of the members were politically with the government or its allies, we would lose the benefit of that committee bringing to the Canadian people a flag that is generally acceptable.

Sir, I think by establishing a committee we would remove from the public's mind the ineptness, the confusion and the chaos created by the maladroit course followed by the government. I think Canadians are divided into various groups, some wanting a distinctive flag, but some define "distinctive" in one way and some in another. Louis St. Laurent defined it as a flag upon which the union jack had its place. The present government, after an election, decided to give their own definition to "distinctive", and their definition is one without any recognition of the heritage of the past, the devotion of either French or English to our country.

There are others who insist on the red ensign without change or modification. There are some who in the interests of unity, and I plead that, are prepared to agree to modifications that will recognize the contributions of the two great races. There are some who want the three maple leaf flag. There are others who want a one maple leaf flag. Then, sir, there are some in all these categories who have been shocked at the course that the Liberal party took in bringing this flag before us.

The Canadian people have a right to say what kind of flag they want and they can only exercise that right through a plebiscite. But in the interests of bringing us together I repeat the suggestion of a committee, but not one to meet for three or four weeks. Her Majesty will be here on the 12th of October and such a committee does not have to be limited to that date. Let it sit for three months. Certainly I think it would take two months. The question of time is not important, but the committee should not be directed that it has to do the job within a certain time. If the committee comes up with a substantial majority, then there is no need for further argument. A short debate would be sufficient. But, sir, unless it does we are back to where we were, except that we have given Canadians a chance to think this over.

Feeling has crystallized very strongly in the last few weeks. So far as time is concerned, I have read one commentator, who in the past has achieved monetary gain by libellous statements, who says that it is costing $33,000 a day for parliament to sit. That is absolutely false. Our salaries are spread over the year. It does not cost any more for parliament to sit today than if we were home, except for the paper, the printing, the page boys and the like. That statement is a complete fabrication. If we were home all of the staff here with few exceptions, as you know, Mr. Speaker, would still be on salary. That statement is designed to hurt and to damage, and the truth can never catch up to a falsehood. But that statement should be answered. In addition, sir, I do not think that anybody should object to sitting, with the salary that is being received today, and I speak as one who does not receive the addition. Parliament is not to be measured by cost. Parliament is to be measured by the degree to which it brings about improvement for the benefit of the nation.

We are ready. Bring on your legislative program. We will be glad to pass it as we have passed other measures. The government have nothing ready except that in their minds they have got plans. If they have anything ready, let them bring it forward. What is there to stop them bringing in the resolution on pensions which has so frequently been asked for? Let us deal with that. Let us set up the committee and let the committee go to work. The government has endeavoured to lead the Canadian people to believe that we are preventing them from bringing in anything. We will welcome legislation. Bring it in and we will give a legislative program every support. But I want to brand as another myth the suggestion that while we debate this matter that will affect Canadians for 100 years we are holding up other legislation.

Sir, you cannot make a flag for a country by putting a slug of political advantage into a jukebox. That is what they are trying to do. The Prime Minister looked over this flag and he said, "I hanker for it". What would this committee do? Would it not consider the indicia of a flag? In the darkest days of 1915 when the British and French had their backs to the wall President Woodrow Wilson spoke of the flag as the embodiment not of sentiment but of history.

I do not want to say anything critical about the three maple leaves, but does it move your heart to see this flag after it has flown for a week or ten days? Does it touch you as freedom's banner streaming o'er us? Does it consecrate in everyone looking at it the history, the struggle, the strife that brought about our Canada? Sir, a flag cannot be created by one man however powerful his position. This is a time of instant creation but you cannot create instant flags. Flags are born in the strife and turmoil of clash of history. They are not the result of an egocentric decision.

That is why we have taken this stand, Mr. Speaker. I speak again as one of two racial origins, neither one of which ever could be dominated. My paternal ancestors came here 150 years ago and until I became prime minister it was often said it could never be that one of German or Dutch origin could be prime minister. My highland ancestors were not dominated. The English tried to dominate them after Culloden. They directed that they could not wear the kilt or sound the pibroch, and the Bannermans were at Culloden. The penalty was death. It did not mean anything. They stood because those things represented something to them, the richness of their past. They arouse the sacred emotion of loyalty. I plead with the government: Do not push on with this.

Today the Prime Minister meets with the premiers of the provinces. I will be the first to congratulate him if they bring about today something that we tried for and did not succeed in accomplishing. That is the history of mankind. Some try, and we advance. They have not lost because they do not attain. This is a step forward. If we get this accomplished, then let us together, in a spirit of Canadianism, a spirit of give and take, bring about a flag which will not disunite, as will this creation that is before us, but which will within its folds gather us all together so that in the next hundred years this country's destiny will be that for which we all hope.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): When the right hon. gentleman began to speak I had no thought of taking any part in the debate on this subamendment which, it seems to me, we could best debate by deciding, because it concerns a purely technical problem. It is not the real issue before us. The real issue lies in the resolution itself, not in the subamendment or even in the amendment.

But the right hon. gentleman made one statement which, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is not here, I feel should be corrected. He said that at no time before the elections of 1962 or 1963 did the Prime Minister make it clear in public what he meant by a distinctive flag. I know that the right hon. gentleman did not knowingly—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will immediately withdraw if the hon. gentleman can show me I was wrong. I have every one of the quotations.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman might have every one of the quotations, in which case he must have mislaid the two I am about to put on record now. I think every hon. member will consider it desirable that they be put on record so that there will be no further inadvertent misquotation or misrepresentation.

On January 21, 1960, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, speaking on the program called "The Nation's Business" said—and I wish to quote one sentence from his remarks at that time:

> We must agree on a distinctive national flag which cannot be mistaken for an emblem of any other country and which is accepted as such by the Canadian people.

Now, the Prime Minister was asked by a number of people to interpret precisely what he meant by the phrase "a distinctive national flag which cannot be mistaken for an emblem of any other country". And on January 27, from the office of the leader of the opposition he issued a statement which I intend to read.

Mr. Nowlan: What year was that?

Mr. Pickersgill: This was in 1960. So that there may be no doubt whatever about where my right hon. friend stood, here is the statement:

> In the reference which I made in my television talk on "The Nation's Business" series on January 21 to a national flag for Canada, I was concerned with the desirability of the Canadian government taking full responsibility as soon as possible for finding a solution to the flag problem by submitting to parliament a measure which—if accepted by the representatives of the people in parliament—would, I hope, settle the problem.
>
> The present red ensign has never been given formal sanction by parliament. Furthermore (I know this from my own correspondence) it is not approved by a great many Canadians as a national flag because, in design, it is the same as the United Kingdom merchant marine flag, with the Canadian coat of arms added. The two flags can be mistaken for each other, and there are many who think that this confusion should be removed. There is no such confusion in any other part of the commonwealth, because each country, including Australia and New Zealand, has a flag which is easily identifiable with its country and cannot be mistaken for that of any other country.
> The union jack, a flag which every Canadian should honour and respect, is not however acceptable to many Canadians as a distinctive national flag of Canada because it is also the distinctive national flag of the United Kingdom. In consequence as I have indicated above, there is an unfortunate division of opinion in this country on the flag question. The time has come, I think, when this situation should be cleared up by governmental initiative and parliamentary action.
> Indeed, whatever action parliament might take in regard to a Canadian flag, I believe that the union jack should be accepted by Canada as an emblem to be flown on all occasions which are concerned with our commonwealth association and our status as a monarchy with the Queen as the head of that commonwealth.

When the present Prime Minister said this in 1960, it was accepted, and that position was accepted by the Liberal party, and it was the position we took at the election of 1962. It was in our literature.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: In exactly the same words, that was in our literature in 1963.

Some hon. Members: No.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Pickersgill: No one can say I did not listen intently, or with courtesy and politeness, to the right hon. gentleman when he was speaking, as did my hon. friends, and I think I might be permitted to say what I have to say without these noisy interruptions. What I say seems not to be palatable, but it happens to be the simple truth. I will bring these statements down at eight o'clock and if anyone wishes me to do so, I will table them. Each of these statements has been circulated throughout the country. One of them has been handed to me, now—

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at the moment. I think the hon. member has not been recognized by the Chair.

This is from the 1963 program under the heading "Adopt a Distinctive Canadian Flag and Anthem".

> Within two years of taking office, a new Liberal government will submit to parliament a design for a ffag which cannot be mistaken for the emblem of any other country. When adopted this will be the flag of Canada. "O Canada" will be proclaimed our official anthem.
> The union jack will be flown on appropriate occasions as a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth. A new Liberal government will also maintain the honour given to the traditional anthem which expresses Canada's devotion to the sovereign.

This document was published. It is published all over this country and nobody on earth has any right to say that we did not make our position clear in two general elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: We did that, sir, and I suggest we had a perfect right to place that program before parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. There is a point of order by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order because of the reference made to myself by the Minister of Transport when he told the house that I had not been given recognition by the Chair. I recall, sir, that within the last two days the Chair gave a specific—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. There is no point of order there. I am sure the hon. member does not wish to interrupt the Acting Prime Minister. No one interrupted the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and I think we should have a little fair play.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to mention in my point of order that there was a ruling given by the Chair within the last two days which indicated that a member rising on a question had the right to the floor provided the hon. member speaking would yield the floor to him. That was the ruling by the Chair with respect to a question put the other day. The Chair ruled that a member had the right to ask a question if the hon. member speaking yielded. I would also remind the Minister of Transport that on two occasions he was permitted to interrupt the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. The floor was yielded to him.

Mr. Speaker: In this particular case the floor was not yielded by the hon. member who was speaking.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rather astonished that after all the appeals from the other side for someone on this side to speak, when someone on this side tries to speak he is not permitted to continue.

It would be rather redundant, but I could go on and put on the record precisely the same words that were in the program of 1962. I think that disposes pretty conclusively of this talk about the resolution which stands in my right hon. friend's name being anything personal.

This resolution was not merely put on the order paper with the full authority of the government, by the head of the government, but it was put on with the full authority of the Liberal party, passed through all those channels used to put a program before the people of this country in two elections in which we were participating. And in order to make it clear it was neither personal, nor even for that matter governmental, at the request of hon. gentlemen opposite, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has indicated there will be a completely free vote on this matter and that the government would not consider its life at stake.

If hon. gentlemen opposite are so afraid that hon. members in other parts of the house—I do not mean just on this side—will express opinions different from theirs, if they are allowed free expression of opinion, then that is an odd conception of that democracy of which the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said he had so much knowledge. It seems to me, sir, that the proper conception of democracy is that under a system of delegated democracy, which any parliamentary system is, programs are put before the people. A government is chosen, and if that government puts matters before parliament it should have a right at least to have the voice of parliament on those matters after there has been all the debate there can reasonably be.

I am not one of those who think there should be any restriction on the right of any member in this house to express his own opinions on the flag. But I may say I think it rather astonishing that all these letters from other people, and newspaper comments which we can all read anyway and which, under our rules of debate we are not supposed to inject into debate, seem to be a large part of many of the speeches made. Indeed I am rather surprised that they are represented as a contribution, a personal contribution coming from the heart, particularly in cases when a sheet of paper is lost and the heart stops beating until it can be recovered from the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I endorse the words of the right hon. gentleman opposite when he said we want consent in this house, not domination. I agree. We do not want to be dominated by a man who is dominating a minority in this house and preventing the majority from expressing its views. I am not going to take up the time of the house by quoting gossip columnists about anonymous members in the Tory backbenches and what they think about their leader. Picking up gossip and retailing it about anonymous people strikes me as being a rather second rate form of debate, and that is what the right hon. gentleman opposite did.

He also said that one man was not going to be allowed to impose his flag on this country. Sir, I hope that the people of Canada are not going to allow one man, drunk for power, to prevent the people of this country from having a flag if they want one.

The right hon. gentleman has found in my old master, Mr. Mackenzie King, a patron saint for the Tory party. I may say this is not untypical of Tories; to wear the worn out clothes of Liberals to cover their nakedness. I remember the enthusiasm with which the Tory party greeted Mr. Mackenzie King's initiative in 1945. They called it separatism and accused him of breaking up the empire. They said this red ensign was the end of all we held dear, that we must stick by the union jack. Now Mr. Mackenzie King is their hero.

The right hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, saw fit to degrade those three maple leaves which have been the emblem of this country since confederation and which the right hon. gentleman, himself, when he was prime minister had cast in bronze—they can be seen in room 16—as a symbol of Canada.

The right hon. gentleman, when he was prime minister, proudly had them put on his motor car—before the days of stickers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: He approved the Queen putting them on the royal standard. He put them on a postage stamp long before my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) was postmaster general.

Mr. Nielsen: When?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can do his own research on that.

Mr. Churchill: Give us the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right. It was in 1959, when the right hon. gentleman was prime minister, that the three maple leaves conjoined on a single stem were put on a postage stamp of Canada, and the word "Canada" proudly underneath, and the prime minister of that time is now the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the plain fact. Sir, one thing that does shock me, and I think it shocks a great many other Canadians who have memories, too, that this maple leaf symbol of ours which is associated with Vimy ridge, which is associated with Dieppe, which is associated with every glorious feat of arms of this country—and in our short history we have had many of them—that hon. gentlemen have sought in this debate to degrade it. I think that is shameful; I hope it will not continue. Let us by all means differ, but let us try to avoid in this debate, on both sides of the house, casting any aspersions on the cherished views of others.

For myself, I do not have a very mixed origin. I am mostly a rather stolid, rather stupid Anglo-Saxon, but I also have a little Dutch blood and I am not ashamed of it. I do not think it has ever prevented me from doing anything I have wanted to do. But I do say, sir, that for me the union jack is the symbol of the land of my ancestors, and I think that land is as good a country as any other in the world, except Canada. But it is not the symbol of Canada—and the maple leaf is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Pickersgill: I can tell the right hon. gentleman, if he does not know it already, why there is unity in the Liberal party and among its members in this house with regard to this question. There is not unity in his party, and if he doubts it, let him ask the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). I will tell the whole house why there is unity in the Liberal party on this question. It is because we did what has been done time and again in the history of this country. It was done at Charlottetown, Quebec and at the Westminster Palace hotel and was embodied in the British North America Act. We agreed on a compromise. That was set out in the program that we honestly and straightforwardly put forward to the Canadian people in two elections. We said we wanted a Canadian flag that was Canadian, and we wanted to fly the union jack, or a flag containing the uion jack, to symbolize our association with the commonwealth and our monarchical character and devotion to the crown. I say, Mr. Speaker, that is a position that is honourable, that is loyal and that, above all, is Canadian.

I certainly would not wish anything I might say to appear to deny to any hon. member in any part of the house his full right to express his views and to express them fully on this question. But we are not debating the flag question at the moment; we are debating a subamendment, a technical subamendment, to an amendment. This subamendment concerns a plebiscite. The right hon. gentleman talked about where his party stood. Well, where do they stand? They have never told us what kind of flag they want, because they cannot agree, because they will not agree, because the section of the party led by the hon. member for Three Rivers cannot agree with what the right hon. gentleman wants. This is not a secret. I suggest that the main reason hon. gentlemen opposite are not willing to allow the rest of us to express our opinions by a vote is because a vote would reveal the hopeless division in their own party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that we go ahead and have a vote on this subamendment and the amendment, on which there is no question of principle involved at all, and then we go on to deal with the main motion. There has only been one speaker on the main motion so far, and that is the right hon. gentleman himself. I suggest that we debate the main motion and when there has been the fullest possible debate, that, like adults, we decide this question; like the other great questions that other parliaments in this country in other times have been called upon to decide. I suggest, sir, that this is the way to make parliament work and to make parliament respected.

I agree with the right hon. gentleman when he said this was an important question. I have no patience with those who say it is an unimportant question and we should get on with other matters that are more important. There is no more important question than any question which affects the basic unity of our country. We will not have much of a Canada pension plan if we have not a united country to support it; we will not have much of a railway policy. I might say, en passant, that if the right hon. gentleman will carry out his word when I bring this important railway legislation forward—and it has been ready for months—and put it through, I will be most grateful to him.

Some hon. Members: Bring it in.

Mr. Pickersgill: If he will do the same with regard to redistribution—a principle that he claims the parentage of, but he does not want his child to be born—if he will let it be born, we will appreciate it.

An hon. Member: Bring it forward.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, settle this question. This is the basic question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that those hon. gentlemen opposite who can read should read the order paper. They will see what is on it already. There is plenty to do. But, Mr. Speaker, having undertaken this task, surely we can find it possible to act like adults in this house and settle this matter in an adult fashion. I suggest that no minority and, above all, no minority dominated—apparently all but bewitched, by one man—

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: —should consider that it has a right to prevent the equal right of everyone in this house to express himself in the only way in which we can all express ourselves, and that is by a vote. That, after all, is perhaps the characteristic of our civilization. In four fifths of the world the people cannot do what we can do here in this house; they cannot settle their own destiny and they cannot get rid of the people who do it badly, either. In four fifths of the world the only way to get rid of a government you do not like is by violence and force.

The whole basis of our system is, as the right hon. gentleman said, consent and not domination.

However, Mr. Speaker, this kind of system will only work when we all honestly and loyally resolve to make it work. There is no system easier than the parliamentary system to disrupt, if the desire to disrupt is there. I appeal to hon. gentlemen: make all your speeches; say everything that is in your hearts; do your best to get your way—but if you cannot get your way, accept the democratic way and allow these matters to be settled, like adults.

An hon. Member: By bringing in closure again?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think an hon. gentleman said something about closure. I have said nothing about closure. I do not think any of us should even be thinking about closure; I think what we should be thinking about is resolving this question. Certainly, sir, there is no reason whatsoever why we should not dispose of the subamendment and the amendment and then, if someone else has another amendment to move, deal with that. I dare say there will be several amendments. There is going to be a free vote; my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has said that. If hon. gentlemen opposite have any united conviction about a flag, there is nothing to stop them moving an amendment to the Prime Minister's motion and putting it to the test of this house.

I hope we will have, after today, an end to these reflections upon the motives of our fellow members of parliament. Mr. Speaker, I have sought in what I have said to reflect in no way upon the motives of hon. gentlemen opposite, except possibly in the case of the right hon. gentleman, the early part of whose speech was a reflection upon everybody on this side of the house, and a deliberate reflection upon them. I have not done that and I do not intend to. But I do suggest that we rise above that kind of thing. Even though we feel strongly and differ on this question we are all honest in our differences, and I suggest that we settle this thing like Canadians.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) a question. I am sure we are all grateful to him for setting out the ideas the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had when he was leader of the opposition in respect to the flag situation and the national anthem. It was set out very clearly that the union jack would denote our commonwealth association and that "O Canada" would be our national anthem. Then he mentioned a distinctive Canadian flag. I wonder whether perchance he missed the paragraph where the flag was described as a three maple leaves flag.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking from memory, but I do not think my memory is too bad, and I have always had a disposition in this house to correct a mistake if I make one. I am sure all hon. members will agree with that. However, my memory is that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said on a good many occasions that he felt the only way this question could be resolved was to have a design put before parliament for parliament to decide. There is the greatest liberty being given to this House of Commons. We have a design put forward by my right hon. friend as head of the government. He has now said that the government will not consider its life at stake in this matter. Therefore it is open to any hon. member who wishes to do so—as the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) has publicly indicated he wishes to—to propose a substitution for that flag. Now, what could be freer than that?

Mr. MacInnis: Would the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) permit a question now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister indicated to the house that during the last two elections the Liberal party advocated both in their literature and otherwise a distinctive Canadian flag. He said that this is the simple truth. Is the minister now saying that the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) was lying to the house on August 24?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I really do not think I need make any comments on the speech of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), because if I did I might be tempted to say something about the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) and I do not want to create that kind of atmosphere in the house this afternoon.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question. Is the minister aware that what he has said this afternoon is in direct contradiction of what the hon. member for York-Humber said on August 24?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I have not read the speech of the hon. member for York-Humber.

Mr. Churchill: Then you should.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Transport. I should like to verify whether what I thought I heard is correct. The minister read two statements made by the leader of his party, and in the second one it seemed to me that he designated the flags of New Zealand and Australia as the type of distinctive national flag which cannot be mistaken for the flag of any other country. If that is the case, would the minister not agree that this gives no indication that the union jack would be removed from such a flag? I have made my own position clear, but this seemed to me to be the intent of the statement, that it would be a flag similar to that of New Zealand and Australia; and we all know what those flags look like.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member will be able to read in Hansard what was said and can draw his own inferences from that; but I do not draw that inference from it and I do not think anyone else did. I remember very well the statement; and when you remember the fact that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister also said we should fly the union jack, that seems to be a clear indication that the union jack would not be in the national flag.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I do not think that any person who wanted to accept those words in the sense in which they were written would have had any doubt whatever about them.

Mr. Monteith: Then why didn't he spell it out?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) asked the question from his seat: Why did the right hon. gentleman not spell it out? He did spell it out. Why does not the right hon. gentleman opposite spell out the flag that his party stands for? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker: It is because they do not stand for one at all.

Mr. Monteith: Our flag is the people's choice.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister to clear up one point. Is he aware that I have in my hand a document published by the national Liberal federation, 251 Cooper street, Ottawa—at least, it says that on it—which was issued in 1963—

[Mr. Churchill.]

An hon. Member: Let us have all of it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Someone is yapping in the background, something which has happened many times, and saying this is only part of it. I think this is all of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Would the minister contain himself for a moment. I also have here a document, issued I believe only in the Atlantic provinces, again published by the national Liberal federation, and I have found that nowhere does it say anything about a new flag. Is he also aware that the Liberal candidate in my area in the last election never at any time mentioned a flag on the radio, or on television or otherwise? Would the minister please clarify those points?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer that. I do not see why the Liberal candidate should have mentioned the flag, any more than I should have mentioned the Canada pension plan, which I never did once, in my constituency during the last election. As for putting the business about the flag in the leaflet especially for the Atlantic provinces, the flag is a national matter, not something specifically for the Atlantic provinces, so there is no reason at all why it should have appeared in the leaflet.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am the last one who would enter this debate with any idea of prolonging it unnecessarily, as all hon. members know. I have a suggestion which I am going to make to the house which might be an acceptable compromise to resolve this rather acrimonious debate which has now gone on for the best part of three weeks. I should like to say that this is the first time that I have participated in the debate on the flag.

Before making the suggestion which I propose to make for the consideration of the house I think that some of the accusations and statements made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who has just resumed his seat should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. He has, for instance, stated that many members have spoken in breach of the rules of this house by reading from letters received from their constituents, from newspaper reports and the like. Yet the minister himself has just finished reading from a Liberal document supplied to him by one of his backbenchers. I believe the rules stipulate that it is proper for a member to quote from newspaper reports and letters and the like if he wishes to adopt the opinions expressed therein as his own. I do not think it is an abuse of the rules of the house to proceed on this basis. He has accused the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) of being drunk with power, of preventing the people of Canada from having a flag if they wanted one. Therein lies the importance of that statement—that little word "if". All the leader of this party in opposition has been requesting is co-operation in putting that very question to the people of Canada. If the people of Canada want a new flag there is only one way to find that out, and that is by holding a national plebiscite to ascertain their views.

Mr. Speaker, he has said that members of this party wish to cover their nakedness, if I paraphrase him correctly, with the cast-off garments of the Liberal party. I for one, sir, would rather freeze to death than clothe myself with the spurious, political approach that they are taking in respect of the question of a national flag for Canada.

He has said that the leader of the official opposition dominates this party, and he accuses us of being bewitched. I say, sir, even if that accusation were true—and I deny it—it is a far better thing to have a leader who is leading his party members than a prime minister who is obviously enslaving his backbenchers, making them kowtow to his own personal choice and silencing them in this debate. This must be true, otherwise we would have heard a good deal more from them.

Sir, he also said in a very sanctimonious and righteous fashion that he would not wish to reflect on the motives of members of this house. He appealed to hon. members to keep any reference to the motives of members out of the debate. How can we do this in the face of the evidence?

I am going to say a word or two about whether or not the Prime Minister, prior to the election of 1962-63, and during the campaign, had anything to say of a definitive nature to the Canadian people in respect of a distinctively designed Canadian national flag. I say he did not, I have press reports and copies of interviews which, if true, certainly bear out that statement.

Mr. Speaker, before I leave the subject in respect of the sanctimonious appeal of the Minister of Transport, I should like to ask him, when he appeals to members of this house to refrain from interjecting aspersions related to the motives of hon. members, to reflect upon the words that have been used by his own leader, the Prime Minister, when he was speechmaking about the activities and motives of the then prime minister, now the leader of the official opposition.

On September 18, 1962, the present Prime Minister, in a speech to the Toronto and district Liberal members of parliament, at the Royal York hotel, in reference to the prime minister of that day had these words to utter in respect of motives. In respect of Mr. Diefenbaker he used the phrase "incredible effrontery". He used the phrase "gross and unpardonable deceit". He also said: ".... still kept up the deceit—", referring to the then minister of agriculture, Hon. Alvin Hamilton. He also used this phrase in reference to Mr. Diefenbaker, then the prime minister:

> The prime minister after the election was over did not try any longer to conceal the facts.

I intend to put a few facts on the record, which I say the Prime Minister and his colleagues now in the cabinet obviously concealed from the Canadian people when those gentlemen were tramping across this country making speeches in respect of the flag. One of these phrases has already been referred to by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken).

The hon. minister also said while referring to motivations:

> Was there ever a greater deceit perpetrated on an electorate?

He also used the expression "farcical explanation", and "contempt of parliament". He also said:

> The man who cannot make a speech without boasting how he has restored the rights of parliament.

That reference was to the prime minister of that day, made by the leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister of this country; yet in the face of these facts the Minister of Transport now makes a sanctimonious and righteous appeal to hon. members to refrain from references to motives. I suggest the hon. gentleman should pause and reflect on those phrases used by his own leader before he makes such an appeal. I should like to remind the house that the Minister of Transport rose to interject by asking a question when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was discussing what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said about obstructionism in past years. In reading over the debates of the past week I have noticed the use of the word "filibuster" by the Prime Minister, and on many occasions by hon. members opposite and to my left, who have also shouted "question" and "filibuster" across the floor. Mr. Speaker, I should like again to put something on record which was said by the Minister of Transport in respect of freedom of speech and the right of discussion of all members of the house. He referred to all questions, and I assume not the least of which is before us.

On November 29, 1963, the Minister of Transport said:

> So far as I am concerned no one in the government has made any such allegation.

He was referring to obstruction. He then said:

> Certainly I have not, and I want to make that very clear. I have not made any such allegation at any time about the opposition. I think there has been a reasonable measure of co-operation—

Sir, I suggest there still can be co-operation if those members will back down from the stiffnecked opposition that they have adopted, and perhaps consider a suggestion which I will make this evening.

Mr. Speaker, in the short time available to me before six o'clock I should like to refer to what the minister said in respect of obstruction in the debate on redistribution. As recorded in Hansard at page 5268, the Minister of Transport said:

> Perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember—and here perhaps I am breaking the rules myself by referring to the debate on redistribution the other day—that I am one of those who think there ought to be debate in parliament, and I do not regard debate as obstruction. I have not said and I have not thought that, taken by and large in this session of parliament, particularly since we met in September, there has been anything I would be inclined to describe as obstruction.

Mr. Speaker, obviously in view of the applause given by the backbenchers on that side of the house to the remarks of the Minister of Transport, he has some following when he says that a minority has a right to express its views. I have gained the impression from his remarks that he feels the discussion should be limited to the main motion. He knows very well why that could not be allowed to take place. I know he does not exercise this kind of control over the backbenchers, to prevent their doing what obviously could be done. He knows that once the subamendment and the amendment are out of the way any one of the members opposite or on my left could move the previous question and have the whole matter removed from free discussion and free debate. That is why we are discussing the subamendment now, and that is why we on this side of the house have the vehicle of free expression of opinion in respect of any matter as important as a national flag for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I was putting the remarks of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) in their proper perspective and also drawing the attention of members of the house to his remarks concerning what he called the domination of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) over his party. I had also referred, I believe, to the servility and slavishness of the backbench members of his own party none of whom except two, as far as I am aware, have risen to speak in this debate. They cry about being a minority government. Every time something arises where they feel the weight of the opposition and the justice of the criticism coming from the opposition side they start crying that they are in a minority position. It seems to me it ill behooves the Minister of Transport to speak of domination of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) over the members of the opposition having regard to the control—

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question? I understood him to say that only two members of this party had spoken in the debate thus far. I would ask him if he has read the press report in the Edmonton Journal in which the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is quoted as saying that there is no filibuster in parliament and that out of four members who have spoken so far 19 have been Conservatives and 18 have been Liberals. That was as of August 17.

Mr. Nielsen: He was referring to the first six days of the debate. I do not think the hon. gentleman would like a serious comment on that statement. That all happened in the first six days of debate. Let the hon. member get up now and tell us what his views on the flag are. Let him and all his colleagues on the back benches on that side get up and speak about the views of their constituents on the flag instead of crying about their minority position, relying on the control that the government exercises over the Social Credit party in the house, and leading a good many members to view with some suspicion the very uneasy position that exists between the member for Winnipeg North and the government. Every time the government wants a change in the rules or a compromise suggested, where does it come from? Does it come from the government? Does it come from a cabinet minister?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member had the wrong constituency and the wrong idea.

Mr. Nielsen: I always have the right constituency, I might inform the hon. member, because he has come to be known as the constitutional conscience of the house. Why is not some of this leadership—

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member referred to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), who sits back here.

Mr. Nielsen: I meant Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is always on cloud nine as far as the conscience of the house is concerned, so he will forgive me if I was a little confused.

Mr. Webb: He is working to become permanent Speaker. That is his objective.

Mr. Nielsen: Rather than all this crying about a minority position I think we should have some leadership displayed by cabinet ministers on the other side. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is in Charlottetown today and is reported in both the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Journal in this way:

Prime Minister Pearson today called on Canadians for "political realism, a passion for justice and a gift for compromise".

Where are all these things? Are they being displayed by the Prime Minister with regard to the issue before us? Where are the suggestions for compromise?

Mr. Orlikow: What is yours?

Mr. Nielsen: I have one.

Mr. Orlikow: It will be the first one we have heard from your party.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not true either, because suggestions have been made by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) and by the Leader of the Opposition just this afternoon.

Mr. Webb: He just got back. He does not know.

Mr. Nielsen: It seems to me that all these suggestions are just being sloughed aside. The government, typical of Grits, feel that because they are the majority their views and only their views should be accepted. This is traditional with them. They have never been any different. They think that because they as the government say something is so, it should be believed it is so. Nobody else is entitled to have an opinion. They believe that because we dare oppose anything, whether it be the flag or any other measure before the house, it is obstruction, and the propaganda conspiracy they have with the press of the country is giving the Canadian people a slanted view of the true facts as they exist. Simply because opposition members have views to express on a matter as important as a national flag for Canada and simply because they do not coincide with their own views or rather with the views of one man, it becomes obstruction. It does not become opposition at all, simply because it does not coincide with their views.

I referred, as did the Minister of Transport, to the announcement of a design. The Minister of Transport tries to have us believe that the Prime Minister and the Liberal party as a whole during the election campaign made it quite clear to the Canadian people that there would be a three maple leaf design. That is not true.

Mr. Walker: It is true.

Mr. Nielsen: The government whip says it is right. It is not right. It is not true at all. Not once before the government took office did the Prime Minister or anyone else in the Liberal party say that when they were elected they would introduce in parliament a three maple leaf flag. I think this is important because what the Liberal party is trying to do now is to say there is no need for a plebiscite because this design was put before the Canadian people before they elected the Liberals, and therefore they say they have a mandate from the people to insist that it be adopted as the flag.

This simply is not true. It borders on fraud. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has quoted from statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on June 21 and 27, 1960. I have in my hand an excerpt from the Amherst Daily News of Amherst Nova Scotia, of December 29, 1961. It is headed: "Liberal Leader Pearson Expresses His Views on Distinctive flag". I think it is illuminating, to say the least. This excerpt begins:

Wide interest has been taken in the remarks of Hon. Lester B. Pearson concerning a distinctive Canadian flag. The Liberal leader's comments were made during a press conference November 9 held in the Fort Cumberland hotel in answer to questions by John Andrews, a Halifax radio commentator.

In view of the letters and inquiries received a transcription of the interview has been prepared as follows:

Andrews: Mr. Pearson, how do you feel about a distinctive Canadian flag?

