The house met at 2 p.m.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALES TO POLAND AND BULGARIA

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian wheat board is announcing in Winnipeg today that it has negotiated contracts for the sale of approximately 200,000 metric tons of wheat for shipment to Poland and 50,000 metric tons of wheat for shipment to Bulgaria. The sale to Poland, totalling about 7,400,000 bushels, is for shipment during the period August to November, 1964. This is the third sale made to Poland under the provisions of the long term agreement signed on November 5, 1963, and represents a preshipment of part of the wheat Poland has agreed to buy during the second year of the three year agreement.

The sale to Bulgaria, totalling about 1,800,000 bushels, is for shipment during the period August to October, 1964. This also is the third sale made to Bulgaria under the provisions of the long term agreement signed on October 8, 1963, and completes the quantities Bulgaria has agreed to buy during the first year of the three year agreement. The credit terms remain as previously announced.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In view of the statement he made a moment ago, could the minister tell us whether efforts similar to those made to dispose of western wheat are being made to sell the products of eastern farmers and, if so, what are those efforts?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Trade and Commerce has the responsibility for promoting the export sale of products in all parts of the country. This, I think, we do with some success. If the hon. gentleman has some export product he would like to promote, my department would be very happy to listen to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, again to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Even though there are no specific products I would care to mention at this time, could the minister not put on his list of exports the products which eastern farmers have in abundance and cannot dispose of due to a lack of outlets?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position now to advise as to the present situation in regard to the Cyprus United Nations forces? Are additional powers to be secured to enable the forces to go anywhere on the island with the exception of government buildings and, furthermore, to enable them to disarm the local population where the United Nations commanders feel it is necessary so to do in the interests of preserving peace?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday there is to be a meeting of the secretary general and representatives of the contributing powers in New York today. The meeting is scheduled for four o'clock this afternoon and I would have to wait until that meeting is over, either today, or tomorrow, if it continues. In any event, I would simply repeat that so far as any extension of powers is concerned this is a matter, of course, that can only be determined by the security council. After that body reaches a decision it would then be a matter for agreement between the secretary general, on behalf of the organization, and the government of Cyprus.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has there been any indication on the part of Archbishop Makarios that he would accept an increase in those powers? I ask that question in view of an editorial that appeared in the Manchester Guardian of August 12 which reads in part as follows:

> —there is no longer any reason for maintaining the United Nations force in Cyprus in its present impossible position. President Makarios should be told bluntly that if the United Nations forces are to do their job properly—

It goes on to say that they must be allowed these extra powers. Has there been any indication in any way that he is prepared to permit an increase in the powers?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, he has already replied, of course, to the secretary general with regard to freedom of movement. Beyond that there has been no reaction, that I am aware of, concerning the attitude he would take with regard to extending the powers of the force. I saw the editorial and I might say I would doubt that was the way to achieve the objective we all have in mind.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are any representations being made to Archbishop Makarios by the secretary general of the United Nations or by the minister himself as to removing the provisos which are contained in his letter with regard to his willingness to grant freedom of movement to the United Nations forces? I refer particularly to the proviso that the United Nations forces may only go into certain restricted areas after consultation between the government of Cyprus and the commander in chief of the United Nations forces. It is perfectly apparent that during the period of negotiation between the commander in chief and the government of Cyprus, troops and supplies could be unloaded and there would be little value in investigating after that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this, of course, is one of the very subject matters of the meeting today; but I have been advised that, notwithstanding the reservation made by the head of the government of Cyprus, General Thimayya has in no instance been refused access to those areas that the government of Cyprus have in their recent communications regarded as secret places.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. Were the United Nations forces not precluded from entering the Limassol area and other points of disembarkation? Is this ban to be lifted by the government of Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I expect this will be one of the matters discussed today.

[Later:]

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence. Is it correct, as reported on the radio news today, that a new contingent of Canadian peace keeping troops has left this country for Cyprus?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): A very small contingent did leave this morning; it is really integral with the units which are already there.

CONGO—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO MAINTAIN STABLE GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the situation in the Congo. In view of the fact that the governments of Belgium and the United States have taken definite action to provide assistance to the government of the Congo for the development of stability in that country, has the Canadian government made any decision regarding assistance in a similar fashion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada took a decision to join in contributions to a special Congo fund. Our contribution this year will be in the neighbourhood of $500,000. This was an earlier contribution, but beyond this we have not gone. I should point out that in relation to other countries this was a generous contribution.

RECOGNITION OF QUEBEC DELEGATION IN PARIS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

In view of the fact that, if I am not mistaken, the right hon. Prime Minister once stated with much sympathy that "Quebec had the same right to be in Paris as the other provinces to be in London", could the Secretary of State for External Affairs now say whether the Quebec delegation in Paris will have the same privileges which are granted to general consulates?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that question is based on a statement made the other day by Mr. Lussier. I had the opportunity to read in yesterday's Le Devoir the report dealing with that statement by Mr. Lussier, Quebec general delegate in Paris. That matter has been under consideration for some time and our ambassador in Paris has already begun considering it with the French authorities. I hope, in the near future, to be in a position to announce that a solution consistent with the needs of the Quebec general delegation in Paris and with our excellent relations with France, was found to that problem.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I think this question should be directed to the Prime Minister since it covers at least two departments. It has to do with evidence given yesterday before a United States Senate committee by Secretary Udall in connection with the Passamaquoddy-Saint John river power project. According to newspaper reports this evidence is to the effect that Canadian officials should be encouraged by the new report.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to say if the government has conducted negotiations or at the present moment is engaged in consultations with the United States on this project? Has the government had the report from the committee now sitting in Washington to which reference was made by Mr. Udall? Is the government giving sympathetic consideration to this question on the basis not only of the report to congress but the examination being made by Canadian fisheries officials?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There is at present an examination going on by Canadian officials and technicians as to the feasibility of this project. There have been no discussions with the United States on this matter recently, and there will not likely be until this examination is completed. I saw the report of Secretary Udall to which my right hon. friend refers and, like him, I would be very much encouraged by that report if it turns out to be accurate in the light of engineering and technical examination. We are making inquiries on this report to see if we can get the evidence on which it was based.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And would the Prime Minister, having secured that report, make a statement to the house during the next few days in this regard?

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to make a statement, Mr. Speaker, as soon as we get that information.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION BY ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked the Prime Minister a question concerning some doubts that had been raised about the participation of the province of Alberta in the student loan fund, and he indicated at that time that he would be seeing the premier of the province. I understand that has happened, and I ask if he can clarify or remove these doubts with regard to this particular subject.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did have a conference with the premier of Alberta yesterday. He did not raise this subject at all; therefore in a sense that is a clarification.

COMBINES

DELAY IN ACTION ON REPORTS OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. My question relates not only to the recent report of the restrictive trade practices commission concerning collusion by Ontario road surfacing contractors but to the fact that there is a growing list of such reports upon which the Department of Justice has taken no action. Will the minister undertake to make a statement to the house soon concerning these several recommendations of the commission?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, subject to my mentioning now that these reports are presently under consideration to ascertain what, if any, action ought to be taken in furtherance thereof.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT METHOD AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the subject of finding a way in which to amend the Canadian constitution in Canada been placed on the agenda for the meeting of the federal government with the provinces in Charlottetown early in September; and can the Prime Minister tell us anything further with regard to this matter at this time?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already announced that this is a matter which will be discussed at Charlottetown at the federal-provincial meeting, although that meeting will be primarily ceremonial in character to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the Charlottetown conference. This is the only matter on the agenda at the moment, and it will be discussed there.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, if agreement is reached to arrange for the constitution to be amended in Canada, will the necessary enactment be made in another country or will it be made in Canada as a sign of our sovereignty.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will have to be made in the proper constitutional way. I would like to look into the matter to find out what that way is, and perhaps I could say something about it tomorrow.

TRADE

JAPAN—CONTROL OF FABRIC EXPORTS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, depending on which minister is in charge of the negotiations I have in mind. Can the minister now inform the house on the results of negotiations with the government of Japan relating to their exports of certain classes of textiles to Canada?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had a similar question the other day and I promised to give a statement to the house as soon as I was in a position to do so. I am not yet in a position to do so.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question. Could the minister tell the house whether the government of Japan have informed the Canadian government that they cannot enforce a formal agreed quota in this regard, but that they will not allow their exports to rise beyond 20 per cent above last year's figure?

Mr. Gordon: I will make a full statement on this matter at the beginning of the week, if I possibly can.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I wonder whether the Minister of Labour is now in a position to answer a question I put to his parliamentary secretary on Tuesday regarding the transfer of the national employment service from the unemployment insurance commission to the Department of Labour.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes. The transfer will be effected just as soon as a parliamentary decision is taken on an item in the supplementary estimates which will provide legal authority for such a transfer.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—EMPLOYMENT OF SOCIAL WELFARE RECIPIENTS ON WINTER WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour regarding the winter works incentive program and the recent decision of the government of British Columbia. In the letter which has been sent to all municipalities in British Columbia, of which the minister has a copy, there is a sentence which says that "the provincial share of the winter works incentive program will be directed solely toward helping those people who have been unemployed and on social assistance for a period of three months or more."

Does this mean that no winter works programs will be approved unless the persons employed thereon have been three months or more on social aid, or does it mean that the provincial and federal governments will have a different sharing arrangement in the programs where there are other persons employed who have not been on social aid for three months or more?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I read that particular sentence and the same question occurred to me. I think it is somewhat ambiguous. I do not know whether the second part of the sentence is intended to include a different category or whether the second part of the sentence is related to the unemployed. I am not sure on that point, but in any case the programs put forward for federal participation are provincially approved, and the type of program hitherto has been a matter for provincial decision. We as the federal government have made no alteration whatsoever in the regulations governing the programs. We have, as my hon. friend realizes, always asked that preference be given to the unemployed in the matter of hirings, and this would include persons in receipt of unemployment insurance and also those in receipt of unemployment assistance.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Could the minister get some clarification of this matter, because I should like to know whether persons who are in receipt of unemployment insurance rather than those on welfare will be employed. Does this preclude a municipality from benefiting under the winter works incentive program unless social welfare recipients are employed? A great many are concerned on this point.

Mr. MacEachen: The federal government naturally will provide 50 per cent of the direct payroll costs without strings attached, as we have in the past. In British Columbia they have had a graduated system of bringing the provincial participation up to 100 per cent of direct payroll costs. I will be glad to try to get clarification of this point, because we will need clarification from our own point of view.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question. Is any proviso or condition imposed by the provincial governments precluding municipalities from benefiting from the arrangement by which 50 per cent of the payroll cost is paid by the federal government?

Mr. MacEachen: Except that these projects, as I understand it, must be approved and submitted on behalf of the municipalities through provincial governments. In other words the first stage of approval is provincial approval, and then it comes through the federal government. In that sense, of course, these projects are a matter for provincial decision.

Mr. Douglas: Could I ask the minister whether that would still be true even if the provinces were to impose impossible conditions?

Mr. MacEachen: That is something we would have to consider, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Barnett: My question has already been asked and answered, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the poor salmon, lobster and cod fisheries in Newfoundland to date this year, would the minister advise whether his department would consider assisting our fishermen in the same way that assistance has been given to our farmers when they have experienced crop failures?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): While the lobster catch in Newfoundland this year may have been slightly below the average, the figures for the salmon season have not yet been fully compiled and I would not wish to comment before we have the final results. It is true that the cod fishery has not started very well, but my information is that in recent days it has shown an encouraging improvement, and my department would not be justified in considering any type of direct assistance before the final figures for the season are known.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works and ask him whether the air conditioning in this chamber has been cut off in the hope that this will have the effect of shortening the Conservative filibuster on the flag.

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): I will take the question as notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice

when I may expect an answer to my question No. 1,494 dealing with alleged wire tapping by the R.C.M.P. in Toronto, which was placed on the order paper a month ago.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): The answer has been prepared, and it will be made available to the hon. member the next time questions are called.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING INTEGRATION OF SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister any explanation to give to the house concerning his recently reported statement to the effect that his plans for the integration of the armed services cannot be implemented within two years but will be delayed indefinitely?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Yes. It was an inaccurate quotation. The Canadian Press inaccurately reported what I said. I believe they have sent out a "kill" on that story and issued the correct story.

Mr. Churchill: Could we have the correct story here, instead of being dependant on the press; because we like to hear from the minister?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not like to be repetitious, bearing in mind the rules of this house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I think the house would excuse the hon. gentleman being repetitious. This is information to which we are entitled. The view has been expressed and widely disseminated that he said integration would not be completed within two years but would take a very considerably longer period. What did the minister say? Let him tell us so that we do not have to depend on the uncertainties of the press.

Mr. Hellyer: I will send my right hon. friend a transcript of the entire broadcast.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say to my hon. friend that my time would be much better spent otherwise.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I must say that I find this announcement by the Minister of National Defence, but with the minister refusing to give the house what he has given to the press, amounts to a denial of the rights of hon. members of this house. This matter affects us directly, and I do not think these statements should be given to us through any leaky bucket.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I have already said—and if I did not make it clear I will do so now—that there was no new information in the broadcast, and that what appeared to be new information was an incorrect report.

INQUIRY AS TO RECOVERY OF STOLEN ARMS AND AMMUNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of the fact that activities are now being carried on in Montreal by some young people claiming to be members of the reborn F.L.Q. I would ask the minister whether he is now prepared to answer the question I asked him on May 7 as to whether all the arms which were recovered are in fact the total amount of arms stolen from the armouries in Montreal earlier this year.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question from memory. I think practically all of them were recovered, but I will take the question as notice and give my hon. friend a precise answer tomorrow.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Could the Minister of Justice inform the house whether in his view alien influences are behind the activities of these individuals in question?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would have to take this question as notice.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY FOR PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence in regard to the urgency of the situation of prevailing rate employees at the Dana R.C.A.F. station. Is he in a position to answer the question I asked the Minister of National Defence yesterday?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as there are prevailing rate employees in departments other than the Department of National Defence I have referred the question to my colleague the President of the Privy Council.

REPAIRS TO NAVAL SHIP SOLD TO TORONTO GROUP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked on whose authority work was being carried out on the former H.M.C.S. ship Haida at Halifax dockyard. The answer, Mr. Speaker, is on the authority of the Minister of National Defence. The work involved the return to the ship of various articles of furniture and equipment, which were removed at the time Haida was taken out of service, for the purpose of restoring it to world war II fighting appearance. All items placed on board are surplus to Royal Canadian Navy requirements.

Haida was purchased by a group of public spirited Canadians who intend to maintain the ship as a national monument in the city of Toronto, and the Department of National Defence in these circumstances was happy to lend every possible assistance.

I am informed that the estimated cost of returning the equipment on board Haida was in the order of $1,600.

PENSIONS OF PERMANENT STAFF COMPULSORILY RETIRED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I would ask him whether it is correct that military personnel on permanent staff—I am referring only to permanent staff individuals—are being asked to retire prior to reaching their normal retirement age; and if so, are they being penalized by being asked to accept reduced pensions as a result?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as has already been announced there will be a number of involuntary retirements in advance of the normal compulsory retirement age. These will be effected during the months that lie ahead. There are special cash benefits to whose who are so retired, and in addition the normal penalty in respect of pension benefit has been waived. This will apply to all those who are compulsorily retired between now and a year from next May.

PROVISION OF NUCLEAR MISSILES TO CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is the situation unchanged in Canada's defence preparations, namely that no nuclear arms have been provided for the Voodoo planes in Canada, no nuclear missiles for the Honest John battery with the Canadian brigade in Europe, and that most of the Canadian F-104 airplanes in Europe are not equipped with either nuclear or conventional weapons?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have had no notice of this question, but from memory I can say that the Bomarc missiles have been armed; the F-104 squadrons in the strike role—six squadrons, two wings in Germany—are operational; the Voodoo aircraft have not yet been armed with nuclear missiles. I am afraid I cannot give an answer as of this date with respect to the Honest John, although the missiles were not available the last time I made a check.

NEGOTIATIONS TO WITHDRAW FROM NUCLEAR DEFENCE ROLE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what negotiations are in progress with respect to Canada withdrawing entirely from her nuclear role, as promised a year and a half ago by the Prime Minister.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I can answer that question any better—

Mr. Churchill: Any better than you did before—and you didn't answer then.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —than I answered it some time ago. I would ask my hon. friend to look at the answer I gave several weeks ago.

Mr. Churchill: I did look at that answer, and it was a very evasive one. The minister did not have any notice then, either, and was taken by surprise. I understand there are no negotiations whatsoever going on with regard to Canada's withdrawal from the nuclear role. Is that correct?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot be responsible for my hon. friend's understanding; but I believe he will want to look at the reply, and if he is not satisfied with it I will be glad to take this question as notice. I am sure that he, more than most members of this house, would agree there are some questions that are so important that they should be asked only on the understanding that notice is given.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is this not one of the most important problems that face the government of the day, in view of the promise that was made such a long time ago and in view of the international tension that prevails?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree it is one of those questions, and that is why it should not be put so cavalierly by way of a question without notice.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO MAPLE SYRUP PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry and "rural development". Could he tell the house whether he received favourable replies to the letters he sent to the minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec in regard to the assistance to be provided to the maple sugar and maple syrup producers who have been requesting such assistance because of last spring's crop failure?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture has written to Hon. Alcide Courcy, minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec, but I do not know whether or not an answer was received.

[Text]

PREVENTION OF SPECULATION IN FEED GRAIN FOR EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who was shocked that the Minister of Forestry took some holidays but who chose to do the same, I would like to ask the Minister of Forestry what are the steps he intends to take in order to prevent speculation on feed grain to be supplied principally to eastern farmers?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the measures which were announced last year, as well as that which I announced some weeks ago, will prevent this possible speculation.

[Text]

ARDA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SURVEY IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry.

In view of the success of the survey conducted by his department jointly with the Quebec department of agriculture with regard to ARDA, is the minister in a position to state that his department will soon undertake, again in conjunction with the provincial department, a similar survey in the Saguenay-Lake St. John district, in order to find solutions to existing problems?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to the report tabled in the house a month ago by the Minister of Agriculture.

As far as I know it has not been decided to proceed with this type of survey for the moment.

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry.

Can he tell us whether he will talk to the Minister of Agriculture about the possibility of publishing the report also in French?

Mr. Sauvé: This report is now at the bureau for translations and I hope that it will be tabled in French in the near future.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry.

Could he tell us whether he intends to bring pressure to bear on his colleagues so that the survey will cover the other areas where problems cry for a solution? I am thinking, of course, of the Saguenay-Lake St. John area where a study like the one carried out in Gaspé is needed.

Does the minister propose to act along that line?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the survey mentioned by the hon. member was a pilot study. We are considering the possibility of continuing along that line but no decision has been taken as yet.

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED LOCATION OF NEW WOMEN'S PRISON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the many representations which have been received in regard to retaining the women's prison at Kingston, where it is adjacent to research and rehabilitation services, would the minister assure the house that no decision is being made to move the prison from that area?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have already said that the matter was still open and that no formal or final decision had been taken.

SPORTS

OLYMPIC GAMES—EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the announcement that the hon. member for York West will officially represent Canada at the Olympic games in Tokyo later this year, will the minister inform the house whether his expenses will be included in the sum of $122,905 provided by her department for sending Canadian athletes to Tokyo in October?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will go in my place as representative of the government, and the cost of his visit will be part of my ministerial expenses.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—MEETING RESPECTING MONOPOLY OF TAXI SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. On page 5 of the metro edition of this morning's Toronto Globe and Mail there is a report that the president of Air Terminal Transport Limited of Malton intends to meet officials of the Toronto taxi industry as requested by the Minister of Transport. The report continues that the president hinted he would not help the Toronto taxi industry at this meeting. Is this the spirit in which the Minister of Transport desires the meeting to be held?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I feel quite sure that it would be the hope of the Minister of Transport that any such meeting would be conducted in a spirit of complete co-operation.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise this matter at 10.30 tonight.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—APPEARANCE BEFORE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader what arrangements he has made with the Minister of Labour and the chairman of the industrial relations committee to carry out what is in effect an undertaking by the trustees to appear before this parliamentary committee, and the undertaking by the Minister of Labour that this meeting would be proceeded with.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Wednesday, August 12, consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in concluding the remarks which I began yesterday. I would like to summarize what I said. I have no intention of trying to prolong this debate, but I would like to look back on what I said. It is very seldom that a member of this house has the chance to read over what he said the previous evening. However, I would like to restate my basic position as an individual and as a member who I think can speak for a fair number of his constituents. I object to the way the flag problem has been brought in; I object to the design; I object to the way we have been told "Accept it or have it shoved down your throat."

Before two o'clock I met a group of young people travelling through Canada; I rushed down to the court house to watch some new Canadians receiving their citizenship. These people who became Canadians today at 3.30 are just as good Canadians as I am, because the number of generations does not mean anything. What in the world have we got today? Why would the government bring up something that is going to split the nation wide open? I did not believe what my grandfather told me and I do not expect my grandsons to believe the prejudices I teach them, because they would be awfully stupid boys if they did. All right. We are one country. Let us face it. We have enough segregation today. We have it right across the country. There has to be a little compromise. If the Canadian people want a new flag, as a Canadian I say yes; but you show me which flag they want.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clancy: I am not asking you. I know you fellows are in the position where you are going to do it.

Mr. Grafftey: Under compulsion in some cases.

Mr. Clancy: You are going to shove it down our throats. All I want is to be able to say to my people that I have put up my argument and have said what I think about it. I am not going to hold up the business of the house over an issue which is a disgrace to the Prime Minister. You cannot do this if you want unity. I want that fellow who became a citizen at three o'clock today to be as proud of this country as I am, and you will only do it by—

An hon. Member: The maple leaf.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I heard a member down at that end say to his leader "We can make some political hay out of this, all right." We are Canadians. Let us be Canadians first, last and always. If you split us now it will take 30 years to get us back together again. You will have to start another war, and nobody wants that war.

Mr. Douglas: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the last speaker waved his arms toward this end of the house and said that some member down here had said to his leader, "We can make political hay out of this". He did not name the party. There are three parties in this corner of the house, and I want to make it perfectly clear that he was not referring to the New Democratic party.

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the flag resolution submitted to the house by the Prime Minister and on the amendment now before us proposed by my leader, the Leader of the Opposition, I continue to be impressed by the wisdom of the amendment. It calls for reference of the question of an official national flag to the people of Canada by way of a plebiscite. I am impressed by its language. It is my opinion that its basic premise is very proper and very much justified, and its recommendation of appropriate action deserves and should have the utmost consideration by every member of the house.

In order that the amendment will be fresh in my mind, and I hope other hon. members feel likewise, I should like to quote it since in my opinion there are various aspects which require careful and thoughtful consideration. So, Mr. Speaker, the amendment reads as follows:

> As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect—

I draw the attention of hon. members to the words "will affect".

> —the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag.

There surely is no difference of opinion in this chamber with respect to the fact that the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I say this most advisedly, that it will adversely affect the unity of Canada. I assert here and now that it is not possible to affect the unity of Canada adversely without having the destiny of Canada adversely affected as well.

I come now to the question of the plebiscite itself. Before proceeding to discuss this phase of the matter I submit that the many assertions made in this chamber and elsewhere that we do not have a distinctive Canadian flag at the present time do not stand the test of careful examination. In this connection I would ask the house to note that it is not what I say but it is what the order in council says, and the order in council of 1945 sets out the authority.

It is a well known principle of law that usage, consent and possession over the years bring about a degree of moral and even legal claim. Twenty years is the period with regard to the law of ownership by possession. We have had this order in council in effect since 1945, 19 years, and we find that in that same order in council the year 1924 was mentioned as well. So we have the order in council of 1945 authorizing the use of the Canadian red ensign and using the words "wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag". It places the label "distinctive" upon the Canadian red ensign without any question. There is no doubt about it.

But this government is not prepared to take the judgment of Right Hon. Mackenzie King, the leader of the Liberal party in 1945 and the leader of this country for many years. They are not willing to accept that. They say we have no distinctive flag, and with that I do not agree. I might also refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North last night who quoted from Hansard of 1904, 60 years ago, to show that at that time they were talking about the Canadian red ensign flying from the flagpole on top of this building. Yet the government still tries to deny that the Canadian red ensign is the distinctive flag of Canada.

Because the order in council is not long I am going to quote it. The order in council with respect to the Canadian red ensign is P.C. 5888 and reads as follows:

Order in council re use of Canadian red ensign

P.C. 5888

At the Government House at Ottawa

Wednesday, the 5th day of September, 1945

Present:

His Excellency the Governor General in council:

Whereas the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, reports that by order in council P.C. 134 of January 26th, 1924, authority is given for displaying the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly (commonly known as "the Canadian red ensign") on suitable occasions from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated without Canada;

That the Canadian red ensign was employed by Canadian forces during the present war; and

That, until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I continue:

—it is desirable to authorize the flying of the Canadian red ensign on federal government buildings within as well as without Canada, and to remove any doubt as to the propriety of flying the Canadian red ensign wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

Now applaud that if you want to.

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, is pleased to order and doth hereby order that the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly (hereinafter referred to as the "Canadian red ensign") may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the federal government within and without Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the first duty of this government in presenting this resolution to this house is to rescind that order in council before they introduce any other resolution which in effect discards and destroys the flag authorized by the order in council of a Liberal government and recognizes the Canadian flag since 1945 by order of a committee of parliament known as the cabinet. In 1964 the Liberal cabinet does not even bother to rescind that order in council passed by another Liberal government in 1945. Apparently they wish to ignore that fact, Mr. Speaker.

I submit that the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister is incomplete. It would appear to me that it should have a preamble to this effect: "Whereas the Prime Minister and government have decided to disregard, discard and destroy the Canadian red ensign which has been recognized as the distinctive flag of Canada for many years, formalized by order in council of September 5, 1945 as the distinctive Canadian flag, now therefore be it resolved"—then the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister could have followed.

The amendment to this resolution is one which everyone who wishes to be equitable, reasonable and patriotic should support. It recognizes the principle of democracy; it recognizes the right of all Canadians to have a voice in the selection of a national flag. It recognizes the need for union, unity and united action. It recognizes concern for the destiny of Canada. What could be more important? What could be more appropriate?

Now I leave this particular phase of the question, and I refer to the resolution which asks us to accept a certain design. I do not accept it. I hope the majority of the house do not. It stands for nothing by way of history and tradition. It discards the past and I submit has no appeal for the future.

I leave this point of the design for the moment and refer again to the plebiscite. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this parliament has no mandate to scrap the red ensign and choose a new national flag, the design of which is generally conceded to have been chosen by one man. Here we are, 265 representatives in this chamber, being pressured by the government to discard the flag which we have been using for many years and to vote, yes or no, on the alternative design which the Prime Minister selects. Then the Prime Minister and the government inject the question of the choice of a national flag right into the realm of partisan politics when the Prime Minister states that the government is prepared to stand or fall on the acceptance of this resolution. It must be accepted or the house is dissolved and a new parliament is elected.

This simply means that every supporter of the government will vote for it as a matter of party loyalty, unless he or she has the necessary intestinal fortitude to stand for principle rather than party and refuse to be a slave to party discipline on a matter so vital to Canada and to his conscience. There will be very few government supporters who will meet this test. There is no need for this test to be imposed. There is no need for anyone to have to make such a decision, as I will explain later.

In the meantime I continue my argument that this parliament has no mandate to choose a national flag. I base this assertion on the fact that a majority of 265 members is 133 members, and these members are asked by the government to take the responsibility for selecting a flag which will be a symbol recognized and revered, I hope, by 19 million people. This works out exactly, Mr. Speaker, to seven people per million, because seven times nineteen makes 133. Let us think this over. Should we let seven persons per million of population choose the flag for any country? This is the question I want answered here. This is the ridiculous situation with which we are confronted today, and we never should have been asked to face it.

Who is to blame? Well, the Prime Minister is, because the resolution is in his name. Generally speaking the Liberal party is to blame as well, since there will be only a few people who will put principle ahead of party. I realize the government may argue that this was an issue in the last election. I submit it was not; not in any general way, in any event. The Prime Minister says it was promised, and perhaps that is so. Where was it promised? I say it was not emphasized, it was not even a major plank in the Liberal platform. In my constituency of Victoria-Carleton I do not recall having heard a word about it, and my opponent never mentioned it once. I have no doubt many members can make similar statements. I repeat that we have no right to arbitrarily decide upon a new national flag and discard or destroy the Canadian red ensign in the process.

Even allowing, Mr. Speaker, that there may have been a minor mention of it made in the election, the important factor is the Prime Minister did not secure a majority of the votes cast or a majority of the seats in this country. This is a minority government, and it has no mandate to proceed with such a tremendous change simply on the basis of a majority vote in parliament. The Prime Minister must know and the government must know that this change, the design, is not acceptable to a large percentage of the people of Canada. In my opinion it is not acceptable to the majority of the people of Canada. However, the government proposes to have us swallow this design. Then, they say, if you do swallow it and comply with our wishes we will let you have a few days off to spend with your wives and families in your constituencies. I cannot and I will not accept this proposition.

The Prime Minister says he is committed. I do not agree that he is, in the light of the arguments previously advanced. I say to him even if he were committed he should put Canada before commitments unwisely made in the heat of an election campaign. He should explain, and he should refrain. To carry out unwise commitments is the negation of duty. He should not force a design upon the people of Canada in view of the large number of people, I believe a majority, who do not favour its acceptance.

I have another argument to present. A change such as is contemplated by this resolution is not, generally speaking, made by the majority in any assembly. If we examine the situation in the United States in connection with amendments to the constitution, or more recently the motion stopping debate on civil rights legislation, I submit we will find that questions of that nature, which are in the same general category as the flag issue in Canada, are decided only by a two thirds majority. Surely we will acknowledge that changing the flag of a country is equally as important as these things I have mentioned.

How should the question be dealt with? I can tell you, Mr. Speaker. The amendment proposed by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is the way to deal with it. The Prime Minister would be given great respect by all Canadians should he present his resolution as a request only for an opinion of the house rather than as a motion on which the government is prepared to stand or fall, to stake its life and the existence of this parliament. There are other ways. There is the matter of a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. There is the question of examination. This is too important a matter to be relegated to the realm of partisan politics and decided on that basis. It is not fair; it is not right; it should not be done. There is no question about that.

I have some quotations concerning a plebiscite, which I would like to read. They are all in favour of a plebiscite, and the first one appeared in the Telegraph-Journal of May 23, 1964, written by Mrs. Jean Sweet, an outstanding woman of Saint John, New Brunswick. Her arguments favouring a plebiscite are so impressive that I would like to put them on the record:

> Normally, like most peaceful citizens, I'm a coward about public issues. But I think the time has come to stand up and be counted on this flag matter.
> Most people who ever saw a tree know that big trees rise from big firm roots. If you trim away the roots you weaken the tree. If too much root is removed you have nothing. The tree—that grew slowly over many decades—weakens, falls, and decays.
> Loyalties grow the same way...putting down roots in friendly soil. Without loyalties—even misplaced loyalties—man is nothing but a drifting derelict.
> Millions of Canadians grew up as I did in the frendly soil of a Canada we learned from earliest years to respect and view with immense pride. We were taught not to brag loudly and constantly about our land, but instead to know what we had and to feel secure in its tenets.
> Above all our flag has symbolized this land. It has grown with us. From pre-school age we loved the simple but intricately planned design of the union jack—so carefully integrating the major elements of Great Britain. We were proud when we saw the Canadian coat of arms in the fly of the beautiful flag. We sang songs to it. It meant our land.
> Through school days, I have no recollection of any "Quebec Question." I remember Montreal as a fascinating place I longed to see where—right in our Canada—two languages were spoken and peoples from many other lands settled and lived.
> Above all, as a child I watched the proud Van Doos march through the streets of our town, where they trained—headed by the tall lean figure of Col. Vanier (I didn't know his name then, not until I met him as our Governor General). From that time I "saw" those proud French speaking troops "fighting for our flag" as news of their exploits trickled home. When we sang "We'll never let the old flag fall" the Van Doos were in the picture, dying in France for that flag.
> Well, as far as I'm concerned, no one man, no one group of troublemakers can tell me "Here is your new flag." This is a matter of roots, Canadian roots. If my flag can be readily discarded, so can my country, and any other belief I ever held in it. It is disturbing—and makes me wonder: what next?
> This is a matter not for one man, one party or one government to decide. This is a matter for a clearcut vote, a national plebiscite of citizens' votes—apart from any party affiliation whatsoever. It is a matter where every citizen has a right to cast his vote for the issue—and not for the party, the man next door, the boss or any dictatorial group with whom he must identify himself.
> Such a vote should be protected in every way possible from any pressures or interference. It should be most clearly stated on the ballot, beyond any possibility of misunderstanding or confusion.
> It seems certain that many of our new citizens, those who chose Canada and all it stands for—

—and a few minutes ago the hon. member for Yorkton referred to them as having taken the oath—

> —when they sought refuge from other lands, must favour the flag they chose and to which they have so recently sworn allegiance.
> As for me...I am just one unimportant citizen (there are millions of us unimportant citizens or there would be no nation)...but without the flag that I was taught to respect from earliest years, I should no longer "feel" Canadian.

I also quote from the Toronto Telegram, the Chatham News and the Moncton Times. The Toronto Telegram had this to say:

> The people of Canada should be allowed to decide whether or not they wish to live under the flag of their forebears or discard it in favour of a new emblem...Let Mr. Pearson ask the people by referendum whether they want to replace the banner that carries the symbols of our nationhood by one that is mounted on the colour of surrender and would be most suitable for an arboretum...

The Chatham News had this to say:

> Prime Minister Pearson, in announcing that he was prepared to place the life of his government on the line over the flag issue, has pulled off one of the trickiest political manoeuvres in Canadian history. The Prime Minister knows that no one—the opposition parties or the people—wants an election at this time. We agree with those who say "take it to a vote of the people."

The Moncton Times had this to say:

> There is only one sound solution: That is for there to be a national referendum embracing all voters, and possibly even the younger citizens of the country. The ballot should be a comprehensive document asking if a change is desired, yes or no; if so, which of several designs does the individual favour, first, second, third, and so on, or none of them. Only in this way can there be a clear and definite expression of the people's will. The selection of a new flag should be left to the people, and the majority choice should be accepted.

I quote what the Canadian corps association have to say:

We feel the supporters of the Canadian red ensign are more democratic in their viewpoint than the supporters of the maple leaf design for they are willing for this question to be submitted in referendum form to the people of Canada and to abide by their decision, where the maple leaf design supporters are reluctant to trust the approval of their proposed new flag to the people of Canada.

We would also like to point out in this letter, that the Canadian corps association, dominion command, considers the advice of the prime minister that a referendum on the flag would cost over $10 million is again simply another smokescreen in the flag question. Those who support the retention of the present Canadian national flag have not urged that the flag plebiscite need be conducted immediately—we do not wish to see our government waste money either, for it is the people of Canada who supply the money. The flag question ballot could be placed in with the regular voting ballots in the next scheduled general election of this country, and there most certainly is no need of either an election to be called, nor a $10 million immediate referendum when the question can be placed before the voters of this country, when the next regular general election is scheduled, and in the meantime, the present national flag should be flown as it has been for the past many years until the people of Canada signify to the contrary.

Our organization fully realizes that there are many important national problems before the present members of the House of Commons that should most definitely take precedence over the flag question, and again we reiterate, that it is not the supporters of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag, who are forcing this issue to the foreground in parliament.

I have an editorial from the St. Croix Courier, published in St. Stephen in the county of Charlotte, New Brunswick, which newspaper ran a survey of its readers concerning a referendum or a plebiscite. It asked the people to answer this question: "Are you in favour of a public plebiscite to determine the flag issue?" I am going to read the editorial which contains the answer.

When the time finally arrives in the House of Commons for members to cast their votes on the flag issue, or rather on the amendment as provided by opposition leader Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, regarding a plebiscite, we would remind Dr. A. M. A. McLean to harken closely to the voice of the people who sent him to Ottawa to represent them.

Although we cannot say the result of our local referendum by special form in the Courier was encouraging, it did give a broad and penetrating viewpoint of the feelings of the people who considered it worth while to fill out the form and mail it in as requested.

As of the writing of this editorial we had received a total of 307 forms all duly completed and signed.

Remember, these were answers to the question "Are you in favour of a public plebiscite to decide the flag issue?" And what was the result? Three hundred people said yes, and only seven said no. That was the result of this questionnaire put out in the county of Charlotte.

[Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).]

Now I wish to quote an editorial which was published in The Legionary, the official organ of the Legion in Canada. This is an editorial in the July issue and the pertinent part reads as follows:

The Legionary therefore takes what is probably the last opportunity available to make one more appeal to the Prime Minister to let the people of Canada decide this crucial question. We do so because we earnestly believe a national plebiscite is by far the most clearcut way of settling the problem once and for all, and because we sincerely believe it is the only means of avoiding, so far as it is possible to do so, making it a partisan issue. Even if a "free" vote of M.P.'s and senators were allowed, there would be a natural tendency—human nature being what it is—for government supporters to vote for the government's own design, and it is far from certain that a parliamentary vote on an issue of this nature would accurately reflect the feelings of the whole people of Canada.

The Legionary believes that the flag question is such an issue and again strongly urges the Prime Minister to let the Canadian people decide it, one way or another, through a national plebiscite. It is the most democratic way of solving this problem. It is the only way to ascertain what the people really want. And the request for a plebiscite is sure to be warmly supported by all Canadians of good will and moderation because, no matter what the result, if the issue were settled by a parliamentary vote only, grave doubts would arise in the minds of a great many citizens that it represented the will of the people. These doubts would linger on for many years and would remain a serious obstacle to the attainment of national unity.

So please, Mr. Prime Minister, let the people decide. It would be a statesmanlike solution and might well be a nation-saving move.

That is a quotation from an editorial in the official organ of the Canadian Legion. They say this would settle the matter permanently and for all time.

The amendment of the Leader of the Opposition specifically provides for consideration being given to this most important question. It provides that the people shall have the responsibility of making this decision. It allows this parliament to consider that the question has been dealt with, and the matter decided. It transcends ordinary partisan considerations and deals with the matter in a way which would be less expensive and more effective. I fail to see how any member can be other than impressed by this argument. If the house wishes to hear another argument as to the desirability of a referendum, just let hon. members look at the column by Bruce West in today's Globe and Mail and see what this famous columnist has to say on the subject. He is warmly in favour of a plebiscite.

Now I wish to say something about the preference I have in a personal way for the Canadian red ensign. I do not wish there to be any doubt in this chamber as to where I stand. I propose to vote for the referendum because I consider that the fair way to deal with the matter before us is to refer it to the people of Canada for settlement. But as far as my personal opinion is concerned, I stand foursquare for the Canadian red ensign.

I have had much correspondence on this subject. I have talked with many people, especially to people in my own constituency. I suppose I have contacted 500 people, and so far all of them favour the retention of the Canadian red ensign with the exception of two, and only one of those favoured the design now being put forward by the Prime Minister. I have advanced my own views and they have met with approval. As a matter of fact I have received a telegram from a prominent member of the Liberal party, a resident of Fredericton—an official, I believe, of the Liberal association in the constituency of the hon. member who represents York-Sunbury in this chamber. Apart from his political views he is an outstanding man who has won honours for gallantry in action, including the Distinguished Flying Cross as a pathfinder pilot in world war II. Here is what he says:

> New Brunswick command of the Canadian Legion solidly in favour of retaining the red ensign as Canada's national flag.

Some hon. members have argued in this chamber that new Canadians favour the so-called Pearson design. I do not believe they do, at any rate to the extent they have been represented as doing. We have new Canadians in this house. I wish to quote what one of them said about the flag long before this controversy was injected into parliament by resolution. The words are to be found at page 382 of Hansard for May 28, 1963. This is what this hon. member had to say, and I will identify him in a few minutes:

> I was one of the more fortunate ones who succeeded in emigrating to another country, in my case to Canada, and I well recall stepping on Canadian soil and being able to see for the first time the Canadian flag which stood for principles quite contrary to those experienced under the flag of the hammer and sickle. I was also aware of the fact that under this Canadian flag thousands of Canadians had fought and given their lives to preserve freedom and democracy as we know them today, all symbolized in the Canadian flag.

Later on he said:

> I am not the only one who is concerned with this issue of the flag. Many new Canadians will also be concerned with the question of a new distinctive Canadian flag, since all of them at one time or another lived under another flag. Undoubtedly, the question will arise in their minds as to whether this new flag will be one which will stand for the same high principles, the same rights and privileges that have been afforded to Canadians of whatever race, creed or colour, as those which were available under the old flag, a flag under which Canada grew to the position of high esteem in which she is held by all the countries of the world. As a result of this national issue before us, all Canadians will search their hearts and souls in an attempt to find the right answer to the question of whether or not Canada should have a distinctive Canadian flag or retain the red ensign. An answer must be found and a decision must be made.
> As I said at the outset, perhaps I should have been the last man to speak about the Canadian flag. My purpose in speaking, however, is only to enumerate the high principles for which Canada stands now, and for which she stood in the past, all symbolized in our Canadian flag. However, should the time ever come when this house decides to adopt a new Canadian flag then, as one who believes in democratic majority rule, I would accept this decision and swear my loyalty to Canada under this new, distinctive Canadian flag of whatever design. At the same time, however, I should like to be around when the old flag, the red ensign, which to me is the free flag, is lowered for the last time. I should like to pay my last tribute to it, to touch it for the last time and then wipe away a tear or two because of my affection for the old Canadian flag, the only free flag I ever knew in my life and the flag by which Canada is known all over the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Those were the words of my hon. friend for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp). May I add that it must be a matter of great encouragement to new Canadians when they come to a country like Canada and read of the career of our hon. friend who represents that constituency. It shows that an immigrant boy has been chosen after something like 30 years to represent the people of his constituency in the highest parliament in the land. It is privileges of that kind which are contained in the things for which the flag stands. We in this house have every reason to think that the hon. member to whom I refer, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, speaks for and represents the views of the new Canadians; we have no reason to think otherwise.

Since the Prime Minister is sensitive about election commitments I assume that he would consider them fulfilled when he presented his design to parliament. He said that he was under an obligation to present a design to parliament within two years. I would have presumed that when he presented it to parliament it was the fulfilment of his promise. He was under no compulsion or obligation to present his design to parliament as a government measure; that was not necessary. He was under no compulsion to have the fate of that resolution govern the life of this parliament, or to make the life of this parliament contingent upon the acceptance of his personal choice, or for that matter the acceptance of any other choice. I have never ceased to wonder who conceived the design. Whose opinion was it that the traditions of the past, emblematic of the history of this country, should be disregarded, ignored and discarded? Why should they be? Who decided to bring this design to parliament anyway? That would be a good question to have answered. The Prime Minister and his ministers apparently do not consider the question important enough even to justify their participation in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Apart from the Prime Minister not one of them has stood up and said one word in this debate in defence of the resolution which has been presented and for which they are going to vote. I should like to know what are the views of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) who sits opposite me. Where does the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) stand? What about the Solicitor General (Mr. MacNaught) who represents Prince Edward Island? Where does he stand on this?

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I am not yielding the floor.

Mr. MacNaught: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): There is no question of order here.

Mr. MacNaught: A question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Order. I think the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton requested an answer from the hon. gentleman, and he should be given the opportunity to answer.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): No, I am not yielding the floor; not because I do not want to, but because my time will soon be up.

[Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).]

Mr. MacNaught: I have a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): I would ask the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton to resume his seat and bow to my ruling.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacNaught: My hon. friend—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Order. I recognize the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I speak? I was going to compliment you on being in the chair, and at the same time I would say to you there is no question of privilege here or any right to rise at all at this time, irrespective of the fact that it would be most commendable at least to have an opinion from one of the ministers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): With all due deference to the Leader of the Opposition, and thanking him for his complimentary remarks, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton did ask the minister who wishes to raise a question of privilege to state where he stood on this matter, and I have granted to him that privilege. When he has answered I think that will be sufficient.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the minister can make a speech later, or can answer the question later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): With all respect to the hon. member I do not think that is a point of order.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member who posed the question, the stand of the Solicitor General will be made abundantly clear when the vote is taken.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the answer that I expected. He is going to stand up and have his nose counted, and that is all he has to say about the matter. What about the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Benidickson)? Where does he stand?

Mr. Benidickson: I will vote, too.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): So, Mr. Speaker, they acknowledge that they are going to yield to the crack of the party whip no matter what happens to the country.

An hon. Member: They do what the whip tells them. Trained seals.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I ask the question, who brought this design to parliament? Who made the decision?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette).

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Was it the government or the caucus of the Liberal party? That is the question which I think the people of Canada will want to have answered in no uncertain terms and at the proper time.

Mr. Deschatelets: It is already answered.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): The ministers do not consider it important enough even to get up and try to justify—they could not, of course, but they do not even try to justify—their attitude. They make no attempt. All they say is that they are going to be counted and that they are going to count for one. That is wonderful. We cannot reconcile such an attitude in this parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired, although I know we all regret that we will not be able to hear the rest of his speech.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I lost about five minutes by the interjections which were made.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): All right. They just cannot take the truth. They do not want to hear the truth.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege or point of order?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had not resumed his seat. I was about to ask him to resume his seat because his time had expired and he was still speaking.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Monteith: Why? Do you want the floor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): I was under the impression, when I asked whether the hon. member has unanimous consent to proceed, that he had it.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): If he has not I will have to ask him to resume his seat. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: Refused by the Liberals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): I regret I hear a few noes, so I will have to ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to rise and follow an hon. member who has pleaded so eloquently with the Prime Minister to reconsider a problem of his own creation.

I must at the outset, Mr. Speaker, express my amazement at your most recent ruling, when Your Honour stood in your place and informed the hon. gentleman that his time had expired and he would not be heard further, without first asking the house whether they agreed to let him go on. It is a precedent that I am sure will be used in the future.

I rise to speak because the Prime Minister has again extended to all members of this house an invitation to participate in this debate. Some of the questions that I propose to deal with today are my views on how this matter could be settled without very much difficulty. First of all, I think we should try to understand that there are those for and those against the red ensign and the new flag. When we talk about the red ensign I think it has, more than any other emblematic device in Canada, an emotional and historic sentiment attached to it. I am speaking specifically of wives who lost their husbands in the last war, of mothers who lost their sons and daughters, of children who lost their fathers, and of those children whose fathers lie in our veteran institutions today, some crippled for life and others who will never again see the outside world. When you talk to these people, as I have on a number of occasions, you find that the red ensign is something very, very dear to their hearts.

I intend to quote from some letters I have received from veterans in the last week or two, and I hope hon. members will then realize why I intend to pursue this argument a little further. When I pose my argument this afternoon I would like to point out some of the reasons why I know of so many who are opposed to the new flag, in its present form at least.

First of all, I think it was the Postmaster General who in a speech away from Ottawa, when asked what was his interpretation of the design, pointed out that he understood it to mean that one leaf represented the English, one leaf represented the French, and the third leaf represented the other ethnic groups in Canada. I think we should talk about that for a moment, because we have English and French members in this House of Commons as well as those who belong to other ethnic groups. I happen to belong to one of those ethnic groups; I am of Ukrainian parentage. My grandfather arrived in Canada when he was 17 years old. He married a young lady, years and years ago, who had also emigrated to Canada in her early years.

The press and the Prime Minister have on occasion tried to tell some of us in this house that the ethnic groups in this country desire a new national flag. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that this representation was never made to me, and I am as close to the ethnic organizations in this country as any other member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Skoreyko: Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the very suggestion that some day we might be flying a flag which has on it three maple leaves, each leaf representing a different group or faction in this country, will mean that my children and the children of every member in this House of Commons will ask, "I wonder what leaf on that flag I belong to". I think if the government has seriously in mind a national flag that is going to unite this country, we should take another look at the red ensign.

Why not be reasonable and accept the proposal that has been put forward to the Prime Minister? I know he has received this proposal because I have copies of letters that were sent to the Prime Minister of this country which contain specific recommendations in this regard, namely for a slight modification to the red ensign, which would not only please the people who at the moment support the red ensign as it is, but those who support having a new flag, if that is what you want to call it. It would also please those who are indifferent at the moment; and there are a great many people in the country who are completely indifferent to this flag issue.

Let us talk about this new flag. How was it chosen, Mr. Speaker? The leader of our party, Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, moved an amendment in the House of Commons which called for a referendum. There is nothing fairer than getting the majority of the people of Canada to decide on the kind of flag they wish to have flown. When we consider this new flag it is very interesting to go through one's files in search of some interesting comments. I have done this, and the first interesting comment I saw was dated May 20. It is an article headed "P.M. told newsmen of flag decision". Well, Mr. Speaker, on May 15 a question was asked in the house as to whether a decision on a new flag had been made, and the answer was in the negative. This article says:

> At a few minutes before 6 p.m. last Thursday, eight men—all members of the parliamentary press gallery—left their desks in various parts of town and made their way to the Sussex drive home of Prime Minister Lester Pearson where they had been invited to discuss the issue of Canada's national flag.
> The eight, all editors, reporters or magazine writers, were shown into the newly decorated, grey-green living room where the Prime Minister relaxed with a scotch and soda, waiting to try his hand at "kite-flying" or, as some who attended the session called it later, "news management."

This is how this proposed flag came into being. I wonder how many people in Canada are aware of the fact that this new flag was born over a glass of scotch and soda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caron: That is cheap enough.

Mr. Skoreyko: That is what the newspaper article says.

Mr. Caron: Well, that is cheap enough.

Mr. Skoreyko: Yes, it is cheap enough; it is a cheap way of introducing a flag into this house. The article continues:

> Kiting a news story is a long established political technique. Certain newspapermen are fed information from what they believe is a responsible source, and are encouraged to write it without attribution.
> Government or party higher-ups then can judge public reaction and take this into account when they decide to go ahead or withdraw from the course they are considering.

If the Prime Minister had heeded those letters—and I intend to put some of them on the record this afternoon—and the requests of those people who wrote and asked him to withdraw his flag proposal, we would not be debating the question this afternoon. The article goes on to say:

> It is doubtful whether any of them anticipated the "hard" news they got—that Mr. Pearson had personally chosen a flag design; that he had sent a telegram to the Queen informing her; that the red ensign would not be on a new Canadian flag, and that he was going to lay the whole matter before the Royal Canadian Legion convention in Winnipeg the next Sunday.

What a Sunday, Mr. Speaker, to bring such news to veterans. I referred a moment ago to those wives, those mothers, those sons, those daughters, whose husbands and fathers lie on their backs in institutions today and may never walk again. It was to these people that the Prime Minister chose to break the news on that fatal Sunday. There was an editorial in one of the newspapers in the west hoping that the flag issue would not be pursued because it might turn out to be a drape for Mr. Pearson's political bier. I can assure you that editorial writer was not a veteran of the last war. He is much too young for that, but that was his feeling in this regard.

The other question that bothers me in relation to the flag resolution is that a normal resolution in the House of Commons will read along these lines: "That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve". But the flag resolution reads in this way:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada—

And so on. What the resolution in fact says is that if anyone said no the government, if parliament approves the resolution as it reads at the moment, would have the power to declare war on anybody who might object to the flying of this flag. I think the motives behind such a resolution are worth considerable research.

Why do I suggest that a plebiscite or referendum is probably the solution to this dilemma? First of all, I think every individual as a Canadian citizen in a democratic country is entitled to express a point of view in a matter as emotionally charged as the flag issue. We must remember that the younger groups, particularly the school age children, have no historic attachment to the red ensign, but their fathers and mothers certainly have. I do not suggest for one moment that my boy, who is quite young now, is going to be particularly worried 20 years from now about what happens in the House of Commons today or whether it should or should not happen again. But I can tell you that even at his young age he knows and understands something about the red ensign and loves it dearly.

I should like to bring to your attention in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that the other day when I was walking from this building to my office in the west block I met a little boy carrying a red ensign. Two other little boys were walking toward him and I asked them what they thought of that flag. They said "Oh, it is beautiful; we love it". The mother said "Now, now, Tommy, you know you should not say that". So the young are being told how they should feel and what they should say when they are asked questions with respect to the new flag.

With regard to a referendum, which I say is the only solution to our dilemma, the Gazette of August 5 suggested that there should be some sort of compromise. I intend to deal with this editorial more fully, but it suggested that the leaders of all parties in the House of Commons should get together and arrive at an acceptable design. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that such a procedure is probably one of the most unlikely to succeed. They say that the prime consideration so far as the government is concerned should be to unite the country and keep it from dividing further. With regard to a compromise the editorial goes on to say:

> The first of these is the objection to the flag in its present design. Even many of those who would favour a distinctive flag for the country have felt that the design offered—a design produced in conspicuous haste—falls below the standard of what might reasonably be expected. A more attractive flag—

They are suggesting other designs, but they are also suggesting that in the end surely there must be some way whereby all the parties, if they wanted to be reasonable, could decide on a modification of the red ensign to suit everybody no matter what their feelings on the matter. If we do not succeed in having our amendment asking for a referendum adopted, what is going to happen? Yesterday the hon. member for Lisgar spoke quite eloquently about what he thought would happen if we do not get a referendum. He made particular reference to an editorial in the Globe and Mail entitled "A Collision Course". It reads in part as follows:

> In his haste to give Canada a distinctive national flag Prime Minister Lester Pearson has set his government and the nation itself on a collision course. There is still time for him to alter it. But there is not very much time.

I suggest that is right, Mr. Speaker. There is not very much time. They go on to say that this is the time for statesmanship, and that the Prime Minister should call in the leaders of the four opposition parties and thresh out the whole matter with them. They say that he should attempt to find agreement on a method of proceeding with the flag resolution and keeping the debate within bounds.

That is too much to hope for, Mr. Speaker, because the Prime Minister has indicated that the flag resolution has priority on his list of legislative matters, and he is determined to go through with the flag debate even if it costs the government its life. In an editorial on May 26 last the Edmonton Journal reviews the flag question and makes this comment:

> Mr. Pearson's haste, and his total commitment, on the flag issue are on the face of things inexplicable. With so many problems bedevilling our country—

They are many, Mr. Speaker.

> —why must he single out this issue and, in effect, stake the survival of his government, to say nothing of his own political future, on the result? It seems foolhardy and senseless...
> Ottawa is in some danger of ceasing to be the real capital of Canada. There is a danger, that is to say, that the federal power will lose control of Canadian affairs. If this happens, our country is obviously doomed; it will disintegrate into a number of fragments, none of which can, by itself, survive as a sovereign nation.
> The flag issue, as we see it, is therefore an attempt to do two things at once: to demonstrate the genuine desire of the Pearson government to reach a rational accommodation with Quebec, and thereby to re-establish Ottawa's power to control Canadian affairs.
> It is, as we say, perilous—more perilous because Mr. Pearson for obvious reasons cannot publicly explain what is going through his mind...
> There are more Anglo Saxons than French Canadians in Canada. Is it reasonable to ask them to abandon something which the vast majority of them hold precious?
> During the past few weeks, the question has caused much heartsearching in the office of this newspaper...
> There is, of course, no guarantee that a new flag will accomplish anything of the kind. But if parliament agrees to a new flag tomorrow—

This is a strong editorial, Mr. Speaker.

> —it should simultaneously be made clear to Quebec that this, as the Calgary Herald rightly pointed out a day or two ago, represents a massive concession. It should also be pointed out that Quebec can expect no more concessions of this magnitude.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister tries to make the people of Canada believe that the flag is being introduced for them, a nation of 19 million people. This editorial says the action is taken solely to satisfy Quebec. If this is the case, Mr. Speaker, why does the Prime Minister not stand up in this house and say so? Perhaps if he did make such a statement, then the rest of Canada might consider some of the better after effects of such a move.

The editorial goes on to say:

> The rest of Canada will be entitled to paraphrase some famous words of the late John F. Kennedy. We can properly say to French Canada: "Let us stop talking about what Canada should do for Quebec, and let us start talking about what Quebec is prepared to do for Canada".

Then again, Mr. Speaker, when I look at some of the reasons for the introduction of this flag resolution, I cannot help but think of Mackenzie King who always looked upon England as a country we should stay away from.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course that is not true.

Mr. Skoreyko: It is true, and I intend to read a document I have here which will satisfy the minister's curiosity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not my curiosity; it is my knowledge.

Mr. Skoreyko: Then, it will correct his knowledge. This editorial is entitled, "Republic of Canada", and reads in part as follows:

> During much of his political life Mackenzie King feared and fought what might be called the philosophy of the imperial commonwealth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is different; so did the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We would like to hear a speech from the hon. gentleman on this subject.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would be glad to make one.

Mr. Skoreyko: I continue quoting:

> He had a deep distrust of centralizers in London and an unswerving opposition to an empire approach to politics, economics, trade or defence. He was determined that Canada should be a sovereign nation in full charge of its own destiny at home and abroad. To Mackenzie King must go much of the credit for the events that culminated in the Statute of Westminster.
> But at times King's determination that Canada should be mistress in her own house became a suspicious obsession—

This could never be attributed to anyone else.

> —as incidents in Vincent Massey's recent book of memoirs so clearly reveal. Furthermore King imbedded both the determination and obsession in the Liberal party of which he was undisputed custodian for so many years.
> To the end of his life King did not seem to realize that his great battle to make Canada an independent nation had been won—at least as far as London was concerned. To the end he remained militant and wary. He bequeathed his attitude to his party as a legacy when he departed. His successors continued to act as if the outcome were still in doubt.

I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) is satisfied with this article.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I say to my hon. friend, if he will permit me, that the views of Mackenzie King with regard to the commonwealth were precisely those of Sir Robert Borden of the Conservative party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not at all.

Mr. Skoreyko: I thank the minister for that observation. Were they the same as those of Louis St. Laurent? I continue to quote from the editorial:

Louis St. Laurent, when he was prime minister, adopted a deliberate policy of expunging symbols from Canada's past that were intimately connected with this nation's origins. The first indication was when the time-honoured designation "dominion government" disappeared from telephone directories from sea to sea. It was replaced by the phrase "government of Canada".

Then the designation royal mail was placed under a cloud and the term "Canada post" was accorded official favour. Then there was the deliberate policy of combing through federal statutes to eliminate the word "dominion". The fact that the word was scriptural and chosen by the Fathers of Confederation was overshadowed by the suspicion in certain quarters that somehow it denoted subservience. There was an attempt to force the dominion bureau of statistics to become the bureau of statistics and so on.

There seemed to be a deliberate policy of rooting out little by little distinctive terms and designations that bound the nation to its past.

Years ago Dr. Eugene Forsey asked: "Where is it all going to stop? Are we going to wake up some morning and find ourselves citizens of the republic of Canada? It looks like it. But I think there are a lot of people who don't want it."

Prime Minister Pearson's preoccupation with the flag issue and the manner in which he has brought it forward make these questions even more relevant and disturbing today. The arguments Mr. Pearson has advanced for getting rid of the red ensign could be applied with equal force to getting rid of the monarchy. Is this the ultimate goal of the policy and program initiated by Mackenzie King and carried on by his successors?

The people of Canada have a right to ask this question and to expect an unequivocal answer from Mr. Pearson and his advisers.

Then, the last line of the editorial reads:

Is the Liberal party dedicated to turning this country into a republic?

The minister of external affairs may like to answer that question. In so far as a distinctive Canadian flag is concerned, the previous speaker eloquently pointed out the reasons he felt there should be no change made. Every member of this House of Commons has received a small pamphlet, similar to the one I now hold in my hand, from the various Legions across the country. I cannot help but refer to one little paragraph in it. There is a reference to a statement made by General H. D. Crerar, the distinguished commander of the first Canadian army in world war II. In recording an incident of great historical significance for all Canadians he recounted an official welcome accorded him on August 8, 1945 by the wartime prime minister, Right Hon. Mackenzie King. He said that as they moved away from the central entrance of the parliament buildings Mr. King turned and looked up to the peace tower at the top of which the Canadian red ensign waved and said, "And that, General, is another problem which your Canadian army solved for Canada, the matter of our national flag". The previous speaker put on the record all the information necessary with reference to orders in council 588 and 134, and I will not do that at this moment because I have very limited time remaining and I want to deal with some of the opinions that have been expressed with respect to this resolution by people not only in my own riding but all across Canada.