Pearson: I feel very friendly toward a distinctive Canadian flag. In fact, it's been on our program now for some years....a distinctive Canadian flag....

Andrews: What particular design do you have in mind?

Pearson: Well, I haven't any particular design in mind; but I certainly....you can't advocate a distinctive Canadian flag without being willing to take the responsibility for deciding in parliament what the design shall be.

Andrews: Would you have the union jack in it?

Pearson: I would have a distinctive flag which would not be mistaken for the flag of any other country....that's as far as I've got.

That is a fine, evasive answer by the Prime Minister. And the hon. gentleman would have us believe that the Prime Minister never left the impression that the union jack would be eliminated from any flag finally selected. It is not true. The interview goes on:

Andrews: Then you wouldn't have the union jack in it?

Pearson: Well, I just made that statement that it couldn't....I think the present red ensign can be mistaken for the flag of other countries. It's the British mercantile marine flag, almost; indeed, I noticed in the advertising the other day, it's very much like the Bermuda flag.

Andrews: You say the Liberals are working on a design. What...

Pearson: Oh, there are hundreds of designs. But it would be the responsibility of government to make up its mind which design it would submit to parliament.

Andrews: How would you poll the people on this?

Pearson: We would poll the people when we have a general election. And if they don't like the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag which can't be mistaken for that of any other country, they'll let us know in no uncertain terms.

Andrews: Which of the present flags would you retain? Anything at all from one of these?

Pearson: Oh....I'm not going to get into the question of flag design tonight.

This was in 1961, a year after the quotation put before the house by the Minister of Transport. The interview goes on:

Andrews: But you do think the country needs this symbol to hold us together?

Pearson: Yes. I think it would be a good idea to have a distinctive Canadian flag in the interest of national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members opposite applaud. But newspaper articles expressing Canadian opinion in all parts of this country, not only from coast to coast but from north to south, have said there is no greater factor contributing to disunity in this land than the design which the Prime Minister has selected and the manner in which he has placed it before us. The article continues:

Andrews: How about unrest in Quebec? Do you think it would help to quell that?

Now we come to the real reason for the Prime Minister's unseemly haste to ram this issue down the throats of the people of Canada.

Pearson: It's one of the things they talk most of in Quebec...the necessity of having the symbols of our nationality and unity in flags and national anthem, and that we should try to solve these problems in a manner which would create the minimum of division and the maximum of unity. That's a good way of putting it.

It is a pity he could not have thought of a better way of putting it before he placed this plumber's nightmare before parliament.

Andrews: Do you think Quebec would oppose anything else except a part of their fleur-de-lis in it? Must they have this part in it?

A very interesting answer was given to this question and I ask hon. members to ponder it.

Pearson: Well, we would have Quebec members in our cabinet decide what the design would be, and they would make their views very clear at that time, I'm sure.

That takes a bit of interpreting, it seems to me.

Andrews: What do you think they might say?

Pearson: Oh, I haven't picked the members for my cabinet yet from Quebec....

Andrews: Then you won't be having a parliamentary committee like your predecessor?

Pearson: I think we've had quite enough in the way of designs submitted over the last 25 years. I can't imagine any new kind of design. I've got about 50 in the last year submitted to me... some very startling ones, too.

Further on, it says:

Andrews: Well, as a Canadian, Mr. Pearson, what is your conception of a new Canadian flag?

Pearson: I'm not going to tell you what the design should be.

That is as far as he was prepared to take the Canadian people into his confidence in December, 1961.

How did the Prime Minister proceed when he finally got around to action? I have a lapel pin here which came into my possession. It is an exact replica of the Pearson design and it was in production at the time the Prime Minister made his speech to the Canadian Legion at Winnipeg. There is no manufacturer's name to be found on it, though manufacturers' names do appear on those lapel pins which can be bought in airport jewelry stands, newspaper stands, and so on, across the country, now. It makes one wonder who was so privileged as to have obtained prior information which enabled him, obviously, to make several thousand dollars, because this is not a pin which has been cheaply manufactured; it is coloured in three colours and it is gold plated. Obviously a good deal of profit has been made by the manufacturer of this pin.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question? Can he indicate the manufacturer of this pin and, if not, how can he say it was in production before the speech was made in Winnipeg?

Mr. Nielsen: No manufacturer would be foolish enough to put his name on a pin manufactured before the flag was introduced in parliament. In the second place, I know it was manufactured before the speech which was made to the Legion because it was in my possession before that speech was delivered and before the resolution was introduced in parliament. That is very simple. I wonder how many other people were able to make a profit from manufacturing flags, bumper stickers, and so on, before the information was given to parliament.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): It had to be popular to make it profitable.

Mr. Nielsen: The Toronto Star carried an article on May 20, 1964 in connection with a certain news conference. It was engineered, probably, by the Liberal organizer—at any rate the Prime Minister has given him credit for it. I think this article is extremely interesting, and it begins:

> At a few minutes before 6 p.m. last Thursday, eight men, all members of the parliamentary press gallery, left their desks in various parts of town and made their way to the Sussex drive home of Prime Minister Lester Pearson where they had been invited to discuss the issue of Canada's national flag.

This was on May 20, 1964. It goes on:

> The eight, all editors, reporters or magazine writers, were shown into the newly decorated, gray-green living room where the Prime Minister relaxed with a scotch and soda, waiting to try his hand at "kite-flying" or, as some who attended the session called it later, "news management." Kiting a news story is a long-established political technique. Certain newspapermen are fed information from what they believe is a responsible source, and are encouraged to write it without attribution.
>
> Government or party higher-ups then can judge public reaction and take this into account when they decide to go ahead or withdraw from the course they are considering.
>
> The eight who had been summoned—Walter Stewart of the Toronto Star Weekly; Tim Creery and John Walker of Southams; Bob McKeown of Weekend; Ron Collister of the Telegram; Stan Westall of the Globe and Mail; Geoffrey Scott of CHCH-TV: Hamilton, and Chris Young, editor of the Ottawa Citizen—expected a flag discussion. It is doubtful whether any of them anticipated the "hard" news they got—

The Minister of Transport would have us believe that it is not a personal choice of the Prime Minister.

> —that he had sent a telegram to the Queen informing her;

And we remember the questions asked of the Prime Minister as to whether or not the telegram had been sent, and the denials we received.

> —that the red ensign would not be on a new Canadian flag, and that he was going to lay the whole matter before the Royal Canadian Legion convention in Winnipeg the next Sunday.

This was all before parliament was told about it.

> As drinks were served and the newspapermen nibbled on sandwiches, Mr. Pearson brought out several flag designs on cardboard, selected one with a cluster of three maple leaves and two blue bands and placed it on the mantelpiece as his choice.
>
> He said he was prepared to have the government stand or fall on the maple leaf flag.
>
> The Prime Minister was careful, however, to make clear that the flag on the mantel was his personal choice.
> Needless to say, with that kind of a kite in the air, the newspapermen lost no time, an hour and a half later, in rushing to their typewriters and giving the Prime Minister's views on the flag exactly as they heard them.
> Despite the fact that two of the biggest news media—the Canadian Press and the C.B.C.—were not invited to 24 Sussex drive, the Prime Minister presumably got exactly what he was after: widespread debate on a specific flag design, for which he could not be held responsible.

That is the type and level of responsibility we have come to expect from the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet.

> In the House of Commons next day, Prime Minister Pearson denied emphatically three times that any decision had been made by the government on the flag, and he was technically correct.
>
> Most political reporters considered it came dangerously close to trying to shape the news that appeared in the newspapers, although the conference included representatives of some which opposed him on this issue.
>
> But the Prime Minister certainly didn't distort his views, nor hold anything back to make the government look good. In fact, he said too much.
>
> But next time he wants a kite flown, he'll likely allow someone just a little lower down to hold the string.

I think he needs a little more string to hold this kite.

Before my time runs out I have this proposal to make, and it is based on what I read in the debates, but particularly on the contribution of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) made on August 20, 1964. In that speech he set out very capably and lucidly four principles for the guidance of members of the house and Canadians, as elements in selecting any flag design which is to be Canada's national flag. He suggested, as did others on this side of the house, the setting up of a committee.

We have heard members speak of the desirability of a recess so that they could go to their constituents and ascertain their views. I wonder if the government might consider proposing for agreement by all parties that such a committee be established, its terms of reference to be along the lines already suggested, that is to say, its decision or selection of a design should be a majority decision, and I have heard 80 per cent discussed as an acceptable indication that there is a majority opinion.

Let us assume that the committee was set up and the agreement was reached now. If all party leaders would say, "We will agree to set up this committee as soon as parliament returns from its recess," then a recess could occur if members wish, on the understanding and agreement that the committee would be set up immediately upon their return, let us say at the end of the month, and that it would immediately tackle the problem of selecting a design.

Some have suggested three months, others two, and other periods of time have been suggested during which the committee should be limited to its discussions. But rather than attempt a compromise as to a time limit within which this committee must reach a decision, how about the committee's terms of reference including an instruction to report back within 30 days as to whether or not its members feel they will be able to reach a decision on the design?

If the committee members after 30 days of deliberation find that they cannot, or feel that they cannot reach accord by an 80 per cent majority, let us say—

I hear a chuckle over there. That is as much as the hon. member is prepared to give this suggestion. It might even be a giggle. But if members of the committee report back, in that interim report to the house, that they do not feel the matter can be decided by a majority, then back comes the issue into the house immediately without any more delay. This suggestion is a compromise and it is a compromise which will work. It is a compromise that will not prejudice any members either on the government side or on the opposition side.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

However, if within that 30 days committee members find they are making progress and that there is every likelihood they will come to accord on a design, then the interim report will so disclose and they will be free then to return to their work and complete it, and make their final report to parliament, which would be subject only to limited debate, say, by the party leaders. In this way a great deal of time would be saved. It is possible that a design acceptable to all parties would be reached, a design which would reflect more accurately the feelings of all Canadians than this debate over one particular design. There would be more likelihood of coming up with a design acceptable to all parties, in a manner in which this should be done, in which views can be sought and the feelings of all ascertained.

This is the suggestion which should find at least sufficient merit in the minds of all members of the house to compel the party leaders to consider it.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Would the hon. member permit me to ask a question.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Supposing a committee did come to an agreement on a certain design and it came back to the house, then after a limited discussion would the hon. member then say that we should go for a plebiscite, or that it would be accepted as a flag right after that?

Mr. Nielsen: Assuming that the terms of reference instruct the committee to select one design, it seems to me—and again I express a personal opinion—the terms of reference in themselves would exclude the plebiscite idea. But I express this as a personal idea and a personal view, and I want to make that clear. It is a possibility however that if the party leaders were to agree that there would be a definite understanding that the committee would be set up, and would be set to work immediately after the recess, which would commence in a day or two, and if it was understood that it would immediately start work, let us say by October 1 or 2, or whenever it might be, and that within 30 days it would report back to the house as to progress made, and if such report indicates that there is definite progress being made, then let them be sent back to complete the job.

If the report indicates there is no possibility of unanimity or majority acceptance, like the last committee had to the extent of 23 to 1, and if the committee reports there is no possibility of coming to agreement, then the terms of reference in setting up the committee would bring the matter back into the house without any further delay. I submit to members of the house that it is a suggestion which might meet with favour by the party leaders and they might compromise to that extent. Nobody is prejudiced if the idea does not work out, and there is everything to gain if it does.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, we have had some very interesting speeches this afternoon and this evening. It was gratifying and interesting to see the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Pickersgill) express some views and make some revelations, because we have had very little contribution from the government side during the last 10 or 12 days of debate. He justifies the introduction of the flag resolution by the fact that this was in the Liberal platform. I have tried to check with hon. members from various parts of Canada and have found that when it suited the convenience of the Liberal party, it was in the platform; but when it did not specify, when it did not spell out that any flag that would be introduced was going to do away with the union jack, it was not said that the flag would not have the union jack on it.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal members and the government should have been frank with the people of Canada. They were not. They have no mandate to introduce a flag and to try to ram it down the throat of this parliament. We have no reason to accept it, because we have no mandate from the people of Canada to accept or reject that flag. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Pickersgill), if I understood him correctly—although he was quite excited and tried to say a great deal in the short time at his disposal, and I think tried to answer the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in as few words as possible—said that the amendment is not so important, but that the resolution is very important. However, Mr. Speaker, if the resolution is very important, what justification has the hon. gentleman for saying that we are wasting the time of this parliament and the time of the country? If it is important, it should receive every consideration and this question should be referred to the people. In this regard the official opposition has been consistent. This party has said that the question should be referred to the people of Canada, and the subamendment has set out certain questions which the people of Canada should answer before they decide on the particular design of their choice. I realize that there are people in Canada who are in favour of the flag proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). We know very well that there are thousands of people and many organizations who have appealed to us by way of petitions, telegrams and letters which indicate that they are behind the red ensign. So, Mr. Speaker, it is not becoming for the Acting Prime Minister to throw out this charge, that we are the only ones who are obstructing the passage of this resolution. The Acting Prime Minister says we are withholding approval of the maple leaf flag from the people of Canada. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are just crying and dying to have a choice in this regard, although the government says they want the flag proposed by them.

We have to admit that there are people who wish neither, if we can judge by the letters and other communications we have received. I have received such letters, and all hon. members on the government side of the house have received this type of letter. We have received requests for three leaves, four leaves, five leaves or more; rectangles, diagonals, and all sorts of designs. Everyone has a different design and interpretation of the flag we should have. But the people of Canada, together with us on this side of the house and those on the government side, have one thing in common, and that is that we want a flag that would have a legal status in this country.

We have such a flag, Mr. Speaker. I maintain that it has a quasi-legal status, because it was established by order in council. I believe the people of Canada want a flag which is established by legislative enactment, by a bill of parliament. Some countries have no legal enactment which legislates that such and such a flag is the flag of their country. But the union jack of the British Isles has come into being and has been accepted as the flag of that country by usage, although our neighbours to the south, who pride themselves on the stars and stripes, did pass an act of congress declaring this to be the design of their flag.

We are in agreement that we would like to legalize a flag for this country. Let us be reasonable in this matter, Mr. Speaker. We are not saying that there are not people who are in favour of the three maple leaf design. I am among the first in this house who would not want to smear the maple leaf design; I have a great deal of respect for it. However, something has happened in this house. I admire the courage of the hon gentleman who sits behind me, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who charged that nobody on the Liberal side of the house has spoken on this matter with any authority. I remember that in the first six days of this debate there was speaker for speaker put up from the Liberal benches. There were even a few speakers from the splinter groups, who have since become the silent allies of the government. But since then, what have we had? There have been one or two gentlemen who have agreed with the Prime Minister, and one or two who have had the courage of their convictions to rise and express contrary views. What have we had from the rest? We have had groans of agony; we have had jeers; we have had childish grins on some of their faces; we have had questions of privilege raised and questions asked—and nothing more. There has been general silence from the other side of the chamber. In spite of this, Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister has the gall to say that this party is dominated by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. Who dominates the members of the government? Who has clamped their mouths shut? Who is behind the Berlin wall in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Mandziuk: Who is responsible for this Mr. Speaker? Is it fear of their leader, or is it because they have nothing to say and have no principles of their own? In the first six days of the debate we learned that they have wonderful talkers in that party; men pleasant to listen to. We know they have talked to the press and have talked in the country. They have written letters of apology to their constituents and have tried to impress upon them their support for this flag. But, Mr. Speaker, it would be nice to hear from them in some way other than by interjection from a seated position. We would like these gentlemen to speak up; to have some courage and stand up on their feet and speak of the petitions, and so on, that they have received. Then their constituents would know what attitude they are taking and would realize these members are not afraid to speak up.

The Acting Prime Minister has said that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition dominates this party. In this connection the Acting Prime Minister was vehement and roared away. He said that the Leader of the Opposition was obsessed with power and dominates this party. I ask, Mr. Speaker, has he dominated thousands of legionnaires of the Royal Canadian Legion? Does he dominate the Legion branches in my constituency, to which I shall make reference? Does he dominate the I.O.D.E.? Does he dominate the Orangemen? Does he dominate the Protestant league? If he does, he must indeed be a great man, and I would love to have that power. This is a ridiculous silly statement for the Acting Prime Minister of today to make. We hear from time to time that they shall indicate their wish by a vote. We have requested that a plebiscite—

An hon. Member: You are afraid of a vote, are you?

Mr. Mandziuk: I shall come to that, Mr. Speaker. I hardly dare take a moment off to partake of a sip of water, because I hear "Question, question, question" or, "Carried, carried, carried". That is the sort of chorus any parrot could learn, especially the parrots we have on the other side. If it were not a musical falsetto we might even enjoy it. But that is all we hear: They are going to give their decision when they vote. I would assure them that those who voted them in are liable to give their decision as well. We do not mind the silence on the other side and we rather enjoy these interjections. But I would like to see one hon. member opposite recognized and stand up on his feet. If he asks me a question, fine; I will try and answer it and if I cannot I will say so. If he wants to speak afterwards, then he can do so. But we enjoy their silence and I think the country does also. Their constituents must enjoy their silence and wonder where they stand. One can draw his own conclusions from their silence. Is it not an admission that they have nothing to say? Is it an admission that if they have anything to say they are afraid to say it. Of whom are they afraid, Mr. Speaker? I will tell you: They are afraid of their leader, the Prime Minister. If they are not afraid of their leader they are afraid to tell their constituents where they stand. I know every hon. member on the opposition side of the house who has taken part in this debate, and I know that I will stake my political future on what I say. I have to live with myself. I have to live with my principles and I have to live with my conscience; I cannot just sit on the fence. I should like to see some of the letters written by hon. members opposite to their constituents. They must be marked "Personal", "Confidential", and so on, but I expect we are going to come across a few. I have heard rumours, but I do not want to base any argument on rumour.

Since the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Pickersgill) has once and for all spiked the argument that we are wasting time on this very important issue, let me say it is important to us that it be discussed, and that is why we feel it should be handed over to the people. I think the Prime Minister too must consider it a very important issue because he has shelved everything else, all the important legislation and promises hon. members opposite had made to the electorate of Canada. All this has been put aside and is gathering dust or has been put into cold storage because this present issue is an important matter. I realize that it is important and I have already told the house that I think it is important. The Acting Prime Minister said that the resolution is very important. While it contained the two flags it was most important; but fortunately the resolution was split in two, providing for one flag for our association with the British commonwealth of nations and the other for association—with what? With the ambitions of the Prime Minister.

I ask the government, or those who support this flag, to consider the question why they are afraid. Why do they not trust the Canadian people? Why do they not permit the Canadian people to have a voice in deciding the flag they want? We have quoted witness after witness from various organizations who have gone on record as saying they want a plebiscite. Why is the government afraid to submit this matter to a plebiscite? Why are they afraid to go to the people at the time of the next general election on this issue? Are they afraid of their decision? How can they be when I have heard some hon. members on the other side of the house give statistics to show that the three leaf flag carries a majority of support in Canada? In this case we who support the red ensign are in a minority. But, Mr. Speaker, even if the supporters of this new flag are in a majority, and even if they, the government, are in a majority in this house, thanks to that unholy alliance with certain splinter groups, has a majority the right to trample on the feelings or principles of a minority? If they have, then tell our French Canadian boys in Quebec—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): We are defending the rights of minorities.

Mr. Mandziuk: I am talking about holding a plebiscite.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You are talking of the red ensign.

Mr. Mandziuk: I am saying that the plebiscite should decide; and if the hon. member wants to make a speech after I am finished then it is his privilege to get to his feet.

For the first three months, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister staked the life of his government on the decision on the flag he proposed. This hung like the sword of Damocles. A lot of those who were not supporters of the three leaf flag, being afraid of an election, got on the bandwagon and decided to support it.

Mr. Orlikow: Is that why some of your members are going to vote that way?

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Speaker, I really think that if a member wants to ask a question he should receive your recognition by asking for it.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): He does not answer.

Mr. Mandziuk: The question was not properly asked.

Mr. Peters: He does not know the answer.

Mr. Mandziuk: For three whole months the sword of Damocles hung over us. I feel that the reason for this was that the Prime Minister was sure that if he did call an election he would win it. However, like the good politician he is he reads the press, not only those papers that flatter him but the others as well, and he must have read the article by Patrick Nicholson, a respected pressman, who wrote an article which appeared in the Quebec Chronicle of August 12. It was headlined "Election of flag could kill Liberals". The Prime Minister, having seen that, then withdrew his threat and said: "Boys, you can have a free vote as long as you leave me alone".

What Patrick Nicholson says, Mr. Speaker, is so interesting that I think it is worth while putting some of it on record. I have a lot of respect for the opinions of this man. He says:

> The campaign strategists have been halted in their tracks—stunned.

I include in those campaign strategists, of course, the Prime Minister, as the chief strategist.

> As most, but not all, Canadians know very well, parliament has long been stalled in its work largely because of "the flag issue". As the majority but by no means all, of Canadians are uneasily conscious, this is dividing the country—

This news must have disturbed the Prime Minister. The article then continues:

—this is dividing the country even more disastrously than the stormiest issue recorded in our history books—the execution of the leader of the Metis revolt, Louis Riel, in 1885.

That is what Patrick Nicholson had to say. He then went on to state:

There is a parallel between Riel and the flag. The public uproar about the punishment of the chiefain of the French half breeds gravely divided Canada's two main ethnic groups, and changed the balance of federal politics for three quarters of a century.

The Prime Minister must have realized the situation and, as this article states——stepped in where Diefenbaker failed to tread.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest he did so because he could not foresee what this situation would do to this nation.

The article then refers to the French language newspaper, Le Droit, in which much has been said about this poll that was carried out. The article which I have been quoting continues as follows:

This poll discovered that a majority of Canadians, in every province except Quebec, prefer the Canadian ensign—

This is a long article and I do not intend to take up the time of the house to read it all, but Mr. Nicholson ends up by stating:

The significance of these figures, in the eyes of all Liberal strategists thinking in terms of an election—

Yes, an election is important.

—is that they clearly show that the flag issue would bring disastrous Liberal losses in nine provinces, and leave that party largely as the political arm of French Canada.

I suggest it was because the Prime Minister realized the situation as outlined by this article, rather than out of the goodness of his heart, that he freed his members taking the bit out of their mouths, allowing them a free vote. The Prime Minister became aware of these statements, which appeared in a great many more than one newspaper. I am sure that hon. gentleman is a politician to the extent he can appreciate the meaning of such statements.

Mr. Speaker, since I spoke last on June 30, at the time the sword of Damocles hung over our heads when, if we had voted against the resolution, we would be forced out on the hustings, I have received a great number of letters and petitions. I do not intend to read the personal letters I have received, because of an impression I have that the Acting Prime Minister objects. I do however intend to read some representations made by organizations.

I received a petition from one Royal Canadian Legion branch in Elphinstone, Manitoba, which was signed by 50 members. This is not a large Legion branch, but I am sure if you check the names on this petition you will find that these members represent a great number of racial origins. We even have a few Indian veterans who are members of this Legion branch.

I intended to be generous to the Prime Minister in sending him a photostat copy of this petition, and like a gentleman he acknowledged receipt. Since his acknowledgement is not personal or confidential I hope hon. members will permit me to put it on record. The Prime Minister's letter is dated August 13, 1964, and is on the stationery of the office of the Prime Minister. The letter states:

The Prime Minister has asked me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 12 enclosing a copy of a petition that you received from the Royal Canadian Legion branch at Elphinstone, Manitoba, and to advise that he has noted it.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,—

I treasure the signature, Mr. Speaker. It is that of Jules Pelletier, secretary to the Prime Minister.

I received another letter from the Prime Minister's office, actually signed by his own hand. I received a telegram from the strongest Legion branch in my constituency, the branch in Minnedosa. I usually call this the capital of my riding. I received the telegram dated August 18 and, to be fair to the Prime Minister, thinking he would be interested to know that we were not just talking through our hats, as some hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested, I passed it on to him. He sent me this reply dated August 19, 1964:

Thank you for your letter of August 14 enclosing the telegram that you received from the Minnedosa branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, advising that the branch membership supports the red ensign as Canada's official flag, and which I have noted.

Apparently the Prime Minister decided that valour was the better part of policy and retreated, deciding to give a free vote. The vote has always been free as far as we are concerned, in spite of what the Acting Prime Minister has suggested.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that any party that does not listen to the opinion of the grassroots cannot know what is taking place and will lose out in the end. I have attempted to keep in touch with the grassroots in my constituency to find out how these people feel about putting this issue to a plebiscite or referendum. I have written many letters to my constituents, although without the same influence as bumper stickers have, financed by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis), or those large buttons, of which I have seen little in the past months.

A small weekly newspaper in my constituency, the Gazette Reporter of Rivers, Manitoba, published an article under the heading "Flag Fight". Rivers, Manitoba, is in an area very close to C.G.A.T.C., which is the largest air training centre in western Canada. This newspaper is read by a great number of people in this area who cannot express themselves because they belong to Her Majesty's armed forces. This newspaper is published by Mr. Larry Bell. During the past four elections I have attempted to find out which political party he supports, but to no avail. He always greets me pleasantly but refuses to disclose his affiliation. He stated this in his editorial dated July 16, 1964:

> A writer in the Toronto Star waxes exuberant in describing Prime Minister Pearson's handling of the "flag issue."

As that T.V. star, Hazel, would say when something of excitement takes place: "This is a doozie". The article continues:

> Recalling how the great Mongol conqueror, Genghis Khan, stormed out of the east in 1215 waving a banner of nine yak tails, he pictures Pearson similarly storming out of Ottawa in 1964 holding aloft his gonfalon of conjoined maple leaves.
>
> The most remarkable thing about the Big Flag Fight (says the writer) has been the transformation of Mr. Pearson from a mild, diplomatic, even hesitant leader to a purposeful commander, storming the bastions of public opinion with a new battle banner and a strident cry of "Excelsior!"
> Somehow, other news media reports and comment just don't back up the picture. Pussy-footing, cat-and-mouse tactics, backing and sidling—all duly headlined in the public prints—have overtook the original "Excelsior", marred its brightness. In any event, it is to be hoped "Mike" doesn't meet the same fate as that cryer and his banner with the strange device.

I think that is a masterful editorial which reflects accurately the thought of the people in respect of the tactics used by the Prime Minister and those who support him in trying to hoist this flag on the Canadian people. In a close circle of friends let us do it with as little debate as possible—that is what the Prime Minister hoped. The less the people know about it the better it is for us, because they only campaigned on the flag issue when it pleased their fancy, where they figured they were on safe ground. They did not dare to mention the flag in my constituency, I assure you. I never heard it mentioned during the last two election campaigns or before that.

Here is an anonymous poem which appeared in the Hamiota Echo which is published by one, Fred Venables. I must admit he is a supporter of mine but I do not think that was the reason for publishing the poem. He is not a poet so it must have been written by someone else. It is a real masterpiece. It is titled "Freedom of Choice" and reads as follows:

> Little boy blue come blow your horn,
> Your flag's in the making, an era is born.
> What matters the people you swore you would serve.
> Just show them you still have an unholy nerve.
> You know that the ensign is loved by us all,
> Especially those who answered the call.
> We fought and we died for the old union jack,
> And wherever it took us we never looked back.
> Those flags bravely flutter all over our land,
> From ocean to ocean, and many a strand.
> From Arctic's cold shore to the southernmost seas,
> They proudly unfold themselves in the breeze...
> But you L. B. P. think you know what is best.
> You've made up your mind so to heck with the rest.
> But let us remind you just what is at stake.
> We don't give up easy for something we hate.
> You look to the people to keep you in power,
> But your own lack of judgment turns everything sour.
> You dream of your three maple leaves on a stick.
> No wonder you've edged it with blue, good and thick.

It is a rather long poem and I know some people do not appreciate good poetry. I say that because I see they are talking among themselves, but I will give copies to those who really want to read the whole poem.

Mr. Knowles: Is that part of the poem?

Mr. Mandziuk: It does not rhyme. I can say that much to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The poem ends this way:

> We know you are badgered but never say die.
> There are things in the offing that will make it quite clear,
> You can't fool with people nor what they hold dear.
> And if you are wise you will draw in your horns,
> And go to the people as you should have done.
> Our freedom of choice that we fought to retain,
> We have it before, we can do it again.

You know now what the threat consists of, Mr. Speaker. I think this poem written in August gives a clear indication that the propaganda of stamps, bumper stickers and press releases which wasted the time of the house has not caught fire in any part of Canada to any extent. If it were not for the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister I might read two short letters, but perhaps I will anyway. They are very short. One reads:

I hope you will do all you can to save the red ensign.

The letter is signed and if you want the name I will give it. It is a beautiful girl.

An hon. Member: Give it.

Mr. Mandziuk: You are married. I do not think I should. I have another one which reads:

I am in favour of keeping our Canadian red ensign flag.

I could bring dozens and dozens before the house. Today's Ottawa Citizen has a very interesting headline, "Pearson Can't Escape Flag". That is interesting. Here is what the article says in part:

—in a city which has decked itself in hundreds of red ensigns and union jacks—in about equal numbers—for the confederation centenary celebrations. Even the Maple Leaf bakery flies the red ensign here.

Mr. MacEwan: Where is that?

Mr. Mandziuk: Charlottetown. That is in today's Ottawa Citizen, and it is very interesting.

Mr. Peters: Order.

Mr. Mandziuk: Is somebody out of order?

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Mandziuk: We have heard nothing but "order, order, order", "question, question, question", "carried, carried, carried". We have heard nothing else during the last 12 days of debate. I have told you the reason why and you can guess the rest. I want to refer the house to an editorial in the Telegram, a Toronto paper—good old Toronto. It appeared in the issue of August 22 last. Apparently the Telegram is not sick and tired of our obstruction.

Mr. Drouin: We are.

Mr. Mandziuk: You see, there is another member who is glued to his seat. I sympathize with him. I know that the tongues of many on that side are aching because they want to get up and say something, but an order is an order and the discipline of an army must be obeyed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Drouin: If the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) had attended more regularly the house sittings he would know that I have delivered a speech on the amendment and the subamendment now under consideration.

[Text]

Mr. Mandziuk: It must have been all right, Mr. Speaker, because some members applauded but this device does not work and I did not catch a word. If the hon. member would care to repeat it after I am finished I would appreciate it. All I can do is blame the government.

An hon. Member: It has not worked for six months.

Mr. Mandziuk: I was about to refer to an editorial in the Telegram headed "Ask the People". I am only going to quote a few sentences. It starts by saying:

The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.

That is what we have been trying to tell the house for the last 17 or 18 days that we have been debating this matter. It must not be done without the consent of the people. If a majority of the people prefer to have the three leaves I will be the first one to salute the new flag, because a law is a law. We are a civilized nation. I quote further:

No decision of the House of Commons, by free vote or otherwise, to strike our historic ensign and replace it with a pennant of the Prime Minister's choosing can be construed as expressing the consensus of the nation.

Those who are pushing the new flag, Mr. Speaker, did not even receive a majority of the votes in the last election. They do not have a mandate any more than we have. The editorial goes on to say that certain legislative programs are introduced by the government and the government takes its responsibility for its plans and policies. Then the editorial continues:

But the flag issue is different. Here is a matter that touches the hearts, the emotions, the loyalties of virtually all Canadians. A parliamentary vote that would destroy the country's flag would leave deep and festering scars for years to come. It is far too important to be settled by parliamentary compromise.

Even if a compromise were arrived at by members of parliament I feel that it should be put to the people in a plebiscite or some other way to find out whether they accept that compromise. I read further:

There was no suggestion that parliament would be presented with a single, peculiar pennant design and be told that this must be our flag. If there had been such a proposition, it is quite possible that Mr. Pearson's minority representation in the House of Commons would have been considerably smaller.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): At the outset of my remarks I should like to draw to the attention of this house a gross exaggeration which appeared in the Toronto daily Star last Friday to the effect that this debate had cost the Dominion of Canada half a billion dollars up to that date. I hope the Star corrects this mistake. Even if one accepts its own figure of $33,000 a day as the cost of running the House of Commons and multiplies it by the number of days we have been sitting on this issue, it becomes apparent how far from accuracy this figure really is.