At the outset I must say that of the 200 to 250 letters I received in the last month, two asked me as the member of parliament for Edmonton East to support the new flag. The others asked me to support the red ensign or a modification of it. A few minutes ago I noted with some concern the lack of interest shown in this flag debate by other parties in the house, and I was particularly amazed to see there was only one Social Crediter sitting in his place when the previous speaker was on his feet. I find this difficult to understand, since I have here a copy of a resolution sent to me by the Social Credit women's league of the province of Alberta, asking me to support the red ensign. I shall indeed communicate with these women and tell them the degree to which that party has participated in the debate.

I have here a short note from a veteran of the first world war, and clipped to it is a newspaper picture of the red ensign with the words written on it "our flag." There is also another newspaper picture of the three maple leaves and the appropriate note on it says: "Reminds one of a firescreen." The letter reads:

Enclosed is a picture of the only flag we need. It covers all ethnic groups and unites all Canada. While the maple leaf is good, it does not represent western Canada—

In fact the maple leaf does not grow in western Canada.

Mr. Mather: Yes, in B.C.

Mr. Skoreyko: You do not have the maple leaf that is known to eastern Canada. If the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) were present he would be able to tell you there is no such thing as an eastern maple leaf west of the great lakes.

Mr. Douglas: Nobody said it had to be an eastern maple leaf.

Mr. Skoreyko: I said there was no maple leaf such as is known in eastern Canada, west of the great lakes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course that is quite inaccurate.

Mr. Monteith: Get up and make your speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Have you made yours?

Mr. Monteith: Not yet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me know when.

Mr. Skoreyko: The letter continues:

—and no one group should dictate what flag we fly as representing the whole of Canada.

We are sorry the people have no chance to decide the issue, and we hope our representative will use his vote and influence in retaining the only flag for Canada, the red ensign.

Here is one that says:

If that proposed flag of the Prime Minister's is accepted, then Canada deserves to be the wishy-washy nation that flag signifies. Canada will then deserve to be a spineless satellite of any nation on this earth. It will forfeit its heritage of being a nation. That is what absence of the union jack means.

Another one says:

God forbid that a Canadian flag should ever be designed which does not have the union jack on it somewhere.

A flag is more than a cloth waving in the breeze, with colour on it, and a design. It is a language; it stirs feeling in the hearts of men; it fosters leadership; it promotes loyalty; it engenders love; men give their lives for it; women weep and remain steadfast. A flag has no language barrier—it is understood by all.

The Edmonton Social Credit women's auxiliaries council sent the following resolution to the Prime Minister:

The Social Credit women's auxiliaries council of Edmonton, Alberta, is unanimously in favour of retaining the red ensign as our national flag; or incorporating the union jack in a new distinctive Canadian flag.

[Mr. Skoreyko.]

I can get little response from the Social Crediters here. Here is another one:

My parents are Russian born, my blood is Russian but I am a loyal Canadian Queen loving subject in spite of all that, and it breaks my heart to see Mr. Pearson giving Canada away.

Here is another:

I want to keep the red ensign as Canada's flag.

We have just returned from a trip to Europe, and it was always with pride we saw our Canadian red ensign flying alongside the flags of other countries.

What a wealth of history is told by the symbols on our flag. No one comments on the coat of arms it bears. This ties the history of our country into one. It represents England, Scotland, Ireland and France and then has the three maple leafs for the new land. The union jack in the left top corner tells the world we are a Christian nation. I don't think there is a flag anywhere with more meaning.

Please do your best to keep it flying.

Here is a man who says what he thinks:

For my own part I say, without equivocation, that whatever parliament may do I will neither recognize, acknowledge, nor pay tribute to any flag that does not bear the union jack. Moreover, while I can respect those who want to get rid of the union jack because they hate it, I can only feel unutterable contempt for those who are so flabby and limp, so devoid of manly sentiment, one way or the other, that they are willing to "go along with" anything at all that consists with what they conceive to be to their own personal advantage. And what claim has any flag—however aesthetically pleasing—to the reverence and affection of a nation, which flag is no more than the product of a transient politician's "hankering"—hankering, mark you.

Even if it had no other history, the red ensign has marked the rallying point for the men of Canada in two great wars. Not only men of British origin but Ukrainians, Norwegians, Danes and many other races because they thought it stood for those things they believed in.

It inspired men to face the test of "going over the top" in the first great war and sustained them when—stricken, grieved but proud—their sons—in many cases the only son—failed to return from some desperate sortie over enemy territory in the second.

This is what another letter to the Prime Minister says:

I do not suppose you will read the enclosed. My purpose in sending it is that you may know that I do not say things about anyone in a letter that I am not prepared to say to their face.

Your argument is completely fallacious and you know very well that it is. Your friends to the south have absorbed millions of newcomers to Canada's thousands, yet never has anyone suggested changing the stars and stripes. There is no reason why we should do away with our Canadain ensign. Add a wreath of maple leafs, yes. It would make it more distinctively Canadian. But that, Mr. Pearson, is not your real purpose.

I will not deal with any more of the correspondence I have received in connection with this matter but I should like to make one brief reference to a cartoon which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen and a reply thereto by General Charles Foulkes, former chairman of the chiefs of staff. I think it is worth putting on record. The last paragraph contained these words:

> To have affection and pride for a flag and a symbol which was once a flag of battle seems to me to be misunderstood by some people. Perhaps it is because they never saw, or wanted to see, that emblem—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Skoreyko: I have only a few brief comments to make before I conclude.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the hon. member continuing his remarks?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: Liberal closure.

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate which has lasted already long enough, but after listening to the remarks of some hon. members opposite, I thought it my duty to express dispassionately an opinion based on reason.

Our hon. friends opposite said that they already had their flag, that Canada already had a distinctive flag with the red ensign, a flag connected with our history and the traditions of our land. If so, I congratulate them and envy them because, as for me, I have never had a Canadian flag. And I say this without the least resentment. On the contrary, I envy those who were able to fly, in the front of their house, a flag which they considered as the flag of their country.

Mr. Vincent: Who gave it?

Mr. Drouin: Personally, I considered the red ensign not as a Canadian flag but as a sign that my country, Canada, was dominated by another.

England was a good colonizing power and I think we would not have fared better under France.

I never felt that the battle of the plains of Abraham was either a victory or a defeat. It was just something that happened in the history of my country. But the Westminster treaty has for me the importance of a victory because it was a decisive step towards my country's independence, and I feel that the adoption of a truly national flag will somehow complement that treaty and constitute a symbol of independence.

My family has been in Canada for 11 generations. My ancestor, Robert Drouin, came from France in 1649. He gave up everything to settle in a new country. He did so without any second thought; he came to a new country with a new spirit just like those who, every day, get their Canadian citizenship. In fact, those people have also left their country without looking back. They came to Canada, a country they believed to be independent.

Recently, a neighbour of mine came to my place to ask me if I could get him a small three maple leaf flag like the one I had on the radio antenna of my car. I knew that he was of English origin and that he had been living in Canada for a short while only. When I asked him why he wanted to fly the proposed flag he told me: When I came to Canada from England, my native land, some ten years ago, I left everything behind. I also left the union jack and I have come to Canada as to a new country.

And he said: "Now, I am a Canadian".

Mr. Speaker, why should we, who have lived here for generations, not be as Canadian as this man? Why are some of us more British than Canadian?

As far as I am concerned, I am proud to be French Canadian. I am proud to be linked with France by cultural bonds, but I do not want any political links with France. I do not wish to see either the fleur-de-lis or the tricolor on the future Canadian flag. I want, for my country, an essentially Canadian flag, a flag which will reflect Canada's independence. And I am certainly not the only one who thinks so.

I believe that others than Canadians of French origin, or people from Quebec, will share my views. We have heard the proof here in the House. There was not a single French Canadian member, nor even any member, whether French or English speaking, from the province of Quebec, who wanted to retain the red ensign as the Canadian flag, notwithstanding the respect and admiration he might have for that emblem.

On the other hand, there are, in the house, a few dozen English speaking or new Canadian members, who unreservedly support the three leaf flag.

Our friends opposite want a referendum, to submit the question of a distinctive flag to the Canadian people. Their argument is based on the fact that there was a referendum in 1942 to authorize conscription in Canada. They say, moreover: "If this has been done in 1942, why not do it again in 1964?"

I would like to tell them that there is an essential difference. In 1942, the government submitted the conscription issue to the Canadian people by way of referendum so as to be freed of a promise made to the Canadian people.

However, in submitting its flag resolution before parliament this year, the government is not going back on a promise, quite the contrary, it is fulfilling a promise made to the Canadian people.

When I agreed, in June 1962 and in April 1963, to run as a Liberal candidate, I then accepted the plank of the party platform concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag within two years of our accession to power.

There were many items in the party platform, some of them, incidentally, not very exciting. But still, when I accepted to be a candidate, I went along with the whole Liberal party program. And those who voted Liberal in 1962 and 1963 were endorsing the program of the Liberal party, including the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Therefore, when this resolution is put to the house, I think I will be expressing the desire of those who returned me to the House of Commons by voting in favour of the three-leaved emblem.

Our Conservative opponents—I should rather say our Conservative friends, because there are no opponents in the House of Commons, at least I do not think so; there should be only men working as honestly as possible for the welfare of their country—our Conservative friends say that the three-leaved design is the project of one man, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). I may say that is wrong. It is true that the Prime Minister kept his word. My hon. friends opposite may not be used to such a way of doing things, but we on this side of the house are proud of our leader who had the courage to give leadership to his party and to the government of this country, not by treading the easiest roads, but who accepted the difficulties threatening his undertaking, to administer the business of the country with his well-known sincerity and ability.

I think that when the three-leaved flag is officially adopted as the Canadian flag, we can say that never, in any country, a flag will have been chosen after so much consideration and care.

[Mr. Drouin.]

You know, Mr. Speaker, how, in most countries, a flag was adopted or replaced. During the night following the revolution, some rag was picked up, a design was planned and the next day, that was the flag of that country and all were proud of their flag because it meant freedom and independence.

What has the government done? It did not impose, as it could have done, some flag through an order in council. The Prime Minister asked a group of experts to study the some 5,000 projects which had been submitted.

He asked those specialists in heraldry to make a selection.

He said afterwards, not on his own behalf but for the government which is charged with looking after the business of the country—he is not imposing it through an order in council—that he was submitting the proposal to the approval of 265 freely elected members of the House of Commons so that they would make it the Canadian flag, not at a moment's notice, for the Prime Minister is leaving to everyone the time to voice freely his opinions on this matter. He also gives newspapermen the necessary time to express their opinions, he gives every Canadian citizen the opportunity to write to his member to voice his views.

I think that under the circumstances the 265 members elected by the Canadian people are qualified to give a flag to their country, and that is what I will do, and I will feel that I have done my duty when I vote for the three-leaved flag.

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am entering this debate because I think the changing of a national emblem, such as the flag is so important that every member of parliament, regardless of party and how he feels on the issue, should express his opinion and the opinions of those whom he represents in this house. To say that any member who wishes to speak on an issue as important as this is obstructing the work of parliament, that he is filibustering because he wishes to express an opinion on the matter, is to my mind a complete negation of what parliament stands for and what our freedom is. To say that we who are the official opposition should meekly fold our hands and allow this resolution to pass reminds us, and I am sure reminds the country, of a previous Liberal administration whose arrogant attitude was: "We know what is good for you; now just be quiet and take it". We have a right to be heard. Speaking out against this white flag is the only weapon we can use to register our opposition. It is not only our right but our duty to use it to the full.

The flags of the great nations of the world have over the years been the symbol, the rallying point in times of crisis. The stars and stripes of the United States of America, the union jack and the tricolor of France have been unifying influences under which people of various racial origin and creeds have stood as one. Now the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of this country proposes to force upon millions of loyal Canadians a flag which has no tradition, a flag which has been shown by recent public opinion polls to have less public acceptance than the flag we now fly. It is not a unifying influence, certainly, but a divisive one at a time when Canada is already deeply troubled by unrest in one of its founding provinces: I ask hon. members to note that it is only one province. I would point out to the Prime Minister that nine out of the ten provinces of Canada have indicated that more of their people want the red ensign than want any other flag. I would point out to the government that there are many millions of loyal Canadians, such as those in the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, the Orange lodges, the women's institutes, the Royal Canadian Legion, the Canadian corps association and many other organizations who have gone on record as very strongly in favour of that flag which has been our recognized emblem for many years.

I would like to discuss the Prime Minister's so-called flag address at the opening of the Royal Canadian Legion convention in Winnipeg in May. I was one of those who were there that evening. Over the years I have been deeply interested in the welfare of veterans and have served on dominion and provincial levels of the Royal Canadian Legion. I was not one of those who in any way interrupted the Prime Minister. The feelings of the Royal Canadian Legion about the red ensign are well known. The Legion supports the red ensign. It supports a national plebiscite on the question. In my file, which is a very heavy one, of telegrams and letters of support for the red ensign, is one letter from the national president of the Canadian Legion supporting, on behalf of that organization, the red ensign. Another is from the New Brunswick president of the Royal Canadian Legion, an office which I once held. He is a close personal friend of mine and also supports the red ensign. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) mentioned this gentleman. He is a decorated war veteran wearing the Distinguished Flying Cross and whose brother gave his life in world war II. He has been, as the hon. member said, over the years a loyal supporter of the Prime Minister and the Liberal party.

At the opening of the Legion convention more than 1,000 veterans were present, and I would say at the most 10 or 20 registered their objections vocally during the Prime Minister's address. I do not condone that type of behaviour, Mr. Speaker, but it is surprising to me that there were not many, many more who objected. Certainly the majority were deeply disturbed. Yes, they were deeply offended. It is a tribute to the delegates that they showed the admirable self-restraint that they did.

As the Legion points out in an editorial in the July issue of The Legionary, of which I think every member has a copy:

> No Legion officer on any level had been notified previously by the Prime Minister or any member of his staff that the main subject of his address at the opening ceremony would deal with the flag issue. That, in effect, he would use the occasion as a springboard for launching a national flag campaign.
> The Prime Minister had given no advance notice whatever of his intent to the Legion, though obviously the press gallery in Ottawa and other news media must have been tipped off because they were in Winnipeg in full force for the occasion.

Personally, I think, as do others, it was exceptionally poor taste on the part of the Prime Minister to issue this challenge to an organization of the high standing of the Canadian Legion at its national convention. A few days later one of the most vicious cartoons I have ever seen appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. This cartoon depicts two veterans, obviously members of the Canadian Legion, apparently intoxicated. Outside the window Mr. Pearson is running along with his three maple leaf flag, and the caption underneath is, "I guess we showed him, didn't we?" The inference in the cartoon is obviously that veterans and members of the Canadian Legion are drunkards, that they are boors. It is an uncalled for slur upon an organization which is the acknowledged spokesman of the more than one million men and women who, like the Prime Minister of this country, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), and many others, put on the Canadian uniform and offered their lives in the defence of that freedom which we enjoy today in this country. I have seen no apology in the Ottawa Citizen for this cartoon. I would say it is to the eternal credit of the mayor of Ottawa, Miss Whitton, that she sent a telegram to the Legion convention apologizing on behalf of the city of Ottawa for this disgraceful cartoon.

It seems to me that we do not need a new flag to have a distinctive flag. Canada now has a distinctive flag, one that symbolizes its spiritual and cultural heritage. In 1921 the Canadian government requested King George V to order a new coat of arms for Canada. His Majesty instructed the royal college of heralds to design a suitable coat of arms, which was then placed on the red ensign. I wonder if some of those who are shouting for the end of the red ensign have taken the trouble to learn the significance of the design it bears. The couchant lion in the coat of arms was the symbol of William of Normandy—it originated in France. The red lion is the traditional emblem of the kings of Scotland, from whom it can be traced back by devious routes to the ancient tribe of Judah, which legend says founded the city of London 1100 B.C. Ireland is represented by the harp. The fleur-de-lis emblem was brought to Canada by the early French settlers. It is the emblem of a France which no longer exists—a royalist, not a republican, France. And, finally, there are the three maple leaves to symbolize the union of people of all racial origins in the new country of Canada. All our history is embodied in these emblems on the flag we now have. Since 1924 it has been the recognized emblem of Canada all over the world. Canadian troops fought under it in world war II, then in Korea, and are carrying it proudly today in Cyprus. Canadian Olympic teams carry the red ensign, and it flies over all buildings owned or occupied by the federal government or its agencies both in and beyond Canada. It has been the distinctive flag of Canada by official proclamation since 1945. Nothing can grow if it is severed from its roots. To try to cut Canada off from the roots of its traditions and its history can only have a withering effect, set province against province and culture against culture. We do not need a new flag; we need a return to the ideals and principles upon which our country was founded.

The matter of a free vote on this flag issue has been much discussed both within and without this house. A lot has been said about the freedom of members to vote as they choose, without regard for party lines. But how can it be called a free vote when the Prime Minister has stated unequivocally that he is staking his government's life on the outcome? How can members of this house who support the government vote against the flag measure, when they know that if the Prime Minister's flag is not adopted it will mean forcing another general election on the Canadian people? On May 19 the Prime Minister stated:

> I think I should make it quite clear that when the government submits to parliament a matter of policy—and this is certainly a matter of policy—the government must stand or fall on the results of the decision of the house.

Arthur Blakely, writing on the subject recently in the Montreal Gazette, had this to say—and he said it very well—on the dilemma in which certain members must find themselves on this issue:

> If they vote one way, their consciences may be maintained in good working order, but their government may go down the drain. If they vote for the other side of the proposition, the government would survive while their consciences might be lost. So there it is. Liberal M.P.'s will be free to vote as they please: As long, that is, as they can resolutely ignore such considerations as the fate of their party and of their government. And all this, in the certain knowledge that they won't become candidates for immediate expulsion.

Unfortunately, we come back again and again to the all-important fact that imposition of this white flag on all of Canada will divide our nation further, and perhaps irreparably. It is true, of course, that a substantial majority of the people of the province of Quebec want the Prime Minister's flag. But I believe that what is happening in Quebec today is that a determined group of fanatical young French Canadians is attempting to erase from the history books what happened on September 13, 1759, and to rewrite the next 205 years to read, not as it happened but as they would have liked it to have happened. It is quite true that rural Quebec over the years has not progressed economically as have rural Ontario, the prairies and British Columbia. I can fully appreciate the problems, having been born in Quebec and having lived for most of my life in northern New Brunswick, where the problems are much the same although for different reasons. But I feel that much of the difficulty in Quebec over the past 200 years has been attributable to their educational system. It has been a system that trained able theologians, philosophers, lawyers and doctors; but at the same time it has failed in the sciences, mathematics, engineering and allied skills on which modern civilization travels.

What too many are attempting to do today in Quebec is to place the blame for this failure on English speaking Canada; and, Mr. Speaker, I for one—and I am sure many others—do not accept that. Nor will we accept this attempt to destroy our British heritage. Why does the Prime Minister feel that he can ensure unity in Canada by appeasing one province and antagonizing nine others? The results of attempts at appeasement are evident to any student of history. From the Danegeld to Munich, appeasement has never worked. In my opinion it is not going to work now.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment to the resolution before the house calling for a national referendum on the flag issue. This would give every Canadian of voting age the right to express his opinion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I be permitted to mention that there are conversations going on across the aisle, which makes it a little difficult for the speaker to be heard by the Chair.

Mr. MacRae: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Was this government elected solely on the promise it would give Canada a three maple leaf flag? I would say it was not. This was never mentioned in my constituency of York-Sunbury. I am afraid it was only mentioned in those constituencies where it was felt it could get a few votes. There are many factors that enter into the election of a political party. We must remember, too, that this government is not in a majority position in this house; it is in a minority position. It is here by sufferance of the splinter parties, who for the most part are like the mule, without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity.

Some time in the next four years there will have to be a general election. A referendum could be taken at that time with very little expense or cost to the treasury. Furthermore, this would provide a cooling off period for emotions and tempers to subside. The Prime Minister would not be put in the position of forcing his personal choice for a flag upon the Canadian people who for the most part do not seem to want it. Here is a sensible and workable alternative to an action whose only result can be to divide our nation further.

Much of the work of this parliament still remains to be done. The Canada pension plan is still only in its formative stages. Nothing has been done toward providing the promised 10,000 university scholarships. This promise has not been fulfilled. Nothing has been done for eastern agriculture, or in any event very little. These and many other urgent matters are awaiting consideration.

I appeal to the Prime Minister and to those who advise him, especially those from Ontario, the maritimes and British Columbia, to use their common sense on this matter to help to save Canada, not to destroy it, to keep it the great nation it has become over the last two centuries and to ensure the great future which could be in store for our children and for those generations yet to come.

Mr. Heber E. Smith (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, we have been constantly reminded in the last weeks by the newspapers and on radio and television and by our semi-silent friends opposite that we must instantly desist from discussing the flag and adopt Mr. Pearson's pennant as our national flag. I do not know what you would call this but it seems to me something like closure by public opinion or closure by public relations.

With my colleagues from the province of Quebec and with their people I can sympathize, and I hope I can understand their position. But to those zealots and others who think that they can instantly cure the imagined wrongs of the past by quick passage of this resolution I suggest that they could profit by listening a little longer.

It is quite true, I think, that the rest of Canada has in the past neglected Quebec, but I think too that our sins have been sins of omission rather than sins of commission. As long as the people of Quebec seemed to us to be content to be more or less hewers of wood and drawers of water, and as long as they did not make too onerous economic demands on the rest of Canada, we were content to ignore them. But now they are bursting into the highly industrialized second half of the 20th century and they cannot be shrugged off any longer.

Many of those in the rest of Canada who strongly support the new flag are doing so in the sadly mistaken belief that this action will quiet Quebec's economic aspirations. I do not think they could be more wrong. The flag controversy is only a symbol of much greater and deeper problems. But I think too that when we talk about this problem there is something on the credit side for the rest of Canada. Quebec's civil law, its religion and its educational system have been carefully protected by our constitution, and for the use or misuse which Quebec has made of this protection it is not the rest of Canada but Quebec and its people who must bear the responsibility.

But it is not only Quebec that is changing. All of Canada has changed. Until the end of the second world war political realities in Canada were based on an Anglo-Saxon majority and a French minority. True, the majority were probably careless of the feelings of the minority and tended rather to ignore them. But in our anxiety to right the wrongs we do not, I think, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) and some other members opposite have suggested, have to apologize for being Canadians of Anglo-Saxon origin.

Anglo-Saxon Canadians have their own adjustments to make. No longer are Anglo-Saxons the prideful majority in Canada. With the influx of post-war immigration it is not now a case of the English majority and the French minority but an Anglo-Saxon minority, a French minority and a new Canadian minority. This is a great, and only now recognized, emotional shock to those of us who are Anglo-Saxon either by birth or heritage and we as well as our French compatriots need understanding and patience. For that reason I think those who are impatient must listen a little longer to this emotion charged discussion of the adoption of national symbols.

Getting a new flag is not like changing traffic signs. It has to be a symbol of unity and it must have the emotional support of a very substantial majority of our people. It must have meaning for them. Unless it has, it would be better to have no flag or no national symbols at all. A flag such as the one now proposed, with its lack of aesthetic appeal and having regard to the blatantly political auspices under which it has been introduced, will be absolutely repugnant to a very large part of the Canadian population, and will be so for at least a generation and possibly longer. I think the Prime Minister is sincere, and I say that honestly, but I think he is misguided. But if he is sincere surely we can get a better solution than the one that has been presented to us now.

A flag and a national anthem, as I have said, are matters not so much of reason and logic but of emotion. Many people passionately believe that Canada must have a distinctive flag bearing no indication of either British or French heritage. Many people just as passionately believe that the union jack must form a part of any official flag. Smaller groups have equally strong views as to other designs and conditions acceptable to them.

Mr. Speaker, I notice it is five o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, 13th August, 1964

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Wilfred Judson, a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 13th August, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to a certain bill.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills.

Mr. Churchill: Before we proceed, Mr. Speaker, may I on a point of order draw the attention of the government house leader to the fact that this is the third time in succession, I think, that private members' hours have been interfered with in order to attend in the other chamber. I think it would be fairer to the private members of this house if those occasions occurred during government time and not private members' time.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READING

Bill No. S-38, to incorporate Congregation of the Marist Sisters—Mr. Dubé.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, July 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-27, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Brown—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Number of directors.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, I thought perhaps I should say a word or two in answer to some questions asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming. In the debate on this subject two weeks ago I stated that I was sorry the hon. member was not present when this bill came before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, to which it was referred. The president and some of the directors and officials of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada were present to answer all questions. I am sure they would have been only too glad to answer the hon. gentleman's questions. I understood from his speech that he was not a member of this committee, but a representative of his party was present. Of course, the hon. member could have been present and asked any questions that he wished.

As sponsor of this bill I should like to deal with his main point. He desired to know if one of the new directors would act as a liaison officer to deal with points of view and complaints of subscribers. The views of subscribers or any complaints they may have are handled by the various employees of the company. If a complaint is very important and far reaching, it will eventually come before the board of directors. It would be unrealistic, Mr. Chairman, for the directors or any director to rule on every point of view and every complaint that is received. I refer particularly to the one that was dealt with by the hon. gentleman. This was a complaint respecting a girl receiving a bill from the telephone company which she thought should have been paid by another girl who had placed the phone call. If this particular matter had come before a crown corporation, for example, I submit it would have been dealt with in exactly the same way as it was dealt with by the officials of the Bell Telephone Company. The question of how the Bell Telephone Company of Canada or any crown corporation would handle matters of this kind, I suggest is scarcely germane to the subject matter of this bill.

With respect to the question of whether additional directors, appointed pursuant to the provisions of this bill, would cause any change in the policy of the company, I would unhesitatingly say no. I believe it to be only reasonable, as has already been stated in the house and before the committee, that the growth and development of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada since its incorporation is reason enough for the company's desire to be allowed to increase its directorate from 15 to 20 members. It is only natural, Mr. Chairman, that the company after all these years might desire to be enabled to increase the size of its board of directors. The Bell Telephone Company of Canada was incorporated not long after the first long distance call ever made in the world. This call was made between Brantford, Ontario, and Paris, Ontario. The company's record and development since its incorporation speaks for itself. I take pleasure in submitting this bill to the consideration of the committee.

Mr. Temple: I should like to speak on this bill because of the fact several references have been made to Northern Electric Company and the fact that there has been a lack of competition in so far as Northern Electric is concerned. Allegations have been made that Northern Electric pretty well have things their own way. The reason I take an interest in this matter is that we have a plant of Northern Electric Company in Belleville. I make it a habit to go through my riding as often as I can and visit the various manufacturing plants in order to ascertain their problems and find out as much as I can about matters pertaining to these various industries. I have come to know something about the operations of the Belleville plant of Northern Electric.

As I have said, there has been some talk in this committee about the lack of competition which Northern Electric has, as a subsidiary. I want to talk about something Northern Electric does in connection with which they have a great deal of competition in the United States market. The Belleville plant of this company has manufactured and sold to the United States two items which alone have brought in over $2 million worth of sales. This is good for Belleville and it is good for Canada. One of these items is a television routing apparatus which was designed by Northern Electric in Canada and supplied by the plant in Belleville in competition with other United States electronics firms. It was sold to the Columbia Broadcasting System and installed by Northern Electric in New York city. I might add that this year the company is selling more of these items in various United States centres.

The other item is the parametric amplifier, which again was designed and manufactured by the Belleville plant. These amplifiers are used in tropospheric scatter systems. They are exported to the United States for incorporation by Radio Engineering Laboratories into their scatter systems, which are sold on a world wide basis. Tropospheric scatter systems permit multichannel telephone, teletype and data transmission without line of sight restrictions. Now, this is the sort of thing which Canada needs, and it is somethng that Northern Electric is doing. We all know, Mr. Chairman, that we need more exports, we need more United States dollars to help with our balance of trade problems. These things are being provided by Northern Electric. They are imaginative; they are scientific; they are going ahead; they are doing a good job, and also they are creating a great deal of employment at home. I myself know, so far as the Belleville operation is concerned, that it is a very good one. They are entering into competition, and with some insight and ingenuity they are coming out on top.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to support the bill presented by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Brown).

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, we do not object to Bill No. S-27 being passed, as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat said; however, I think he is wrong in saying that the Bell Telephone Company, a private enterprise, has competition in Canada or in our province.

The Bell Telephone Company is now a monopoly and when we hear a very dear friend of the hon. member, Hon. René Lévesque of the province of Quebec, saying that the Bell Telephone Company has to be nationalized in order that the control of that public service be eventually resumed in our province or in Canada, I think the hon. member should consult his bosom friend, Mr. René Lévesque, before making such statements.

We do not object to the Bell Telephone Company having 20, 25, 35, 50 or 1,000 directors—a request for 20 directors is now being made—we have no objection to their number being increased to 1,000 or 10,000 it matters little to us, but we must understand the reason for the existence of the Bell Telephone Company. We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, are undoubtedly in favour of private enterprise and we necessarily want to give it full freedom, as long as there is competition to safeguard the rights and the interests of consumers and of people in need of its services. However, we are against trusts. There is federal legislation against trusts that might be set up or be in existence in this country. This act has not been enforced, not only in the case of the Bell Telephone Company, but in many other cases also.

Mr. Chairman, Bill No. S-27 comes to us from the Senate.

Earlier, at five o'clock, the private members' hour, private bills were called. At that time it was said that such and such a bill was allowed to stand at the government's request, and finally we came to Bill No S-27.

Mr. Chairman, all those bills come to us from the Senate, from the other place. I believe that we should not, as responsible members elected by the people, accept any bill from the Senate.

The Senate is a place made up of gentlemen, former politicians, from one party or the other, who are not elected by the people, who have never represented the people since they were summoned there. And yet, they are now trying to rule the roost so far as selecting the legislation to be presented to the House of Commons is concerned.

A little earlier, a bill to incorporate a bank and another to incorporate the Congregation of the Marist Sisters were allowed to stand so that we could finally reach Bill No. S-27 entitled: An Act respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what is going on between the Senate and the government—besides there are not many ministers here now and I do not know what happened. However, we firmly intend to stop the passing of all bills that will come to us from the Senate as long as the bill of the premier of British Columbia to incorporate the Bank of British Columbia is not passed by the Senate.

I solemnly declare that we do not intend to let the Senate tell us what to do in the House of Commons, because not a single senator has been elected by the people whereas we and you, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve will surely agree that his remarks go far beyond the scope of clause 1 of Bill No. S-27 under consideration.

His comments are interesting, to be sure, and hon. members are no doubt listening to them with great attention, but under standing orders, the hon. member is not allowed to go beyond the scope of clause 1 of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Once again I will abide by standing orders which forbid my going beyond the scope of clause 1 of Bill No. S-27. I just wanted to point out that since the senators, for whom I have a great deal of respect, are not elected representatives of the people, we will object as long as necessary to any bill from the Senate submitted to the House of Commons.

[Text]

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Definitely.

Mr. Basford: In the position he has just announced that his party is taking, I am wondering whether he has had any agreement with Premier Bennett to take this viewpoint?

The Chairman: The question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) is also beyond the limits of the bill and out of order.

Mr. Caouette: You asked whether Bennett let me do this or—

The Chairman: Order please.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I was not out of order, but a Liberal member was. As usual, all Liberal members, as well as the Minister without Portfolio, are out of order.

Mr. Chairman, Bill No. S-27 says:

Whereas The Bell Telephone Company of Canada has by its petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

I shall now read clause 1:

The business of the company shall be managed by a board of not less than five nor more than twenty directors, as may from time to time be determined by resolution of the shareholders, and each such director shall be the proprietor of at least ten shares in the capital stock of the company, or such other additional number of shares, not exceeding forty additional shares, as the shareholders shall by any resolution passed at any annual general meeting, or special general meeting, from time to time determine; and the said board of directors shall be elected and hold office as hereinafter provided; and a majority of the said directors shall be residents of Canada."

Mr. Chairman, this concerns the operations of the organization of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, within the boundaries of Canada.

It is all very fine to read in the bill that a majority of directors shall be residents of Canada, but nobody is or will be surprised to hear that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company of America, a branch of that American company. Even if we have a Canadian majority of directors, officers and shareholders in the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, this corporation is, nevertheless, under the control of a parent company, a master company, in the United States. This means that our telephone system, in Canada, is still under American control.

Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lotbinière says: Hear, hear.

Why try to mislead the public with bills like this one? Why do the hon. senators—most of them former politicians accept to submit to us a bill like Bill No. S-27, to make people believe that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada will, henceforth, be controlled by a Canadian majority, which is untrue, because the Americans still control that company?

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that I have absolutely nothing against Americans. But let us stop making believe that by moving bills as insipid as the one now before us, we shall take over control of our economy, of our administration and of our assets, etc. It is absolutely false to pretend that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada will be controlled by a Canadian majority, even if it had 20 directors, or even 1,000 of them.

Mr. Chairman, I will now conclude my comments on Bill No. S-27 because other hon. members intend to say a few words about it.

However, I wish to say that bills coming from the Senate do not interest us any more and that we will do our utmost to prevent their passing because we do not want to be told what to do by people who are not elected by the people.

Mr. Choquette: Will the hon. member for Villeneuve allow a question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Choquette: The hon. member seems to be against companies controlled by Americans. As a good car salesman, could he tell me who controls the Chrysler Corporation of Canada?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, it affords me great pleasure to answer the question of my hon. friend from Lotbinière. The Chrysler Corporation of Canada is controlled by the Americans, like Ford and General Motors. He probably owns a General Motors car.

The Chairman: I do not think the question of the hon. member for Lotbinière is in order.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, may I point out just the same, on a question of privilege, that I have been advocating for over ten years the establishment of a wholly Canadian automobile factory? If we do not have such a truly Canadian company at the present time, the Social Crediters are not to blame, but rather the Liberals and the Conservatives who have never done anything to develop our own resources.

Mr. Choquette: I rise on a question of privilege—

The Chairman: Order. There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I cannot recognize the hon. member. If he wishes to speak, he must in the first place resume his seat.

Mr. Choquette: May I have the floor?

The Chairman: The hon. member should take his seat. He has expressed the wish to speak on a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve. Before he does so, I wish to point out that the Chair is of the opinion that there is no question of privilege. If the hon. member wishes to take part in the debate, he will be recognized in due time.

[Text]

Mr. Peters: I am grateful for the intervention of the hon. member for Villeneuve, for whatever reason, because it gives us an opportunity to say something about the affairs of the Bell Telephone Company, and if the situation continues a good many more members will probably have the opportunity to say something on this subject.

The sponsor of this bill mentioned the fact that I am not a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines but that I have the right to attend the meetings of that committee and ask questions. I believe this could only be done in exceptional circumstances; it is not the normal practice of committees to allow people who are not members to raise a number of questions at committee meetings.

The sponsor has been very fair in saying that the directors would be willing to answer a number of questions. My objection to this bill would be removed if a suggestion made by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni last week were taken into serious consideration. Although there has been a change over the years, the New Democratic party still has an interest in seeing that government control is exercised where a public utility is involved. This does not always mean nationalizing particular industries, though it is believed that in the field of communications, as in other fields of public utility, this is desirable. The suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was that the five new directors should be appointed by the government rather than by the company. This would take account of the fact that the public has not always been well represented on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company. I believe this situation would be remedied, provided the government were to appoint the new members. I do not believe it is necessary for us to control this company, even thought it is a public utility, but I think it is necessary for the people who use a monopoly utility to have some voice in its operation.

I know the government has often been accused of being a bit socialist—of adopting some of the policies of the N.D.P. To some extent it is tarred with the same brush as the N.D.P. If this is true to some extent, and if members of the Liberal party are willing to accept the accusation, it seems to me this is an excellent occasion upon which to do so, and if the mover of this motion before us would rise and assent to this bill being sent back to the committee, with his blessing, for the purpose of having the government negotiate with the company with regard to these five new directorships, it would I think meet my requirements.

My objection is that these five new directors do not seem to be in a position to guarantee that the reforms I have previously indicated will be achieved. The sponsor, in rising to reply to previous questions, referred to the case I mentioned of a young lady living in Ottawa. I do not think she would object to my using her name, but there is no point in doing so. Suffice it to say her member of parliament is a lawyer who has been interested in this case, as have other lawyers. This claim No. 29159-707, was before the board of transport commissioners in 1962, and no reply has been received to the legal arguments which were put forward. I am of course not a lawyer and cannot tell the committee much about this case, but it is headed:

> In the matter of the application and complaint of... concerning the general regulations governing the furnishing of telephone service and equipment by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and further concerning certain wrongful and unlawful acts and omissions by the company in furnishing telephone service and equipment to her.

Then reference is made to sections 34 and 35 and section 353(1) of the Railway Act and it continues:

> An order declaring that rule 31 of order 81007, of the 11th March 1953, as amended, which provides, "31.—If objection in writing is not received by the company within thirty days after a statement of account is rendered, such statement shall be deemed to be correct and binding upon the customer".

And so it goes on. I will not abuse the privileges of this house by reading it all, but I am sure that those who have been applying for this extension of the number of directors are well aware of this case. The law being what it is, and lawyers being what they are, I can appreciate the delay. But what I cannot appreciate and what the hon. member sponsoring the bill should be highly indignant about is that these principals have asked him to make the explanation which he made this afternoon without fully informing him about this case before the board of transport commissioners and of the fact that they had done nothing about it.

This complaint has been made in a proper manner and I think the hon. member has been imposed upon and denied a courtesy which should have been afforded him. He should feel very indignant about the matter, and so should all of us. I think the company are being deceitful by not replying and have not been very frank with the hon. member sponsoring the bill, as well as with other members of this committee. They are abusing the very rights they are asking for by being unwilling to give the proper information. If a member is asked to reply he should be fully informed of the facts. I think that the principals should look at this claim, because it personifies the problem I am raising.

I have received many complaints from areas which are served to the effect that the individual subscriber's rights are not being honoured and that he is not being given a fair shake by the Bell Telephone Company. If more directors are to be appointed we should know why they are asking for additional members. We should also consider that the government itself has a responsibility in the matter. I know the Liberal government is not going to nationalize the Bell Telephone Company or the telecommunication services of this nation.

Mr. Caouette: The banks want it.

Mr. Peters: I do not care who wants it, they are not going to do it. This should be carried out not only on a national scale but a provincial scale. This has been accepted in Saskatchewan and in Alberta, and I think it has also been accepted in Manitoba. We are not asking for anything nationally which has not already been accepted by many provinces with assistance given in others.

Rather than asking a private member to sponsor a bill which affects the economy of many citizens in Canada and eliminates rights which should be those of every subscriber to a public monopoly and particularly where an individual is denied the right to complain to the board of transport commissioners, it would be more acceptable if the government were to finance the appointment of these five new directors so that the government itself would have some say in the operations of the Bell Telephone Company, which for the present at least would satisfy me and many of the people I represent. If the hon. member wishes to rise and say that this is so I am perfectly willing to accept it. If he or any of the ministers wish to refer the matter back to the committee for further consideration, I am happy to suggest that that action be taken.

It is interesting to note that one of the problems which will have to be considered by the board of directors, a problem which you and I should also be considering, is the situation which develops between the Bell Telephone and Northern Electric Company. In the act establishing the Bell Telephone Company the company was limited to a 6 per cent profit. But are they limited to that profit? I'll say they are not. Northern Electric comes along and says they need some more money from Bell, and that money is transferred. Then that money is distributed to the board of directors of the company, who are the same as those of the Bell Telephone, which company we said could not obtain more than 6 per cent profit. This is a violent abuse of the law.

The Chairman: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, particularly in view of the fact that there are only a few minutes left before his time expires, but he, and other members before him have referred to the relationship between the Northern Electric Company and the Bell Telephone Company. I wonder if the hon. member would enlighten the Chair on how this is encompassed by clause 1 which is now before the committee.

Mr. Peters: The board of directors in the Bell Telephone Company are identical to the directors in Northern Electric Company. Northern Electric Company is a wholly owned subsidiary of Bell. What is done by the directors in the parent company appears to be almost the same as what is done by the directors in the subsidiary company. I really do not think you can separate the two. In effect they are the same body.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out some of the things the subscribers will be turning to the board of directors to decide. This has reference to the fact that we decided by law this company was not to make an exorbitant profit; yet it has done this by its ownership of Northern Electric. Do they charge the subscriber a reasonable rate? A letter written by a member to the dominion bureau of statistics just recently, on July 31, elicited the reply that the Bell Telephone Company in Montreal charges $6.46 for a private line; in Ottawa, $5.46; in Toronto, $6.03. What about the provincially owned telephone companies? In Winnipeg the charge is $3.90; in Regina, $3.90; and in Alberta, $3.50.

Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting money is not being made by the provincial telephone companies, but I am suggesting that the subscribers of Bell Telephone Company are paying twice as much for the service they receive as are subscribers of other systems of public utility. We attempted to deal with this by providing in the original law for a limit of 6 per cent on the profits of this company. This was to provide a monopoly, utility service at a reasonable cost to the subscribers—and this has not been accomplished. I am in complete agreement with our increasing the board of directors by five; I would agree that we should increase the board by 15 if necessary, provided we stipulate that the new directors are appointed by the government. If this is done, Mr. Chairman, I think we will be able to support wholeheartedly the motion that is before us, because the motion will carry out the intention of the original act in regard to the limitations that were provided therein. I suggest that anything less is unfair, unreasonable and should not receive the support of members of the house.

The mover of the motion has suggested that this matter should have been discussed in committee. I will therefore resume my seat, with the expectation that the hon. member will move that this subject be referred back to the committee for discussion of the matters that obviously were not before the committee when they considered this bill previously. If this is done, I think it will allow the company to provide the answers that they may well have to some of the questions we have raised.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, on this occasion I have some pleasure in supporting the hon. member for Timiskaming. He did refer in rather unkind terms to my profession, but I know we are not sensitive and I forgive him for that. I am not prepared at the present time to support this bill, for a number of reasons. I am not a member of the committee but I have read the proceedings of the committee very carefully and I do not think the reasons given for increasing the number on the board of directors carry any weight whatsoever; so much so that I wonder whether they are the real reasons for presenting this bill.

This bill, as hon. members know, is to permit an increase of the board of directors from 15 to 20. Mr. Vincent, the president of the company, gave evidence before the committee and was asked a question by one of the members of that committee as to the reason for requiring a greater number of directors. He asked whether 15 was not sufficient for the entire administration. Mr. Vincent replied:

> We should have a little more leeway. We should be able to do things.

The hon. member for Quebec East then asked, "What things?", and Mr. Vincent replied:

> Things we want to have.

He did not at any time specify clearly what he wanted to have. He did go on to say:

> We might want—I would personally like to have a seat on the board so that our vice presidents could take turns on the board for a period of six months, for instance, so that the directors could have an opportunity to get to know our officers.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the Bell Telephone Company is able to arrange that its vice-presidents and directors become acquainted with each other without the necessity of coming to parliament and asking that the board be increased in number to this extent.

Mr. Cowan: They could have phoned each other.

Mr. Brewin: I think that problem could have been looked after in some other way. Then Mr. Vincent said:

> So there would be one seat for the vice presidents who would be appointed director in turn for a period of six months so that they would have an opportunity to get to know our people. It is a good thing, it would be a good thing if our vice presidents could know the people who are there.

But there is no explanation given as to why some other method could not be found, rather than coming to parliament with this bill in order to achieve this objective. Mr. Vincent said they should have a little more leeway. Leeway for what, Mr. Chairman? I am assured that there are a number of large, very well managed companies in this country, with boards of directors of 15 or less, which handle a tremendous amount of business. I think an hon. member put on the record earlier in this debate the business connections of the present directors. They were very, very extensive. Mr. Vincent suggested that some of these directors might not be there all the time; but I think we all know that a group of perhaps eight or nine people sitting down can do quite as much business, and as efficiently, as a group of 17 or 18. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, no particular reason was advanced for the necessity for this bill in the evidence presented to the committee. The hon. member who introduced the bill did not take any great pains to tell us why it was necessary, either. He said, "Well, the Bell Telephone Company has grown in size since 1927, when the number of 15 was first established".

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, I might remind the hon. gentleman that it was 1880.

Mr. Brewin: I am afraid the hon. member is wrong. I am relying on the evidence given by the president of this company, and at page 421 of the evidence given before the standing committee Mr. Vincent said the date was 1927. The hon. member for Quebec East asked:

You were allowed 15.

Mr. Vincent: We have had 15, from 1927 on we have had 15. Before 1927 there were not always 15.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member would have to acknowledge that Mr. Vincent, the president of the company, probably knew what he was talking about when he gave this evidence to the committee.

Mr. Brown: What I meant was that the number of 15 directors was made allowable in 1880 on the incorporation of this company.

Mr. Brewin: It was made allowable, but they did not seem to find it necessary to have 15 until 1927. In any event, Mr. Chairman, it does not really affect the basis of my argument, because they got along up to 1927 without this number of directors, although as we have been told their business was increasing all the time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am informed that a messenger is on his way from the other place.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An act to provide for the revision of certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and to provide adjustments of fiscal arrangements and taxation provisions consequential upon the provision of youth allowances to parents resident in certain provinces.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of standing order 39A, it is my duty to inform the house that the question to be raised at 10.30 o'clock this day is as follows:

The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan): Airports; Toronto; meeting respecting monopoly of taxi service.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, at five o'colck I was discussing the differences of opinion between the various groups who are proponents of one form of national symbol or another, and I was pointing out that there are two large groups in Canada who are deeply involved in this matter.

There are those who say a flag must be completely distinctive and there are those, almost equally large in number, who claim that any national symbol must bear some evidence of our history and, if possible, our British connection. Having regard to the controversy that has raged, these two groups may at this time seem absolutely irreconcilable; but I am not so sure of that. However I am sure of one thing, and that is that to impose absolutely the wishes of one of these groups on the other is not an act of unity but an act of disunity.

Emotions cannot be controlled by legislative fiat. The losers in such a decision could be just as opposed and as bitter as ever to the adopted design, and Canadian unity, which after all is presumably the reason for our adopting a national symbol, would suffer a disservice. Discussions on the flag are not new. They have been going on for many years, but during those years conditions in Canada have changed, and changed greatly.

No longer does the cry that was sometimes heard, that an Anglo-Saxon majority was imposing its will on a French Canadian minority, have much validity because Canada, much like this House of Commons, is now a country of minorities; and this will be, whether we like it or not, a continuing fact of Canadian life. Other conditions are changing too—

Mr. Caouette: That is not right.

Mr. Smith: It is right. Canadian developments in these days of rapid communication, no matter how much some of my friends might not like to know it, have been and are being greatly influenced by our giant neighbour to the south. Economic patterns are changing and changing rapidly, and this is affecting our cultural lives. It is no longer just a struggle to protect French Canadian culture or English Canadian culture, but it is going to be a struggle to maintain a Canadian culture and identity; and in this struggle, whatever our racial origin, we must try to be together and work together. We must not further divide ourselves unnecessarily over a question such as is involved in the selection of a flag or an emblem; and all Canadians, in parliament and outside it, have a share in the responsibility for not facing these problems earlier.

If the matter brought forward by the Prime Minister had been introduced in a less partisan political way I think most of the bitterness that has now arisen could have been avoided. Perhaps it is still not too late to repair some of the damage done to Canadian unity, but I know it is possibly too late for an ideal solution. It is possibly too late for a long drawn out solution, or for a conference of the type that would be long drawn out, but surely it is not too late for a compromise that will leave feelings less embittered than they are now.

I am sure that if a small committee of the house were appointed it could quickly produce some formula for national symbols that would bring together, rather than divide further, the Canadian people because, make no mistake and have no illusions, we are being divided over this issue. However I am sure something can be done that will repair some of the damage and avoid further damage.

In closing I would like to commend my proposal to the Prime Minister and to the leaders of the parties that they try earnestly to consider some conference method, some quick conference method, or some alternative similar to a conference, that will solve the problem and get Canada off the collision course on which it now seems to be.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to participate in this debate on the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), and I welcome the opportunity to place on the record my views, and the views and opinions expressed to me in recent months by my constituents, relative to the flag proposed by the Liberal party as a national flag of Canada. I also wish to present my views on the proposal made by my leader that a plebiscite be held to determine this issue. In my opinion this is the only method that will guarantee that Canadians have a voice in settling this problem.

This afternoon I thoroughly enjoyed the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae), a holder of the Military Cross for outstanding bravery beyond the call of duty in world war II. He speaks with the courage of conviction earned on the battlefield, and in my opinion he made an outstanding contribution to the debate.

I have received numerous letters and petitions on this controversial subject, and without exception all these letters have requested me to endorse the retention of our present flag, the Canadian red ensign, or a modification of the ensign containing the union jack in the corner. I have not received one letter from my entire constituency, which totals some 50,000 people, requesting my support of the white flag containing red maple leaves proposed by the Prime Minister. I therefore believe it is only proper that I take this opportunity to raise the objections of my constituents, especially of those who have written to me, outlining their concern over the flag that is proposed by the administration.

So that my own position will be abundantly clear, I stand for the retention of the old symbols, the distinctive Canadian red ensign which today flies from the peace tower. The day may come when in the course of unity we may be required to accept some change, but I would always hope our flag will contain some symbols of our past traditions.

I cannot help but ask the question, why is the Liberal party introducing this divisive symbol to parliament at this time? No doubt in reply some Liberal member may say it was an election promise to be carried out within two years of taking office. But surely this administration, which has made so many wild promises in order to regain power, has some sense of responsibility to the electorate. I would like to know the yardstick used by the Liberals to measure the priority of their promises. Mr. Speaker, the promise to bring in a distinctive national flag is only one of many promises which were made during the last election campaign. What about the promise to institute a medicare plan, the promise to improve unemployment insurance and the promise to establish portable contributory pensions? The Liberals were going to promote freer trade by co-operating with other free world countries to reduce trade barriers. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), speaking in Milford, Nova Scotia, undertook to improve trade between Nova Scotia and the West Indies, but to date no action has been taken. In co-operation with the provinces, the Liberals were going to see that more low rental homes were built; they were going to improve retraining programs and pay supplementary benefits in cases of long term unemployment. The Liberals were going to review our civil defence policy, too. However, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) had other ideas and today the militia, which was to have been the nucleus of our civil defence force, is seriously weakened in numbers.

The Liberals promised to establish scholarships to help young people obtain a university education. They were going to introduce a national health plan. All these and a score of other promises were made, but to date no action has been taken. It is therefore not the real answer to this question to say that a promise is being implemented. We must look for a deeper meaning if we are to understand the Liberal motive for the course which is being followed.

In my opinion Canada's flag should be a symbol of unity. But the proposed flag or design presented on the resolution now before the house has already created widespread disunity and discontent throughout Canada. The reason is easy to understand. First of all, many Canadians have raised objections to the three maple leaf design, on the grounds that it bears no relation to the history and culture of our past and contains little promise for the future. In the second place, they raised strong objections to the method used by the Liberal government in bringing this issue before parliament.

This government has no clear mandate to provide Canada with a new flag and it is not being brave or courageous by endeavouring to impose its wishes upon the great majority of Canadians. The hon. member for Argentueil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) speaking this afternoon, said his leader showed courage in bringing in the maple leaf design. If this is courage, then it is a courage born of despair. I would remind this government that it is still a minority government with the right to rule only as long as it commands support in parliament. The government undoubtedly has a right to introduce this type of resolution, but when doing so it should have stated clearly that the vote, when taken, would be a free vote. I say this because what we are considering now is an issue of the heart, not of the head. If there were a free vote, members of parliament, who are elected to represent as closely as possible the viewpoint of their constituents, could express themselves freely in debate and vote according to the wishes of their constituents. This would be for the parliament of Canada its finest hour. This would be representative government in the best sense of the term.

However, that is not the policy of the government. I would like to think that at one time it was the intention of the Prime Minister to allow a free vote. In support of this statement I would refer to Hansard of May 12 where hon. members will see the following recorded on page 3164:

> Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Will the right hon. gentleman give an assurance that when the design for the proposed new national flag is presented to parliament all members of this house will have a free vote, and that the defeat of the design would not be considered a vote of non-confidence in the government?
> Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): When the time comes to submit the decision of the government in this matter to the House of Commons I would hope every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates, and that there would be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense.

Later the Prime Minister had second thoughts about this. Some of his image makers said: You cannot do this; it will result in another defeat; you must put on the whip; you must get out the lash; you must cram this down the throats of the Canadian people whether they like it or not; if you don't, you will be charged with another retreat. In any case, when the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) raised this question again on May 19, as recorded on page 337 of Hansard, he had changed his mind. This is how the exchange reads:

Mr. Douglas: I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he considers a free vote to be one in which the members have an election pointed at their heads like a gun.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the members have had an election pointed at their heads like a gun in respect of every decision that has been made in this house on policy matters since we took over the government. I have pointed out and I think I should make it quite clear, that when the government submits to parliament a matter of policy—and this is certainly a matter of policy—the government must stand or fall on the result of the decision of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crouse: You are happy about it, are you?

Then, to continue quoting the Prime Minister:

But we have gone out of our way, and I have gone out of my way personally, to let the members of this party know that in a question so personal, so close to their conscience, so deep in their emotions, as a flag, a member of the Liberal party, in voting against the decision submitted by the government, would not be read out of the party for so doing.

Well, hon. members opposite have at least that much to go on. They know that if they stand up and vote as their consciences dictate, at least they will not be voted out of their party. But let me return to what the right hon. gentleman said:

This is a matter of policy...the government must stand or fall on the result of the decision of the house.

The Prime Minister has presented his flag design and he has indicated that unless the resolution before us receives majority support he will consider the vote as being one of non-confidence in his government and plunge this country into another federal election. Only the Prime Minister has this power. He is the only one who can call an election at this time. If he were to do so it would, in my opinion, be nothing short of an election of frustration. If he had a majority of members to back him up in the House of Commons, regardless of the size of the Conservative following it would be our responsibility to bring the request of the people of Canada before this house. It would be our responsibility and we would have to discharge it; there would be only one course open to the Prime Minister if he had a majority, and that would be either to implement closure or to close down the house and call another election. But in his present minority position any election he may call would be nothing short of an election of frustration.

This is the threat. This is the club held not only over the heads of government supporters but also over the head of each member who holds a seat in the House of Commons: Either vote for this resolution or there will be an election. In my opinion no vote on the proposed resolution regarding the flag can be called a free vote, nor will it give a clear indication of what any member is thinking, regardless of where he sits in the house, if he is threatened by the Prime Minister with another federal election should the motion fail to carry.

This is nothing short of political blackmail. Some Canadians are asking us as a responsible opposition to do everything in our power to prevent another election. At the same time they are asking us to do everything in our power to prevent the Pearson pennant from passing the house. I ask the Prime Minister: Is he not aware of the necessity to improve understanding among our different racial, religious and cultural groups as quickly as possible? Is he not aware of the serious cleavage in Canada today which threatens to pull up by the very roots the tree planted by the Fathers of Confederation almost 100 years ago? By introducing this flag resolution at this time the Prime Minister has stirred up racial differences between the two great founding races of the country which will set back the clock of national unity by at least 50 years. I ask the house, is this the price the Liberal party is prepared to pay for its flag? It is evident to me that the Liberal party has not realized that it cannot pull down the Canadian red ensign without men rising to its defence.

By order in council dated January 26, 1924 the red ensign was dedicated as the Canadian flag, the distinctive emblem of Canada. That was over 40 years ago and it served as a distinctive flag for our Canadian forces during the second world war. During this 40 year period Canada has earned a place of esteem among the nations of the world. When you visit foreign countries in which the Canadian government owns property the Canadian ensign flies over that property reflecting the prestige which is enjoyed by Canadians everywhere. Man's roots go deep. We cannot arbitrarily destroy the symbol which represents our loyalty and affection, not for the Queen of England but for the Queen of Canada. She is our Queen as well. We cannot arbitrarily destroy the symbol of old France, the fleur-de-lis which is on the red ensign at present. We cannot arbitrarily destroy a flag which in toto represents our membership in the commonwealth of nations.

We are not being presented with a new flag, Mr. Speaker, because Canadians generally are demanding a change. When speaking with my constituents they ask me: "What does the Liberal government and the Liberal party find wrong with the old flag? Why do they want to pull it down? Why do they want to destroy the symbol that truly represents our varied traditions and cultures?" I could bring into this house, as I am sure every other hon. member of the Conservative party could, thousands of letters received from our constituents in support of the red ensign. I have brought only a few. I should like to read into the record one written by Mr. J. D. Dexter to the editor of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on May 25. He says:

> Just about everything has been said concerning the Canadian flag by the two sides, those of us who would keep the union jack in at least part of the design, and by those who would be satisfied with anything except the union jack. It now seems that "a banner with a strange device" will be forced upon us.
> One thing that should not be forgotten, however, is the shameless impudence of those "representatives" who would undoubtedly vote servilely as their government tells them; many must well know that this will be against the wishes of the great majority of their constituents. They are perfidious toadies, allied with a lunatic splinter group from Quebec.
> Is there none in the Liberal party with the courage and honesty to vote as his conscience tells him? It should be an honour to be read out of this particular government, and is the only way to be respected and remembered.

That is one of the mild letters which I have received, Mr. Speaker. I have received others. One from Mr. Norman Swain says this:

> May I add my vote to the millions of Canadians who favour retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag.
> Being ex-air force like yourself, I can look back on many sad and also happy moments when the red ensign proudly flew to make us mindful of just why we were waging the war. Let's not simply kick it aside like a worn out shoe.
> It's high time we called a halt to concessions to the one province in ten.
> You know the breed of the people on our south shore better than I. It will be a long time, if ever, when you can tell those mothers who lost sons in the war, those hardy fishermen who sailed under the ensign, that in order for them to be true Canadians it is necessary to change our flag.
> Get on with the business of the country and stop fooling around with matters like the flag issue, designed to appease one province, and which is making Canada the subject of cartoons throughout the world.

This is a telegram I received:

> Strongly urge you stand for referendum or national plebiscite on flag issue. No matter what outcome such high handed action by minority government although brave not to be tolerated.

Finally, one from Mr. Lee Crooker dated July 28, 1964:

> The proposed destruction of our Canadian flag is the greatest crisis since confederation. It is greater than confederation. It will bring shame on every one of us and destroy all national consciousness.
> Canada expects that the official opposition of which you are a member will take whatever steps are necessary to prevent this outrage.

This, Mr. Speaker, is our responsibility. We must present these views on behalf of our people who are calling out to us. They cannot come to Ottawa. They cannot stand up in this house and speak what is in their minds and what is in their hearts. They have charged us with this responsibility. And not only us in the opposition; they have also charged hon. members opposite. But they sit silent and will not portray the true thoughts of the people who elected them and sent them here. I hear a remark from the other side and I sincerely hope that an opportunity will be provided for the hon. member to make a contribution on his feet.

An hon. Member: One of the trained seals.

Mr. Crouse: Quite frankly I find it difficult to answer these questions which have been raised by my constituents because it seems that the Liberal party has designed a new flag in an effort to create a following among those who dislike the Canadian ensign because it reminds them of our connection with Great Britain. We cannot destroy the past through legislation, but we can through the passage of this flag resolution make our future progress as a nation more difficult.

Some of the Liberal supporters have said that we have a need for a distinctive flag, and that this is why this resolution was presented. Canada adopted the red ensign with the dominion badge for its merchantmen in 1892, just 25 years after confederation. The arms of the four provinces that united in 1867 formed the great seal of the dominion. The present arms, which date from a royal proclamation of George V dated November 21, 1921, include a shield containing the traditional emblems of England, three golden lions on a red field; of Scotland, red lion rampant on a gold field; and of Ireland, gold harp on a purple field. It also contains the emblem of France, three golden fleurs-de-lis on a purple field, thus incorporating into the flag that still flies here the one French flag that in ancient times flew over Canadian soil.