My first observations will be on the subject of the government's proposed flag. The weak position of the proposed three maple leaf flag has been revealed by the lack of support from the government benches. If government members were enthusiastic about it and were sure of their constituents' backing I would think they would be on their feet speaking of its merits and advantages. They have passed up many opportunities to tell this house and the country why they prefer the three maple leaf flag and why they think the Canadian red ensign should be pulled down and discarded. Some of them have expressed their opinions fluently and I will make reference to these deliberations later.

I would like to dwell for a few minutes on incidents that indicate further the weak position of the three leaf flag. We are all aware of the many and varied schemes which were used to no avail to promote this flag. When it appears on cars it is now a sad spectacle—it has become a tattle-tale gray. Much of the promotion must surely have been embarrassing to the Prime Minister, especially when one of his ministers lowered this flag to the position of a bumper sticker. This three leaf flag has taken a terrific slide—from the top of a pole in front of the parliament buildings to a bumper sticker, which is just about as low as it can get. Indications coming in from across the country verify that its popularity and support have slipped about the same degree in the opinion of the vast majority of our people.

Surely by now, after this vain effort to break the will of the Canadian people, the Prime Minister will get his political ship back on course and go along with the wishes of the majority by allowing a plebiscite.

Some of his backbenchers have seen the handwriting on the wall and have so expressed themselves. On August 19 the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) said:

> We on this side have wondered how it is that so many people in Canada are staunchly entrenched behind the red ensign, a fact we did not expect; people who would otherwise have fondly and readily welcomed a new distinctive flag.

There are many reasons for this attitude and reasons why it is gaining strength with each passing day.

Many people across Canada did not take the Prime Minister seriously when he talked of adopting a distinctive flag for Canada. This is so, first, because many of the government promises still remain promises or died within the 60 days of decision. Second, others fully believed that the new flag would be a modification of the red ensign. Of course, when the three leaf flag design was given its back door introduction the props were knocked from under this line of thought. It was then and there that the backers of the Canadian red ensign took their stand. Their ranks were substantially increased when the Prime Minister announced the method by which he hoped to force his flag on this nation. More people took up the fight from resentment of the brainwashing methods by which he hoped to influence opinion in support of his three leaf flag.

Now, referring again to the observations of the hon. member from York East, I can assure him I am in full accord with the last statement of his speech when he said: "so that we may give the Canadian flag back to the people to whom it belongs". This is all we are asking. Give the people of Canada the flag of their choice. This problem can be settled just as easily as that, by way of a plebiscite.

There are many reasons why the three leaf design did not catch on as anticipated by the Prime Minister. One need only look at it to realize it lacked anything that would create enthusiasm. It is destitute of magnetism which would encourage the people to rally around and give support. It is too bad the Prime Minister had not taken heed of these words of Henry Ward Beecher:

> A thoughtful mind, when it sees a nation's flag, sees not the flag only, but the nation itself; and whatever may be its symbols, its insignia, he reads chiefly in the flag the government, the principles, the truths, the history which belongs to the nation that sets it forth.

The three leaf flag does not embody these things which are essential.

We need only read the speech of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) when he spoke on August 24 as reported at page 7178 of Hansard to find more reasons for the failure to create any fervour for the three leaf flag. Some of the hon. member's statements have been refuted in the press by a letter signed by six of his colleagues, but to my knowledge only one of those six has spoken in this debate, and that member, when he made his speech just a little later the same day, did not contradict any of the statements made by the hon. member from York-Humber. So we must believe the statement made by the hon. member for York-Humber when he told us that the government caucus had no voice in the decision on the three leaf flag. There must have been very good reasons for keeping Liberal members excluded from information so vital to the government and to the country. This is the usual procedure for all conspiracy. Here was the beginning of the disunity which has now fanned out across this nation.

The introduction of the three leaf flag was no doubt as shocking to supporters of the government as it was to millions of Canadians, particularly to those Canadians living in constituencies where the flag was given the silent treatment during the election campaign and where they were told there were so many other goodies in store for them. After the silent treatment given government members prior to the introduction of his personal flag there must surely have been much quiet, as well as open, resentment when the three leaf flag appeared on the scene. Handcuffed as they were from the start, the government members on hearing the resolution read, at once realized they were still shackled because they could not speak out against the two top men of their party—the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau)—unless they had a lot of intestinal fortitude. The die was cast. They had no voice, so very few of them have spoken.

Now I ask this house, could anyone expect the Canadian people to accept this three leaf flag with open arms, conceived as it was in secrecy by a few individuals; introduced to the house like a cold clam with no history or tradition; and since that time promoted by ways and means that did nothing more than build up more resistance to its approval?

Furthermore, much information has been brought to the surface during this debate which has had a telling effect across the country. Many people are giving the matter a second look and have come to realize that a flag given approval at this time will be the flag as long as we stand as a nation. I would venture to say that if the Prime Minister had unfurled this three leaf flag during the election campaign he would have saved Canada this present embarrassment because he would not have had the opportunity to form a government.

My constituents are asking me, "If the government forces this flag on the country, who will fly it?" This is a good question and I would think the only place we could be sure of having it flown would be on federal property. Also, I find much opposition to the two flag idea. A flag we are not ashamed of in any company should be our flag, and that flag is the Canadian red ensign, which to this date has never failed to rally support in peace or war, and we will not fail it now. We want one country and one flag.

I will at this time quote from an editorial from the Owen Sound Sun-Times of May 25, 1964 headed, "Will Quebec fly New Flag?" It reads:

> Midst all the turmoil over the "new Canadian flag" there can be no more moot question (nor uncertain one) than whether a new standard for the nation will bring about greater or lesser unity. And of topmost importance in this regard must be the ultimate results on relations between French Canadian Quebec and the rest of Canada.
> Will, for instance, the people of Quebec accept Prime Minister Pearson's new flag as their national standard? Or will the Quebec flag, in several forms but always exclusively featuring the fleur-de-lis, continue to be flown throughout that province, along with the tricolour of France, but seldom, if ever, Canada's present colours?
> Unless Quebec accepts as its own any new flag Mr. Pearson may have parliament approve, then all the Prime Minister's efforts are in vain. He will have failed to promote that unity so vitally needed for the continued progress of this young nation. In fact, it may well be that disunity has been promoted. The hard core at least of the Canadian Legion is not likely to easily give up their support of the red ensign which has come to mean so much to them as they have served their nation. Nor, if the new flag is an unprofitable compromise to Canadians of French ancestry, will it be viewed kindly by other provinces which see themselves as distinctively important to Canada as a whole as in Quebec.

We have heard members opposite say we should forget our past and our history, which is embodied in the red ensign. They say that it is insignificant and would be better forgotten. Now, it is most difficult to accept this sort of thinking because, as individuals our own past can mean so much to us. When one applies for an important position, his past record is very thoroughly investigated, and rightly so. It is usually, if I may use another example, the deciding factor when an investor is speculating on which company or corporation he will invest in. If he is a wise investor he examines closely the record of the president and the directors of the organization. He looks into the financial statement and all the past history of the said company before investing. The same principle applies to any nation. Many decisions made by its own people and other countries are based on that country's past performance or its history. We cannot ignore history or wash it out. Some may distort it, but we can never obliterate it.

Therefore, it is just nonsense to say that the history and tradition in which the Canadian red ensign is involved and so interwoven should be forgotten. If we are to believe this, the prospects for our future have reached an all-time low. It would be a sad day for this nation if we were to sit idly by and let this calamity overtake us. We cannot let our people down. We will continue to fight until a suitable solution is presented or until it is agreed to let the Canadian people decide.

I quote from this short editorial from the Sudbury Star because it is relevant:

> Quebec is only one province in the dominion of Canada. But it elects 75 members to the 265 member House of Commons. The Liberal government is a minority government. It has only 128 members in the Commons of which 46 come from Quebec. Without the support of that province the Liberals could not form a government—and this has been demonstrated time and time again in Canada's political history.
>
> The Liberals need Quebec and Quebec needs the Liberals. Politically, it is as simple as that. Behind all the high-sounding platitudes about "rights" and "unity" can be found hard-faced politics where power and the retention of power are the rewards.
> Canadians might ask themselves if there is any other country in the world where a minority group dictates to the majority to the same extent? Or where a government bends over backwards to please the minority and tries to convince the majority that they should agree to domination by the minority. That is what is happening in Canada today.

Mr. Speaker, the brunt of the attack in this flag debate has fallen on the shoulders of one man. That man is the Prime Minister of this country. Perhaps this is justified as he has made statements indicating his willingness to take the responsibility. We know he had the help of two or three people in selecting the three leaf design. We know he promoted it by way of a press release to a selected group of news reporters. We know he took it upon himself to make an appeal to the Canadian Legion rally in Winnipeg. In fact he has played the leading part in the act, but I am convinced that he has taken some direction from his braintrust on some of the methods used in trying to sell it to the Canadian people.

The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) made his contribution by way of bumper stickers. The Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) made sure of good coverage with the three leaf postage stamp. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) broke the sad story to the Queen. Other ministers no doubt took a hand in the regrettable incident which has upset Canadian people more than anything in our history, outside of war itself.

The Prime Minister has shown good judgment on many occasions in the past during his years as a diplomat. He has been honoured many times. He has commanded much respect on numerous occasions. If I may, I will cite a recent event, a report of which makes special reference to him. This is an excerpt taken from a report in the Ottawa Journal of July 16 on the commonwealth conference held recently in London:

> Pearson emerged—in the opinion of observers from Australia to Zanzibar—as one of the most effective participants in this conference. His experience in commonwealth and empire meetings goes back to the 1930's.
> His speech Monday was regarded as a turning point on the Rhodesian issue when—as representative of the senior white dominion—he put forward his declaration on racial equality and called for release of political prisoners in the African colony.

Right now a great opportunity is being presented to him, whereby he can render a great service to his country. He can play the leading role in a new act with every Canadian playing a part. He can settle this flag turmoil quietly and to the satisfaction of the majority by letting the Canadian people select their flag. It is the only way he can settle the issue and keep the high respect of his fellow Canadians. He must surely see the folly of following the course leading to disunity. We know, Mr. Speaker, he is exposed to great pressure from within his party by people who do not fully realize what the consequences will be if the three maple leaf flag is forced on this nation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) must surely realize that he would not have the support of the communists and many known radicals on this issue if he were acting in the best interests of this nation. I implore him to free himself of these millstones which threaten to strangle him and, in the interests of unity, assume the role of a free thinking prime minister who will not be intimidated or influenced by people who would rejoice at the breakup of this young nation.

My personal contacts with the Prime Minister have been pleasant and in the past he has given me the impression that he would listen to reason. Why he takes such an adamant stand on this issue, which means so much to so many Canadians, is hard to understand. If he would recognize the folly of his ways and would agree to a unifying compromise, the Canadian people would give him full credit and the respect due to him, and he would command full marks from this House of Commons. As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, the democratic way out would be by way of a choice by the Canadian people.

I do not think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) impressed any one very much this afternoon. His remarks did nothing more than strengthen the barrier preventing any compromise. The attitude he took this afternoon is not shared by all government members. I know quite a number over there who would be willing to consider a compromise.

Miss LaMarsh: Who? Name them.

Mr. Noble: I could name them. As a matter of fact, last night as I walked from this building with a minister of the crown we chatted about problems under his jurisdiction. Finally I said, "This debate on the flag has turned out to be a tough nut to crack". He replied, "We must reach an agreement; we must compromise"; and, of course, I agree with him. I think this is the attitude of a good many members on the other side of the chamber, which they would express if they had the opportunity to do so.

It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, that I speak at any length in defence of the Canadian red ensign. It is becoming more respected, more loved, and is flown by more Canadians right across this country, including those in the province of Quebec, with every passing day. On a recent visit to Montreal I saw more Canadian red ensigns flying than at any time over the years. Speaking of the French, Mr. Speaker, I noticed a newspaper write-up recently about a young Canadian by the name of Joseph Côté, who by his name, I assume is French. The report spoke of an extended hitch-hiking trip which this young university history student took through Europe, Africa and Asia lasting over 300 days. To make sure he would be properly appreciated and recognized, he wore the Canadian red ensign on the outside of his packsack.

An hon. Member: Was he from Quebec?

Mr. Noble: Well, the name would indicate that he was. I would also like to say that I stood in front of the United Nations building in New York with some American friends, and there in front of that impressive building flew the flags of all member nations. The Canadian red ensign stood out among those flags and I was proud to point to it and say, "There flies our Canadian flag". I have another quote here from our daily paper, Mr. Speaker. I understand that it claims to be independent, and I know this is the case because they have never given me any favours. This article says:

> We Favour the Red Ensign
> The Sun-Times makes a very honest, and we believe successful effort, to be independent in our political viewpoint. Helpful in this regard is the fact that staff members connected with opinion voiced are quite diversified in the political field, including those who honestly attempt to remain free of party bias of any kind because of the paper's policy of independence.
>
> We view the flag issue as most unfortunate at this time, as has been pointed out in these columns previously. Nor is it an issue that should bring on an election, if Mr. Pearson has such a thought, as has been suggested.
> The Sun-Times editorially favours the red ensign, a flag of which Canadians of all ancestral background can be proud in that it has been born out of the experience of a young, aggressive and farsighted nation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that regardless of what happens as a result of this debate, I predict that the red ensign or a compromise of that flag will fly over Canada long after our time.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great feeling of pride and a deep sense of responsibility that I rise to take part in this historic and important debate. In doing so I would like to take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the house the views of constituents whom I am honoured to represent, as well as some views of my own. At the outset I should like to state that I am not only quite satisfied with the flag that is universally acknowledged and accepted as Canada's flag, the red ensign, but I am strongly in support of its retention.

Constituents of mine with whom I have discussed this matter, as well as the numerous ones who have taken time out to send me their views in letters, have with one exception indicated in no uncertain terms that they also wish to see the retention of the Canadian red ensign. Knowing them as I do, however, and being aware of their keen interest in the all important matter of Canadian unity, I feel quite certain that they would be more than willing to accept some variation of the present flag if it were felt desirable by a majority of the people of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, I am also quite certain that the great majority of them would insist that in any new flag which may be decided upon there should be some recognition of our two founding races.

After those brief observations I should like to deal with one particular aspect which has come to the forefront not only of this debate but during the past few years when certain people in many parts of Canada have talked over the possibility of a new flag. The point I should like to deal with at this time is the emphasis which has been placed by most speakers in this house on a distinctive Canadian flag. The speakers who have preceded me have dwelt upon this point. Some have referred to the definitions of the word "distinctive" which are found in various dictionaries. Therefore, like many other hon. members I have been quite interested to try to get to the bottom of this idea of a distinctive Canadian flag, and I have found from looking through various dictionaries that the definitions show little variation. In the latest dictionary I consulted I noticed that "distinctive" is defined as "marking or expressing distinction". When I looked up the meaning of "distinction" in the same dictionary I found three definitions were given. The first variation was "an act of distinguishing a difference or differences"; the second one was "a difference"; and the third "a distinguishing quality or mark".

After looking at the red ensign flying above the peace tower, atop public buildings across Canada and many private dwellings, I would defy anyone to convince me from the definitions in the dictionary of the two words "distinctive" and "distinction" that our present red ensign is not a distinctive flag. Be that as it may, I will return to the subject I mentioned a while ago and say that I am sure that the constituents in my area would be more than willing to compromise on some variation of our present flag in respect to the all important subject of the unity of our nation. Before going further let me say that, despite the speeches we have heard in this flag debate, and no matter how long it goes on, I hope all of us realize that the unity of our country is by far the most important fact.

Before giving the house any further views on the red ensign or the possibility of coming to some agreement on an acceptable alternate design, I should like to deal briefly with some of the points which have come out in the debate so far, as well as some of the charges which have been made in the articles which have appeared in various newspapers and in statements made on television. First of all, I should like to say a few words regarding the charge, which I say is unfounded and unjustified, that the official opposition is obstructing the business of this house. Many speakers have mentioned this and many of our newsmen have given their version as to what has been going on during these last two or three weeks. I have been very interested in one or two of these observations.

Another charge which has been made is that we are filibustering. In this respect I should like to mention the speech delivered in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). In his speech he roamed the field far and wide, and I noticed that on seven or eight occasions, while looking up to the ceiling and possibly bowing to any members of the fourth estate who might be within his vision, he mentioned the word "filibuster".

Mr. Orlikow: How many days ago was that?

Mr. Simpson: That was a few days ago.

Mr. Orlikow: Then it is not a filibuster.

Mr. Simpson: Well, let us take a look at some of the observations from our worldly wise newsmen. I would like to quote an article which apeared in the Toronto Star on August 31, which is not too long ago, from the pen of Mr. Peter Newman. In reference to the unfounded reports of the obstruction of parliament he stated:

> The Liberal administration, unaccountably, has no major bills ready for debate.

Hon. members opposite may say "So what?" They may ask: "Who is this gentleman to say that we have no legislation ready for parliament?" I recall when he penned a recent fictional edition for them, at which time he was considered the fountain of knowledge; but somehow or other when he talks in this way they seem to want to turn off the water.

I do not think by any means we need to stop at Mr. Newman's observations, because here is another one on Preview Commentary by Mr. Blair Fraser under date of August 20. He stated:

Canadian Flag

People are getting so bored with the flag debate, and so cynical about it, that it seems to me we're beginning to accept as facts a number of things that aren't true.

One is the charge that the Progressive Conservatives are blocking the business of government by their filibuster on the flag resolution. This is not true. Parliament has got through all the work that the Prime Minister stipulated must be done before the house could adjourn for a summer recess, with the lone exception of the flag resolution; if the resolution were brought to a vote tomorrow, parliament would adjourn and probably wouldn't come back until October. The only thing that's being held up by the filibuster is a holiday or the tired M.P.'s—a holiday and a chance to get back to their ridings and attend to the useful work they do there.

Another charge that I don't believe to be true is that the Conservative campaign against the maple leaf flag is a mere political ploy, just a device to force an early election on an issue they think they could win on—or, alternatively, that the Liberal determination to have the maple leaf flag is no more than a piece of electoral strategy for the recapture of Quebec. This cynical view has no factual support that I know of. I don't know any reason to doubt that the people who have spoken are saying what they really believe, and furthermore that they think they're speaking for their electors.

This is the man who has seldom if ever lauded the work of the Conservative party. I can only say that it is possible his recent trip through the beautiful country of Churchill constituency, which he made by canoe, gave him for once in his life a much clearer picture of the situation. We have also heard this charge made by other people.

I will conclude my remarks in respect of this subject by saying that in my capacity during the last few days as acting whip I can unequivocally state that in the main our members are extremely desirous of speaking during this debate. Many of them have told me that they have been unable to place all their views before this house in the allotted time. In answer to some of the criticisms directed toward some members on this side who have spoken twice during the debate, I should state that many have said they have not used their allotted 40 minutes and wish to put further statements on the record. Many others who have not spoken as yet have not spoken because they have given way to other members who wished to speak on a specific date. I suggest that the charges of obstruction are false, and charges of filibuster can only be taken for what they are apparently worth.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to enter this debate and I can state here and now there are other members who still wish to speak, probably at some length.

[Mr. Simpson.]

I also wish to deal briefly with some of the remarks made today by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). He followed the lead of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) and took part in an unwarranted attack on the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). It might be of interest to note, for the benefit of those members not present at that time, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce took part in an unwarranted attack on the Leader of the Opposition, until that right hon. gentleman entered this chamber, and then completely changed his speech and said no more in that vein. That performance can only be compared to children in primary school, grade five or six, who fall silent when a teacher who has been absent for some time returns to the room. The tune certainly does change.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate are concerned, I should like to say that I am in disagreement. That hon. minister referred to the 1940's in an attempt to suggest that the Tories did not support the red ensign. Having read that committee report I understand the official vote was 23 to 1, and there were several Tory members on that committee. That committee was established to study and recommend a Canadian flag.

The Minister of Transport made one statement with which I am in agreement. He said he was a stupid Anglo-Saxon. I agree with him, of course, if he is speaking only for himself.

Mr. Knowles: Do not deprecate the whole race.

Mr. Simpson: That was certainly not my intention, and I am sure the minister was speaking for himself.

Mr. Speaker, having talked with a great number of people I am convinced that many Canadians are perturbed about the way this flag issue has been brought before parliament. Many members have made this statement before during this debate, and it hardly needs repeating. However if the government is not aware of the situation as yet, I should like to say on behalf of my constituents that they are strongly in support of retaining the red ensign as Canada's flag. They also feel that any change in the Canadian flag involves far more than the presentation by government of a resolution, such as is before this house, followed by a vote by members of parliament, which in all likelihood will be in acceptance of a proposed national flag which will remain as such for more than 100 years. These people certainly disagree with that procedure.

Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned that I personally support with vigour the Canadian red ensign, as do the people I represent. During the course of this debate many speakers have mentioned some of the history behind the red ensign. I have a few notes here I should like to refer to in an attempt to illustrate why my constituents support retention of the red ensign. It is true that the Canadian red ensign is in grave danger of being discarded as Canada's national flag. That danger is intensified by the lack of knowledge on the part of a great many Canadians who know nothing of the historic symbols and tradition. Recorded history actually contradicts many of the things people take for granted about the red ensign. Past generations of Canadians have asked for and proudly adopted the red ensign. They used it in defiance of restraining orders. Today, sanctified by the blood of our fighting forces, steeped in our traditions, the red ensign by common acceptance and long usage has become known to every nation and country as Canada's flag. Despite all the evidence of common approval, the Prime Minister has stated that he fully intends to write the obituary of the red ensign as Canada's identifying flag.

We all know that by order in council No. 5888, dated September 15, 1945, the red ensign was declared Canada's distinctive flag. It was adopted at that time because Canada's history has been established under that flag, and there was then no question in respect of its worthiness. Why are we now faced with this sudden reappraisal in 1964?

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note about the history of the red ensign that one pamphlet published by the Canadian Legion which, as is well known, is an extremely strong supporter of this flag, contained the following very interesting observations. This is a very interesting observation.

General H. D. G. Crerar, the distinguished commander of the first Canadian army in world war II, recorded an incident of great historical significance for all Canadians when, recounting an official welcome to him in Ottawa on August 8, 1945, by our wartime prime minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, he wrote in the March, 1963 issue of The Legionary:

"As we moved away from the central entrance of the parliament buildings, Mr. King turned sideways in the car and looked upwards to the peace tower where, at the top, the Canadian red ensign waved. He then said, 'And that, General, is another problem which your Canadian army has solved for Canada—the matter of our national flag.' "

Little did he know at that time that this debate would be taking place in this year 1964. To get back to some of the history of the ensign, we find that ignorance of the Canadian flag is alarmingly prevalent and it begets misunderstanding, prejudice and bigotry. These are all weapons in the arsenal of the proponents of a new flag. This lack of knowledge is not confined to the man in the street. It is found at all levels. Some school children and school teachers know little or nothing about the flag. When it is explained to them they are amazed. Why is not this information made public, they ask. They are susceptible to the clamour for a new flag only because they are uninformed about the old one.

The trouble is that our flag suffers from underexposure in our country. Poor publicity and indifference are responsible for this. Anyone interested can find an abundance of historical and pictorial material showing use of the red ensign in Canada long before confederation. It came here with Prince Rupert and the Company of Adventurers trading into Hudson's bay. The archives of the Hudson's Bay Company have numerous references to the flag from 1670 on.

The Hudson's Bay Company was not a mere trading company. It was the government of that day. It controlled trade, settlement and the building of forts. It armed ships and soldiers, passed and enforced laws and punished offenders. Its powers could scarcely have been more sweeping. For two centuries a large part of what is now Canada was governed under the company's charter and flag.

Canada holds the west today because she fell heir to the achievements of the Hudson's Bay Company and the Nor'westers with whom they united in 1821. All that area drained by the rivers flowing into Hudson's bay was controlled by the company until Canada formed a dominion capable of taking it over. The flag of that company was the red ensign.

This is just a little of the history of the flag which of late has been in danger of being removed as Canada's national flag. There are many other points of view I should like to bring before the house at this time, but I see my time is getting on. As many speakers today have said, I think we should endeavour to arrive at some means of settling this issue, and several means have been suggested. I have mentioned the views of my constituents and my own personal views in relation to the Canadian red ensign. I have also put on record the fact that I am quite sure the people of my area would be only too willing to compromise to the extent of a variation in this flag if they could be assured that this in itself or the flag chosen by the people of Canada would bring national unity. This, of course, is the most important aspect of the whole subject.

We have suggested that a plebiscite be held but there does not seem to be unanimous support for this idea. Another suggestion has been made that a committee should be set up. The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) mentioned the committee idea in his speech as did the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) today. I feel that this suggestion is worthy of the full consideration of the house. As has been said, if the view of that committee was almost unanimous they could then so report to parliament and if they were not unanimous they could probably be instructed to lay down the rules or terms on which a plebiscite would be held, in which each and every citizen of Canada would have an opportunity to select one of several designs which he or she felt would be suitable as a national flag. However, this, of course, is up to the house to decide.

In speaking of the committee aspect of the matter there has been considerable support to the effect that a time limit should be imposed on the committee. I think that some of the suggestions as to a time limit have been quite unreasonable. Some of our members have mentioned three or four months. I do not know if this would be acceptable to those on the government side. However, it is possibly enlightening to recall that a few days ago I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) if he had received any report from the advisory committee on broadcasting which was set up, and he said no and went on to say that when he outlined the terms of reference last May he had mentioned that he expected a report early in 1965. So if a committee is set up I do not see why there should be any attempt to place a rigid time limit on it.

I should like to conclude my remarks tonight by stating once again that I am fully in support of the retention of the Canadian red ensign and that the people I represent, those with whom I have talked and those who have written to me, have with one exception advised me that this is their feeling as well. However, I want to emphasize again, as I mentioned at the start, that knowing them as I do and knowing of their interest in the unity of this great nation I am sure I can say tonight that they would be willing to accept a new Canadian flag if it should be felt by a majority of the people of Canada that such a flag would bring unity to our country. I want to leave one further point with the house. My people definitely have strong feelings that any new flag should give recognition to our two founding races.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. More) which was negatived on the following division:

APPENDIX

ADDRESS OF PRIME MINISTER IN OPENING CHARLOTTETOWN CONFERENCE

It is a great honour to speak in this chamber on this centennial anniversary of Canada's first confederation conference; to meet with the premiers of all the provinces around the same table where those men of vision conceived a great new nation a hundred years ago. I think today of the words of the 60th chapter of Isaiah. "A little one shall become a thousand and a small one a strong nation. The Lord will hasten it in his time." The Lord has hastened it in our time.

I share in the gratitude we all feel to our host, Premier Shaw, for the delightful and uniquely "Island" welcome we have received. History tells us that our forefathers from Canada were not met by any such welcome when they first arrived here for the conference 100 years ago. But it also shows that when they left Charlottetown, exhausted by hard work and open-hearted hospitality, they were happy in the warmth of a new fraternity and the hope of a new nation. That hope has been realized, and the fraternity is also with us today.

[Translation]

It is of course most fitting that a federal-provincial meeting should have been convened here to commemorate the centennial of the Charlottetown conference. This was the point of time and place at which the grand but distant vision of Canadian confederation emerged as a desirable and attainable goal.

[Text]

The Charlottetown conference was also the first of the intergovernmental meetings of which today's is a direct descendant; meetings which have in effect become a permanent part of our national governmental structure, through which, by co-operation, we can keep our federal system effective and acceptable.

Today, a hundred years on, there are constitutional and racial and regional tensions in Canada. At times they seem to endanger our very survival as a nation, for strains of the present always create doubts about the future —in a nation no less than in an individual. This doubt is seized by the cynics, and the faint-hearted, to belittle the Canadian experiment and diminish its achievements. To counteract such defeatism we should spend more time rejoicing in our achievements; less in moaning about our difficulties.

Social unrest—economic pressures—federal-provincial differences—difficulties of the kind that are felt today; these have tested every Canadian generation, and no generation has failed to meet the test. Nor will we fail—we who enjoy riches and resources beyond the wildest dreams of those men who met here in 1864—if we face up to our problems in the spirit and with the resolve of our forefathers.

The fathers of confederation combined a remarkably clear and sure sense of purpose and direction with a single minded dedication and determination to reach a goal. Within three years they converted their dream into the reality of a federal state, now grown beyond their imaginings.

If it is to continue to grow—as it will—we must acknowledge the realities of the strains imposed by our times on the national structure bequeathed to us; we must acknowledge them without being daunted by them. We must define them. And remove them.

For that purpose, we must have a sense of political realism, a passion for justice and a gift for compromise. We must also recognize that the basic partnership of our two founding peoples—and the enriching diversity of our national pattern—remain our greatest source of strength and progress.

We must not over-dwell on yesterday—or even on today. We plan for the future—and it is the future on which we have to agree.

For we cannot turn back the clock. We cannot by our wish or our command restore to our problems the simple shapes, the neat, black and white alternatives of simpler times.

To solve them we must recapture the faith of our predecessors and restore their purpose in our national life. We must reaffirm those principles on which they agreed—and which are still valid—but be willing to modify procedures unsuited to our own times.

First among our national goals—prerequisite to all others, economic, social or cultural, is national unity. This does not mean and cannot mean uniformity. It does mean Canadian identity, with the symbols and even more the spirit and the pride to foster such identity.

It does not mean subordination in any way of provincial rights, nor the alienation of provincial authority. It does mean a government at the centre strong enough to serve Canada as a whole.

Let us here agree and let our accord be broadcast for all men to know, that this nation—conceived in the hearts and minds of those who met in this place a century ago; nurtured through 26 parliaments and into its fifth generation to embrace half a continent and 10 provinces—that today this nation has no intention of falling apart; and every intention of moving forward to greater things.

Let us agree that whatever may be the difficulties facing our federation, whatever our differences, we are resolved to keep our union strong, our federation healthy and our nation one before the world; that we accept our responsibility to the past, but even more important we will discharge our obligations to the future.

Gathered here in confederation chamber on this the 1st day of September, 1964, let us declare our vow to do our part to lift our country beyond the jeopardy of forces or factions which would divide it; to strengthen and safeguard its federal system; and to regard our highest purpose to be our trusteeship over the concept of a Canada fortunate in the duality of its origin and the diversity of its development, but a Canada greater than the sum of its parts.

Let us acknowledge freely that these goals will not be easy to reach; that in their pursuit we must show tolerance and patience as well as strength and determination. But let all Canadians know that these are our goals. Their acceptance can itself be a strong unifying force.

Finally, let us ask God's help and His blessing in our task.

In this spirit, Canadians will never betray the trust of those we honour today, nor the heritage of those into whose keeping we pass our trust tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 2, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

DESIGNATION OF MONDAY PRECEDING MAY 25 TO HONOUR QUEEN AND COMMONWEALTH

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-117, respecting Commonwealth day.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to establish by statute a sovereign's birthday and Commonwealth day to pay our respects to the Queen as head of the commonwealth and to celebrate our Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the creation of a new holiday but rather the renaming of an old one. The monday preceding May 25 each year is set aside by the nation as a public holiday. It is called Victoria day by some, the Queen's birthday by others, and even Empire day in some parts of the nation. It is a remarkable fact that whatever the forms of government in the various parts of the commonwealth, every nation agreed to retain, in the royal titles, the designation "Head of the Commonwealth". It is together with their common ideals, the real link among the various members of this extraordinary association.

In 1951, when Her Majesty visited Canada as Princess Elizabeth and made a memorable tour of the country from coast to coast, she made the following declaration in her farewell broadcast:

> The crown is a thing of real and tangible strength, and one of the most important factors in uniting the people of the commonwealth into one great brotherhood.

These words are just as true now as they were then.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCREASES IN COST OF GOODS AND SERVICES

Question No. 1,644—Mr. Douglas:

What are the percentage price increases in the costs of goods and services procured by the federal government for each year since 1956 in the following categories (a) current expenditures (i) wages and salaries of federal government employees (ii) services provided by non-government employees or by private businesses, and (iii) goods purchased by the federal governemnt (b) capital expenditures?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): No price indices are kept or can be readily compiled to show the percentage price increases in the cost of goods and services procured by the federal government in the categories (a) (ii), (a) (iii), and (b). It can probably be assumed, in the absence of precise evidence to be the contrary, that the index numbers for prices published by the dominion bureau of statistics would be applicable to goods purchased by the federal government as well as by others; but there are no data readily available to confirm or contradict this assumption.