From its use on merchant ships, the Canadian red ensign moved, with widespread international recognition, to the position of our flag abroad, superseding the union jack. This was written into law in 1924 when parliament enacted legislation providing for the wearing of the ensign on any Canadian building abroad. At home the ensign is the national flag by authority of an order in council dated September 5, 1945. This order says it is appropriate to fly the ensign on any occasion when it is desired to mark its Canadian significance.

Now, what did General H. D. G. Crerar, the distinguished commander of the first Canadian army in world war II, say when recounting an official welcome to him in Ottawa, as put by the Canadian Legion magazine for March, 1963? He stated:

> As we moved away from the central entrance of the parliament buildings, Mr. King the then prime minister turned sideways in the car and looked upwards to the peace tower where, at the top, the Canadian red ensign waved. He then said, "And that, general, is another problem which your Canadian army has solved for Canada—the matter of our national flag".

The Canadian ensign was suitable for prime minister King, and I would like to ask, why is it not suitable for Prime Minister Pearson? What does the Canadian Legion have to say about our present flag? They say:

> The Canadian red ensign has grown out of Canadian history. Why now reject that history? All the parliamentary votes at Ottawa cannot blot out the truth that it was under the red ensign in two world wars that Canadians of all racial origins risked and gave their lives for those values which the red ensign symbolizes.
> The great Edmund Burke warned that a people who ignore their past, will have no future. Those who believe that maple leaves alone, or other symbols related merely to geography, are sufficient for a Canadian national flag, are suggesting that Canadian nationhood has been determined by purely materialistic factors. It is true that the Canadian physical environment has affected the development of Canadian nationhood and Canadian characteristics. But Canada's soul is rooted in the flow of history which came out of western, Christian Europe. Spiritual and cultural death is the end of a nation cut from its roots. And the Canadian red ensign does symbolize those roots.

[Mr. Crouse.]

I believe that epitomizes the thoughts of many Canadians and I am glad to have this opportunity to place it on the record. I ask the Prime Minister to look upon Canada as a great tree having twin trunks that represent our French and British ancestors. Our tree has many grafted branches representing Canadians of other national origins, and as an entity I believe it can grow larger and stronger and provide shade and comfort for those less fortunate than ourselves. I ask him, and I ask the house, what could be more distinctive for a Canadian flag than one representing the two great founding peoples of Canada? On this issue the Prime Minister has been given a golden opportunity to provide leadership, to show evidence of his statesmanship and establish unity throughout the entire length and breadth of this nation. In my opinion, it is not too late to make the changes that are necessary.

While I honour and revere our present flag, the Canadian ensign, I believe it could be modified to give more reasonable representation to Canadians of French origin. The easiest way to accomplish this change would be to remove the shield in the field of the red ensign and replace it with a large, gold maple leaf on which there was superimposed the fleur-de-lis. I am convinced that a flag containing these symbols would be accepted as a flag of good design and as a reasonable compromise by most Canadians. This would not be just a flag of maple leaves, which I understand are found in greater numbers in the states that border us to the south than in some of the provinces in Canada; in fact, there are provinces in Canada in which there are no maple leaves. This would be a flag that all of us could proclaim as a symbol of our unity, the ideal flag for a country like ours.

Tonight, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but wonder, where are the supporters of this maple leaf design? Where are the two members for Halifax, Nova Scotia? Why have they not spoken on this issue? They receive the same mail as I receive, and certainly this must indicate to them that their constituents want them to speak out in favour of our present flag. When are we going to hear from the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen), the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond? When are we going to hear from the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart)? Is their contribution to this important issue going to be one of silence, which is all we have had from them to date?

I wish to take this opportunity to challenge the Prime Minister to carry out at least one of the promises he made to the Canadian electorate during the last election campaign. He promised 60 days of decision and a bold, decisive government. Well, his 60 days of decision were a bitter disappointment to many Canadians; but he can still provide bold, decisive government. I challenge him to stand in his place today, or tomorrow, and free the Commons from the sword of Damocles that is hanging over its head in the threat of a general election if the flag resolution fails to pass.

I challenge him to tell the House of Commons that the vote on the flag resolution will be a free vote, with members in all parties voting as their constituencies and their consciences dictate, without fear of a general election if the flag resolution is turned down. I approve of a plebiscite on this issue and predict that if a plebiscite is held the results will be most surprising to the Liberal party. It is perhaps the only way that Canadians who feel they have been robbed of their right of expression on this issue can have their views properly presented as members of this great nation. The selection of a new flag design could then be a choice made of the people, and I believe the majority view should be accepted. However, Canadians will have had their plebiscite right here in the Commons, through their freely elected representatives, if the Prime Minister would give us a free vote. Should the maple leaf design submitted by the Prime Minister be approved under these conditions, then I am sure Canadians generally will accept—they will be forced to accept—the rule of the majority.

However if it is rejected I hope the Prime Minister will seriously consider the proposal I have put forth for a distinctive national flag, which I believe Canadians generally would accept since it would satisfy every desire of our multiple religious, racial and cultural background, and it would eliminate the confusion and disunity which is created at present by the two flag resolution.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Quack, quack.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to this debate during the past two days, and it seems to me it is strangely reminiscent of the atmosphere that prevailed on the government side of the house back in 1956. It was a Liberal government in those days, too—during the famous pipe line debate. I was a member of the House of Commons at that time. The situation was different inasmuch as the government of that day had an overwhelming majority and it used that overwhelming majority like a steamroller to subvert the basic rights of parliament. When I rose to speak during that pipe line debate I was received in much the same way as I was received tonight, with cries of "Carried" from the government side of the house—and the government side of the house today is again occupied by the Liberal party. There is a difference, however; it has not the great big steamroller majority that it had back in 1956. But it still seems to be saturated with the spirit of complacency, indifference and arrogance which prevailed during that tragic pipe line debate which brought such disastrous results to the parliament of Canada.

There is something else in the atmosphere of that time which is reminiscent of the atmosphere that prevails tonight. The government backbenchers were dedicated to a conspiracy of silence. The very word parliament means to talk and discuss. Yet the supporters of the government sit in silence, do a little jeering from time to time, shout "carried" from time to time, but make no constructive contribution to this important subject which is not only dividing the parliament of Canada but is also dividing the people of Canada from sea to sea. During the rape of parliament back in 1956 I could not understand how the government backbenchers could sit in silence on that occasion, and neither can I on this occasion when a subject is under discussion that is loaded with emotion and concerns the basic values and ideals, the symbols that are identified with our traditions, with our parliamentary institutions, with freedom and liberty, which are at stake at the present time.

I want to spend the few moments at my disposal tonight discussing the amendment to the Prime Minister's motion. There is a fundamental purpose in the amendment. As has already been indicated, it is to provide an opportunity to the government and the Prime Minister in particular to find a convenient face saving device to get them out of the difficulty into which they have stumbled. I cannot believe that a man with the international background of the present Prime Minister of Canada could have deliberately set out to deal with this controversial and divisive issue in the almost absentminded fashion in which he has proceeded up to the present time. I believe he has stumbled into this difficulty in much the same manner as the government stumbled into its problems with the budget, stumbled into difficulty over the Canada pension program and generally have stumbled along in an unplanned, haphazard fashion which I do not have to emphasize during this debate tonight because it has been commented on by many of Canada's leading journalists as well as by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), who also doubles as a journalist.

I think it results from a lack of firm leadership on the part of the Prime Minister and I think it results too from the fact of his diplomatic training. In the world of diplomacy you almost have to be a chameleon. You have to be all things to all people if you are going to bring about the kind of reconciliation that he has been so successful in achieving during his years as a diplomat representing the Dominion of Canada. I think too of his background, as it was pointed up the other day in a little exchange between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, when he indicated that the Leader of the Opposition had once been a Liberal and the Leader of the Opposition shot back that the Prime Minister had once been a Conservative. I think his difficulty results from the fact that he has fallen into bad company. He was once a Conservative. I am sure those Conservative instincts must still be there, but he is surrounded by bad company at the present time. It is interesting to note that a convert to a political party is always more extreme than those who are born into that party.

As another illustration of this point I would refer to the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who spent most of his formative years in the province of Manitoba and was a Conservative, but now has become an extreme exponent of the worst aspects of Liberalism. I am also reminded of Sir Winston Churchill, that great parliamentarian, who changed parties twice. He was a Conservative, became a Liberal and then in his more mature years he returned to Conservatism and wound up his parliamentary career in a blaze of glory.

The reason I interject this thought is that what the Liberal government is doing in dealing with this important issue is typical of their attitude toward Canada and confederation down through the years. It is the old divide and rule formula. As a western member I have been subjected to this right from the days I first entered parliament. At that time—and they are great sloganeers—they used the slogan: A vote for Dinsdale is a vote for Drew, is a vote for Bay street, is a vote for duplicity. This is the sort of divisive tactic that they pursued in my early experience in politics, and they are still using it today. I have an advertisement here which goes back about 10 years in Canadian politics. It reads in part as follows:

> Manitoba now receives $23 million yearly under the dominion tax agreement. Drew would scrap this to fatten the money bags of Ontario and Quebec.

This is the old divide and rule formula which has been used with such a devastating effect on national unity in this country. At the bottom of the advertisement you are urged to vote Liberal. This formula, applied by the sort of company the Prime Minister finds himself in at the moment, found expression in a rule or ruin policy during the period when the Liberals were in opposition, at which time they downgraded Canada in the eyes of the world for the sake of political expediency. I read recently an interesting speech by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) which was delivered on Friday, June 26, to the British-Canadian trade association at the Seignory club in Montebello. On page 7 of his speech there is this interesting paragraph:

> Shortly thereafter I visited Britain to discuss with the government a number of trade matters, and also to try to break down the psychological barrier that seemed to have been created by giving some reassurance about the underlying trend of conditions in Canada and the growing opportunities for sales in this market.

Who created the psychological barrier? The hidden persuaders of the Liberal opposition of those days. And so I could go on with the campaign gimmicks, the party slogans imported from the United States such as "get the country moving again", the comic books, the pigeons, etc., etc. These tactics are being repeated in the government's handling of the very delicate issue of the flag. They have resorted to the same divide and rule tactics.

They have attempted to destroy the opposition leader in a personal assault. They have allowed themselves to become the representatives of the extreme forces in this country, and I shall be dealing with that in a moment. They have brought in the flag with typical Liberal arrogance, without having it passed upon by a parliamentary committee and without any referral to the other groups or other parties in this House of Commons. Even worse than that, it was never even discussed by the members of the house supporting the government. It is a personal flag, it is a party flag.

The only political parties that have had personal party flags were parties like the nazi party, which had its personal party flag. This flag is a complete break with Canada's past. Again, the only countries that have resorted to this tactic in adopting a flag have been Soviet Russia, nazi Germany, and more recently Dr. DuValier who is in charge of the new government of Haiti. They have adopted a flag which has completely repudiated their past because they have emerged out of a revolutionary rather than an evolutionary process.

I believe these tactics have been deliberately designed to irritate the House of Commons. We have had no Easter recess—the first time that I can recall in the 14 years I have been here that parliament has not been granted a recess. We have not had any summer recess. If there is any procedure that is designed to irritate and disturb the House of Commons, it is this procedure of forcing parliament to operate under pressure on controversial issues. Perhaps, sir, it has been done deliberately to keep members of parliament out of touch with their constituents, because in this Ottawa hothouse experience we sometimes live in an Alice in Wonderland environment. Of course, it makes it more difficult for members who come from the more remote parts of Canada. We have not been able to get back to our constituents in order to feel the pulse at the local constituency level, particularly on an issue like this. It is political expediency of the worst kind which almost borders on the political philosophy espoused by Machiavelli of the middle ages.

An hon. Member: It is renaissance.

Mr. Dinsdale: No renaissance here, I assure you.

The Prime Minister's attitude has been one of political provocation right from the start. As the Globe and Mail has said, and this has been quoted many times, it was deliberately designed to set Canada on a collision course. There was a challenge issued for the opposition to bring in a want of confidence motion on this issue. Some have been interpreting the flag debate as an attempt on the part of the opposition to precipitate an election. This is the last subject which should be used as a basis for an election in this country. This is why the opposition is introducing an amendment for a referendum to make it possible for the government to get out from under the impasse in which it finds itself, and to avoid the collision that has been referred to by many commentators in this nation.

The attitude, the belligerent attitude if you will, with which this subject has been introduced by the government suggests that it hopes that the present house of minorities, this divided house, will split on the issue. They will capture one province in toto and then press ahead to divide the rest of the country in a desperate attempt to get an overall majority. This is why I say we are dealing with Machiavellian politics on this issue. Hypocrisy is also involved because it was said this was an election promise. This aspect has been dealt with adequately. Many silly things are promised during an election campaign, and this is a quotation from the Prime Minister himself. It certainly was not in my campaign. My campaign dealt with the propaganda issues like deficit financing, wheat sales to China, Diefendollars and all the other gimmicks with which we in the Conservative party had to wrestle. The very fact that a two flag resolution has been introduced too is indicative of hypocrisy. We are being given a flag that repudiates the past on the one hand, and on the other hand we are going back to the union jack, which is directly concerned with Canada's colonial period. This is hypocrisy. This is political subterfuge of the most despicable kind.

It reminds me of the tactics that were used in South Africa where, in response to the extreme element in that commonwealth country the government decided to bring in a distinctive flag. They could not decide on a distinctive flag, so they brought in a two flag resolution, a distinctive flag plus the union jack denoting connection with the commonwealth. It was not long before someone moved in the house that there was no longer a necessity for the union jack. The prime minister agreed and that was the end of the symbolism denoting the connection of that country with the commonwealth. We know the story of South Africa only too well since that time. You cannot appease extremism by this sort of tactic of appeasing the extremist viewpoint.

The suggestion that this is extremism is not my idea at all. It is not the first time this subject has been up in the House of Commons. I am going to quote from an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press back in 1954 when a Liberal backbencher introduced a resolution for a distinctive flag. The government very wisely withdrew itself from any connection with the private member's bill. Here is what the Free Press had to say about that particular period in Canadian parliamentary history:

> Only two small remnants of extremism survive the earlier controversy. On the one hand, there are still some extreme "loyalists" who want the union jack alone, but to this there are overwhelming practical objections, besides the fact that citizens of the United Kingdom understandably show no enthusiasm for having their flag used by Canadians. On the other hand, there are those who want a flag that does not contain the union jack at all. The Canadian people have continually shown by their actions that the majority feels otherwise. Hence the red ensign has been for all practical purposes our national flag since confederation. Notwithstanding the lack of formal authorization, it has ousted all competing flags. It has withstood every effort to discard it. And it surely will withstand any future effort, for this is the standard under which Canadian soldiers were proud to fight and die in both world wars. It is by consent of parliament in 1946 our national flag "until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag." The other day it was consecrated as such on the altar of Westminster Abbey.
> In the result it may be said that the Canadian flag question is now settled, finally and irrevocably, except for formal recognition by parliament.
> Surely the time has come for this final step. Parliament at the next session should declare the red ensign to be our national emblem.

That is what the editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press said back in 1954 when this issue was before that parliament.

We are catering to the extreme elements on both sides of this question, on one hand repudiating our past by bringing in the maple leaf flag with no symbols of our heritage, and on the other hand going back to the union jack. It was a two flag resolution. Now it has been split into two resolutions which I think is symbolic of the split in our country on this issue.

The Kingston Whig-Standard of Saturday, May 16, had this to say:

> As recently as February of this year Prime Minister Pearson said publicly there is more to this flag issue than simply satisfying the desires of those who make the most noise. It now appears that the noisy faction has got to him.

The final paragraph is this:

> Mr. Pearson has issued a challenge to Canadians. He is betting on the weakness of parliament to sustain him in his decision to sell us out. This is a bitter day for Canada.

I know this is a device that has often been resorted to in parliament. Members of parliament in their desire to get home in the withering heat of July have often left their places of responsibility in the House of Commons, particularly those of us from remote parts of the country, but not on this basic issue. We are here to discuss it in all its important aspects.

The fact that the government has capitulated to the extreme viewpoint in Canada is also revealed in the way this matter was initially introduced to Canadians, not through the House of Commons but by an insult to the Canadian Legion. I used to be the parliamentary secretary to the minister of veterans affairs, and in that capacity it was my privilege to attend the opening ceremony, on Sunday evening, of the biannual national meeting of the Royal Canadian Legion. It was always understood that was not an occasion for a political speech, that it was a semi-religious, dignified ceremony.

I can understand the response of the legionnaires on that occasion. Some of them indulged in booing, and a good many of the papers said it was a shame to boo Canada's Prime Minister under these circumstances. Mr. Speaker, I was in England at the end of the war in 1945 and I followed the post-war election there. I heard Sir Winston Churchill speak in Wembley stadium. I heard that great man, who led the free world through the holocaust of world war II, booed by a large section of the audience. They were not booing him; they were booing the domestic policies that he represented.

Was Winston Churchill vexed? Did he stand on his dignity and say, "You should not boo the prime minister of the United Kingdom?" No. He turned to the section of the audience booing him and he said, "Let's get it over," and he led them in a great booing chorus, and he won the meeting from that point on.

A journalist, Mr. Bill Smiley, had this to say about that particular episode in Winnipeg:

> By the way, I think the Canadian Legion has had some pretty shoddy treatment from the daily press because of its espousal of the ensign, and it's less-than-enthusiastic reception of the Prime Minister, at the Winnipeg convention.
> What's wrong with an organization standing up for something it believes in? Everybody else does it, from hog producers to folk singers. But the Legion was suddenly made the butt of a vicious and slanted attack in certain dailies.
> The men who did the dirty work in two wars were suddenly catalogued as a group of reactionaries, or as one daily put it, a "bunch of old soldiers", trying to tell the rest of Canada what flag it should have.

I must congratulate the Legion for its responsible response to the attack made on it in sections of the press and in some other circles in Canada. In its own publication, The Legionary, it showed a great sense of responsibility—this is in its July issue—when in a special editorial the editor said, in reference to the number of letters it had received:

> Most of the letters, about 85 per cent, are in favour of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as our national flag. Practically all of them, however, whether pro or con, are of a highly emotional and critical nature, and in the interest of national unity The Legionary refrains from printing any of them.

I think it would have been much better for national unity if this issue had never been precipitated into the arena of public discussion under the present circumstances. It was done in the presence of a group of Canadians who, above everything else, must be aware of the significance of symbols. It was the sacrifices of these men and their colleagues in world wars I and II which made the ensign Canada's distinctive flag. Surely the flag that has been the symbol of the values and ideals that made this nation great, having gone through the bloodshed in two world wars, should have received the kind of distinction that is demanded by the resolution put before the house by the Prime Minister?

Just briefly I want to indicate what the ensign stands for. We have had its history outlined. It became Canada's distinctive flag after the sacrifices of two world wars. In 1919 Canada discovered its soul at Versailles where the then Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, insisted that Canada be represented as a separate nation. This came about, I think, because of the upsurge of reasonable nationalism that had been contributed to by the influx of a great wave of immigrants who came to this country in the early part of this century, immigrants such as the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), who was quoted this afternoon by my colleague from Victoria-Carleton. These immigrants came to this country to get away from the narrow nationalism that was turning Europe into a bedlam, and they appreciated the positive nationalism that was afforded to them under the aegis of the ensign and all that it represents.

I could quote the late prime minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who made a specific promise that any flag in this country would contain the union jack. I could quote the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, and I heard him speak in this house whenever the issue came up when he was prime minister. He would say, "I am in favour of a distinctive national flag, but unfortunately some of my fellow Canadians are not of the same viewpoint, and so long as I am prime minister I will do nothing that will divide this nation." That is the responsible attitude that any leader must adopt if we are going to evolve to our full stature of national unity.

Why is this such an important issue? Before I go into that I can also refer back to the parliamentary committee of 1945 which made a specific recommendation for a distinctive flag, the ensign with the golden maple leaf in the fly to which might be added a superimposed blue fleur-de-lis, recognizing the traditions of our past. We do not have to be adamant on this point, because if we are to resolve this matter at all it will be on the basis of typical Canadian compromise. As a westerner from Manitoba, the home of No. 1 Northern Manitoba wheat, I think the gold maple leaf would be a symbolic reminder of the golden prairies which are contributing so much to the well being of the Canadian economy at the present time. Certainly a maple leaf has little symbolic significance to us.

This is a vital issue, because flags symbolize those values and those ideals which undergird the spiritual life of this nation. The heart craves some tangible expression of the intangible and this always emerges out of the past. Why are flags kept in cathedrals? It is because peoples of all nations recognized their importance as symbols of underlying values.

The ensign could not be more representative of those values because it comes about—particularly the union jack in the corner—by bringing together the crosses of St. George, St. Andrew and St. Patrick. St. George was a Macedonian, a symbol of chivalry; St. Andrew was a Jew who became the patron saint of Scotland; St. Patrick was a Roman who went to Ireland as a missionary to spread among the Irish the civilization he had learned in France. These men were not chosen because of their racial or national backgrounds. They were chosen because of the ideals they represented and the deeds they had accomplished. Britain was a melting pot made up of Angles, Saxons, Picts, Scots, Normans, French and many others. Unity came out of diversity because of a dedication to common ideals. Canada, too, must evolve unity out of diversity and this can only be done by dedication to the spirit of tolerance, the spirit of fraternity which was referred to by Cardinal Léger recently when he spoke in support of the ecumenical movement which is now sweeping Christendom. These values and ideals are symbolized by the crosses in the jack—and the very name "union jack" derives from the fact that James VI of Scotland who became James I of England loved to sign his name Jacques, French being the language of the court at that time.

There is something of deeper significance in this attempt to destroy the symbols of our past. I think it is associated with the materialism of the nineteenth century. The intellectual movements which came out of the nineteenth century counted many which gave rise to a distortion of scientific principles. The science of eugenics, for example, was blown up into the theory of the superiority of certain races which has plagued the twentieth century. The fact that we keep talking about the founding races and bringing race into this discussion is I think, a reflection on this age; it is something we should have long grown out of in this country. Someone has said that man attempted to destroy God in the nineteenth century as a result of which, in the twentieth, he is in great danger of destroying himself. If you destroy the symbols, if you remove the symbols which go back to the foundation of western civilization, which go back to the crusades, which are identified with the slow evolution of our political institutions, how long will it be until the facts upon which those symbols are based are also destroyed in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not intend to deal with the maple leaf as a symbol. It has its place on buttons, badges and other things of that kind where it has been used to good effect. Dr. Eugene Forsey has placed the matter in proper perspective. He says: "A government which is firmly committed to the absolutely bicultural character of our country is yet proposing a flag which contains not the slightest reference to any culture whatsoever—not even agriculture."

An hon. Member: Very funny.

Mr. Dinsdale: Someone across the way says "very funny". It is not funny. It is tragic.

Mr. Bigg: You fellows speak better sitting on your rear ends—why not stand up and make a speech?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) says it is very funny. It is tragic that a government should adopt this hypocritical approach to such an issue. I try to be as charitable as I can, but there is only one explanation: It hopes to split the country and get a majority.

Mr. Sharp: It has split your party, though.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) talks about splitting parties. He and his friends have been trying to split the Conservative party, east against west, using divide and rule methods.

My time is running short and I must bring these remarks to a conclusion. The Liberal party has talked about a new approach to politics, one without partisanship and all the other nasty things which are identified with our political system in Canada. I say that in their approach to this issue they are attempting to re-open all the old divisions. They are playing party politics with a vengeance. Ramsey Cook, who gave the public a little book last year entitled "John W. Dafoe and the Politics of the Manitoba Free Press" had this to say:

> Based on the careers of Arthur Meighen and Mackenzie King it would appear that something other than honesty and integrity is required for success in Canadian politics.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: I agree wholeheartedly with that. As a westerner, I know what the Right Hon. Mackenzie King did to divide that part of Canada.

It is not good enough to deal with this matter from a narrow, partisan standpoint. You may win Quebec, but you divide the rest of the country. That is obvious, so why proceed on a collision course, on a headstrong, partisan course which will have such a divisive effect on the progress Canada has made toward national unity? Our traditions and our history are not a private preserve for the Prime Minister and the Liberal party to exploit or repudiate as their whim or fancy may dictate.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Hamilton East): In one sense this seemingly interminable debate on the question of a distinctive Canadian flag possesses pathetic undertones. That this question could and does engender such seeming fervor can only be interpreted as a manifestation of our frustrations as a nation. As a nation, in recent years, we seem to be floundering. We have not found a sense of direction.

This observation would not, I think, apply to our French Canadian compatriots. One often hears of the so-called mistrust of English speaking Canadians towards the new ideas, aims and aspirations of the Quebec renaissance, of Quebec revolution, if you like. I believe all too often this mistrust is mistaken for simply envy. Quebec seems to have emerged from the morass. They seem to have acquired a sense of direction. They seem to have a destiny to realize. The new vitality of Quebec is one of the most encouraging signs indicating that perhaps our apathy has run its course. The destiny of French Canada is inexorably interwoven with ours and cannot be realized alone. How else to explain the repercussions of this movement in Quebec upon the rest of Canada?

The strange paradox is that many of our English speaking commentators on and observers of the political scene who would extol the virtues of the Quebec development often are the very ones who would deplore an extension of this movement on similar terms to the rest of Canada. The Canadian body politic is starting to flinch, to rid itself of its complacency and apathy, a complacency and apathy albeit more apparent than real. If one welcomes this change, then English speaking Canada can in no small measure owe its new awareness to the sometimes rude jabs emanating from Quebec. Perhaps the rest of Canada has decided to set aside any niggardly resentment and take the development in Quebec as a cue to the initiation of our own re-thinking. True it is that the glamour of the new direction in Quebec should not mesmerize us to the point where we are unaware of the possible damage and repercussions which would arise. However, the attempt to equate the flag resolution with a desire to accede to the desires and aims of Quebec—a very questionable hypothesis in any event—is a telltale sign of an underlying resentment on our part, a feeling we can ill afford to indulge any longer.

Mr. Hamilton: Tom Kent should write more legibly.

Mr. Munro: This tedious and often exasperating discussion—I am sorry, I did not hear the comment of the hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton: I was just asking the parliamentary secretary to tell Tom Kent to write more legibly.

Mr. Munro: This tedious and often exasperating discussion of the flag is fast becoming a great Canadian Preoccupation. Standing alone this question does not deserve such great attention. That there is something of far deeper significance behind this resolution no one will now deny. Perhaps it is our collective desire to go to our own internal brink for one last time, with the desperate hope that the exercise will either kill or cure us as a nation. Does not the whole debate as it is waged here and throughout the country have a fatalistic quality that is unmistakable? Those who would champion the red ensign instinctively know that they have lost. But lost what? Lost the debate in the commons? Lost a great Canadian controversy? Lost just the battle but not the war? The fact that such champions are forcibly arguing for at best a referendum and at least a general election is perhaps one of the great examples of internal political and moral brinkmanship in our Canadian experience.

Let no one misunderstand me. I am not attributing any base motives to those who would champion the cause of the red ensign. They feel deeply. Theirs is a course of action to which they are totally and utterly committed. After all, was it not this side that brought this issue to the forefront by advancing the flag question in the form of a government resolution at this time? No, I am not being critical of those who would fight for the retention of the red ensign, but rather I agree with those Canadians who think that another trip to the brink is precisely what this country needs.

Alas, one thing all this has proved is that the flag debate has unquestionably debunked the theory of those Canadians who would insist that we as a people no longer desire to indulge in introspection, no longer desire to deal in terms of a Canadian identity. To state that Canadians are not deeply troubled over the question of a Canadian identity, Canadian aims, Canada's role, Canada's destiny as a nation, is to be oblivious to the facts.

There are those who say that the discussion of the scope and direction of a Canadian nationalism is a futile and wasteful thing, outdated in this age of international co-operation. This line of thought has been forcibly advanced by many of our leading scholars and intellectuals.

May I refer to a remark made by a man deserving a great respect, Professor Frank Underhill. He said:

> I think we are heading, wherever you look now, towards a rather mean, petty, parochial nationalism.

It is true that Professor Underhill expressed this sentiment in the context of his expressed concern for foreign control, but I feel his statement is no less applicable here. I expect that this flag question will after much turmoil be resolved. I expect we will have a distinctive flag. I believe that during this current process of resolving the matter, and irrespective of the outcome, it can be taken that Canadians have once more served notice on their political leaders that they desire a policy of enlightened nationalism.

Any discussion in the political arena of nationalism, especially a Canadian nationalism, leaves the politician open to immediate ridicule. Such activity on his part is seen as nothing more nor less than that action of a rather ruthless political opportunist, succumbing to the irresistible temptation to seize a time-tested weapon in order to reap rich political rewards.

On the premise that the best defence is attack, may I say that the constant refrains by many of the commentators on the Canadian political scene are distastefully smug, an ego-satisfying device to identify oneself with the conventional wisdom of the so-called intellectual elite, to identify oneself with the enlightened. The answer to a more definite scope and direction of a Canadian nationalism must be found. If it is to be found it undoubtedly lies between the two extremes. The important thing is we must try to find it. The flag issue is simply another price we Canadians would pay to be Canadians; just another hesitant step in our cautious groping to find a truly national purpose.

Of the many Canadians who are prepared to take this step, are there not those who wish that they were more aware of its direction? How much more so, then, must this feeling sway those Canadians who are not as yet prepared to take that step, who desire knowledge of where the step will lead us.

Can we be too critical of those who before depriving themselves of a cherished possession would desire to know that with which it is to be replaced? To say that the replacement will be a distinctive symbol, three maple leaves on a field of white bounded in blue, is an answer too patently superficial. If it is to be replaced with something new let us have a general idea of the dimensions of this newness, of its fundamental meaning. Many surely will acknowledge how much more readily those Canadians who still resist the implementation of this resolution would accept it if they but knew the real ingredients of its substitute.

Our caution, as exhibited in this issue, brings to mind a point made by Professor Kilborn in his book "The Firebrand", a point he seems to have made more as an afterthought. When our country's only armed rebellion, in the early part of the nineteenth century, ignominiously suffered humiliating defeats, it left an indelible mark on our Canadian character. This is the point Professor Kilborn makes that I think is of considerable interest. This, he claims, left us a cautious people, suspect of any emotionalism; a people resolved to settle its problems by travelling the safer road of pragmatic compromise. No ringing declarations for us; no high sounding protestations of faith and allegiance for us.

Does not this present resolution somehow disturb this pact we have made among ourselves? This resolution would squarely confront and challenge this historic legacy. Nor, as some unhappily believe, does it lend itself to solution through the good old Canadian way. We are boldly dealing with a matter on the order paper which is not subject to our typical Canadian treatment. Too slavish adherence to the device of compromise has left Canadians with a festering sense of unfulfilment. Like a bandage too hastily applied, it covers up the wound before the air gets in and often as not the wound never properly heals.

I am not extolling the virtue of soul searing, emotional orgy, but rather the necessity of seeing this debate on the flag as it is encompassed by the many other problems and circumstances we face as a nation; problems of which we are now at last aware; problems that all too often are given the old Canadian treatment, that of burying them in our subconscious and hoping against hope they will fade. They have not faded; events have nurtured them; they are bursting their enclosure; they are stridently emerging into our consciousness. Any further attempt to entice them back into the recesses of our national soul are attempts we undertake at our peril.

What are some of these encompassing problems and circumstances that reflect so strongly on this question of a distinctive flag? We know that no modern industrial country has ever allowed so large a portion of its industry to fall into foreign hands as we have. I would include in this our natural resources, owned by non-residents to a frightening degree—a type of foreign ownership which to all intents and purposes is irredeemable. Predicated upon this premise that Canadians cherish their independence, dare we delude ourselves that such a development has not imposed severe limits on that independence; that it has and will cut drastic inroads into our sovereignty; that it constitutes a constant pressure area to prompt ever greater economic and political assimilation to our southern neighbour?

One striking thing about this flag issue is the bitter ironies that it has pointed up. One such bitter irony is now evolving; that is the thought that so absorbed will we become in our internal wranglings, in nourishing our resentments—resentments that are invariably the aftermath of the application of the old Canadian treatment—that we will ignore the real threat to our over-all sovereignty, the threat of foreign domination. I fear that this type of reaction feeds on what is our legitimate desire for a vent for our collective frustrations. We are in a somewhat similar position to the wife beater. He picks on his own because the boss gave him a bad time at work; but he does not change his job.

Another bitter irony is the current attempt to becloud the issue by the effort of many to convince the Canadian people that any manifestations of nationalism on their part are not only belated but are primitive expressions of a backward people. So elevated do we regard ourselves in the hierarchy of sophisticated nations that such an observation is particularly galling to our self-esteem. It would not be inaccurate to say that such a suggestion has found a fairly wide acceptance in our country today. The really unfortunate thing is that it has little merit. The ironic connotation is that its most ready proponents would seem to be among our corporate leaders and our heady left-wing intellectuals. At last they have found a sentiment which they can espouse in common, and apparently with equal enthusiasm. A galling aspect of this particular irony is the fact that the common sentiment would have to be the very sentiment that would undermine those national aspirations that some Canadians may at last be ready to express. I think in this context I can do no better than quote the thoughts of Michael Barkway on the subject some years ago when he undertook to deal with this problem:

> One (argument) is the pose of sophisticated realism which asserts that the conception of national independence is out of date in this nuclear age, and, therefore, Canada should not worry about preserving its independence from the United States. All that needs be said about this slippery bit of semantics is that the premise, in any sense in which it is true, is also trite; and that the conclusion does not follow from it. It is true that the growing interdependence of the world in the world in the nuclear age necessitates increasing limitations upon the sovereignty of all nations. But the chance of getting such limitations universally accepted will not be increased, but reduced, if Canada surrenders its independent voice to one of the superstates.
> The same offence against logic invalidates the argument when it is presented in its alternative form under a cloak of superior idealism. In this form the premise is that national barriers must yield to a universal community of man and a world government. Its false conclusion is that Canada can hasten "the day of the Lord" by sacrificing its independence, not to a world authority, but to the one superstate which happens to be very powerful, very rich and very near. This merely confuses Canada's absorption by the United States with an ultimate kingdom of heaven where all lambs will be cherished by all lions and there shall be no night.

He goes on:

> I don't want to labour the elementary and obvious confusions but so much Canadian thought about independence is so confused that they cannot be ignored. We cannot begin to talk sense until we get rid of the half-baked idea that it is somehow vaguely immoral to assert Canada's will to independence.

Later on Mr. Barkway brings back to our memory a prophecy made many years ago by Henri Bourassa when he stated that if a movement toward annexation ever started in Canada it would be led by "the imperialists of Toronto". This line of reasoning leads one to the historic note that has been drawn to our attention by Douglas V. LePan. In one of his papers, Mr. LePan was warning that Canadians are prepared to pay some price to preserve their national independence but there was a limit to what they are prepared to pay; and then he reminded us of the somersault performed by some of the signers of the annexation manifesto in 1849, signed by many of the very people who had been most vocal in defending Canadian independence and who suddenly became most anxious to exchange it for union with the United States.

The third ironic element that has emerged during our discussion on the flag debate is the often repeated criticism being levelled at the Prime Minister to the effect that his timing was exceedingly bad in bringing in the flag resolution at this time.

When, I ask, could there be a more propitious time? Twenty or even 10 years ago? Surely not. Those were times when we still basked in that affinity with the United Kingdom, arising from the close attachment during world war II and for many years thereafter. To bring in this resolution in those times would have provoked near havoc.

If the argument is that the timing was premature, then would it have been more appropriate to have delayed this resolution to say 10 years from now? I think not. If I may appropriate a phrase uttered by the leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), it would seem that perhaps 10 years from now the more suitable Canadian flag would contain "the insignia of a beaver clutched firmly in the claws of an eagle". Would not a resolution such as the one before us today if brought in at such a time be well accorded that widespread mockery which it may have richly earned and deserved?

Even now the bald fact that many of those who oppose this resolution are rather resigned about the whole thing has an ominous ring. The mere fact of the relatively peaceful discussion of such a resolution now taking place would indicate that to many of our people it is not regarded as a bold new step in the context of a Canadian awareness but a quiet acceptance, an acceptance based on that feeling that perhaps it does not much matter anyhow. What irony, that we Canadians are determined to take a step, for many years regarded as inevitable, only when the taking of such step would be devoid of much of its meaning.

If one of the motivations behind the design to establish a distinctive flag for Canada is the hope that it will stimulate a national pride, one wonders whether the timing is not perhaps too late. Is there not in this country a concurrent discussion generating much heat over the issue of federalism versus sectionalism? Right at this moment are there not many Canadians gravely concerned that the increasing demands of the provinces in jurisdictional matters are sapping the strength of our federal authority? One cannot help but wonder whether the cries of the provinces for more autonomy are not in some degree a reflection of that instinct for survival that tells us to get out of a burning building while there is still time.

Perhaps the reason that the aspirations expressed today are more of a parochial or provincial nature is akin to the feeling that a home owner has when his house is overencumbered. Why needlessly spend the energy in bringing about extensive changes? Is it not more practical to get out and build a new one from the ground up? Perhaps some of this discussion on my part is unduly pessimistic. My only personal hope and prayer is that it is.

I for one wholeheartedly endorse the resolution without amendment and respect and admire the Prime Minister for bringing it in at this time. I support it more for what it can mean than what it is.

Mr. Enns: Would the hon. member permit a question before his time expires?

Mr. Munro: Certainly.

Mr. Enns: During the course of his very learned observations, which were listened to with much care on this side of the house he made the statement that this was really an excellent time to introduce discussion of a flag and asked why we should postpone it for 10 years. There has been no suggestion by anyone that it should be postponed for that length of time but rather just for a matter of months. So I would ask the hon. member why he should want to make that kind of remark.

Mr. Munro: In the over-all history of the Canadian nation I think we must deal in terms of years. When we consider what an appropriate time is, surely we consider that in the context of this year or next year. Surely we do not consider it in terms of two or three weeks or two or three months from now. The fact of the matter is that we have gone this long without a flag. The fact remains that I think it has been injurious to our national aspirations to have gone this long without a flag, and my only point was to establish that now is as good a time as any other, if it is not too late already.

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this time in this debate I want to make it clear that under any circumstances I would have sought to speak on a matter of this importance to Canada and its future. The fact that we are in the month of August and have not had the normal holiday period does not compromise my views in any way. It does not compromise me in my desire to do the duty which I feel I was elected to do by the people of my constituency.

I have had to fight not only serious illness but economic challenges in order to make my way in my lifetime, and in some years I had no holidays. I forwent them to meet the challenge facing me at that time. Equally as much as in the case of personal experience I believe there is a challenge to this parliament and to the people of Canada in the flag debate, and I forgo any hope of a holiday and sympathize with no one for having to forgo a holiday so that debate in this parliament, which is what this parliament is for, may take place.

I do not intend in my remarks to belittle anyone who has spoken in the debate, and there have been members on the other side who have spoken. I do intend to put forward my views on why this debate is taking place now, and on the serious misjudgment of the Prime Minister in having it take place now and forcing it to a conclusion in the dictatorial fashion in which he has started out. I think this is responsible criticism. Although there are those who differ with me and applaud the Prime Minister for bringing the matter forward, I think I have justified criticisms to offer with regard to his conduct in bringing it forward and imposing it on parliament in this fashion. I hope I will be given a hearing as I express, without any malice, my criticisms in this regard.

The debate before the house arose out of a motion proposed by the Prime Minister, which motion was proposed in one part and has since been divided into two. The motion now before the house is in these words:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

I know that the matter under consideration before the house is the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). Mr. Speaker, the levity I hear on the other side indicates to me the attitude of many over there who choose to sit silent, not use parliament for its intended purpose and belittle those who feel it their duty to take part at this time.

In my experience or in my reading of parliamentary history of Canada, I do not know of any serious proposal that had to do, not with the economics of this nation or any subject upon which you normally pass judgment as a result of full consideration, but a matter dealing with emotions relating to the background of the people getting together to form confederation, that has been brought forward in such an arbitrary fashion as the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has seen fit to do in presenting this resolution. It is claimed by the Prime Minister and those who speak for the government that the Liberal party had a mandate from the people of Canada. I ask where and when that mandate was given. Certainly I have taken part in four election campaigns during recent years. If a mandate had been indicated at all it would have arisen from the presentation the Liberal party made to the country in the general election in 1962 and again in the general election of 1963.

In both of these election campaigns the Liberal forces of this country did all they could to defeat me. They had the hierarchy on the front benches in my constituency. They were there between elections and they were brought back in the 1963 election campaign. I do not boast about the results. They have been a deep satisfaction to me because I have lived in this community for over 30 years. The results were substantially in my favour. I think under the circumstances in which the election campaign was conducted I can, in all humility, feel very gratified indeed that the community in which I have lived for that period has seen fit to give me its support. I say the Liberal party had nothing to do with it. They marshalled their forces at the federal level. They were going to win Regina City. They had all their forces in Regina City, but at no time during the election campaign did any one of them mention the Liberal party stood for a new, distinctive Canadian flag which contained no symbol related to the past. They did not say that they would, if they were given a majority, introduce a distinctive Canadian flag. The Liberal candidate in the constituency never mentioned it, and certainly I never offered it to the electorate in any way, shape or form. I believe there are other constituencies in Canada in which the Prime Minister spoke, and in which members on the front benches spoke, in which they did not mention that one of the major planks in their platform was a distinctive Canadian flag. They did not mention that one of the major items with which parliament must deal in a particular session, regardless of the period of the session, would be the distinctive flag. What I have said cannot be repudiated.

It is passing strange, too, that the throne speech that was to herald the great 60 days of decision when everything the Liberal party had promised the electorate was going to be achieved, made no reference to the flag being introduced in this session of parliament. This fact gave heart to some of the people who stood for the Canadian red ensign. Members of the Legion, as pointed out in The Legionary, were given hope that this matter would not suddenly be forced into the realm of politics and partisan action. What changed the Prime Minister's mind? What brought on this sudden haste? What compelled him to make this a major issue in this session and completely disrupt the affairs of this parliament? We would like to know. I think the people of Canada would like to know.

I wonder if it is because of the extremist voice of Quebec? I wonder if that is what it is? I suggest this because in a speech delivered by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) he made a reference to this subject. I am sorry to see that he has left the house because I do not like to refer to remarks made by other members if they are not present. I hope the hon. member will forgive me. The Minister without Portfolio made a speech outside this house referring to the flag and praised the Prime Minister for his courage. I do not intend to quote him, but he can correct me if I misinterpret one of the remarks he made. He said: Let us get on and settle this flag business, when we get the new, distinctive flag the Prime Minister has put before parliament, we will hear no more of extremism in Quebec, we will stop the saboteurs, these bombers, these disrupters. What utter nonsense to say that a new flag, a piece of cloth, will settle them. Is this the reason for the sudden change? The Prime Minister had a reputation for sound judgment, and I do not challenge his services to Canada. What changed the character of this man all of a sudden? On what basis does he thrust this issue into this session of parliament at this time and say: You do this, or else? What has happened to this man? If the reason is the one suggested, then it is utter nonsense. This is no basis for choosing a flag for a country, because that problem appears to have some depth and the very strong feelings of the extremists cannot be settled overnight.

Is this a message that the Minister without Portfolio thinks the people of Canada can accept as the true reason for this flag issue being brought before parliament at this time? No, my friends, I do not accept it and my mail indicates that hundreds of thousands of people in Canada do not accept it. I was born and raised in Canada. I have lived more than half a century. I was raised in a little town in the west. My roots and my family's roots are deep in Canada. My people pioneered the west. We lived in a community in Saskatchewan that had no great services and did not have all the amenities of life that we enjoy today. We lived in a mixed community. Predominantly it was Protestant. We had only two churches, a Methodist and a Presbyterian. We had some Roman Catholic families—not many, but two that I can remember very well, because we were close to each other and played together. We had a Jewish family and we had a Chinese family. We had no problems of separatism, no problems of prejudice. These people joined us at our churches at times because they were Christian people and the Christian message coming from whatever source was interesting to them. Their own church was not available and transportation was not easy. On occasion, they joined with us.

I remember well as a lad going to the Orange celebrations on July 12. I remember how I fully misunderstood things because we used to have some speakers coming from Ontario. I could not understand why one Canadian would say the things about other Canadians that some of these people said. It was particularly embarrassing to me in my early youth when I was forming opinions, because we took one of the Catholic families with us to these celebrations. They came along readily because the celebration took in the whole community. In spite of these messages, no prejudice existed or developed in this community. I am glad to see it has been reduced here. Perhaps, as a result of those speeches, I can understand the feelings of my French Canadian compatriots. They have never been expressed in my family and I hope the time will never come that they will be expressed by anyone. We all want to be Canadians and to get along together as Canadians, but if the Minister without Portfolio is correct, that this flag is an appeasement of an extremist element, no matter on what side of the fence it is, then it is a shame it is being thrust on this parliament at this time.

During my lifetime we have had only one flag in Canada, the Canadian red ensign. I grew up under it. It flew from every building in my little home town when the occasion demanded it. I have seen it flown throughout Canada, and I never knew there was any feeling that Canada did not have a flag.

Today when I see the efforts being made by the government I wonder what it has in mind as the aims and objectives of Canada, and how far it has departed from the original intent of the Fathers of Confederation. I listened to the last young speaker with great interest. He belittled the efforts of those of us who want to maintain something of our traditions and carry them forward in the building we will do in the years ahead.

I entered public life actively as a candidate late in life. I may say I was active throughout my life because I was brought up to consider this part of my duty; but in 1957 I had a challenge thrown to me and I entered public life as a candidate. I certainly did not enter it to come to a parliament to take part in and witness the dissolution of the aims and objectives of the Fathers of Confederation, and of the nation we have built during our first 97 years. Because this seems to be the trend that is being followed by this government, I intend right now at the start of it, on the question of the flag issue, to fight it with all the strength I possess, not because I think a flag should be maintained at all costs but because I think Canada should be maintained at all costs. The intent of the Fathers of Confederation should be in all our hearts, should be what we are here to work for and to which we should honestly seek to contribute.

No superficial symbol, a piece of bunting or anything like that, will contribute to the building of this great nation unless in our hearts we have an understanding, with prejudice removed, and unless we have one aim and objective, whether we are of French extraction, Irish extraction, British extraction, Ukrainian extraction, or whatever. We should have one purpose in mind—to work to build a new nation that will enhance the respect of the individual and increase the freedom he enjoys and has enjoyed in this country under the present flag.

A symbol should firmly express the determination in the hearts of the people of the country to work towards a common objective. I say that this determination is in the hearts of the Canadian people as I have met them, sought conversations with them and discussed amicably the problems we jointly face. It is there now, but it will be destroyed in large measure by the implementation of this resolution which the Prime Minister has so arbitrarily forced on this parliament, and demanded that it deal with on the basis that if it does not accept it there will be an election.

I think I have proven beyond possibility of defence or repudiation from the government side that at no time during the campaigns of 1962 and 1963 did the Liberal party offer, in a manner that would impress Canadians in all parts of Canada, a platform that contained this great plank of this new flag. There were other things it did offer in all parts of Canada that all Canadians understood, and though the Liberal party did not receive the majority of votes or return to office with a majority of members, similar proposals were made by other parties whose combined votes indicated the majority of the people supported them.

In particular I remember the Liberal party's undertaking that it would immediately seek to negotiate with the United States a way out of our nuclear commitments, to remove nuclear weapons from Canadian soil and Canadian military operations in every sphere. This was a plank and platform offered to Canadians in every part of the country. It was a plank which was supported by the majority of Canadians. It is a plank the government should be dealing with now in honouring its commitment to the Canadian people.

The Liberal party has been loud in its criticism of other governments and people for commitments it said had been made, but it has never found or produced any evidence in this house that such commitments had been made. I say it is a shame that the government delays carrying out this undertaking to the Canadian people. If there was one single item of priority in the Liberal platform, on which it got votes in the election of 1963, it was this plank and platform to negotiate a way out of the so-called nuclear commitment. However, as revealed in answers given to questions on orders of the day, we know that no negotiations are taking place and that the government is doing nothing about the matter at this time.

On the question of priorities, we have got a flag debate, even though the government has no mandate from the people to proceed with its flag. No selling job was done by the Liberal party to show it would take this action which today has such priority. Now we are going to be bludgeoned into facing a decision on it. You smile over there, but you cannot deny this. I doubt if you ever said to the people in your constituency that you stood for a plank and a platform that would do away with the Canadian red ensign in two years, and replace it with this proposed design.

The hon. member who preceded me referred to remarks made some time ago by a certain writer relative to foreign domination. Well, we have got foreign domination in the acceptance of the United States demand that we arm ourselves with nuclear weapons. I do not understand the hypocrisy and nonsense in this regard. To me the Minister without Portfolio may have spoken the truth, and I think it should be made known to the people of Canada.

I go further and say there can be only one reason for the haste with which the Prime Minister is demanding a final vote on this question of the flag, and that is to use it as a red herring, to try to get the people to forget that the Liberals' 60 days of decision resulted in a further 120 days during which practically all their decisions were repudiated, not by the people of Canada but by the government itself, because it made them in haste and without full consideration of their consequences. I believe time may yet demand some changes in the distinctive Canadian flag we have had for over 75 years. But I believe the need for such changes will be made evident, not by managed news leaks but by natural developments.

I am receiving a tremendous amount of correspondence on this issue—more than 1,700 individual pieces of mail along with the usual flow of lobby material which all members of parliament receive on every subject. Of all these writers, there were only seven who wanted the Canadian red ensign dispensed with. There were 13 who indicated that their preference was for the union jack alone. The remainder all asked that the Canadian red ensign be retained—the flag of their lifetime, the distinctive Canadian flag which has been recognized on no fewer than three occasions. Although this correspondence cannot represent everybody in my constituency, I am sure Mr. Gallup would consider that it is an overwhelming indication of what the people in my area, at least, desire. Perhaps this situation has come about because the Prime Minister did not say clearly to the people during the last election that this was one of the planks of his platform. Perhaps the people were taken somewhat by surprise and were unprepared for this confrontation. I do not know.

I might take up a great deal of time by reading some of this correspondence. I have listened to many of the speeches which have been made in this house and I have heard other hon. members reading from the correspondence which they have received. All I need say in this regard is that I have had letters from wives of servicemen, from mothers of sons who were killed in action, from ladies who have lost not only their sons but their husbands as well. And the tenor running through all these messages is this: Please stand up and fight for our flag, which is the only reminder that we have of the sacrifices made by members of our families in two world wars. I am ashamed that those who seek to have their way with regard to this flag question should seek to demean the opinions expressed by those who do not feel as they do. I think this indicates the weakness of the whole argument put forward by those who say that the majority of the Canadian people want a new flag with none of our traditions attached to it. I cannot understand anyone taking part in a debate if his proposals are so negative that his only contribution must be to demean opponents who put forward ideas different than his own. I think the caricatures of the Canadian Legion for its stand on the flag question will take Canada many years to live down. I do not think it is proper to joke at the expense of people who have made sacrifices and who have offered to make the supreme sacrifice. I do not think people who have honestly made their views known to the government should be demeaned by a cartoon such as the one published by the Citizen with regard to the Legion's stand on this question. Those who for their own purposes laugh and scoff at letters written by sincere and honest people, members of whose families have made the supreme sacrifice as members of the armed services, and who wish to retain the red ensign for that reason should be ashamed of themselves. We may not agree with them, but if they honestly feel that way, and have so expressed themselves, they do not deserve to be scoffed at.

An hon. Member: Who is scoffing at them?

Mr. More: It has been done in this house.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. More: It has. If the hon. member wants to make a speech, let him get up on his feet and not sit silent and refuse to carry out his obligations to his constituents and to parliament. There have been quite a few occasions on which members opposite have given me the odd lecture on conduct in this chamber, but I will stake my conduct against the conduct of those who have sought to lecture me and bring me to order. I had a little experience in conducting business and taking part in public meetings before I came to this house, and I have not been given to interruption. I have been given to listening to members while they advance their arguments in this house and taking what they say into consideration, because I believe that is what this house is for. All I ask in return is that I be given the same consideration in return. And if the hon. member, or any hon. member, disagrees with the arguments I am putting forward or the position I am taking, he will have at least an audience of one when he rises properly to make his own observations here in this house.

I say it is a shame to this nation that the opinions of people who have given everything to this country should be demeaned. I should also like to refer to the I.O.D.E. because I believe this organization also has given great service to our country. Its members, too, have taken a position which honestly expresses their views and, while it may not be the opinion of others in Canada, it should be recognized as an honest and sincere expression of opinion, and as such it should be given consideration.

I think there has been a mistake in judgment in bringing this issue before the house at this time. I will go no further in criticism of the Prime Minister, because of his distinguished services to this country, services which I recognize. But I believe that whoever advised him, whoever put him in the position of making a one-man decision on a matter of such great importance as putting forward a flag design of the nature now before us, and forcing it upon parliament, has placed him in a most unpleasant situation.

As I say, I have had over 1,700 personal letters on this matter. I do not dare to stand here and say they represent 65,000 voters in my constituency, but I have tried as far as I have been able to find out the views of my constituency. This matter was brought in at a time when the press and radio and television of this country were full of the news of bombing in Quebec, death in Quebec, destruction in Quebec, the burning of the flag in Quebec, the destruction of a monument to a historic figure in Canada. This resolution, brought before parliament at a time when these messages from Quebec were received throughout Canada daily, has not found very fertile ground, to say the least. Under the circumstances, this effort by the Prime Minister and by the government has been interpreted widely throughout Canada—I think I am being fair although I do not want to emphasize it—as nothing but further appeasement of a minority in Canada, even though that minority is one of our founding races. I think this was most unfortunate and was not to be desired. However, this I put forward as being the truth, and I am afraid that nothing that can be said will cover up the fact that the extremists have seized the public limelight and given the matter great publicity across the country. The action by the Prime Minister and his government has not brought forth the spirit of unity which is desired.

Surely any change of this nature can only be justified on the basis that this would result. First of all, I challenge every hon. member of this house to remove prejudice from his heart and to come forward and work with but one desire in mind, a desire to build a better Canada. Having done that I think that many of these other things will come in due course.

However, not having done that, and that not being the case, I believe the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition is the only way this present situation can be resolved, so that whatever final solution this parliament adopts it would be one of permanency and one accepted by the Canadian people. I have heard it said tonight that this flag is a must with this government; that it is something they must do; that it was an obligation they had. I should like to ask, does that make it permanent? Knowing of the divisions in the country and the voices of many thousands of people, I wonder whether in the near future there might not be a change of government and some other government might have an obligation to change the flag. Is this the kind of solution we want to a problem of this nature? I say no. I say that in the matter of the heart, not of the head, in the matter of emotions, not of statistics and dollars and cents, a solution, to be permanent, even with parliamentary action taken, must be a solution that the Canadian people have determined upon by their own voice. To me, that voice can only be heard through a referendum.

The words of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition are as follows:

> "As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag."

I believe this is the form of action which must be taken to bring unity to this country and to have a flag that we know that the people of Canada accept. I am not in my own mind completely satisfied with the wording of the amendment that we have before us. I think we need to have further clarification. We need to know what the plebiscite would be on. Therefore, at this time I wish to suggest a subamendment. I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stefanson):

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:
> "and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:
> 1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
> 2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
> 3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
> 4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been better had a plebiscite been taken before this question came to parliament to determine the desire of the people for a new flag. I believe that at that time the plebiscite could have been one which would not have aroused any emotions or been a political football or party matter. It would simply have asked: "Are you in favour of a new Canadian flag?" But because the government has taken action I believe this opportunity has gone past the board.

I submit that having now selected a design which has been put before parliament further action by parliament should not be taken, but that this plebiscite be held. I suggest that it is important that the questions I have suggested be placed on the plebiscite in order to determine which design the people want.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps before the hon. member's time expires—it has just about expired now—and before we reach 10.30 I should read the subamendment as proposed by the hon. member. It is moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More), and seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stefanson):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:

"and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:

1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

AIRPORTS—TORONTO—MEETING RESPECTING MONOPOLY OF TAXI SERVICE

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I had occasion to address an inquiry to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport in connection with the monopolistic ground service for passengers that is rendered at Malton airport, primarily into the city of Toronto. On June 22 the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made a number of inquiries of the Minister of Transport, and I myself had a 12-part question addressed to him bearing on the subject of this service from and to Malton airport as it affects the city of Toronto. The burden of our complaint was that taxicabs were not allowed to render service to and from Malton airport, despite the fact that the monopoly now existing and which refers directly to taxi service is held by a company that does not own a taxi, does not render taxi service and is not licensed as a taxi service.

The matter was brought up today deliberately because of a large advertisement which appears in today's Globe and Mail as well as today's Toronto evening Telegram and the Toronto Daily Star. This advertisement has been inserted by Air Terminal Transport Limited, operators of this monopolistic service. They have written the advertisement in such a way, full of inaccuracies and innuendoes, that I considered it a matter of privilege; but rather than raise the point this afternoon I thought I would discuss it at this time.

The remarks I made here on July 31 are quoted in this advertisement. In those remarks I pointed out that I do not expect to have transportation service available to me if I arrive at a railroad station in a distant city, or if I arrive at a bus terminal in a distant city, or if the car should break down at the city limits; and I could see no reason why an air traveller should expect to have such service waiting for him upon arrival. Are our airplane travellers a favoured few, that the government must provide them with taxicab service immediately they set foot on the ground? Air Terminal Transport Limited have quoted accurately enough from the remarks I made on July 31 when I pointed out that I had taken taxi service in Boston, Kansas City and New York city at various times; but they have quoted me completely out of context, as though I was complaining of the taxi service that was rendered. I do not think their case can be very strong if it is necessary to mislead the readers of the three great Toronto newspapers in this manner.

Another interesting point in connection with the advertisement these papers carry is the fact that in it there are four different mentions of "bus" and "limousine" service, but not once do they use the word "taxi". It is this very word "taxi" that is the cause of all the complaints at the present time, because in the agreement entered into secretly by the Department of Transport, under the Hon. Léon Balcer, and this company the word "taxicab" or "taxi" appears 11 times. We have been complaining that when there is a contract which mentions the word "taxi" 11 times, there should be some taxi service involved. The company evidently realizes the inaccuracy of their actions in not operating taxis when they hold a taxi exclusive franchise from the government, and in this advertisement which appears in today's papers they do not use the word "taxi" in referring to their own operations, but refer exclusively to "buses" and "limousines". They also state that they have an agreement with the Department of Transport that stipulates "we must provide ground transport 24 hours a day".

I would like to point out that the agreement does not require that service whatsoever, in connection with ground transport. The agreement, in clause 10, says:

> That the lessee shall maintain at the said airport a sufficient number of buses, limousines and taxis, 24 hours each day, to accommodate passenger traffic to and from the said airport.

Yet the president of this company, in a statement made to the Toronto Globe and Mail following a meeting with the council of the township of Toronto, made the statement that his firm is living up to its contract with the federal government. I point out that they are not living up to clause 10, which states that they must maintain a sufficient number of buses, limousines and taxis, and they are not living up to clause 13. Clause 13 of the agreement requires:

> That the lessee shall keep records of the number of passengers carried to and from the said airport in the buses, limousines and taxis of the lessee and, annually within 15 days after the first day of December, shall furnish to the minister a statement, certified by a responsible officer of the lessee, of the number of such passengers carried in the buses and limousines of the lessee, and a similar statement of the number of passengers carried in the taxis of the lessee.

They do not furnish any statement of the number of passengers carried in the taxis of the lessee, as is proven by the fact that in answer to my question of June 22, when I asked how many passengers were carried by bus, by limousine and by taxi, as required by clause 13, the reply came back, as will be seen at page 4542 of Hansard, giving the number of passengers carried by bus, the number of passengers carried by car, and absolutely nothing under the heading of taxi. When this president says they are living up to their contract with the government, I state flatly that they are breaking clause 10 and clause 13 continually and have not yet been checked up by the Department of Transport.