With respect to category a(i), the following information, subject to two qualifications noted hereafter has been supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics:

Federal government salaries and wages implicit price index 1957=100: 1956, 93.2; 1957, 100.0; 1958, 104.3; 1959, 106.8 1960, 114.7; 1961, 120.5; 1962, 124.1; 1963, 132.3.

1. It is pointed out, with respect to the foregoing index figures, that no wage rate data are available with which to deflate expenditures on salaries and wages. The price series for this category of expenditures are therefore, for the most part, those which are implicit when a comparison is made between total employment and total wages and salaries. Thus, the price series may change, not only because of a change in wage rates but also because of a change in the proportion of, say, professional to clerical staff.

2. It is also to be noted that the implicit price index figures here shown relate solely to salaries and wages paid by the federal government, and so not necessarily represent price movements for other categories of federal government expenditures.

WAGES OF SEAMEN ON EAST COAST

Question No. 1,646—Mr. Crouse:

Do seamen serving on ships operated by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys on the east coast receive equal wages for the same duties carried out by seamen serving with the Department of Transport in the same area and, if not (a)

what is the disparity between wage scales (b) what is the purpose of such a disparity, and (c) what steps are being taken by the Department of Labour to eliminate any such differential?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Rates of pay for ships' personnel are determined by treasury board on the recommendation of the appropriate deputy head which in turn is based on the recommendation of the Department of Labour following an examination of rates of pay prevailing in the appropriate area of employment for similar classes of work.

The treasury board has delineated the appropriate areas to be used in determining the prevailing rates for ships' personnel as follows: (a) Where government vessels are confined to one of the following areas of operation, (i) Newfoundland, (ii) lower St. Lawrence-east coast, (iii) upper St. Lawrence-great lakes, wage rates are to be determined on the basis of rates prevailing in companies operating in that one area; (b) where government vessels operate in any of the above areas and are not confined to any one area, wage rates are to be determined on the basis of rates prevailing in those companies that operate in any or all of the areas and that apply the same wage rates and conditions to their employees irrespective of the areas of operation.

The treasury board has made an exception to this policy in the cases of relief personnel and personnel serving on eight vessels of the Department of Transport because the numbers involved represented only a small portion of a total number of personnel employed by the department on its fleet of 55 vessels. The exception provides for payment of wage rates arrived at under (b) above rather than (a). It was felt that by placing all employees of the Department of Transport on the same wage rates, the department would have more flexibility in moving crews from one vessel to the other which would allow for better career planning.

The effects of this exception on wage rates applicable to personnel serving on Department of Mines and Technical Surveys vessels operating in the same area as vessels of the Department of Transport are presently under consideration with a view to eliminating any resultant unwarranted differences in rates.

MARITIME COMMISSION SUBSIDIES, ATLANTIC COAST

Question No. 1,740—Mr. Barnett:

What, for each of the fiscal years commencing with 1950-51, are expenditures made through the subsidies branch of the Canadian maritime commission for services (a) between ports or places in Newfoundland (b) between ports or places in Newfoundland and other parts of Canada (c) for inter-provincial services between other provinces on the Atlantic coast (d) between ports or places in Quebec (e) between ports or places in Nova Scotia (f) between ports or places in New Brunswick (g) between ports or places in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport):

Years	(a)	(b)	(c)	(d)	(e)	(f)	(g)

NATIONAL DEFENCE AUTOMOBILE LICENCE 27120F

Question No. 1,745—Mr. Millar:

1. Does the Department of National Defence own an automobile bearing a 1964 Ontario licence plate No. 27120F and, if so, to what branch of the department is this automobile assigned?

2. Under whose control was this automobile during the hours of 10.30 a.m. and 11.30 a.m., on Monday, August 17, 1964?

3. How many persons were occupying the vehicle during this period, to which service do they belong and what are their ranks?

4. What assignment was being carried out for the Department of National Defence by this automobile and its occupants during the above-mentioned period of time?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, on strength of No. 9 transport company, Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Ottawa.

2. This vehicle was assigned to and under the control of a member of the privy council office, assigned as office manager in the secretariat of the third commonwealth education conference at the time in question.

3. Two assignments were carried out during the hours of 10.30 a.m. and 11.30 a.m.; (a) the driver, a private of No. 9 transport company, R.C.A.S.C., and an officer of the Department of External Affairs assigned to the secretariat of the third commonwealth education conference proceeded from 140 Wellington street, Ottawa to the queen's printer in Hull and returned to the same address; (b) the driver, accompanied by a messenger, proceeded to a local business establishment to obtain supplies for the commonwealth education conference.

4. Not applicable.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Question No. 1,751—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What was the monthly rate at which family allowances were paid to children eight years of age and of 14 years of age as of July 1, 1934, July 1, 1944, July 1, 1954, July 1, 1964?

2. Has the government given consideration to the desirability of increasing family allowances in order to keep them in line with the increase in the cost of living as compared with 1944?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. On July 1, 1934 and 1944 the family allowances program was not in existence. On July 1, 1954 and 1964 the rates were the same: 8 years of age, $6; 14 years of age, $8.

2. The government is continuously studying ways and means of improving Canada's social security programs. Any changes decided upon will be announced by the government at the appropriate time.

POSTAL FACILITIES, RED ROCK, ONT.

Question No. 1,762—Mr. Fisher:

1. When was the post office facility at Red Rock, Ontario, obtained?

2. In summary, what space does it provide in terms of boxes and working room?

3. Is the facility close to the standard or average for a community of this size?

4. Has any consideration been given to erecting a new post office and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): 1. September 25, 1950.

2. 700 square feet.

3. Yes.

4. Yes, but as the existing space is satisfactory for the present, it is not proposed to recommend the provision of improved accommodation at this time.

WATER FLOW, WELLAND CANAL

Question No. 1,768—Mr. Ryan:

1. Since inception of the seaway, what has been the annual seasonal average in cubic feet per second of the flow through the Welland canal?

2. What is the estimated increase of such flow that will be caused by the planned twinning of locks on the Welland canal?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Since the inception of the seaway, the annual seasonal average of the flow through the Welland canal has been 6,800 cubic feet per second.

2. The estimated increase of such flow that will be caused by the planned twinning of locks on the Welland canal is 1,000 to 1,200 cubic feet per second.

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—EMPLOYEES LAID OFF

Question No. 1,773—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. How many employees have been relieved of their employment at the Point Edward naval base since the announcement by the Minister of National Defence on December 5, 1963?

2. How many of these employees have been re-employed through the offices of the national employment service?

3. How many are still without employment?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. 229. Of this number 55 left voluntarily to accept other employment and 48 were transferred to other government departments.

2. 28 and an additional 6 are training in local trade schools.

3. The number of personnel without employment is not known as not all registered with the national employment service. However, 73 are in receipt of unemployment benefits.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION CONTRACTS TO NORTH SYDNEY MARINE RAILWAY CO.

Question No. 1,774—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

What was the dollar value of contracts awarded to the North Sydney Marine Railway Company

Questions

Limited by the Department of Defence Production for each of the fiscal years 1954 to the present time, for repairs, refits and conversions?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): The value of contracts awarded to North Sydney Marine Railway Company Limited by the Department of Defence Production for the years in question is:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1954-55	$ 26,874
1955-56	94,969

1962-63	139,420
1963-64	155,603
1964-65	38,839*
Total	$1,352,933

* Information on the value of contracts placed in 1964/65 is available only to the end of July.

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—PENITENTIARY CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 1,782—Mr. Coates:

Is it the intention of the government to have construction initiated on the young offenders' institution at Springhill, N.S., in October, or will construction be delayed until the spring of 1965?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Tenders for this project have been advertised and are due October 7, 1964. Subject to acceptable offers being received construction should start this fall.

WHARF EXTENSION, PORT PHILLIP, N.S.

Question No. 1,784—Mr. Coates:

1. Is it the intention of the government to extend wharfage facilities at Port Phillip, Cumberland co., N.S., in the fiscal year 1965-66?

2. What would be the estimated cost of wharf extensions for Port Phillip?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. Matter is under consideration.

2. Between $20,000 and $25,000.

*CANADIAN FLAG—SUPPORT FOR RED ENSIGN OR PLEBISCITE

Question No. 1,798—Mr. Coates:

What is the total number of names attached to telegrams, letters, petitions, etc., in support of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag or requesting that a national plebiscite be carried out to determine whether any change should be made in our present flag?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The Department of the Secretary of State has received 134,196 names attached to telegrams, letter, petitions, etc., in support of the retention of the Canadian red ensign; 25,096 names requesting that a national plebiscite be carried out to determine whether any change should be made in our present flag.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP ON DISCOVERY OF SALT

Question No. 1,814—Mr. Irvine:

Has the Postmaster General recently received representations or submissions that a new stamp be struck to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the discovery of salt in Canada in the year 1866, inasmuch as one recently was struck to commemorate the discovery of oil in Canada and, if so, what is the result of his deliberations?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Yes, and the suggestion will be considered when the 1966 program is under study.

DEATH RATE FROM LEUKEMIA

Question No. 1,817—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

What has been the death rate, per thousand, from leukemia in each province in each of the last ten years?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Death rates from leukemia and aleukemia, Canada and provinces, 1954-1963 (per 100,000 population)

CANADIAN LIFE EXPECTANCY

Question No. 1,818—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

What was the life expectancy of Canadian males and females in 1954, 1959 and 1964?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Life expectancy at birth, by sex, Canada, 1951, 1956 and 1961*

	1951	1956	1961
Males	66.3	67.6	68.4
Females	70.8	72.9	74.2

*Life tables available for census years only.

LIFE EXPECTANCY

Question No. 1,819—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

What proportions of the Canadian population can be expected to survive to (a) age 60 (b) age 65 (c) age 70 (d) age 75 (e) age 80?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): Survivors of a cohort of 100,000 persons at specific ages, by sex, Canada, 1961*: age 60, males, 77,546; females, 86,387; age 65, males, 68,774; females, 80,916; age 70, males, 57,517; females, 72,746; age 75, males, 43,791; females, 61,052; age 80, males, 28,936; females, 45,161.

*Life tables available for census years only.

*POSTAGE STAMP COMMEMORATING BATTLE OF PLAINS OF ABRAHAM

Question No. 1,825—Mr. Hahn:

1. Was a postage stamp issued to commemorate the bicentenary of the battle of the plains of Abraham and, if so, what was the principal pictorial feature on that stamp?

2. Who was the head of the government which authorized that particular stamp?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this question is in two parts. The answer is: 1. Yes, a postage stamp was issued on September 10, 1959 to mark the bicentenary of the battle of the plains of Abraham. The principal pictorial feature on that stamp is three green maple leaves, joined on a single stem, on a red background.

2. The head of the government which authorized that particular stamp was Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker.

Perhaps I might add, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. gentleman referred to this stamp yesterday as having been issued while his government was in office, and I might say he also referred to some remarks I had made about the three maple leaves stamp issued earlier this year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is this a proper exercise of the minister's right? I raise a question of order. If the hon. gentleman wants to take part in the debate we will be glad to hear him, but up to the present time he has been one of that great gathering over there who are gagged.

Mr. Nicholson: I was answering the question, and I said the right hon. gentleman had also made reference to this matter. I would also say—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is very irregular. This is using a starred question for the purpose of getting in some gratuitous suggestions and answers which the minister has not got backbone enough to do in the course of the debate.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Monteith: He answered the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nicholson: —to complete my answer, the press release issued by the government of that time stated that the three maple leaves are similar to those on the coats of arms of several provinces and represent the two original groups as well as people of the many other nations who joined in the task of building our country.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, motions 158 and 159 are acceptable to the government. I ask that motion No. 134 be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that motions 158 and 159 should be carried?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—CORRESPONDENCE FROM ATLIN, B.C.

Motion No. 158—Mr. Howard:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between anyone in Atlin, B.C. and the office of the superintendent of Indian affairs at Whitehorse, Y.T. since January 1, 1962 dealing with any aspect of Indians affairs.

Motion agreed to.

BELLA COOLA, B.C.—ELECTRICAL FACILITIES ON WHARF

Motion No. 159—Mr. Howard:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government and any agency or department thereof and any other person, group or organization since January 1, 1963, relating to the need for the installation of electrical facilities at the wharf or floats at Bella Coola, B.C., and also to the levying of fees under the government wharves regulations.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he was interviewed recently by Mr. Robert Reguly regarding the S.I.U. Has he read the article in the Toronto Star of yesterday, and is he the cabinet minister referred to in the report who stated that Hal Banks was in New York?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I did have a meeting with Mr. Reguly and I did discuss, I think, rumours as to the whereabouts of Mr. Banks. I repeated to him the statement which I think I gave to the House of Commons, that there had been rumours that Mr. Banks was in the United States, possibly in New York. This is a rumour, of course, to which I referred recently and in which connection I indicated that there was no firm knowledge so far as I was concerned; it had been merely a rumour.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—RESPONSE TO REQUEST FOR FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): About a month ago I directed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in which I requested him to ask the high commissioner for India about the need for food in that country. Today I should like to address my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the urgent appeal put forward by our sister commonwealth nation, India, requesting food and asking Washington and London to divert grain ships to that country, will the Acting Prime Minister take some steps to let the Indian government know our shipping is free on the St. Lawrence at the present time and we do have grain available for hungry people?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Prime Minister): I shall be glad to bring this matter, which has been raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, before my colleagues tomorrow when the Prime Minister will be back. I am sure that appropriate action will be taken.

[Mr. Howard.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR SEVERANCE PAY FOR CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the reorganization of his department which will involve further layoffs, and in view of the fact that severance pay is provided for military personnel, is the government giving any consideration to some type of severance pay or compensation for civilian employees whose services are to be dispensed with as a result of the reorganization?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I think that question has been asked once or twice before. Perhaps I could look up the reply in Hansard and make it available to my hon. friend.

Mr. Douglas: I believe the question has been asked, but I do not think it has been answered. I was wondering if the minister would undertake to give some thought to this problem and give the house a definite reply as to whether his department is prepared to give such severance pay to civilian employees.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I would be very happy to give it some additional thought. As I have pointed out to the house before, this is a large problem and would not apply to the Department of National Defence alone. Any solution which was arrived at in respect of our department would have to apply to all other departments of government, and for that reason there are restrictions which we cannot easily overcome.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister if he knows of any other department which, according to its own press release, intends to cut its headquarters staff in Ottawa by half?

Mr. Hellyer: No, offhand I could not say that I do, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

FAILURE TO USE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN RECREATION OF CHARLOTTETOWN CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Would he care to comment on the statement made yesterday by Mr. Lesage to protest against the unilingual re-enactment of the Charlottetown talks, organized by the centennial commission?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, first, I would point out that the government itself had nothing to do with the contents of that program. However, I am told that those who did organize it merely meant to respect the historical truth and that not a single word of French was spoken in Charlottetown, at the 1864 conference.

Be that as it may, I can assure my hon. friend that the program for the confederation centennial celebrations, in 1967, will fully respect Canada's bilingual character.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State.

Is he aware of the corrective statement made by Senator Connolly, government leader in the upper chamber, with regard to Mr. Lesage's statement, in support of the latter's protest?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am not aware of the statement made by the senator concerned.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Must one conclude then that the remarks made by the Quebec premier were unfounded?

WATER RESOURCES

CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN REQUIREMENTS IN SALES TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, based on my lifelong appreciation of the value of water. My question is also based upon a press report, that caused me some concern, of a recent announcement by Mr. Ralph M. Parsons of Los Angeles with respect to plans for the diversion of Canadian rivers in the Arctic watershed to Mexico and the great lakes, and upon another recent press report of a statement by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano to the Vancouver board of trade in which he said that "he could foresee the time when water will become one of the most important items of trade between Canada and the United States."

Can the minister assure the house that the present and future water requirements of the Canadian people will be protected before the government undertakes to sell any more water to the United States?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question, because it enabled me to prepare a few notes. I want to compliment him again, as I have in the past, for his continuing interest in this subject, and I want to say that in my view he is dealing with probably the greatest issue that will confront Canada during the next several decades.

I have been stating recently that water is at least our second greatest asset, next to soil; and as the years go by may even exceed the value of our soil. It is true that we are having indications of water shortage in parts of the United States. As a matter of fact in some places the problem appears to be reaching critical levels; and dependant entirely on the increase in population and the expansion of industry which might depend upon the multi-use of water, it is possible that the so-called Parsons plan will in the years ahead appear as something other than the cloudy dream it might be today.

That being the case, it is imperative that in Canada we give an increasing amount of attention to water, and I want to assure the house that one of the first measures I took when I became minister of this department was to ask for an increase in the personnel and expenditures of the water resources branch. In addition, we have encouraged the three prairie provinces which are now meeting together to decide on a plan for the diversion of northern rivers into the Saskatchewan system. This was initiated by the former premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Lloyd, on September 20 of last year.

Mr. Grafftey: This is a Rotary club speech.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be something wrong with the hon. member. Perhaps someone can help him.

Mr. Grafftey: You are abusing the rules.

Mr. Laing: At the present time it is under the chairmanship of Hon. Mr. Strom, who is minister of agriculture for Alberta. In addition, we have joined with the province of Manitoba in studies of the Nelson river.

I am quite certain that in the years ahead this government, and indeed any government dealing with this matter, will look upon our water resources as a prime element in negotiation with our United States friends; that we will regard it as an important element of our national greatness and make sure it will never become a badge of bondage.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to ask the minister whether he has any progress to report with regard to the long range transmission of hydro power; because without this there can be no such thing as selling off our water resources. We must have regard to our domestic needs.

Mr. Laing: I would hope we are dealing here with the multiple use of our waters and not with power alone. I hope in a few days we shall be announcing a contract dealing with this matter which the hon. member has raised, namely long range transmission of power.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Is the minister also giving active consideration to the Kierans plan for the diversion to the great lakes of waters flowing north into Hudson bay?

Mr. Laing: We have on the order paper at the present time a motion to refer the matter of the level of the great lakes to the committee on mines, forests and waters. I hope action will soon be taken in this respect, and it may be expected that the subject to which the hon. member referred will be dealt with by that committee. The committee might well wish to call Mr. Kierans as a witness.

Mr. Martineau: As a final supplementary on this matter, I should like to know, for the information of the house, whether the minister is still praying for rain.

Mr. Laing: Yes, and I hope the hon. gentleman is, too.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): In view of the minister's interest in water and the discussions he has held recently with the Alberta government, can he say whether there has been any indication from the government of Alberta that they are now prepared to proceed with the Red Deer river diversion scheme?

Mr. Laing: I was informed by Mr. Strom less than a week ago that discussions with the other two provinces concerned were going magnificently, to use his expression.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On that particular project, or on water use generally?

Mr. Laing: There was no special reference to that particular project.

[Mr. Laing.]

IMMIGRATION

CONSIDERATION OF AMNESTY PROGRAM RESPECTING CHINESE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the minister take this house into his confidence and tell us what consideration he and his colleagues are giving at the present time to a new policy with respect to Chinese immigrants? I ask this question because of news reports on radio and television within the last 24 hours that the government is considering a new policy. If this report is not spiked or denied now I am afraid it will adversely affect the present policy, which has been gathering momentum.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for giving me this opportunity to state that the news published in the last few days about a new policy could only refer to the two statements I made previously about Chinese immigration. Therefore, there is no question of a new government policy. The whole policy about Chinese immigration was announced when my estimates were discussed and in the correction I made in the house on August 19.

[Text]

Mr. More: Does the minister say, then, that no consideration is being given to a general amnesty program? This was the news report. I ask him to confirm or deny it, because I am afraid the Chinese people will be affected until this is done.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker. It is out of the question to consider a new amnesty. The statements made in the house are the only ones that count.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the report from Vancouver that the Chinese amnesty does not cover those who have entered Canada by means of forged passports, would the minister consider issuing a statement clarifying the situation with respect to eligibility for amnesty?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to clarify any point which may not have been cleared before.

QUEBEC—MOVEMENT OF NEW CANADIANS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. We are noticing, with regret, that many Canadians and new Canadians from Quebec are moving to the United States. Could the minister tell the house whether anything is being done to find out the reasons behind this mass moving of Canadian citizens to the United States?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for the order paper.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SASKATCHEWAN—STATEMENT RESPECTING SERVICE AT REGWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): I should like to reply briefly to a question raised in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Regina City concerning the port of Regway, Saskatchewan.

Traffic figures for Regway during the current summer months have been carefully analysed, and the results of this analysis indicate that the volume of traffic between 12 midnight and 8 a.m. barely justifies the 12 midnight to 8 a.m. shift during the summertime. I might point out that the average has only been four cars for that shift during this summer, 1964. Since traffic always declines greatly after Labour day week end, the volume which can be forecast for this shift after September 14 does not support its retention. Twenty four hour service will, however, be provided between May 15 and September 14 each year. I might point out that this is the first summer that such service has been provided at Regway. The situation at Regway will continue to be kept under close observation to ensure that appropriate action is taken as warranted.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO "UNDERDOG" ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a question was raised by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac concerning the deductibility as charitable donations of contributions to an organization known as Underdog. This organization was recognized for purposes of the Income Tax Act as a charitable organization by the previous government on April 15, 1962. Subsequent to recent events I have asked officials of my department to contact officers of this organization to determine whether a continuation of this privilege is warranted.

BROADCASTING

APPROVAL OF TRANSFER OF WINDSOR RADIO STATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. It has to do with Mr. Royce Frith, reputedly a member of the inner strategy board of the Liberal party, who secured a radio broadcasting licence in Windsor and has now made application to the board of broadcast governors for permission to sell after only four months of operation.

Would the minister ascertain from the B.B.G. whether the B.B.G. has received letters opposing the transfer of this station; the reasons for the curious change of circumstances which now lead Mr. Frith, having secured the licence, to endeavour to rid himself of it; and whether there is any foundation for the statements made in the Globe and Mail by Mr. Dennis Braithwaite that Mr. Frith was able to make a secret application and secure his licence on the basis of such an application?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly try to secure from the B.B.G. the information which the right hon. gentleman is seeking. Meanwhile I should like to remind him that the B.B.G. granted the application of Mr. Frith at their meeting on March 26, 1963 and the public announcement was dated April 11, 1963.

[Later:]

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, which relates to the question put to the Secretary of State by the Leader of the Opposition. An answer to my question might clarify the other answer given. I should like to ask the minister whether the actual licence for CKWW, Mr.

Frith's station, was issued by the Department of Transport after the change of government in 1963, and if so, did the minister at that time have a report before him in respect of the financing of Mr. Frith by Mr. Stirling?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. gentleman knows quite well, the licence was of course issued after the change of government pursuant to a recommendation made by the board of broadcast governors, as the Secretary of State has already told the house, before the change of government. Precisely what the minister of transport of that day may have done to satisfy himself that he should send the recommendation of the board of broadcast governors to the cabinet for approval, I cannot say. This is one of those things that is done by the minister on his responsibility. There is no question that on his responsibility he did send it to the cabinet, and on their responsibility it was approved.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask a supplementary question just to clarify that answer. Is it ever the practice not to approve the issuance of such licences if they have been recommended by the B.B.G.?

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe I would be right in saying that there has only been one case; none under the previous government and one under the present government. I therefore doubt if one could call it a practice.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps I should ask the question of the present chairman of the treasury board, who then was the minister. Did that minister have before him a thorough review of the financing of CKWW?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember the particular application, but I would not expect I would have, because that would be a matter for the board of broadcast governors.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN PROVISION OF SECOND ACCESS ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport regarding a matter of immediate concern to the city of Vancouver. In view of the fact that Vancouver is the third largest city in Canada but has only one approach to the international airport, via a bridge which has been breaking down for certain reasons, and as recently as the last two days, thereby affecting not only flights to and from the airport but creating a grave danger to those using the bridge in the event of accident, is the Minister of Transport now giving immediate consideration, in collaboration with the Minister of Public Works and the provincial government, to providing an alternative route between Vancouver and the international airport?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that just at the time I was last in Vancouver a joint announcement was made by the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia that an engineering study, which is being paid for jointly by the two governments, is being made of this proposal. In saying this I think I should repeat what was said at the time; that it is not a normal part of the functions of the government of Canada to provide access from great cities to their airports. That is regarded as a municipal function, and where it transcends municipal boundaries a provincial function, since it is the provision of roads or roads and bridges. However, it was our opinion that the problem the hon. gentleman referred to is of sufficient importance that we should join in this engineering study.

Moreover, I am sure that the hon. gentleman's friends would wish to address to the government of his province, which I understand claims to be debt free, urgent representations on the same subject.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry the minister made that statement. I have never known that the premier of British Columbia was considered a friend of mine, because I was the first opposition leader to face him. However, I would ask the minister whether he and the government would be prepared to recommend, in view of the situation, a federal contribution toward a new access route to the international airport, which is under the jurisdiction of the minister, be it a bridge or a tunnel. Would the minister mind answering that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I apologize both to the hon. member and to the government of British Columbia. I think the hon. gentleman did not hear what I said. I suggested that perhaps his friends would wish to make representations to the government of British Columbia, and I was using the word "friends" in the usual parliamentary sense of those people in his own party which I believe is the official opposition in that province.

The question as to whether or not there should be a federal contribution to the road to the airport in Vancouver, I think would have to be considered in the light of similar situations in Toronto, in Montreal and in Ottawa, where the situation is not very satisfactory, as well as in a great many other places. There does come a point where one has to consider whether and to what extent the federal government should be spending money collected from the taxpayers all over Canada to perform functions which normally fall, under our constitution, within other jurisdictions.

Mr. Winch: A further supplementary question. In view of the minister's statement is he prepared to give the same consideration to a federal grant to British Columbia as he asked for and got for the maritimes?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should think that where the circumstances are equal there should always be equal treatment.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—DELAY IN PAYMENT FOR WINTER WORKS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour?

Would the minister consider the possibility of reaching an agreement with the state of Quebec in order that unemployed persons participating this year in the winter works program may be paid periodically instead of six months after the jobs are completed, as was the case these last few years?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

TORONTO—CANADA COUNCIL GRANT TO CREST THEATRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is the minister now in a position to tell the house why the Canada Council has revoked the grant to the Crest theatre in Toronto, thereby wrecking one of Canada's principal and outstanding cultural projects?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. gentleman that the Canada Council is not an agency of the crown and is therefore not responsible to parliament. The position I am taking at present was confirmed by the former prime minister of Canada, the present Leader of the Opposition, when he refused to answer a similar question in the house in the fall of 1957.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. I believe only two days ago the Secretary of State, in answer to a question by another hon. member, said he would answer this question or he would make inquiries of the Canada Council, implying that he would give an answer when he had done so. I do not see why this question cannot be answered. The Secretary of State certainly replies to this house, on behalf of the Canada Council, and I think he should provide this house with an answer.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I have reexamined the relationship that exists between parliament, the government and the Canada Council, and have come to the same conclusion as the former prime minister, that as it is very clearly stated in the act, the Canada Council is not an agency of the crown and therefore not responsible to parliament.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a further supplementary question. Is there any way, then, in which replies to questions concerning the disposition of funds by this entity can be obtained?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I will always be very pleased to transmit the grievances or questions of hon. members to the Canada Council. As far as the members who want to direct questions to the Canada Council are concerned, they have an opportunity each year to do so when the Canada Council appears before the public accounts committee.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. In view of the apparent shortage of funds available to the Canada Council to carry on their very important duties in preparing for the centennial celebrations in various performing arts centres, is the government giving any consideration to a special grant to enable the council to carry out this responsibility?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that the Canada Council is not responsible for preparations in respect of the centennial celebrations. The centennial commission is responsible and is preparing very good projects indeed to celebrate that great event.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I have another question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Aiken: I thank the hon. gentlemen for obtaining order for me. Mr. Speaker, in view of the last response of the Secretary of State may I ask whether he has read the annual report of the Canada Council for 1963-64, and particularly page 12 wherein they state they feel it their responsibility to obtain competent actors and directors for the centennial celebrations, and complain about the shortage of funds? They have accepted this responsibility in their latest report to the minister himself.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the government, and I am sure also the centennial commission, will welcome the collaboration we will receive from the Canada Council in this respect.

FINANCE

REPORTED DISALLOWANCE OF INCREASES IN DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council, in his capacity as chairman of the treasury board, whether special notices have been sent to most departments informing them that the increases in estimates originally planned or expected will not now be allowed, or will not come about; and is this a step preparatory to a tax reduction?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has forgotten all the knowledge he is assumed to have collected when he was an active privy councillor; because it is quite inappropriate for him to attempt to anticipate the budget address which presumably will come next spring.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, is it inappropriate for me to request the minister to indicate, by simply saying yes or no to my question, whether special notices have been sent to most departments suggesting that the various increases in the department estimates would not now be allowed?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of cabinet business. It is quite a wrong statement in any event.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS IN ADVERTISEMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State. Has the civil service commission the right to ignore the present government's established policy concerning bilingualism in the civil service? I am referring especially to the poster dealing with competition No. 64875 for the position of legal officer (international law) which states that knowledge of English will be compulsory and that knowledge of French, while an asset, will not be necessary, even though French is one of the greatest international languages in the world.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will reply to the hon. member's question tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF NEW ZEALAND OMBUDSMAN AND HIGH COMMISSIONER

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may call to your attention and that of the house the fact that we have just been joined in the Speaker's gallery by two distinguished visitors. I refer to Sir Guy Powles, the New Zealand parliamentary commissioner or ombudsman, who is accompanied by the New Zealand high commissioner, Mr. John Reid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Tuesday, September 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether during the 19 days of this debate, the clerks have kept a record of all speakers and know whether they have spoken on the motion, the amendment or the subamendment, so we will know that a member is in order?

Mr. Speaker: I am glad the hon. member raised that question. I have checked the records. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is in order.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, first I should like to welcome back to the house the hon. member for Vancouver East and acknowledge his interest in this debate, to which he has apparently given no attention up to the present.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons assembled on February 18 and I have missed only nine days since that date. I have been here at all other times.

Mr. Churchill: Confession is good for the soul. I have missed two days this session. I hope the hon. member will participate in the debate, because I recall him saying that all he would have to do to be re-elected in the next election would be to march up and down carrying the red ensign in his hand. That is the support he has in his constituency, and he should so indicate to the house and declare himself by word of mouth and also by his vote.

When I was speaking last week I said it was my intention to discuss the plebiscite and to indicate why people should not give their support to the personal choice of the Prime Minister. I said I would give reasons why they should give their choice, if a plebiscite is held, to the Canadian red ensign. I had time to complete only about a third of what I wanted to say, and I welcome this opportunity to deliver the remainder of the speech I had prepared for that occasion.

This debate, which has gone on for a reasonable length of time, is serving a great deal of good so far as the country is concerned. No matter what the outcome is, the people of Canada will have a better knowledge of our history, our traditions and the meaning of national symbols than they ever had before, because our educational system has never had to deal with this particular problem. I have not been able to find in any of our Canadian history books any reference to Canada's flag, and in the 17 years I was engaged in the educational profession I never had occasion to draw attention to Canada's national flag because the issue never arose. In fact, throughout my lifetime the issue did not arise until I entered the federal political field. It was only then I became aware that there was a movement on foot in this country to take away the Canadian red ensign.

At that time, several years ago now, I thought it was not a really serious movement; but now in the year 1964 we discover that it is a serious movement, and people are attempting to take away from us something that we, as did our forefathers before us, have treasured all our lives.

In a series of articles in the Toronto Star this debate has been labelled "the great flag farce". It is not a farce at all. It is a serious matter. Thanks to the freedom enjoyed in this country, people who have been here one day or six weeks or a dozen years may comment upon our parliamentary institutions, tell us how they should be operated and give us advice as to what we are to do. They are free to comment on our history and our traditions in so far as they understand them; but those of us whose ancestral roots in this country go back 150 years, as mine do, and those whose ancestors were here 200 years ago or 400 years ago also have something to say with regard to our history and our traditions. Our opinion is entitled to be considered by those who are perhaps viewing our country for the first time.

That is why I say this debate is not a farce. It is a serious matter, and we on this side of the house in the Conservative party have been taking it seriously. The Prime Minister is quoted in the Star of August 31 as saying "Every good flag has to be born in a battle and this one is no exception". I will deal with that later. This is not a battle in the sense that any blood is going to be shed, except for cow's blood which comes down from the gallery sometimes, but it is a contest between opposing forces in our country; and thanks to our parliamentary system and freedom of speech we can express these differing points of view.