They make the further claim that the opposition to the present monopoly is being engendered by a taxicab operator falsely claiming to represent all of Toronto's taxicabs and that there is only one company objecting. I make the statement to the house that on three different occasions I have met with representatives for 1,100 taxicabs in Toronto involving seven different firms.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member may I say I will be very glad to bring his remarks to the attention of the Minister of Transport on his return.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.38 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Seventh report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Pennell.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the house whether Canada has received a request from the secretary general of the United Nations to provide additional troops for the UN Cyprus force, and what has been the reaction thereto? Furthermore, is he now in a position to advise on any developments that took place at the meeting of the nine participating countries with the secretary general? Would he at the same time give his observations to the house as to what he believes will be the effect on the already delicate negotiations for a peaceful settlement in Cyprus of the appointment of the guerrilla leader, General Grivas, as commander of the Cypriot national guard, especially in view of the fact that the United Nations commander has stated that General Grivas regards the United Nations peace force as "a bloody nuisance"?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no comments to make at this time on the reported observation of General Grivas. With regard to the first part of my right hon. friend's question, there has been no formal request made to Canada for the supply of additional troops, although I believe General Thimayya has indicated he would like to see the United Nations forces brought up to the strength contemplated by the permissible limits under the security council resolution. At present Canada has 1,125 military personnel in Cyprus. Ours is the largest contingent in the United Nations force except for that supplied by Britain which is only slightly larger.

A meeting of the contributors took place yesterday at the United Nations. The Canadian ambassador expressed the view of the Canadian government that all possible measures should be taken to enhance the authority of the force so it would be in a more favourable position to carry out its assigned task. There will be further consultations, and I am confident that the position taken by the Canadian government is being urgently considered by the commander of the force.

In addition, Mr. Galo Plaza, a former president of Ecuador and a man of considerable experience in and outside the United Nations, is returning to Cyprus to carry on negotiations as the representative of the secretary general in discussions with the force commander as well as with the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot authorities. Admittedly the United Nations force, as the secretary general has publicly stated, is working within fairly circumscribed limits. Failing agreement in the security council and in addition the formal agreement of the Cypriot authorities, an extension of the powers of the force need not necessarily be expected. What we are doing is to maintain our representations to the United Nations authorities to ensure that all possible measures are pursued to enable the force to operate effectively within its present mandate.

From the report we received from our ambassador this morning I can say that the secretary general is determined to see that the principle of freedom of movement, as embodied in the exchange of notes between himself and the government of Cyprus, is established. To this end Mr. Galo Plaza as well as General Thimayya will be engaged in consultation with appropriate authorities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the use of the words, which I took down, that the augmentation of the powers of the force "need not necessarily be expected", may we take it that is a diplomatic way of saying there is going to be no increase in those powers? This expression is strangely reminiscent of the phrase "conscription if necessary, but not necessarily conscription." Do the words so carefully enunciated by the minister indicate that the force will continue to operate under powers that have proven insufficient for that force to properly discharge its responsibilities?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would agree as to "insufficient", but it could not be argued that as a result of this insufficiency the United Nations is not playing a very important role in these very difficult circumstances. No; my hon. friend should not read anything into my language that was carefully conceived before being uttered. It simply means that we cannot, in this house, take unto ourselves powers which belong to the security council and which in turn can only be given effect to following agreement with the government of Cyprus. These are limitations that exist, and we will not further our objectives in this situation by failing to recognize them. Within those limitations I think my right hon. friend has now been informed of our intentions.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question in the light of reports that the secretary general of the United Nations is requesting the participating countries to supply additional troops for the peace keeping force in Cyprus. In the event that Canada is asked to do so, will this matter be referred to parliament before the request is complied with? Second, would the Canadian government make the supplying of additional Canadian troops contingent upon some amendment of the agreement of status to include provision for disarming guerrillas?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not agree to such a condition, myself. This might be a desirable condition to impose in normal circumstances; but if it is not attainable, and if we were faced with the alternative of either having this condition accepted or of making no contribution to a situation that requires an international force, I would not be prepared to accept it even though this would be the easiest position to take.

With regard to the position of parliament concerning an increase in the numbers of the Canadian force, the resolution of this house authorizes the government to provide up to 1,200 men. If there were any disposition to go beyond that figure then of course we would have to come back to this house. I have pointed out that the Canadian contribution now is greater than that of any other of the participating countries except Britain. The secretary general and General Thimayya are undoubtedly giving consideration to the possibility of additional contributions of forces from others of the participating countries. I have suggested that they might give consideration to the inclusion of countries not now participating.

Mr. Douglas: As a further supplementary question, in view of the fact that the obstacle does not seem to lie with the security council of the United Nations but rather with the government of Cyprus, would the minister not agree that if additional forces are to be requested to protect the people of Cyprus, the very least Canada has a right to expect is the co-operation of the government of Cyprus in amending the agreement of status so as to make that force effective?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course Canada has the right to expect, and not only Canada but the whole world, that there will be this measure of co-operation; but this is something that depends on the government of Cyprus and possibly as well on other governments. However, I am sure my hon. friend did not intend to dismiss, as he did so summarily, the position of the security council. The force could not I think be augmented beyond the present 7,000 figure without the approval of the security council. There may be some hesitation in confronting the security council because of attitudes that could conceivably be taken by other countries. I am not saying that this situation would arise, but this may be in the mind of the secretary general.

Mr. Douglas: As one final supplementary question, has the security council at any time opposed the extension of the powers of the United Nations force in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend and I are talking about two different things. He is talking about the extension of powers and I was talking about the increase in the numbers of military personnel. No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no public opposition by any member of the security council with regard to extension of the powers of the force, but it should be noted that the powers of the force were not specifically established by the security council. The secretary general himself was given the authority to negotiate for the powers which were required by the force.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I was intrigued by the distinction the minister has made with regard to the limitations on the powers of this parliament. I agree this parliament has no control over the security council as to the size of the force, but surely the minister would also agree that Canada has been the prime mover or the initiator or the catalyst in setting up this peace keeping force, and that the views of this parliament as expressed in recent times with regard to its powers should certainly impress themselves upon all those concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman and I are in full agreement about the role of parliament with regard to the force.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs related to the earlier question concerning Cyprus. I am asking simply for information. What methods or means are open to the minister to put before the security council Canada's desire with regard to strengthening United Nations force on the island, or extending its powers? Are we helpless in this regard even though we are the largest participant?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would not agree that our views have been disregarded by the security council because, as I indicated earlier, the security council has at no time dealt with the question of the extension of powers or the principle of freedom of movement. These were matters involved in an exchange of notes between the secretary general and the government of Cyprus.

In any event, for some time Canada along with other countries, and particularly the participating countries, has been endeavouring to improve this situation by representations, together with the officials of the United Nations and with the commander of the force, all of whom have shared our concern. These are the limitations, but notwithstanding them we shall continue with these negotiations. The meeting yesterday was part of this effort, and the meetings that will be held within the course of the next few days with some of the participating countries have the same objective in view.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has gone a bit beyond what I was asking. What means are open to the minister to make direct contact with the members of the security council in order to present the views that are held by this parliament on this question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is open to the government direct contact with all the countries represented on the security council, where some of these negotiations have been carried on and appeals have been made. There is the opportunity for discussion open to our ambassador at the United Nations with his opposite numbers representing the members of the security council. Very active discussion is now going on between our ambassador, the ambassadors of the participating countries and the secretary general.

Mr. Churchill: One final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it, then, that there is no opportunity for, say, the minister himself, with his persuasive powers, to appear in person and sit in with the security council and present his views?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend was not serious, because, if that were so, the minister would have been there.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether some of the misunderstanding is not partly due to to the statements which he made in this house on Wednesday, as reported at page 6716 of Hansard, when he pointed out that the extension of powers depended on two things; the security council, where the power of veto exists, and the agreement of the government of Cyprus. It is for that reason that these questions have been raised?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to defend myself, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think questions arise in that way; because any increase in the total force could only come as a result of security council action. Any increase in the existing powers of the force, apart from personnel, is a matter that would arise out of negotiation between the secretary general and the government of Cyprus.

CANADIAN FLAG

DISCUSSION OF DESIGN AT MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Would the Prime Minister tell the house whether he is still determined to hold on to his project for a three leaf flag in spite of the opposition of some members who still believe that they are living in the 19th century?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): A discussion on this matter is going on now, and the position of the government has been made known.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of that, I read in the press with interest that the meeting on Tuesday which has been convened by the Prime Minister is for the purpose of offering the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of third parties an alternative plan on the part of the government. What has been reported in the press gives all the indications of a well directed leak, and I ask the Prime Minister whether that is indeed the purpose of this meeting, and whether he intends to set aside the three maple leaves in favour of one leaf and to substitute the red ensign for the union jack in the submission he will be making at this meeting.

Mr. Pearson: The request or the suggestion that this meeting be held was first made by an hon. member on the other side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was he?

Mr. Pearson: One of the right hon. gentleman's friends on the other side, the hon. member for St. Mary. I acknowledged that request and thought it would perhaps be useful to continue the discussions we had with the Leader of the Opposition and others the other day. At that time, as the right hon. gentleman will remember, it was agreed that there might be a further discussion. That discussion will take place on Tuesday. As far as I am aware there has been no leak at all as to the nature of the meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I take it, then, the Prime Minister is telling the house that the information which has appeared in the press in this regard has no foundation, as far as his mind is concerned, as he addresses himself to the subject of the discussion.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. Not having read all the press comments on the meeting I am not in a position to confirm or deny what has been said in the press, but I hope the meeting will be a useful one and that we shall be able to consider the parliamentary situation in the light of the discussion now going on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That shows it was a leak.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister?

Would the Prime Minister tell us whether, in the course of those discussions, the question of the flag design, the choice of design itself, will come up?

[Mr. Pearson.]

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I have no idea what my colleagues the leaders of the other parties will bring up for discussion at this meeting.

[Later:]

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in respect of the suggested meeting next Tuesday in relation to the flag debate presently before the house. Does the Prime Minister have in mind the suggestion that a joint committee of both houses be formed to study the matter and make recommendations to the House of Commons?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have in mind the idea of listening to any proposals brought forward by my colleagues, the leaders of the other parties.

PUBLIC WORKS

OTTAWA—LEASING OF SPACE IN UNFINISHED BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of rather disturbing reports about the government's leasing of space in unfinished buildings at rentals that will pay almost the entire cost of those buildings in a short period of time, though the government is taking only part of the space, would the minister care to make a statement regarding this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member gives me this opportunity to make a statement following the report published in yesterday's newspapers.

I can now say that, for the first time in the history of space rental by any government, public tenders have been called. In the case of the two buildings concerned, a call for tenders was made and was published in the local newspapers, following which some 20 contractors showed interest in the two contracts. Six of them made bids and we selected the two lowest.

That is the only information which, to my mind, was missing in yesterday's newspapers, but I believe it to be the most important.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If it is costing that much to rent these buildings at the lowest tenders, would it not be better for the government to build their own?

[Translation]

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, the price is not the only factor to take into consideration. It may be that if you look at the rent over a period of ten years, you find out that it amounts to nearly the price of the building or even a little more, but other factors have to be taken into consideration, such as repairs, etc., to arrive at an adequate price.

Furthermore, I must tell my hon. friend that for at least 25 years—and I also refer to the former government—the same situation arose and gave the same results, but there was never a call for public tenders.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. In undertaking to rent buildings which are not yet built, does not the minister think that he is encouraging unfair speculation?

Mr. Deschatelets: Not if we call for public tenders, Mr. Speaker.

And at this stage, for the information of hon. members, I must say that we are at least 15 years behind schedule in our renting program for all the services needed.

The time factor is extremely important, as is also the price factor. That is why we are now calling for public tenders, and inasmuch as this rule will be adhered to rigidly in the future, I fail to see how we would be encouraging speculation.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would consider it exorbitant to pay over $6 million over a ten year period for all the space except the ground floor of a building that cost $4 million, and to pay $5,750,000 over a ten year period for half the space in a building that costs $6 million?

Mr. Deschatelets: No, Mr. Speaker, not necessarily; and I am sure if my hon. friend makes any investigations here in this area of Ottawa he will admit that the $3.25 or $3.50 per square foot is the lowest price we can get in respect of any building of this type.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question about this matter. In view of the rent that is being demanded in this particular situation would it not be advisable for the minister to follow the example of another government and advise these gentlemen to sharpen their pencils and bring in more realistic figures?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, in these two particular cases, of course, we departed from the former practice. That is the reason we asked for public tenders. I should like my hon. friend to keep this fact in mind. All contractors were invited, through public advertising, to submit tenders, and this is the result.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister table these tenders so we may see them?

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, of course I would be delighted to table all documents for the examination of my hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just table the ones in question.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister inform the house whether her department is considering the possibility of publishing a press release containing the facts and details surrounding the decision of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Morison) to give up smoking for 30 days, and about the eventual penalty for a breach of promise?

RESEARCH

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO BASIC MEDICAL RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, notice of the following question has been given to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the urgency of my question arises from the discontinuance of private funds from outside Canada for assistance to medical research in Canada. Is the government about to announce a new policy for assistance to basic medical research in Canada, or will we have to wait for a further study to be made of the Hall report before such policy is announced?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter is not specifically related to the Hall report, but the question of assistance to medical research, which is not only within the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare, is, as always, under urgent consideration.

POWER

TORONTO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF NUCLEAR PLANT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister tell the house under which authority or powers the federal government was able to justify its contribution of about $80 million for the construction of a nuclear energy plant in the suburbs of Toronto in order to supply electricity to that area?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important and complicated question which can hardly be answered on orders of the day. When the estimates are before the house for consideration I am sure a full explanation will be given.

AGRICULTURE

WHEAT—CHANGE IN ALLOWABLE MOISTURE CONTENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I notice the Minister of Agriculture has returned from the west. Can he inform the house what results he obtained at a meeting with the farmers' union in respect of the contentious question involving the moisture content of grain? Can he also tell us whether he held a meeting to discuss the handling charges?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in connection with moisture content, as the hon. member is aware as of April 1 this was reduced from 14.5 per cent to 14 per cent. The farmers' union was concerned about this reduction. When it was explained to them that we were merely bringing this moisture content in line with the moisture content in grains of competing countries, I believe they were quite satisfied. Most of the countries with which we are now competing have a lower moisture content.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—PRESSURE FOR APPOINTMENT OF SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-De-Lanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Does he intend to yield to the pressure exerted upon him by the government of the province of Quebec for the appointment as judges of the Quebec superior court of Mr. René Hamel, attorney general of the province of Quebec, and of Mr. Gérard Cournoyer, minister of transport?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, no pressure has been exerted upon me on this matter by the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Paul: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Justice tell us whether pressure has been exerted by the premier of the province of Quebec?

[Text]

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF COUNTY COURT JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Can the minister advise me whether a county court judge has been appointed as yet for the county of Yale, B.C.?

Hon Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have in mind for recommendation the name of the future appointee.

ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF TREASURY BRANCHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It has been alleged that Bill Dickie, M.L.A., the Liberal member for Calgary, has written the Minister of Justice asking that the Alberta treasury branches be investigated by the Senate committee on banking and commerce in view of alleged improprieties.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

LABOUR RELATIONS

POSSIBLE IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING S.I.U. ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour regarding elections being held by the seafearers international union. I wonder whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that two of the candidates, Andre Bansept of Quebec, and Gilbert Johnson of Montreal, have met with some misfortune in that one has been fired and the other transferred. I wonder if he could make inquiries as to whether the board of trustees is looking into this matter to see whether these two incidents are in any way related to the union election, and whether this is an attempt to rig the election and reduce it to a farce.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have noticed these reports and I will make inquiries to assure myself and the hon. member that there is nothing sinister.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT METHOD AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I asked him yesterday whether any amendment to the Canadian constitution having to do with making it a Canadian document would be enacted in another country or here in Canada, and the Prime Minister said he would like to look into the matter and say something about it today. Is he in a position to make that statement now?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have this morning received a memorandum on this matter from the constitutional and legal experts of the department concerned and I should like to study it before I make a statement, which I now hope to be able to make on Monday. I am sorry it is not available this morning.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

Supply—Citizenship and Immigration

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

1. Departmental administration, $1,130,500.

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Chairman, I am pleased indeed that my estimates are to be studied by the committee today. I know the great interest taken by hon. members and the public at large in this important department of government, and I am pleased to be in a position to again set forth the policies of the government in this regard.

I am taking this opportunity to make certain important announcements to the house. I have a fairly long statement on the three branches comprising my department, the citizenship branch, the immigration branch and Indian affairs. In order to expedite matters I propose to deliver my statement in French, but the translators have been provided with the material so there may be simultaneous translation.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether you would ask for order. I find it very difficult to hear the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: The point of order is well taken. It is very difficult to hear what the minister is saying. Possibly we could have a little less noise in the chamber.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I take it that there has been distribution of this statement to the press. Would it be possible for the minister to extend the courtesy of letting me have a copy of the statement so I can follow it?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Citizenship Act came into force on January 1, 1947, and for the first time provided for the legal status of "Canadian citizens". The act is administered by the Canadian citizenship registration branch, which has an establishment of 96 at headquarters in Ottawa, and 64 in the citizenship courts situated in various centres in Canada.

Courts have been established at Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton, London, Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Moncton, Windsor and Ottawa.

These courts along with the regularly constituted courts provide facilities for persons wishing to apply for Canadian citizenship. There are in addition 56 persons who have been appointed courts for the purpose of the Canadian Citizenship Act in areas in Canada remote from regularly constituted courts.

Four similar appointments have been made overseas to assist servicemen who wish to become Canadian citizens.

Persons applying for citizenship through courts must first satisfy the court that the several statutory requirements set forth in the act have been met before the application may be processed by the branch headquarters in Ottawa.

I am pleased to inform the hon. members who have expressed an interest in the qualifications which must be met by an applicant for Canadian citizenship, that a review has been made of the standard required of applicants and that certain amendments to the citizenship act are to be introduced into parliament shortly that will facilitate the acquisition of citizenship. This is in keeping with the policy of the Liberal party. At the same time, it will be recommended that provisions which now discriminate between naturalized and natural-born Canadians be removed from the act. The regulations to the Canadian Citizenship Act have been amended to include a provision to schedule B that will permit veterans of the armed forces of Canada who were on active service during time of war and who have not previously been naturalized, to be exempt from the payment of the fee of $10 required under item 3 of the same schedule. I am also endeavouring to establish uniform criteria for the use of courts in the administration of citizenship across Canada.

In 1963, 69,468 persons became Canadian citizens. This is fourth highest number for any one year; the highest was in 1957 when 95,462 certificates were granted. From January 1, 1947, to December 31, 1963, a total of 723,847 persons have been granted citizenship in Canada. In addition, approximately 460,000 certificates were issued to persons who wished to have proof of their status as Canadians.

The number of applications fluctuates from year to year, but it is known that about 40 per cent of the immigrants who entered Canada during the past ten years who were eligible for Canadian citizenship have became Canadians.

It has been found that fitting and appropriate ceremonies for the presentation of certificates of citizenship can focus a great deal of attention on the benefits to new Canadians of the acquisition of Canadian citizenship. I am therefore encouraging more participation by voluntary organizations in citizenship ceremonies. For the same reason, an item has been included in the estimates to provide for the expansion of the jurisdiction of some of the present courts and for the opening of a new court of Canadian citizenship in Calgary, Alberta. At the same time I shall give continuing study to the opening of courts in other areas not yet serviced by a court of Canadian citizenship.

The Canadian citizenship branch could be described as the extension arm of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. It will be appreciated that much of the work of my department is concerned with the fulfilment of the hopes and aspirations of special categories of persons. A civil service, no matter what their number or dedication, cannot replace the personal interest that needs to be shown by the average citizen if the goals I seek are to be attained. In carrying out its responsibilities, the citizenship branch encourages and assists individuals, groups and agencies that are interested in immigrants, Indians and general citizenship to play a more effective role.

The data from a survey of language classes for immigrants, which I am reviewing at present, will be used in discussions with various agencies offering English or French language instruction, with a view to improving the courses offered and rendering them as attractive as possible to immigrants. I have directed the officials to intensify their efforts in order that more citizenship courses are offered in conjunction with language classes. Such courses will enable applicants for Canadian citizenship to become more familiar with Canadian institutions and traditions, in preparation for the court examination which non-British subjects must take when applying for Canadian citizenship.

Hon. members are aware of the public interest evidenced in recent years, most dynamically, in the organization of Indian friendship councils and centres in a large number of communities across Canada and in the emergence of two national organizations, the national Indian council and the Indian-Eskimo association. The citizenship branch will increase its activities in this field in co-operation with these organizations, which add security that Indians need to feel when off their reserves and which make it easier for them to live in communities that offer the type of work they would like to have.

In respect of general citizenship, the branch will be asked to play an active role in encouraging and helping Canadians to participate fully in centennial celebrations. It is our hope that 1967 will be an occasion for all Canadians to become more aware of the historical development of our country and the cultural heritage that has accumulated during the past 100 years.

May I take this opportunity to offer some observations on the subject of immigration as it affects Canada. This is the first opportunity I have had to acquaint the committee in any extensive manner with my views on this subject which is one of paramount importance to all of us.

Because of limitations of time I shall not deal at length with the contribution which the new Canadians have made to the general Canadian welfare. It is a study well worthwhile in itself. I could not make this statement, however, without saying that the Canadian economy and our culture simply could not have advanced either quantitatively or qualitatively to their present state without the very substantial contribution of these thousands of immigrants. We owe thanks to those who have come to us in the period under discussion.

We come now to the question of where we stand at this moment in the matter of Canada's domestic concern with immigration and the need for policy in this field to meet the needs of 1964 and the years beyond.

Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with this question I should like to explain what I mean by the term "skilled" which I shall be using in this statement from time to time. In my view this is a fairly broad term which includes a variety of persons. It includes those with a reasonably good level of education sufficient to permit a range of mobility and adaptability required in most occupations today. These persons should also have qualifications in their particular fields. In terms of the trades which are common in Canada, these qualifications would normally mean the possession of journeymen's papers or certificates of competency. The term "skilled" also includes those with more advanced technical or professional training, as well as those with successful experience as managers or proprietors of commercial, industrial and agricultural activities.

While in years past there was a need for the immigration of unskilled and semi-skilled workers in large numbers, this is no longer the case. The Canada of 1964 is not the Canada of 1913, 1946 or even 1954. Machines now aid manpower in many areas of activity. In some fields, such as agriculture, fewer workers actually produce far more than ever before. Technological advancements are causing sweeping alterations in the pattern of employment.

This committee does not need to be told that the greatest handicap of the majority of our unfortunate unemployed is a lack of education or skill. Our government has committed and spent substantial funds for the training and re-training of those who lack the necessary skills for today's employment market. This year's budget, in providing for family allowances for children in school beyond 16 years of age, emphasized certain aspects of our concern today about those who leave formal training inadequately prepared.

At the same time, there is a very substantial demand and need for skilled individuals in many undertakings across Canada. The presence of such workers provides a stimulus to the enterprise and the economy of this country. Unfortunately, these persons are not always available from within Canada or, if here, are not sufficiently mobile to fill particular opportunities. Then too, in this country—as in any country—there is abundant scope for managerial talent, as well as for those with the experience, ability and funds to establish their own enterprises.

The competition we must meet in today's world is a competition of brains, skill, ability and initiative. Despite our best efforts and whatever our virtues at this moment, we cannot claim a surplus of any of these features. We must overlook no opportunity to encourage additional people who can assist us, to come to this country.

To this end, and as a first principle of this government's immigration policy, we shall endeavour—through adequate promotion and recruitment—to bring to Canada the well-skilled on a substantial scale. This is to be a positive program. It will help to fill the gaps in our industry, commerce, and other areas of economic activity here. Increased activity across the board will aid in absorbing the unskilled amongst us.

At the same time, the infusion of skilled people will assist in developing further the better balanced and even more dynamic economic structure we will need to absorb the greatly increased entries to the labour force from Canadian sources which will soon take place, due to our own rapidly expanding population, a feature that will be even more important in the next six to eight years.

It is impossible to make any valid predictions of the exact numbers of immigrants during a period ahead of, say, a year. This is increasingly the case in present circumstances. On the one hand, our economic capacity to absorb skilled, educated and otherwise well-qualified immigrants is virtually unlimited. On the other hand, this type of person is in demand in many countries these days. We must obtain these immigrants in competition with other countries and there is no great surplus of qualified people anywhere in the world.

To help establish a more positive immigration program our government has taken the following steps:

(a) We have provided for an interdepartmental committee composed of senior officials well versed in economic, labour and social problems to assess our needs, and our absorptive capacity, for migrants in Canada's economy. This committee, which will serve in an advisory capacity, should help the government in its objective of developing fairly long term programs not subject to the turning on and off of the immigration tap which has had such objectionable results in the past.

(b) We are embarking on a considerably increased promotional campaign abroad, particularly in Europe where the greatest number of likely immigration applicants are to be found. Additional funds for this purpose are contained in the estimates before you.

(c) The government recently approved a new establishment structure for immigration personnel abroad. This is a first step in our plans to ensure better classifications for our personnel in order to implement a really productive and positive immigration program.

(d) The existing organization, served as it is by many hard working and capable people, is not such as to get the maximum results from our immigration efforts. The organization must be made fully responsive to today's immigration requirements. It is very short of staff, particularly in its overseas service. If the effort to secure adequate numbers of immigrants with the skills Canada needs is to succeed, we require more and better trained personnel and we must see that they are employed to maximum advantage in posts for which they are best qualified. We must hold open the opportunity to pursue a career for these employees, a career satisfying to the person concerned and as fully rewarding as any comparable posts in the public service. A complete re-organization in immigration, both at home and abroad, is overdue. It is now in the course of development.

(e) Not only are changes in organization required with appropriate staffing, but so also are changes badly needed in the picture Canada presents overseas in so far as its immigration offices and facilities are concerned. These have been too often dull and unattractive. Every effort will be made, consistent with good and efficient management, to secure office locations and quarters that will do Canada justice, enable our staff to work effectively, and promote a favourable reaction among potential immigrants. Such steps will enable us to compete on more equal grounds with other countries which are also making strong efforts to secure the immigrants they need. Let me say that in our efforts to promote immigration abroad, this government will welcome the participation of the provincial governments wherever they feel they can be of help. In addition, it is the intention of the government to discuss immigration matters with certain foreign governments in the hope we can achieve a better understanding of our operations and ambitions in the immigration field.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

We come now to the second principle of this government's immigration policy. It has to do with the social—and in some respects—the humanitarian aspects of immigration. I refer to our intention to do what we can to assist in the reunion of families—with particular regard to the immediate family, that is, the head of the family and his dependents—and to assist refugees.

In the past the department has received criticism from some quarters where sponsored immigration is concerned, on two main points. First, the length of waiting period in some countries has been unduly long before relatives can be examined for immigration purposes. Second, there has appeared to be inconsistency on the part of immigration offices within Canada, in assessing the adequacy or otherwise of the reception arrangement which can be provided by the sponsor here.

With regard to the first point, the waiting period for examination in Hong Kong for example has been reduced from nine months to three. We hope to effect even further improvement in this respect not only with regard to that area, but in connection with the selection of immigrants everywhere. This, of course, is not the end but the beginning.

I am very conscious of the desirability and even the necessity of re-establishing families, of bringing together again a man, his wife and their dependent children, without avoidable delay. All the procedures and practices within the department are under my systematic and critical review. The procedures governing our operations in this particular area are being dealt with on a priority basis.

Furthermore, the moves being made for more qualified staff and better facilities which I have already mentioned, are under way with this problem very much in mind. Within a reasonable period I hope to be able to report to this committee that waiting periods for examination of immigrants have been reduced to an absolute minimum.

I should like at this time to say a few words on my visit earlier this year to Hong Kong. Several important conclusions and decisions have resulted from that trip which will be of interest to hon. members. I also visited Japan where I had the pleasure of very informative and fruitful discussions with officials of the Japanese government.

This was the first of a number of inspection visits which I hope to make, as minister, to learn first hand the facts on which to base a development of new immigration policies and programs. Early in September I expect to leave for an inspection trip of immigration offices in Europe and while there, I plan to consult with government officials in the various countries. I chose Hong Kong for my first visit because I was deeply concerned about the complex problems involved in Chinese immigration and complaints I had received that our Hong Kong operation was inefficient and discriminatory.

I found Hong Kong prosperous and thriving. It is a model of efficient administration for which the British authorities deserve great praise. The flow of illegal immigrants from mainland China has declined to a trickle, and the population situation is now more stable. You will note that I do not use the term "refugees" in relation to those persons leaving mainland China. The British maintain, and I agree, that these people are not political refugees at all, but are simply seeking a better economic life. This is proven by the fact that once they are accepted as Hong Kong residents they flock back to China to visit by the hundreds of thousands, apparently without fear of persecution.

I also learned in Hong Kong that the British authorities do not regard mass emigration as a solution to their population problems. They feel that if it becomes known that Hong Kong is an easy stepping stone to Canada or the United States the colony would receive hundreds more migrants from the mainland for every immigrant who goes to North America.

Therefore, while Canada can offer a better future to some individuals from Hong Kong, any large scale program of resettlement here would do more harm than good as far as Hong Kong is concerned. Therefore, my first conclusion was that we must look at immigration from Hong Kong in ordinary immigration terms rather than as a special refugee problem.

Even though Chinese from Hong Kong are not to be given any special refugee status, I must emphasize that the ordinary immigrant admissible classes, as they affect Chinese, are broad: they permit the admission of the immediate families, parents, grandparents and fiancées of Canadian residents, as well as unsponsored immigrants who have sufficient education or skills to become established in Canada.

In addition there is another less well-known admissible class, of which even many of the Chinese seem unaware. This permits Canadian citizens to sponsor the admission of such non-dependent relatives as adults or married sons or daughters, along with the spouse and children of such sons and daughters. These non-dependents are sponsorable in the usual way subject to appropriate educational and occupational standards.

It can be seen, therefore, that the legal admissible classes do not create any impossible barrier to the reunion of Chinese families in Canada. However, the law does require that each immigrant, whether of Chinese origin or not, be examined to find out if he qualifies for admission, to ensure that he is not a criminal or subversive and, in the case of sponsored persons, to ensure that they have the relationship claimed to the sponsor in Canada.

The greatest problem we face in examining immigrants from mainland China is the difficulty in verifying their identities. Such immigrants arrive in Hong Kong with virtually no identifying documents. There are no official records available which can be used to verify the statements of the individual. This situation has given rise to extensive abuse in Chinese immigration with which present and past Canadian governments have attempted to cope.

There is evidence that many Chinese immigrants to Canada are in this country illegally. During my stay in Hong Kong I personally discussed the problem of illegal immigration with the immigration officials of other countries. All these countries experience the same problems that Canada does. They agree that there exists a well-organized and highly efficient illegal Chinese immigration system involving forged documents and photographs, schools that coach immigrants in false identities, persistent use of false statutory declarations, and other abuses.

Some Canadians are relatively unconcerned about illegal Chinese immigration. They feel that past discrimination has forced Chinese to use illegal means to get their dependents to Canada.

Our investigations have satisfied us that frequently relatives and friends, no doubt largely influenced by ties of blood and sympathy, have been parties to such illegal entries.

Often these admissions were arranged by syndicates or individuals who make a business of smuggling inadmissible persons into Canada from Hong Kong.

I am also satisfied that, contrary to popular belief, a large number of these illegal Chinese immigrants are not close relatives of Canadian residents. They were brought here solely for the profit of illegal immigration agents. This is a serious and disturbing situation. Not only does it tarnish the reputation of Chinese Canadians as good citizens, but it has added greatly to their problems when they seek to bring out their true relatives.

Speaking personally and for my department, I wish to emphasize that we have no desire to penalize Chinese Canadians seeking to bring their legitimate families to Canada.

During my visit to Hong Kong, and in subsequent discussions with departmental officials, every effort has been made to find ways to facilitate the admission of legal immigrants without destroying or weakening essential controls.

I found in Hong Kong that there are many changes which can be made in our system there that will facilitate the admission of close relatives to Canada. We have already reduced the waiting period for immigrants in Hong Kong from nine months to less than three, and I hope it can be reduced still further. The quickest way of improving the situation would be to provide more immigration staff in Hong Kong but for the time being extra staff cannot be accommodated in our Hong Kong office. We have already enlarged our staff as much as our office space will permit, and we are seeking larger office quarters. There is a severe shortage of office space in Hong Kong but we are trying to reserve space in a building now being erected. With larger and better quarters in Hong Kong and with certain other changes we should be able to deal with Chinese immigrants on a current basis without abnormal delays.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

It is worthy of note, however, that, notwithstanding the shortage of staff and shortage of office space in Hong Kong, last year immigration of Chinese to Canada increased substantially. In 1963, some 1,571 Chinese were admitted as compared with a total of 876 in 1962. In the first five months of this year 879 were admitted as against 481 during the same period in 1963. In other words, the number of Chinese immigrants in 1963 increased almost 100 per cent over the figure for 1962 and has again increased 84 per cent in the first five months of this year as compared with the same period in 1963.

It is obvious, therefore, that as a direct result of the policies of this government and the changes in procedures which have been effected since this government took office hundreds of Chinese families have emigrated to Canada and hundreds more have been re-united in this country.

A serious problem for immigrants in Hong Kong is the necessity to visit various offices for medical tests and examinations. This is tedious, causes long waits and is expensive for the migrants.

I am discussing with my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), the establishment of a completely integrated "one-stop" medical centre in our immigration office in Hong Kong. This would greatly benefit the immigrants.

There are in Hong Kong many well-qualified persons who have no relatives in Canada but who would make good immigrants. In the past, the department has been so preoccupied with servicing sponsored immigrants that little time was available for the unsponsored. This has been partially remedied and when we are in new quarters in Hong Kong, it should be possible to devote more of our resources to unsponsored immigrants without in any way interfering with the processing of the sponsored. Since sponsored immigrants are not usually skilled, it is desirable that this humanitarian flow be balanced by a movement of well-qualified unsponsored persons.

There are other changes which are being made in our office systems and routines, and our staffing and staff training policies, which should further improve our performance. These are matters of internal administration but I expect the results will soon speak for themselves.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but I must advise the house that his time is over.

Mr. Lambert: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the minister may proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation)

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say that my visit to Hong Kong satisfied me that our Canadian visa and medical officers, and our local Chinese staff are honest, extremely hard working public servants who have been doing a good job in the face of very difficult circumstances. I certainly do not want my comments on the needed improvements in the system to be considered as a reflection on their integrity or their devotion to duty. I have the greatest respect and regard for them all.

The foregoing has dealt with our administrative problems in connection with Chinese immigration. As a result of my trip I have also reached several general conclusions about the legal admissible classes and immigration policy as they apply to Chinese and I wish to speak of them at this time.

First, the admissible classes.

On the whole, the present admissible classes are adequate to permit a healthy Chinese immigration movement and the reunion of families. However, I am pleased to advise the house that the approval of the governor in council has just been given to one important addition to the admissible classes, and that is to make male fiancés admissible on the same legal basis as female fiancées. This amendment will benefit particularly the Canadian Chinese community but will have the happy corollary of satisfying the justifiable ambitions of other ethnic groups.

I am not recommending at present that sponsorship privileges for Chinese be extended to cover brothers, sisters and more distant relatives. I regret this but unfortunately there are serious practical difficulties involved. An expansion of the admissible classes to cover these non-dependents would seriously interfere with the good service we propose to give to the immediate dependents. In addition it would multiply the problem of control and detection of impostors to an extent far beyond our present experience and would render ineffective our efforts to exercise essential controls. This decision is dictated solely by the facts of the situation and not by any desire to discriminate against Chinese.

Second, the Chinese status adjustment program.

The Chinese have complained that this program is discriminatory. Actually the status adjustment system was intended to benefit the Chinese but its purpose has been misunderstood. Moreover, it has had limited success in spite of the fact that it has been in operation for four years, far longer than was anticipated. While we would not wish to discourage Chinese from voluntarily coming to our offices to set their personal immigration records straight we shall no longer exercise forbearance in respect of immigration violations merely because such voluntary statements are made. Everyone has had ample time to put his affairs in order and henceforth from September 1, 1964, R.C.M.P. and immigration officers are being instructed to apply the law to Chinese in exactly the same way as to other residents of Canada.

In concluding my remarks on Chinese immigration, I wish to say that, as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, it is my aim to develop a positive immigration program to bring more well-qualified immigrants to this country and assist residents of Canada to reunite their dependent families here. Chinese immigration increased substantially last year and I firmly expect this increase to continue without loss of control over illegal immigration.

It is the sincere wish of this government, as I am sure it is of all Canadians of good will, to treat our Chinese compatriots as fairly as possible and make available to them the same facilities and opportunities provided to other citizens for the reunion of their families in this country and the prosperity of their community. If this desirable objective is to be attained it is essential that we have the wholehearted co-operation of the Chinese community, the vast majority of whose members are honest and reputable Canadians, in eliminating the abuses which have been of concern to all law-abiding citizens.

I should also say a word or two about my brief visit in Japan, during which I met the Japanese foreign minister and had informal talks with Japanese economic and emigration officials.

Emigration from Japan to Canada has been negligible in recent years, averaging less than 200 annually. Even with the change in immigration regulations in 1962, opening up immigration from all parts of the world, there was little interest shown by the Japanese, as indicated by the few applications received from that country.

There are several explanations for this. First, Japan's economy is booming and there are actually labour shortages in many skilled occupations. Japanese workers have ample opportunities at home. Moreover, Japan's emigration has, in the past, been organized in group settlements and the Japanese are accustomed to applying for migration in schemes organized by their own government rather than for individual migration. On the other hand, Canada's society is today so complex and highly developed that it is not possible for us to introduce large group settlements of one ethnic origin, and our entire immigration system is based on individual and family selection and settlement in Canada.

In our discussions we did much to clarify our respective viewpoints. Also, I endeavoured to convince the Japanese that any of their people who do qualify and are admitted to Canada will be assisted by our immigration service to locate jobs and homes and, in general, will be aided as fully as they would be in one of their own government-organized group settlements.

In view of the present economic conditions in Japan, it is not realistic to expect that any large scale immigration movement will result. But I am confident that steps have been taken which will result in a growing movement to Canada of qualified Japanese professional and technical workers and their families.

I should refer to another point in immigration procedures concerning apparent inconsistencies in assessing the abilities of sponsors to receive and care for their relatives until the latter have become established in Canada. Let me say first of all that this has rarely been a problem in recent years where the spouse and dependent children of a sponsor in Canada have been involved. The department takes a lenient view in such cases and the financial and domestic arrangements required have been reasonably easy to meet.

The sponsoring of relatives other than dependents is, however, a different matter, as I think all members will agree. The responsibilities assumed by the sponsor in Canada are serious ones. They include the willingness and ability to provide care and maintenance as need be until the immigrant and his family establish themselves in Canada. It was in assessing the abilities of various sponsors to meet these responsibilities that there may have been some variance of opinion on the part of different immigration officers.

To overcome this problem my officers, after intensive study, have developed more objective standards of assessing settlement arrangements. These standards, which are essentially financial, were put into effect last February, upon my arrival in the department. Reports to date indicate that they are working out well, and in large measure have resolved the problem. Applicants who are unable to satisfy the criteria—which I believe to be reasonable—are informed of those deficiencies that must be overcome to have their applications approved. As I say, this system appears to be operating well; however, I shall keep it under review to ensure that it serves the purpose intended.

In the field of refugees, also, we intend to pursue those policies which have enabled Canada to show its concern with the unfortunate of the world's political upheavals. This concern has been demonstrated throughout the post-war years, notably in the displaced persons movement, in connection with the Hungarian uprising, the world refugee year and in other arrangements which have been made for individual refugees with particularly difficult handicaps.

The high commissioner for refugees, as an appointee of the United Nations, deserves our support within the terms of his present mandate. It is the intention of my department—where migration is an appropriate solution—to offer him all possible help within our capabilities. This in itself is not something new but is a reaffirmation of our government's position in the field of refugee problems.

I come now to certain matters of general interest in the immigration field. First, there is the question of legislation. As I mentioned in connection with my visit to the Far East, I am recommending to the governor in council that section 31(c) of the immigration regulations be amended to provide for the addition of male fiancés to those categories admissible on the sponsorship of a resident or citizen of Canada. This is all I propose for the moment in this direction. However, it is my firm intention to visit personally, all major areas of immigration operations and from the first hand knowledge which I shall gain, there may well come other recommendations for changes in the legislation.

At the same time, I am conscious of the representations made by members of parliament and others to the effect that there are provisions open to question in certain sections of the present Immigration Act. Some members have introduced private bills with the intention of revising specific sections of the act.

Let me say that I am in sympathy with many of the points raised. However, I think most members will agree that there are many inter-relationships between various sections of the act, and isolated amendments while perhaps appropriate in respect of one or more particular problems, could have unfortunate effects in other areas.

All the points raised from outside the department as well as from within are being carefully noted and I shall shortly assign priorities for detailed studies of the changes suggested and required. Following this I would expect to introduce a revised act for the consideration of parliament as soon as possible.

Another question of importance in the general policy area is the problem of quality control in the immigration movement. From what I have said earlier I think it should be clear that this government intends to do everything possible to secure, through immigration, a substantial flow of desirable skilled people and their families and to expedite the reunion of families. In this process we intend to improve our administrative facilities and processes to the point where there can be no legitimate excuse for "queue jumping".

While we shall be fair it will be necessary, none the less, to be firm. Persons who seek to circumvent the law by entering Canada illegally, for example, ship deserters, can expect the full process of the law fairly and justly to be applied to them.

At the same time—and with even more emphasis if possible—I should like to stress the government's concern with these elements who seek to infiltrate the Canadian community to carry on criminal activities, especially of the organized variety. Let me assure the committee that persons of the kind under discussion will be denied admission, if known. Those who may have gained admission and are within the jurisdiction of immigration legislation will be subject to the provisions respecting deportation. Obviously all necessary control measures can be effective only with wholehearted public support. I hereby ask for such support from the Canadian people through you, their responsible representatives.

Finally, I am happy to inform the committee that just last night treasury board gave me authority to proceed at once with our plans for reorganization in immigration.

At this time the changes will involve immigration headquarters at Ottawa and our offices overseas. Proposals regarding our offices in Canada will follow in due course. The changes to be made in the organization at the present time will more effectively meet the government's policy to implement a more positive and productive immigration program. We shall then have a considerably greater capacity to seek out suitable immigrants, to provide all necessary information about Canada and its opportunities and to speed up the procedures by which immigrants coming either on their own or to join with relatives already in Canada will be dealt with.

Important portions of the work now centralized at Ottawa from our immigration offices in numerous countries will be decentralized in such a way as to eliminate much of the present transfer of paper and the consequent delays. It is important that not only better but that quicker services be given to all those persons who plan to come to this country as immigrants.

The changes in organization should improve the morale of our immigration employees markedly. This is a point the importance of which I have already stressed.

The new organization will reflect fully the functional aspects of the flow of immigration, beginning with its planning, proceeding to the recruitment and selection of immigrants in accord with such planning, and going on to the successful establishment of these immigrants in Canada. There will be five principal divisions at the headquarters in Ottawa: (1) policy and planning; (2) overseas services; (3) Canadian services; (4) special services; and (5) support services. Special services will have to do with those exceptional persons who give unusual difficulty, such as those who must be deported for one reason or another. Support services will have to do with all administrative requirements in respect to finances, personnel, provision of suitable quarters, both in Canada and overseas, furnishings and equipment, and all the numerous basic needs of any large body of employees.

The changes in the plans for the overseas services envisage the setting up of a new regional office in continental Europe, charged with the general supervision of the immigration programs in the 16 countries where we maintain offices. This is comparable in some degree to the regional office we already have in London which covers the United Kingdom and Ireland, but its territory is of course far more extensive and the problems it will meet will be more complex due to the numerous governments with which it will deal and the many languages with which it must have requisite familiarity. The provision of such a regional office at this time will greatly reinforce the efforts of our present offices in the various countries of continental Europe. We will give them much greater support in their promotion and information programs and will be able to react much more quickly and effectively to their requirements than has ever been possible from Ottawa. This is a measure of decentralization that should be most effective. The result should be to stimulate and to expedite Canadian immigration efforts in all the countries now concerned, and in additional countries if such expansion becomes advisable.

In dealing with the reorganization of the overseas immigration services I should point out that these changes are by no means confined to Europe. Another aspect of the new plan will be to so organize as to give added support and attention to the matter of immigrants from sources in the western hemisphere as well as from sources in Asia and in the Pacific areas. For the first time there will be a unit of our immigration staff whose primary responsibility it will be to look after immigration from these important sources.

May I thank the committee for its patience in bearing with me through this fairly lengthy review of a number of important aspects of immigration. I trust it will be helpful to all of us.

Mr. Chairman, I have not said a word about the Indian affairs branch of the department. With the unanimous consent of the committee and since there is a great difference between the problems of immigration and those of Indian affairs, perhaps I could make later on some comments on item 15 concerning the Indians.

[Text]

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's long statement. I must say that during all the years I have been in the House of Commons I have listened to former ministers of citizenship and immigration make statements, but have not heard one that was as disappointing as this one. I do not say that to be deliberately critical but because of statements that have been made outside this house on many occasions by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, particularly in regard to amendments that are indeed necessary to the Canadian Citizenship Act and the Immigration Act.

I thought today the minister would announce at least some of the important changes he has been talking about for so long. He did make one announcement to the effect that in so far as immigrants from Hong Kong are concerned, male fiancés would be able to get into Canada. I must say that is only a crumb when compared to the many promises he has made since he became minister of this department.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with some of the promises that have been made over a period of time as far back as the last election. A promise was made to the Chinese people in my area of Alberta that if they voted Liberal they would not be discriminated against. Promises were made by the former minister of citizenship and immigration that amendments would be brought before the house within a short period of time in respect of the Canadian Citizenship Act and the Immigration Act.

The last time I dealt with this subject was in December of 1963, at which time I referred to several of these promises. At that time the former minister said certain changes were being contemplated. These changes are being contemplated again today.

I should like to quote from the September 24 edition of the Montreal Gazette, as follows:

> Sweeping changes to regulations governing the admission to Canada of Chinese immigrants were forecast Monday night by immigration minister Favreau.

Who was the minister trying to impress when he said certain changes were to be made to allow Chinese immigrants into Canada? Perhaps he impressed some of the Chinese people in Canada who were not aware that the important changes had been made by the Conservative minister of citizenship and immigration, Mrs. Ellen Fairclough. I believe those changes were important; they were announced in this House of Commons on January 19, 1962, and I have a list of them here.

For the sake of informing those people who may not recall that it was Hon. Ellen Fairclough who made these sweeping changes, I should like to put on the record one paragraph of the statement she made in 1962:

> Subsection (c) of section 31 provides for the admission of a somewhat wider list of immediate dependants and close relatives. It applies not only to sponsors who are Canadian citizens but also to persons other than Canadian citizens who have been legally admitted to Canada for permanent residence and who wish to bring forward a mother, father, wife, grandparent, female fiancée or an unmarried minor child.

I am sure the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration recalls that the old regulations were indeed discriminatory as, indeed, the present act is with respect to certain countries in Europe. I recall reading a newspaper report of a speech made by a responsible minister of the crown to a group of Chinese, in this instance Vancouver Chinese with whom he was having a nice Chinese dinner, and at that time he referred to sweeping changes in the regulations governing the admission to Canada of Chinese immigrants. Almost the same speech, word for word, was made a year later by the new minister on the occasion of his having a nice Chinese dinner in Toronto. With the newspaper report there is a picture of the new minister. He was not quite as broad in his promises, because the newspaper report in the Globe and Mail of June 25, 1964, contains this statement:

> He hinted also at a coming general overhaul of immigration policy and announced that he will go on a tour of Canadian immigration offices in other countries, including Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Portugal and Greece. "I shall go on the journey at the recess of parliament, if we have a recess," he told a reporter.

I was indeed happy to hear that the minister intended to visit these countries to find if there were any inadequacies in these offices that should be corrected immediately. I was glad indeed to hear this, but at the same time I am a little disappointed in that I have some 12 files before me of cases that have not been settled. I do not intend to deal with them all individually, but these 12 files have been on my desk now for a number of years. I an not being critical of the minister because these files have not been processed, but I am being critical of him because, in view of what the present regulations say, he is aware that there are people in Europe of other origins than those countries from which we readily accept immigrants and where we have office facilities, who are faced with problems. I refer to people of Ukrainian, Polish and Russian origin now living in Canada who have relatives in those countries where there are absolutely no facilities by which they can bring them to Canada.

I would make one suggestion in this regard. I suggest to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that talks should be held with such countries as Russia, where we do not have facilities at present, to see if it is not possible to do something. I am sure the Russians would not give us permission to set up an immigration office in their country, but surely they would bend sufficiently to allow the immigration branch to have an agent in Russia who could operate out of our embassy in Moscow and whose prime function would be to encourage those people in Russia who have relatives here with whom they would like to be reunited, and give them the necessary assistance so they could be reunited.

As an example I have one case before me which is indeed a sad one. It involves a father and mother who came to Canada from Poland, but because of the existing regulations which prohibit the admission to Canada of a son or daughter over 25 years of age they had to leave their son and one daughter, I believe, in Poland. They did so on the understanding, though it was a misunderstanding on their part, that once they were established in Canada and could provide adequate accommodation for their son and daughter and their families these people would be able to come forward immediately. This man got settled in Canada and found a good job. He was a trained craftsman, a carpenter, I believe. One day he called me and said that this was what he had been told while he was in Poland, and he now wanted to make application for his son and daughter and their families.

I do not need to remind the minister that I could not offer him much encouragement. Since then I have been trying to bring this matter to a conclusion but to no avail. Something should be done, and I hope the minister will give the matter very serious consideration.

Certainly consultation with a country like Russia in order to see what they have to say could do no harm. I know there is a means by which some of these applications can be processed. We can approach the Russian embassy or the Polish embassy here in Ottawa, but this is the long way of going about the processing of such applications.

The minister also made some comment about refugees. I did not have the text of his speech before me and could not follow his remarks as closely as I might have wished. However, I want to point out that under the administration of the Leader of the Opposition 106 refugee families were admitted to Canada from Hong Kong. I believe five families settled in the Edmonton area, some four or five in Calgary and one or two in Red Deer. The others were distributed across Canada. I have before me a newspaper article which the minister may find very interesting. I certainly do. It is a report from the Ottawa bureau of the Globe and Mail and reads as follows:

> All but one of the 106 government sponsored Hong Kong refugee families brought to Canada in 1962 are self supporting. A spokesman for the Department of Citizenship and Immigration said heads of 105 of the families were employed by January 1. The one unemployed man, the official said, was not able to work because of sickness.

I think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will agree with me that this was probably one of the sounder moves made by the department. I do not want to go into the history of similar matters now, but certainly these people have proved to be very stable indeed. I do not believe you can expect to get a better performance record from a group of refugees. One hundred and five out of the 106 families are self supporting. One man, because of sickness, is not able to support his family. If I know the Chinese community, and I think I do, I do not believe these Chinese families will ever become a burden on the government. The article goes on to say:

In addition, a number of the family heads have learned English well enough to obtain employment in the field in which they were trained in China.

All the men chosen for the move to Canada were skilled workers and many were professional men.

John Diefenbaker, when he was prime minister in 1962, decided to lift the quota on Hong Kong immigrants to allow into Canada about 100 refugee families who had fled China.

The move came in the middle of a Department of Justice investigation into illegal entry by Chinese into Canada.

May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he will now consider, on the basis of the performance of these families, doubling that figure the next time. Let us bring in 250 families. Let us see how that works. On many occasions the minister has talked about bringing in hundreds of thousands of immigrants. Is it not then reasonable to request the minister to bring in 200 or 250 refugee families? If that program works out, then in subsequent years let us bring in 500. You could never do better, Mr. Chairman, than to bring in families that have shown a performance record like this. If the minister has some views in respect of this matter, when he replies to some of the questions posed I would be glad indeed to hear from him.

I should like to deal now with another matter that comes under the Immigration Act and which has been the cause of considerable concern. I shall bring to the attention of the minister one case upon which I am working at the moment and which is similar to the cases which are causing concern. I have before me a letter from the former minister of citizenship and immigration which was sent in response to a request I made on behalf of a constituent who wished to bring a niece to Canada for adoption because the family in the old country was poor and unable to maintain the family adequately. The family in Alberta interested in this adoption were wealthy indeed and did not have children of their own. It was very discouraging, not only to myself but to these people, to receive a letter of refusal. I believe this situation is one which can be altered very quickly. The letter reads in part as follows:

[Mr. Skoreyko.]

Additionally, there is no provision in the immigration regulations for the admission to Canada of adopted children or children for adoption.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, this is not an unreasonable request, and changes of this nature should be made and made quickly.

I want to bring to the minister's attention one case in the province of Alberta. I believe I dealt with this particular case on one previous occasion. An elderly gentleman and his wife, who owned quite a large estate, were never able to have a family of their own, and with my assistance applied to the immigration department for permission to bring in a niece for adoption. Of course the application was refused on the ground that there was no provision for this sort of thing in the Immigration Act. The estate owner died. Shortly after that his wife also passed away. I should like the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to tell me, if he can, what happened to that $250,000 estate? It is true that it was administered by the crown, but is it not true also that a sizeable portion of that estate went to Russia?

I have a dual purpose in recommending this change to the minister. First of all, if a change such as this were made a similar incident would never again occur whereby the sum of $250,000 was sent out of Canada, because I believe it was turned over to the other members of the family in Russia. If that young lady had been admitted to Canada she would have been totally independent. She probably would have inherited the entire estate and a profitable business would have remained in the family.

There is another matter in connection with the citizenship act with which I should like to deal for a moment. The minister may recall, if he has read some of the briefs that have been sent to him—or his departmental officials can advise him to this effect if he has not—that the Canadian Ukrainian committee in Winnipeg asked the government to consider the repeal of section 18 of the citizenship act. In my view this section still discriminates against those people who are Canadian citizens but not Canadian by birth. This section deals with the loss of Canadian citizenship as a result of residence outside of Canada. Certainly if this act is going to correspond with the true meaning of the bill of rights, this discriminatory section should be repealed.

The minister might consider another aspect of the Immigration Act which needs consideration. I should like the minister to inform me how security risks are assessed when our officials examine prospective immigrants. How do we do this? I shall give another example. For a number of years I have attempted to bring into Canada a family whose father at one time attended some communist meetings in Italy. The rest of the family have never been associated with the communist party. They swear they have no leanings in that direction, but our officials simply say that because the father attended meetings of the party in 1928-29 they are not the admissible class.

Do we have the Italian, French and German police determining the security risk involved in admitting certain immigrants? At this moment I am not prepared to offer any suggestions about a solution, but I think the minister might consider, in the case of an individual applicant, a letter of recommendation from the local priest, the local judge, or local police officer who has known the applicant for a number of years.

Dealing with the question on a local level, does the minister intend to reduce the qualification requirement for immigrants being questioned at the certificate presentation ceremonies in the respective courts to which he made reference? People who are very young, particularly those who are still in their school years, do not have much difficulty acquiring sufficient knowledge of the English language to qualify for such an examination, but I know of one case, that of a Chinese woman in the city of Edmonton well into her sixties, who probably never attended school a single day in her life. Because she was unable to name certain objects that were pointed out to her, her citizenship papers have been delayed. Is the local judge instructed to give such people special consideration, particularly on account of their age? A judge can find out from an applicant's relatives and friends how much educational background the applicant has. Certainly in this case an applicant who could not even write in Chinese would find it difficult within a short period of five years to name in English all objects that were pointed out to her.

Who operates the language courses to which the minister referred, and in what areas are they located? I think he suggested there was a citizenship course in Edmonton. Is there also one in Calgary?

Mr. Tremblay: There will be one there.

Mr. Skoreyko: I thank the minister. I notice my time is running out, and in conclusion I would draw to the minister's attention a speech which he himself made in this house on February 27, 1964. From what I know of the minister's attitude toward people of different national origins I think he is completely impartial and unbiased so far as ethnic groups are concerned, but I fail to understand why he spoke like he did on that occasion, as recorded at page 316 of Hansard for that date:

> There is a tradition of long standing in this parliament, that the Speaker's function in the House of Commons and in the other place is entrusted in turn to representatives of the two most important ethnic groups in this country.
> According to another tradition, the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne are chosen among the representatives of the two most important racial groups in Canada.

I wonder what the minister meant by that. If he meant what I think he meant, then of course the statement he made in this house today has very little meaning. I think it must have been a slip of the tongue, or probably an error in translation. I hope the minister did not mean to imply that any one group of people in Canada was more important than others. Mr. Chairman, I hope to rise later this afternoon as various items come up for discussion, and at the moment I thank the minister for his statement.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have heard the minister's statement. This subject of an enlightened and sensible immigration policy is very important for a number of reasons, one being, as he indicated, that the economic welfare of Canada depends to a considerable extent on our having an enlightened immigration policy. Second, our relations with other peoples of the world depend on having an enlightened immigration policy. There are very many possibilities in the small world of today of resentment and misunderstanding arising if our immigration policies are, or appear to be, discriminatory and unfair. Finally, immigration is a matter of very great importance because of the immense number of individual human family problems, as the minister well knows, that are involved in the administration of immigration regulations. Therefore I am glad he has made this lengthy statement about the policies of his department.

There were many good things in the minister's statement, but I cannot help expressing my agreement with the hon. member for Edmonton East who said the statement, by and large, was a disappointing one. To me it was something like the old cliché of the curate's egg, good in parts and bad in parts. The total impression was not very satisfactory. The reason I say this to the minister is that despite some of the good points I will mention, and for which he and his department deserve credit, there remains a failure to tackle some of the basic problems, and we will not have a satisfactory immigration policy until they are tackled.

I will deal with that in greater detail later. The announcement as to the proposed changes in the regulations did not deal with the charges which have been made, and properly made, of discrimination written right into the regulations themselves. There is failure to appreciate that right at the root of the procedures laid down at the present time is a system which, as the hon. member for Edmonton East said, perpetuates a disregard for the basic principles of the bill of rights. This has not been dealt with, unfortunately, in the minister's statement.

But may I, first of all, call attention to things in this statement which we welcome. I warmly welcome the minister's announcement that steps are to be taken to bring about a positive approach to the subject of immigration. As long as we, or officials in the department, or some of them, think in terms of keeping people out; as long as that is the basic philosophy, no satisfactory result can ever be achieved. I was glad to hear the minister speak of a positive program, and I was glad to hear of the various steps he proposes to take in this direction; the setting up of an interdepartmental committee, for example.

This seems to be an excellent proposal. But why does the hon. gentleman not go a step further? Why do we not have a committee of this house charged with the responsibility of reviewing these matters? I think this parliament should be used. I think there are plenty of people in parliament with experience in these matters who could contribute, not only by making complaints about some of the things which are wrong but, and this is far more important, by helping toward the development of the positive approach of which the minister speaks.

There is one thing which is perfectly obvious. It is that in a sense immigration policy depends upon and is a function of our general over-all economic policy. If we have an expanding economy there is no problem about getting skilled immigrants to this country. If we have adequate social security measures we do not need to worry about promotional campaigns. Why has there been such a tremendous influx of immigrants into France, Germany and other countries in northern Europe from Italy, Greece and Turkey? No elaborate promotional campaigns were needed. What these countries had were expanding economies and opportunities, and this is a situation which is essential. We can talk as much as we like, but unless there are opportunities available to them, immigrants are not attracted.