I noted in the remarks of the Minister of Transport yesterday that he said his party favoured a distinctive flag, and claimed that this was widely disseminated across the country during election campaigns. Not in Winnipeg; I can tell him that. I would have had no trouble at all in 1962 and 1963 in the city of Winnipeg had I been told by the Liberals that they were going to take away the Canadian red ensign or remove the jack from the flag. They did not tell us that. They concealed that from the people. They will not be able to conceal it in the next election.

There has been talk about a distinctive flag, and I will just gloss over this very quickly because other people have mentioned it. You have only to go to the front of the west block and view the flags of the commonwealth displayed there in honour of the commonwealth educational conference to see that Canada's flag is distinctive and cannot be mistaken for any other flag. The same is true of the NATO nations. I have seen all the flags of the NATO nations. We have had them flying here on parliament hill. There is no possibility of mistaking Canada's flag for that of any other nation in that group; and the same is true of the United Nations.

I commend the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce for a display they have in the airport terminal at Toronto, opposite the newsstand. They have on display there 105 flags of the nations of the world, and I challenge anybody to prove that Canada's flag is not distinctive. It stands out there as clearly as half a dozen other distinctive flags. You do not have to look twice to see whether it is Canada's flag. I commend the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce for their public interest in putting these examples of flags on display for the benefit of the people.

I intend to speak about the long history of our flag. The evidence is quickly assembled. On page 593 of Hansard for October 1, 1945 you will find a reply by Mr. Ilsley to a question on the red ensign, and the second part of the answer reads as follows:

> The red ensign flew from the tower of the houses of parliament from the days of confederation until 1904.

You will find in Hansard for November 8, 1945, at page 1934 a statement by Hon. Ian Mackenzie, a minister of the crown, which reads as follows:

> Prior to 1867, the flag in general use was the union jack, which was flown in all the colonies. Upon the establishment of confederation, however, it was felt desirable to have a symbol of the new country that had been created, and this was achieved through the use of a flag made up of the British red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly, a flag which became known as the Canadian red ensign. The ensign was flown from all public buildings after 1867, and achieved quite general use. In a governor general's dispatch of December, 1891, on the question of the issuance of a formal warrant for the use of a flag on Canadian merchant vessels, Lord Stanley wrote:—

These are his words:

> Though no actual order has ever been issued the dominion government has encouraged by precept and example the use on all public buildings throughout the provinces of the red ensign with the Canadian badge in the "fly". I submit that the flag is one which has come to be considered as the recognized flag of the dominion both ashore and afloat, and on sentimental grounds I think there is much to be said for its retention.

We had further evidence given during the course of the debate. We have had statements and quotations from Mr. Mackenzie King, from Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent. The hon. member for Calgary North drew our attention to an election poster used by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1891, showing the Canadian red ensign. The hon. member for Victoria (Ont.), drew our attention to the Fenian raid medal of 1866 showing the Canadian red ensign. It has been the accepted flag for Canada since confederation. It is disturbing to find people saying now that we have no distinctive Canadian flag. We have one, and we have had one for almost 100 years.

Now, I suggest that we should give serious consideration to the union jack in that Canadian red ensign in relation to the exploration and settlement of Canada and the significance of that flag to Canada. Sometimes it is overlooked that Canada is not just the two central provinces which are so prominent in the news. It is overlooked that Cabot came to Newfoundland in 1497; that in 1583 that island was annexed by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and that for a period of from 381 to 467 years —you could say for over 400 years—Newfoundland has known nothing but the union jack.

With regard to Nova Scotia, it is overlooked that for 250 years since it was annexed in 1713, that province has known the union jack. Little mention is made of British Columbia. British Columbia had no connection with the other parts of Canada. It was explored and settled by people from the British isles. In 1778 Captain Cook was there, and in 1792 Captain Vancouver. In 1793 Alexander Mackenzie crossed into British Columbia by land. For almost 200 years, therefore, British Columbia has known no flag except the union jack or the Canadian red ensign.

Now, even more important is Manitoba and the prairie country of the west. In 1610 Henry Hudson sailed into Hudson bay and touched the shores of what is now the province of Manitoba. At that time there were only 2,000 people living in Quebec by the shores of the St. Lawrence. In 1612 Captain James Button was there with two ships, the Resolution and the Discovery, and remained there during the winter of 1612-13. In the next few years Captains Gibbons, Bylot and Baffin sailed into Hudson bay and again touched those shores. James Munk in 1619, wintered at the mouth of the Churchill river. The flag of the country he represented was flown at that time. In 1631 Luke Foxe and in 1632 Thomas James wintered on the shore of James bay. In 1668 the Nonsuch carried back a cargo of furs with such results that the Hudson's Bay Company was formed in 1670 and sent two ships into that territory. On September 1, 1670, Governor Bayley formally took possession of that territory and the adjoining area for a company under the protection of Great Britain, and the union jack was flown there. The province of Manitoba, therefore, can claim a far longer association with the union jack than any other province of Canada with the sole exception of Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a factual question. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that the union jack was only established in its present form in the year 1801, after union with Ireland?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, I am quite aware of that. After all, like the hon. member, my ancestors came from England. Originally they were reputed to be a Norman family but intermingled with Anglo-Saxons, and therefore enjoy some of the stolid characteristics of the Anglo-Saxons to which my hon. friend referred yesterday.

Mr. Nowlan: Any Irish in the background?

Mr. Churchill: There was an ameliorating influence of 200 years in Ireland and then my ancestors came out to Ontario to settle in the Huron tract when it was opened. I quite understand, therefore, that it was the union flag, the cross of St. George and St. Andrew, during the period of which I was speaking, and it was subsequently that the cross of St. Patrick was added. Permit me to call it the union flag or the union jack because I mean both; I mean the flag which represented those countries from which our ancestors came.

Still dealing with Manitoba and the west, I may say that in 1690 and 1691 Kelsey was at The Pas and he was the first white man to venture into the parklands and the grasslands of these areas. It was only for a 15-year period from 1697 to 1713 that the French controlled Hudson bay. By the treaty of Utrecht in 1713 it came back under British control, so for 350 years Manitoba and the west have known the union jack or the Canadian red ensign. This illustrates the importance of that flag to other parts of Canada.

Although I was born in one of the central provinces, I had the great fortune to move out west at a very early age before too much damage had resulted. I suggest there is more to the history of Canada than just the history of the two central provinces. When the Prime Minister says that every good flag has to be born in battle, I was reminded how true that was with regard to most national flags. Most national flags have had their origin in conflict and in bloodshed. It is for this reason most national flags are so highly treasured and respected.

I think one of the great omissions in our country is the way in which the military history of Canada is treated. We play it down all the time. In a very recent history of this country of over 500 pages there are six paragraphs devoted to the first and second world wars. These six paragraphs are devoted to two wars which changed the whole nature of our civilization, changed our lives and are affecting them today.

The military history of our country has been neglected, yet it is in this military history that you find the use of a flag. We do not know, as Canadians, enough about the threat to our country in 1776. We think it is not right to talk about what the United States tried to do to Canada because we may offend them, just as 100 years ago the fathers of confederation would have chosen the name "Kingdom of Canada" for this country but a weak-kneed colonial minister in England thought the Americans would be offended, so it was changed to the less offensive term "dominion."

There is nothing wrong in recalling our history of 1776 and the resistance of our people to the invaders from the south. Our existence is based largely on the fact that they were defeated, and they were defeated by the action of English and French standing together behind the bastions of Quebec. Is it wrong for us to recount the story of the conflict of 1812 and 1814? I do not hear much about it now. I heard about it when I was a schoolboy many years ago, but no one hears much about it now. It is something we should consider, because once again English, French and Indians standing together defended this country from a very serious invasion, and back of them stood the power of Great Britain.

We do not hear much about the Fenian raids in the 1860's; yet the fathers of confederation, when they were making their plans in 1866 to complete their organization for confederation, had those plans seriously delayed and upset because of the threat of a Fenian invasion from the United States, and that Fenian invasion or threat did not receive the restraint from the government of the United States that it should have. We play all these things down.

We do not talk much about the uprising in the northwest in 1885. We hear very little about South Africa. There was no national recognition here in Ottawa with regard to the veterans of South Africa until two years ago, on the sixtieth anniversary of the peace that was signed, when we had the surviving South African veterans in the capital city. The first world war, the second world war and Korea are better known. Our activities in NATO and in the peace keeping operations of the United Nations are much better known, but in all of these the flag plays some part.

We overlook the fact that from 1763 to 1870, for over 100 years, Canada was kept inviolate from attacks from the south, and from threats from the south, by British regular troops stationed in Canada and Canadians enlisted in the British regular army and, in the distance, the protection of the British navy. We forget that the cost of all that was paid by the British taxpayer. Why don't we say something about what the British navy did for us in all those years, and under whose protection we rested, including the years 1914 to 1918, up to 1939 and 1945?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: Had it not been for British military forces we could not have survived or won in those two great world wars, and it was the union jack that represented British protection. In 1891 Sir John A. Macdonald said this:

> For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown.
> Under the broad folds of the union jack we enjoy the most ample liberty to govern ourselves as we please.

That is how Canada began; that is how Canada was maintained; that is how British North America was established. It was under the ample, broad folds of the union jack and the might that was represented by it. Yet we have people saying to us nowadays, "Remove from your flag that jack in the corner." It represents our history. It represents the fact that we have an independent country.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Let me draw your attention to the importance of the union jack in the history of the world. In this debate we have heard people expressing their deep emotions concerning the flag. I do the same. I am presenting to you today my feelings with regard to our Canadian flag and that jack that is in the corner. I grant that, as with everyone, a person is affected by his experiences in life, and I grant that my experience in life has been largely influenced by warfare. It may be I take a different view of some of these problems from some of my friends, but the union jack to me represents something in the history of the world.

I recall, reading from history, what happened during the course of the Napoleonic wars when Britain, so frequently during that 20 year period, had to stand alone against a world conqueror. It was Nelson at Trafalgar and Wellington at Waterloo, with their supporters, who saved the day for us. But it was under what flag? It was under the union jack.

It is not difficult for me to remember the period of the first world war, 1914 to 1918, I know so well the experiences that our country went through then and the threat to our survival. People have forgotten that in 1917 we were almost throttled by the submarine menace. They have forgotten that in March, 1918 Haig sent us this message in the field: "Our backs are to the wall." And they were, and we were sent into action with orders to "hold your position to the last round and the last man." I well remember that occasion. The threat of world domination by Kaiser Wilhelm and imperial Germany was resisted for three full years by France and Britain, with some assistance from Italy; but they virtually stood alone against that threat, and it was some time before American assistance reached us in 1918. Millions of casualties had occurred before that time.

I think of the union jack with regard to the last world war. In the period from May, 1940, when France fell, until the invasion of Russia in June, 1941, what countries stood against that menace? What countries resisted the world conqueror? Think of it. It was the British commonwealth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: It was the British commonwealth standing alone for one year. Under what flag? The union jack, the flag of Australia, the flag of New Zealand, the flag of South Africa and the flag of Canada, each of them containing the union jack in its fold; and it was another six months before the United States came to our assistance.

What does that union jack mean with regard to the history of the world? What flags had disappeared? The flag of Czechoslovakia, the flag of Austria, the flag of Poland, the flag of Norway, the flag of Holland, the flag of Belgium, the flag of Luxemburg and the flag of France were gone, succeeded by the crooked cross of Hitler; and it was under that flag that western Europe lay prostrate.

There may be some members in the house who had the experience of liberating villages and towns at the conclusion of the war. It is something you never forget, the excitement of the people and their joy at being set free. I saw this in 1918 in Belgium and France, and again in 1945 in Belgium, France and Holland. After the first exuberance is over, what happens? The flag of the conqueror is torn down, taken to the market square and burnt or otherwise destroyed. Then, out comes the flag of the country. Out comes the flag of France, or of Belgium, or of Holland, and people wave it as they welcome the liberating troops. These are experiences which no one who has seen them can ever forget. This is what a flag means to people—a flag borne in battle. And our flag has been borne in battle.

The flag of the United States means a great deal to the people of that country. We are all admirers of the freedom, the justice and the liberty which result from the activities of that great neighbour of ours. What do the people of the United States say when they take the oath of allegiance, the pledge to the flag?

> I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America, and to the republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

I wish we had some pledge like that here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: To me, the Canadian red ensign means as much as does the stars and stripes to any inhabitant of the United States of America.

We have fought shoulder to shoulder with men of other countries. I can say, as a machine gunner in the first world war, and just a corporal, a member of my team came from French Canada. And in the second world war, when I had the opportunity of commanding a regiment, I had under my command people from French Canada and from the various other races which make up the Canadian population. There was no distinction; we stood shoulder to shoulder. In the first world war when the troops of the British commonwealth were coming to the aid of France, Le Temps or the Times of Paris penned these words on October 27, regarding the arrival of troops from the commonwealth. This is what it said:

> Today what a remarkable development in history. The Indian troops are in France, the Canadians are coming. They will come under the British flag, and that will not cause any bitterness amongst us. For they come to defend France as well as England. The blood of English Canadians will flow for France; French Canadians will shed blood for England. And among those who fall, none will know whether he dies for the motherland of yesterday or that of today, for the two former rivals are closely united to protect the liberty of the world. There is, perhaps, no better lesson, no brighter chapter in the history of civilized peoples than this final reconciliation after ancient wars. It was prepared by the equal and parallel development of two liberal civilizations.

This sums up my feeling with regard to the flag. This is why I hope and pray that the symbol of the union jack in the red ensign will be maintained in any flag which may be suggested or approved in this country in the future. I cannot do less than express, as we have been invited to do, my own feelings with regard to this matter and I hope I am also expressing the feeling of my constituents in the city of Winnipeg. The letters they write to me say these things. But this is how I feel, myself, and by this I stand.

I hope that as this debate continues, or when it reaches a conclusion, there will be a meeting of minds with regard to this issue. Let us continue shoulder to shoulder in days of peace as we did in war. We can have our political differences, but these are pretty largely on the surface until the emotions of the people are touched. In this particular question, the emotions of the people have been touched and serious harm may result unless we are very careful. But I have expressed my point of view and I hope the Prime Minister will take a second look at this problem and recognize the feelings of those people in Canada who have a regard for their history and their traditions and who see in the Canadian red ensign something of that history and of those traditions, and who have respect for the jack in the corner because it represents so much in the history of the world—justice, liberty, freedom, parliamentary institutions. This is part of the heritage we have derived from our ancestors, the ancestors of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and myself, on whose necks was placed the heel of the Norman conqueror. But we survived. We intermarried with them and we subdued them, and we have progressed to be one of the great colonizing races of the earth and one which has brought freedom and liberty to mankind.

Mr. Speaker, that concludes my expression of opinion with regard to the flag question. I have now to propose, seconded by my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert):

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto:
> "and that in conducting such a plebiscite, provision be made, inter alia, in the interests of national unity that the results be published on a national basis only and not by regions or provinces."

I will leave it to others to develop the thought which is contained within that subamendment. But our hope is that if a plebiscite is decided upon, that plebiscite in itself will not be used to create in any way disunity in this country but that, as a result of the method by which the plebiscite is conducted, unity will be preserved. It is with this thought in mind that I present the subamendment to the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising to speak very briefly on a point of order and I hope I can do so in a non-controversial way.

The hon. gentleman has moved a second subamendment. Your Honour made a decision with respect to the first subamendment which has been honoured mainly in the breach by all speakers, including myself. I might be allowed to say that the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat found much more favour in my eyes than have some to which I have listened because he did do as I suggested, yesterday—he spoke about his own views and did not in any way attempt to depreciate those of others.

I would hope that now, if, as the right hon. gentleman said yesterday, we are seeking to have a debate—and there is no thought or element of obstruction in this—that we will, in debating this subamendment, obey the rules of the house.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a point of order.

Mr. Skoreyko: On the same point of order, just to correct the impression left on the house by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), does he not remember that the first man in this house to transgress the rules was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), and then everyone else followed suit?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, can I go further than to blame myself? That I did.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, it seems to me there are a number of members who have not put forward their views on the flag. All who have not spoken so far would want to speak for their constituents and for themselves, and it seems to me that the sum total of their thoughts on the flag should be made available to the house and that they should not be curtailed in any way. In much the same way as the debate on the speech from the throne, I feel that suddenly in the middle of this debate it would be wrong to start curtailing speeches. If precedent is required, I do not believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) should be singled out. It would seem to me that almost every speaker who has spoken in this debate so far has had the fullest leniency with regard to what he wishes to say. It seems to me that Your Honour must rule that the debate will continue within reasonable bounds. If we were to limit it at this stage I believe it would be wrong, and particularly wrong as far as those who have not yet had an opportunity to speak are concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would underline the fact that I was not asking Your Honour to make any ruling whatsoever. I was just raising the point and I did not express any view that the Chair should take any particular attitude. I merely suggested a little self-restraint on the part of hon. members. I think the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) has said something which makes a lot of sense. If the debate is kept within reasonable bounds, and if those speakers who have not yet spoken, wish to put all their speeches together in one place, I think that would be highly acceptable to the house.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to prolong this debate but the Chair has acted on this general principle, which seems to me right and proper and which I could perhaps restate. Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 119(3), says:

> Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech. Members are often deprived of their right to speak on the pretext that their remarks are irrelevant when as a matter of fact they refer to matters perhaps remote but yet related, even indirectly, to the question under debate. In borderline cases the member should be given the benefit of the doubt. A great deal of latitude must be allowed in the House of Commons which is a forum where every phase of public affairs can be discussed and every member has the right to be heard, even if in doing so he sometimes disregards the rigidity of procedure.

Basing myself on this principle, and in view of the highly charged emotional context of the issue, it seemed to the Chair that members should be dealt with in a most reasonable fashion. On the other hand, I do count on the co-operation of members to be as relevant as possible.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this subamendment. Before I begin the subject material of my discourse I should like to pay special tribute to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). He is a man who all of us in this house will recognize spoke from the heart, a man who merited this privilege, and who pointed out in no uncertain terms that we have in Canada a heritage of which we can be justly proud, regardless of our political faith.

There is one sentence in the subamendment just proposed particularly important to me and to those I represent. It deals with national unity. In the area where I come from in southwestern Ontario this is of particular interest owing to the peculiar aspect of our geographical location. Perhaps hon. members are not aware that in my area at least nine tenths of the television programs, three quarters of the radio programs and at least three quarters of the newspapers and periodicals originate from United States and its activities political and economic have a distinct bearing and leave their mark on the area I represent.

We are particularly flag conscious and have always been so. I have been trying to determine why this is and I think it is because for many years there has been a very welcome influx into this area of tourists from the United States who take advantage, especially in the summertime, of our many resorts and summer playgrounds. When these tourists come in they bear, either on their cars or on their boats, the flag of the United States of America. When they go to their cottages in Canada, on their flagpoles flies this flag of which they are so very proud and have every reason to be proud. These people exhibit a courtesy that is an example to all nations. Very seldom do they erect in front of their cottages the flag of their nation without unfurling with equal prominence the red ensign of Canada. This to me shows with what respect these visitors to Canada view our national symbol.

This has an effect, Mr. Speaker, on the people in my area. We see the respect held by these visitors from the United States for the flag of Canada. We also try to emulate them in this regard. We too, whenever possible, display the red ensign of Canada; and when we take advantage of going to their beautiful country to the north of us in the state of Michigan and take advantage of their hospitality, we display in no uncertain terms the red ensign of Canada and are also very careful indeed to repeat the courtesy shown to us and to pay equal respect to the flag of their nation.

The people in my area are very conscious of flags that affect them in other ways. It does the heart good to visit the various agricultural fairs in the area, where one of the highlights is the school parade of students from the various schools, who parade down the main street following the band and their drum majors. Without fail every school bears on its standard, and bears proudly, the red ensign, Canada's flag. Also peculiar I think to our area are the many roadside stands where the high quality fruits and vegetables grown locally are displayed for sale to the tourists and local people. Sir, invariably displayed in the stands is one or more red ensigns. Also displayed are red ensigns by the hundreds for sale as souvenirs, and they are eagerly purchased by visitors and tourists travelling through this area. This little red ensign represents the courtesy and hospitality displayed to those tourists and visitors in this great Canada of ours.

Sir, that area is 500 miles from Ottawa. We do not receive daily broadcasts in detail of the happenings here in parliament. We do not hear the daily commentators discussing the pros and cons of the actions taken by parliament. The every day actions in parliament do not make the headlines or front pages of every newspaper in this area. The people, because of that fact, and because their television broadcasts are mainly of United States origin, are perhaps not as quick to sense the ebbs and flows of feelings generated by debate in this house.

I never make a practice of putting letters or newspaper clippings on Hansard, but I should like to beg the indulgence of this house to make one exception. We in southwestern Ontario are ordinary people. I have here a letter written by an ordinary man, and I think this reflects the deep feelings of the people in that area. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read that portion of it which states:

> There are many problems that this country faces and we know that one man just cannot solve them all, and we wonder just what the individual can do to help solve them. I realize that it doesn't do any good to sit home and beef and the only other way I know of to do something is to write to my member of parliament and let him know what at least one person thinks.

He then goes on to state—and this is the part I am very proud of:

I am, like a lot of people, short on the history and background but my wife and I are both veterans and this is the flag we served under. I understand that the Canadian Legion is backing this flag, and who has a better right to make the choice.

Mr. Speaker, please mark this portion:

As far as I am concerned I am not a fanatic about good old England or good old France or good old any other country, but what is mine and my country's I don't want changed when it will serve no useful purpose. Our lives are full of changes, our jobs change, our way of living changes, people change, religion changes but one thing must remain the same and that is our unity. All around the world there is a mighty struggle for something called freedom but there is no such thing until people learn that united they stand divided they fall, give a little, take a little. Yes, I would be disappointed to see our red ensign disappear and a totally different flag wave over our country but if that is what the majority of Canadians wanted I would be the one to support it.

Sir, if there is anything that would make me want to support and fight for a plebiscite it is sentiment expressed from the heart such as in this letter. This country is indeed fortunate to have ordinary citizens, with a love of human dignity in their hearts, who will write such letters as this. Mr. Speaker, I was more than proud to receive it and repeat it in this House of Commons.

Because of the number of days that this debate has continued the people in this country, and in that area I represent, are beginning to sift the wheat from the chaff in their assessment of the basic principles we are discussing here in this house. They are beginning to get over the emotional shock that the action taken by this government created. They are beginning to assess coldly the pros and cons and formulate their own opinions. The one thing I have noticed is the way in which the editors of the various newspapers in that area are taking a very keen interest in the procedings of this house. Without exception they are putting down in black and white the thoughts, as near as they can, of the people with whom they are coming in contact day by day, the people they serve and the people to whom they broadcast the news as honestly and factually as they can.

Sir, the tenor of their writings is in this vein. Nothing is as important to this country today as its national unity. Anything sir, that tends to drive a wedge into any segment of this country should be discouraged, should be frowned upon, should be blocked and should be fought at every opportunity. That is what we in the Conservative party feel we are doing at this time. We are confident that our action is directed towards preserving the unity of this country, and I say this with very deep conviction.

We in our party have requested that the government refer this matter to the people of Canada in the form of a plebiscite. We feel under the circumstances that this is the only way the people of Canada will have an opportunity to express their own personal views. We also feel that this is the only way this country and government will ever determine what is the wish of the majority of Canadians.

Many polls have been conducted, including newspaper polls, Gallup polls and polls by members of parliament. We have had opinions expressed, directed and influenced by bodies, pro and con, but I still fail to see how anyone can stand up in this House of Commons today and say that we know what the majority of Canadians prefer. We do not know that. We have no idea in that regard. That is why this party is putting this proposition to the government. Let us try to assess what the majority of the people in this country want. Let us find out for once and for all what the preference is.

Mr. Speaker, we are all Canadians and we do not want disunity. We want national unity as we have never wanted it before. We are now approaching the 100th anniversary of confederation. This issue must be settled, and I am very confident that the government itself, on calm reflection, would not want to force a flag on this country today, if they were sure the majority of the people did not want it. They are Canadians too; they are Canadians first; and I am certain they do not wish to take such action.

This country today wants a distinctive flag. This is not the question. We all want a distinctive flag. The problem facing Canada today is, what goes on this distinctive flag? How do we create this distinctive flag? It is the opinion of the people I represent that never in the life of this country will we by partisan politics evolve a flag that will be suitable to fly on our flagpoles. We must have a flag that is not manufactured, a flag that is not sold, a flag that is not plucked out of the air because it has a pleasing design. We must have a flag that means something to the majority of Canadians and it cannot be evolved in this fashion. It cannot be sold to the people by a slogan. It cannot be sold to the people by bumper stickers and other methods. It has to provide something that the people of this country themselves want.

This is why we are asking for a plebiscite. Let the people decide. Never will we have unity in this country if there is a large segment of Canadian citizens anywhere who do not feel that the flag flying on the flagpole is their flag. Minority or majority, we cannot have this division of opinion. Certainly we want a distinctive flag for Canada, but we want a flag for Canada that means something in the world, a flag which the Canadian people will be proud to stand and salute.

I am sure the ordinary people of Canada are watching parliament closely. I am not certain that they care very much whether we debate this matter for two days, 20 days or 50 days. They do not care. What they want us to do is to produce results and this is what we are going to do. We are going to let the people decide, and when we are sure we have something that the majority of the people of the country want, parliament will then be proud of its action. But let us not sit here in deliberation and force on the people a flag which it is already apparent many people are dead set against. If we do such a thing, if we commit such a blunder we will have national disunity in this country such as we have never seen before. In the troubled state of the world today Canada can ill afford such disunity or the risk of such disunity becoming permanent. Harmony is what we want and need. We need harmony, and the only way we can have harmony is to make sure that the people are satisfied. I fail to see how we can have such harmony without letting the people have the opportunity to express their view.

The subamendment deals with the method of a plebiscite. We are all aware that in various parts of Canada there are differing strong feelings. In one part of Canada people want the red ensign. In another part of Canada people want no part of the red ensign. Still another segment wants a compromise of both designs. How are we to know? When we have a plebiscite we do not want to know that province X had a great majority for one proposed design. We do not want to know that province Y had a great majority for another proposed design. This is disunity. The only thing we want to know is, what do the majority of Canadians want in a distinctive Canadian flag? That is why I make no apology for standing in the House of Commons today and pointing this out to the government. That is why I am speaking on this issue. I am confident that the only way we will achieve the unity that is necessary is by letting the people decide. Let the people decide.

It has taken a long time for the people removed from the political battles of Ottawa to get the picture. We cannot fool the people of Canada. Sometimes news takes a long time to reach them but they finally get the picture. They understand the situation. They know what is going on, and this is as it should be. Never before have the people made their wishes known to me as their representative to the extent they are doing today. We are not dealing with millions of dollars or billions of dollars, the size of which they cannot even imagine. They have never seen a billion dollars piled up. They do not know how big it is, how broad it is, how high it is, how deep it is. But when you talk about the flag they know what that is.

I cannot understand the psychology behind the action of the government in saying to the people of Canada: Even though this red ensign has been your flag, down it comes, you cannot have it; this new three leaf design is going to be your flag. You cannot even treat little children that way. We all know that the best way to make a child or adult want something is to try to take it away from him by force. This will never work. Let us have a plebiscite. Let the people of Canada decide. The people are capable of doing so; they now know the facts. They have their minds made up and they have the ability to express their views. Let us not wait for an election. Let us remove this question from party politics; it does not belong there. It should never have been put there but somewhere a cardinal blunder was made.

In Canada today we have a very grievous problem. We are all aware of it; we know this is a fact. But, sir, let us hope that this government and this parliament will take such action now that the people of Canada now living and those of future generations will be able to look back and say of us: They were statesmen, they were men who believed in Canada and believed in national unity as no other parliament did since confederation.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to participate in this debate, this time of course on the new subamendment, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to be as relevant as the rules require. I am very pleased to see the loquacious Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) in the house, that part time minister, that part time auctioneer, that expert on sillabub, and I hope that some time this afternoon he will rise in his place and make his contribution to this debate. I am a little disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) is not in his seat because, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), he has adopted a new role as the second Speaker of this House of Commons, or the second master of the rules.

In the light of the wording of the new subamendment, I should like to dwell for the next few minutes on the word "unity". I realize that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is a very busy man indeed, and I know that this week he is away attending a conference in Charlottetown. However I have attended the sittings of this house since this debate began some 18 or 19 days ago and I have been a bit disappointed at the amount of time the Prime Minister has spent in this house. The reason for my disappointment is the fact that the resolution under discussion at the moment is in the Prime Minister's name. Certainly the same could not be said of the former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), who spends a great deal of time in the house. I believe all hon. members will agree he is sincerely interested in bringing this matter to a satisfactory conclusion as soon as possible.

Last night, Mr. Speaker, we disposed of the previous subamendment which dealt with the four questions proposed by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More). I regret that the vote on that subamendment was not more favourable to the stand of our party, but at least we know where those who have not spoken on this question now stand. The subamendment that was moved today by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) calls for the results of the plebiscite to be published on a national rather than a regional basis. The reason given for this is unity. I agree wholeheartedly with the subamendment. Later in my remarks I will point out why I am in agreement with it.

In the meantime, let me refer to the remarks made by certain ministers of the crown with reference to the problem of getting certain sections of this country to change their attitude towards the province of Quebec, and how the province of Quebec could change its attitude towards the rest of Canada. I say this because the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) said in this house that the adoption of a flag would be a plum to a troublesome minority. I do not believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce had any right to make such a statement in this house. He used those words and it is of concern to us that certain sections of this country feel this is precisely what this government is doing. The term "massive concessions" to the province of Quebec has been used by many of the western Liberal newspapers. It is this kind of thinking that we have to dispel as soon as possible. It is bad, and it is not true. I do not believe the flag is a concession to Quebec any more than it is a concession to the province of Alberta from which I come. It is this sort of attitude that must be dispelled immediately. The only way that this feeling can be dispelled, I suggest, is through a plebiscite. If I may go further in that regard, Mr. Speaker, the results of that plebiscite should be published on a national basis. If we were to publish the total number of those who were for or against any flag, we would completely dispel this feeling at the constituency level. It would not be known and would not be referred to.

The subamendment uses the words "in the interests of national unity". Those are nice words, Mr. Speaker, and this afternoon I want to deal with unity. The unity with which I am primarily concerned is the unity of all the people of this country no matter from what part of Canada they come. When I talk about unity in a political party I cannot help but be reminded of a speech made in this house not long ago by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). He claimed he was a good Liberal and someone interrupted by saying he was the only good Liberal. The hon. member said that his caucus did not see the design for the tri maple leaf flag until Votes and Proceedings had been published on May 27. Why was this done by the Prime Minister? Why did the Prime Minister not consult with his colleagues in the caucus? Why should he put himself in the position of having the hon. member for York-Humber recognized by the Chair and then have the hon. member say that the members of the party were not consulted in the caucus and that they were informed of the action taken by the Prime Minister at the same time as the opposition? I am not saying there is anything wrong with that, but the hon. member for York-Humber says he feels he has a special place in the Liberal party. He feels he should have been consulted and he was not. This does not make for unity within a political party.

Then I may say that not too long ago the Edmonton Journal carried an article in relation to this question under the headline "M.P.'s wonder how free a vote on flag choice can be". We are talking about unity, and I will deal with that a little later. However, the Prime Minister certainly did a lot to unite the Liberal party. One day he told them there would be a free vote on the issue. They were told there would be no question of confidence involved; it would not be a matter of the government standing or falling on the decision. Then later he said the government would stand or fall on the result of the free vote. Last night we had the example of a free vote. Those who spoke against the resolution were absent. I am not saying they were out of Ottawa; they were not in the House of Commons. Is that a free vote, Mr. Speaker?

The Conservative party members were in the house, however, and voted as their consciences dictated. I suppose the newspapers across the country will say that the Conservative party is split. Here is a headline in one newspaper just handed to me by my colleague from Okanagan Boundary, "Quebec P.C.'s Split Ranks in Vote". There is no such splitting of ranks. The leader of our party said its members could vote as their consciences dictated. Some of our members could well have stayed out of the house last night, as did some of the members on the other side to save embarrassing the Prime Minister, but they did not. This is what unity means in a political party.