The reverse is also true. As long as we have a substantial pool of unemployment in this country the pressure against a liberal immigration policy will be tremendous. It is bound to be so. We have seen it again and again. In times of economic stagnation the minister will be under constant pressure to turn off the tap, to use one of his own expressions; and he certainly has all the means of turning off the tap at his disposal if need be. I welcome this new positive approach and the changes in organization and staffing, both badly needed, which we understand are to be carried out. This approach is useful and worth while, and I wish the minister luck in carrying it out effectively because it is certainly a move in the right direction.

I have no wish to discuss for very long the lengthy passages in his speech in which the minister dealt with the immigration of Chinese from Hong Kong, because I do not regard this as simply a problem involving the Chinese. I regret very much that the only change which is proposed in the regulations should be a minuscule change, namely that females—to adopt the elegant word which was used—can sponsor male fiancés, or their entry into this country, whereas hitherto there was apparently discrimination based upon sex. We are all happy to know that this discrimination is to be removed. But if this makes any substantial difference to the situation I shall be surprised. I doubt whether there are enough Chinese females of marriageable age with the ability to attract these young men from Hong Kong to make this change in the regulations more than a tiny gesture.

The minister has, in this instance, frankly stated that he is not recommending that sponsorship privileges for Chinese be extended to cover the admission of brothers, sisters and more distant relatives. That statement, and the regulations which underline it, perpetuate a discrimination which is based, if you like, on geographical grounds but in reality on racial grounds. It represents the survival in these regulations of racial discrimination.

I have heard the Prime Minister speak on this subject. I have heard the former minister of citizenship and immigration do the same. They together, I imagine, with the present minister, are enlightened men who say they do not have anything to do with discrimination. I remember the Prime Minister speaking heatedly about some United States legislation which continued discrimination on racial grounds. What are the circumstances here? I want the committee to appreciate this. Perhaps the committee does appreciate it already; it is written into the regulations. We do not need to wait for a new session of parliament or for legislation on other items to be completed before we can deal with it. It could be done by order in council with the stroke of a pen. But it is not being done. What is the situation today? Regulation 31(d) states, with application to persons permitted to land in Canada:

> a person who is a citizen of any country of Europe, including Turkey; or of any country of North, Central or South America or islands adjacent thereto; or of Egypt, Israel or Lebanon, if such person is:
> (i) the son, daughter, brother or sister, as well as the husband or wife and the unmarried son or daughter under twenty one years of age of any such son, daughter, brother or sister, as the case may be; or
> (ii) the unmarried orphan nephew or niece under twenty one years of age, or fiancé of a Canadian citizen or of a person legally admitted to Canada for permanent residence, who is residing in Canada and who has applied for such person—

And so on. And that excludes not just China and Hong Kong. It excludes all of Asia with the exception perhaps of Lebanon and Israel, and apparently all of Africa, too, which is the largest continent of the world, a continent whose people are now seeking a place in the sun. They are conscious of discrimination in all these countries.

Under regulation 31(c) the group of people who can be brought in from Asia and Africa is far more restricted. If I come from Poland, for example, I can bring my brother and sister into Canada, subject to the other qualifications, of course. If I come from Lebanon, or Israel, or Egypt or any part of Central or South America I can bring one group of my relatives to this country providing the other qualifications are met. But if I happen to come from Asia or from Africa—and I use those words generally—or from China or Japan—

An hon. Member: India.

Mr. Brewin: Or from India—this government takes a particular interest in Malaysia; we are very sympathetic toward Malaysia, apparently, but we say "You are in an inferior position as far as admission to Canada is concerned". I say this provision should be taken out of the regulations, and taken out now. The minister talks about allowing female financées to bring prospective husbands into the country. The labouring mountain has produced a little mouse. We are still keeping right in these regulations, bold and clear, a provision that if you come from one part of the world you are in one class, while if you come from another part of the world you are in another class and may not bring your relatives here to the same extent.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this discrimination ought to be removed from the act, and no administrative problem about finding out what the Chinese relationships are should justify the maintenance of this trace of discrimination. Well, Mr. Chairman, "trace" is understating it; this is discrimination against the majority of the people in this world. I think if you add the Asians and the Africans together, it is precisely that. I do not know what the exact figures are because I have not counted them up, but I think you will find it is discrimination against the majority. There may well be administrative problems or difficulty in knowing who is the brother or sister of someone in Hong Kong when a person has lost his papers. There is no justification in this, though, for discrimination and the same treatment should be extended to all. If they want to narrow the classes—I would be very sorry to see them narrowed; I think that would be a great mistake—at least the same rule should apply to both groups of people. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I am very, very disappointed that this change has not been made.

I did notice that in his statement to the committee the minister made the following bow to the criticisms that have been made in this house. He said that some members of parliament have made representations with regard to certain sections of the present Immigration Act, and some have introduced private bills. Then he went on to say "Let me say I am in sympathy with many of the points raised".

I say to the minister that I appreciate his sympathy, but that sympathy must be translated into actions. It is no good saying one is sympathetic to these points. I think there is an old expression to the effect that sympathy does not butter parsnips, or something like that. We have to have more than sympathy. Then the minister said he thought most members would agree that there are many interrelationships between various sections of the act and isolated amendments which, while perhaps appropriate in respect of one or more particular problem, could have unfortunate effects in other areas. Then he said that all the points raised from outside the department as well as from within were being carefully noted and he would shortly assign priorities for detailed studies of the changes suggested and required. The minister said that following this he would expect to introduce a revised act for the consideration of parliament as soon as possible.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, we do not need to worry about assigning priorities when the courts of this country as well as members of this house have again and again expressed, in the most clearcut terms as far as members of this house are concerned and in the solemn judgments of the highest courts of the land, that there are basic deficiencies in the present administration. I would like to ask the minister whether it is not a fact that the majority of people who are excluded or deported from this country are excluded or deported on the ground that they do not have immigrant visas or on the ground that they do not have medical certificates. I know there are many such cases; I do not know whether they constitute a majority. They are not prohibited from entering this country by any of the provisions in the act but because they have not a piece of paper, which is not given to them and is refused them, or they have not had a medical examination, which is refused them under the act.

The courts again and again, as long ago as 1931, have said that this procedure of not giving the grounds for deportation is wrong; they called it hugger-mugger, farcical. How many priorities do you have to assign; how many studies do you have to make, to determine that this procedure is wrong? This has been stated in this house a number of times. I regret that all the minister can say is that he is going to assign priorities shortly and expects to introduce a revised act. A revised act is urgently needed, not only to deal with these major points but to tidy up all sorts of other points.

I had a case just the other day of a Canadian citizen who wanted to bring his wife back from Ireland, where he had married her. Because she had a mild epilepsy she was excluded from coming to Canada. The family is kept apart. The minister cannot do anything about it—although he could issue a permit—because she is within a prohibited class. This man is well able to look after his wife. She is a mild case and is well able to be treated in this country. He happens to be a journalist. He cannot bring his wife into Canada except as a temporary visitor, and as a temporary visitor she cannot obtain hospital insurance and it is dubious whether the children would receive family allowance.

I am sure the minister and his staff would be the first to agree that this provision is a survival of an attitude that is no longer up to date, is neither humanitarian nor sensible. This sort of thing should be changed. Then we have exclusion because of "insanity." Persons are not permitted to enter this country if they have ever had enough sense to go to a mental institution for a check-up. That is practically the position. I forget the exact phraseology in the act, but one of the groups of people excluded are those who "have been insane at any time". All the medical men will tell you that it is a ridiculous definition; and sometimes it is assumed that you are insane. You are asked the question, "Have you ever been in a mental institution?" A lot of us, possibly, would be well advised to have a check-up in this respect from time to time. But you can be perfectly healthy and capable, a sane and reasonable person, and because of this provision in the act, which does not make sense any more today, you are excluded from entering this country.

The act should be carefully revised. I hope it will not be a question of the minister expecting to introduce a revised act. I hope he will make that firmer and say he will introduce a revised act, and that this is an A1 priority for his department. I also hope this matter will receive a lot more than sympathy. When the minister gets this draft act I hope he will submit it to a committee of parliament which can look into it carefully and make suggestions and revisions. Then we would have an immigration act that instead of being antiquated would be something we could be proud of.

There are one or two other matters I wanted to refer to in my remarks, Mr. Chairman. I believe I have a few more minutes. I wonder whether the minister would tell us what he means by the term "skilled". Perhaps he would give us a little more detail in this connection. He said in his statement that the term "skilled" includes those with a reasonably good level of education sufficient to permit a range of mobility and adaptability required in most occupations today. It would be most helpful if we knew what is regarded as a reasonably good level of education.

While on that point, Mr. Chairman, the minister referred somewhere in his remarks to the difficulties that have arisen because of sponsorship. He said the qualifications for sponsorship were being dealt with inconsistently by different immigration officers. He referred to the fact that standards, which are essentially financial, were put into effect last February upon his arrival in the department.

I wonder whether the minister would table in this house, or make available to members, the standards which were put into effect last February. I know many would-be immigrants have received letters saying "Your sponsorship application is rejected because it does not meet requirements". In most of those letters I have not seen any attempt to tell them what changes are required. I think it would be extremely helpful not only to the members of this house but to all who deal with these matters if the minister were to set out for us the actual requirements.

The minister referred to another matter in rather harsh terms. He spoke of queue jumping. I understand the meaning of queue jumping involves the people coming into this country as visitors, and their desire to stay here and apply for citizenship rather than go back to their country of origin. I appeal to the minister to attempt to find some satisfactory solution to this problem, because section 7, subsection 3 of the Immigration Act itself specifically provides that when a person comes into Canada as a non-immigrant he has a right to report such fact, if he wants to stay, to the nearest immigration officer and present himself for examination at such place and time as may be directed, and that for the purposes under this act, he shall be deemed to be a person seeking admission to Canada.

I am absolutely convinced, Mr. Chairman, that parliament when it enacted that provision intended that if a visitor to Canada for some reason wanted to stay in Canada he should have the right to take his case and have it dealt with in Canada without having to return to his country of origin. I have in mind an individual who, while in Canada, becomes engaged, is offered a job, or who has been a student and, following graduation, desires to stay and work in Canada. I think it was the intention of parliament to give this right to these individuals, provided they are not in a prohibited class, and are qualified for entry.

I understand there is a great problem involved in respect of the machinery of the department, particularly in relation to the admissibility of immigrants. I realize that there are many problems when the department insist on a visitor going through all the requirements following an application for permanent admission. I know it is difficult to carry out the very careful inquiries which must be made, but I feel there must be some solution to these problems.

I would ask hon. members and the minister what would happen if they found themselves in the position of many of these visitors to Canada. I can imagine some of us being unmarried and having a desire to marry someone we met while visiting in another country. If we invited them to Canada as visitors and they decided to live here, how frustrating for the fiancée it would be to have to return to her country of origin and make application for admission to Canada. I can imagine how frustrating it must be for an individual in Canada who met and desired to marry someone from another country, having to send that individual back to the country of origin to make application for citizenship. This is clearly an unsatisfactory situation, and I feel it should be looked into very carefully.

I am wondering whether some method could be found to enable visitors to Canada, who desire to stay, to make application while in this country without having to return to the country of origin. Perhaps the examination carried out in respect of visitors to Canada could be more stringent, but having allowed the visitors in, they should be permitted to make application for citizenship while in Canada. I feel these individuals should have their cases examined as quickly as possible without the necessity of returning to their original homes and making application in the normal manner. After all, I feel it is a compliment to Canada when an individual seeks permission to remain here.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will consider this situation in an attempt to find a solution to this problem, because at the present time the provisions of section 7, subsection 3 of the Immigration Act are being disregarded, and the right that can be conferred by the provisions of that section is not being followed at all.

Mr. Chairman, I have perhaps detained the committee long enough, and it would be repetitious for me to suggest to the minister that if he really wants to achieve the reputation, which I hope he will, of a minister who has cleaned up the immigration laws,

I think he should seriously consider the remarks that have been made in this house during this debate. I am sure the minister has consulted Mr. Sedgwick, an eminent lawyer from Toronto. I am sure Mr. Sedgwick would tell the minister that many of the procedures now followed are inconsistent with the bill of rights and fundamental principles of justice. I am sure the minister will listen to these remarks and not allow the difficulties and problems that exist to stand in the way of fair and just administration of our immigration laws.

I conclude, Mr. Chairman, by saying that while I commend the minister for his statement, he must go much further than he has to achieve the results required. I hope he has no delusions in this regard.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, we appreciate the statement made by the minister in introducing his estimates. I am sure everyone followed with interest the rather lengthy presentation of the immigration picture in Canada today. I must agree with other speakers who have participated in this debate and who have suggested that there was not much indication in his statement of what he intends to do in the future. A great deal of emphasis was placed on plans the department is preparing, but there were no concrete proposals.

I believe this department has a very important role to play in the continued development of Canada. As a nation, Canada has tremendous prospective absorption possibilities. The population of Canada is very limited, being of the order of 19 million. Canada has vast geographic proportions and I feel can absorb a great number of immigrants and can do so very rapidly. I am sure everyone recognizes the necessity of increasing our population in order to develop markets adequate to absorb our production. There is a great deal of emphasis placed on overseas markets. We must dispose of our produce. I am sure we can do so by creating larger markets within our own borders. I think our domestic markets would grow following the adoption of the suggested new immigration policy, allowing people into Canada who will accept the responsibilities as well as the privileges of citizenship in this great country of ours.

The minister outlined the steps he proposed to take to improve immigration facilities. He referred to an interdepartmental committee as being a method of meeting the needs and demands in this respect. I think this is a very good suggestion and will help to alleviate the poor situation now in existence.

I think one of the most important things to do in respect of the promotional campaign he mentioned, is to develop this country, and by practical steps to show other people exactly what Canada is and what it can become. This cannot be done through the use of propaganda. We in this country do know of our vast resources and productive capacity. I am sure we can achieve a greater degree of development and progress than has been achieved to the present time. I am sure one of the ways of doing this is by bringing people into this country who will develop the nation as quickly as possible. I think when this development has taken place the example will be obvious to all countries of the world.

Not only must there be adequate policies in respect of immigration, the policies must be co-ordinated with those of every government department. I do not think it is possible for the minister and his department alone to do the job which must be done. As I pointed out before, there is a tremendous amount of development and progress needed to achieve the desired results. I feel there must be a correlation of policies of all departments in order to bring this about. Generally speaking I have found the officials of the immigration branch quite co-operative with regard to the matters I have discussed with them, but I believe that in many instances they are hampered by legislation and regulations that are in the main too restrictive in their nature. This has been referred to by the speakers who have preceded me. I am not going to labour the point but I believe there must be an opening up, a liberalization of the legislation and rules and regulations in order to make them more effective and to do the job that we believe the immigration department should do in this particular field.

The minister dealt mainly with immigration. I realize that this is a very important phase of his departmental responsibilities, but I believe that attention should be given to the requirements, privileges and responsibilities of Canadian citizenship. It is not sufficient just to bring people into Canada. It is not sufficient just to encourage them to come here and take up residence within our nation. I believe that the responsibilities of citizenship should be impressed upon them. In this regard I refer not only to new immigrants. I believe that all the people of Canada should realize that in accepting the privileges and benefits that are theirs within the borders of our country they must also be prepared to accept the responsibilities of citizenship. I have raised this matter before and I believe it is a subject which should receive a great deal more consideration than it has up to the present time.

In making his statement the minister indicated he was not going to refer at this time to his responsibilities with respect to Indian affairs but would reserve his statement on that matter until we come to that branch. I believe that is desirable and makes for more effective debate.

Extensive debate has already taken place on interim supply motions with regard to immigration, and our participation in the debate at this time is going to be very limited. However there is one other point to which I should like to refer. The minister mentioned revision of the act. It would appear that this is highly desirable not only for the purpose of making the necessary changes that are required but also for the purpose of making the whole act more readable and more understandable and in that way making it more effective in accomplishing the particular task.

We would urge the minister to continue his diligent attention to these particular fields. I think it is absolutely essential to remember that especially in this department the human factor is of primary importance.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration I do not want to take a lot of time. I was very glad to hear the minister state that the policy of the department is going to be a positive rather than a negative one and that we are actively going out to seek new immigrants for this country. Too often in the past I have felt that the department—when I say "department" I mean a combination of the legislation, the regulations and the department itself—has tended to act not as a pump drawing people into our country but more as a wall trying to keep them out. I hope and expect from the minister's statement that this will end.

There are three specific items that have been touched on about which I should like to make a few remarks. First of all, the hon. member for Greenwood raised the problem of geographic and racial discrimination in our immigration policy. I can only agree with him that I think this is wrong. I believe this is something that is not in keeping with the image of our country we want to present abroad and I do not think it is in keeping with the view of our attitudes that we ourselves have within our country. So I would ask the minister to regard this problem as a problem, and see if something cannot be done about it. I say again that the arguments presented by the hon. member for Greenwood made a lot of sense to me and I would hope that consideration might be given to them.

The second problem I should like to speak about briefly is that of immigrants from behind the iron curtain. As I understand the regulations, people within a certain age group are not admitted to this country because we are unable to find out anything about them. We do not know whether they are acceptable from a security point of view. It seems to me that because we are unable to prove the case for admission of these people we are in a position of having to assume the case against. We cannot prove they are fit immigrants for the country so we say that they must be unfit.

I am fully aware of the security problems involved. On the other hand, I do think there is something that might be done which has not been done in the past. Instead of looking only to the immigrant himself as a source of information about his character I think we might look to this end of the story. We might look to the sort of people who are sponsoring the immigrant. If we are going to bring somebody from behind the iron curtain to this country, and the people who are sponsoring him, the family with whom he is going to live, are people of good character and of industry who have established themselves as good citizens of this country, surely we should be able to give some consideration to the risk involved in bringing a person into that environment. If we have confidence, as I do, in our system of life in this country I think we should not be afraid of bringing somebody who might possibly be a communist into this type of environment, in the hope that our system would commend itself to the immigrant. So I would urge the department to look at the problem not only from the point of view of trying to find out information about the prospective immigrant in his country of origin but also from the point of view of the environment here to which the immigrant is coming, and see if we cannot establish some yardsticks on that basis that might allow some of these people into the country, that might allow some family reunions which, based on the experience of the cases I have had, I think should take place.

The third point I should like to raise deals with the problem of mental illness. This is the subject of a private member's bill which I have on the order paper, but the way the schedule is going I do not think there is a chance that the bill will come up for debate this session. It was on the order paper last session but did not come up then either.

I think the easiest way for me to describe this problem is to cite the case history that first brought the problem to my attention. I refer to the case of a man who during the war lost his family and wandered throughout war torn Europe. After the war he was able to obtain certain skills as an electrician and became engaged to be married to a girl. His engagement was broken and he came to Canada in 1953. Shortly after he arrived in this country he had a nervous or mental breakdown and went into a mental hospital. There he stayed for a period of a couple of months, I believe. Since that time this man has established himself in this country. He has worked steadily since 1953, a period of 11 years now, and there has been absolutely no problem at all in terms of his mental health. He has had recent examinations by psychiatrists and they have indicated that his previous problem was the result of the upbringing he had during the war, the breaking up of his family, the loss of his parents, the breaking of his engagement and then suddenly being transplanted to this environment. The pressures were too great. But since that time he has re-established himself and from current psychiatric examinations the indications are that he is probably as good or a better risk than most people in this country today. This man is under an order of deportation.

Now, it is true this order of deportation will not be exercised. Indeed it cannot be exercised because there is no place we can send him. He is now a resident of Canada. It is fine to say to the man: You do not have to worry; you can stay here all the rest of your life. The order of deportation will not be exercised. This may seem like a reasonable thing to say. However in my opinion it is not. This man cannot become a Canadian citizen or become the citizen of any country. He cannot get a passport as you and I can to visit other countries. He is denied many of the rights that we, as Canadians, have. He is denied these rights under the Immigration Act, and not just for today or tomorrow; he is denied them all the rest of his life.

He wants to get married and raise a family. However he refuses to do so under these circumstances. He does not want to bring up children and have to try to explain to those children why he cannot go to Europe like other Canadians, or hold a passport from this country. I do not believe this is good enough. I believe that the legislation, as it is drafted now, fails to take into account the advancements that have been made in connection with the problem of mental illness. It fails to recognize what all other institutions in our society seem to recognize, that is that mental illness can be cured. We allow a prisoner who has been in our prisons, but who has rehabilitated himself, to become a Canadian citizen. I believe we should do the same thing for people who have been unfortunate enough to have had mental problems. I think we should recognize that these people can be cured, and after adequate proof of cure I think we should then return them to full status as Canadians. I believe that to do less is not in keeping with our attitudes in this country. I urge the minister, when he is making his revision of the Immigration Act, to bring this section up to date because in my opinion it is almost reminiscent of the middle ages. A change should be made so that a mental patient receives proper treatment in this country.

[Mr. Hahn.]

Mr. Mandziuk: I wish to associate myself, Mr. Chairman, with the remarks of the previous speaker, who made some very good suggestions. I hope the minister takes note of them. I wish to congratulate particularly the hon. member for Edmonton East for his remarks because when we are considering the extension of immigration quotas for people from other lands, I believe the department would be well advised to co-operate more fully with the Department of Industry so these people can make use of their skills when they arrive in Canada.

My remarks I hope will be brief because I intend to refer to that branch of the department which has responsibility for the Indian population in Canada. The minister's introductory remarks were quite extensive and he should be complimented. He covered a great deal of territory. We find champions for almost everything in Canada. We find people who champion the cause of law breakers, people who come into Canada illegally. We are so careful, and we want to give them free legal advice and see they are comfortably housed in our prisons. We want to see that they get the proper bail. We have champions for those who deliberately take the life of another. Just a short time ago an organization was established in Canada to lobby for the abolition of capital punishment. Canada sends a great deal of money to the underdeveloped nations through the Colombo plan.

Who does champion the cause of the Indians? We have almost a quarter of a million of these people in Canada. There was a time when we thought they were faced with extinction. However the Indian population is increasing and we have them in every province. I have some in my constituency, approximately 1,300 men, women and children scattered over five reserves. It is with these people I am familiar, but I think the same situation exists in every part of Canada in so far as our Indians are concerned.

I was particularly intrigued by a centennial project initiated by the Saskatchewan wheat pool, Mr. Chairman, and I wish to make a short reference to it. The Saskatchewan wheat pool has initiated what they call a conference and trade centre to be built in Saskatoon. The federal-provincial contribution will be $92,000 and public contributions will amount to around $150,000. This building is for the purpose of teaching the Indians in order to bridge the gap between the different cultures, thus enabling these Indians to lead a richer life. These short courses are going to be five or ten days, or perhaps of two weeks duration and will be given to Indians of all ages. The Saskatchewan wheat pool is to be commended for initiating such a project. I fail to see why this example could not be followed up by the government, instead of neglecting this section of our population as we do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these are first Canadians. Away back almost 500 years ago when the first white man came to this country, the Indians had a culture. They had reached a certain level of civilization. They did not have a common language but they had an organized government and some ideas for practising democracy. One does not need to stretch his imagination too far to visualize what would have happened if the white man had not come and this Indian population, simply by a process of evolution, had been allowed to progress culturally. One wonders if these people would not have reached, by this time, a much higher level than some of the multitribal nations in Africa. I have great respect for the intelligence of these people. However, today they have no ambition. I think we have destroyed that.

What have we given the Indian? We have put him in a reserve, in a ghetto. We have destroyed his pride of race. We have destroyed his initiative. We have destroyed his ambition to do better because all we hand out to him is a relief voucher. He lives from day to day because he knows the little white father, the government, is going to take care of him. I admit that the schools on the various reserves are trying to do a good job. I commend the department for having started an experiment several years ago, namely encouraging the integration of the Indian boys and girls into our public school system.

I speak from experience because from one large Indian reserve in my riding a number of children were brought into our public schools, and from the conversations I have had with the board of trustees and the teachers, I learn they are making satisfactory progress. This experiment should be extended to the full. We should do away with the idea of the one room school on the Indian reserve where at times it is most difficult to secure a qualified teacher.

Some of the residential schools are also doing a wonderful job, and in my constituency the Birtle residential school is doing a magnificent job. We must achieve integration for the Indians. We must destroy any suspicions we have had. We must restore the Indian's confidence in himself so that when he gets education he may qualify for better positions. Educated Indians will become leaders in their communities, and I believe the project which the Saskatchewan wheat pool has initiated is a good one, which could be copied by many other parts of Canada.

Indian affairs are in no way related to citizenship and immigration. Citizenship and immigration are two subjects, related to each other, and I would suggest that the government give consideration to establishing an Indian affairs department. It might be created by providing for an associate minister of citizenship and immigration who would give his full time to Indian affairs.

Indian reserves are scattered all over the nation. Suggestions have been made that they be abolished, and the Indians have gone up in arms over those suggestions. Outside of striving to integrate some of the young we are not doing a thing to encourage Indians to establish themselves on the land that is presently cultivated by the whites. There are thousands of acres of good arable farmland rented by white farmers, on an acreage fee or on a share basis. Is it not about time we took steps to prepare the Indians to take over this land? It is their land, and if they worked it it would put an end to the spectacle of Indians waiting for relief vouchers.

An associate minister of Indian affairs would assist the minister greatly. At present the department is too big for one man to handle. It is a troika, as Khrushchev would say, and in no way are Indians connected with citizenship and immigration. They do not have to be naturalized; they are the first citizens of this nation.

Several years ago, probably intended as an experiment and on the recommendation of the departmental heads, a change was made by taking the Indian agent off the reserve and putting him as far away as possible, presumably with the idea of encouraging the Indian to be self-supporting and to depend on himself and his band. In some instances in my riding the Indian agent is 40 or 50 miles away from the reserve to which he is assigned. In fact the nearest agent to a reserve is 50 miles away. The Indian has been in the habit of coming to the agent and regarding him as a father confessor, telling the agent all his problems, grievances and beefs. I know it is not pleasant for an Indian agent to live on a reserve ostracized from white society, but this is one of the hazards of his job, and I feel he should be as close as possible to the reserve, if not actually on it.

The Indian never goes anywhere without dragging his family along with him. You will see an Indian and his wife sitting on the roadside trying to hitchhike a ride to see the Indian agent. If they can afford the bus fare they travel that way, but the agent should be nearer to them.

I do not know what qualifications are expected of Indian agents. I am not offering any criticism of any agent I know personally, but I believe the agent has to be a teacher. He should also be an agricultural expert so that he may encourage Indians to make use of the land on which they reside. By competition he should instil in the Indian ambition to own, to possess something, rather than be content to carry on day by day without any hope for the future.

We have to have more houses on Indian reserves. If we have millions of dollars to spend for everything else then we must also have them for these people. We have put these people on reserves, and you should see the conditions under which many of them live. We worry about what is going on in Malaysia and Africa; I say let us start worrying about what is going on at our own back door or front door. Surely we can give better dwellings to the Indians, many of whom are living in hovels, log cabins with barely a covering on them, with broken window panes and bad floors. These are a blot on our civilization.

Let us try to integrate the Indians into our way of life. Let us get them into our public schools. Let us put dedicated Indian agents on our reserves. Let us bring the Indian to a level where he does not suffer from an inferiority complex. If that is done the department will be accomplishing something. I hope the minister will keep some of these suggestions in mind. They are important, and this is a segment of our population which we must attend to if we want to present a respectable face to the rest of the world.

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief comments on a subject which we are too often inclined to treat lightly, whereas it is the most essential subject to be found in this country, and I refer to immigration in so far as it relates to the demographic composition of Canada.

In accordance with our best traditions and by way of introduction, I should like to begin by congratulating the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, of whom we have reason to be proud.

Not too long ago, I had the opportunity to witness one of his performances on television, when he faced a panel of interviewers who stuck to their guns rather hard, and I was able to see how masterfully he handled their questions, which is altogether in keeping with his great ability and exceptional talent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Choquette: I am pleased to hear the applause of my colleagues, because what I have to say later on might not meet with their approval.

The immigration problem is surely one of the most difficult for French Canada. It is obvious that our country can admit a very great number of immigrants, but it is also obvious, unfortunately, that immigration has never favoured the French speaking group. Figures are there to prove it.

I put on the order paper several questions regarding immigration, in order to learn how many immigrants have been admitted and have settled here since the beginning of the century. In those questions I was asking for the number of French speaking and English speaking Canadians; this would definitely show that the French speaking element has been reduced, through immigration, to a very alarming extent.

We believe in the dual language character of our country. Many people say that they want to accept the bilingual and bicultural fact. We probably find this good will everywhere, but even if those high-sounding principles were broadcast from coast to coast, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, if the French speaking element is constantly losing ground in Canada from a demographic point of view, the day will come when it will be absolutely useless to speak of bilingualism or biculturalism, for there will no longer be any French speaking element.

Then I shall appeal to any Canadian citizen to come to our assistance in the province of Quebec, in order to fight those who exploit prejudice and those who would like to drive our compatriots into breaking up our confederation. We are able to face up with the utmost energy and courage to those who resort to prejudice, but we want also to provide them with acceptable arguments in order to prove to them that confederation is to our advantage and not to our disadvantage, as they try to make us believe by foul and surreptitious means.

Mr. Chairman, the facts show that: Since 1946, Canada has welcomed 2,200,000 immigrants, of whom 650,000 were British, 270,000 German, 320,000 Italian, 160,000 Dutch, etc. and as far as the French speaking immigrants are concerned, they numbered fewer than 70,000.

It is clear that in the circumstances, a large proportion of immigrants is drawn to the majority group and inclined to identify itself with, and become part of that group, for which they can hardly be blamed.

But the point I would like to submit, Mr. Chairman, is that to the extent the French minorities in the nine other provinces are strengthened, become strong and actively dynamic, we shall be able, not only to fight, but to eliminate separatists, by telling them: If Quebec should separate there would still be a strong French speaking minority to denounce them as traitors and renegades. But, if the French speaking minorities in the remainder of this country are inexistent, the separatists will then gain the support of those who are weak enough to yield to their arguments.

My impression is that if we really want to establish a biethnic country, I think the area where this principle should be confirmed is the Immigration Act, where the demographic balance could be considered in one way or the other.

It is by laying down that biethnical principle, by recognizing it in the Immigration Act, that we will assert ourselves. And that, all the much more if it is recognized that bilingualism and biculturalism prevail in this country.

I would be remiss if I failed to deplore the lack of interest shown by the government of the province of Quebec in regard to immigration. That government was at fault, altogether. Certainly, such a lack of interest is consistent with the theories expressed not too long ago by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) who seemed to be afraid of the fact that Algerian immigrants were to settle in the province of Quebec. It is because of such obsolete and out of date prejudices that we have continually lost ground as far as immigration is concerned.

I have here a booklet written by Jean-Marc Léger, who is particularly interested in the problems of immigration and he wrote this:

> But there is a general complaint and also a general surprise: "French Canadians always speak to us in English. Even when we address them in French, if they detect a foreign accent or a certain slowness of speech, they immediately switch to English.

Here I speak on behalf of the immigrants who come to Canada and are surprised to see that as soon as French speaking Canadians realize that their name has a foreign sound they have a tendency to speak to them in English.

French Canadians show a lot of thoughtlessness which should be remedied if we want our grievances to be justified and accepted.

And Mr. Léger continues:

> In other circumstances, our people will consider new Canadians as English speaking people when it comes to the distribution of pamphlets or booklets published in French and in English. In a hotel or on a streetcar, in a restaurant or in a store, the name or the accent of a new Canadian will immediately encourage the French Canadian employee to carry the conversation in English.
> The situation is so ridiculous that some of our fellow citizens speak in English to French immigrants with Basque or Alsatian names.

And Mr. Léger said further that this xenophobia has always existed among a great number of us and, as a result, the immigrant did not feel at home when he came to live in Quebec.

It is on account of speeches such as those delivered by a former minister of the crown that immigrants are reluctant to come and live in Canada and more especially in the province of Quebec. It is on account of that backward attitude that immigration has always been unfavourable to French Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks. If we really want Quebec to develop within confederation, the dual language principle should definitely be included in the Immigration Act in one way or another.

Second, I think we would be justified in asking that the demographic balance, which was momentarily upset following massive immigration into Canada since the turn of the century, be corrected in some way so that the French minorities, as I was saying a moment ago, be strengthened numerically in the English speaking provinces. Then we would be in a position to say to the Quebec separatists: you have people in the other provinces who are speaking your language and have your culture and with whom we must make common cause in order to become true Canadians worthy of the name.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question of the hon. member for Lotbinière?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: If my hon. colleague will be kind enough to let me complete my remarks, then he may ask questions.

Mr. Laniel: I would like to ask the hon. member—

Mr. Choquette: I will answer your question at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, may I submit a third suggestion? I wonder if it would be so unpleasant to consider the following possibility: the law requires that when an immigrant becomes a naturalized Canadian, he must have a sufficient knowledge of one of the two official languages in Canada. Would it be so unreasonable to demand that a part from a sufficient knowledge of one of the two official languages in this country, the immigrant should also have a basic knowledge of the second official language in Canada, because after all when he has been living for five years in a biethnical and bicultural country, it seems to me that he should have an idea of the second culture and the second official language of that country.

And as a fourth suggestion—I do not know whether this would meet completely the ideas of the minister—I have the impression that the demographic make-up in a country is so primordial and vital that I feel we should have a parliamentary committee on immigration. This is a personal opinion that I am voicing—

Mr. Churchill: Why not one on the flag, too?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I am happy that this intervention of my hon. colleague from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) takes place now because I think he will cry out even more when he hears my fifth suggestion.

I belong to the younger generation, and we consider ourselves essentially Canadian everywhere; we respect the feelings and the principles of the older and more experienced generation who believes in ties and symbols which to our minds, are the badge of colonialism.

I believe that we of the younger generation must respect the feelings of the older generation but our generation must not be accused of being revolutionary because it wants to eliminate all colonialism symbols. We want our country to be essentially Canadian. There is a provision in the Immigration Act whereby every Canadian citizen is a British subject. I recognize that that may please a great number of Canadians, but you cannot blame the young people of my generation if they believe that the fact that we are subjects of another country constitutes a tie of bondage of one country to the other. In my opinion, we should be essentially Canadian, Canadian citizens, and if we want to pay respect to the crown presiding over the commonwealth, why could not all commonwealth nations grant mutual citizenship instead of giving recognition by legislation to a tie of servitude?

Mr. Laniel: I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, did you not give me the floor?

Mr. Laniel: I have a question for the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Churchill: I see. All right.

[Translation]

Mr. Laniel: Is the hon. member for Lotbinière not of the opinion that there would be another way to increase the French Canadian population in this country, that is by a natural way? The hon. members are wondering if he is not himself giving the lie to the statements made by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan).

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I think French Canadians have resorted to this means more than they should. There is an old saying about the revenge of the cradle. Today, it is powerless to compete with the constant flow of immigrants.

Mr. Churchill: I wanted to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, what is the reason for the activity of his colleagues today who were so strangely silent on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week? They are now conducting an apparently organized filibuster of his estimates, and he does not seem to have the confidence of his party.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Webster: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks regarding education among our Indian youth. A most outstanding development of school administration in recent years has been the enrolment of native children into non-Indian schools. Last year this trend affected 36 per cent of more than 50,000 young people from the reserves. This required 157 joint school agreements with provincial and local authorities—an excellent example of federal-provincial co-operation in providing an important community service. However, I would remind the minister that the Glassco commission recommended "the more rapid development of school integration as worthy of top priority". I hope the appropriate authorities will act on this advice and encourage an increasing number of families to send their children to non-Indian schools.

Last year a delegation from British Columbia presented a brief to the government in which they urged "a stepped up program of vocational training for native boys and girls with spot centres in Indian districts". Facilities of this kind would provide training that would prepare young people for job opportunities that are now closed to them. This would do much to lessen the possibility of discrimination in the field of employment. Such a development would take place more generally with the building of more and more technical and vocational institutions across the country.

School drop-outs among Indian youth at the secondary school level across Canada can be described only as a tragedy. In 1960 according to government reports only 82 students were doing work beyond grade 12. Last year only 98 of our native population were in attendance at a Canadian university. Every effort should be made to encourage more bright young Indian students to take advantage of the scholarships and other forms of assistance that are available at the present time. I hope Professor Hawthorne and his associates will conduct a searching inquiry to discover the reasons for the excessively large number of drop-outs among native children in the secondary schools across Canada. This country needs the services of more educated young Indian boys and girls in industry, in business and in the public service.

The department is to be commended for its program in the field of adult education. Last year 2,061 men and women were enrolled in a variety of courses, many of the instructors being provided by the extension departments of the universities. This is excellent work in citizenship and occupational training and should be encouraged in every way. However the adult education program is handicapped by lack of native Indian teachers. More of these young people should be persuaded to enrol in teacher training institutions. At present there are 1,500 teachers in Indian schools but only 200 are natives themselves.

Finally may I urge greater attention to setting up more Indian friendship or social centres in thickly populated areas across Canada. Eleven cities have such meeting places now, as a result of the interest and initiative of local groups. Vancouver recently commenced a service of this kind through the action of enterprising citizens and local native people themselves. But they are having financial difficulties.

To an annual budget of $18,000, the department of indian affairs contributes only $5,000. I understand that this is the maximum amount paid to any of the centres in Canada. Surely they are deserving of more generous assistance through some public agency. I urge the minister to consider sympathetically future requests. The department should assume a greater share of the cost of supporting these important institutions.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to make a few remarks about the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I represent a constituency in which a great number of citizens who have come from European countries live. Quite a number of them came from countries behind the iron curtain. I receive a great many letters from these people.

I must say that I have received a great deal of co-operation from the officials of this department, and only a short time ago one of my constituents required a Canadian citizenship certificate and passport in order to make a trip to his land of birth in Europe. As a result of the very quick work of the officials of the department this individual was able to obtain the documents.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring one further matter to the attention of the minister. Many of these people came to Canada about the turn of the century. Their passports and other documents were not satisfactory as far as the immigration officials were concerned. I think perhaps the officials should pay a little more attention to these people applying for certificates. Quite often they do not have the necessary information to obtain a passport or certificate of registration. In many instances the officials of the provincial and federal governments have co-operated in supplying the information needed. I have heard many complaints made by these people in respect of applications for citizenship papers. In many of these cases the people concerned have lived in Canada for quite some time and have not lost contact with their relatives and friends living in the country from which they came. Sometimes they make remarks, or express themselves in terms that could be misunderstood. They speak of the fine qualities of the countries in which they were born, indicating that even though some of these countries are behind the iron curtain conditions were quite favourable. They are in no way desirous of returning to those countries. I think immigration officials should keep in mind the difficulties some of these individuals face, when processing applications for citizenship. These people have close ties with relatives in Europe and find it very difficult to dissociate themselves from their origin.

I am aware of a man and wife who came to Canada many years ago and raised their children here. These children were all born in Canada. For some reason or other the father cannot obtain citizenship although his wife has become a citizen. I think cases of this kind should be considered, and some effort made to help these people obtain citizenship.

One other difficulty that has come to my attention involves recent arrivals to this country who have put money in travel bureaus, following which the travel bureaus have become bankrupt and they have lost their savings. One of these is the Atlas travel bureau of Toronto. I reported this situation to the department of immigration and received the reply that the companies were private companies and the department had no jurisdiction. The department of immigration does look after the issuing of these registration certificates, and I think they should make some investigation of this type of thing.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to state that there are several Indian reservations in my constituency. Many of the Indians have asked to have the reservations enlarged. Some of these reservations are situated adjacent to crown owned land. These Indians find that they can no longer make a satisfactory living by trapping and fishing, and wish to commence farming. They need a little more land. I think the department should give some consideration to this request.

I should also like to direct the minister's attention to a matter in respect of passports. I travelled in Europe not so long ago as a member of the NATO delegation and I had no trouble whatever in those countries. The officials just looked at my passport and it was all right. But if you try to cross the border to the United States the first thing they ask you is not what country you are a citizen of but where you were born, and if you happen to say you were born in Russia their eyes pop out and you think that the next thing they will do is to put handcuffs on you. I think this could be very well avoided and that the first question should be as to your national status. Instead of inquiring about the place and date of your birth they should inquire about your citizenship and should not be concerned with where you were born and how you were born. I know the same thing has happened to many other people who have crossed from Canada to the United States. People are asked these questions and have to undergo the embarrassment of the officials looking a little more closely at your baggage and what-not. I think this should be corrected. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to touch briefly on a matter which I feel is of great concern to the people of Canada and has to do with immigration. I refer to the case of Mr. Harold Banks. I do not intend to rehash previous arguments about this man nor do I intend to express my opinion of the illegal action of the Liberal government which gave this man the status of a landed immigrant in Canada. But I should like to suggest a way that may free us of this man entirely.

I believe many people are unaware that when the previous government was in office the former minister of citizenship and immigration, Hon. Ellen Fairclough, refused to grant Mr. Banks citizenship. She did everything in her power to rectify the action of the previous government which had granted him landed status.

I believe that under the Immigration Act a landed immigrant who leaves Canada with the intention of living permanently outside of Canada loses the domicile he has attained, whether he has been in Canada one or ten years. I am not a lawyer and therefore cannot give a legal opinion, but I would think that if Mr. Banks is a fugitive from justice, if he has fled from Canada to the United States to avoid serving the 30 day sentence imposed upon him for contempt of court, this might easily be construed as leaving Canada with the intention of remaining permanently outside this country.

I suggest that the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should look into this matter most carefully. If Mr. Banks has indeed left the country and lost his domicile by so doing, then every effort should be made to ensure that if and when he applies for reentry into Canada he be required to meet every test applied to all immigrants coming here for the first time. If these tests are properly applied, I am sure he can be refused entry as a person convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude under section 5(d) of the Immigration Act.

Then there is also the Hooper case, the man who was detained in Don jail for 100 days because he refused to answer questions that were asked by an immigration officer. It is true that under a certain section of the Immigration Act an officer has the power to detain and that it is an offence to refuse to answer questions. However the act was passed long before the passage of the bill of rights, which guarantees certain freedoms. Is it in the spirit of the bill of rights to hold a club of possible imprisonment over the head of a man who refuses to testify against himself? Should a person suspected of being in this country illegally be forced to provide evidence on which his deportation can be ordered? Should not the same principle apply as applies in any other prosecution? The civil police must build up their own case against an accused. There is no provision in the Criminal Code as far as I know whereby a person can be jailed for failing to make a confession.

Some people have suggested to me that so far as immigration is concerned they do not feel that the government is pursuing a sufficiently aggressive policy to bring immigrants into this country who are prepared to do manual work. I refer particularly to the field of agriculture, including gardeners, caretakers and manual workers. A great many fail on the tests of skills imposed by the department which are perhaps too severe under present conditions. Perhaps a plan along the lines suggested by some of the experts along those lines to bring in people from some countries who will do the manual jobs should be initiated by the minister of immigration.

I want to refer to the immigrants who have built up this country and to say first of all that actually the only citizens of this country are the North American or red Indians. All the rest of us are immigrants. The first immigrants, of course, were the French. They were followed by people from the United Kingdom. Then the United Empire Loyalists came to this country and they were composed of Germans as well as those of English stock. Then followed immigrants from the British Isles and then European immigrants in the main, until today in this country we have a million people of German descent, half a million Ukrainians, half a million Netherlanders, half a million Italians and many others totalling in all three million. The result is that today we have a country of minorities.

But I want to say that we cannot just thank federal governments for the policies of immigration and methods of bringing people into the country that have been initiated. I remember that in 1945 no move at all was being made to bring immigrants into the country and Hon. George Drew, who was premier of Ontario at that time, started an airlift. Within the space of a few months he brought in approximately 25,000 people. This demonstrated to the federal government that they would have to get off their seats and start moving.

Over the years since 1945 over 2¼ million immigrants have come to our shores and the province of Ontario from which I come has taken over half of them. Many of these immigrants who have come to Canada over the years have made substantial contributions to our economy. Names come to my mind such as Stephen Roman of Denison Consolidated, Romandale Farms and other enterprises. I think of the great contribution made by Mr. Koerner of British Columbia who established sawmills throughout that province and finally created the Koerner foundation which has done so much to help the University of British Columbia and education generally in that province. Then there is the Bata firm from Czechoslovakia which founded a town in Ontario and established one of the great shoe factories in Canada. I think too of the Bick family who came from Holland. Mr. Bick came here as a market gardener in a modest way and gradually expanded his enterprises until he went into pickle manufacturing and is now one of the big pickle manufacturers on this continent.

Then, in so far as the farm sector is concerned, since 1945 immigrants have purchased lands worth over $100 million. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that some of these farms would be abandoned today if it were not for these immigrants. Agriculture needs workers because of the older age group—in this industry.

It is in the professional field that I am particularly concerned. There were over 100,000 professional people who entered Canada since the war. Of these, 20,000 were engineers. I sometimes wonder if we stop to think of the great contribution these immigrants make in dollars and cents, to say nothing of their brain power. The cost of educating these 20,000 engineers at about $6,000 each would be over $120 million, to say nothing of the cost of raising them until they were ready to enter university. These people come over here ready to go to work and their earning capacity represents well over a quarter of a million dollars each. This is a great economic thrust to our economy.

I should like to speak for a moment about my own profession. There were 6,000 doctors entering Canada since 1945, most of whom came from the British Isles. The cost of training these 6,000 doctors would be approximately $84 million in Canada. This is a gift. I am not including the cost of raising these doctors from infancy until the time they were ready to go to medical school. The earning power of this group would be approximately $3 billion, quite a proportion of which would go to the government in the form of income taxes. It is a fact that since the last war 37 per cent of all the doctors in this country, including our own medical school graduates, came from outside of this country. About 18,000 of the nurses who are today working in the hospitals across Canada were trained in hospitals outside of this country. Think of what it would have cost us to have raised these young people from birth and then trained them to take their place in the world.

Then, I come to the other professional fields. We find that over 16,000 teachers and professors have come to this country since 1945. We are very short, as I have said, of doctors and nurses at the moment. The Hall commission report stressed the need for doctors and nurses over the next 10 years and the need for five new medical schools, as I pointed out before. The shortage will become more acute because the sources of supply overseas are drying up. It takes something like seven years to train a doctor from the time he starts medical school until he is ready to go to work. No drive has been needed up to this moment in order to attract doctors to this country. As a matter of fact, the government of the day deserves no credit, in many ways, for the people who have come here. We have to change our tactics. Doctors are harder to get. I would suggest to the government that they consider offering some incentives to the medical profession. Certainly, positions should be located. There will be difficulty in getting the doctors. However, the government should hold consultations with the Canadian medical association to ascertain the best way of attracting these doctors when they reach our shores. I am thinking of the first six months or the first year they are here when they have to pass examinations. Perhaps some degree of latitude could be given in these particular fields. These doctors are well trained, most of them in United Kingdom universities. I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that this matter is urgent. We will be unable to turn out sufficient doctors from our own medical schools for the next 10 years.

When I say the need is urgent, Mr. Chairman, all I have to do is to point out to you that there are hospitals across Canada today that are operating without interns. I can go to the metropolitan city of Toronto and indicate hospitals which are running without interns. I can take you to hospitals where there are floors closed because we have not the nursing personnel to run them. This is not good enough. I say to the minister therefore that he should get in touch with the Canadian medical association to see what can be done to bring to this country physicians, nurses and trained personnel.

Mr. Olson: I do not intend to spend a great deal of time on these estimates today because the two questions I want to raise have been discussed during this session and the last session of parliament. First of all, I was interested in the remarks made by the minister concerning the attitude of the Canadian government toward immigrants from Hong Kong. The minister made one or two statements which I believe appeared to indicate a changed attitude toward the immigration problem in Hong Kong.

My conclusion was that the minister pointed out we should look at immigration from Hong Kong in terms of ordinary immigration rather than in terms of a refugee problem. In order to substantiate this position he went on to say that if there were a relaxation of immigration regulations to permit additional people to come from Hong Kong to Canada or any other place in North America, this would initiate another flood of illegal immigrants from the mainland of China into Hong Kong. I think there is some sense to this reasoning. However, Mr. Chairman, we know also that there are still a great number of families in Canada who have relatives, brothers, sons, daughters and so on, in Hong Kong. In some cases the reasons given for the refusal to admit these relatives to Canada are not sufficient to provide the families here with additional information. In other words, there are cases that I have in Medicine Hat, and I am sure every other member in the house has too, in connection with which the immigration department does not provide sufficient information to the people here to satisfy them as to the reasons the immigration department refuses to allow them to enter Canada.

There may be an improvement in the policy, but nevertheless there seems to be an overriding suspicion, because of certain things that have happened during the last two or three years, that some of the people applied for are not members of the family. The department can never get conclusive evidence of birth and all the other vital statistics required for persons who come from mainland China. I do not say the minister should brush aside all these regulations but he should take this factor into account, and give sympathetic consideration to such applications.

The minister claims the government is working very diligently to find ways and means of overcoming these difficulties and reuniting these Chinese families in Canada. We sincerely wish him success.

I now wish to refer to a particular case in my constituency, but I shall not name the individual concerned. I shall send the name to the minister. This man has resided in Canada for 35 years, and although on four occasions a judge has passed his application for citizenship it was turned down by ministerial authority. This man has now made his fifth application and he sincerely and honestly does not know what caused the rejection of his previous ones.

I realize regulations are required for security purposes, but I believe this man should be given at least a suggestion of the reason why he is being rejected so that he could answer it. From talking to his neighbours I am satisfied there must be something in his file that has no foundation. This matter has been going on for 12 years, and neighbours who know him have nothing but praise for the man's conduct.

This man reapplied two or three months ago, and if the present minister rejects his application I hope he will at least provide some inkling of the reason. I would be pleased to discuss this man's application with the minister or his officials. It is not satisfactory to say he has been living here for 35 years and in that time no one has interfered or bothered with him, and therefore his certificate of citizenship is not important. Without it he is prohibited from crossing the border into the United States or travelling to any other country for fear that without citizenship papers he will not get back into Canada, which he has come to regard as his homeland. I hope the minister will give sympathetic consideration to this application or else provide some inkling of why this man has been rejected.

Mr. Wahn: I hope the estimates of the department will pass quickly, Mr. Chairman, but I do feel I should say a few words with regard to immigration because of the importance of the subject to my riding and Canada as a whole. In St. Paul's riding about one third of the residents are people who have made their homes there after coming from other countries. The great majority of them have become good Canadian citizens, and have made a great contribution to the life of Toronto and to the riding itself. Therefore I have a particular interest in immigration because of the nature of my riding, and also I have a particular interest in it because I have served as a member of the United Church committee on immigration, which is concerned with questions relating to this department.

I was delighted to hear the minister say he proposed to adopt a positive program to welcome immigrants to Canada. This is about the most important decision that any minister of immigration could make. I welcome that statement. I believe immigrants should not be treated as people who are looking for favours when they ask for admission to Canada. They should not be treated as suppliants. They should be welcomed to this country and treated with respect, and that attitude should prevail no matter what the colour of their skin, no matter what their country of origin, no matter what their level of education. I am delighted to know that is the approach which the minister proposes to adopt.

There was one point, however, in the minister's remarks which caused me some concern and which I would ask him to review very carefully with his departmental officials. I refer to the statement on page 13 of the speech notes in which the minister indicated that the Chinese amnesty program might be changed in some way—

An hon. Member: He said "suspended", "terminated".

Mr. Wahn: —and that there might be a different attitude with regard to the adjustment of status program. The minister intimated that some Chinese had complained that the adjustment program was discriminatory even though it was intended to benefit the Chinese. I would respectfully ask the minister to review this whole question with his officials and others interested in the subject.

I should like to draw his attention to question No. 1,383 which I placed on the order paper some time ago. It reads as follows:

> How many persons of Chinese origin have filed adjustment statements, (that is, statements to adjust their irregular or illegal status) at the Toronto immigration office during the 1960 calendar year and each subsequent calendar year to date?

The answer to that question was:

> The numbers of persons of Chinese origin who filed adjustment statements at the Toronto immigration office in the calendar years of 1960 and 1961 was 62. Separate figures for 1960 and 1961 are not available. The figures for the number of such persons who filed these statements at the Toronto immigration office since 1961 are: 1962, 233; 1963, 434; 1964, 312 (first 5 months).

So there was a steady increase in the number of adjustment statements filed at the Toronto office. As a result of my personal experience in a riding where a great many citizens of Chinese origin live, may I say that the general feeling is that the adjustment and amnesty programs are vital from a social point of view, and vital for the re-establishment of Chinese families on a regular basis. Not only should they be continued, but the existing procedures should be improved. I would draw to the minister's attention the brief presented to his predecessor by the Chinese communities of Hamilton, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. Far from suggesting that the amnesty and adjustment programs are discriminatory, members of the Chinese delegation emphasized that they should be continued and improved. I respectfully suggest therefore that this whole question requires careful re-examination. The figures indicate that the programs have been extremely successful, and this contention will be borne out I believe by the experience of social workers who are acquainted with the needs in cities such as Toronto, where the problem has been a serious one.

In welcoming this statement that Canada's immigration program is to be a positive one, I should like to take a few minutes to explain why I think this is so important to an urban riding such as my own. The royal commission on Canada's economic prospects reported the following:

> Immigrants have made a decided contribution to the scale of economic development in Canada... It is in Canada's interest to continue to encourage people from other countries to emigrate here in order both to assist and participate in the development of our country, and also to contribute further variety to our social organizations and institutions. Between 1946 and 1962, immigrants brought to Canada over $1 billion in capital, and almost half a billion dollars worth of settlers effects...Between 1950 and 1962 immigrants bought 7,147 farms and rented more than 1,300 others...From 1950 to 1962, 9,850 new Canadians established businesses of their own for which they paid over $116 million.
> In 1961 the research staff of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration made a survey of 7,000 immigrants who had obtained their Canadian citizenship papers. Of this group about 350 had established their own businesses and created jobs for over 3,400 other Canadians.

There are many striking facts of this sort which should be cited in support of the decision to make Canada's immigration policy a positive one. It has sometimes been said, erroneously, that immigrants increase the problem of unemployment. This has been carefully investigated, and of course it is not true. An examination of the unemployment and immigration statistics since 1940 shows clearly that there is no correlation between immigration and unemployment. It is entirely to our benefit to encourage immigration and to welcome immigrants here when they arrive. For this reason it is important that the minister should proceed to increase the staff of the department along the lines he has suggested. I welcome his statement that every effort will be made to improve the status of the department, because this is a vital department in our lives. I think the staff of the overseas offices, in particular, should be increased in order to eliminate the long line-ups which often occur at immigration offices abroad. If these line-ups could be eliminated the root cause of illegal and irregular entries into Canada would be eliminated. The department should concentrate on doing this because it is the true solution to the problem of illegal and irregular entries.

As I said earlier, in my riding I have a large number of residents of Chinese origin and for this reason I am very familiar with certain of their problems. I should like the minister to review very carefully suggestions which have been made from time to time with regard to the special problems of people of Chinese origin particularly in relation to the adjustment and amnesty program. Several practical difficulties have arisen which have limited the value of these programs although, as I have stated, they have been extremely valuable.

In the first place, when a man goes to the immigration office to adjust his status and get back his real name he is required to turn in his citizenship papers or landing papers and is left completely without papers of any sort until such time as the adjustment procedure has been completed. This often takes months —five months, or six months or even longer. During all this time the man is without papers. I suggest that the minister should consider making photostatic copies of these documents and returning the originals so that the man may be able to move about pending the completion of the adjustment process.

Another point is this. It has been emphasized that if the people concerned will come forward, tell the truth and adjust their status they will not be prejudiced in any way and will not lose their citizenship. This has been the case, generally, but there have been exceptions. For example, the case has been brought to my attention of a Chinese who had been over here for a long time holding false papers which described him as a natural born citizen. He went to the immigration office in good faith to adjust his status. His certificate was taken from him and he was told that in due course his status would be adjusted but that he must put in the usual period of five years before he could get his citizenship. Mr. Chairman, a man may have been here for 15, 20 or even 25 years and yet he must still wait five years before citizenship papers are issued. This is a situation which should be cleared up, and it could be cleared up rapidly.

Another point I should like to bring to the minister's attention is this: When a man goes to adjust his status—and I am assuming that this adjustment procedure and amnesty program will continue—he often wishes to apply for the admission of relatives at the same time. The practice has been not to accept such an application until the adjustment process has been completed. The adjustment takes a long time; the application for the relative takes a long time, so it will be several years before he actually gets his relative here. This tends to discourage the use of the adjustment program, and here again a simple change could considerably improve the results.

There has also been a suggestion that sometimes the immigration offices in Canada, after taking an adjustment statement have possibly furnished information to the Hong Kong authorities which has been used by the Hong Kong authorities as the grounds for bringing a prosecution in Hong Kong against relatives there. I would respectfully ask the minister to review all such cases and assure the house in due course that this practice is not being followed. I ask for this assurance because I think all members of the house would agree that such a practice is not one which any Canadian government would want to see adopted.

I think most members have had the experience of cases where immigration applications have been rejected and no reasons have been given for the rejection. I think reference has been made to this question this afternoon. It seems quite clear that in most cases it should be possible to tell an applicant why the application has been rejected. This would save a great deal of departmental time; it would prevent frustration on the part of applicants, and I think it would be in accordance with elementary justice. If an applicant knows why his application has been rejected, he is in a position either to remove any misunderstanding which may exist or, alternatively, he just accepts the rejection. But if he is not told the reason, it leaves him in a complete state of frustration; it also leaves people who are trying to help him in a complete state of frustration.

Mr. Chairman, one further point which I should like to make at this stage is that it would appear to many of us that there should be some sort of an appeal board set up which would hear appeals from the exercise of discretion by departmental officials, particularly in cases where applications have been made for sponsored relatives. All of us have had experience of constituents who have been very dissatisfied with the treatment they have received and who have felt they had no legal recourse. I would respectfully suggest to the minister that this whole situation should be reviewed again, and at the earliest possible date an appeal board should be established which would be independent of the departmental officials and would hear appeals, particularly in sponsorship cases.

I have one final remark, Mr. Chairman, and it is with regard to the suggestion made by the minister that in the case of immigrants from Hong Kong male fiancés would be admitted on the same basis as female. This is a small step in the right direction. I think in this country we have accepted the principle of equality without discrimination on the basis of colour or country of origin. The simple fact is—and I think no one can deny it—that at the present time in Canada we do have discrimination based upon country of origin; in other words, based upon racial origin. I would respectfully urge the minister to review the sections of the regulations which are discriminatory at the present time. These are the sections which make a distinction between relatives who can be sponsored from European countries and those from the countries of Asia and Africa. My suggestion would be, with all respect, that the landing requirements should be the same for all people, irrespective of racial origin, so that in actual fact we can take the position in Canada that our immigration practices are not discriminatory and are based upon the principle of equality.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to make a few remarks at this time which will hasten the passage of the estimates item by item, because I am not holding up any item. First of all, this is my first opportunity to congratulate the minister on his appointment. Coupled with that I would like to congratulate his parliamentary secretary, because he is a man for whom during the time I have been in the house I have had great personal respect. I have had fine cooperation from the minister personally, and his parliamentary secretary, in the cases I have brought to their attention, although I have not always had satisfactory conclusions. However, I think I can go this far and say that the minister personally exhibits those traits of character and non-prejudice which I think are very important in holding the office that he does.

I think that is about as far as I can go in congratulating him on his effort today. After reading his speech—which I was very happy to receive, incidentally, and give attention to —which is to be reproduced outside the house, and considering the promises of the Liberal party to the electorate, I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood who said we had only a mouse in the literature in front of us. Why it was felt that this speech contained so much and was important enough to warrant prior release to the press gallery, for the life of me I cannot understand, in view of the election promises that were made and the Liberal planks in this regard which brought them support—for I believe these planks and promises did bring them support.

There is no evidence here of any priority and I do not know why this government places priorities on certain things which seem to have very little importance when one considers the major problems of Canada, and at the same time probably frustrate the minister in his desires to carry out his own personal wishes in amending this legislation. I think the Canadian people deserve an explanation of these things.

I agree generally with the remarks that have been made throughout this debate. I fully agree with the remarks of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. I am concerned with one announcement in this presentation of the minister to the committee, namely that the amnesty and adjustment program will be terminated on September 1. First of all I would like to suggest to the minister that it is unfair to a large segment of the people, because the immigration offices have not been able to handle the work that has come to them through this program. It is the experience at my local office that the people who seek to make statements have sometimes had to wait two or three weeks before anything is done. Perhaps this has been because an interpreter was needed, but sometimes it has been because the business of the office was so heavy that the officials could not attend to the particular case. That is one reason why I think the announcement that this program will terminate two weeks from now is a terrible one, and I urge the minister to reconsider this matter. I am going to make some suggestions to him in this regard before I conclude my remarks.

The other matter I want to emphasize today—and I know from speaking personally to the minister that he is aware of this situation—is that although they say the program is four years old and this has been ample time for everyone to take advantage of it, this is not in truth the fact. First of all, it was a year to a year and a half, or maybe two years, before there was any co-operation from the Chinese community in regard to this program. There is a very basic and a very good reason for this. These people are a law unto themselves. Although they render services to the communities in which they live and to all people who can bring them business, in their own personal relationships they are very, very close and there is a very definite authority in the head of a Chinese family.

In many cases the head of the Chinese family is 70 or 75 years old. He is a small fellow who has probably been afraid all his life. He knows what the circumstances are in respect of his status and is afraid of the result of any disclosure on his part. Very often this man has worked all his life, made a success of a small business and has supported a family. What does happen as a result of the police disclosure and action? I am sure we all know the answer to that question.

Very often the head of the family has been frightened by stories told him by the individuals who make money out of these situations. The Chinese fellow is afraid he will lose his position and be sent out of the country. He has often told his own family what to say about their regularization status. False information is given by all the members of his family.

Young Chinese people refer to their fathers as "daddy". Some of these young children have told me that their parents told them to give the false information they have been giving. Many times these people will not give explanations at all. I have one particular situation in mind. A Chinese family has been running a grocery and has found a good living in this occupation from the point of view of their requirements. There is one son in this family who in fact is an illegal entrant. This husband and wife did not have any children of their own. The father before bringing his wife to Canada made three trips to China. When his wife came to Canada they followed an old Chinese custom and brought this boy as their son. He was not in fact a blood son.

I spent a good deal of time with these people over a period of three years. I have known the family for some 20 years. On each occasion I visited them they would say: "You help our son; you help our son". I said: "Pop, I want to help you". On each occasion they would tell me a slightly different story. After the three year period I had decided in my own mind what the discrepancies and untruths were. I finally paid a visit to this family and told the son there was nothing I would rather do than help him obtain a regularized status. I said to him, "You are not telling me the truth. I have come to four or five conclusions about what you have told me. Many things you have said are not true." I then told him what I felt was the truth. The young lad then said, "You are almost right, Mr. More, but what I have told you is what my daddy told me to say". I said to the young lad, "Go downstairs and tell your daddy I want to see him". The little old man came up and started his story in the usual manner. I said: "Look, pop, this has been going on for three years. I have run out of reasons for visiting you. Either you must trust me or say that you do not, in which case we will go no further". I said that I could not accept the story he had told me and knew that it was not the truth. I outlined to the old man what I felt was the true story. He said, "You are pretty near right, Mr. More. I will tell you this." When he had finished his story I felt that I finally had some idea of the truth. I gave him advice about further action. That was a Saturday and on the following Monday he went to the immigration office. Within two months he was regularized. Today he has made an application for his family to come to Canada. I hope his family will be able to come within a short period of time.

Mr. Chairman, the facts I have just related apply to a family of which I have some knowledge. I wonder whether anyone with any influence in other communities has been friendly with people in similar circumstances, helping them to understand and accept the assurances that have been given. These people should be given the understanding that their status can be regularized if they will tell the truth. I have only referred to one case with which I am familiar, and wonder how many more there are in existence. Each year these people are learning to trust their friends and believe in the assurances because of satisfactory treatment other individuals have received. They are beginning to believe that they will not receive discriminatory treatment. There are many hundreds of people who I believe will come forward soon and tell the true facts. I believe they will do so as a result of this program.

The program in question has really only been operating effectively for two years rather than four. Someone has worked very hard over a period of two years in an attempt to break down the fear these unfortunate people have. I refer again to what the hon.

member for St. Paul's said and assure the members of this committee that I cannot sit here silently in approval of these estimates. I cannot do so because of what the minister said in respect of cutting off this program in two weeks. What will happen to the people who cannot be serviced in your offices within that short period of time? They are being denied an opportunity to come forward and establish a regularized status. This opportunity is being arbitrarily removed without warning. The minister today announced that this program would be concluded in two weeks. People who have not taken advantage of the situation will be discriminated against after the conclusion of the program. I cannot understand how the minister has arrived at this decision. I agree there must be a cut-off date. I think the program and educational work have now reached a stage when the people will open their hearts and trust those who wish to help them. I suggest to the minister that he end the program on September 1, 1965. I do not think two weeks warning is enough, or fair. Many of these people will within a short period of time accept this program and take advantage of it, but I am sure all of the people who should take advantage of it will not do so within the next two weeks.

We must remember that these people are very different from the people who come from Europe and other countries. Their family ties and authorities are completely different. They have not been accepted in this country with open arms. Generally they have been able to support themselves and are accepted as individuals who work long and hard hours. People are very pleased to find these little Chinese stores open late at night. These people have been accepted to that extent.

I should like to ask the minister to consider extending this program. I assure him we want to get on with the business of the house and deal with his estimates. This program is tremendously helpful to these people. I hope the minister has listened carefully to all the suggestions that have been made, and the arguments I have put forward in support of an extension of the program. I hope he listened with attention to what the hon. member for St. Paul's said. He may be assured the program is not four years old but in fact only two years old. I think an improvement is coming in respect of these people, as evidenced by the fact they have more confidence in people of their community who assure them of fair treatment. I do not think the gates should be closed at the end of this month. The program should continue for at least 12 months. That much warning would be much better than the two weeks warning now being considered and I think the least I can ask the minister to do at this time is extend the program. The least I ask of the minister at this time is that he give notice here and now that the doors are open and that the program is available. Give it publicly and make it widely known. I will certainly make it known to the people of my community that the program will be finished by the first of September or the end of September, 1965. Having undertaken a humane program which was brought about as a result of discrimination throughout the history of the Chinese in Canada, please do not eliminate completely the benefit of that program by only two weeks warning that the program is finished.

There is discrimination in the act and nothing can cover it up. I concur fully in the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood in this regard. It is something of which no Canadian can be proud. As I say, we know that the older Chinese have not assimilated but have carried on their old Chinese ways. On the other hand, their sons and daughters are the equal of any in school and the equal of any of us as citizens of Canada. I ask the minister to consider these points well. I thank him for his co-operation and personal consideration whenever it has been necessary to approach him.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the one or two comments I wish to make today will not be taken out of their context and find their way into a framed picture on the minister's wall. With that caveat I will proceed to make a few comments. First of all I agree with the two members who have taken the strongest possible exception to what I say, with all fairness, is an arbitrary cut-off date for the amnesty program. My hopes and expectations were realized in their remarks.

It is an interesting coincidence to me that within the last day or two I have been discussing this problem with the department and yesterday I arranged by long distance telephone to have a Chinese make disclosure when I am available to go with him some day next week. I agree with the hon. member for Regina City that the program is only started. We have had a few hundred come forward so far, and for the life of me I cannot see what the point is in this short-sighted cut-off date. I hope that before the afternoon is out the minister will show his usual fair sense of proportion and announce as some of us have asked that the period of amnesty will not be arbitrarily cut off in two weeks time. This would spoil a program that is only getting under way.

I suppose we all relate to personal examples, and in the case of the person I have in mind it has taken him a couple of years to get to the stage that he feels able to brave the questioning of the department. These people have been unfortunate and the rest of us can take no pride in the situation. They have lived in a somewhat isolated way but now they are coming out of their shells, so to speak, and are willing to make statements. I hope they will be given every opportunity. Everything else in Canada seems to be postponed until 1967 and maybe the minister would find it convenient to postpone this date to the centennial year.

There are two specific questions I want to ask. One or two speakers have referred to the question of male fiancés and seemed to think that they were restricted to Hong Kong. I did not take this from the minister's statement and I see he nods his head. I am sure this is to be taken in the widest sense of the word. It is somewhere in the minister's statement but I cannot find it at the moment. I hope I can be reassured on this matter and I trust that those within iron curtain countries will be included. I have a particular example in mind. In many instances the British authorities have facilities in these countries and if we in Canada are not yet ready to establish immigration offices and consular officials there, surely we can usefully avail ourselves to the facilities of our British friends because so many Canadians have been cut off from their family sources since the late 1940's.

I was disappointed that the minister did not make a statement on a matter that has been very close to me as chairman of the immigration committee of the Anglican church. For 14 months I have waited at the minister's door at various times and the doors of other officials with regard to a program that seemed to me to have wide acceptance within the department. I refer to the program under which church people would sponsor 50 boys from Hong Kong to come into this country for training and then to find their places as citizens.

I have been patient about this matter for 14 months. On many occasions during the question period and at other times when I have wished to press the minister about it he has assured me that he would make a statement on this aspect of immigration. I think it is a rather humanitarian project although I admit that the numbers involved are just a drop in the bucket. However, he assured me that if I would wait until his estimates were presented I would have my answer. I followed his remarks about Hong Kong today with close attention and I should like to have the assurance that the department will accept the proposal of the Anglican Church of Canada and allow these boys to come to Canada under sponsorship to attend technical or other schools within the country. The minister having put me off, if I may use that term, for 14 months, I would be gravely disappointed if, after I and others who are interested in this project have waited so patiently, we were told that this program, which as I say has met with wide acceptance on the part of those officials of the department with whom I have spoken, was not going to be part of the over-all program. I would hope that within the next few minutes the minister would give me a favourable answer in this regard.

I want to say how much I appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for Greenwood. I think that immigration is not a partisan matter, in the sense that problems concerning immigration and the provisions of the Immigration Act are brought forward by members in all parts of the house. But I must say I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood in his reference to the really splendid statement about amending the act. If I ever heard something written in an office to be uttered through the mouth of the minister, it was this statement. I want to repeat it because I suppose the same thing has been said by every minister whenever he has not wanted to make a move, and I have to admit that people have tried to put such things into my mouth at times. These are his words:

> There are many inter-relationships between various sections of the act and isolated amendments, while perhaps appropriate in respect of one or more particular problems, could have unfortunate effects in other areas.

This has been said a thousand times before in the house and it is not good enough. For the life of me I cannot understand this worship at the altar of the sanctity of a statute. If we did our job properly in this place we would have two or three amendments to the act a year, provided they were sensible ones and commended themselves to the majority of members. But, no, the act is some sacred thing on an altar; we all come to bow down and genuflect before the act. I believe that answer is not good enough. If there are amendments suggested by the courts or by members, then for heaven's sake they should be made. Then, in the years to come we could have a consolidation of the act. Then, we could have it revised and revised again to look after all the small problems. This sanctity of the statute is nothing more than nonsense in my opinion.

Having said that, I hope there will be a committee of the house on immigration soon. There is a wide interest amongst the members in such a committee. We would like to hear about the plans the minister has. We commend him for them. The hon. member for Regina City complimented the minister and his parliamentary secretary. I should like to add my compliments. I should like also to compliment the new deputy minister. I see that Maclean's magazine classifies him as a submandarin, whatever that is. He has been a wonderful addition to the department and I thank him for the courtesy he has shown to me. I hope he did not have anything to do with the writing of this nonsensical sentence about the sanctity of the statute, because it is nothing more than nonsense.

Mr. Klein: Mr. Chairman, the members of my constituency were very pleased with the speech made by the minister in this house on August 4. What they found to be very encouraging was the statement made which appears on page 6394 of Hansard, to this effect:

> As far as immigration is concerned, I have already stated in the house that we have now reached a point where a positive and aggressive policy in immigration matters should be established in our country.

Then on the next page I find this statement:

> Later, when the business of the house will permit, I hope to make a revision of the Immigration Act, so that it may be more in keeping with the requirements of the twentieth century and the situation in which find themselves modern states which need more and more to welcome new citizens who are willing to go there.

Perhaps with respect to the question of the twentieth century we might be at the stage in our history at which the United States was in the nineteenth century. Perhaps we ought to borrow some of the aspects of the immigration policy of the United States in the nineteenth century when we are speaking about immigration into Canada in the twentieth century. This speech received unanimous editorial support in the country. I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen yesterday which stated, amongst other things, the following:

> That must be quite an immigration policy that immigration minister Tremblay and his colleagues are hammering out. Mr. Tremblay has been promising a new approach to the whole question of immigration, particularly with respect to regulations governing the entry of newcomers from Asian and Middle East countries, ever since he assumed his present portfolio in January.

Then, it says further:

> Just over 93,000 immigrants came to Canada in 1963—a pitiable low figure for a country of Canada's size and natural resources.

Now, I should like to point out to the minister that if you take the train from Montreal and you travel east to the maritime provinces you can travel hundreds of miles without seeing a house. If you take a train from the city of Toronto and you travel west to Winnipeg you also travel hundreds of miles without seeing a house. We must ask ourselves if we are being moral in this country when we have over 3.5 million square miles of territory with only 19 million people in it. I am serious when I say that we must question ourselves also when we condemn the policy of apartheid in South Africa as to whether or not perhaps we are practising a passive form of apartheid in Canada by refusing to admit people to this country. What is the use of condemning South Africa if we will do nothing about the British West Indies?

In the Montreal Gazette of this morning the editorial states:

> Immigration has fallen so low that probably almost as many Canadians are leaving the country as are coming in. The curtailment of immigration from its high point of 282,164 in 1957 was at first deliberate Canadian policy, the outcome of the slowdown in the economy. But there has been no slowdown the past few years. And yet the flow of immigration has not recovered.
> The hard truth is that people no longer want to come to Canada in the numbers they once did.

In this respect, I should like to say the following: At the end of world war II Canada was the fourth largest manufacturing country in the world. We were sending our products to the different markets in Europe. Now the markets to which we have been sending our products are manufacturing the products we used to send. I say that if we can no longer export the products, let us import the customers. When we speak of landed immigrants in this country, we should change the phraseology. When we speak of the 90,000 immigrants who came to this country as landed immigrants, we should speak of them as landed consumers.

The editorial in the Gazette goes on to say:

> It has become clear now that the methods of the Canadian immigration department will have to be revolutionized. This does not mean that the standards set for immigrants will have to be lowered. But it does mean that Canada can no longer wait for prospective immigrants to put in their applications. Canada will have to go out after suitable immigrants.

In this respect there are, as the minister will confirm, thousands of applications waiting to be processed in Greece; thousands of applications waiting to be processed in Italy. We need more staff in these different countries in order to process these applications. May I say that in my constituency there are thousands upon thousands of Greek people who are ready to suffer all kinds of personal deprivation in order to bring their fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers from Greece or from Italy and the different countries in Europe.

Now, Mr. Chairman, recently there have been speeches made in the house with regard to the C.B.C. I am only mentioning this because the cost of the C.B.C. has been criticized. It is criticized because we are televising and broadcasting to too few people in this country. If we had double or treble the population we have we would still only require the kind of broadcasting and televising facilities that we have now.

We have two transcontinental railways in this country, one of which is costing the country millions of dollars every year simply because there are not enough people to make use of these railroads. We are also faced with the situation where we want to implement the recommendations of the Hall royal commission. A headline in yesterday's Gazette said this: "Plan for health package could raise taxes 50 per cent." If we had more people in this country such plans could operate economically.

The trouble is that we have not enough people in this country and with too few people we will never be a great nation. If we want to make this a great nation what we need is people to make it great. If there are people in this country who are concerned —and I am not—about the great colossus to the south, I ask how can we ever be in a position to do anything about that situation unless we are ready to admit people to this country? You cannot live beside a nation of 200 million people, with only 19 million here, and be expected to be able to compete with it in any way, shape or form.

We have every natural resource in this country except one, people. That is the one natural resource we lack. So, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the policies yet to be enunciated by the minister will take into account some of the things that have been said here today. Canada should stop thinking in terms of what Canada can do for immigrants but should think in terms of what the immigrants can do for Canada.

Mr. Orlikow: I suppose I should join with other hon. members who have congratulated the minister on the excellence of his speech, but if I do not, Mr. Chairman, it is not because I have anything specifically against the minister or his speech. It is simply because I have heard other ministers make the same kind of speech. The former minister made a wonderful speech last year. Ministers in earlier governments, both Liberal and Conservative, all made the same kind of speeches. I suppose they came out of the same file, because if one does not do anything to implement the speech that was made the previous year, there is not much point in writing a new speech.

Not for a moment do I believe that the method which the minister announced today, to increase the number of immigrants coming to Canada, will be any more successful than were the methods announced by the former minister. Let us face cold hard facts. The people who have come to Canada ever since those of us who are not Indians started coming here and the type of people we have wanted to encourage, were those who came from northern and western Europe. In recent years those people have virtually stopped coming.

The minister is making a big mistake if he believes that by opening more immigration offices he will attract more people from Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Belgium or Germany. The peoples of those countries are pretty intelligent and well informed. That is why we want them here, but that is also why they will not come here. Why should they come from those countries when they have full employment at home, and have had it for the last half dozen or more years, and when they know we have had large scale unemployment for the last 10 years? Even though the unemployment figures are down somewhat, there is no prospect that this coming winter we will not again have somewhere in the neighbourhood of 500,000 unemployed.

Similarly, persons who have families in those countries will look at the kind of medicare plans presently operating in those countries, financed to a large extent if not entirely by their governments. If they do this they will not come to Canada because the pension plans they enjoy at present fall far short of the pension schemes we have in Canada, indeed far short of the projected Canada pension plan which is to begin in a year or so but which will take at least 10 years to become fully operative. If we are going to have large scale immigration from Europe it will have to be from the countries of southern Europe.

I do not intend to speak for long about the kind of treatment meted out to people who have come to this country somewhat illegally. On another occasion the hon. member for Royal said this was the kind of person we wanted, the kind of person who has the gumption to jump ship and break the laws. These people have been put in jail for 30, 60 or a hundred days before their trials, at which they have been sentenced to two, three or five months in prison and then deported. Certainly they will not spread any encouragement to people in their home countries to come to Canada.

It is time for the department to take a hard look at the situation behind the iron curtain. Many people who entered Canada since world war II originally came from countries which are now behind the iron curtain. They were displaced during the war. They were in concentration camps or slave labour camps. They were working in factories in France, where they had been transported by the occupying armies of nazi Germany, and after the war they found their way to Canada. I join with members who have already spoken in saying this was a good thing for Canada and that we are happy to have them here.

Many of these people were separated from their families, some from wives, some from children, some from cousins, nephews or nieces. Like many other hon. members I too represent a constituency populated by a large number of people who came to Canada from Europe following world war II, and who have relatives living in countries behind the iron curtain. I know of cases, as I am sure do other hon. members, of people who are already citizens here and who have cousins, nephews, sons-in-law and other relatives in countries such as Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia and Poland. It seems to me we all should practise some of the compassion we are so glad to prate about. I understand the need for security regulations and I am not too critical of them, but it seems to me if we are to encourage the relatives of those people who are already here to come to Canada we must be more elastic in our interpretation of them than we have been in the past. I hope the minister will take a sympathetic look at this matter. I know he can say with justification that he has been co-operative, as was his predecessor, with regard to individual cases. I have been successful in some of these cases. I know the hon. member for Toronto Greenwood has been successful. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre says he has been successful. I, personally, do not take any credit when I am successful in one of these cases because I think that if a person has to go to his member of parliament in a case of this sort, then, rather than being proud that I have succeeded I feel I ought to be ashamed that the regulations are such as to make it necessary for anyone to take that course. I think the regulations should be such that a person could get permission to enter Canada simply by going to the local office of the department of immigration and making an application. I am not saying we should open the doors wide. I am not saying that if some member of a central committee of the communist party or some minister in the communist government of one of the countries behind the iron curtain wanted to come to Canada we should say: Come on in, we are making it easy. All I am asking is that the tens of thousands of people who are living here and who have relatives who wish to come to Canada should be given a great deal of encouragement.

I should like to say something, now, about what I consider to be the total inadequacy of the change in the regulations which the minister intends to make with respect to this act. I will not repeat the exact words he used. A previous speaker has already done that. When they are read aloud it becomes apparent how ludicrous the concession is. Nor am I satisfied with the minister's promise that he is looking into this question and that we shall soon be getting a complete revision of the act. This is what the former minister of citizenship and immigration said last year. Ministers have been saying it for a long time.

I have before me a memorandum presented to the government of Canada by the Canadian Labour Congress dated March 14, 1962. So it was presented to the former government. This memorandum says, with regard to some changes which were proposed by the minister of citizenship and immigration at that time:

> While gratified with what appear to be changes for the better, we are bound to express disappointment that the Immigration Act itself has remained unchanged. There has been widespread agreement, including expressions from your government, that the act should be overhauled, and the congress among others had anticipated an amended act rather than only a change in the regulations. We urge immediate consideration of amendments to an act which has proved obviously unsatisfactory in many respects.

I wonder for how many more sessions and how many more years members on all sides of the house will have to get up and make statements of that kind. I do not believe that this minister or any other minister ever came into the house and told a deliberate lie. What is the sacred cow which prohibits every minister, despite the fact that he sets out with the best of intentions, from bringing about this revision? Every minister has made the same kind of statement: We are getting to it; it won't be long. I do not wish to heap coals of fire, but I hope it will not be as long as it has taken the Liberal party to bring in a pension plan, that is, 35 or 40 years. Surely it is time, now, that the Immigration Act was completely revised along lines which have been indicated so often and so eloquently by spokesmen from all parties in years gone by.

I should like to say something about the discriminatory features which still exist in the act and the regulations. I am constantly amazed at the way in which ministers can make speeches expressing sentiments of equality and justice which are so obviously false. I do not know whether the minister just blinds himself—

Miss LaMarsh: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: The minister of health says "shame". Let me give a couple of examples. There is not a minister with whom I have had a better or more successful relationship than the present Minister of Justice. On September 23, 1963, that hon. gentleman made a speech to the Chinese community in Vancouver during which he said:

I have been distressed by the accusations of discrimination which have reached me. If prejudice exists in immigration matters it must be eliminated. True Canadianism permits no discrimination. All citizens are equal in rights and responsibilities, regardless of ethnic origin or creed. It is with this view in mind that I am most sincere in my efforts to weed out discrimination and prejudice.

That is a wonderful statement. But today his colleague announces that in two weeks time the amnesty program for the benefit of Chinese who are here illegally will be discontinued. I would point out that this is a program which has only just started to produce results. I would remind the minister of health that the only group which will be affected, the group for whom this program was adopted consists of the Chinese, and I suggest that when the former minister of citizenship and immigration made that speech to the Chinese community he must have been speaking with his tongue in his cheek.

During the last session, the hon. member for Greenwood raised the question of a Canadian-born citizen of Chinese origin, Wayson Choy who had applied to be allowed to enter the United States and who was turned down because of his Chinese origin despite the fact that, like most of us in this house, he had been born in Canada. The Prime Minister made the following statement on October 28:

At the outset I should like to make it very clear that as for Canadian law and policy the present government, like its predecessor, is firmly opposed in principle and in practice to racial discrimination.

That sounds very good. But anyone who looks at the Immigration Act and its regulations will readily see how ludicrous statements of this kind are.

I am sorry I do not have my files with me this afternoon—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: He does not need them.

Mr. Orlikow: I have to smile at the cheers from those on the benches to my right. Having sat here day in and day out, listening for many hours to the drivel which comes from some of those members I admit I have to smile at their hope that we will co-operate to get on with our business. Suddenly they become great believers in speed and efficiency in this parliament.

The regulations which we have today are designed to a large extent to keep out of Canada those people whose colour is not white. If hon. members opposite do not believe me, if the minister does not believe this is true, I would point out that the people he has to convince are not, those of us who sit on this side of the chamber; he has to convince not only the Chinese of Hong Kong but he has to convince and educate the vast majority of British subjects, citizens of the commonwealth, who live in the West Indies.

As I was going to say before I was so rudely interrupted, in the last year we have had visits to Canada from the prime ministers of some of the West Indian countries. I am speaking from memory, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me the prime minister of Barbados was here, the prime minister of Trinidad, the prime minister of Tobago, and I think the prime minister of the Windward Islands. All of them mentioned the same fact, that their people find it virtually impossible to come to Canada. The proof is very simple to find, if one wants to look for it, if one wants to be realistic instead of having one's head in the clouds like the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Just consider the tens of thousands, the hundreds of thousands of people who have gone from Jamaica, from Trinidad and from Barbados to the British Isles; so much so that they have had their difficulties there. But why have they gone to Great Britain rather than Canada? They have done this because the British, very reasonably, have done nothing to keep them out; while we, on the contrary, have done a great deal to keep them out. I and other hon. members who handle immigration cases have had the same experience. There have been many cases of West Indians, people from Jamaica, Trinidad and the other countries of the West Indies who have come to Canada to study, who have spent a year, or two or three years getting the kind of training which every minister has said develops the kind of person we want in this country, they have become skilled in some craft, and yet when they decide to stay in Canada, on the basis of their experience here, having had the kind of training they have had, they have found it virtually impossible to get the minister or the department to permit them to stay. So I say that if the minister wants to make his speeches mean something, if he wants to be honest, he ought to consider what happens to those people from the West Indies and he ought to clean up the mess that still exists.

Mr. Chairman, I now wish to deal briefly with some of the provisions of the Immigration Act. I hoped these provisions would have disappeared by now, as they would have if the minister had followed the speeches made by the former minister and had brought in a revised act, as he should have done. I would like to show just what these provisions do and how ridiculous was the statement made by the Prime Minister during the last session, in the light of the actual practices in Canada. Section 61 of the Immigration Act, in dealing with the regulations provides, by paragraph (g), that the governor in council may make regulations for the prohibiting or limiting of the admission of persons by reason of:

(i) nationality, citizenship, ethnic group, occupation, class or geographical area of origin,

It might be interesting to find out some day just what the department considers to be "peculiar customs", because what is one person's peculiar customs may be somebody else's normal customs. Then paragraph (iii) says:

(iii) unsuitability having regard to the climatic, economic, social, industrial, educational, labour, health or other conditions or requirements existing, temporarily or otherwise, in Canada or in the area or country from or through which such persons come to Canada, or

(iv) probable inability to become readily assimilated or to assume the duties and responsibilities of Canadian citizenship within a reasonable time after their admission.

The regulations, which are the main means of controlling immigration to Canada, still contain provisions which in effect, if not in language, discriminate on geographic, and hence racial grounds, in precisely the same way as the immigration laws of the United States, which were objected to by the Prime Minister so eloquently during the last session. The main section relating to admission to this country is regulation 31 of the immigration regulations passed on June 18, 1962. The former minister of citizenship and immigration was wont to repeat that these regulations would eliminate discrimination to some extent. We have succeeded in persuading the public of this, but in fact this discrimination still exists. The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out how regulation 36 classifies people. I quote from regulation 31 (d), which says that a person who is a citizen of any country of Europe, including Turkey, or of any country of North, Central or South America or islands adjacent thereto, or of Egypt, Israel or Lebanon is admitted if applied for by relatives in Canada on a fairly wide group of relationships, if such person is able and willing to provide care and maintenance.

I would point out that two very large and important members of the commonwealth, namely India and Pakistan, are among those countries which do not qualify under this regulation; so that citizens of India and Pakistan, as far as this country is concerned, as expressed in this regulation, are in fact second class citizens as compared with the citizens of other commonwealth countries. I am glad I am not one of those who go to commonwealth conferences representing this country, because I for one certainly could not justify this kind of discrimination, whatever the original reasons may have been.

I suggest to the minister that the time has long since passed when the house should be put off with tinkering with the act and tinkering with the regulations. I know the minister is a new minister, but these matters must be known to the top officials of the department. I have a good deal of confidence in them, despite what some other hon. members, or one member, may think; I have confidence that they must have done a great deal of work along the lines which have already been discussed so often in this house. I suggest that the minister should get busy and correct these matters by a very early date. I suppose it is too late to hope that during this session or during 1964 we will have an amended Immigration Act. I should like to say to the minister that this session will last some time yet. We have a lot of business that must be done, and I am not convinced that he believes an amendment to the Immigration Act is high on the priority list and will be brought forward this year. I do state, however, that if we consider his estimates in 1965 and there has not been a new act brought forward he will have a long, rough, hard, bumpy time before they pass.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with one or two other matters, and will do so briefly at this time. I do not intend to go into detail in referring to the debates that have already taken place during this session in respect of the kind of treatment meted out to people who have come into Canada illegally. The minister made an excellent statement about this matter. The minister has appointed eminent counsel to investigate the situation. I know Mr. Sedgwick is now working on this task and I do not raise this subject as a result of any prejudgment to the effect that Mr. Sedgwick will not present a good report. Surely the department will have to wait until it receives Mr. Sedgwick's report before eliminating some of the horrible practices which in my mind have existed and still exist. The minister can give a detailed explanation to the best of his ability in respect of each case, but in my opinion he cannot in any way justify the fact that a number of people have been kept in prisons for 30, 60, 90 or 100 days before their cases have been settled. The minister cannot in any way justify the fact that a large percentage of those people were brought before magistrates, tried, convicted, sentenced and jailed, although not represented by counsel.

I have said before that I do not believe any person should be tried for an offence for which he can be jailed upon conviction without the benefit of counsel. Certainly no individual in Canada illegally, without friends, contacts and probably no money, should be subjected to that kind of treatment. The department should make arrangements to provide counsel for these individuals. These arrangements would necessitate the spending of a good deal of money, but I feel it would be money well spent. This country would have the kind of reputation for fairness and decency we think we are entitled to as a result of following that suggested practice.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one further remark in respect of individuals being kept in jail while their cases are being investigated. I am not at all satisfied with the arrangements made by the department. In Toronto and Montreal these people are being held in Don and Bordeaux jails while their cases are being investigated. I placed a question about this situation on the order paper several weeks ago, and that question has not been answered. My understanding is that these people who are still being held in those jails because they are here illegally, are subject to the same rules and regulations as apply to other inmates.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman. His time has expired.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I may be allowed to speak for one minute to complete my remarks in respect of this subject?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: I feel that the department is responsible for these people being kept in these jails. The department made the arrangements to do this. I am told that visitors of the people being held in the Bordeaux jail can only visit once or twice each week, that mail privileges are very restricted and that visitors are being fingerprinted. Surely Mr. Chairman, if a large number of people are to be held, pending investigation of their cases, the department should make arrangements to keep these people at some place other than the local jail.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to limit the debate on immigration. It is the duty of each member who desires to comment on immigration estimates following my statement, to do so. However, before commenting on the remarks made by hon. gentlemen I should like to make a statement about Indian affairs.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee at this stage to hear the minister's statement on Indian affairs? There may be other members who wish to speak on immigration matters. Is it agreed that the minister make a statement at this time?

Mr. Tremblay: I do not wish to limit the debate.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak very briefly about immigration matters. Perhaps if I am allowed three minutes I can assist in facilitating the conclusion of the discussion on immigration. Certainly we have no intention of extending the discussion this afternoon, and we felt that there was ample time to discuss the estimates of this department when we were considering interim supply. Because of that fact, it is our hope we will be able to conclude our consideration of the estimates of this department this afternoon.

Several individuals, including the minister, have referred to a new age and spirit about to emerge in regard to Canada's attitude towards immigration. That was the theme of the minister's statement. He referred to the developments that are to take place in the future. The hon. member who just spoke referred to the necessity for a new approach to immigration, and I should like to point out to him and other hon. members that a change in regulations was made in 1962 which provided a new approach to immigration matters. All that is needed to achieve a broader perspective is the application of a more enlightened spirit and policy in the administrative approach.

The main problem that did exist under the old discriminatory approach to immigration was the limiting of unsponsored categories to rather exclusive groups. When the new regulations are applied, in the spirit in which they should be applied, there will be absolutely no limitation to unsponsored immigrants. Immigrants may come to Canada from any place in the world, provided they have the educational background and skills to make it possible for them to fit into Canada's economy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are you referring to the changes made in 1962?

Mr. Dinsdale: I was referring to the changes brought forward by the former government in 1962 and approved by this parliament.

The refugee category was also broadened at that time. This category was restricted to refugees from Europe until 1962, at which time it was changed, making it possible to meet special emergency circumstances. The refugee provisions now apply to any group anywhere in the world. I think we have demonstrated a means of meeting some of the problems that have been referred to by various members during this discussion this afternoon. These problems can be solved by broadening our approach to the problem. The minister has indicated that new administrative techniques are going to be applied. Certainly the regulations that were passed in 1962 depend upon the broadening of the administrative facilities and there are two questions I should like to ask in regard to office facilities. I refer first to the West Indies. Up until a few years ago there was no permanent headquarters in the West Indies and immigration was taken care of by a mobile immigration team. I think this gave rise to the problems that were outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Certainly here is a country where many people are interested in coming to Canada. The regulations now make it possible for them to come to Canada if the administrative means are provided in order to make it possible.

I should also like to ask the minister about the administrative facilities available in Greece where there seems to have been some sort of bottleneck in the past. I feel that the regulations of 1962 are adequate to meet most, if not all, of the problems that have been raised in the discussion this afternoon.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I propose to take only a few minutes of the time of the committee to make some comments about the operations of the department with respect to immigration. I might say in passing that I was interested to note the words of one of the members of the opposition with regard to the deputy minister being referred to in a Canadian magazine as a member of the mandarin class. This may be an omen of hope to those in the house who are interested in increasing Chinese immigration. I do not really know, but I know that we wish him well in his attempt to carry out some positive changes in the department.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I was pleased to note the positive steps that were mentioned in the minister's statement, particularly those dealing with increasing the staffs in overseas offices, putting them in proper quarters, and general changes and improvements in administrative practices. However, I say, I hope in a constructive spirit and with the utmost respect, that statements and speeches favouring a positive approach to immigration and even the broadening of the regulations themselves will not mean too much unless there are at the same time the staff and the administrative machinery needed to handle the admission of sizeable numbers of immigrants in a prompt and courteous manner, and even more important is the need for an attitude in the department from top to bottom that this department is a department of immigration and that immigrants are needed and useful to this country.

The lack of effect of changes in the regulations unless backed up by proper administrative machinery and proper attitudes is shown by the record of the previous Conservative government. I was interested to hear the comments of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on this point. In the years between 1945 and 1957 I must say that under the regulations which then existed and which have been criticized by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and other members, over 1,600,000 immigrants came to Canada, all of them under a Liberal administration, and the overwhelming majority of them became good, useful and productive citizens. In 1956 the last full year of Liberal government 164,857 people came to this country and in 1957 the number rose to 282,164. In 1958, the first full year of Conservative government, the number dropped to 124,851 and it dropped each year thereafter until in 1961 it fell to a shameful low of 71,684. I might say that if the excuse is given that economic conditions had deteriorated at that time I think members of the opposition are caught in a difficult dilemma because I had understood their comments in this house to be that in those years there were no economic difficulties, and in fact in 1961 improvement had begun.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gray: I will accept questions at the end of my remarks, which will not be too prolonged if the hon. member does not mind. In January, 1962 the new regulations referred to by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris were proclaimed. What happened then? Was there a dramatic increase in immigration? No. The number increased by less than 3,000 to 74,586. Therefore the changed regulations apparently meant very little under the previous administration since there appeared to be a failure to fill staff vacancies and perhaps there was even an actual decrease in staff. I think it can be said that the attitude of the previous government was exemplified by the minister of that time, Mrs. Fairclough, who on behalf of the government was responsible for a very unfortunate order in council limiting Italian immigration. In any event, since the present administration took office there at least has been a start toward improvement, with immigration rising in 1963 to some 93,000.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is only a start toward improvement. There is a lot more that can and must be done, and much of it need not wait for changes in legislation because the vast powers given to the minister and the government under the present act to deal with these matters through order in council, thereby changing the regulations, are such that changes can have a far reaching effect if put into effect in this way. These changes in departmental organization and administrative practice can have a far reaching and useful effect.

I might say to those who are particularly interested, as I am, in having changes made in the legislation, which can only be done through being introduced in the house, that if members of the official opposition would be kind enough to permit the resolution and amendments now pending before the house to come to a vote it would be a lot easier to have other needed legislation, including changes in the Immigration Act, brought before us for implementation, and it could be done a lot quicker.

I noted the minister's reference in his statement to the link between the number of immigrants to be admitted and the administrative apparatus of the department. But, Mr. Chairman, our aim should not be to hold back the number of immigrants to fit the administrative apparatus of the department. Instead our aim should be to expand the administrative apparatus of the department to meet the needs of this country for an expanded population through immigration.

It is important to look for people abroad with high degrees of skill and training, but there is still room in this country for people who bring with them not much more than basic intelligence, good health and the desire to make a contribution to our country's life. If we expect suddenly to get very large numbers of immigrants from Europe, for example, with very high degrees of skill, education and training, I think that to a certain extent we are fooling ourselves. It is true, however, that through better promotion and more staff abroad we can get more immigrants of this type. With the dramatically improved economic conditions in western Europe and the opportunities there the high proportion of skilled people who might have wanted to come here 10 years ago is no longer available.

I hope that this emphasis on skill and training will not be used by the department officials as a subtle way to keep people out. It is true that we must try to match the flow and type of immigration to the type of skills needed, the type of jobs available and the economic conditions of the country, but we are not going to have tens of thousands of Ph.D.'s in atomic physics, or computer technicians battering at our doors to get into Canada. If we want to expand the population of the country more quickly than natural increase will permit and in some way to balance the outflow to other countries, we are going to have to make it possible for substantial numbers of people to come here who have relatively low degrees of formal skills and training when they arrive.

There is no question but that an expanded population increases jobs for all and helps the economy to grow. One basic answer to our economic problems is a larger population. This is shown by the fact that the United States, with the same type of geographic divisions and difficulties, has a population of some 190 million providing a huge internal market so that that country is not exposed in the same way as our own to external economic changes.

Just by way of conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that my own community of Windsor is a wonderful example of how people coming from almost every part of the world, the British Isles, western Europe, central and eastern Europe, the Mediterranean countries and the Orient, can work and live together in harmony and make a great and positive contribution to this country.

There is still a lot more to be done toward making the law more just and equitable, toward making more effective and generally improving both the act and the regulations as well as the operations of the department itself. I say by way of conclusion that the record of the previous Liberal government between 1945 and 1957 in bringing almost two million immigrants to this country, while at the same time giving us an expanding economy with expanding employment opportunities for all, is an indication of the achievement that can come, and I am confident will come, in the very near future.

Mr. Dinsdale: May I be allowed just a brief question of the hon. member? I wonder if he is aware that one of the major reasons for changing the regulations in 1962 was that the traditional source of immigrants was drying up in Europe as a result of the economic boom, and instead of sending people abroad, countries such as Germany and France were inviting immigrants to meet their employment needs? This was the reason for broadening on such an extensive basis the categories of immigrants. Is he aware also, as the minister outlined today, that as the result of the regulation changes there was a dramatic upsurge in immigrants coming in from Hong Kong, for example, in 1962 and 1963?

Then, there is the joint provincial responsibility in immigration matters. I am sure he is aware of the dynamic immigration program that was sponsored by the Ontario government in the immediate post-war years, which was one of the most successful immigration schemes.

Mr. Gray: If I may reply briefly to my hon. friend's very interesting question, I should like to direct his attention to an interesting editorial in the Globe and Mail for June 10, 1964, entitled "A Tale of Two Countries". This editorial points out that at a time when our immigration was decreasing in a drastic manner, some one million immigrants from Italy, Greece, Portugal and Spain went to West Germany and 100,000 more are expected to go there this year. As the editorial points out so well:

> In these figures and facts there are two morals for Canada. One is that a lively, competitive economy can absorb almost any amount of immigration.

Then, I quote from the editorial again:

> The other moral Canada may draw from the West German story is that there is still a substantial pool of ambitious manpower and womanpower in southern Europe. If West Germany can get large numbers of these people to settle there temporarily, cannot we get large numbers of them to settle here permanently?

I have, in my reply, only to echo these statements and point out that if last year we only got 14,427 people from Italy and 4,759 from Greece it shows that even under the regulations to which my hon. friend refers, there is still a lot more that Canada could and should do in this regard.

Mr. Tremblay: As regards Indian affairs, I would like to reiterate that my aim with regard to Indians is to help them participate fully in the social and economic life of this country. We are pursuing this aim through a wide range of programs aimed at the development of the individual and the development of the community. Throughout the emphasis is on the progressive involvement of the Indians in both planning and execution. Again, we are seeking to bring about the further extension to Indians of services normally available to other citizens. This will involve continuing consultation not only with the provinces and with other federal departments but with the Indians themselves for we know the importance of obtaining their views on matters which are of direct concern to them.

I want to review in some detail the current Indian affairs programs. However, before doing so, I would like to speak of three or four matters which also deserve attention and which are occupying much of my thought and energy at this time.

Hon. members will recall that the administration of Indian affairs was considered at the federal-provincial conference held in November, 1963. It was agreed by the delegates that the matter was so complex as to warrant a federal-provincial ministerial conference and plans are proceeding toward this end.

In the months that have intervened since November we have been developing various proposals aimed at encouraging greater provincial interest and co-operation in Indian affairs always with the basic objective of providing Indians with the same opportunities for social and economic advancement as are enjoyed by other citizens. We know that the provinces have also used the intervening period to good advantage in considering what part they might play in furthering the basic objectives agreed upon at the November conference.

We intend to keep the Indians fully informed with regard to the further extension of provincial services to them. I have already written to the council of each band explaining the exploratory purpose of the November conference and will keep them up to date as developments occur.

In keeping with our wish to consult the Indians on all matters of direct concern to them, the Indian claims Bill No. C-130, as introduced in the house on December 14 last, was sent in January to Indian bands, Indian organizations and others throughout the country. I am glad to say we have been having a generally good response to this with nearly 250 bands already heard from. Some 31 replies have been received from other sources. Close study will be given to the various suggestions made before proceeding with the legislation.

It would also be my hope that we can begin to move ahead over the next year with appropriate amendments to the Indian Act. Much of the ground work has been done already. On the other hand, it is not something we want to rush through without a great deal of careful thought. What is more, our legislative thinking must be reshaped to some extent by current and possibly quite new developments in the Indian affairs field, not the least of which are the promotion of closer co-operation with the provinces, and the community development approach of which I will be speaking later.

I have mentioned Indian consultation in connection with the possible further extension of normal federal and provincial services to Indians and in regard to the Indian claims bill. I would also confirm here what has been said before about the Indian Act, namely that this government would consult with the Indians on any proposed changes. Consultation is not, of course, an easy task when there are over 550 bands and a dozen or more Indian organizations. Much thought is being given to ways and means of providing for more ready access to Indian opinion at all levels—band, regional and national. I am confident we shall be able to work something out in this respect that will be satisfactory to the Indians and the government alike.

As well as through direct consultation with the Indians we hope to learn much from the Indian research project which was announced in the house on December 2 last and which is now in the field study stage. The research director, Dr. H. B. Hawthorn, has informed me that he and Dr. Adelard Tremblay, associate director, have been successful in gathering a very capable group to work on the project. As stated in December the purpose of the project is to provide a body of knowledge that will assist in establishing guidelines for future policy and the over-all planning required to promote the welfare and progress of Canadian Indians. I am sure that much valuable information will soon begin to flow from the study which is unique in Canadian experience.

Before going on to review the Indian affairs programs, I would like to mention that although I am greatly interested in the well-being of the Indians, matters relating directly to Indian health come within the jurisdiction of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I am of course, willing to take up with my colleague questions which may arise concerning Indian health. However, I would point out that hon. members will be given an opportunity to raise whatever questions they may have in this field when the estimates of that department are being discussed.

Basic to the work of the Indian affairs branch is the education program. The estimates for 1964-65 reflect the continued emphasis on the program with 57.55 per cent of the amount requested designated for Indian education, including $27,200,000 for the administration, operation and maintenance of the school program, and $7,416,000 for capital expenditures. This represents an anticipated increased cost for education of $3,528,190 or 11.3 per cent over the previous year. Of this amount about 3 per cent is attributable to a higher enrolment in schools of all kinds, 2.8 per cent to rising costs including higher payments to provincial school boards, 1.7 per cent to an accelerated program of building repairs to maintain minimum standards of school accommodation, and 3.8 per cent for new construction.

School enrolment continues to increase at a steady pace with the school population for the 1963-64 academic year standing at 55,475 or an increase of approximately 5,000 over the previous year. The largest part of this increase was due to the admission of approximately 4,200 more pupils in provincial schools.

To facilitate the further enrolment of Indian pupils in the provincial school systems, provision has been made in the proposed capital expenditures for contributions towards provincial school facilities of approximately $2,345,000 as compared to expenditures for this purpose during 1963-64 of approximately $1,913,000. Payments to provincial schools for tuition fees for Indian pupils have also continued to increase proportionately, and expenditures of approximately $4,255,000 are anticipated, an increase of $465,000 over last year.

Our government has continued to provide financial assistance to worthy Indian students to enable them to follow academic, professional or vocational courses so long as the students display reasonable promise and industry. During the year 22 special scholarships were awarded to outstanding students for studies in engineering, nursing, medicine, teacher training, metallurgy, auto mechanics, diesel mechanics, carpentry, music and commercial art. In addition financial assistance according to need was given to over 4,000 pupils to enable them to attend high school or university, or to obtain professional training.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

I am endeavouring to develop a basis for the establishment of school boards on reserves which would assume responsibility for the operation of reserve schools in accordance with provincial legislation and under the direction of provincial education administration. It is hoped that in the near future pilot projects of this nature will be conducted in selected areas.

The number of Indian students attending schools providing trades and professional training more than doubled during the past year. To accelerate the increase even more, it is intended to give added emphasis to this field of education in the coming year. In addition to the regular trade schools, the Indian affairs branch conducts special courses to provide vocational training in such activities as guiding and boat building.

The growing importance of economic development programs to many Indians in all walks of life is reflected in the estimates. These are essentially self-help programs and wherever possible financial assistance from appropriation is furnished on a repayable basis. Last year a total of $163,000 was repaid, most of which was for materials and supplies used in wildlife and fishery projects and for advances for agricultural, handicraft and employment placement purposes.

Expenditures from appropriation are augmented by loans from a revolving loan fund and by expenditures, grants, or loans from band trust funds. The revolving loan fund of $1,000,000, established as a source of credit for Indians who do not have access to ordinary lending institutions, is operating with about $750,000 out on loan at any time, leaving about one fourth of the fund available for new loans.

The use of band trust funds for economic development purposes is also increasing. Last year some $300,000 in band funds was diverted from direct relief to more constructive purposes including the improvement of reserve facilities. Seventy three projects were accepted by the Department of Labour for the winter works incentive program with an estimated 1,297 Indians employed for a total of over 20,000 man days. Payroll costs were $228,000 half of which is of course recoverable under the program.

Bands lacking sufficient funds to participate in the winter works incentive program are assisted under a special community employment program undertaken each year by the department. In the past year $1,200,000 was approved for this purpose. An additional sum of $414,000 was made available under the federal supplementary government winter construction program to carry out works projects on reserves in 16 designated development areas.

Indians are encouraged to exploit and develop the natural assets of their reserves and the provision is made in the estimates for materials, supplies and equipment to help them in this. Programs of assistance to farmers and ranchers are being continued with the emphasis on livestock raising for which a promising rotating herd program has been established. The forest resources of Indian reserves are another important factor in their economy and harvesting by the Indians themselves has increased to 90 per cent as compared to 25 per cent 15 years ago. Oil and gas are providing Indian bands, mostly in Alberta, with an annual revenue of over $2 million.

There is a potential for industrial enterprise on many reserves that has been scarcely tapped. However, while development of this kind has so far been limited, this is an area where we hope that more can be done. To this end we have established a close working relationship with the Department of Industry and hope to take full advantage of their services. We will also need to considerably strengthen branch staff in this field.

The estimates reflect an expanded scale of activities to meet the demand for Indian handicrafts. More raw materials are being provided on a repayable basis while the need for broader distribution is being met through expansion of the department's central marketing facilities. My department recognizes that still greater attention needs to be given to this field and with this aim has recently taken on an arts and crafts development officer. This man will be examining the development of Indian handicraft to see in what way it can be further stimulated.

Development projects have been undertaken for the benefit of the very large group of Indians who still pursue their traditional vocations of hunting, fishing, trapping and wild crop harvesting. Since these projects are based on provincially-owned resources their success is dependent largely on continuation of the excellent co-operation now in effect either by formal cost-sharing agreements or informal work-sharing arrangements with the provinces concerned.

Assistance in commercial fishing is provided by supplying gear and in some cases freezing and storage facilities. Trappers are assisted by provision of grub stakes, essential supplies and equipment. In relation to both fishing and trapping, marketing assistance is provided where necessary.

Indians seeking wage employment are assisted through the department's employment placement program. Growing numbers of selected candidates are being placed in permanent employment in urban centres with the co-operation of the special services division of the national employment service. The total of such permanent placements in five years of operation has reached 2,124 of which 507 were placed in 1963-64. The majority of these were qualified for their jobs through academic and vocational training provided by the department.

Rural and seasonal placements, again with assistance from the national employment service, have on the basis of known figures reached a total of 26,854, including nearly 9,109 placed during the past year. These figures do not include the many Indians who have obtained employment on their own initiative.

Provision is again being made for a road construction program aimed at developing road systems on the more populated reserves and providing access to Indian groups who are living in isolation. Although progress has been made over the past several years in this field much remains to be done. This is particularly the case in providing access to reserves whose residents, as yet, have no adequate means of reaching centres of population where they can take advantage of employment opportunities, school facilities and so on. In some instances provincial governments have participated in the construction and maintenance of roads on reserves. It is hoped that further discussions with the provinces will result in better road facilities being made available to the Indians.

Sanitation continues to be an urgent problem in many areas and a substantial increase in the allotment for this type of work will be noted. The provision of wells, and water and sewage systems where feasible, is being given priority by the department's technical staff. Efforts are also being made to encourage band leaders to take the lead in the development of better sanitation facilities.

In view of the pressing need for more adequate housing, an increase of some $600,000 has been requested in the housing appropriation for this year. This, together with contributions from the Indians themselves should help to meet some of the more urgent requirements. However, it is foreseen that much more will have to be done in future to keep pace with the steady increase in population and to reduce the existing backlog.

Concern has been expressed about the apparent disparities between the amount of public assistance provided to Indians as compared to that received by other residents of the various provinces. On the surface there appear to be such disparities. However, they are more apparent than real. Indian assistance rates cover food only. Fuel, shelter, clothing and other forms of assistance are provided to Indians as extra items on the basis of need. On the other hand, provincial scales, though varying greatly from province to province, generally include a lump sum payment for food, shelter, clothing, fuel and other needs.

The problem in public assistance is not, therefore, one of amounts of assistance but rather that Indians receive assistance within one framework of administration while other citizens receive it within another. This tends to set Indians apart in a way which I think we all recognize as undesirable. So far the one exception is in Ontario where a number of bands participate under the provincial general welfare assistance act in the same way as other communities. It is the hope of the federal government that similar arrangements can eventually be made throughout the country.

Again, while arrangements have been made in some of the provinces for the extension of provincial and other child welfare services to Indians on reserves, I recognize the need for extending such services to all reserves as quickly as possible.

Despite the progress that is being made under existing programs it is recognized that additional positive measures of a preventive and remedial nature are needed to accelerate the process of bridging the social and economic gaps which are still all too common between Indians and non-Indians in this country. For some time this government has been giving close study to this problem and, as I announced in the house on July 7, has now developed a community development program to complement existing services in the fields of welfare, education, health and economic development and to assist in raising living standards and improving the economic, social and cultural life of the Indians.

This community development program will emphasize Indian participation and initiative in advancing the well-being of Indian communities and will result in the application of a community development approach in many of the existing projects and services being provided by the Indian affairs branch.

As you were informed, it is expected that over the next three years this will involve an investment of over $3,500,000. The cost of this program is not included in these estimates but will be presented in supplementaries, at which time I will be prepared to answer any questions which hon. members may have.

This government is prepared to take the initiative in introducing a community development program on any Indian reserve which would benefit from this approach. Federal community development work would be phased into provincial operations whenever the Indians concerned are ready for this change and the province is able to extend its own services. There will be no duplication of provincial services.

Although the community development program will affect in some ways the whole Indian affairs organization, a new social programs division is being created to reflect a new federal emphasis on the need to promote actively the development of Indian communities.

This new division will pull together and focus more effectively a number of services which have been provided in the past in a fragmentary way. This includes the current work being done in Indian leadership training and recreational services on Indian reserves.

The new social programs division will also include a "cultural affairs section" which will be staffed with Indians. This section will recognize the cultural needs of Indian communities and will facilitate the development of various forms of Indian cultural expression in the arts, including painting, sculpture, music, dancing and so on. Similar work will be done in the field of sports. Equal emphasis of course is being placed on the economic and social needs of Indian communities.

It will be necessary to appoint a number of community development officers to co-ordinate new and existing programs in the complex and demanding task of facilitating the development of Indian communities and giving them access to a wide range of technical and other resources which are available at the local, provincial and federal levels. Skilled practitioners in community development are extremely scarce in Canada, however. The federal government plans therefore to arrange additional training for appointees to equip them better for this work.

Training for community development officers constitutes only one aspect of the training that will be carried out. To accommodate the community development approach properly, Indian affairs branch will also be retraining its existing field staff.

Training courses are also being organized for Indians to fill jobs in the community development program. The aim is to create a group of trained and competent Indian employees as soon as possible to assist in the work of community development and eventually to fill positions of responsibility in Indian communities. In effect, Indian communities will be assisted to develop their own municipal type of civil service to manage welfare, recreational services, economic projects and many other local services.

Grants to Indian councils, particularly in communities in which such councils have achieved a measure of effectiveness will be an important instrument of development. Such assistance will supplement band revenues and is intended to make it possible for Indian councils to employ Indians full time in various community services.

The present adult education measures will be stepped up in the context of the community development program. Depending on the needs of various Indian communities, courses will be provided in such matters as budgeting, homemaking, food handling, sanitation and so on.

Within the framework of this program, there will be continuous consultation with Indian groups and individuals. Much of this consultation will take place informally and consideration is being given as well to a more formal structure of Indian advisory committees. These committees will be chosen by the Indian people and will be as broadly representative as possible.

In education, the influx of Indian pupils into provincial schools and training institutes has created a wide-spread need for adequate guidance services particularly for those students who are boarding in cities. Many students need much guidance and encouragement to make the necessary social adjustments to city life and city school study habits. The teacher-counsellor service provided by the branch must be strengthened each year to handle this problem. Indian age grade levels have been brought closer to provincial norms in recent years, but by reason of absenteeism and late starting there is still a relatively large number of children two or more years behind in their grades and who will leave school before completing at least grade VIII. More remedial and accelerated classes are being organized to overcome this difficulty. Pupils leaving school before completing high school or a vocational training course constitutes a real problem. Drop-outs on the reserve are such as to seriously affect economic and social development. More upgrading classes are required to assist this group in raising their academic standing, thereby permitting them to find employment or to take further training if they wish.

It will be apparent from what I have said that there is a real need to move forward in all program areas. To be truly effective this will demand additional effort and attention. The present staff can only do so much. There is a need to strengthen—

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question? He is dealing with education. Is it the intention of the department to close the schools on the Indian reserves and have the Indian children attend public schools in the provinces, along with the other children who are attending?

Mr. Tremblay: The hon. member means the integration of Indian students. Yes, that has been the policy in the past and it is the present policy of the government. But, as hon. members know, we must reach agreement with each province, and each province must accept that these students shall go to the public schools.

Mr. Woolliams: I have one other question, Mr. Chairman. What has been the reaction of the Indian councils in this regard? I am thinking particularly of the Blackfoot reservation in Gleichen, and the Morley reservation, both of which are Indian reservations in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Tremblay: I met the chief and a few members of this band a few months ago. They are very much in favour of this system if these schools can give to their students exactly the same services that they are anxious to get from any other type of school.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I have only one paragraph to add before I am through.

It will be apparent from what I have said that there is a real need to move forward in all program areas. To be truly effective this will demand additional effort and attention. The present staff can only do so much. There is a need to strengthen the operations of the branch in both the field and support services. More highly qualified staff are required to do the job.

Every Canadian has a responsibility if only to extend the hand of friendship when the moment comes. There are in this country many groups of public-spirited citizens who are conducting their own programs of aid to Indians in city, town and country. Their contribution is invaluable. I appreciate as well all the suggestions we have received from hon. members and other interested persons, groups or agencies during the past year. We will always be receptive to any suggestions which might be of benefit to the Indian people.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the minister would answer one more question, Mr. Chairman—just one. This question has reference to Indian affairs. I certainly do not want to delay the passage of the estimates, but this question is causing some concern among the Indian residents, particularly in the province of Alberta. Is it the intention of the department to close the hospitals situated on the reservations, or hospitals that have been set up particularly in reference to medicare for the Indians? What is the reaction of the department to this matter at the present time?

Mr. Tremblay: The department has no responsibility with regard to hospital services; these are the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare. It is that department's responsibility to decide which services shall be given to the Indians, as is the case with any other group of people.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the minister would go one step further. Is it not a fact that the hospitals situated on Indian reservations were under the jurisdiction of his department and financed from the estimates of his department? I may be wrong in this respect.

Mr. Tremblay: As I said, Mr. Chairman, this is the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Woolliams: Are they financed by the Department of National Health and Welfare, or the department of Indian affairs?

Mr. Tremblay: We pay the services of those hospitals.

Mr. Woolliams: That is the point. Then, have you not some responsibility in reference to these hospitals?

[Mr. Tremblay.]

Mr. Tremblay: No. We pay for the services of these hospitals, like any other hospitals provincial or municipal. There is a system whereby we decide how much to pay to any such institution.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether before five o'clock the minister has any statement to make in regard to the amnesty program. The story is in the newspapers, on the front page, and I am sure it is going to create consternation. I wonder whether, if the minister has any statement to make in this regard, it could be publicized over the week end, if there has been any change in thought in this connection.

Mr. Tremblay: I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that we decided to choose this date, September 1, knowing that all the Chinese people who will want to benefit from this program will have sufficient time to make their statements. But we will be quite ready, if we are wrong in this assumption, to extend this period. If there are applicants who want to make a statement after September 1, we will be quite happy to extend the period.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I have one short question on schooling. Has the Indian population the equivalent of a night school? Most schools in British Columbia run night classes for parents and those who have left school but wish to further their studies. Does the department provide similar facilities for Indian parents who may wish to attend these classes? Also, if there are schools on the reserves, may Indian parents attend them?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have facilities for adult education in many places in Canada. I cannot give the hon. member the exact list of the reserves, but we have facilities for those parents who wish to take courses. I will provide the hon. member with this list as soon as possible.

Mr. Pugh: Are these facilities acceptable to them? Do many Indians attend?

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Could the hon. gentleman tell us whether the medical and hospital costs he referred to a moment ago also include doctor's fees? Does the department pay the doctor in addition to the hospital costs?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we pay both hospital and medical costs within the hospital.

Item agreed to.

Citizenship—

5. Administration, operation and maintenance including grants and contributions for language instruction and citizenship promotion, $1,715,000.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have one question I would like to ask on vote No. 5, which is the citizenship section of the estimates. We had some discussion earlier on the question of Indian friendship centres. I am trying to identify the particular item in the estimates which covers this matter. I am wondering whether I am correct in assuming that this comes under the item of grants for citizenship promotion. I notice there is some increase in this item in the current estimates, over last year. It does seem to me that this is not a very large amount to be assigned under the rather imposing title of grants for citizenship promotion in this country. I realize that the item above that, which has to do with the provision of language instruction for immigrants, is considerably larger.