Returning to the article I was referring to a moment ago, headed, "M.P.'s Wondering How Free Vote on Flag Choice Can Be", I wish to quote one little paragraph:

> Around parliamentary corridors there was some grumbling about the strings Mr. Pearson has attached to the so-called free flag vote. All M.P.'s —including certainly the Liberals—are keenly aware that another general election can come at any time. In their concern about this they recognize that while they may not be "read out of the party," they will have to seek re-election and need the backing, financial and otherwise, of party headquarters in the campaign.

What does this mean. I do not want to suggest the Prime Minister would do this, but there are ministers of the crown who are capable of approaching members of the Liberal party and suggesting to them that if they took an opposing stand to the government they would not be "read out" of the party but they could not obtain financial and party support when the next election comes. To me this is certainly not a free vote.

The subamendment refers to the interests of unity, and in that connection I would refer to unity in the services. What about all those servicemen who have made representations to the government and to private members, appealing to them to do what they can to save the red ensign? The Prime Minister went to Winnipeg and told the legionnaires they could not have it, that they were going to be stuck with three maple leaves, that he was going to give them this flag whether they wanted it or not. Is this creating a sense of unity in the armed services? I suggest it is not.

A good friend of mine in the city of Edmonton, in a recent sermon delivered in the United church, used these words:

> Do you wonder that our veterans love the red ensign? After all, they are the ones who learned the hard way what sacrifice and suffering on behalf of others really means. Extract this idea from the armed forces and you extract their strength, their pride, their glory and their effectiveness. But Mr. Pearson says this must go.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, what lack of unity can do to the armed forces, to those who have served in them in the past and those who are presently serving in them. No doubt they wonder what the government's next move will be to disunite them further.

Not making any mention of the tri-service or the statements made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) about the millions of dollars he is going to save—and that has nothing to do with this debate—I simply say that his attitude and that of the Prime Minister with respect to the flag have done as much to disunite the armed forces as any step taken by any government in the history of our country.

When I think of the letter from the Reverend Chubb containing a request that the members of this house look at the discarding of the red ensign very carefully, not only has it shown that disunity has been created in the Liberal party but it has shown that the same thing has happened in the armed forces, and it has shown representatives of religious bodies of this country feel as strongly as those of the armed forces.

One cannot help but think of some of the statements made both inside and outside the house by responsible cabinet ministers, with reference to the flag question. In my opinion a flag that embodies a religious cross in its design serves to unite people, if through no other means than the medium of religion. The new flag does not have a religious cross in it.

What is so surprising about the proposed flag, and I mentioned this in one of my other speeches, is the fact that when the question was posed to one of the ministers of the crown, as to what the three maple leaves stood for, his answer was one that I think would serve to disunite Canada quicker than any other reply he might have made. This is a quotation from a Calgary newspaper:

> Justice Minister Guy Favreau said Tuesday he believes French Canadians will support a national flag bearing a symbol such as the maple leaf.
> He told a press conference Quebec residents do not want a symbol such as the fleur-de-lis, representing French history, any more than they want a symbol depicting Canada's British heritage.
>
> He said his feelings and those of Prime Minister Pearson are Canada's flag should "refrain as far as possible from telling the story of any particular part of Canada."
>
> The Quebec member of parliament was here to address a public meeting.
> The maple leaf, he said, would be a proper symbol.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it may have been, but he was pressed a little further the following day in Vancouver, when somebody asked him, "Just what did you mean when you said that no particular reference should be made to any part of Canada in the flag?" This is what a newspaper report gave as his answer:

> He said that the simple, three maple leaf design favoured by Prime Minister Pearson was "very indicative of the three groups that form Canada."

He said one leaf could well represent the British heritage, the second, the French heritage and the third the heritage of all Canadians of other ancestry. Yet a day earlier he had said that Canada's flag should refrain as far as possible from telling the story of any particular part of Canada or any particular group. The Minister of Justice may have been a little confused but I wonder how many people who have their origin in countries other than Britain or France have written to compliment him for making such a statement. The question which arises in my mind is this: You are a French Canadian, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am of Ukrainian origin; which one of the maple leaves on that flag belongs to either one of us? If the Prime Minister had stood up in this house and said this is precisely what these three leaves represent, I would be the first to resume my seat to the end that this matter might be disposed of. But I am not very happy about splitting Canada into three ethnic areas, the French, the English, and then all the others as if they did not matter. The hon. gentleman did not have the courtesy to name the various countries, from which these others came, to make up this great country of ours.

[Mr. Skoreyko.]

Then, to add further to our disunity, an article appeared in the Ottawa Citizen not too long ago under the heading "Government Hunts New Design for Flag". I will refer to it shortly. First, they tried to unite Canada with a three maple leaf design which only served to disunite the country further—if we agree that Canada was disunited at any time, and I am not sure it was.

Hon. members will recall we were promised a free vote on the flag issue. We were told that no matter how it turned out, the vote would not be considered a vote of confidence. Then we were told there would be no free vote; that the issue would be treated as a vote of confidence and that if the government lost it would fall. Again, we were told later on that there would be a free vote after all. Hon. members will recall, too, the discussion of the two-flag resolution and of the resolution dealing with the two national anthems. If you will forgive me, Mr. Speaker, there was an unprecedented ruling to split the resolution on the flags. I can foresee that when this question now before us is settled we shall be back immediately debating the pros and cons of a second Canadian flag. Will you tell me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as a Canadian, if really, deep down in your heart, you feel we need two flags in Canada? I suggest it is the last thing we need. If we are to be Canadians united in one Canada, is it not logical that we should have one flag showing our allegiance to the commonwealth and showing our connection with France, if you will, embodied in one design? This could very easily be done with the present red ensign. Canadians united in one country do not need two national flags any more than they need two national anthems.

The splitting of the resolution only served to confuse matters further. Newspapers across the country have criticized not only the opposition but the government, because some 19 days have been spent debating the flag question. I wonder how some of these newspaper writers will feel after the debate has taken place on three more resolutions which will probably be put before us—the second resolution dealing with the second flag and the others, now in one resolution which will probably be split again so that we may have separate discussions, on the two national anthems for Canada. If they think we are in difficulty now, let me tell them I can see a lot more choppy, muddy water ahead.

Last night, I say, we had this free vote—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member; I was following his speech with interest. But a while ago he said he would make some comments about the vote which took place last night. I know he is familiar with the provisions of standing order 35 which forbids hon. members to reflect on a vote in the house, and I am sure he will have this in mind when he refers to what took place last night.

Mr. Skoreyko: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I apologize if I have in any way transgressed the rule. I wanted to point out what disunity will do not only to a political party but to the people of this country if the attitude of the Prime Minister does not change very quickly. I had hoped that when this debate on the flag question was drawing to a close there might be a degree of agreement expressed by the people who correspond with me almost daily. Some two months ago, they said: I will not accept anything but a union jack, or, I will not accept anything but a red ensign. They have written to me subsequently and said: Well, the debate has gone on and on, please do something to get this question settled and get on with the other business of the House of Commons. So I wrote back to say I had done my part; I had spoken in the house and expressed my point of view as well as theirs, and I was hopeful that some compromise could be reached in the very near future. I wonder what thoughts passed through the minds of some people who were hoping for a reasonably acceptable solution in the course of the next few days or weeks when they say this article in the Citizen, to which I shall refer later in greater detail. After 19 days of controversy over the flag the government now say they are looking for a new design. The article to which I refer is dated August 27 and the Minister of Transport when he spoke yesterday did not deny what the article said. Do you not agree, Mr. Speaker, that one of the ministers of the crown should rise in his place this afternoon, lay the matter squarely before this House of Commons and let us know precisely what their attitude is?

The Prime Minister on a number of occasions said there would be no free vote, that it would be treated as a non-confidence motion. Subsequently he changed his mind five times; at least that is my count, it may be one more or one less. What do the people of Canada today think when, on picking up the newspaper, they read "Government hunts new design for flag"? Does it mean that a man sitting in his front room tonight reading his newspaper will for the next 19 days after this debate is concluded have to listen to the same thing? Every time one turns on the radio the news is about parliament and the flag. The people of Canada are tired of the flag and will be as tired of it in the next month or two as they are of general elections. I suggest that if there is any truth to the rumour that there is a second design, then someone on the front benches of the government should stand up and say so. If it is the case then let us suspend this debate now. There is no point in going on with it. Let us bring in some legislation. The pension plan has to be dealt with, and the government intends to deal with it. Then they can bring in a new design and we can see what it looks like. Or has the government made up its mind that eventually an opportunity will be given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to rise in his place at the opportune time and move that the government adopt a single maple leaf flag? I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, if that is the course of action the government is contemplating, that I will be prepared to make four or five more speeches on the single maple leaf flag.

In conclusion, if the rule of national unity has some meaning to the government I suggest that expressions like "troublesome minorities" and "massive concessions" never be used again in this house. Every time a member of this house uses that kind of language it serves only to put a little more fuel on the fire.

I was going to make reference to an article dated August 22, 1964 by Mr. Charles Lynch of Southam news services entitled "A nightmare in diplomacy". This article is relevant to the subject before us and deals precisely with the matters I have dealt with during the course of my remarks. It commences in this way:

> The Pearson government's stand on the new flag started to soften almost from the moment that the Prime Minister unveiled the three maple leaf design—and today it appears distinctly mushy.
> Instead of becoming in any real sense our national emblem, the three leaf flag seems to be receding to the status of just another design, which may or may not come before an all-party committee of parliament.

It was our hope in this party that the government could offer some reasonable solution to the problem by way of a committee. Instead the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) had the audacity to come before this house and tell us that he was willing to accept a compromise which would leave Mondays open for government business and force the opposition to sit in the house from eight o'clock in the morning until midnight. This is supposed to be, in the words of the Minister of Justice, a reasonable compromise. Those words mean only one thing to me, Mr. Speaker, and that is that the Minister of Justice, on instructions from someone, was not interested in finding a reasonable solution to the problem.

The article goes on:

> Government by diplomacy and compromise.
> It is sad because it represents one more bit of evidence of Mr. Pearson's determination to govern by diplomacy and compromise—those admirable qualities that more than any other have served to weaken his ministry.
> To me, Mr. Pearson's decisiveness in producing the three leaf flag, as a focal point around which new flag sentiment could rally, was admirable. In decisive fashion, he made it clear that this was the new flag and that the government would stand or fall on it. Now was the time for all good Canadians to rally round.

I do not need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, how they rallied round. The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) practically bolted from his party, although I see he is now back in again. This article continues:

> In the subsequent confusion, the Prime Minister seemed to be saying that he would stake the life of his government on the adoption of the union jack, in its Queen and commonwealth context.

If that is his attitude and if he is determined to have a Canadian flag embodied in a Queen and commonwealth context, then for heaven's sake what is wrong with the plea which some 80 Conservatives have made in this House of Commons with regard to modifying the red ensign. In it you have all those things which the people across Canada seem to want. But the Prime Minister says no, it will not be the red ensign; it is going to be the three maple leaf flag—one leaf for the French, one leaf for the English and the other for all the others who do not matter.

I see my time is drawing to a close but I want to make reference to two western newspapers which are Liberal supporters. Both of them during the early stages of the debate indicated that they could not support the three maple leaf flag because it represented nothing of any meaning to them. Then weeks later after considerable heart searching they found that perhaps if this was what the Prime Minister wanted they would go along with it, although they regretted seeing the red ensign trampled into the dirt. Its most recent editorial adopts the line that we should get it over with. The Albertan says that there is deadlock and that the bones are bare. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what both of these newspapers contend? They contend that if ever there was justification for closure this is it, the government's diffidence notwithstanding. Parliament, after all, is the ultimate place for decisions to be made on proposals advanced by the government.

Mr. Speaker, there is no point in my reminding you that this is a newspaper in the city of Edmonton which favours the Liberal party. This kind of attitude on the part of a newspaper in this country, knowing what the results were of using closure in 1956, is nothing short of disgusting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Ouellet (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, 2,000 years ago we had a promise of peace on earth and goodwill unto men. Alas, when I consider daily events affecting mankind, do you think, hon. members, I would dare to say that this message from heaven has received enough consideration to provide for the people of the earth the quietness and the stability desirable for the accomplishment of man's natural destiny? Has Canada, this great, rich and young country, reached that degree of Christian civilization desired and visioned by the pioneers of our two main national groups which represent the majority of the Canadian people?

Those of you who know me are aware that I am a farmer concerned about carrying out faithfully the duties of my profession and vocation. They also recognize that I dedicated my life to the protection, the defence and the safeguard of the interests of the farmers. I bear proudly in my heart the flag of farming unionism, mutualism and co-operation. And that is why I want to say here, in passing, that never, since the administration of Intendant Bigot, were the farmers, and especially the settlers, placed in a position as distressing as the one they are in today.

Those noble flags that were our family farms in eastern Canada and especially in the lower St. Lawrence region, are now being replaced by community pastures, and I am sorry to see that serious people consider it as a permanent and imperative solution.

As regards the flag of Canada, which has been the main issue lately, the remarks made by certain hon. members lead me to believe that moderation in our general behaviour might soon be a thing of the past.

Do you believe that I am ready today to give up the affection I feel for the Canadians in my group? Do you believe also that I refuse to respect actively English speaking Canadians? Not at all.

Tomorrow like yesterday and today, I want to bear witness in support of those who call to the attention of this parliament the need for the flag to represent faithfully our common origins.

I have listened to and read carefully the speeches made in the house and the press reports intended for the information of the public. After serious consideration, I wish to announce that I totally support the Canadian flag design suggested by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent). In my opinion, a flag without any signs representing or symbolizing what the union jack and the fleur-de-lis stand for will not be appreciated by the majority of the Canadian people neither today nor tomorrow.

Yes, a two-cross and one green and vivid maple leaf flag would stress the importance of developing the wealth of the two cultures which have contributed to make Canada a land of hope and promise. Yes, we should approve and adopt that flag design.

I hasten to point out to those who object to my opinion and my testimony that they should at least know how childish it is to feel that to remain faithful to our past is to hold the future in contempt. In my opinion, to assume a wise attitude, it is necessary to consider the opportunity of a compromise on the flag issue.

I have stated as briefly as possible my opinion on the matter and I like to hope that fervent prayers should be heard.

I would like to thank particularly the hon. members for Kamloops (Mr. Willoughby), for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth), for Saskatoon (Mrs. Jones), for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg), for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) and for Nicolet-Yamaska for the kindness and fairness they have shown when carrying out their duty in this house on this very important issue.

I would ask all hon. members to co-operate for the finding of a solution which would respect the pride and nobility of the majority of the people.

Canadians have had hard times in the past, and in the future they will undoubtedly have the opportunity of showing unfailing wisdom.

Our good will is the guarantee of orderly stability. My last word will be: Long live Canada and its citizens.

I should like to add a word of praise about all the Canadian citizens with whom I discussed this delicate issue. They have always shown me great respect even when our opinions were absolutely contradictory.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Inasmuch as we are dealing with an amendment to an amendment concerning a plebiscite, could the hon. member tell me whether or not he is in favour of such a plebiscite?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Longueuil would like the member for Rimouski to give him an answer which, in some respects, could raise certain problems.

For his information, I am glad to say that, should all possible negotiations in order to reach a compromise fail to achieve the results we hope for, I would be in favour of a Canadian plebiscite.

[Text]

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this subamendment I should like to state that I feel we have come to the nub of the problem, and that is the preservation of national unity in Canada. It becomes very obvious, and I think it is obvious to most people in Canada, that the best way we can preserve the unity of Canada is to dispense with this debate immediately and work—

Mr. MacNaught: By accepting this flag.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —behind the scenes on a compromise which will be acceptable to all Canadians.

Mr. Skoreyko: Why does the minister not get up and make a speech?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): So far as unity is concerned, I say that the action of the Liberal government in bringing about disunity and division within Canada will be a matter of history. We now see in western Canada such newspaper comment as the following in the Edmonton Journal of August 25 under the heading "Partition for Canada?":

> Liberal strategists who formulate policy might well have provided their minions with calling cards with the legend "Have tails, will grovel."...
> The Pearson government is indirectly responsible for the chaos that is evident to eastern Canadians.

This is the kind of thing they have created in Canada. Do they want to go on aggravating the situation more and more? Surely the obvious answer is that this debate should be suspended and that we should get on with the business of Canada.

Mr. Peters: You move it and I will second it.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Stubbornness is no substitute for statesmanship. If the Prime Minister wants to do so he can continue his stubborn attitude. He can try to make a hero of himself which he very nearly did when he first set out on this track. But he has bungled the whole thing so badly. He has failed to acknowledge or accept the views of many millions of Canadians and is continuing with stubborn petulance to try to force down the throats of Canadians a flag that the majority obviously do not want. To suggest for a moment that he has a mandate to do so is foolish, as the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) so ably pointed out. We were a little disappointed he was not with us last evening to back up his able presentation.

This is the general feeling across Canada now. I should like to quote for a moment from the Victoria Daily Colonist with regard to the stubbornness of the Prime Minister in pursuing his present policy and trying to force this flag down our throats, in dividing Canada and forcing a division which, if he continues, may take years to heal. The editorial has this to say:

> Where does the blame for the present parliamentary stalemate lie? Solely in Mr. Pearson's obduracy over the flag issue. This is the core that keeps parliament sitting and the normal business of the country held back from speedy progression.
> This has been evident ever since he introduced the flag resolution. To begin with he held the threat of an election over M.P.s' heads did they fail to pass the flag measure, which was tantamount to holding a gun at their heads and depriving them of unbiased decision.

I want to say a word a little later with regard to the free vote which we saw last evening.

> He refused a free vote on the subject. While blaming Mr. Diefenbaker for non-compliance he has now prevented the compromise suggestion that would delay the contentious flag bill to a fall session by insisting on an unacceptable time limit to its debate.

It is not so much the question of the time limit that is unacceptable. It is this flag which is unacceptable to a majority of Canadians and we as Conservatives have to see that it is never unfurled on a public standard in Canada, period. There is no other attitude we can take. The editorial continues:

> It is not obstructionism on the part of Mr. Diefenbaker that is at fault but the Prime Minister's insistence on having his own way. Mr. Pearson says he is not prepared to call an election on any of the current issues facing parliament, the flag of course being the main one. Is he afraid of the result?

[Mr. Peters.]

I say he is.

> This would probably be the quickest and most salutary solution to a parliamentary stalemate that grows worse with each passing day.

I too say that if he is going to insist on trying to force this flag upon us then let him call an election. Let him call an election on this issue. I do not particularly care for another election but if he is going to insist on pushing this bunting down our throats at a time when national unity in Canada is precarious, if he insists on choosing this time to push his flag upon us, then surely he must face the consequences. As I said initially, he cannot substitute stubbornness for statesmanship. He should ask the people. If he does not want an election then let him ask the people through a plebiscite, and so that we will create unity let us not have the results announced provincially. Let the results be announced on a countrywide basis. Let us keep it ultra secret. We cannot rely upon the responsibility of the press in this matter because the press of Canada has shown itself in the main to be completely irreponsible.

Mr. Pepin: You have just read from the press.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): That was a private article and I only read it because I agree with it.

Mr. Pepin: There are two kinds of press.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I will have a few more words to say about the press and particularly with regard to the editorial which was quoted by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmoton East (Mr. Skoreyko). I want to say a few words with regard to the editorial in the Edmonton Journal particularly because we in northern Alberta are faced with a monopoly situation. It is the only newspaper and it is thrust down our throats somewhat like Mr. Pearson's pennant. We have got to accept it whether we like it or not.

When the flag issue was first raised this newspaper was against replacing the union jack or red ensign. They wrote editorials saying it was a shame that we were going to have to go to Honolulu to look at the union jack. I do not know whether their conscience is troubling them, but now they are writing editorials saying that we should get it over with, and advocating closure. I wonder whether the publisher is not just covering up for himself or did he get a phone call from somebody else in the Southam organization, which seems to be in the hands of the Liberal party? The hon. member for York-

Humber outlined some of the benefits that can come from supporting your party at the right time. Was the Southam organization told there would be no more senatorships unless they fell into line? Was it a case like that of Maclean's, which got rid of its editor and Ottawa correspondent without a murmur from their friends in the journalistic profession? They allowed these men to be scalped without one of them having enough gumption to stand up and protect them. They talk about freedom of the press: They are using it now to cover up their own inadequacies.

On the subject of national unity and the manner in which the government has brought in this flag I want to quote rather extensively from an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of August 31 last written by no less a person than Mr. Peter Newman. We who have been here over the past few years have a good knowledge of Mr. Newman's writings. Some of them we did not like because he was a bit inaccurate, but some we had to accept. However, he has a very interesting view with regard to the flag situation and I think it is worth while to put some of his comments on the record. He is talking about the fact that the Prime Minister wanted to become a hero out of the flag debate and the main theme of his article is that the hero of the flag debate may now become the victim. I have to admit that Mr. Newman may be slightly biased because he wrote that the present government was a grey, dismal failure, and he was fired or was told he could not write such things. I am not sure which. In any event, he had the courage of his convictions and wrote what he felt about it, even though it cost him his job. As I say, he may be a little bit upset. He may still feel that any way we can get rid of this dismal grey failure of a government would be worth while. In any event, he goes on talking about the hero of the flag who may become the victim, and I quote:

> But when the actual flag resolution was tabled by Pearson in the Commons it turned out to be a piece of legislative whimsy that defied the laws of political gravity. Instead of being the only major nation in the world without its own distinctive flag, we were urged to perpetuate our unique position by becoming the only land on the earth's surface to fly two official flags. Once again, Lester Pearson had tried to square the circle of political leadership.
> This double-barrelled flag resolution apparently grew out of the insistence—

I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is not here.

> —of Jack Pickersgill, who first articulated the idea at a little-reported young Liberal rally in Quebec city on February 2, 1962. Pickersgill suggested then that Canada should have one flag to represent the commonwealth connection as well as a distinctive flag of its own and pointed out that there's no reason "why Canada can't have two official flags just as she has two official languages."

We are talking about national unity and those are the views of the Minister of Transport. The article continues as follows:

> As Newfoundland's chief representative in the federal Liberal hierarchy, Pickersgill in turn was under pressure from Premier Joey Smallwood, who fears that a new flag would become the focal point of anti-Canadian feeling on this island.
> In retrospect, it's clear that Pearson's two-flag resolution was a political miscalculation of major proportions.

Then, I wanted to put on the record what this writer has to say with regard to the question of a filibuster, if you can call it that. I quote:

> The Conservatives' filibuster has not (as is generally believed) prevented parliament from dealing with a backlog of essential legislation. The Liberal administration, unaccountably, has no major bills ready for debate.

Is this flag debate being forced upon us because the Liberal cabinet does not have legislation ready for debate? Is this why we are debating the flag? I think some members on the front benches should have something to say with regard to that.

> The pension plan, which was supposed to be the showpiece of the Liberals' first year in office is now in its fourth, sad mutation.
> But the Tory filibuster has succeeded in softening Pearson's stand. He has retreated on his pledge (repeated as late as June 18) that his government would fall with the rejection of his flag.

Then he goes on to talk about the proposed alternatives that are available to the Prime Minister, and I think they are worthy of consideration. I quote:

> The Liberal leader now must choose between three alternatives: He can ram his flag design through the Commons by using closure and thereby provide Diefenbaker with a natural election issue; he can allow the flag to go before a parliamentary committee, which might delay a decision indefinitely or force on him a compromise design which he could not accept; or he can let the Tory filibuster continue and hope that public revulsion with Diefenbaker's tactics will force a Conservative retreat.

Let me say here and now that we do not intend to retreat because we represent the majority of the people in Canada. As pointed out so ably by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), Mr. Newman ends his article in this way:

> It's a grim choice, but Pearson isn't discouraged. "Every good flag has to be born in battle," he told a friend recently, "and this one is no exception."

Are we having this flag debate so that Liberal ministers may get their legislation ready, and so that we can cover up their faults? Is this the reason we are discussing this emotional issue which may divide this country? Is this government going to continue to perpetuate the division in Canada? How much better it would be if we were to have national unity in Canada and get on with the business before the house, get on with legislation which would bring about improved economic opportunities and improved economic returns to the people. If we do not improve the standards of living in some areas of Canada, how are we going to get unity? We are not going to achieve it through a flag. We are going to get unity in Canada by improving the standards of living of some areas so that there will be equality right across this country. This was the task we of the official opposition set ourselves at a time when we formed the government, and we took many steps toward this goal. This is what this government should be doing now, instead of forcing an emotional issue upon the people of this country and furthering disunity.

How much better it would be if, for instance, the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), were discussing legislation to improve the standard of living in some areas of Canada, instead of reading the newspaper this afternoon. How much better it would be if we were discusing legislation which would increase the economic opportunities of all Canadians. Are we discussing the flag because the minister has not done his homework and has not got legislation ready? I understand he has many $10,000 a year men in his department. Let them get busy and draft some legislation to be introduced in this house which will do something to bring about unity in Canada and to improve the standard of living of our people. We have a big job to do.

How much better it would be if we were spending our time listening to the minister of northern affairs introduce legislation to solve the problems of our north country. He is quoted enthusiastically by correspondents about what should be done in our north. So far, we have heard nothing but words. We want to see some action from this so-called decisive government. We have not heard a decision yet except the stubborn refusal of the Prime Minister to do anything except consider the flag, even if it divides this country for years to come. No one said there was anything wrong with the old one. Even the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) said they did not care what kind of flag we had in the west of Canada because they had their own flag. Obviously, the Prime Minister wanted it to go through, and this is clear if one reads Mr. Lynch's report. This is the Prime Minister's personal touch; he wants this moment of glory. However he is now heading down the road toward becoming the victim of his own glorious notion. I think the people of Canada should have an improved standard of living, and then we could come together under one flag that would be acceptable to all the people of this country.

But oh no, we are going to be forced to go on and, as the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) said, this is just a start. This is the first of the bipartite flag resolution. Then we have to go on to the bipartite anthem resolution. Is the Prime Minister going to keep us here for the next year deciding on a symbol? Let us get on with the work that is to be done. Let us make ARDA a living thing. Let it not die, as the government is trying to let it. There is work to be done even in Alberta, in ARDA. There is work to be done in Quebec. These are things which will bring unity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I realize some of his remarks are related to the subamendment, but when he discusses such things as ARDA in Alberta he is straying some distance away from the subject matter before the house.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Well, Your Honour, I am just pointing out that the subamendment calls for a provision which will create unity in Canada. Goodness knows, we need something. With the government we have in office we need anything we can get if we are to perpetuate unity in this country. I am merely pointing out that rather than have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) sitting here reading his mail and the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) reading the paper, they could be doing concrete things. We in western Canada are waiting for the Minister of Agriculture to bring in his farm machinery bill. That is one of the things we want to get on with.

Mr. Hays: The farmers are waiting too.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Let's go then, my hon. friend.

Mr. Hays: Let's vote then.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): We are not going to allow the party in power to push this flag on the Canadian people, because it does not have a mandate to do it and, as I said a moment ago, we represent the majority thought at the moment in Canada on the flag issue.

With regard to the plebiscite and the issuing of federal results, I would point out that the Prime Minister and his cabinet, like all good politicians, are a little bit egotistical. They said this is what we were elected for, to decide a flag for Canada. I dispute that. Many politicians I know are a little bit egotistical. Most politicians get here because they are leaders in some parts of their communities or constituencies, but not for a moment does this mean they have the ability to decide on an emotional question such as the flag. What about all the other people who feel they do not have that political bent but are concerned emotionally about the flag. Are we going to refuse them an opportunity to express their views about a symbol such as the flag? This is something that should be settled by a plebiscite, but I do not agree there are very many other things that should be settled that way.

We were elected to run the country as members of parliament. We were not elected to settle the question of an emotional symbolism. As I said before, we were elected to get on with the job of improving the economic situation in Canada, of providing defence, of passing legislation with regard to taxes, and we have had some evidence from the government of how it can do that. We are charged with the job of making Canada run. We are not charged nor are we suitably equipped to pick an emotional symbol for Canada. I do not believe politicians are emotionally equipped to pick an emotional symbol. We have already seen evidence of this.

At first the Prime Minister said it would be a free vote and each member would be allowed to vote as his conscience dictated. Then he said his government would stand or fall on the result, and the other day he reversed his position and said there would be a free vote, but by that time it was far too late. This is the very reason why politicians cannot decide the flag. Last night we saw that all those people on the government backbenches who were opposed to the government stand did not vote. So, it became an emotional issue and this emotional issue is decided on a political basis. Therefore instead of a national flag we have a political party flag. This is what happens if you allow politicians to decide a flag. It is going to be decided on the basis of political party lines and, as the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) said, "You either vote the party line or you don't get into the Senate". I leave that for your consideration.

I wish to quote from the Toronto Telegram of August 22 on the question of a free vote:

> At this stage, with party lines hardened, it is difficult to conceive of a truly free vote.
>
> Having shown, belatedly, a willingness to retreat from his earlier stubborn demands for the banner of his choice, he now should go one step further and measure public sentiment by plebiscite.
> Perhaps Mr. Pearson fears the outcome of such a testing of public opinion.

That is my opinion, that he fears the outcome of a plebiscite as much as he fears an election. It is my opinion he should have one or the other, dissolve the house and call an election on the flag issue, or present it to the people in the form of a plebiscite.

> There is no reason why this obstructive and divisive bill should not be shelved pending a reference to the people. There is no urgency. Most Canadians outside Quebec appear to be quite satisfied with the flag we have now. In Quebec, the matter is of little importance as there they fly the Laurentian flag with its white cross and fleur-de-lis.
> Until Mr. Pearson softens his stand, the opposition is justified in continuing a modified filibuster. As distasteful as such devices are in parliament, no other method seems practical in the face of Mr. Pearson's stubbornness.
> The way out of the parliamentary impasse is clear: a plebiscite to end the long debate and to allow parliament to get on with more important legislation.

With regard to the Prime Minister causing disunity in Canada, I want to say he has even caused disunity in some of our minor parties. The Social Credit league of Alberta passed a resolution endorsing the maintenance of the red ensign as Canada's national flag. People in Alberta are quite satisfied with the red ensign. Most of them would be quite satisfied with a modification of that ensign to denote the history of Canada, so eloquently outlined this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). But most of all people in Alberta are anxious about the government, about its stubborn refusal to get on with the business of Canada. We come from a country out there where we believe there are many things to do, many opportunities for our people, and to get some of these opportunities going we need government direction. We are not getting it from this government. Fortunately the last government which was in power did something. We did get some direction. We are still seeing the benefits of it out there.

Recently the minister of northern affairs went to drive the silver spike at the Northwest Territories boundary of the Great Slave Lake Railway. I wonder why the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) did not go. We sat in this house and watched him vote against the construction of this railway. Now his colleagues have a big delegation to drive in the silver spike. If they really want to name this railway properly, they should call it the Baldwin-Bigg railway for northern Alberta. Here was an example of unity, an example of compromise in order to prevent a split in a certain section of this country. I think this could serve as an example to members of this house, particularly on the government side, with regard to the matter now before us. Here were two members, each representing half of the northern part of a province. A railway was proposed to go through one of these areas. By their ability and statesmanship, these members were able to accept one another's points of view and got this railway going into the north country, leaving aside all pettiness and questions of personal betterment so as to enable the building of this railway to begin. This is a real example of what the government should be doing with regard to these things.

If we raise the standard of living by providing opportunities for all Canadians—I come back to this theme—we shall have unity in this country. If the standard of living is raised to an equal level for all our people we shall have no trouble in finding a symbol. By the time we have done that, as a result of advances in education and communications, we shall be able to sit down and find a symbol which will be acceptable to the whole of this nation.

In conclusion may I repeat that the government owes it to the people of Canada to suspend this debate, to put this resolution back where they have put three or four of them in the past—they have a place for these things—and leave it there until the time comes when there is such unity in Canada that we can have a single flag which will suit everybody. Let us get on with the legislation of the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury). Let us put some of his $10,000 a year boys to work on contributing directly to the prosperity of this nation. At the same time, we do not intend to submit to the pressure now being applied. We shall not allow this bunting to be unfurled in Canada.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, in rising once again in this discussion, I want to say right away that I have no apologies to offer for doing so, because I think I would be remiss as a member of the house not to air my views as well as those of my constituents.

[Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson).]

It is generally admitted, Mr. Speaker, that the way in which the flag issue was introduced in the house roused a whole gamut of protests throughout Canada which can only result in a threat to Canadian unity. Now, it is with this thought in mind and the idea of doing something to strengthen Canadian unity that I rise this afternoon to explain my position.