I am wondering, with the idea of the Indian friendship centres apparently catching on in various places across the country, just what proportion of this $75,000 it is expected will be devoted in the current fiscal year to that end, and what proportion of the $75,000 is to be used in other forms of citizenship promotion. I think the department is doing something about citizenship promotion with regard to people who are getting their citizenship papers, and I am wondering whether that field of endeavour is also to be covered by this $75,000 vote. It seems to me that if this is the case it is not going to allow very much for any possible development, expansion or assistance in a real way for the friendship centres. Could the minister give us some details as to just what is covered by this $75,000 item?

Mr. Tremblay: I do not have a breakdown of the amount for friendship centres, Mr. Chairman. It is part of the total amount of this item. I will provide the hon. member with this information as soon as possible.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the minister has indicated that he will provide information on this matter when we resume our consideration of these estimates. I think we should leave this until the time we resume our consideration.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is the feeling of all hon. members that if you do not look at the clock for a few moments we will be able to dispose of this item.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest with all deference to the acting house leader that while we have listened to some rather interesting speeches from the various members of the committee, we have not really started our consideration of the estimates. For example, we have not touched upon the question of the operation of the Indian affairs branch, which I think will require a great deal of consideration. I do not see how we could possibly approach the completion of our consideration.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member who has just taken his seat feels that if by unanimous consent we suspend private members' hour we could complete our consideration of this item.

The Chairman: I suggest the resolution be reported and that any suggestion of that kind can be considered later.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. More: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that by unanimous consent we suspend the private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Apparently it is not unanimously agreed by the house to forgo the private members' hour.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-47, to amend the Weights and Measures Act (truth in packaging).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that retail purchasers of goods packaged in a wrapper or container be fully informed of the weight or measure of the contents. I take no personal pride in this bill and admit that it has been explained in great detail by people who are much more competent to do so than I am.

The national president of the consumers' association of Canada, Mrs. Plumptre, was described by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) in answer to a question in the following words:

> Mrs. A. F. W. Plumptre, national president, consumers' association of Canada, Ottawa, has devoted a great deal of time to consumer education and consumer wants. She is the outstanding person in this country in consumer activities. Her knowledge will be invaluable to this council.

Mrs. Plumptre wrote me a letter on March 12, 1964 in which she quoted the text of a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the consumers' association of Canada in June, 1962, which reads as follows:

> Whereas there appears to be an increasing number of packages on the market whose contents are stated in fractions of ounces; and
> Whereas consumers are experiencing difficulty in determining readily, while shopping, the comparative values of many products, due to the varying weights of packaged goods;
> Be it resolved that the consumers' association of Canada requests the Department of Trade and Commerce and the food and drug directorate to standardize the weights of packages of food and other items weighing four ounces and over, in units of quarter pounds, half pounds and pounds.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill was passed today, and I am sure it would if the Minister of National Health and Welfare supported it, it would provide invaluable aid to the consumers advisory council which the minister has appointed.

There is some protection at the present time in that manufacturers have to list all the ingredients contained in the product, and their name and address in the event an individual wishes to write them about their product. Many containers have an indication on the label of the weight in terms of 14 ounces, 35⅜ ounces, or some other weight, as the case may be, and anyone would have to stand at the counter and do a little mental arithmetic, or use a sliderule, to compare quantities and prices of different products.

The "ten cents off" gimmick is being used very extensively. One can go into any supermarket in Ottawa and find bottles of instant coffee with labels reading "ten cents off", even though manufacturers have no authority at all to suggest to retailers the prices to be charged for products. They cannot do that as a result of the legislation we have passed to control combines. The statement "ten cents off" means nothing at all. One can find products contained in packages, such as toothpaste, the smallest being referred to as the giant size, the next largest as the economy size and the largest as king size. Soap flakes containers have an inch of air at the top so that one cannot tell what size the container is. This practice is standard in respect of a great number of packaged goods people are invited to purchase.

Mr. Speaker, two or three months ago I did some comparative shopping at one of the large supermarkets in Ottawa. I found that I could buy York homogenized peanut butter in the 12 ounce size for 39 cents and in the one pound size for 49 cents. I challenge any housewife to figure out easily which is the cheaper. I found that I could buy French's mustard in a six ounce size, two for 29 cents and in a 16 ounce size for 25 cents, and Heinz ketchup in the 11 fluid ounce size for 27 cents, the 15 fluid ounce size for 35 cents and the 20 fluid ounce size for 41 cents. Again it is virtually impossible to determine the price. Salmon is a really interesting example. We have Clover Leaf pink salmon, 3¾ ounces, the small size, selling for 25 cents, the next size, 7¾ ounces, selling for 35 cents and the large size 15½ ounces, selling for 69 cents. I can see no justifiable reason for that kind of packaging on the part of manufacturers except as a means of confusing potential customers.

You have canned corn in 10 and 15 ounce sizes. You have different brands of soups sitting next to each other. One product is 10 ounces, another is 10½ ounces and another is 10¾ ounces. Obviously it is impossible for the customer to be able to calculate the price. You have two types of baby food sitting next to each other, one packaged in a 3½ ounce size and the other 4¾ ounces. Obviously it is almost impossible to calculate relative prices to decide which is cheaper.

Amongst the worst offenders are the soap products. Spic and Span comes in three sizes, 1 pound 3½ ounces, 2 pounds 8 ounces and 4 pounds 6½ ounces. The small size of Joy is 12 ounces and the larger size is 32 ounces. Dash comes in two sizes, 1 pound 9 ounces and 4 pounds 11 ounces. Surf comes in two sizes, 2 pounds 10 ounces for 73 cents, with the statement that you are getting 20 cents off, and 5 pounds for $1.19, and you are supposed to be getting 40 cents off.

I could go on indefinitely, Mr. Speaker, but I think the illustrations I have given show very conclusively the difficulties with which the customer has to deal if he is trying to buy on the basis of price. So far as packaging and labelling are concerned, it is true that we have passed through a packaging revolution and that the phenomenal growth in supermarkets is related to the package which sells, and not the quantity or the price. In effect the package has replaced the neighbourhood grocer whose job once was to sell the products in his store. Part and parcel of the selling job that the neighbourhood grocer once performed was to give his customers information about the products he was selling. Today the supermarket does that job but all it does is to put the packages on the shelves and it is up to the customer to take his choice. The sole way in which they really sell the product is by the package.

It seems to me it is important that this new salesman gives the same kind of essential and meaningful information to the customer as was once given to him by the grocer. This information is essential if the consumer is going to make a rational and intelligent choice between competing products. We have been told continually that the consumer is king. Everything is directed toward satisfying the consumer. If the consumer is to make a wise choice, surely we have to guarantee to the consumer that he can make an honest choice and choose the best product on the basis of quality and quantity.

I think that businessmen have a vital stake in giving the consumer all the information he or she needs to make a rational choice. Yet this does not happen any more. In the United States lengthy hearings have been held on this subject and it has been established that very often the consumer is unable to obtain the basic information necessary to make a rational shopping decision. He is prevented from doing so by the kind of packaging and the method of sizing which I have already illustrated. The price per unit as between two brands and sizes has become difficult if not impossible to calculate. In some instances the buyer is deceived by a package that does not fairly reflect the quantity inside. These practices make rational shopping almost an impossibility. Among these practices I would list the following:

1. Inconspicuous or non-existent quantity designations.

2. Deceptive illustrations.

3. Imprinting on the package by the manufacturer of price information implying a retail bargain where the manufacturer has no control over retail price, such as "cents off" and "economy size" designations.

4. Use of adjectives to describe the net quantity that attempt to give the impression of a greater amount than the same quantity of a competitor, such as "giant half quart" in place of "16 ounces" or "pint".

5. A proliferation of weights and measures expressed in odd amounts making price comparisons almost a mathematical impossibility. In the United States it was found that there were 73 quantities of potato chips under three pounds. Which is the better buy, 20 ounces at 35 cents or 22½ ounces for 40 cents?

6. Use of containers of sizes, shapes and dimensional proportions that give a distorted impression of the actual quantity within. This includes non-functional slack fill where the consumer may be paying for the air instead of for the product.

7. The use of size designations that have no actual relation to the quantity in order to gain a competitive advantage. One manufacturer's "king size" is another manufacturer's "large" for an equivalent amount. In toothpaste the smallest size may be marked "large". If we are not lucky, it will be marked "giant".

8. Meaningless serving designations involving the same quantity, but one package says "serves two" and the other package says "serves four".

9. Lack of any useful method of price comparison where weight or count are meaningless.

10. Lack of ingredient or composition information when this may be important, or presenting such information in an inconspicuous manner. Size is often difficult to find on Canadian products although the law requires that the weight be shown.

11. Reduction in content while masking the weight loss from the consumer by manipulation of package size and content markings.

These are just some of the practices which would be controlled by the bill if the house would agree to its passage. The bill seeks to bring our practices up to date by recognizing the emergence of this relatively new form of non-price competition. A packaging and labelling bill does this by facing up to the realities of present day marketing conditions, naming as restraints of trade those practices brought about by unfair and deceptive methods of packaging and labelling certain consumer commodities.

In proposing the bill, Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on my part to make it difficult for legitimate and honest businessmen. As a matter of fact, I think that the passage of the bill would make it easier for honest businessmen because it would control the small number of unscrupulous businessmen who want to get an unfair share of the market by using some of these cute tricks and, to say the least, immoral practices in competition with the businessman who wants to be fair.

There was an editorial on February 21, 1964 entitled "Slide Rule Shopping", in which they commented on this bill which I am proposing. I just want to read a couple of paragraphs:

> Two cartons of honey look just the same, but one holds 16 ounces and the other 12. Bottles of vinegar come at 8, 12, 16½, 24 and 33 ounces. Soap flakes of varying brands are in packages of 14 ounces, 16½ ounces, 20 ounces, 20½ ounces and 34 ounces. A small box of detergent could weigh (depending on the name) 15 ounces, 20 ounces or 21 ounces.
> In these circumstances, the only way to figure out the best buy is with a sliderule, or maybe a computer. What is wrong with plain old pints and quarts, pounds and half-pounds? Could not the shopper's lot be made a bit easier? Or are the manufacturers deliberately trying to confuse her?

The purpose of my bill, Mr. Speaker, is to make it easier for the consumer. I hope that the government and the members of this house will facilitate the passage of the measure and give the government departments, both trade and commerce and health and welfare, as well as the new consumers advisory council, an opportunity to do their work as they should, without having their arms tied behind their backs.

Mr. Macdonald: Before the hon. member takes his seat, I wonder if I could ask him a question about his bill? Do I understand correctly that he is suggesting the administration should decide, in connection with cans of soup, for instance, that only cans of a certain size may be used by a manufacturer, and none other? Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr. Orlikow: That is correct. If the hon. member or the minister wish to have the details of what is involved in this bill they can get the evidence in the hearings that were held in the United States on the bill proposed by Senator Philip A. Hart of Michigan. Extensive and detailed hearings were held in which government and industry spokesmen gave full testimony. I believe all the information could be secured from this source.

Mr. Marvin Gelber (York South): We live today in a society which is very largely dominated by advertising techniques and advertising philosophies. There is a story told of a man who said to his wife, "My dear, I have been made a vice president." She looked very sceptical and he said, "Are you not surprised?" She said, "Well, down at the groceteria there is a vice president in charge of prunes". He was incredulous, so he phoned the groceteria and said, "I want to speak to the vice president in charge of prunes". The girl said, "Yes, bulk or packaged?"

The advertisers, associated with the psychologists, in studying the mores of our society can almost predict our wants and can almost instruct us upon what we should buy. There is a story told by Vance Packard in his "The Hidden Persuaders" about a conversation between two psychologists. One of them said, "Now, take the man who drives a Studebaker, smokes Old Golds, uses cream-based hair oil, an electric shaver, carries a Parker 51 fountain pen. Obviously he's a salesman, an active man, aggressive in face to face situations and wants to make a good impression. Probably he was quite a romantic type in his youth". And the other psychologist added: "Also, you'll find that he is wearing loud shorts."

The psychologists, Mr. Speaker, allied with the merchandisers have developed a study of the techniques of impulse buying. As a matter of fact one psychologist who was studying merchandising techniques, realizing he could not give a lie detector test to the women who were shopping as to their reasons for choosing one product rather than another, decided to place a motion picture camera in a store to photograph the ladies as they went through the store. He counted the number of times her eyes blinked as an indication of how tense she was in making her merchandising decisions. The results were surprising to him. Instead of becoming more and more tense as she went through the store she became more and more relaxed. As a matter of fact, the blinking of her eyes decreased as she was going up and down the aisles to the extent that it became half of the normally expected rate.

A person can go into a store today and instead of facing the possibility of buying 600 items, he can choose between 6,000 and 8,000 items. The point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is a very salient comment about the merchandising habits of our society. I think that the individual salesman selling his wares can compare with the improved merchandising of, let us say, groceries. It has been discovered as the result of studies, that people going into a self-serve groceteria will buy a considerably larger number of items than people going into a grocery store in which they are served by a salesman. Impulse buying is that important. The person being sold by a salesman has time to weigh the pros and cons of a decision and may decide not to buy, whereas a person subject to impulse buying goes into a store in which the position of the item in the store, the colour of the package, the size of the package, the name of the item, are all decided on a scientific basis in order to induce the purchaser to make his decision. When a person leaves the store he will have more items, it has been discovered, than he would have had if he had been served by a salesman. It has been discovered also that if there is any person more susceptible to impulse buying than the housewife, it is her husband. Men are even more subject to impulse buying than women.

As a result of these studies it has been decided that the size of the package, the colour of the package, the format, all these things are very important in terms of merchandising a product. The hon. member has introduced a bill concerning packaging. He mentioned the question of toothpaste in support of the point he made. I should like to read from the Consumers' Report of May, 1963 concerning one of the best known brands of toothpaste sold on this market. The report says that your correspondent's difficulty may be stated briefly as follows: One large tube, $1\frac{1}{16}$ ounces plus one family tube, $5\frac{11}{16}$ ounces equals $6\frac{3}{4}$ ounces for 98 cents, as against two giant tubes, $2\frac{7}{8}$ ounces each equalling $5\frac{3}{4}$ ounces for 99 cents. The result is, Mr. Speaker, that the person buying the giant size tube of toothpaste is paying 22.61 cents per ounce while the person buying the family size tube pays 17.23 cents per ounce, a difference of more than 5 cents per ounce for the same brand of toothpaste, depending upon the size of the package.

Here is a form of what someone might call disguised taxation. Certainly there is a very wide differential between the merchandising packages. A very substantial levy is made on the people of Canada and the United States as well as other countries subject to this type of merchandising because of the packaging methods which are being used. Recently, in the field of cosmetics, the question of hollow wall packaging was examined by the attorney general of California. He accused 23 leading cosmetic companies of using deceptive packaging. It was found that by varying the package the customer was completely misled as to the amount of the product he was buying.

A very interesting study was made of aspirin in Baltimore city hospitals. Five different brands were examined and there was a report of the findings in the journal of the American medical association, December 29, 1962. I would like to quote from the report in Consumers' Report, where it says this:

> Within days after the report appeared, the manufacturer of Bayer aspirin and the distributor of St. Joseph's aspirin began to capitalize on the fact that their products came out rather well in the study. Most upsetting to the federal trade commission and the American medical association was the advertising for Bayer aspirin which boasted that a "government-supported medical team," whose findings "were reported in the highly authoritative journal of the American medical association," had found the Bayer product equal to the higher-priced pain reliever. The ad further claimed that "Bayer aspirin brings relief that is as fast, as strong, and as gentle to the stomach as you can get. . . .Bayer aspirin had a somewhat higher pain relief score than any of the other products."

In point of fact the study proved there was no difference in the pain relieving capabilities of the different brands, but that two brands, which contained phenacetin, tended to give more stomach upset.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a few extracts from a conference on consumer problems, sponsored by the Consumers' Association of Canada, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) referred, in co-operation with the consumers union of the United States, held at Queen's University in 1962. I would like to read a comment made by Dr. C. A. Morrell, of the Department of National Health and Welfare, who said this:

> Of the 2,263 people who said they wanted a change—

This is in packaging—

> —1,061 wanted to change them because they thought packages were deceptive. This is nearly one in five people questioned and I think it is enough to give the packaging industry a reason for a critical review of what they are doing...
> Although the possibility of deception is the main reason for Food and Drug to be interested in packaging, there are other reasons too. Packages should be of such construction and material that they cause no health hazards to the consumer. It is my feeling that some study should be made of vacuum sealed plastic packages to determine whether they should be used at all for packing certain kinds of meat and fish. Deaths from botulism derived from smoked fish sold in vacuum packed plastic containers occurred recently. Experimentally, at least, it has been possible to show the development of staphylococcus toxin in bacon, similarly packaged. The point to note is that under this kind of packaging the usual spoilage organisms did not develop and so the warning signs of bad odour and appearance were not there. Our own laboratory people said that had they not known the facts they would have had no objections to eating either the fish or bacon—they looked and smelled like good fish and bacon. New forms of packaging should not be introduced without careful forethought and study of possible hazards.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gelber: Certainly.

Mr. Woolliams: Does he think he could cure this evil by legislation or by competition? Which would he accept?

Mr. Gelber: I would say in reply that it says in the Bible that when the Babylonian king was having a feast a hand appeared and wrote on the wall "Mene, mene, Tekel, Upharsin,"—"Counted, counted, weighed and found wanting"—or in today's terms that the Toledo scales showed there was a short weight measure. I think, Mr. Speaker, if we have people to inspect scales to make sure they are giving accurate measure we should also inspect all packages to see that their prepackaged measure is accurate.

I would like to refer again to the committee set up by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On August 10 the minister announced the appointment of a committee, the consumers advisory committee, and she said, as recorded at page 6581 of Hansard, that it is to do the following:

> (a) To consider and advise the minister on such questions relating to the operation of the Food and Drugs Act and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act as she may refer to the committee; and (b) to give consideration and advice to the minister on such matters relating to the operation of the Food and Drugs Act and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act from the point of view of consumer interest as the committee shall see fit.

I do believe the very important matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North in this bill will be of great concern to that committee, and will certainly give guidance to them in their meetings.

The hon. member referred to Senator Hart of the United States senate and said his bill was inspired by the Hart bill. I would like to read a comment made by Senator Hart before the 47th national conference on weights and measures in 1962, the report of which was published by the United States department of commerce. He said this:

> It seems to me that what is required are definite standards against which packages and labels can be measured. Enforcement then requires only measurement against the standard; not a determination of whose definition of "conspicuousness" or "misleading" is correct.
> Standards, whether in the law or in regulation, give to the manufacturer greater freedom to compete on the basis of price and quality. He can plan his merchandizing campaign knowing that his competitor will be held to the same packaging and labeling standards as himself. And he can spend the large sums necessary for packaging and labeling equipment, materials and printing, secure in the knowledge that his packages and labels conform to the law and regulations because the law is certain and precise.

The hon. gentleman who has introduced this bill, No. C-47, merits the thanks of the house for having brought the matter up for public discussion. The name of Senator Hart's bill, to which reference has been made, is the truth in packaging bill. In this country the problems raised in the hon. member's bill are of concern to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and also to the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Fisheries, and some of the matters raised in this bill are not related to the Weights and Measures Act which it is seeking to amend. In fact I do not know if some of the matters raised in this bill are within the competence of this parliament because some lawyers think they are trespassing on provincial jurisdiction. Certainly many of the items in it have a great deal of merit. Clause 1(p) speaks of weight, measure, quantity or count, and this adds nothing to our existing law except "count." It is doubtful if that type of regulation, that kind of item or that type of consideration will come under the Weights and Measures Act. Certainly under the Criminal Code of Canada miscount is an offence.

With reference to clause 1(q)(i) it speaks of "standard size designation," and I am doubtful about this. I am not a lawyer, but I believe legal opinion would not support this because "standard size designation" could come within provincial government jurisdiction.

Clause 1(q)(ii) reads:

> —the net quantity of the contents of any prepackaged goods, in terms of weight, measure or count, that shall constitute a serving and shall be used where the goods are in a wrapper or container—

It is doubtful if "serving" would come within the competence of the Weights and Measures Act.

Clause 1 (q)(iii) reads:

> ...the standard quantative designation of the contents of any prepackaged goods that shall be used when the net quantity of the contents cannot meaningly be designated in terms of weight, measure or count,...

This refers to quality and it seems to me that the acts of this parliament cannot ensure quality of performance to satisfy the anticipations of the customer. It seems to me that is a rather broad conception.

Subclause (q)(iv) certainly has merit, as do (r)(i) and (r)(ii). Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a quotation from the Cohen report on English company law, where it said this:

No system can wholly protect fools from their own folly or from the knavery of others, and the advantages of trying to do so as fully as possible have to be weighed against the disadvantages of imposing fetters on business conducted honestly and efficiently.

Merchandising is changing so rapidly and the power of advertising in our society is so persuasive that the questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) have a special meaning. We could well look at our federal legislation, and the provinces could well look at their legislation, to see whether the problems to which the hon. member has drawn attention are being adequately dealt with.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Woolliams: Hear, hear.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): I wish to thank my personal friend, Red Skelton, for his encouraging support.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us is very interesting, and I am sure that its sponsor was prompted by a very generous intention.

The purpose is to avoid as much as possible all misrepresentations, all attempts at trickery in which businessmen and dealers are often tempted to indulge.

But first, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a remark to the house. The purpose of this bill is to amend subsection 1 of section 35 of the Weights and Measures Act.

Let us read, for instance, some provisions of that act.

(p) the weight, measure, quantity or count, or the fraction or multiple thereof of the contents of the wrapper or container of any pre-packaged goods;

The next paragraph reads as follows:

(q) the establishment and definition of—

That only goes to show that the language of administrative legislation is a real jargon. In any act concerning administrative legislation, whether it be the Bankruptcy Act or the act concerning which an amendment is now before us, the Criminal Code or any branch of the administrative legislation, we always find that inevitable complexity, that real inextricable maze, as I said a while ago, which constitutes more or less a kind of despotism imposed upon the people.

There is an old principle that says: No one is supposed to be ignorant of the law.

Take the tax act, the Bankruptcy Act or any act of that kind in which merely a subsection of one section, among many others, is to be amended. How can it be maintained in such circumstances that nobody is supposed to ignore the law?

I wish to make the following comment. I urge all those who are responsible for the drafting of legislation to try to clear up their wording, so that it may be understood by every citizen, if the principle that no one is supposed to ignore the law is to be applied.

The contrary is preposterous and stupid.

Imagine paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 35 of a piece of legislation among thousands of others. And the citizens are supposed to comply with the law and understand that legal jargon.

This is absurd and contrary to reason.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is time that the members of parliament, representatives of the people, do something to make legislative texts truly accessible to any citizen subject to common law.

I appeal to all hon. members so that our legislative texts can be rid of all that mumbo jumbo ordinary citizens cannot understand.

If that is not done, let no one say that everyone must know the law. With texts such as this one, I say that no one should know the law, even members of parliament, maybe the latter least of all.

Mr. Speaker, after those preliminary remarks—

[Text]

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member care to explain to the house what we are going to do for all the unemployed lawyers if his suggestions are carried out?

Mr. Choquette: I highly appreciate my hon. colleague's sense of humour.

Indeed, if there is a party that has fought unemployment, as we have done here, on this side of the house, if there is a political formation which has really wanted to deal with unemployment, it is the party to which my hon. friend belongs. I am convinced that the suggestion he just made is most appropriate. As a matter of fact, there is no doubt that there are many lawyers who are unemployed because they cannot get elected as members of parliament. Therefore, it would be a good thing to avail ourselves of their talent and services so they could try and clarify the true wording of our administrative law.

A little earlier, while studying that bill, another thought occurred to me. There again,

I think I have the support of my hon. friends of the New Democratic party.

There is talk about parliamentary reform. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre Mr. Churchill)—

Mr. Prud'homme: Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Choquette: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because the other, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, often loses his bearings. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made very appropriate suggestions to reform our parliamentary system.

Personally, I humbly submitted a few suggestions to the committee of the house on procedure and organization—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will understand that he has to speak to the principle of the bill under consideration. I feel that he is now drifting quite far from the matter under discussion.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: I think truth in packaging in the House of Commons would be a good idea, too.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: It would be a good idea, but what I want to make clear to my hon. friends opposite is that a bill of this type has, first of all, a technical aspect and requires the advice of experts in the commercial publicity field. As everybody can see, the bill is rather difficult to read and even to understand on account of what I would term the jumble of our legal terms. Is it not contrary to the parliamentary reforms advocated by our hon. friends opposite to consider matters requiring technical knowledge, the hearing of witnesses and which, more or less, call for some kind of survey in order to ascertain to what extent the public is being misled and to what extent also the people are satisfied?

I fail to see how a parliament could lose one hour of its time to consider amending a paragraph or a section, among several, in an act lost in a jumble of other legislation connected with administrative law. As this seems to be nothing but an administrative matter, parliament should not be bothered with it for a whole hour, when there are other very urgent problems to settle. We should not be bothered or importuned with such technical details.

I feel that at certain times, legislators should confine themselves to matters of great scope dealing with major and important principles. They should not be asked to devote one hour of their time uselessly, since it seems that the bill is not going to be passed.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not realize that this bill is so drafted that it would give to the administration the opportunity to make all the regulations? Does he not realize that the bill actually meets the very point he is making; that we should not deal with it here but that we give the power to make regulations to the government?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member says is partly true, but should parliament devote its efforts to those little regulations, or rather put all its energy into working out an over-all type of legislation? I think this belongs in the administrative field; each department employs legal advisers who are able to see and find out how the consumers are to be protected. They are aware of any restrictions which should be imposed on dealers and merchants who might take advantage of the consumers in general. This is strictly our administrative matter. The government provides in each department, for legal advisers who are paid with the people's money and who are responsible for advising the government with regard to the form of each piece of legislation, so as to make it more adaptable and useful in its practical application.

That is precisely why I cannot understand that the hon. member who introduced the bill, who calls himself a member of a reform party, should ask the house to waste its time in considering technicalities. Therefore, I think that rather we should ask the legal advisers of the department concerned for their opinion. Indeed, we see that by asking for expert advice—and I am not thinking of legal advisers, because I have had no contact with them—but after consulting knowledgeable people in this field, we have been informed that this bill will alter precisely nothing from a practical point of view. Even if it were passed as it now stands, consumers would have the same protection and dealers would be limited by the same restrictions. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, parliament has been down-graded by a useless logomachy whereas it should have been maintained on a proper plane.

That is why I am disgusted with the hour spent in discussion of insignificant details which merely concern the opinion or legal advice of the department concerned.

If we tried to explain in this manner how the government works instead of in the way my hon. friends wish, I am convinced the public would only have admiration for the efforts we are putting forth.

Mr. Speaker, those are the views of a junior member of the house.

[Text]

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that I rise to follow one of the main dramatic events in order to make a few pedestrian remarks about the bill in question. I would like to cite three particular considerations which I would submit to the house are reasons why the bill should not be adopted. The first relates to the philosophy of law itself; the second relates to the division of jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments; and the third relates to Canada's international obligations, more particularly those under the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

I was very much surprised that none of the members of the official opposition rose, when they had the opportunity to do so, to speak on this subject, in view of the fact that the bill proposes—and to this extent I disagree with my colleague the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette)—a very substantial administration for the purpose of setting down the standards which will have to be followed in every case.

The house will recall that at the conclusion of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) I asked him whether he really proposed that the government was to decree the size of containers to be used in respect of any particular product. He agreed with me that this was his contention. While I referred to one particular product, it will be obvious to hon. members that there will have to be a great multiplicity of administrative decisions, rules and orders to decide the size of cans, containers, boxes, bags and other packages in which merchandise is retailed, and it will require a vast addition to the bureaucracy for the purpose of determining these questions. In this respect I would point out that it is very much different from the fundamental purpose of the Weights and Measures Act, which in essence can be enforced by a—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologize for interrupting the parliamentary secretary, but I should point out that the time for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

Mr. Knowles: He should apologize, not you.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply this day]:

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

1. Departmental administration, $1,130,500.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, August 17, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance) moved that the second report of the standing committee on privileges and elections presented on June 15, 1964 be now concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, parliamentary fortune of the second report of the standing committee on privileges and elections has long been delayed. It is my earnest hope that the healing power of time has composed whatever differences there may have been over its acceptance. This inquest into the past has deeply exercised the minds of many members, and its evolution from its origin has been in a sea of controversy.

If it is not inconvenient or disagreeable to the house, may I be allowed to offer a few observations. It is scarcely necessary for me to make plain that I speak only for myself. It would be convenient, I think, if I began by reintroducing the history of the matter for the house in a very summary fashion, and by this means we may retrace our steps.

It will be remembered that on April 27 last the hon. member for Labelle rose on a point of privilege and made a statement to the house which included the gist of an alleged conversation between the national organizer of the Liberal party and himself in the presence of four other hon. members. Perhaps due to provocation, the statement was couched in language that readily lent itself to misconstruction.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I should like for what it is worth to refer to standing order 30 which reads as follows:

> If anything shall come in question touching the conduct of any member, or his election, or his right to hold his seat, he may make a statement and shall withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

The debate, at the present time, started with the remarks of the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Pennell).

Under standing order 30, would it not be more appropriate to ask the member concerned to make his statement and then to ask him to withdraw while the matter is in discussion?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me there must be some misunderstanding, because the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand, if I understand it correctly, is speaking to this motion under standing order 32(1)(b) and not standing order 30. So far as I know there is no question of any member withdrawing at the moment. Am I correct?

Mr. Pennell: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. Before I was interrupted I had indicated that on April 27 last the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) had made a statement to the house on a point of privilege, which included the gist of an alleged conversation between himself and the national organizer of the Liberal party in the presence of four other hon. members.

The day following, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rose on a point of privilege also, and moved that the matters raised in the statement be remitted to the committee for study and report. It was unfortunate, perhaps, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre misinterpreted the meaning of the statement, although I am bound to say in fairness to him that his misinterpretation was not unreasonable having regard to the language in which the statement was framed.

Mr. Knowles: It was shared by the whole house.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Pennell: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I shall not trust to my memory. I would like to refer textually to Hansard at page 2645, where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is reported as saying:

> I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Labelle has alleged in this house that he was offered a bribe...It is a breach of the privileges of this House of Commons...

That constituted the first allegation that accompanied the motion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If I may, I should like to go on now to page 2646 of Hansard where the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre continued as follows:

> The hon. member for Labelle has been insulted by the alleged offer of a bribe. The Prime Minister has been insulted by what the hon. member for Labelle said about him...But my concern is that an insult to any member of the House of Commons is an insult to the house as a whole.

Once these allegations were turned loose, Mr. Speaker, a burden of suspicion fell upon all parties concerned, and it is a melancholy thing to see good names and honourable reputations trampled into the ground. It would be appropriate, I suggest, that the house remind itself of what is contained within the report. I do not propose to read all the report but only two material sentences:

> Your committee reports that it found no evidence of bribery or attempted bribery. There was no question of privilege involved in the present reference.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to do everything within our power to undo the injustice that has been done, and in the course of my submission I shall respectfully invite the house to accept the report of one of its own committees as the considered judgment of the entire house. Before I turn to deal very briefly with the evidence on which the report rests I desire to dispel the innuendoes arising from alleged reports of the happenings at the chance and casual meeting which took place at Hull on the evening of February 17.

I am pleased to emphasize that the conduct of every member present was not unworthy of the standard expected of members in this chamber. As I approach the evidence it will be my earnest endeavour as well as my earnest desire to approach it in a detached and impartial manner. In fairness to the hon. member for Labelle I must say he made it abundantly clear, at the earliest opportunity before the committee, that he did not rise with the intention of accusing anyone or anything. I would ask the house to turn to page 50 in the first volume of the proceedings before the committee where the hon. member is reported as follows:

> —when I rose on a question of privilege I did not rise with the intention of accusing anyone or anything.

The cross-examination of this witness, as of all witnesses, was taken up with great industry and relentless zeal. As recorded at page 59 of the first volume the hon. member for Port Arthur cross-examined the hon. member for Labelle:

> Mr. Fisher: Well, you are very clear on this, that you were not offered any bribe by Mr. Davey?
> Mr. Girouard: Yes, I am clear.

The cross-examination continued as recorded at page 119 in the second volume.

> Mr. Fisher: Did Mr. Davey get into any of the advantages that might lie with the Liberal party for you personally in terms of your advancement to, say, senior positions in the party?
> Mr. Girouard: No.
> Mr. Fisher: Did Mr. Davey get into questions concerning such things as judicial appointments or advantages that might come to you as a practising lawyer?
> Mr. Girouard: No.
> Mr. Fisher: Did he suggest to you that there was a patronage list which would be available to you?
> Mr. Girouard: No.

The witness was further examined by the hon. member for Renfrew North. In this connection I wish to turn to volume 3, page 187:

> Mr. Greene: You have told us in the witness box on two occasions that there was no bribery—
> Mr. Girouard: No, I said there had not been any bribery. I want to state that here, before the members of the press. I said that no attempt had been made to bribe me.
> Mr. Greene: I think you said in your previous evidence, if I recollect it correctly, that in your opinion there was no bribery. Is that correct?
> Mr. Girouard: That is correct.

It is my respectful submission that no matter how you look at the evidence of the hon. member for Labelle you are driven back to the conclusion reached by the committee.

It is only fit and proper that I should make reference to the evidence of the hon. member for York-Scarborough and of the national organizer of the Liberal party. Both confirm the evidence of the hon. member for Labelle that there had been no attempt to bribe him. The force of the evidence when viewed dispassionately and with a single desire to see that justice is done dissipates and destroys every particle of the allegation of bribery.

I now pass to the second allegation, which might best be described as nothing more than the ghost of a rumour wrapped up in hearsay four times removed. It was a paradox, however, that the committee had to accept that, while they were called upon to investigate a question of privilege they found there was no question of privilege to investigate.

Let me go back to the report which I have already read to the house: "There is no question of bribery involved in the present reference". The committee looked at all the circumstances and considered the evidence with care and precision, but came to the honest conclusion that the point involved was outside the definition of a question of privilege as we understand it in this house. May I say we were not unmindful of the attractive and persuasive argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but the committee also had the advice of the learned parliamentary counsel who was in attendance throughout.

I might reasonably anticipate that this part of the report may become a target for criticism because the committee did not return a formal verdict as to the truth or falsity of the allegation. The answer to such criticism is simplicity itself. Once the committee, after careful and conscientious consideration, had reached the conclusion that there was no question of privilege involved, then it would have been in violation of its principles to have taken the matter further. But I am bold enough to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is in this part of the report that may be found the real and lasting fruits of the committee's efforts. If out of the experience of the committee we serve to stiffen the resolution of this house not to spend its energies in pursuing synthetic points of privilege, then the committee will have been proved a useful instrument.

In the peculiar and special circumstances of this case I would be doing a great injustice to hon. members on both sides of the house if I were to let the matter rest there. It is within the knowledge of the house that on April 28 the right hon. Prime Minister rose in this house and categorically denied that there was any truth in this allegation. I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that all reasonable and fair minded members on both sides of the house will agree that the Prime Minister's denial was an unanswerable reply to a contrary suggestion. It would be contrary, however, to the canons of decency and fair play if I did not also bring to your attention the fact that the hon. member for Labelle, while he denied that he was the original author of the allegation, at least was frank enough to concede that he did not suggest there was any truth in the allegation. The hon. member for York-Scarborough, while he also entered a personal disclaimer as to the authorship of this allegation, also stated—and was joined by the national organizer of the Liberal party—that there was no truth in this suggestion.

Whatever may be the fate of this motion, Mr. Speaker, at least I am entitled to claim that before the committee not one word was subtracted from the statement the Prime Minister made in this house on April 28.

I come for a brief moment to another matter that excited some difference of opinion within the committee, when the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), as was his right, in a somewhat aggressive and hostile fashion took exception to the suggestion that the committee should terminate its hearings upon the evidence of only three witnesses. However, the contrary point of view put forth by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) carried conviction to the mind of the committee and eventually commanded its assent. I can do no better than to borrow his words, which may be found on page 278 of the fourth volume of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of that committee:

> It is now obvious that we are almost certain to have the word of five persons against the word of one which, to a general attitude towards fair play, looks unsatisfactory to everyone; that is, five to one in terms of this question of whether or not there were enticements...I think we would be stupid to go much further in trying to nail this particular thing down. It seems to me that it is going to be a question of one man's word against five other men's word.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not dissociate myself from those remarks. On the contrary, I fully and wholeheartedly approve.

I come now to my final observation, and I move on to more debatable grounds. The house is acutely aware that there was a violent collision between the evidence given under oath by the hon. member for Labelle on the one hand and that given under oath by the hon. member for York-Scarborough and the national organizer of the Liberal party on the other. I would be failing in my duty, Mr. Speaker, if I attempted to pass over in silence this conflict in the evidence. I candidly confess that if you viewed this antagonism through the spectacles of suspicion, in a spirit of hostility and mistrust, then it is open to the harshest construction and must lead to the most prejudicial conclusion. But the first principle of justice demands that we view this matter in the most favourable light. It is my humble submission that if we approach this problem in a reasonable manner, making reasonable conclusions and reasonable assumptions, then the knot of entangled evidence may be untied with honour and with freedom of conscience.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to disfigure my few remarks with egotism, but perhaps the house will allow me to say that I have spent a large measure of my life within a court-room, and I do not find the circumstances now engaging the attention of the house particularly unusual. More than 100 years ago a great judge of the common law dealt with this problem in this language:

> It is a matter of frequent observation that persons dwelling for a long time on facts which they believe must have occurred come at last to persuade themselves that they do actually recollect the occurrences of circumstances which at first they only begin by believing must have happened. Without imputing anything like wilful and corrupt perjury to witnesses they often in truth bona fide believe that they have heard and remembered conversations which in truth never existed.

This was the language of Sir John Romilly, attorney general and solicitor general in Great Britain and a judge of the high court. It is no exaggeration to say that his judgment has been confirmed from that day until this moment. I am confident that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) out of his own experiences will confirm the authority which I have just cited. If he will allow me, I would adopt his words which he used before the committee and which are to be found at page 279 of the fourth volume of the committee report. They are as follows:

> Of course it is not unusual in any tribunal, whether it is a committee such as this where you call a witness, or a board or even a court, to find that witnesses differ. For example, it happens often in a court of law that one witness in a vehicle accident says he was on the right side of the road going in the one direction and another witness says he was on the other side going in another direction and all this happened on a 66 foot highway, and both of them have a head on collision almost at a standstill.

It should be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that these witnesses were asked to cast their minds back over a period of some two and a half months to recapture and reconstruct conversations and events which occurred at a time when no one thought they would ever be called into dispute.

I may reasonably anticipate, Mr. Speaker, that it will be said: "Put the law into action", but I can only answer that I can find no law to put into action. I do not say this to escape an unpleasant situation or for purposes of expediency, for if I felt otherwise I would not falter for one moment to oppose this report. May I say to the house that if we continue to bandy this report about it will become the cemetery for the good names and honourable reputations of innocent people. In my respectful submission the house can accept this report without mortgaging its conscience.

Let me say this and only this. Less than two years ago I came into this chamber for the first time believing it to be the highest court in the land. I came believing it was a court not only of legislation but a court of justice and of honour. It is in that firm belief that I now invite the house to accept the report in the spirit and the letter in which it was tabled.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, my delay in rising was that I had assumed that the hon. member for Bow River was getting to his feet to participate in this stage of the debate.

Before going into the main object of my remarks on this report I think as one who served on the committee I would first of all like to pay a word of tribute to the acting chairman. I think that perhaps save for his somewhat impassioned speech this afternoon all of us were quite impressed with his impartiality and his desire to see that all the matters referred to the committee were thoroughly explored. We all felt he was serving in a very difficult position. I personally felt that he did a very competent job, and I think I speak for all members of the committee when I say that we were impressed by the manner in which he conducted himself while he was the acting chairman.

However, Mr. Speaker, I really could not let his remarks this afternoon pass without dealing in some manner with his statements in which he referred to the action of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He said in his remarks that the member had turned loose certain allegations, and he talked about reputations being trampled into the ground.

Frankly I heard nothing which would indicate that, and I was hoping he would go on to tell us who was trampling reputations into the ground.

I do not think it is in any way reasonable to try to obscure the serious aspects of this committee report by attempting to assess any blame against the member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think it is significant that when he moved the motion to refer the hon. member for Labelle could hardly get to his feet quickly enough to second it, and the Prime Minister also was very anxious to second it. I think the house was convinced at that time that a prima facie case had been established, and the motion to send the matter to the committee was carried unanimously, without a dissenting vote. Therefore I think it is superficial to attempt to lay any sort of blame or otherwise upon the person who moved the motion.

However, Mr. Speaker, this was an interesting committee. It was both interesting and dismaying, and it verged from the comical to the serious. The first lesson which it seems to me the house should learn is that generally speaking the committee on privileges and elections is not equipped in any way to deal with an issue of this kind. It was the first inquiry of which I had been a part where there were 29 prosecuting attorneys; where each member of the committee was free to go his own way, pursue his own investigation, ask any questions he wanted and endlessly repeat questions everybody else had asked.

I think it is significant that under the present set-up the committee is simply not equipped to do the job. There is no way for anybody to lead the questioning; therefore we spent days and days going over the same ground. The chairman's authority is far too limited in conducting such an inquiry and dealing with questions as they come forward, and there is a lack of any clearcut lines at all in an inquiry of this sort.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we had all the initial manoeuvring that took hours and hours and hours. It took a very long time to even decide what we were there trying to decide. Everybody had a different interpretation of the point of privilege, and it was a considerable length of time before we had any idea what we were trying to adjudicate upon. A great amount of time was spent in discussion trying to decide the order of witnesses and then, of course, we had the farcical, circus-like atmosphere that surrounded the lack of French reporters to take down the proceedings.

I do not want to review the terms of reference. The hon. member for Brant-Haldimand has already done that. We were trying to decide whether the statement of the hon. member for Labelle raised a question of privilege, and in doing that the testimony of the witnesses, of course, as has been pointed out, varied enormously. In fact the only thing the witnesses really agreed upon was that they met together on two occasions, once in a restaurant in Hull and once in the office of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. Other than that there was virtually no agreement in precise terms as to what had happened, what had been discussed, what had been agreed upon, what had been offered and what had not been offered. It was much easier to find out by the process of elimination those items that were not discussed than to find out what had actually taken place between the parties. So the evidence on the surface really does seem to be diametrically opposed.

But, Mr. Speaker, I think anybody who has dealt with this sort of thing before realizes one or two things. First, the most untrustworthy witness of all is the human memory. It is extremely difficult for anybody to recite in precise detail conversations and verbal statements that took place several months ago. This is why we terrible lawyers insist upon contracts being reduced to written form, and why international meetings insist upon written communiqués. Once the meeting breaks up everybody's interpretation of what happened or what was said is probably quite different.

The other thing that I think it is important to understand in going through the hundreds of pages of evidence is that it is not just what is said at a meeting but also how it is said and the impression it gives. It is the interpretation that members take out of the words of other people who were present; and knowing Mr. Davey and how he can say things, I can see where some interpretation would be taken which might not be warranted.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think all one can do in these circumstances is to try to sift through the evidence, try to assess what really happened and then decide whether this does raise a problem of bribery or whether it does raise a question of privilege. I have tried to do this, and I hope in what I now say I will be fair to all parties concerned. After sifting the evidence and trying to reconcile the differences I think this is essentially what happened. I think the hon. member for Labelle decided that his political future was not very bright in the province of Quebec under the Social Credit party.

An hon. Member: Which group?

Mr. Scott: The group to which he belonged at the time. That was his decision to make, rightly or wrongly. I think the hon. member then began to look for another home. He told us that his organizers in his riding instructed him it was their wish that he become a Conservative, and I think his own background led him in that direction as well. I think he then met these members quite by accident and communicated his decision to leave the Social Credit party and his desire and inclination to join the Progressive Conservative party.

Something he said or the way in which he said it led these members to believe that he was not of a firm mind. Consequently, with his consent or certainly without his objection, telephone calls were made and a meeting was arranged with Mr. Davey. Again, I think a similar procedure followed at the meeting. The hon. member for Labelle said he only went to the meeting to please his friends. His friends said that the fact he went to the meeting led them to believe that his mind was not made up.

Who is to say who is right in circumstances like that? Again, at the meeting at which Mr. Davey was present there was a great deal of discussion about a flag and about some other things, but memories are very vague as to who said what and what took place. Again I say that in the circumstances, reading the evidence and trying to correlate it, obviously something that the member for Labelle said or the way in which he said it indicated that he was prepared to listen. Things were said to him about joining the Liberal party or what he might expect or what his position would be, and either at that conversation or at some other time he was led to believe that certain things would be available to him in the event that he joined this party. He himself admitted that he expected future meetings at which he would be consulted with regard to whether he had pondered these proposals.

I know you cannot reconcile all the evidence, but looking at it as a whole it is pretty clear there was a discussion, and there were to be subsequent meetings. It is significant that after negotiations broke down the member for Labelle then approached the Progressive Conservative party and announced his intention to join. I do not believe the facts are really very much in dispute. I do not think anyone would quarrel with that and, speaking again for myself, I do not see anything particularly sinister in that sort of thing taking place.

But, Mr. Speaker, is there anything we can learn from this whole sad affair? I want to suggest six things that I think might be of some benefit to us in the future. The first one I have already mentioned, namely that the committee on privileges and elections is not equipped and should not be expected to try to judge between the accuracy of the memories of various members of parliament with respect to verbal statements and discussions that took place at meetings months before. It is difficult enough for an impartial judiciary to make decisions of that kind on verbal evidence, much less to turn over such a matter to a political committee that is charged with all the partisan by-play that took place on the occasion in question.

Second, I am satisfied that there was no evidence of bribery disclosed. Certainly the member for Labelle never considered he had been bribed. Certainly the essence of bribery is the offer of something to corrupt. There was no evidence that anything had been offered to corrupt. Therefore I believe that bribery clearly is out.

The really sad aspect of the whole affair to me was the degree to which it showed how the two major political parties approached this matter. There was no discussion with the hon. member as to whether he believed in the principles of the Liberal party. There was no evidence that the program and principles of the Liberal party were even laid before the member so he could decide. All they talked about was nominating him and getting him re-elected; how the chances would be. Really, all they were after was another body on that side of the house.

To me it is a sad reflection on the way in which the Liberal party approached this whole matter. They were not interested in the philosophy or the principles of this gentleman in question. They never asked him whether he believed in the Liberal party. They just wanted somebody to go on that side of the house. I believe that is a sad commentary on the way in which this episode was conducted.

The chairman's ruling, of course, prevented us from going into the very interesting field of the negotiations which may have taken place on his entry into the Conservative party. Many members of the committee were anxious to explore this interesting aspect of the question. It was felt it was not germane; therefore we did not go into it.

The next thing is that I do not believe parliament should be asked to decide upon what are essentially political party matters. The occasion in question here was really something within the frame work of the political parties themselves. It never got beyond the vague organizing stage. I do not believe parliament should be getting to the point where we are mixing into the general political activities of parties. In many ways we try not to recognize parties as such in the house. All the members here have duties and responsibilities to their electors and to the country that vastly transcend any party partisan considerations.

I feel that one of the troubles here, therefore, was that this whole matter should have been dealt with on the party level. If Mr.

Davey was to have been reprimanded, he should have been reprimanded by the Liberal party. This affair should never have reached the point where we as parliamentarians were wallowing around in a party mix-up that took place outside of the house.

Then I do not believe there is any point in referring this matter back to the committee for further discussion. I do not believe there is any way in which we could make a finding that would be of any greater help than the one we have made. There is no point, either in referring this, as I understand my friends in the Ralliement Créditiste intend to move, to the attorney general for consideration of perjury charges. There is clearly no evidence of perjury here. It would be taking outside the authority of parliament control over its own affairs, and this is something for which parliament has fought for generations. If any action should be taken, it should be taken by the house itself as has been done on other occasions.

As I have said, the only unpleasant aspect of the affair to me was the approach taken in which there was no real concern or discussion of the principles involved. Perhaps this is because there is not any real difference between the two major parties; I do not know. Certainly in my opinion this is the only real, sad aspect of the whole sad affair.

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand for the manner in which he performed his duties as acting chairman of the committee on privileges and elections.

However, while several members of the committee were present, we objected to the adoption of the report, and that for a number of reasons.

First of all, some people seem prepared to sit on the fence. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) has just said that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) was not sure he was going to join the Conservative party, while, on the contrary, the hon. member himself is reported as stating he was determined, even before the meeting, to do so. That is why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seems to be blamed for rising on a question of privilege, when at that time everyone agreed.

But to discuss objectively the meetings of the committee on privileges and elections, we must keep to the statement made by the hon. member for Labelle and the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Therefore, we must go back to April 27. Now, at page 2583 of Hansard for that date we read this:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last Friday, as reported on page 2538 of Hansard, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) interrupted the debate to insinuate that my recent decision was due to political bargaining on my part.
> The remark of the hon. member for Bonaventure could have passed for a joke, but the hon. member forgot that wit is the mother of humour.
> I shall therefore take a few minutes in order to clear myself from the charge made against my integrity by the hon. member for Bonaventure. At the risk of disappointing members of the press gallery, I have decided not to mention the dates, places and names of certain Liberal members involved, because I refuse to become an accomplice of the chief Liberal organizer who would have allowed me to reflect on the political reputation of certain friends whose only mistake was to show their sincerity in this matter.
> About two months ago, I met publicly four Liberal members in Hull. In reply to one of their questions concerning my political future, I said that I was quite decided to join the ranks of the Conservative party.

That is a clear indication that even before the sittings of the committee on privileges and elections, he was quite decided to join the Conservative party, even if he did not know at that time that he would be accepted by that party. I resume my reading:

> At that very moment a Liberal member got up to make a phone call. When he returned to our table, he strongly insisted that I take no decision without having met Keith Davey, the chief Liberal organizer.
> I replied that my decision was final, that the organizers of my riding wanted me to be a Conservative and that such a meeting would probably be useless.
> However, urged by my colleagues, I agreed to receive in my office—you understand, in my office—

I emphasize these words:

> —the power behind the Liberal party. Another telephone call from a member of parliament and the meeting was set for the next morning. At eleven o'clock, the next morning—

I skip a few lines and I come here to the discussion which happened in the office.

> —but my first words to Mr. Davey were to confirm my intention of joining the Conservative party. I told him that if I had come to the meeting, it was only to please my friends.

Therefore, I understand that the hon. member for Danforth knew that the hon. member for Labelle was then well-intentioned.

> —if I had come to the meeting, it was only to please my friends.

There was then an animated discussion and the following benefits were outlined:

The benefits: a party in power and a fat electoral fund for the next election.

A week later, a Liberal member of parliament belonging to that same group approached me to tell me that he was very sorry but the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had asked his chief organizer to cease all pressure because he, the Prime Minister, was sure to lose the regular support of the Social Credit party if he ever stole members from that party.

Mr. Speaker, I have never asked to join the ranks of the Liberal party and, as far as I know, none of my former colleagues have ever made such a request either.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, the following day, April 28, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose on a question of privilege, as reported at page 2645 of Hansard for April 28, and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege relates to the fact that this house has been insulted in one way or another, if not in two ways. The basis for my statement is to be found in the remarks, under a question of privilege, that were made yesterday by the hon. member for Labelle. There are two aspects of that statement on which I found my question of privilege today. I shall come to each of them in a moment.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to standing order 79, which reads as follows:

The offer of any money or other advantage to any member of this house for the promoting of any matter whatsoever depending or to be transacted in parliament, is a high crime and misdemeanor, and tends to the subversion of the constitution.

I should like also to draw Your Honour's attention to citation 108, paragraph 5 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

The offer of a bribe in order to influence a member in any of the proceedings of the house, or of a committee, has been treated as a breach of privilege, being an insult not only to the member himself, but to the house.

It is the language of that citation that prompted me, in my opening words, to say it is the house that has been insulted. I should like also to draw your attention to section 100 of the Criminal Code of Canada. I shall not read all the section because all of it is not relevant, but I shall read the relevant portion:

Everyone who gives or offers corruptly to a person who holds a judicial office, or is a member of the parliament of Canada or of a legislature, any money, valuable consideration, office, place or employment in respect of anything done or omitted to be done or omitted by him in his official capacity for himself or another person, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre refers to the statement by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard):

Mr. Davey was rather suggesting at that moment that I join the ranks of the Liberal party. He said he would take care of the defeated Liberal candidate and as for unsatisfied Liberal organizers, I only would have to change them.

[Mr. Beaulé.]

The benefits: a party in power and a fat electoral fund for the next election.

Mr. Speaker, it was on that ground that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked that the whole question be referred to the committee on privileges and elections.

—the member for Labelle has alleged in this house that he was offered a bribe, that he was offered certain advantages if he would take a certain position in this House of Commons. If that fact is true it is contrary to standing order 79 which I read, to citation 108, paragraph 5 and to section 100 of the Criminal Code.

If this has happened I say it is an insult not just to the hon. member for Labelle but it is an insult to this House of Commons. It is a breach of the privileges of this House of Commons, and the matter certainly ought to be investigated by this house through its committee on privileges and elections.

However, Mr. Speaker, if what the hon. member for Labelle said about things that happened outside this chamber is not true, or even if what he said is true, there is something else in what the hon. member said yesterday which gives offence to this house. It is an insult to one of the members of the house, and therefore is an insult to the house itself. I refer to the very next paragraph in the hon. member's statement, right after the ones I read a moment ago. That next paragraph reads as follows, on the same page 2583 of the English version of yesterday's Hansard:

A week later, a Liberal member of parliament belonging to that same group approached me to tell me that he was very sorry but the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had asked his chief organizer to cease all pressure because he, the Prime Minister, was sure to lose the regular support of the Social Credit party if he ever stole members from that party.

Thereupon, Mr. Speaker, we met in committee on privileges and elections to discuss the statement made by the hon. member for Labelle. We cannot give evidence on what was said or what was not said because, as the members of the committee know, the witnesses were under oath but the testimonies were diametrically opposed.

That is why it is my duty to report these facts to the house.

As can be seen in No. 1, page 58, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) asked the following question:

Mr. Fisher: In English, your statement in the house included this: The benefits: a party in power and a fat electoral fund for the next election.

Was that the sum of what Mr. Davey put to you? Were there other people there expressing the same attractions?

Mr. Girouard: No one else has made this accusation except Mr. Davey.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Davey, to your mind, offered you the benefits of the party in power. Did he elaborate on that?

Mr. Girouard: Yes, up to a certain point. Only it was the main idea.

Mr. Fisher: Can you tell us just what these benefits were?

Mr. Girouard: You ask me what the advantages were. That is exactly what I said:

A party in power, a fat electoral fund.

And a little further:

Mr. Fisher: All right. I will turn to the next question which seems to me to be fundamental in this, and that is the question of:

A week later, a Liberal member of parliament belonging to that same group approached me to tell me that he was very sorry but the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had asked his chief organizer to cease all pressure because he, the Prime Minister, was sure to lose the regular support of the Social Credit party if he ever stole members from that party.

Who was that member of parliament?

Mr. Girouard: A most sincere member of the Liberal party, the member for York-Scarborough.

Mr. Fisher: You have nothing to add at all to the thought which would in any way change the meaning of that?

In other words, so far as you are concerned you were clearly told this by the member from York-Scarborough. There was no confusion in your mind?

Mr. Girouard: I was told what was said.

Mr. Fisher: Did you do anything at all to check into the statement, I mean with your own party, that is, your party at that time, the Social Credit party?

Mr. Girouard: That question is out of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman: No, no. What was the question again?

Mr. Fisher: Did you do anything at that time, after receiving this information from Mr. Moreau, to see whether there had been any repercussion with the Social Credit party in connection with the matter?

Mr. Girouard: I did not say it.

The Acting Chairman: Are you prepared to answer?

Mr. Girouard: No, I did not say it. I think it is out of order.

And further on, here is the reply given to a question asked by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams):

Mr. Woolliams: In respect of anything Mr. Keith Davey said at anytime, were you induced to join the Liberal party?

Mr. Girouard: If the word "inducement" means to tempt, to attract, yes; if it were to mean "bribe", the answer is no.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we take Mr. Moreau's testimony in No. 3, page 201, when he offers his argument before being questioned, here is what we read:

About two months ago, I met publicly four Liberal members in Hull. In reply to one of their questions concerning my political future, I replied that I was quite decided to join the ranks of the Conservative party. At the very moment a Liberal member got up to make a phone call. When he returned to our table, he strongly insisted that I take no decision without having met Keith Davey, the chief Liberal organizer.

I should just like to put on the record the fact that the matter of calling Mr. Davey had been discussed for approximately half and hour and that I made the telephone call with his full knowledge and consent, and I would not have called Mr. Davey had I not felt that he was indeed very interested in exploring the possibility of joining the Liberal party.

And further on, Mr. Moreau said:

I should like to review my recollection of the events that led to the phone call.

As I stated earlier, I offered to phone Mr. Davey if he wished me to and with his full knowledge and consent I made the telephone call. I called Mr. Davey about 10.30 on the night of the 17th—

Here I leave out a few lines and come back to where he himself said:

I returned to the table and reported to Mr. Girouard that Mr. Davey was prepared to talk to him and at this point of the discussion, Mr. Girouard said he did not want to go to the national Liberal party's office. We did discuss where we might meet. Mr. Girouard's office was ruled out for the same reason, that it was not wise. Mr. Girouard certainly did not want to be seen in the national Liberal federation office and it seemed that the same objection applied as far as Mr. Davey going to his office. It was agreed that we would meet in Mr. Macaluso's office which is quite near Mr. Girouard's office in the west block.

At this point I shall leave out some of the text to come back to the talk which took place in Mr. Macaluso's office.

During the earlier part of the meeting, a discussion about the flag issue arose. Mr. Girouard was quite concerned about what the Liberal party's decision on a distinctive national flag was. We reaffirmed, or indicated to him, that we were sure that our party was committed and we certainly all were committed to a distinctive national flag. Mr. Macaluso then returned to his office and got a letter which our whip has sent out indicating that this was the reply to flag letters that the P.M. was sending out.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I will leave out a few further paragraphs to come to a statement of the hon. member for York-Scarborough, who said:

I then felt that I should report this to Mr. Girouard, and I did. I would like to refer again to something in his statement of April 7 in which he said:

A week later, a Liberal member of parliament belonging to that same group—

—and later he identified that member of parliament as me—approached me to tell me that he was very sorry but the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) had asked his chief organizer to cease all pressure because he, the Prime Minister, was sure to lose the regular support of the Social Credit party if he ever stole members from that party. I have no such information. I did not make that statement to Mr. Girouard. It is my recollection that Mr. Girouard said to me on hearing the report that the reaction in Quebec had not bee particularly favourable, "Oh, well, I knew it would never come off anyway", and again for the reason that the Prime Minister would be afraid to lose the support of the Social Credit party. I did not make that statement.

And at that moment the hon. member for Danforth asked the following question:

Mr. Chairman, as one of Mr. Moreau's constituents I have a couple of questions to ask.

Can you tell us if there were any discussions with Mr. Girouard about this matter before you actually met in Hull?

Mr. Moreau: I had a number of meetings with Mr. Girouard. I met him first at the privileges and elections committee meetings last session; he was a member of that committee. Mr. Girouard's office was very near to mine and on a number of occasions we discussed a very large number of matters. I was perhaps aware prior to the adjournment of the house at Christmas that Mr. Girouard was less than happy with his present state, but I do not think that any discussion specifically regarding his movement from one party to another had taken place. I do not know if that is a relevant matter to this in any case.

Mr. Nielsen: The answer is no, then?