I would like first of all to repeat that freedom of action and thought, which is our privilege in this party, entitles me to repeat that I favour a distinctive national flag. Yesterday's events, Mr. Speaker, proved that freedom of action and a free vote only exist on this side of the house. I cannot dwell on this matter, but may I point out the clearly established fact that we of the Conservative party are fully free with regard to the national flag as well as to all other matters submitted to us, and if we come back to the subject, it is because we believe that it is our duty to do so. I would like to ask hon. members opposite, who are so talkative outside the House of Commons, to seize this opportunity of submitting to the house the views of the people who sent them here.

Mr. Speaker, I must say again that the situation has not changed at all since the resolution on both flags was before us. By the way, I want to mention first that we on this side of the house, the members of the official opposition, support one flag, and not two as provided by the resolution now before us.

It is clear that the Conservative party has been supporting a distinctive national flag for many years. I want to repeat before the house that we want only one national flag, and not two flags, with one borrowed from a foreign nation.

Mr. Speaker, since we are dealing with the plebiscite question, I should like to call the attention of the house to the result of a poll I made in my riding—I say a poll, but to be more accurate, I should say two polls, because I carried out two—during the month of May, when we heard that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) would introduce a resolution concerning two flags. I immediately contacted my constituents to know exactly the viewpoint of those I represent here. On May 22, 1964, I sent 1,600 questionnaires to the people in my riding, who represent all classes of society. Here are those questions:

Are you in favour of keeping the Canadian red ensign as our national flag?

Mr. Speaker, hon. members will be interested to know that in my riding, 62 people answered that they were in favour of keeping the Canadian red ensign while 347 were in favour of other flags.

As a second question I asked them:

Do you think that the flag issue should have priority before the unemployment issue, the pension plan or the farm problem?

The results were as follows: 132 replied that the flag issue should be settled first, while 278 were in favour of the settlement of the unemployment issue, the farm problem and the adoption of the pension plan.

The third question I asked them was:

Supposing that you are in favour of a new flag, would you indicate below which one you prefer:
1. Flag embodying the Canadian red ensign and the fleur-de-lis?

Seventeen were in favour of that design. I carry on:

2. Flag embodying the Canadian red ensign, the maple leaf and the fleur-de-lis.

Seventy four were in favour of that flag design.

The third design I suggested was a flag with three maple leaves. Two hundred people of my riding were in favour of the three maple leaf design.

As a last question, I suggested a flag with one maple leaf only. Only hundred and forty one of my electors were in favour of that design.

Mr. Speaker, in adding together those who were in favour of a flag design other than that submitted by the Prime Minister, we reach a total of 294, whereas those who chose the three maple leaf flag number only 200.

But at the beginning of June, I decided to make another poll. May I read the letter I sent to 1,751 citizens, in which I asked them to enlighten me on the choice of a Canadian flag. I said to them:

Dear Friend:

Once more, I take the liberty to ask your co-operation and I submit a few questions on the flag issue. I am sure you will rush your reply, and I wish to thank you in advance for your valuable assistance.

As you certainly know, the project of the Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, is to officially establish, as a Canadian flag, a flag composed of three maple leaves on one stem, and to decree that the union jack be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations and our allegiance to the crown.

He also intends to decree that "O Canada" be considered as the national anthem and "God Save the Queen" as the royal anthem.

In practice, the adoption of Mr. Pearson's project would mean that we would have two flags and two national anthems. I would like to have your point of view on this question and I would ask you to fill in the enclosed questionnaire and to return it to me as soon as possible.

Thanking you for your usual co-operation.

I remain,

Yours truly,
Théo. Ricard, M.P.
St. Hyacinthe-Bagot

The questionnaire included four questions, the first of which read as follows:

Are you in favour of two flags?

464 answered: No, while only 8 favoured two flags.

The second question was the following:

Are you in favour of only one flag?

490 constituents answered: Yes, while only 8 answered: No.

The third question was:

Do you feel that rather than to have two flags, it would be better to maintain what we have at present?

273 constituents gave their preference to the status quo, while 76 answered: No. The fourth question was the following:

Do you feel it would be preferable to have a referendum on that matter?

Mr. Speaker, it is worthy of notice that 216 replied in the affirmative and 155 in the negative.

Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the information I obtained following those two soundings of opinion I have taken the attitude that a referendum, a plebiscite or a popular consultation should be held on the flag issue. I feel I have carried out the mandate my constituents have given me not only on the flag issue but on all other questions of national interest.

Mr. Speaker, to give an idea of the interest shown by the Canadian people in the holding of a referendum, I should like to quote an article which appeared in the Oshawa Times and which reads as follows:

[Text]

"Taxes and jobs main topics for Canadians". I should like to read a few extracts from this article:

"If you were writing to your member of parliament in Ottawa about the things you think parliament should do, what would you suggest?"

A similar question was asked in the United States recently and what came to the top there was taxes, as well as the civil rights bill. Medicare was cited in third place but only 2 per cent of Canadians mentioned need for a good medical plan and for more hospitals.

We read among the things judged as most important by the people across Canada that taxes are what Canadians would like to see reduced first. Then comes unemployment; the encouragement of more industry; and then, fourth, a revised unemployment insurance fund. Then finally what is interesting people and is in the minds of the people is the cost of living.

[Translation]

This goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that there are several measures to which the house could have given serious consideration before dealing with the flag issue.

To repeat what others have said before me, people are anxious to see that matter settled but, at the same time, they are aware that any hasty and irresponsible action could inflict wounds on our national unity which would take generations to heal.

Mr. Speaker, I was greatly amused to hear the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) and the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Frenette) suggest that a motion for closure be passed to put an end to this debate.

However, a few moments before making that suggestion, both members—I am sorry neither one is here at present—had made much of the fact that they were in favour of a distinctive national flag.

By suggesting the passage of a motion for closure, those two members actually recommended the adoption of the three leaf flag as the first national flag, and that the flag of a foreign country, that is, the union jack, be given an official status in the statutes of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, during their private conversation, my Liberal friends from the province of Quebec suggest that the second part of the resolution is merely a gilded pill to have a distinctive national flag adopted, and they claim that after a while, the second part of the resolution would be forgotten and the union jack would no longer be flown in our country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to dispute the validity of that suggestion of our friends opposite, because I do not believe that by decreeing and entering into Canada's statutes that a certain flag will be the official flag we will force people to forget another flag. You and I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member to remind him that the resolution he referred to is not under consideration at this time. By the same token, I take the liberty of reminding him that we are now considering the subamendment presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill).

Mr. Ricard: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I could follow in the footsteps of the previous speakers.

But, since you are responsible for maintaining order in the house, I have no choice but to accept your ruling, which I do willingly and with respect for the authority you represent in this chamber.

I would now like to give the views of some of our best editorial writers on the flag issue.

But before doing that, Mr. Speaker, like my colleague from Rimouski (Mr. Ouellet), I would like to call on the good will of the members of the House of Commons to reach a final understanding on this burning question.

You will admit, Mr. Speaker, that we have now reached a decisive turn. I do not believe that this national flag issue can be settled without a compromise which would be acceptable by all the parties concerned.

I should like again to commend my colleagues from the other English speaking provinces for the dignity with which they tackled the problem. Each and all of them have risen in the house and expressed the views of their constituents. And they added that they were ready to accept a compromise. I think, Mr. Speaker, that they could not show better cooperation.

I should like to set out this courageous attitude as an example to my friends opposite, and particularly to those from the province of Quebec, so as to prompt them to stand up and to express their views on this matter. Really, I cannot see how they could feel free not to avail themselves of this opportunity to express their point of view as well as that of their constituents.

I pity them much more than I blame them for being bound in such a way by party discipline. Before resuming my seat, I should like to urge them once more to tell the House of Commons about the views of their fellow citizens.

It is important that they participate objectively in the discussion in the same way as we are now doing in an effort to solve this problem. It must not be forgotten that this is a problem that concerns them as much as us.

I am conscious that the official opposition has a very important role in this house. It must be recognized that we have fulfilled this responsibility to the best of our ability and that, in so doing, we have surely rendered the people a service, because if the official opposition had not drawn the attention of the house and of the Canadian people generally to this question of the flags, since the Prime Minister plans to have two, it could, I repeat, have caused deep wounds to Canadian unity.

I will close my remarks by repeating that I favour a distinctive national flag and that we should all take steps to ensure that this problem is settled in the most agreeable and friendly way possible, in order that national unity, instead of being jeopardized, may be consolidated and this is the wish of all of us on this side of the house.

[Text]

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on our loyalties, our unity and our heritage of the past. I want to bring to mind that over the years we have had a cross on our flag that goes back to the crucifixion, the cross that was put there by the English in honour of their patron saint, St. George, who was a Macedonian. The cross of St. Andrew was placed on the flag by the Scots in memory of their patron saint, St. Andrew, who was a Jew and a disciple of Christ. There is also the third cross, the cross of St. Patrick which was added at a later date. St. Patrick, of course, was a Scotsman who was educated in France and then became the patron saint of Ireland.

I also want to direct the attention of the house to the fact that over the years of early history England was invaded time after time by the Scandinavians and the same thing was also happening in Europe. The Scandinavians invaded Europe and established a province in the northern part of France called Normandy. These same Normans were very closely related to the Normans who had remained in England after the Scandinavian invasions prior to 1066.

Then William the Conqueror invaded England and defeated Harold at the battle of Hastings, in which Harold lost his life. It is also interesting to note that Harold's mother was a Scandinavian. Some people will say: Why go back into history? I see some members are smiling. I say to you that if you have no love for your traditions and are ashamed of your past there is something wrong with you and you have something you want to cover up. I for one do not want to cover up the history of Canada and I am going to relate it.

William the Conqueror invaded England and conquered that land. He pillaged and laid waste the land and for 100 miles there was neither a house nor a person left. He brought with him from France the Latin touch not only in politics but in religion, and in the feudal system which he brought to England and established there. That was the last Scandinavian invasion of England, and I think this is an important part of history when we consider it was this man who stopped any further Scandinavian invasions.

As a matter of fact, he laid the cornerstone of the England we know today. He introduced the feudal system. He was a pretty smart man in a great many ways because he set up the barons and knights on the one side, and then had the English doing the work as serfs on the other. But he did not trust the barons and knights and he also appointed sheriffs. He had two bodies, one to watch over the barons and the knights and another whose members went around making secret investigations. He was a smart man.

I also wish to point out that it was from these same Normans that Magna Carta came. As a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, you will recognize that this is the cornerstone of democracy wherever it is found in the world. I say to all members and to the people of Canada generally, what a tradition we have got. William the Conqueror introduced the French language into England. It was used in court, it was used by the gentry and together with Latin it was used by the church. It was the language of politics and political science in that day, while English was the language of the serfs. The combination of those languages, Mr. Speaker, resulted in a common language, the English language of today, the greatest language in the world.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the acting house leader about the estimates that will be taken up on Friday, so that we will have adequate knowledge beforehand.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, on Friday we will consider the main estimates of the Department of Labour, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Barnett: What about tomorrow?

Mr. MacNaught: We go on with the flag debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 3, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION OF REPATRIATION AT CHARLOTTETOWN CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all members of the house in welcoming the Prime Minister back following the celebration of the 100th anniversary of that historic gathering at Charlottetown. In saying that I wish to ask him something about the repatriation of the constitution. Has the formula advanced in December, 1961 by the minister of justice in the government of which I had the honour to be the head been accepted, and what modifications in that formula are indicated? I ask him particularly whether there is any foundation for the press articles which suggest that the federal government is prepared to surrender or diminish its right to amend certain sections of the British North America Act relating to matters purely within the federal jurisdiction. I think a statement from the Prime Minister is necessary in order to have the assurance that such is not being contemplated.

I ask the latter portion of the question on the basis of an article in Le Soleil in which the premier of Quebec is quoted as saying that the agreement of the province is subordinated to the abrogation or satisfactory revision of article 91, section 1 of the constitution which, of course, is the one concerning the distribution of legislative powers.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for his welcome back to the house after an interesting and agreeable conference at Charlottetown, where the hospitality was almost as openhearted as it was 100 years ago.

So far as this particular question is concerned, I am happy to inform him that as the statement issued yesterday morning indicates, and I am quoting from a paragraph of it now:

> The Prime Minister and premiers affirmed their unanimous decision to conclude the repatriation of the British North America Act without delay.
> To this end they decided to complete a procedure for amending the constitution of Canada, based on the draft legislation proposed at the constitutional conference of 1961, which they accept in principle.

This acceptance, of course, includes the formula to which my hon. friend referred. Then the next paragraph states:

> An early meeting of the attorneys general of Canada and the provinces will be held to complete the amending formula devised by the 1961 conference—

In so far as the specific question he asked is concerned, based on a newspaper report, there is no foundation to the report that the federal government at Charlottetown indicated its willingness to give up its own rights under the proposed legislation in respect of those matters under its jurisdiction which are covered in section 91, subsection 1 of the British North America Act. It was agreed, Mr. Speaker, that at the meeting of the attorneys general to which I have just referred and which is mentioned in the statement, section 91(1) could be examined in order to ascertain if there are any specific matters in that section in which the provinces have a legitimate and direct concern, and if so to decide whether the formula should be applied to the amendment of those particular matters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister allow me to ask which particular matters he has in mind?

Mr. Pearson: I have no particular matters in mind. We are quite content to receive from the provinces any information they may wish to send us concerning that which they may think they have a legitimate interest in amending. We will look at it from that point of view, and this will be the purpose of the meeting of attorneys general to be held shortly to see how the particular sections could be adapted to the amending formula which we have agreed upon in principle.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the Prime Minister whether there has been any change in the attitude of the governments of Saskatchewan and Quebec since Mr. Fulton, as minister of justice, advanced the views of the dominion government in December of 1961?

Then I also want to ask him this regarding these questions of legislation in respect of which representation will be made by the provinces. Was there any suggestion that any of the provinces should have the authority to legislate in certain recognized federal fields, such as immigration and the like, or should have any veto power over monetary or tariff policy?

Mr. Pearson: The answer to the last part of the question is no. In so far as the first part of the question is concerned, the premier of Saskatchewan indicated that the amending formula put forward in 1961, and which at that time was not acceptable to the government of Saskatchewan, is now acceptable to that government. The prime minister of Quebec indicated that the position of his government in respect of section 91(1) was the same as the position taken in 1961, in other words that the application of the formula to that particular section of the British North America Act should be examined before the formula comes into effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So that the position today is that the change since December 1961 is that with a change in government in Saskatchewan the present government has agreed with the formula of 1961, and that so far as the premier of Quebec is concerned he wishes to examine the formula to which objection was taken in 1961?

Mr. Pearson: That is correct, Mr. Speaker, with this addition; that the head of the government of Quebec, along with the heads of the governments of all the other provinces, now accept in principle the draft formula of 1961, which they had not accepted at that earlier conference.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Has he any comment to make about the statements allegedly made by Messrs. Roblin and Thatcher that an agreement on a formula to repatriate the constitution was still far away.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Roblin, as I understand from the reports, indicated some impatience that we were not able to reach final agreement on all details yesterday in Charlottetown, and I have no comment to make on that. I am not quite certain what Mr. Thatcher said, but I think he also indicated the same kind of impatience and hope that there could have been final agreement yesterday. We all shared that hope, but the position taken at the conference by all heads of government was a very helpful one, and we hope that in a very few weeks the remaining difficulties will be cleared up.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a great pity the Prime Minister did not make a statement on motions so we could have had a full statement on the conference in Charlottetown. However, we all welcome him back, and he has our full support in any steps that may be taken to repatriate the constitution.

I want to ask him whether the government is placing its wholehearted support behind the so-called Fulton formula of 1961. Does this mean the government is now committing itself as well as the provinces to entrenching subsection 92(13), the property and civil rights subsection, which would mean that legislative matters having to do with pensions, a labour code and a great many other matters of that sort, under recent decisions by the courts could not be amended without the unanimous consent of the parliament of Canada and all ten provinces? Is this the position the federal government is taking?

Mr. Pearson: Not necessarily, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry if my hon. friend thought a statement should have been made on motions, but the communiqué was very short and I thought it would probably be more appropriate if I were asked questions so that other hon. members in addition to the party leaders might ask questions also. I would be glad to make a statement next week, if that is desirable, but so far as the federal details in this matter are concerned I cannot go beyond what I have already said. I do not accept the hon. gentleman's interpretation of our position with regard to entrenchment generally.

Mr. Douglas: Could I ask the Prime Minister if in view of the wide powers which the courts have injected into the property and civil rights clause he does not consider that entrenching this clause would put Canada in a constitutional strait-jacket for many years to come?

Mr. Pearson: I can only say that in recent years, in respect to the amendment of the constitution, Canada has been in a kind of strait-jacket, a strait-jacket imposed from outside.

Mr. Douglas: Is it not true that at present the Canadian constitution can be amended at any time by an address of both houses of parliament?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question.

In the course of his discussions with the provincial premiers about the eventual and desirable repatriation of our constitution, was there any mention made of the title our Canadian constitution should bear in the future, if it is repatriated?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. While I am on my feet perhaps I could explain that when I said we had been subject to a strait-jacket imposed on us from outside, I should have added that the imposition was of our own doing.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I realize this meeting was very short, but I should like to ask a question dealing with an aspect of this matter apart from the repatriation of the constitution itself. Would the Prime Minister tell us whether any suggestion was made to hold a federal-provincial conference to modernize and bring up to date the constitution to suit the needs of modern times?

Mr. Pearson: No. We restricted our discussion to methods of amending the constitution. But I should add that in the discussions just completed we agreed to have another meeting to consider, if possible, a report from the attorneys general on the amendment of the constitution and any other questions which the premiers might wish to bring up. This meeting will be held immediately following the visit of the Queen to Ottawa on October 11. There will be a two day meeting after that between the premiers of the provinces and the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will that be during the presence of Her Majesty the Queen in Ottawa?

Mr. Pearson: No, it will be the day after she leaves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the Prime Minister this. In view of the major importance of the step to be taken, would he consider setting a day aside very shortly, and before we adjourn this portion of the session, for the purpose of securing the views of the house on this matter? In 1961 there had been discussions from time to time in the house on this question which divides itself into two parts; first, the repatriation of the constitution, which latter I cannot agree is anything in the nature of a strait-jacket; and second, reconsideration of the whole question of the entranchment of powers. Is it the right hon. gentleman's intention to allow the house an opportunity to discuss these matters before anything is finally determined and, in particular, before legislation is brought before parliament?

Mr. Pearson: Parliament will undoubtedly be required to consider any action before that action can be taken if it deals with a new procedure for amending our constitution, and there would be an opportunity for parliament to do so at the time a decision has finally been reached between the governments of the provinces and the federal government. However, it seems to me it would be quite proper that there should be a general and earlier discussion of this very important matter. Perhaps the estimates of the Department of Justice would be a suitable occasion and, if so, we shall try to expedite them. We could bring them forward next week, perhaps. I am informed—I do not want to mislead the house—that the estimates of the Department of Justice are not in supply yet. Perhaps we could make some special arrangement.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I should like to ask a supplementary question relating to that asked by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi a few minutes ago. Does the Prime Minister intend to call another conference later this year between himself and the ten premiers for the purpose of modernizing the constitution after it has been repatriated?

Mr. Pearson: I think we had better restrict our consideration at the moment to the subject of amending our constitution here in Canada. In addition to the meeting in October, there will be a further meeting with the provincial premiers, the annual meeting held late in November or in December. It is a little early to say what will be on the agenda.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider setting up a special committee of the house to study this whole question, so that when the measure is before the house hon. members will have something of a preliminary study on this question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to give consideration to that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Was there any discussion at Charlottetown, as the Prime Minister said earlier this session, in response to questions, there would be, with respect to how the repatriating of the constitution will be brought about? Will it be by an act of another parliament, or will it be by an act that we take in this our own sovereign parliament?

Mr. Pearson: That matter was mentioned, but it was not discussed in any detail. It will certainly be considered by the attorneys general and the Minister of Justice. On this particular point, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to a question put by my hon. friend, I think it was last week, in the house.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

PROPOSED UNION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house in regard to the proposal made by the premier of New Brunswick relative to the union of the Atlantic provinces? Would he care to tell the house about this?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would care to express any opinion on that matter at this time. Surely that is a matter for the four Atlantic provinces. At the meeting at which the proposal was put forward they had some comments to make on it, but I believe they have not given it very serious consideration.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WINCH—REMARKS IN DEBATE BY MEMBER FOR WINNIPEG SOUTH CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is something I very, very rarely do; therefore Your Honour will understand that it is a matter which I feel is of importance concerning myself. I refer Your Honour and hon. members to yesterday's Hansard, page 7581, the first column, starting at line 26, wherein the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had this to say in reference to myself:

[Mr. Valade.]

—I recall him saying that all he would have to do to be re-elected in the next election would be to march up and down carrying the red ensign in his hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I have at no time been interviewed by the press on my position. I have not as yet spoken in the House of Commons on this flag issue. When I do, that will be my business and my opportunity. However, Mr. Speaker, never having made any such statement in my life, I think I have the right to rise at this time, in view of that statement made yesterday by the hon. member, and say that it is only because of my respect for the House of Commons, its decency and decorum that I say his statement yesterday was a most vicious, despicable inexactitude of terminology.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege based on the rather sharp attack made on me by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I want to state that I had no intention of offending the hon. member yesterday, and I was rather surprised that he did not raise some objection when I used the words which he now considers to be offensive, as he was in the house at the time.

May I draw to your attention, sir, that when I rose to speak yesterday he interrupted and left the imputation that I was speaking without authority, that I had participated earlier in the debate and should not be allowed to speak again. This occasioned what I thought was a friendly exchange; but if the hon. member has been offended by any words I used I am quite prepared willingly and publicly to apologize to him, and I wish him all the best in the next election.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONGO—SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the acting minister of external affairs and relates to the safety and well being of a number of Canadian citizens who are at the present time in the fighting areas of the Congo. Does the minister have any information for the house with respect to the safety of these individuals?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I think all members know, a register is maintained by our embassy in the Congo of all Canadians resident there. These people have been advised by the embassy from time to time to evacuate danger, or possible danger, areas. Some departures have taken place. In other cases Canadian missionaries have preferred to stay en place. In respect of those who have remained, arrangements have been made, with the generous co-operation of the United States embassy, and with the help of the UN authorities for the rapid evacuation to places of safety of those who may so wish to be evacuated.

INDIA—RESPONSE TO REQUEST FOR FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. On Tuesday and again yesterday the government of India sent an urgent appeal to both the United States and Australia to divert shipments of wheat to India because of the severe flood damage that has been occasioned during the past few days. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada has received an appeal from the government of India for wheat and other foodstuffs and, if so, what is the response to the request.

An hon. Member: That question was asked yesterday.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this question was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I can only say that no special request has been received from the government of India for special help in this emergency. As the house is no doubt aware, we are supplying to India at the present time about $7 million worth of Canadian wheat, which is an increase of $5,500,000 over the amount supplied in each of the last two fiscal years, and credits for the purchase of additional supplies if required. Part of the $7 million worth of wheat to which I referred was shipped from Canadian ports in August, and the balance is going forward in September. I do not think therefore, Mr. Speaker, that there would be any possibility of diverting wheat at this time in a way which would assist India. We are examining the matter and making inquiries as to whether there is anything in addition to what I have mentioned that we can do to help India in this emergency.

INDONESIA—SUGGESTED TEMINATION OF CANADIAN AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact, as reported in the Globe and Mail this morning, that the government of Indonesia has dropped armed paratroopers in Malaysia and that the government of Malaysia is sending a complaint to the security council of the United Nations, would the government now give consideration to cutting off aid to Dr. Sukarno?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, this matter is now under consideration; but, as it has also been pointed out, the only aid going to Indonesia this year is I believe a few hundred thousand dollars worth of wheat and flour.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister not agree that even though the aid is only in the form of wheat to the value of several hundred thousand dollars, this enables the Indonesian government to save foreign exchange and thus buy arms abroad?

CYPRUS—FURTHER CONTRIBUTIONS TO COST OF PEACE KEEPING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday the government of the United Kingdom agreed to underwrite $400,000 of the $2 million requested by the secretary general of the United Nations to keep the peace force operating in Cyprus. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether any other nations have agreed to underwrite some of this $2 million and, in the event that these other pledges do not come through, will the force have to be withdrawn by the end of September?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to answer my hon. friend's question tomorrow morning. I have not got the information at the moment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

CAPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS TO A AND B CLASS FAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I understand that annual grants to class A and class B fairs in respect of capital construction were suspended some time ago, and may remain suspended for some time. I wonder if the minister could say that such capital grants for construction would be extended until perhaps the 1967 centennial, giving these fairs a greater opportunity for adjustment?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in that capital grants for construction were suspended, I believe in July of 1962. We are running a pilot project this year, and we are keeping those grants in suspension until such time as we know whether there is merit to that project, at which time we will re-examine the situation.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In the Brome-Missisquoi area this week end we are having a fair. Would the minister come to that fair and tell the dairy farmers what he told us in the house in respect of the dairy industry?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, if I have the time and I receive an invitation I should be very glad to go with the hon. member.

PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY ON GRAIN TRANSPORTED BY FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): On September 1, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) asked me whether a farmer doing his own transporting by truck would benefit from the transportation subsidies.

The answer is yes. According to the regulations coming into force next September 14, a farmer will be able, from now on, to use his own truck to get his supply of feed grain, and that assistance will be granted to him at any mill in the area where his farm is located.

Under the present policy, he could not obtain any additional help when using his own truck for that kind of transportation.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the house whether the miller who provides his own means of transportation is also entitled to those subsidies?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire about this, but I believe the answer will be yes.

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. Must the farmer apply to the federal government in order to get this subsidy? Will the federal government pay this subsidy to the transportation company, which will then remit it to the farmer?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any difference in the cases just mentioned by the hon. member. The subsidy is always paid to the mill. Therefore, the miller will have to see to it that the farmer gets the amount to which he is entitled.

Mr. Vincent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the event the miller would not give the farmer the money owing to him, will the federal government be able to step in so that the miller will hand over to the farmer the money to which he is entitled?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska a moment ago concerning the remedy which would be available to the federal government should a miller refuse to pay back an amount of money to a farmer, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that, for nearly a year now, I have been raising questions which are somewhat related to that matter. In my opinion, too many privileges are granted agents selling feed grain and I think the minister should tell us what would happen if the federal government had no remedy at law to force them to reimburse such amounts to farmers.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, as this is a legal question, I would like to inquire about it before giving an answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

Does the minister intend to issue a pamphlet on the procedure to be followed by a farmer to obtain a subsidy for the feed grain he moves himself?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Yes, we intend to do that, Mr. Speaker. We will send a pamphlet to all farmers who benefit or might benefit from that new policy.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will such action be taken immediately or within a few months?

Mr. Sauvé: The new regulation comes into force on September 14. The publicity we intend to carry out in this connection will start immediately and the pamphlet to make farmers aware of the benefits of the new policy will be distributed as soon as possible.

ROYAL VISIT

REPORTED DANGER TO QUEEN IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the question I am about to put I ask with great diffidence, but it is one that I think has to be asked and requires an answer from the Prime Minister. My question is related to the visit of Her Majesty the Queen to Canada. In view of the threats of violence that have been made, the advertisements appearing in newspapers with particulars regarding opposition to the forthcoming visit in respect of which demonstrations are planned, and so on, is the Prime Minister in a position to advise, not particularly what means are being taken to provide necessary precautions, but whether he agrees with the suggestion by the special committee for the royal visit that special precautions are not necessary; or is that not representative of the viewpoint of the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only say in respect of that visit that adequate security precautions are being taken, and every effort will be made to provide necessary precautions for the security and comfort of Her Majesty.

Perhaps I might also be permitted to express my own feeling that it does not help very much in this respect when exaggeration and extreme publicity are given to the violent statements made by those who are speaking only for themselves and, in one case at least, by a person who has spent the previous 12 months in jail. I cannot think, Mr. Speaker, that it adds anything to the effectiveness of security to have that kind of statement given such exaggerated publicity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has expressed himself in a way that I think will receive general support, though always subject to the one qualification that we must be very careful not to restrict freedom within appropriate limits. However, I do point out to him the fact that, according to the Gazette of Wednesday, petitions are being secured by an organization known as rassemblement pour l'indépendance nationale, and advertisements are appearing in one Montreal daily newspaper in respect of plans for meetings to protest against the visit, and for demonstrations, which were freely admitted in detail on the telephone yesterday by a feminine voice answering the number which appeared in the newspaper advertisement. Would the Prime Minister have this situation looked into?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will do that.

CANADIAN FLAG

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND OPPOSITION TO RESOLVE DIFFICULTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, but perhaps his gracious substitute for the last two days is in a better position to answer. I should like to ask whether there have been negotiations, official or unofficial, completely aside from the house leaders' meetings, between members of the government and any members of the official opposition in order to find a way out of the flag dilemma.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the leader of the official opposition as an officer of the house, supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur. Has the Leader of the Opposition any knowledge that members of his party have met unofficially with members of the Liberal party in an effort to resolve and conclude the flag debate?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that under our rules such a question cannot be asked the Leader of the Opposition.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the flag debate has now gone on for five weeks and there seems no immediate prospect of the house being allowed to reach a decision, I want to ask the Prime Minister would he consider again the proposal that was made, that we set aside the flag debate for a period of time and deal with legislation; or the proposal made by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the government allow one day a week for legislation and one day for estimates, and the balance of the week for debate on the flag? It seems to me there is a great deal of merit in trying to proceed with government legislation at an early date.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the reaction of the government to the proposal to which my hon. friend refers was given immediately in the house that evening by the house leader on this side, and I have nothing to add to what was said then. That remains our position in regard to that proposal.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SASKATCHEWAN—STATEMENT RESPECTING SERVICE AT REGWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a follow-up question to that to which I received an answer yesterday from the Minister of National Revenue. My purpose in asking this question is not to embarrass or chide him, but he did give an answer, which is recorded in Hansard, to the effect that the average use of this port involved only four cars during the extra hours in the summer season. The information I have been given is that this is not the case. I would ask the minister whether he has any correction to make.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated in a note to the hon. member that I intended to correct Hansard. As found on page 7577, the 15th line from the bottom, I am reported as having said:

[Mr. Herridge.]

I might point out that the average has only been four cars for that shift during this summer, 1964.

What I said was:

I might point out that the average has been only four cars per hour for that shift during this summer.

PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX ON ALLEGED PROFIT BY MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has he investigated the report of the Quebec royal commission under Chief Justice Smith, which states quite clearly that a personal profit amounting to $62,000 was made by a member of parliament in a certain transaction? Is he investigating this matter now or has he done so already? If not, will he do so in the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In my opinion this question is illegal. I refer the hon. member to Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 108, subsection 3, which perhaps I had better read at this time:

Libels on members have also been constantly punished; but to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity, and the libel must be based on matters arising in the actual transaction of the business of the house.

I think it is a matter of common knowledge that this matter took place outside the house and within the personal capacity of the person concerned, and does not affect any of the business of the house. Unless it affects the honour of the house or of any member therein, and unless a member is prepared to bring a charge in virtue of—I give the reference in Beauchesne—citation 127, subsection 2, which necessitates a member laying a charge and attempting to substantiate it, in my opinion the question is completely out of order. This is particularly so inasmuch as the attorney general of Quebec has said that the matter is a civil matter.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If I may speak to the point, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned no particular member of the house. My question was to the Minister of National Revenue, whose duty it is to see that people pay income tax. I asked him a simple question; has he investigated or will he investigate this report by Mr. Justice Smith which was recently made public to the effect that personal profits of $62,000 were earned by a certain person, and will he ascertain whether proper income taxes were paid?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is trying to do indirectly what he is prevented by the rules from doing directly.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister prompted by news reports carried on the front pages of yesterday's papers. Is the reported leading candidate for the Liberal leadership in Ontario the same Charles Templeton who a few years ago wished a depression on the people of Canada in the interests of a Liberal victory?

AIRPORTS

HAMILTON, ONT.—AVAILABILITY OF FEDERAL FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Transport, of which I have sent notice. Can the minister confirm reports that federal funds will be made available for the development of Mount Hope airport at Hamilton and, if so, how much money will be spent?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, treasury board has authorized certain work to be done at the Mount Hope airport near Hamilton if the Hamilton city council is prepared to take over and operate the airport. We are hoping to have discussions on this matter next week. I think it would be difficult to say how much would be spent at least until tenders are called and we see what can be done for how much money.

PROTECTION AGAINST DAMAGE FROM MIGRATORY BIRDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It relates to a news release by his department last Friday in relation to the migratory bird regulations. One of the orders states that special permits may now be obtained by managers of civilian airports or the commanding officers of military airports to take migratory birds which are endangering the safe operation of aircraft. Can the minister assure the house there is evidence that such action is necessary?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is evidence available in the fact that damage of over a million dollars was done to planes by birds last year in Canada. We are taking a variety of preventive measures, and this is one of them.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If I may be allowed to say so, I am not too concerned about a few birds that may have to be done away with in the interests of safety in areas where there is relatively little nesting. I am interested to know what precautions, if any, are being taken to assure that this order will not result in unwarranted hunting privileges in some of the northern nesting areas in the vicinity of military airports.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, we are concerned over this aspect, and we will make every effort possible to avoid abuse.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND C.P.A.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can he report to the house on the negotiations between Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Air Lines in relation to international and domestic operations, which report he expected to be able to make on the first of September?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is perhaps rather in a hurry. I said "during September". I can report that very active discussions have been going on between the two air lines since discussions commenced some months ago. I get progress reports from time to time, but I doubt that a statement at this stage would add very much to the prospects of success in these negotiations.

Mr. Rhéaume: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the house he has not been pressuring Canadian Pacific Air Lines to change its name to Air Pacific Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have not even heard of that suggestion before, but if the hon. gentleman wants them to do that no doubt he can carry on his own propaganda.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TELEVISION

PROVISION OF SETS CAPABLE OF RECEIVING 86 CHANNELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Now that it has become practicable to transmit television programs from one continent to another, is the minister or his officials giving consideration to following the steps taken in the United States so that all television sets that may be produced in Canada will have a minimum of 86 channels?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not quite sure whether under our jurisdiction—I am not expressing an opinion one way or the other—we would have the power to compel manufacturers to do that or whether it would be advisable. I am going to direct the hon. gentleman's question, and the information he gave me on which he based his question, to the Minister of Industry, who I think may very properly discuss this matter with the manufacturers in Canada, although they are rather alert and are likely to have noticed it themselves.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLIDAYS FOR STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. What arrangements are being made so that the House of Commons permanent staff, including members' secretaries, may have holidays?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I am afraid this problem, although one in which I am very much interested, does not come directly under my responsibility.

HARBOURS

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.—INQUIRY AS TO IMPROVEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if it is correct that tenders have been called for major harbour developments at North Sydney to convenience the ferries operating between North Sydney and Newfoundland.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): This would not come within my responsibility as minister, because these harbour developments would be undertaken by the Minister of Public Works. I am not actually sure if the tenders have been called as yet. I rather doubt it, but I hope they will be called soon.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask a supplementary question. I noticed that, according to the press, the Minister of Labour announced that tenders had been called. I am very glad to see the government has finally decided to go ahead with this project which was initiated by the previous government. May I ask also if the minister is aware that I have question No. 1,811 relating to this subject on the order paper, and it has been there for a few days now. Is he aware also that the minister made this announcement in yesterday's press?

Mr. Pickersgill: This just indicates that the Minister of Labour is much more alert than I am. However, I am well aware of the hon. gentleman's question, and I am doing my utmost to compose an answer that will satisfy him, the people of North Sydney and also the people of Port aux Basques.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I am glad to learn about the alertness of the Minister of Labour. I want to find out the degree to which that alertness has resulted in securing some word regarding the itinerant and elusive Banks. Is the minister alert enough at the moment to advise whether there has been any communication by the Department of Labour with the United States secretary of labor for the purpose of ascertaining if Mr. Banks is at the moment on the payroll of the international S.I.U.? Has he made any investigation in that regard? Is he able to tell us whether the government of Canada, after three weeks, has been able to ascertain from the immigration authorities of the United States whether Mr. Banks shook the dust of Canada off his feet and went to the United States? After all, as one newspaper, the Whig-Standard said:

> Of course we're suspicious. The whole affair smells to high heaven.

Let us hear about that alertness now.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the seeking out of individuals like Mr. Banks is not the proper function of the Department of Labour. We have attended effectively to all those aspects of Mr. Banks' career that relate to this department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that the alertness of the hon. gentleman does not extend to other departments, but I ask him, did he ever think of getting in touch with the secretary of labor of the United States, with whom he had such frequent communications only a few months ago, to ascertain whether that gentleman may make inquiry of the international S.I.U. to find out where Mr. Banks is?

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I want to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. I should like to ask the minister whether in view of the apparent mobility of Mr. Banks he has given consideration to the idea of asking his colleague the Minister of Transport to take over looking into this situation?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPRESENTATIONS BY ONTARIO SENIOR CITIZENS RESPECTING MEDICAL CARE AND PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the request of the united senior citizens of Ontario, made at their meeting in London two days ago, that the federal government provide comprehensive medical care for citizens over 65 and raise the old age pension to $100 per month? What is the government's response to these requests?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have just noticed the clipping, and I am grateful to my hon. friend for sending me a copy of the Canadian Press story. As all hon. members know, there was an increase in the old age pension less than a year ago, and there has been no increase contemplated for this year. Perhaps of all things in the press release the most disturbing to all hon. members was the quotation allegedly laid to Mr. Rose in which it was indicated most members of parliament were just not interested in any such increase. I should like to say that all representatives in the House of Commons notwithstanding party affiliations, and particularly the hon. member are most interested in this problem.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not realize that it would be a good way to show that interest and to celebrate our being a nation of 100 years existence by raising the pension to $100 a month?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, it may be that my hon. friend will have the responsibility of this particular portfolio by that time, and I would like to leave such a matter to the government of that day.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): As a supplementary question, and in a more serious vein, is it not the opinion of the minister that rather than a non-serious ad hoc suggestion, such as was made by the hon. member a few moments ago, in future old age pensions should simply be raised in order to keep abreast of the rising cost of living?

Miss LaMarsh: This was substantially done up until 1957, but for a few years there it jumped very much ahead of the rise in cost of living.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning her answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, when she indicated that possibly he would have the responsibility for that portfolio in 1967. Is this a forecast of an amalgamation between the N.D.P. and the Liberal party, or is it a forecast of a coming Liberal defeat?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the hon. member to whom I was then replying was at least responsible and interested in this portfolio and might indeed aspire to hold it, something I cannot hold out as a hope to the hon. member who asked me this question.

ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING MEDICAL SCHOOLS AND SCHOLARSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the statement made by the president of the Canadian Medical Association that only immediate expansion of medical training facilities will prevent a serious shortage of doctors in Canada, has the government considered the early implementation of the Hall commission recommendations for new medical schools and medical scholarships?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As is well known, Mr. Speaker, the government is considering all the implications and recommendations of the Hall report.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STAMP COMMEMORATING ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF SALT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Has the minister received representations promoting the issue in 1966 of a stamp to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the discovery of salt in Canada? Would the minister investigate the desirability of issuing such a stamp, as outlined by the stamp editor on page 21 of the London Free Press for August 8?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put that question on the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TORONTO, ONT.—DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO STRIKING NEWSPAPER EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Labour a question related to an answer he gave the day before yesterday about the I.T.U. strike in Toronto. Has the minister completed his investigation in order to ascertain whether a sufficient resumption of work is taking place so that the strikers would now be eligible for unemployment insurance?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I had information yesterday from the commission to the effect that the situation is being closely followed by the insurance officer, and that the jurisprudence in these cases is usually to the effect that 85 per cent activity must be resumed before normal work is considered to have taken place in the operation.

Mr. Scott: Can the minister tell us how they ascertain the 85 per cent? What action is taken by his department to arrive at a conclusion, one way or another, on the figure of 85 per cent?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this matter is one for the unemployment insurance commission. As I understand it, the insurance officer has authority under the act to make a decision with respect to this matter.

Mr. Scott: Would the minister take into consideration the Telegram of yesterday, which produced a 72 page paper and is well within the 85 per cent margin?

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Wednesday, September 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Churchill.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I was speaking about the great contributions that had been made by various countries, particularly the Scandinavian countries, to both England and France. The Normans brought with them to England their culture, which was a Latin culture, and the Roman influence. William the Conqueror in some cases pursued a scorched earth policy but he brought order and set up a country that was never again invaded successfully by any other nation.

I also went on to point out that the Norman language enriched the language of the English. It became the language of the court, it became the language of the gentry, it became the language of the politicians, and Latin became the language of the church; while the poorer classes, the agricultural classes and serfs, used English. It was the melding of these two languages that made the English language as we know it today; a language whose origins are part French and part English, a language which is world wide, a language which is used by our neighbour to the south, the most powerful nation in the world. The melding of these strains gave rise to the tongue in which the plays of Shakespeare were written, in which Milton's "Paradise Lost" was written and in which Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" was penned. It produced not only a great language, but unity; unity in a nation which controlled the seven seas, which held sway over all the oceans of the world and which for years was the greatest peacemaker of all, as well as the greatest colonial organizer in the world.

It is also interesting to note, as I mentioned earlier, that the language of this nation became the language of the great country to the south. There was doubt whether it would be German rather than English, at one point, but George Washington gave the deciding vote in favour of English.

Thus it was that this great British nation came into conflict with the French in New France. Let me remind hon. members that the population in New France at the time of the battle of Quebec was just around 50,000 people. They were people who were heavily taxed and badly looked after, grumbled at by King Louis of France whenever they asked for help. Historians say he would like to have written off the colony and forgotten it. The officials were rapacious. They taxed the colonists whenever they could, stayed long enough to make fortunes, then returned to France to live on their illgotten gains. Certainly there were good officials, but the bad ones overshadowed them.

Is it any wonder, then, that these colonists, given the benefit of free trade under the British constitution and freedom from taxation on their goods as well as freedom of religion and the opportunity to retain the French language and the French code of civil law, were glad to accept these things? To an oppressed, heavily taxed people, robbed by some of their intendents, this represented a freedom they had never enjoyed.

What was the attitude of the English themselves? They were on most cordial terms with the French. We are told they laboured in the fields side by side with these sons of France and worked together with them on other jobs as well. We read that during their second winter in Quebec the English collected five hundred pounds sterling to help the French. This is a sum which would be worth well over $30,000 in terms of today's money. The garrison of Quebec gave one day's ration per month.

This was a friendship the colonists had not known from France. This was a freedom they had not known before. As a matter of fact, we learn that 3,000 Scottish soldiers who settled in New France liked the French girls so much that they married them. Here we see the introduction of some 3,000 young Scotsmen into the mainstream of the life of this colony. It meant, too, that 3,000 girls of French origin were taken out of the marriage market. Talk about unity, what unity is there to beat that? Today, some people talk about disunity. What is wrong with history teaching in Canada if there is disunity? What is wrong with the politicians if there is disunity?

I want to say that the French appreciated the Quebec Act. They appreciated the treatment I have described here so well that when the American revolution came they stood side by side with their English compatriots and with the Indians and, with the help of the British navy and British soldiers, they defended this country successfully during the American revolution and during the war of 1812. This is unity. Who today tries to cause disunity?

The French and the English together made progress over the years. First there was Upper and Lower Canada. Then there was the province of Canada. Then we had confederation. Not 50 years after that the French and the English were found joining together to go to war when over 600,000 boys—yes and for the first time some women, too,—went abroad to defend freedom in the great struggle of 1914-1918. Some of them, both English and French, went to the help of their mother countries, and over 100,000 suffered casualties. But out of the ashes of that war came the treaty of Westminster. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this was a move made by Sir Robert Borden when he insisted on signing the treaty of Versailles, confirmed in 1932 by a Conservative government under R. B. Bennett.

I come now to the second world war of 1939-45. Here again the English and French fought side by side to defend their mother countries, England and to an even greater extent France, against the invasion of Hitler. A great many of these boys and girls of Canada, principally the young men, lie buried in the fields of France, and on one of these graves— I have not seen it—is an inscription of particular significance. A gentleman from Vancouver wrote to me that there is a monument to an unknown soldier on the Normandy beachhead with the following inscription on the stone: "The sons of William the Conquerer come back to claim his land". I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what greater unity could we have? Who is dividing this country today?

We have before us one of the most divisive issues which could be presented to parliament. Here in Canada we have a people whose stock is 44 per cent British, 30 per cent French and 23 per cent of other European origin. The Prime Minister has made use of two issues which, in my opinion, are most divisive. The commission on biculturalism and bilingualism was appointed to go across this country and, as far as I can see, it has only stirred up trouble. Now the right hon. gentleman has brought in a flag of his own choice.

I do not want to be critical of the Prime Minister, because we all make mistakes. Where is the man who has not make a mistake? I sympathize with him, Mr. Speaker, but I say this was simply a tragedy; this was the thing to disunite the people, not to unite them. Nothing the Prime Minister could have done could have caused more trouble; no way he could have gone about it could have caused more trouble. Then we ask ourselves, why did he do it? It has been said that it was an election promise. If it was an election promise three Toronto daily newspapers did not know anything about it, because they did not carry a single line about it in their advertisements. Not one newspaper mentioned it.

On Friday, May 15 the Prime Minister said "Well, we have 37 important measures to come before the house". But the flag was not included in them. On June 3, though, he announced that he had cut this to 18 items, and the flag made its appearance. Why? Did he have a mandate from the people? This is a Prime Minister with a minority government. I ask hon. members on the other side of the chamber, did he have a mandate? How could he have a mandate, when he had a minority government and only 42 per cent of the vote? It has now been shown, according to the newspaper reports, that nine provinces are against the Prime Minister's personal flag and only one province is for it. But, Mr. Speaker, I have had letters from the province of Quebec as well as designs.

Here is where I think the Prime Minister is making a fatal mistake in coming to the conclusion that the people of the province of Quebec want the flag he is personally proposing. I do not believe this is so, because not one of the designs I received nor one of the letters—and I received a goodly number—called for this flag. After speaking in this house previously I received several letters, most of them congratulatory. Even though they differed, and these people said they wanted a new flag, in my opinion the great majority of people in Canada are not in favour of the design proposed by the Prime Minister. This is my personal opinion, Mr. Speaker.

I say let us have a proper flag; let us have a flag that will be respected and accepted from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The dominion-provincial conference has been held in Charlottetown during the past few days. The other evening in the quietness of my office I thought what a wonderful thing it would have been if the Prime Minister of this country had presented the flag question to that meeting and had said, "You are going to change things. You are going to change the constitution. Let us get together now and work out the flag over the next two or three years", before 1967. Mr. Speaker, let us have a flag that every premier and the people in the provinces from the Atlantic to the Pacific will accept. Would it not have been a great thing if this had been done?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rynard: I do not think any members on the government side can disagree with that in their hearts and souls. I do not believe there is one hon. member opposite who would say this was not the proper course.

Now we are faced with this problem. The Prime Minister has introduced his personal flag. I say again that I have nothing against the Prime Minister in any way. I know it is a heavy load that any prime minister carries. However, contrary to all the rules of diplomacy he introduced his own flag. Did he consult the Leader of the Opposition or any of the other groups before he brought in this design? Not at all; he brought in his own flag.

In doing so, Mr. Speaker, there was no reference to the people at all, and no plebiscite. At the beginning the Prime Minister said there would not be a free vote; in other words, "If you do not vote for it you can go to the people". I say to you, Mr. Speaker, how in the world could the Prime Minister have gone about it in a more arrogant fashion than this?

Things have changed now, because nine out of ten provinces do not want a change or they want some other design. Le Devoir was very sympathetic last spring to the Prime Minister's flag; they were prepared to go along with him. Now the conclusion they have reached, as I gather from reading the articles that have appeared in this newspaper, is that they are fed up with the bumbling in connection with this issue; they do not want to go along with it any more. That is a very influential newspaper in the province of Quebec. They say "In May your ideas might not have been too bad, but in August your bumbling is too much".

I have stated that the correspondence and designs I have received in connection with the flag have led me to believe that the people of the province of Quebec have far better flags, far more acceptable flags which have been designed by the people of that province. Their designs are far more acceptable than that introduced by the Prime Minister. I feel rather sorry for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, because his charted course has floundered. Now he offers summit meetings and a free vote, but this is all too late. Perhaps this is his only way out. I want to place on the record an article which appeared in the Cape Breton Post. This is very apropos:

> Conservative M.P.'s are taking the right course on the flag issue, in stepping up their campaign in the House of Commons to persuade the government to refer the issue to a special parliamentary committee.
>
> The issue should have gone to a parliamentary committee in the first place, but it's not too late for this to be done as a means of breaking the deadlock on the flag debate.
> The Conservative tactics became evident Tuesday as the house plodded through the 14th sitting day of debate on the maple leaf flag resolution. Conservative after Conservative rose to press the point that a small all-party committee would cool off the steaming debate.
> The Conservative proposition is that a committee should be empowered to recommend a flag and have it approved by the house. If the committee failed to agree unanimously on a flag, the issue should be taken to the people in a national plebiscite.
>
> The prospect of a committee representing all groups in the Commons, arriving at an unanimous agreement on the flag does seem dim, but obviously such a committee should be the next step toward settling the issue.
>
> The next step thereafter quite conceivably would be or should be a national plebiscite, which previously was recommended by this newspaper as the sure way of the country reaching a firm decision on the design of Canada's new flag.
> All parties, including the Conservative party, appear to be agreed that a new flag is essential. It would be misleading to suppose that the Conservatives oppose the adoption of a new flag. The controversy on the issue revolves around a question of design.

I have said previously that the Prime Minister has my sympathy, because he is in about the worst mess possible. He said we cannot have a plebiscite on this issue. Why in the world can we not have a plebiscite? He has only to consider the action taken by previous Liberal leaders, who held plebiscites on issues that were just as emotional as this one; that were just as heart searching. I say to the Prime Minister that it is not too late for him to change his course. I suggest, in the interests of very important legislation that is waiting to be dealt with, that he get on with the job and get this work done. I had a newspaper clipping from the Daily Packet and Times which said "The reason he is not getting on with it is that he has not the legislation prepared".

Mr. Speaker, if that is true we should adjourn this house and allow the members to go home, and the ministers should get together and prepare legislation. Why should the Prime Minister keep everyone here when he has nothing for us to do? I suggest the problem is one for the government to solve, not for the opposition to solve. I say with all seriousness as a Canadian that it is my desire to have the flag issue settled in such a way that our national unity will continue in the spirit which existed following the capture of Quebec, as evidenced by the intermarriage and the intermingling of the two races on a firm footing. These two peoples lived in complete unity of purpose and have defended this country over the years. They were faced with a war within a short period of our historic union, and won.

Mr. Speaker, in the interests of preserving that great unity I suggest to the Prime Minister that he allow a committee to commence its deliberations in respect of the flag issue. Let us adjourn this house until that committee has found a solution, or until the government has prepared other legislation. Over and over again it has been proved that the government does not now have legislation ready. Mr. Speaker, I think we can resolve the present difficulties with which we are faced. Whenever people get into trouble I always remember that poem which states:

> One ship drives east and another drives west
> By the self-same winds that blow,
> 'Tis the set of the sails and not the gales
> Which determines the way we go.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those members who have been somewhat reluctant to participate in this debate. I consider this to be one of the greatest debates this house has had for many years, and perhaps we will not have another as great for some years. I am not apologetic in any way for rising to contribute in my small way those words I feel are essential at this time. Despite the fact that government members, and perhaps some members of the opposition, have not contributed to it, I think in years to come students will regard this debate as part of the history of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have been reluctant to speak because I felt, as perhaps the Prime Minister did, that a new flag might be essential to the unity of this country. I still feel that there is a possible solution to our problem, and I am not prepared to accept the idea advanced by those individuals who are ready to separate from the rest of Canada. I am not ready to accept the idea that a part of Canada, which I believe is part of my nation, should become a separate entity. I think those individuals who feel that part of Quebec, or Quebec itself, should separate from the rest of Canada are wrong, and I will do everything in my power to protect and defend my country, of which I believe Quebec is a part.

Mr. Speaker, I am not happy about what is happening in the province of Quebec, but I do not believe that those people in Quebec, who are deeply disturbed by the present situation, wish to be embroiled in this question. I have hesitated to take part in this debate because I am neither of Anglo-Saxon nor French Canadian origin. My father came from Poland and, although my mother was born in Canada, her parents were of Ukrainian origin. I often refer to myself in a jocular way as a half-breed, but at the same time I feel very strongly that I am a Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I heard someone on the opposite side say "Hear, hear." I am very puzzled, and have been puzzled over the years, because of a question asked during the taking of the census. Most people in this country wish to be labelled and considered as Canadians.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, again I hear a member say "Hear, hear". We all want to be remembered as Canadians. I should like to remind those members on the opposite side that there is another problem inherent in that problem we are now discussing. We must decide whether we wish to be Canadians, or to be Polish Canadians, Ukrainian Canadians, Yugoslav Canadians, or Canadians of many other ethnic origins.

An hon. Member: Or French Canadians.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, behind the main problem there is another problem which is difficult to isolate. I want to co-operate with all Canadians, but I expect in turn that they will co-operate with me. I should like to know why, during a census taking, some Canadians were labelled as French Canadians, for example. If an individual wishes to be identified as something other than just a Canadian I would agree to that designation, but I should like to know why those of us who wish to be Canadians must disclose our racial background.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure my leader is aware of my position. I felt perhaps the establishment of a distinctive Canadian flag would lend itself to national unity.

Mr. Benidickson: Would not this distinctive flag help?

Mr. Korchinski: I do not know what distinctive flag would help create national unity, but I am sure that the flag your government has proposed is not accomplishing that which you intended.

Mr. Speaker, I have been very reluctant until this stage of the debate to say anything, because I honestly felt that perhaps at some time during this great debate something would be suggested that would be accepted by all parties. Unfortunately no suggestion has been put forward which is acceptable to all parties. There have been many suggestions put forward by the official opposition, and only by the official opposition, but none has been mutually acceptable. If this proposed flag is not mutually acceptable in this House of Commons, how could it possibly be mutually acceptable throughout Canada? I suggest to those members who have been pressing this flag issue that they should take stock of the situation at this stage.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that we in the opposition are not debating this flag issue because we love to stay here all summer. Do not think for one moment that we are not jeopardizing our own position if we are taking the wrong course, but think what you are going to do to Canada. As I said, I have been very reluctant to participate in this debate because I was perhaps not convinced as readily as some. I too felt that there might have been some in between measure we could take. I still believe that today. But there is only one group that can do something about the matter, and that is the government. We are not the ones who are responsible for taking action in the House of Commons; it is the government.

The leaders of all parties are meeting. The debate going on in the House of Commons is the frontispiece, if you like. Behind it are the discussions that are being held between the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the past leader of the Social Credit party, the leader of the New Democratic party and the leader of the Creditistes. I have referred to the past leader of the Social Credit party for the simple reason that he is stumbling over himself in his hurry to get over to the other side of the house and have them accept him. Let us not fool around about that.

We have been told that this debate is a filibuster, but so many strange statements have been made by the past leader of that party that it is disgusting. In fact he has reached the point that he does not even know whether he wants the Social Credit nomination in his own riding. He wants the Liberal nomination. We might as well accept that fact, and the people of Canada might as well know it.

I am one of those who believe that a two party system is the most effective parliamentary system that can be devised. I do not believe for one moment that a third party is necessary, nor do I believe that you add to the effectiveness of the system by adopting another name. You simply have a special label and that is all. However, I am sure the Liberal party of today can accept many of the ideas and ideologies expressed by the Creditiste group, the Social Credit group or the New Democratic group, and I am sure that many of us in the Conservative group are also quite prepared to accept many of their ideas. We have done this in the past. This has nothing to do with the issue today.

Mr. Deschatelets: Is your leader ready to do so?

An hon. Member: Your leader is not ready.

Mr. Korchinski: The two members who sit behind me will substantiate that he was ready to accept them because some of their ideas represent ideas in which he believes.

Mr. Thompson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is a subamendment before the house. Should we not be speaking to the subamendment?

Mr. Korchinski: I am sure what I am suggesting is unity. I am suggesting that the past Social Credit leader should unite with the Liberal party. That is exactly where he is headed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member could direct himself to the subamendment.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree with me that what we want in this country is unity, and there cannot be unity if we are going to divide ourselves in the House of Commons in such a way that the people of the country do not know where they are being led. How can the country be led by minority groups, large or small; and if the leader of one of those groups is going to deviate where is the country headed?

I want to turn again to the subamendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Korchinski: Again I say that if at this moment the leader of the Social Credit group were to suggest that he was going to walk across to the government side, they would accept him and members on that side would not even interrupt me. The point is that we in Canada are going through a quiet struggle, a struggle that it is difficult for people to understand. It is difficult for me as a private member to understand. I should like to see the man who can show us the answer to this dilemma. I should like to see that man, because I do not believe the past leader of the Social Credit party is the man who will show us how it is to be done. There are those who want to call themselves French Canadians. We have no problem with them, but they have a problem within themselves.

An hon. Member: You have a problem over there.

Mr. Korchinski: That is true. We have a problem.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Like the Ukrainians in Europe.

Mr. Korchinski: I say that I do not want to be labelled as a Ukrainian, nor do I want to be labelled as a Pole. I want to be labelled as a Canadian. I do not know the constituency of the hon. member who interjected, but if somebody will remind me of it I will put it on record.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): It is a good French name.

Mr. Korchinski: The point is that I want to be a Canadian, and the sooner all of us want to be Canadians the sooner we will get to the root of the problem. Why do you want to be called French Canadians when it comes to the census but want to be labelled as Canadians when it comes to a flag? I ask that question. On the one hand you want to be labelled as a separate French Canadian group, and on the other hand you want to be labelled as Canadians.

May I say I have some very good friends among the French speaking members. I am looking at the Minister without Portfolio. I am sure he will agree that I have discussed with him the question of how we could get at the root of the problem.

Mr. Benidickson: By a Canadian flag.

Mr. Korchinski: Why do they want special consideration on the one hand, and on the other hand do not want to be recognized as a separate group? Why do we want two flags? What are we supposed to ask for in this debate? I am asking today, what do we want? What does the government want? After we finish this debate what will we be in the midst of then? We will be in the midst of another debate which will be a contradiction of what the government are trying to do today. They are going to say to us that the union jack is all right in certain cases. What hypocrisy. You do not believe it. Why do you try to shove it down the throats of Canadians? I do not know what is behind the whole thing, and personally I do not think the Liberal party is behind this flag proposal. I do not think the cabinet is behind it. The only one who is behind it is the Prime Minister. This is the problem. I have a quotation here from Shakespeare.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Korchinski: Sure I will read it. It might be a lot easier to take than my words: I refer to Julius Caesar, act one, scene two:

> Caesar. Let me have men about me that are fat; Sleek-headed men and such as sleep o'nights. Yon Cassius has a lean and hungry look; He thinks too much: such men are dangerous.
> Antony. Fear him not, Caesar, he's not dangerous; He is a noble Roman, and well given.
> Caesar. Would he were fatter! But I fear him not;
> Yet if my name were liable to fear,
> I do not know the man I should avoid
> So soon as that spare Cassius. He reads much;
> He is a great observer, and he looks
> Quite through the deeds of men; he loves no plays,
> As thou dost, Antony; he hears no music;
> Seldom he smiles, and smiles in such a sort
> As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit
> That could be moved to smile at any thing.
> Such men as he be never at heart's ease
> Whiles they behold a greater than themselves—

I am suggesting at the moment, Mr. Speaker, that this is what the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister alone has done. He has thought to himself, for what am I going to be remembered. He said to himself well, the Leader of the Opposition was prime minister and he is going to be remembered for the bill of rights. For what am I to be remembered? He said, I am going to be remembered for the flag. He talked to a few of his colleagues in the cabinet. I stand to be corrected on this, but I understand it was suggested at one time that there were only a few, select members of his cabinet who were going to choose a design for the flag.

An hon. Member: Well, be corrected, then.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Korchinski: I suggested that I wanted to be fair about this.

An hon. Member: Who told you that?

Mr. Korchinski: I read it in the Liberal press. I am suggesting that this country is being divided, and it is being divided not by the Liberal party, not by the Liberal cabinet, not by anybody except one man. This one man wants to immortalize the name of Pearson. He wants—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I recall to the hon. member that we are discussing how to conduct a plebiscite and what we should do with the results, whether they should be published in one way or the other. This is really the subamendment.

Mr. Korchinski: I should like to bow to your wishes, Mr. Speaker. I certainly do not want to divide—

Mr. Speaker: I think all the members in the house must realize that a great deal of leniency has been given to the hon. member. I do not see where it is in order for an hon. member to indulge in a personal vendetta against any particular member, no matter what his official position may be. We are discussing the subamendment and under the heading "national unity" there is wide scope.

Mr. Korchinski: I am suggesting that a division is being created in this country, and it is being created by only one individual. I do not know how to skirt around this problem without referring to the particular individual. If I may refer to him as an hon. member, then I will do that. I do believe I am discussing unity at this particular moment. I do not want to deviate from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, or anything of the sort. However, I do want to be able to discuss unity. I have already suggested it is not the Liberal party that is dividing this country. I have suggested it is not the cabinet that is dividing this country. I am suggesting that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Korchinski: I am suggesting that we can find unity only by avoiding one man's ambitions. This man is ambitious. I am suggesting to the members of the government and to government supporters that this man is dangerous to you. You are going to lose your seats because of this man's attitude.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Korchinski: Well, if it is all right for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to suggest it is dangerous for the Conservative party to have a certain leader, I am sure it must be all right for me to make the same suggestion to the Liberals.

Where are we heading? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, where we are heading. I have a letter here, and I do not mind telling hon. members that I did not receive very many letters concerning this problem. This is one of the reasons I have not participated in this debate heretofore. I have a letter here from which I am going to quote very briefly. This letter is from one of my constituents, a French Canadian if you want to use that hyphenated name. She is Mrs. Roland Bosse from Perigord, Saskatchewan, which is a French community. I receive a great reception when I go there. Let me tell the members of the government what they are doing.

Mr. Rouleau: Is the letter in French or English?

Mr. Korchinski: Let me tell the hon. member what she says about the flag:

> I'm sending you three letters that I cut out from "The Western Producers, The Young Co-Ops' Page", and they express my feelings better than I can express them myself.

I am just going to quote this letter. I am sure she did not want to hurt my feelings, and I do not want to offend her in any way:

> Canada, O Canada
> "United we stand; divided we fall." This is an old saying that historians often use in reference to the fall of a country. Does this hold true today? We are faced with the division of our country today, and most of us realize this. All over this large country of ours a team to study bilingualism and biculturalism has been set up, headed by André Laurendeau and Davidson Dunton. Exchange students are being sent to Quebec and vice-versa.
> The new flag has raised the question of further split. I am sure all of us would be content with the old flag if the new one had to be brought in at the expense of a division in our country. If we all work for the interest of the country I am sure a division can be prevented.

Now, this expresses her sentiments, and I underline the fact that it expresses my sentiments. I do not want a division in this country. I believe that Quebec is part of Saskatchewan, if you want to look at it that way. I believe I have an interest in that province. I have tried my utmost to understand the situation. I believe that today the Prime Minister is going headlong into something, and he does not know where it is going to end. If he wants to immortalize his name he will do so in one way, and that will be as the man who divided this country.

This is not going to be a laughing matter when it happens. I do not regard this as something funny. My parents came to this country because it had a future, and they would not want to see a division in this country. If you think it is a silly matter, then you do not respect the historical background of our flag. Let us not forget that right today Britain does not want to allow Southern Rhodesia its independence until such time as freedom and free speech for all its people are guaranteed within its confines. This is what that country stands for. This is what my people came to; this is what we want, and this is what I want. Do you not want it?

I heard overtures from the Social Credit party suggesting we should propose closure, and the hon. member who sits behind a former leader of the Social Credit group suggested he would be willing to impose closure. Is this what this new flag is going to represent—lack of freedom of speech? This is not what my people want; this is not what I want. I am sure this is not what government members want.

Mr. Deschatelets: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Korchinski: I am speaking for myself and I hope I speak for a lot more people when I speak for freedom of speech. Is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) suggesting for one moment that freedom of speech is not important?

Mr. Deschatelets: I said speak for yourself.