Mr. Moreau: I should like to add something to my statement. I am sorry, Mr. Scott, that I left something out of my statement which is a very important point, as I am sure the committee will appreciate. I did not deal with the matter of the benefits of the party in power and a "fat electoral fund" at the next election.

I would like to elaborate and to deny categorically that any mention of campaign funds or the party in power was made in my office.

Mr. Rhéaume: By yourself?

Mr. Moreau: By anyone.

Mr. Scott: Are you referring to the meeting between Mr. Davey and the four other members when you say that?

Mr. Moreau: Yes.

Mr. Scott: You were present throughout all that time?

Mr. Moreau: I was present throughout.

Mr. Scott: Do you say, Mr. Moreau, that Mr. Davey never offered any campaign funds?

Mr. Moreau: The subject of campaign funds was never brought up.

Mr. Speaker, as recorded on page 206, the hon. member for Danforth asked the following question:

Mr. Scott: I do not want to repeat this, but from what you have told us you are saying that at no time did anybody mention campaign funds, fat campaign funds, or words of that kind.

Mr. Moreau: I deny that they were mentioned in any way at any time in my office that morning or the night before in Hull.

Further on, we read this:

Mr. Scott: Do you realize your evidence places us in a very, very difficult position. I want to be sure you are absolutely firm in your own mind on this point.

Mr. Moreau: I am very firm and I have thought about it a great deal.

Further on the hon. member for Danforth asked the following question:

[Mr. Beaulé.]

Mr. Scott: At the meeting ten days later, Mr. Girouard has told us—and we have heard his testimony—that you were the member who told him that the discussion had been called off because of something Mr. Pearson had said.

[Text]

Mr. Scott: On a point of order, I wish to correct the hon. member. I did not say the testimony of the hon. member for York-Scarborough placed him in a difficult position. I said it placed the committee in a difficult position. I think this should be on the record.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaulé: I continue to read, Mr. Speaker:

Mr. Moreau: I would like to add another thing to my statement:

Mr. Speaker, in his statement, the hon. member for York-Scarborough declares that he is not the one who stated that the Prime Minister would lose the support of the Social Credit, but the hon. member for Labelle.

I would now like to quote an extract of the evidence given by Mr. Keith Davey.

As can be seen on page 300 of No. 4, Mr. Davey said:

The only thing I want to say, Mr. Chairman, is that at no time in the meeting was there any discussion of money or campaign funds of any kind. I made no reference to a "fat electoral fund" for the next election; nor did I say that I would "take care of the defeated Liberal candidate"; nor did I say that "as for unsatisfied Liberal organizers" I would only have to change them. I did not use the phrase "The benefits: a party in power."

This is a summary of what took place during the sittings of the committee on privileges and elections which was instructed to study the question moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If we concur in the report, as we are asked to, this would mean that the hon. member for Labelle may have or may not have told the truth, because at that moment the question of privilege was raised in regard to an attempt of bribery by offering the benefits of a party in power and "a fat electoral fund".

On the other hand, if we come to the conclusion that these statements were not made, then it means that the house has been misled by the hon. member for Labelle and that there must have been some untruths somewhere, especially if the hon. member for York-Scarborough and Mr. Keith Davey told the truth.

If the house concurs in the report, it will recognize that the statement of the hon. member for Labelle is not truthful.

In view of the contradictory evidence given before the committee on privileges and elections, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire):

That the report of the committee on privileges and elections be not concurred in now, but that it be referred back to that committee on privileges and elections and that the said committee recommend to the house, in view of the apparent contradiction of the sworn statements, to have the record of evidence examined by the attorney general of Ontario, leaving it to him to take the necessary action or to make the appropriate decisions.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Had the proposed amendment merely referred to the question whether this report should be sent to the attorney general of Ontario it would not, in my opinion, have been acceptable. However, the proposed amendment is to the effect that the report of the committee on privileges and elections be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to that committee to be dealt with as the committee may see fit and proper. I will, therefore, accept the amendment as proposed.

The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the amendment.

One fact seems obvious. On the face of it, it seems here as it seemed in committee that the two old parties have suddenly agreed to forget the whole business. There seems to be something which is rather smelly on the Conservative side and things do not smell any better on the Liberal side, considering the tentative accusations which were levelled at the Prime Minister.

In such a case, as it happened in the past and as it is bound to happen again, for the two old parties are pretty much of the same origin, they agree that it is better to forget the whole thing.

But one thing remains: this matter involves a bribery attempt. Was there an attempt or was there not?

The hon. member for Labelle rises and says: I was offered the benefits of a party in office and a substantial election fund.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rises and says: If he has been offered that, the matter must be referred for consideration to the committee on privileges and elections because in such a case, there would have been a breach of the privileges of the hon. member for Labelle in the attempt to bribe him.

Now, the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand claims that there has been no bribery attempt.

But according to the minutes of the committee in question the hon. member for Labelle himself would have stated: It was tempting. That was like the worm used to bait the hook: It is tempting and the fish bites. Sometimes the fish does not bite because the bait is withdrawn too soon. That is somewhat what happened when the hon. member for York-Scarborough said to the hon. member for Labelle, according to his testimony: I am sorry but the deal is off; the Liberals do not want you.

But the hon. member for Labelle himself says: It was tempting.

He was offered the bait but it was withdrawn too soon. Since he could not bite, he went to another party.

The organizer of the Liberal party says: He asked us to take him but we rejected him.

The hon. member for Labelle says: No, they offered me election funds and the advantages of a party in office.

And yet it was stated that there had been no bribery attempt. Mr. Speaker, what is a bribery attempt if it is not to offer to an hon. member the advantages of the political party in power? Look in the report of the committee on privileges and elections where the question was asked on many occasions. What is the meaning of the advantages of a political party in power? The hon. member of Labelle did not say what they were, but everyone knows what it is all about. All the Liberals who are now in power and the Conservatives who held office previously know that patronage is involved. We have had examples of that with the lists of the Post Office Department: It is an advantage held by the party in power.

A fat electoral fund? It was tempting for a member of parliament who, without funds, would never be elected, but with a fat electoral fund—and I would like to point out to the leader of the Liberal party that it will have to be a fat one—

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, may I put a question—

Mr. Grégoire: It will take a lot of money to have him elected.

Mr. Martineau: May I put a question to the hon. member?

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he or his party are trying to assume office?

Mr. Caouette: In your case, definitely.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would tell the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue that if, at the last election, I had been elected by a majority of only one vote, I would abandon any thought of winning back my constituency. A one-vote majority is nothing to brag about and holds not too much hope for the future.

Mr. Speaker, it was nevertheless an attempt at bribery. If one reads the report of the committee on privileges and elections, one sees that the hon. member for Labelle stated clearly that it was tempting. He admitted that it was tempting.

And there are people who would try and make us believe that there was no attempt at bribery. Mr. Speaker, we are not so naïve. If there are some who want to be naïve it is up to them.

Mr. Speaker, another problem was raised, and rightly so, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: I am wondering whether the hon. member is keeping a close watch on the time. Should he not be making preparations for his trip to Copenhagen?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that, realizing how stupid the Conservatives were on the flag issue, I said to myself: I am leaving. And when I was asked when I would come back, I said: when the Conservatives are through talking about the flag. Indeed, I think every intelligent person ought to let them speak by themselves, alone in this house, and go as far away as possible. I do hope that with the Atlantic ocean between me and the meaningless speeches of the Conservatives, I shall be rid of them.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad also, since the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) is raising this problem, to go and take part in this international meeting of parliamentarians. I do feel that I have to get some experience and I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have studied parliamentary procedure and are qualified in that field.

I am pleased to commend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre for his competence as a parliamentarian. If I go to Copenhagen it is precisely in order to become as competent as he is and to be able to compete with him when we shall sit on the other side of the house.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, this is not a bribery attempt on my part in order to get the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to cross over to our side.

A further interesting point in all this is that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand suggested it was not up to the committee to determine who was right or who was wrong.

Now, an accusation was lodged against the right hon. Prime Minister.

I heard the charge when the hon. member for Labelle said: the hon. member for York-Scarborough told me that the Prime Minister had allegedly mentioned to the Liberal national organizer that he was afraid that he would lose the support of the Social Credit party.

It reminds me of the man who had been listening to every Tom, Dick and Harry. You do not know where the truth lies.

But the hon. member for Labelle jotted all that down and then repeated it in the House of Commons, thus insulting the right hon. Prime Minister, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated.

I appreciate that the Prime Minister denied it, but the hon. member for Labelle maintained his statement.

It is said that in the House of Commons, we must accept the word of an hon. member. Now, the hon. member for Labelle said one thing, and the Prime Minister said exactly the opposite. Where is the truth? It is rather difficult to know under those circumstances, and the truth should always be obvious.

As far as I am concerned, in view of the language used by the hon. member for Labelle, I cannot hesitate in believing the statement made by the Prime Minister. But since the matter was sent to the committee on privileges and elections, I think that the committee should have come to a clear conclusion instead of coming out with a most indefinite one.

Mr. Speaker, the matter was brought to a stop while under way. All witnesses were not heard. I heard some of my good Liberal friends say: It is better not to hear the four Liberal members, because inconsistencies might come out.

Frankly, I admit that it left a bitter taste in my mouth to know that not only the Tories and Grits would contradict each other, but that the four Liberal members would do so too.

Therefore, a most vague and general conclusion is brought forward, which does not compromise anybody, in spite of the accusations that were made.

And we have the hon. member for Port Arthur rising in the committee to move a resolution according to which there was no question of privilege involved, after the same hon. member had on many occasions repeated before the committee that the chief organizer of the Liberal party, Mr. Davey, was one of his personal friends. After soft-sawdering the Liberal party organizer, the hon. member for Port Arthur is the first to suggest that the whole thing be forgotten as soon as possible.

But what is more important and more serious—and I speak more especially of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East—is that the latter pointed out glaring contradictions in statements made under oath.

We do not want to hear: It is because we had forgotten. It is obvious that if the hon. member for Labelle states that he was offered an electoral fund, he remembers that well because last time he did not have any and, moreover, he would need one for the next time.

The national organizer for the Liberal party and the hon. member for York-Scarborough say: We never offered him an electoral fund. So, on the one hand, it is maintained that he was never offered one while on the other, he maintained that he was offered one.

On seven specific points the statements of two members are diametrically opposed, although they were under oath.

A newspaperman said: These can be called "apparent sworn contradictions" but in plain language this is called perjury. The members of the House of Commons are also here to set an example for the Canadian people. If a Canadian citizen perjures himself, he is condemned to prison; he is liable to prison under the Criminal Code. This section of the law dealing with perjury has been passed by the House of Commons. If there is some doubt as to a sworn statement made by a person, he will be prosecuted before the courts.

This is done in the case of high ranking persons, even in our judicial system. But anybody is considered innocent as long as he is not proven guilty by the courts.

When an ordinary citizen is involved, there is, at least, a charge laid against him, followed by an investigation and prosecution. But is there any difference when an hon. member is involved, who has to behave properly, or at least observe the law as passed by the House of Commons?

When a member of the House of Commons is involved I think that it is perhaps neither more nor less serious, but it is nevertheless as serious as when an ordinary Canadian citizen is implicated.

There is an example to be set. Shall we begin to observe the law ourselves or shall we violate it without having to bear the consequences?

A while ago the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) said that the House of Commons —and not the attorney general of the province—would thus be authorized to render judgment upon its members. But will any member of the house, Liberal as well as Conservative, feel himself qualified to judge any action of his peers, when, from the first, he is imbued with partisan politics and will ask for nothing better than to deal in the worst possible way with a political opponent and do all he can for a friend?

To my mind hon. members in this house are not qualified to act in this way, but it is rather up to the judiciary to render judgment in such cases.

That is why we say that parliament should not ask the committee on privileges and elections to state that the hon. member concerned has committed perjury, but that everything be put in the hands of the competent authorities, that is, of the attorney general of Ontario so that the latter could proceed with an inquiry, go over the evidence and call in witnesses, after which he might render a decision himself without being politically involved like the members of the House of Commons would be.

It is true that parliament should as much as possible seek to direct its own affairs, as the hon. member for Danforth said, but in a case like this, parliament would be neither impartial nor objective, nor able to decide. Under the circumstances, the case should be left in the hands of competent and impartial authorities, that is, the judiciary.

Indeed, perjury in itself is not under parliamentary jurisdiction, but should be dealt with under the Criminal Code and the judicial system which, alone, have the necessary competence to render a decision with regard to perjury.

If there has been perjury, it did not happen in the house, but in committee. Then, the members involved accepted, of their own free will, to give up their privilege and testify under oath; they knew very well what to expect in so doing.

In my opinion, the situation at the present time is obvious. Throughout the country people have been informed of what transpired before the committee.

I have not the least intention to say who committed perjury. This is not my problem; it is not up to me to say. It is not up to us either. But it is incumbent upon us to point out the facts which took place. We do not want to decide by ourselves which one is guilty, and to what extent, but we believe that the House of Commons would fare better in the opinion of the public if the committee on privileges and elections were instructed by the house to leave the whole thing to the persons qualified to judge such cases. Then, people may have a better opinion of their representatives.

We are judging nobody, we are only asking that the facts be clarified to the satisfaction of each and everyone, and this not through prejudiced people, but through impartial people, whose task, entrusted to them by the parliament of Canada, is to see to it that the Criminal Code, and even the sections concerning perjury, passed by the parliament of Canada, be respected.

I am appealing to the members of the house, not with prejudice, since we shall have nothing to say then, but in an impartial way, so that parliamentary legislation, the reputation of the members and also the accuracy of the facts may be respected.

Mr. Gérard Chapdelaine (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, since it is I who put before the committee on privileges and elections the motion to the effect that there had been no attempt at bribery and that the matter should be referred to the house for concurrence, I should like to say a few words first to assure the house that we agree on the report submitted to the house, because the question which was referred to the committee on privileges and elections was to inquire whether there had been any attempt at bribery.

Now, the evidence given before the committee on privileges and elections led us all to believe that there was no attempt at bribery and, in my opinion, the majority of members are satisfied with this report concerning this aspect of the question.

The problem raised by the Ralliement Créditiste is not to know whether or not there was any attempt at bribery, but rather if there was perjury.

An hon. Member: Both.

Mr. Chapdelaine: Now, whether or not there was perjury is not a question which should be discussed by the committee on privileges and elections.

What strikes me most, Mr. Speaker, is that the members of the Ralliement Créditiste tried by all possible means to get an individual at the committee on privileges and elections and when they could not succeed and when they realized that the committee had no authority to grant their wish they now resort to another means, namely the introduction of an amendment, so that the whole thing would be referred again to the committee on privileges and elections, in order to examine and inquire whether or not there was perjury.

In my opinion, this reason or this attitude on the part of the members of the Ralliement Créditiste is easy to explain. First, I feel that it is merely a vicious revenge against an individual who refused to follow the policy of the Ralliement Créditiste because its members diassociated themselves from the national Social Credit party.

I do not think such an attitude could inspire noble motives of justice because usually, for those people, it is completely beyond their capacity to render an equitable judgment on a decision of the committee on privileges and elections—

Mr. Caouette: You pass such good judgment.

Mr. Chapdelaine: All were agreed in the house and also in the committee that there was no attempt at bribery, except the members of the Ralliement Créditiste who actually remind me of that mother who, seeing the regiment going by, said that only her son was in step.

What amazes me even more, Mr. Speaker, is that suddenly they have such a craving for justice concerning a few members of the house while, generally, we all agree that there was no breach of the privileges of the house.

If some member of the house feels aggrieved by the stand taken by the committee on privileges and elections, I suggest that he lodge a personal complaint which he will have to prove.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To date, we tried to stick to the subject matter of the motion now before the house. We did not blame any political party, but rather we asked that the case be judged not by us but by someone else.

I do not think that the hon. member for Sherbrooke, who attended very few sittings of the committee on privileges and elections, is in a position to discuss what happened, because he is completely beside the point.

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think that even if I did not attend all the sittings of the committee, I can read and am able to find out what happened. Besides, I attended one sitting and I noted that the members of the Ralliement Créditiste were filibustering and were out to get a certain individual. I could see that they wanted to wreak vengeance on a former colleague.

After hearing all the evidence in order to decide whether there was an attempt at bribery, we came to the conclusion that there was none. It was then that the hon. member for Lapointe, who wanted the committee to lay a charge of perjury—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. What the hon. member for Sherbrooke said—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has been quite lenient, especially on the rule of relevancy, in the hope that we can get on with the business before the house. Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, about what the hon. member for Sherbrooke has just said to the effect that we wanted to bring an accusation of perjury. I want to say that the hon. member for Sherbrooke lied because the motion at that time was to refer everything to the attorney general of Ontario in order to decide who had lied to the committee and not to judge that question ourselves.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke is distorting the facts and he lies shamelessly to the house. If he had been present at the committee, he would have realized that the motion was to the contrary.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask all hon. members to restrict themselves to the amendment before the house. Is the hon. member for Sherbrooke finished?

[Translation]

Mr. Chapdelaine: No, Mr. Speaker. On the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Lapointe, I have just been accused of distorting the facts. All hon. members who attended the committee meetings surely realized that the aim of the hon. member for Lapointe was to have a charge of perjury brought against one or the other of the members who had testified before the committee. I do not think I lied to the house when all I did was to report the facts which took place at that meeting of the committee on privileges and elections.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say I am satisfied with the report submitted by the committee and that, in my view, the amendment is not in order inasmuch as those who want to bring charges should do so under their own names and not on behalf of the whole Canadian government.

[Text]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say just a word or two on the amendment, but I rise also for another purpose which I will indicate in a moment. For the reasons that were stated by my colleague the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) even before the amendment was moved, we do not feel that the house would be well advised to accept this amendment to refer this matter back again to the committee on privileges and elections. We think that committee has had enough of it, and we are not satisfied that enough of the ingredients of perjury are before us to support this kind of motion. There is also the question whether we want to delegate to the attorney general of a province a measure of authority over what goes on on parliament hill. Surely we should look after these things ourselves.

However, Mr. Speaker, I rose also at this point because now that an amendment has been moved the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand can speak again. Quite seriously I invite him to do so, because I believe that in his initial statement he registered implications that he would not want to have stand, being the fair minded person that this house has acclaimed him to be. He referred in his opening remarks to my part in moving the original motion on the 28th of April, and during the course of his remarks he used the phrase "synthetic point of privilege" and he suggested at one point that I raised it out of a misunderstanding of what was involved in a point of privilege. There seemed to be a suggestion that the whole mess we have gone through is somehow to be laid at my door. May I suggest, and I suggest this very seriously to the house, that if no account had been taken by the House of Commons of the remarks that were placed on the record on the 27th of April by the hon. member for Labelle we would have been derelict in our duty. Furthermore, when I raised my point of privilege on the 28th of April there was competition in the house to second my motion. I indicated that my leader was prepared to second it, but the hon. member for Labelle was on his feet asking to second it, and the Prime Minister offered to second it. When you, sir, later put the motion and started to name the Prime Minister as the seconder several Conservative members protested and said no, it was the member for Labelle who should have the right to second it.

The house supported the motion unanimously, which is a clear suggestion that the house felt at that time that whatever the committee on privileges and elections might do, it should look into the matter. I am prepared to accept the judgment of the committee on privileges and elections now that it has made an investigation, but I suggest that the kind of implication the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand made should not have been made, and that he should now take advantage of this opportunity to speak again to correct that impression.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, may I say I acknowledge freely that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is entitled to the greatest respect at my hands. As he pointed out quite properly, I voted for the motion that he introduced. I wish to make it meticulously plain that I am not suggesting that his motion was a synthetic point of privilege. I was just putting forward the general principle that in future the house ought to satisfy itself before we embark on these committee inquiries. I trust I have satisfied the hon. member. I was not reflecting upon him, because all members of the house stand in great debt to his unrivalled knowledge of the rules of practice and procedure, and I am pleased to make this statement in his presence.

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, may I say—

[Text]

Mr. Pennell: Is there any suggestion in the hon. member's mind that I am still reflecting upon him?

Mr. Knowles: Not at all. The hon. gentleman has withdrawn the reflection, and I accept his withdrawal.

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am in complete agreement with the report which the committee on privileges and elections submitted to the house for approval and which stated that there had been no bribery nor any bribery attempt regarding the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard).

However, I was particularly impressed by the contradictory testimony given before that committee. As stated earlier by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Pennell) and the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Beaulé), the testimony was rendered under oath and had it been given before a court of justice, I am sure the presiding judge would have applied sanctions to one or more witnesses who testified or he would have referred the case to the crown attorney for careful consideration.

As already pointed out, it is extremely difficult for the house to penalize one of its members. It is still more difficult to undertake a thorough investigation; in fact, this was realized during the proceedings of the committee on privileges and elections.

At the beginning of the meetings, we did not even have a bilingual stenographer. The proceedings of the committee had to be delayed to find a stenographer who was qualified to take down the evidence given by the witnesses.

In addition, I feel that the hon. members are not in a position to criticize the attitude or conduct of some of their colleagues. I also believe that to do justice to public opinion, it would be advisable to submit the evidence heard before the committee on privileges and elections to the attorney general of Ontario, in order that he may decide whether it would be advisable to institute proceedings against one or several of those who appeared before the committee on privileges and elections.

However, Mr. Speaker I would not want my intervention to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). In fact, I dissociate myself completely from the insinuations he made with regard to the two traditional parties of this house. There has been, neither within nor outside the committee, any collusion between the Conservative and the Liberal parties with regard to those questions. Besides, no member of the Liberal party received any instructions concerning his vote in the committee or in the house, and this is evidenced now by the stand I am taking.

Mr. Speaker, I understand my colleagues who supported the report now before the house, and I also understand their attitude in the committee as well as in this house.

With a great deal of generosity, they reconcile the conflicting evidence given before the committee. Maybe I am less generous than they are, but I find it more difficult to explain that evidence. In my opinion, the public has the right to know who lied before the committee and it also has the right to demand that those who committed perjury should suffer the consequences.

I am not afraid for my colleague from York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau) who testified before the committee. I followed with great interest and regularity the proceedings of the committee and I examined the minutes carefully enough to know that the hon. member for York-Scarborough was sincere in his evidence. Indeed, the hon. member for Labelle said as much before the committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, I should like to make a few brief remarks regarding certain statements made today, as well as others made in the committee on privileges and elections.

After hearing the statements and the discussions, it is obvious that a meeting was held between prominent members of the Liberal party and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard). Everyone is convinced of this. Since the report also mentions it, I feel bound to intervene at this time. I am convinced that the hon. member for Labelle was approached by the Liberal organization, and that he was also approached at the same time, no doubt, by the Conservative organization. However, I am not prepared to admit that perjury was committed by either side. But I am prepared to suggest that one side or the other has lied barefacedly in this house.

I feel that this question should not have been submitted to the house and it is precisely the irresponsible attitude of the hon. member for Labelle which is to blame. He behaved like a six-year old boy, with as much sense as an eight-year old no doubt. He boasted, showing off, that all the political parties wanted him to join their ranks and it is probably following a meeting with a member of the Liberal or the Conservative party that the hon. member for Labelle saw that it would be wise for him to make in parliament a flamboyant and untimely statement charging that the Liberals had tried to bribe him, promising him large election funds and the advantages of the party in office.

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to point out to the house that at the beginning of the proceedings of the committee on privileges and elections, the hon. member for Labelle once again showed his irresponsibility and replied rudely to the questions put to him by the members of the committee.

There again he acted as a six year old child, with perhaps, the reasoning of a two-year old. He believed he was even more important than the committee itself. He paraded like a "smart alec" before the committee members and he must bear the full responsibility for it. And if, today, his reputation is blemished in any way he only has himself to blame.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) was saying a moment ago that we wanted to get him. Not at all Mr. Speaker. On the contrary, we want to "get" somebody else.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke also said that we moved an amendment because we wanted to bring out the truth out of revenge. There again, Mr. Speaker, this is false. I feel no animosity whatsoever against the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) or against the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) and if we are proposing an amendment, it is not out of revenge.

As a matter of fact, as you said a while ago, Mr. Speaker, this amendment recommends that this report be referred back to the committee on privileges and elections and we suggest that, if judicial steps are to be taken, it is not up to the members of parliament to do so. This will be a matter for the courts, should the matter come to that.

As I pointed out a while ago, I do not think there was perjury on either side, in the literal sense of the word; but there were fibs on both sides. I suggest that both parties lied to the house, that they tried to show astuteness and wiliness, as it is the old parties' characteristic to act in such a way.

We do not want to be taken in by lies; neither do we want to be the accomplices of this extraparliamentary or parliamentary action. We do not intend to favour one party more than the other and that is the reason why I maintain that the whole responsibility must be assumed by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard). He behaved like a six-year old child.

CHANGE IN NAME OF MEMBER FOR GRENVILLE-DUNDAS

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I rise on a question of privilege. Because the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas has changed her name to Mrs. Jean Wadds I request, Mr. Speaker, that you take note so that all the necessary changes may be made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am in order, but I should like, if I may, on behalf of those on this side to welcome this new member to the house, and to assure her that while she was away something of beauty and charm was missing from our deliberations. Mr. Speaker, the exuberance of my observation has nothing to do with the fact that perhaps her new happiness and new domestic responsibilities will prevent her standing for parliamentary office.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if one is allowed to speak on an occasion such as this, to join in the felicitous words that have been uttered by the Prime Minister, and to show that unanimity for which this house from time to time becomes famous, I should like to say how very happy we all are about the hon. member's happiness. The only source of disagreement is in the last suggestion made by the Prime Minister. We on this side of the house want her to continue to represent her constituents.

DUMPING OF RAW SEWAGE INTO GREAT LAKES

Question No. 717—Mr. McMillan: (Supplementary)

In connection with the strong recommendation by the international joint commission to cease dumping raw sewage and other waste products in the great lakes system (a) what program has been decided on in Canada to this end (b) how many American and Canadian communities dump raw sewage, directly or indirectly, into the great lakes system (c) have the American people assumed any time limit on any program to clean up the water in the great lakes system by sewage disposal plants, elimination of detergents and other wastes etc.?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): (b) 159 communities in the United States with a population in 1960 of 356,596 are discharging untreated or raw sewage into the great lakes basin. (c) Although no time limit has been set for these communities to provide sewage treatment, some of them will soon be doing so in accordance with state schedules, assisted by provisions of the federal water pollution control act. Under this act, financial assistance is extended through construction grants for building municipal treatment works under priority programs established by the states.

PATENT OFFICE RECORD

Question No. 1,408—Mr. Caouette:

1. How many copies of the Canadian Patent Office Record are printed each week?
2. What does a weekly printing of this publication cost?
3. Is this publication published in the two languages or in English only?
4. For what reason do members receive an edition in which only the cover is bilingual, the rest being in English?
5. Are there plans to make this publication a completely bilingual one in order that French Canadians may benefit fully from it?

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): 1. On the average, 950 copies of the Canadian Patent Record are printed each week.

2. Weekly publication costs vary between $3,000 and $4,000 depending on the number of patents delivered during the week and the number of pages of each issue.

3. The publication includes a descriptive memorandum of each patent in French or English as the case may be. The summary of the patent is printed in the same language as the descriptive memorandum (specification) which, under section 20 of the regulations, must be entirely in English or in French.

4. It is not true to say that there is an English edition only. In fact, there is but one edition which is printed in English and in French depending on the language used, in each case, in the patent application. The cover is in both official languages.

5. At present such an edition does not seem a necessity since the demand for this publication is very limited. Moreover since a translated document is legally binding just like an original one, the risk of mistakes could give rise to serious litigations considering the technical nature of the summaries.

RESEARCH INTO NEW USES FOR COAL

Question No. 1,545—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Has the government made any progress with its announced program to give special attention to step up research into new uses for coal and, if so (a) what is the nature and the extent of any steps taken in this regard (b) in what way does the government think that any such steps will halt the rapid decline in the economy of communities dependent on the coal industry?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): (a) The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has been unable, due to an increasing demand for more research in all of its disciplines, to assign more of its facilities toward a stepped-up program of research into new uses for coal. We have continued to maintain essential services to the coal industry and the dominion coal board as well as to improve the design of combustion equipment to slow down the rate of loss of the thermal power market.

(b) Provision is made in this year's estimates for an expenditure by the dominion coal board for professional and special services. It is intended that this provision should be used in research projects to support present markets and develop new outlets. In this development, consideration will be given to new uses for coal.

All research directed to the maintenance of existing markets and the development of new outlets has an effect on coal production. 2½ per cent over 1962 while figures for the six months ending June 30, 1964 show a further increase of 4½ per cent over the same period in 1963.

INUVIK AIRPORT—RUNWAY CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 1,546—Mr. Cyr:

1. In what year were the runways built in Inuvik in the Northwest Territories?

Questions

2. What amount of money did the Department of Transport allocate for the purchase of lands and the construction of runways including engineering services?

3. Did any private industries contribute to the cost of this project?

4. What amount of money has the Department of Transport allocated to the maintenance of the runways at Inuvik since the commencement of operations?

5. What amount of money did the Department of Transport receive from airlines using the runways?

6. How many people reside in the immediate vicinity of Inuvik?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): 1. Commenced 1956 and completed 1959.

2. $5,500,000.

3. No.

4. The accounting system does not bring out the costs of maintenance of the actual runway, but total expenditures for operation of the airport from commencement of operations in the fiscal year 1958-59 to March 31, 1964, amount to $314,324.

5. To March 31, 1964, $31,097.

6. According to dominion bureau of statistics, 1961 census, there were 1,248 persons in the local improvement district of Inuvik. The airport, however, serves as distribution point to a much larger area.

CONTRACT METHODS FOR D.E.W. LINE SUPPLY

Question No. 1,579—Mr. Nugent:

1. Is the contract for D.E.W. line supply for the western and central Arctic sectors negotiated and is the contract for the eastern sector tendered?

2. If so, what are the reasons for the difference in methods followed?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): 1. See answers to questions 797 and 798 in Hansard of May 4 and May 6, respectively.

2. Differences in method result from the differences in the areas served, routings followed, availability and experience, as well as from the nature of the arrangements with the U.S. authorities.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Question No. 1,615—Mr. Mullally:

1. What was the federal contribution to the province of Prince Edward Island for each of the following fiscal years, 1961-62, 1962-63, 1963-64 and 1964-65 (estimated) under the following: (a) unconditional grants—itemized (b) conditional grants—itemized (c) payments to individuals (i) unemployment payments (ii) family allowances (iii) old age security (iv) all others?

2. What is the total amount of all payments for each fiscal year mentioned above?

3. What is the per capita contribution in each category and how does this compare with the per capita contribution to the other nine provinces?

* OPERATION OF AUTOMATIC ELEVATORS, WEST BLOCK

Question No. 1,636—Mr. Watson (Assiniboia):

1. How many are employed in the west block to operate the automatic elevators?

2. How many of the employees were experienced elevator operators when first employed as operators in west block?

3. What was the cost of the automatic elevators?

4. Were tenders called for non automatic elevators and, if so, what was the lowest tender?

5. What is the justification for having operators to operate automatic elevators in the west block when they operate much quicker when on automatic?

Mr. G. Roy McWilliam (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): 1. Seven.

2. Seven.

3. $185,675.

4. No.

5. When the building was occupied in September 1962, operators were supplied for the elevators. This is normally done on new installations in order that the occupants can familiarize themselves with the equipment. The operators remained on duty until the close of the session. When the House of Commons opened in September 1963, elevator operators were not provided. However, representations were received from various members of parliament which resulted in assigning experienced operators to the elevators on October 15, 1963.

PUBLIC WORKS POSITIONS UNFILLED AFTER ADVERTISEMENT

Question No. 1,639—Mr. Aiken:

1. What positions with the Department of Public Works in Ottawa have been advertised for competition by the civil service commission but remain unfilled?

APPROVED ARDA PROJECTS

Question No. 1,653—Mr. Noble:

1. How many projects have been approved for aid under ARDA?
2. How many of these are located in Ontario?
3. How many are located in each of the other nine provinces?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): 1. The number of projects approved under the ARDA agreement to July 31, 1964 total 476.

2. The number of approved ARDA projects located in Ontario total 29.

3. Approved ARDA projects located in the other nine provinces are as follows: Newfoundland, 38; Prince Edward Island, 21; Nova Scotia, 40; New Brunswick, 29; Quebec, 122; Manitoba, 51; Saskatchewan, 98; Alberta, 29; British Columbia, 19.

LABOUR RETRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 1,656—Mr. Douglas:

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

1. What is the total amount paid to a single person under the federal-provincial labour retraining program?
2. What is the total amount paid to a married person under the federal-provincial labour retrainvincial labour retraining program?
3. What allowance is made for each dependant under the federal-provincial labour retraining program?
4. How many persons are presently registered under the program in Canada?
5. How many drop-outs have there been for each month since December 31, 1963?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1, 2 and 3. Allowances paid to persons attending retraining programs (training of unemployed) are determined by individual provinces with approval from the federal Minister of Labour under the terms of the technical and vocational training agreement. These provincial allowances are reduced by the amount of any unemployment insurance benefits received by students while in training. Current allowances provided in the various provinces are as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO CANADIANS WORKING IN MAINE

Question No. 1,687—Mr. Perron:

Is it the view of the Department of Labour that there is no longer any hope for an agreement, between the unemployment insurance commission, and the Canadian government on the one part and the social security authorities of the state of Maine, under which Canadians working in that state could claim unemployment insurance benefits upon their return to Canada?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): After a prolonged period of negotiation between the Canadian unemployment insurance commission and the Maine employment security commission the latter advised on October 30 last that it did not feel it would be in the best interests of Maine to enter into an agreement at this time.

In communicating this decision the Maine employment security commission expressed the hope that the matter might be re-examined some time in the future.

In all of these negotiations the unemployment insurance commission has had the support of the bureau of employment security at Washington but since unemployment insurance is a state matter the concluding of reciprocal agreement with Canada is the sovereign right of the state.

It is the opinion of the unemployment insurance commission, therefore, that prospects for the concluding of an agreement with Maine in the foreseeable future are dim.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—CANADIAN REACTION TO INTERVIEW BY MR. KHRUSHCHEV

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether his department is giving study to the contents of the momentous interview between the Canadian, Lord Thomson of Fleet and Mr. Khrushchev, and in particular reference to Mr. Khrushchev's acceptance of the need for a summit conference to arrive at an agreement regarding nuclear disarmament. Second, what has the government to say regarding Mr. Khrushchev's suggestion that in so far as Cyprus is concerned the British forces there should withdraw, as well as Mr. Khrushchev's threat, if I might use that expression, to Turkey, all of which were dealt with during the course of the interview?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the interview which Lord Thomson, formerly a Canadian, had with Mr. Khrushchev was, of course, a very interesting bit of news which came to us over the week end. We will want to give careful study to what Lord Thomson had to report about Chairman Khrushchev's proposal for important meetings after November next.

We will also give careful study to the statement attributed to the Soviet union in respect of the action that the Soviet union would take in the event of further intervention on the part of Turkey. However, it is noteworthy that what the Soviet union, and Mr. Khrushchev in particular, had to say on this subject is conditional. It appears that the Soviet union has given an undertaking to Cyprus on a conditional basis. I think this underlines the vital importance of United Nations efforts to consolidate the cease fire, since in view of the position now taken publicly by the Soviet union it is more than ever obvious that a recourse to violence must at all cost be avoided. Second, the public position taken by the Soviet union points up the difficult nature of the political balance of forces in the security council.

I would not want to go beyond this without careful analysis of the statement and an opportunity of examining all the circumstances involved. But I thank my right hon. friend for directing the attention of the house to these important statements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister in a position to say whether any representations have been made to the Soviet ambassador here regarding the request on the part of Archbishop Makarios for Soviet assistance, and the rather unusual reaction thereto on the part of Mr. Khrushchev, that such assistance would be given, which is certainly a situation completely inconsistent with the commonwealth relationship?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the ambassador of the Soviet union is on leave, but on Friday last I asked the chargé d'affaires of the Soviet union if he would be good enough to come and see me. We had a long talk on Friday afternoon about this and other matters.

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister give us any report now as to the outcome of the meeting between the secretary general of the United Nations and the nine participating forces? Have any decisions been reached with reference to the extension of the terms of reference for the United Nations forces, and are representations to be made, as a result of this meeting, to the government of Cyprus?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government, of course, has made representations on this question. My hon. friend will recall the report I made on Friday. We are now waiting to hear further from the secretary general.

Mr. Douglas: I should like to ask a further supplementary question. I think the minister has misunderstood me. I am not asking whether he has made representations, but asking for the outcome of the meeting which was held last week between the secretary general, U Thant, and the nine contributing nations. The minister told us that at this meeting they would be discussing an extension of the terms of reference. Has any agreement been reached by which the secretary general of the United Nations will be making representations to the government of Cyprus for an extension of the terms of reference of the UN peace keeping force?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I made a report on this last Friday, indicating that the secretary general has not yet made a reply to us about representations which he himself is making to the government of Cyprus through General Thimayya and through Mr. Galo Plaza, whom he dispatched to Cyprus primarily for this purpose.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact the minister stated in his report the other day that the meeting had only begun an hour before he made the report, I am wondering whether he has a final report to make as to the final outcome?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. When I made my report the other day, the meeting had taken place the day before. The secretary general was continuing his discussions and had indicated that he was communicating through Mr. Galo Plaza and General Thimayya with the government of Cyprus. The meetings with participating countries will be continuing.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does he have comments or a statement to make concerning the statement of the premier of the Soviet union to the effect that the Turkish attack against Cyprus villages had to be made with the support of members of NATO, particularly of the United States and Great Britain and consequently of the Canadian forces?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me what was my reaction to Mr. Khrushchev's statement and I answered him. Consequently, I have no further comment to make for the moment.

[Text]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been in touch with the secretary general of the United Nations, either yesterday or this morning, with regard to the unfortunate illness of the mediator, the eminent Finnish diplomat, who was apparently taken seriously ill in Geneva? Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether or not this gentleman will be able to continue his duties at the present time, which are obviously of some urgency, and if not is consideration being given and has there been consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs by the secretary general with regard to the appointment of a new mediator as quickly as possible?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house generally regrets the very serious and untimely illness of the mediator who was on his way to Athens to report on the vital negotiations which have been taking place in Geneva, negotations which carry with them, I believe, some hope. What action the secretary general will now take with regard to the mediator I am not now in a position to say. Our ambassador has been in touch with the secretariat. However, the decision as to a successor is one which, under the security council resolution, rests entirely with the secretary general.

Mr. Nesbitt: A further supplementary question. In this regard I cannot ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to divulge the name or names of the person or persons who might be under consideration, but has the secretary general of the United Nations consulted in this respect with the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations between our ambassador and the secretariat.

NATO—INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF GREEK FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can now give the house any information in connection with the reported withdrawal of Greek forces from NATO command, the implications of this action as far as the Cyprus situation is concerned and also as far as the general situation of NATO is concerned.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend said Greek withdrawal?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the hon. gentleman mean the withdrawal of certain Turkish air force units?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I understand through the press gallery that this afternoon the Greeks announced that they had withdrawn some, if not all, of their forces assigned to NATO.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall have to take this question as notice.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RETIREMENT OF REAR ADMIRAL OF ATLANTIC FLEET

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is he in a position to confirm or to deny the news to the effect that he forced Rear Admiral Brock, chief of the Canadian Navy in the Atlantic, to retire? Could he also give us explanations in that connection and tell us that the statements made by this officer during a sitting of a committee on national defence in Halifax are not the reason of his forced retirement?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, one consequence of the integration process is the fact that we now have on strength more officers than we have positions for. It is therefore necessary to retire some in advance of the normal compulsory retirement age. Rear Admiral Brock has a distinguished war record. He has served this country well and long. It is therefore a matter of regret that we have to retire officers of his calibre. I can assure my hon. friend that his retirement is in no way connected with the visit of the parliamentary committee or anything which may have transpired at that time.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): A supplementary question. I wonder whether I might ask the minister why this particular officer, who is one of the most outstanding of all of the senior officers in the Canadian forces, is being retired at the age of 51, with still four years of his normal service to go, with the consequent considerable increase in cost to the taxpayer through payment of his pension, when ordinarily he would have received his pay, which some other officer will be receiving in the meantime? It would seem a most peculiar way of dealing with senior officers in the Canadian forces—retiring an officer of this distinction at such an age, with the consequent loss of his abilities which are very necessary to the forces, and at the same time bringing about a great increase in the cost of the services to the taxpayer.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, we have indicated all along that it was necessary to effect economies in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no economy in that.

Mr. Hellyer: As a result of the integration process we will be able to undertake our tasks quite satisfactorily with fewer people. This proposition has been widely applauded not only in this house but across the country. I do not think it was ever understood—I would be surprised if it was—that the reductions would only take place in the junior ranks; the reductions will take place right across the board at all rank levels. It is unfortunate that experienced people, whether they be of junior or senior rank, must be retired in advance of normal compulsory retirement age. The alternative is to keep on the strength of the Department of National Defence personnel for whom there is no further employment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where is the economy in this action?

Mr. Hellyer: The economy is that there are fewer personnel required, so there are consequent savings which can be diverted to the acquisition of equipment. I think all hon. members agree that the cuts should be proportional throughout the rank structure, and not applied just to junior ranks.

Mr. Harkness: A further supplementary question. In view of the fact that officers of the rank of commodore and brigadier, and equivalent, have been and are being promoted to the rank of rear admiral, and equivalent, which is the rank of Admiral Brock, how can there possibly be any savings by retiring a man four years before his normal retirement age, a man of outstanding abilities, and promoting somebody else from a lower rank essentially to take his place?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, there are two points I should make here. First of all, the total number of senior officers under the integrated service and as a result of integration at national defence headquarters will be substantially less. A lesser number are required and fewer will be on strength. In respect to promotion of some younger men, we have a problem which must be faced. Many of our best wartime commanders are coming to the compulsory retirement age at approximately the same time. There is some variation of course, but within a rather narrow band of years a very high proportion of the most skilled second world war commanders will reach compulsory retirement age. One thing we must do if we are to maintain the competence and the operational effectiveness of our forces through future years is to promote some younger men, some junior officers, to give them command experience so that they will be able to carry on the distinguished capability of the Canadian armed forces in the years which lie ahead.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would now give us some definite reasons for this, I think, completely indefensible move, because all he has given us so far is generalities.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question—

Mr. Martineau: I have a supplementary question for the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Greenwood on a supplementary.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the minister if the enforced retirement of Admiral Brock had anything to do with his expressed views about the role the Canadian navy should be playing? Otherwise I must say I would find this retirement quite inexplicable.

Mr. Hellyer: As I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, that was not the reason for his retirement. The views expressed to the committee at the time of the visit had no direct relationship to the matter.

Mr. Brewin: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Can the minister state if the decision to retire Admiral Brock was taken before or after his expression of views?

Mr. Hellyer: It was taken before that visit, Mr. Speaker. I think it is fair to say that many factors enter into these judgments and I do not think it would be the least bit helpful to the morale of the forces or to any of the individuals concerned to expose them in detail.

Mr. Martineau: Can the minister say when the decision was taken?

Mr. Hellyer: Not precisely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The same old alibi.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: You have to be recognized.

Mr. Brewin: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not see any possible opportunity for raising a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am giving the floor to the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I was about to bring up a point of order because of a remark by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the effect that I had not been recognized. Possibly his remark is on Hansard. I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Is it not true that the man who is replacing Admiral Brock is senior in years, so under those circumstances how could he qualify to replace Admiral Brock?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not recall the exact ages offhand, Mr. Speaker, but I can assure my hon. friend that the Royal Canadian Navy will be in good hands and that the flag officer designate, east coast, is a man of excellent experience and will be a first class commander.

Mr. MacInnis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In effecting the economies which the minister so often brings before the house is it the intention of the department to delete the position of one of the ministers of national defence?

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the retirement of Admiral Brock, forced or otherwise, anything to do with a disagreement with the Associate Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Hellyer: I can say categorically that there is no disagreement whatsoever.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence which may appear to arise out of some earlier questions that were asked but, in my mind, it does not. It is related to the question of the reorganization of the Department of National Defence and the consequential reduction in the number of employees. I should like to ask the minister if it is the policy of the department that any jobs which have heretofore been performed by civilian employees will henceforth be performed by members of the armed forces?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): There is no policy to that effect, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, the policy is that to the extent possible we will maintain the present relationship. I understand there have been some individual cases, however, where jobs previously performed by civilians are being presently performed by servicemen. This is something we will look into in the process of reorganization to ascertain whether they can best be performed by civilians or servicemen. The present circumstances, therefore, can be regarded as temporary until we have had a chance to look at the over-all organization.

Mr. Barnett: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister not think it would be much more satisfactory for some over-all policy to be developed rather than have civilian employees replaced, without regard to their seniority within the civilian establishment of the department.

Mr. Hellyer: The general policy, Mr. Speaker, is to employ the civilian or military personnel, having regard for the requirements of the job. Some jobs can best be performed by civilians, and this was commented on by the royal commission on government organization. There are other jobs which, for obvious reasons, have to be performed by military personnel, and this includes some categories of jobs where personnel are required to do certain things in an emergency which one would not expect, nor could one enforce, civilians to do; but the over-all policy will be to determine the actual requirements for the job and fill it accordingly.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which arises out of the questions that have just been asked. Is it the intention of the government to grant to public service employees, on the termination of their services, benefits similar to those being granted to military personnel? I ask this in view of the resolution recently passed by the national defence employees association, a resolution that appears to be eminently fair and reasonable.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think this question was answered earlier in the session. I do not have the exact Hansard reference at the moment, so perhaps I could send it to my right hon. friend later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am referring to a resolution passed within the last week or so by the national defence employees association, seeking similar benefits. It certainly was not dealt with prior to the meeting of the association. Is this resolution receiving consideration on the part of the government, because it seems eminently fair?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think the decision of the government which was previously promulgated was that it would not be possible to have the same benefits for civilian employees because of the effect this would have on civilian employees in other areas of the government service. That is the decision as I recall it. I am sure, however, all the resolutions passed by the national defence employees association will be studied by the department when they have been submitted to us.

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF QUEEN'S AND REGIMENTAL COLOURS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence or the Associate Minister of National Defence whether either one of them has issued instructions to any person or persons to develop designs for the present Queen's and regimental colours for the purpose of eliminating the union jack on such colours?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the Queen's and regimental colours no such thought has been given.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister assure the house that no action will be taken to alter the Queen's or any regimental colours by eliminating the union jack on any such colours?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is no thought of that whatever.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if the Associate Minister of National Defence will give the same assurance?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Associate Minister of National Defence claims equality with the Minister of National Defence in the performance of his duties. I am entitled to ask him that question and get an answer from him. I repeat, will the Associate Minister of National Defence give the same assurance as was given by the Minister of National Defence?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of National Defence answered that question he was speaking for the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—FAILURE TO APPEAR IN COURT

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, if I may change the subject, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice.

Is he in a position to inform the house of the results of the police action taken in order to retrace Hal Banks, and to tell us whether the latter appeared in court this morning to answer the charge of having induced seamen to abandon ship, in October last?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this morning Hal Banks did not appear in court, as he was ordered to and that, consequently, warrant for his arrest was issued by the court. But I am not aware of the efforts made to date—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Can the Minister of Justice tell us, for instance, whether Mr. Banks has been traced? Does the Department of Justice know where Mr. Banks is at the present time?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I do not know, at the present time, the whereabouts of Mr. Banks.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the failure of Mr. Banks to appear, will the Department of Justice decide finally to cancel the other bail granted to him?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, this question is under consideration and the decision which will be taken will have to be consistent with the best interests of the crown and of justice. But the fact that a bench warrant was issued in another case might affect the decision.

[Text]

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has Banks' bail been estreated?

Mr. Favreau: You mean in the case where he was to appear this morning?

Mr. Pugh: Yes.

Mr. Favreau: I have not been advised as to the disposal made with regard to his bail. All I know is that a bench warrant has been issued.

Mr. Pugh: Will the minister look into that?

Mr. Favreau: I will.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PARLIAMENT HILL—PICKETS AT ENTRANCES TO WEST BLOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. My question arises out of the presence of pickets at all entrances to the west block of the parliament buildings. As there are many members who very much dislike crossing picket lines, I wonder whether the minister is able to report to the house on the reasons for the presence of pickets around the west block today?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the reason for the current picketing is a protest on the part of a local union against a subcontractor who is alleged not to have asked local unions to provide labour and also alleging substandard wages. The fair wage division of the Department of Labour is investigating the matter because the contract is a federal one.

TRADE

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN OILSEED EXPORTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister inform the house as to what the findings and recommendations were of the oilseed trade mission which went to Japan for the purpose of looking into the possibility of increasing our oilseed trade with that country? Is there a growing market for Canadian rapeseed and flax, and what were the recommendations of the mission?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me this is a very good question for the order paper.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, the mission has returned and I am sure the farmers of the west will be interested in their recommendations.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

CANADIAN FLAG

REQUEST FOR TENDERS FOR PENNANTS WITH THREE LEAF DESIGN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio and ask him whether or not within the last two or three days his office has been inquiring from one or more manufacturers for prices for the delivery of 100,000 4x6 three leaf pennants? At whose request are these tenders or suggested tenders being sought and on whose behalf is he acting in this connection?

An hon. Member: Speak tenderly.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Dupuis (Minister without Portfolio): I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for the great interest he takes in what I do. I did ask what it would cost to get bumper strips, as they say in Shakespeare's tongue, showing the new flag design which is now proposed to the house.

I did it as a private individual and I would be happy if they were available soon so that I could buy some myself, not for the government but for myself, because I am proud of that flag.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the interest of the hon. gentleman is of course very much appreciated. Were these 100,000 bumper strips for his constituency or whom were they for?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: I asked for 100,000 because I thought the Conservative members would probably want to buy several of them.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is a very frivolous answer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and also a fatuous one. I ask the minister: Is this a personal purchase? If it is, no questions will be asked, but it came from his department.

An hon. Member: He has no department.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: If my hon. friend was listening he heard that I sought this information for my own personal use.

[Text]

PUBLIC WORKS

OTTAWA—LEASING OF SPACE IN UNFINISHED BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): I was asked on Friday by the Leader of the Opposition to table certain documents. The officials of my department are collecting this information and I shall be able to table these documents tomorrow. Because of the delay of one day, I think I will be able to table more information than was requested by the Leader of the Opposition.

INDUSTRY

PETERBOROUGH, ONTARIO—REPORTED REMOVAL OF PLANT TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary secretary. On August 12, the minister stated in reply to a question of mine concerning the move of C. W. Fisher, precision manufacturers, from Peterborough to the United States, that the principal reason for this move was the level of United States tariff. I should like to ask the minister if he is aware of the fact that Mr. Fisher has denied his statement. Mr. Fisher has said, "We would not have considered moving part of our operations to the United States in the foreseeable future if it had not been for the sales tax."

I should like to repeat my question. Will the minister advise the house what steps are being taken to prevent further movement of such industries to other countries and protect skilled labour in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest, in view of the information desired, that this is a question for the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—POSSIBLE OUTBREAK OF COMMUNICABLE DISEASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister check into the cause of the death of 10,000 turkeys out of a flock of 16,000 in western Canada, and will he consider reporting to the house his findings in order to avoid a repetition of this sort of thing, if there is an indication that a communicable disease might be transmitted from one flock to another?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I would be glad to look into the situation for the hon. member if he will give me the source of his information.

Mr. Korchinski: I will give the source.

HAY—SUGGESTED RESTRICTION OF EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the relatively poor hay crop in eastern Canada and because of the continuing need in the coming winter season for fodder for the cattle of eastern Canada, will the minister consider taking steps to prevent the export of hay from Canada to other countries until such time as we are assured that our own livestock will have sufficient feed for the coming winter?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met the minister of agriculture from Ontario and his deputy several days ago, and I would suppose many of these programs or suggestions would have to be initiated by the province. So far they have not made this sort of representation.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): As a supplementary, has the minister received a request for assistance for farmers in similar circumstances in western Quebec, from the government of the province of Quebec?

Mr. Hays: Not as yet, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENT METHOD AT DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to answer my questions of Thursday and Friday relating to the possible amendment of the Canadian constitution, and whether this would be done in another country or in Canada, in the light of our own sovereignty over our own affairs?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the information I have received from those who are competent to advise on this constitutional and legal question is as follows:

It is true that the parliament of Canada, that is to say the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, did in 1952 enact a measure in direct amendment of the British North America Acts. However, the authority to make this amendment was conferred on the parliament of Canada by the British North America (No. 2) Act, 1949 which was enacted by the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, assembled in the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What year was that?

Mr. Pearson: It was 1949. The authority of the parliament of Canada to amend the British North America Acts is therefore derived from and limited by this 1949 act of the United Kingdom parliament.

Any amendment outside the scope of section 91 (1) is therefore beyond the authority of the parliament of Canada, and must still be enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

A further amendment to establish a complete amending formula, or to re-enact the British North America Acts as a statute of the parliament of Canada can, in my view, be made at the present time only by the United Kingdom parliament. Of course, if an appropriate amending formula were so enacted, a new constitution could be enacted pursuant thereto.

Mr. Knowles: In view of this answer, I wonder if the Prime Minister does not agree that the matter should be discussed at the Charlottetown conference, not only the getting of the constitution home to Canada, but the way we do it? Would it not be desireable to find a way so that at the earliest moment we could make our own enactment, even if we had to do that after the United Kingdom had acted?

Mr. Pearson: Indeed, I do. I have every hope that, not only will this matter be discussed at the Charlottetown conference beginning in September, but that progress will be made there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the latter statement made by the Prime Minister, I should like to recall when we were endeavouring to bring this about there were two provinces, Quebec and Saskatchewan, that would not consent. Have Quebec and Saskatchewan now indicated that they are prepared to agree to the repatriation of the constitution?

Mr. Pearson: All I can say is that I have some reason to hope we will be able to agree on a formula very shortly which will overcome the difficulties which my hon. friend and the provincial premiers of that date experienced. I know he will be as happy as I, if that could be done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister did not answer the specific question. Have there been consultations with the governments of Quebec and Saskatchewan to remove the basis upon which they more or less vetoed action in this regard?

Mr. Pearson: There have been consultations with all the provinces, including Quebec and Saskatchewan, and particularly in regard to the obstacles that were encountered at the last meeting.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Is the Prime Minister contemplating the convening of a special meeting of the provincial and federal governments to deal with the repatriation formula?

Mr. Pearson: There will be a meeting within a short time at Charlottetown, and I cannot imagine a better place or a better time in which to make progress on these matters. If as a result of that meeting a special meeting is required, I am sure we can arrange that. I hope that at the forthcoming meeting real progress can be made.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): May I ask a supplementary question? Will the Prime Minister give this house the assurance that any change in the formula proposed by the previous government—and I certainly hope there will be a change—will be made known to this house before it is discussed with the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: I think the customary procedure should be followed in this matter. We should take advantage of the forthcoming meeting to discuss this matter. When the heads of the governments of the provinces met a week or so ago in Alberta, they took advantage of their meeting to discuss the matter informally. I was delighted that they did. I can assure my hon. friend that if and when a formula is agreed upon which is acceptable to all the provinces and the federal government, it will certainly then be brought to the house.

LABOUR RELATIONS

POSSIBLE IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING S.I.U. ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour?

Can the hon. gentleman confirm or deny the report to the effect that the vice president of the international seafarers union is taking steps to prevent free elections within this union?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this question is on the same subject as was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) last Friday. Since that time I have made inquiries regarding the reports mentioned on that date concerning candidates for election to office in the S.I.U. of Canada. I have learned this morning from the board of trustees that Mr. Andre Bansept the officer of the S.I.U. of Canada dismissed on Friday by the executive board of the S.I.U., has been ordered reinstated by the board of trustees pending investigation of the circumstances of the dismissal. The board of trustees are also investigating the movement of other members of the slate of officers proposed to run in opposition to the existing elected officers of the union. Where such movements may limit the effectiveness of any campaigning for office, the trustees will take appropriate action.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): On a supplementary question has the Minister of Labour's attention been drawn to the fact that René Turcotte of Montreal has been moved to Newfoundland just at the precise moment that he was running as a candidate for the position of executive vice president, following in the footsteps of the two people I referred to on Friday and will the minister give us some assurance that this matter will also be looked into by the board of trustees?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe this must be one of the two additional cases under investigation by the board of trustees.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Since the C.B.C. is engaged in a competitive business and the C.B.S. has bought the New York Yankees, what team is the C.B.C. going to buy for us?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Thursday, August 13, consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this most important debate and I make no apologies to anyone for occupying the time of the house with my contribution. I wish to say at the outset that I am going to speak in full support of the amendment and the subamendment.

I am fully aware of the gravity of the problem and of the gravity with which the people of Canada are beginning to look on this entire question. I am also well aware that my speech will not go down in the records as a great piece of oratory, nor will it be taken up by the press and radio and spread from coast to coast. It will not contain a great amount of research work on all the flags that have been flown in Canada. It may not contain the great principles that have been expounded by the leaders of the various parties, but I say in all honesty I regard myself as just an ordinary citizen of this country, and if in this debate I can convey to the house the feelings, thinking and beliefs of the ordinary man in the street, the man in the barbershop, the man in the bakeshop, the man in the corner grocery, the man who has been retired, the school teacher—all the men who form this great middle class of the people of Canada, of which I have the honour to be a part—if I can do this and convey their thoughts to the house, I shall feel I am justly fulfilling my responsibility as a representative of the Canadian people.

We have heard various speeches made in this house. We have heard a great deal from members who represent the great province of Quebec. I must pay tribute to these men because they spoke I feel, in all sincerity; they tried to the best of their ability to put forward the feelings of the citizens they represent concerning this flag question. They have been very eloquent and they have pointed out in no uncertain terms the feelings of the people of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, there are nine other provinces and today I propose to do the best I can to deal with the question as seen from my segment of Ontario.

Like many other members, I have prepared a flag speech. Like many other members I have spent weeks in research on this subject, knowing its importance to Canada and to the Canadian people. I do not intend to use that speech today. I say this because I have been in my riding and in other ridings in northwestern Ontario in the past few week ends talking with the people on the streets and trying to find out what they think of the actions of parliament and of the government in connection with this matter. What do I hear on every street? The ordinary Canadian says: What in the world is going on in Ottawa? What concessions are we making to the province of Quebec? Are we, in fact, making concessions? We hear talk of a federal state of Canada. We hear talk of a republic. We hear talk of changing the names of various crown corporations. What is going on? We in Ontario have the right to know. What do the people of Quebec want? Where will it end? These are the questions the people in Ontario are asking today. This is what they are saying. They are asking: Have these people from Quebec a grievance? Is it a grievance which has grown up over the years? Can we meet and solve this problem? How serious is it? What is this great division which is building up in this country of ours? This is what they want to know. They want to know whether the people of Canada are being sold out by this government.

They are asking: What about the filibuster? What is this filibuster of which the newspapers speak? Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have a wrong conception of this debate because they cannot get the facts. They speak of a filibuster. It is interesting to note that in this entire session we have devoted less than 30 hours to this flag issue. How can that be considered as a filibuster? We have devoted just 30 hours to a matter as important to the people of Canada as the issue which is now before us. A filibuster indeed. Mr. Speaker, the ordinary man wants to know what is going on and the only way he can find out is through a debate in this house during which the principles are brought out.

A question I have often been asked, indeed the question I was asked most when I talked to the people I have the honour to represent was: How in the world did the government get itself into such a mess? I try to be honest. I try to give them the facts. I said no government could get itself into such a mess without constant practice. And this is what we have seen.

We talk about news. I am very interested in the news on this flag issue. At the beginning of this debate we saw what was called a march of flags on parliament hill. I went out to see this march of flags because I was interested. I saw what took place that night in the drizzling rain. I saw a file about six people wide—

Mr. Favreau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must rise at this point and submit that now he has clearly announced the trend of his speech, the hon. member who has the floor is out of order.

The only matter which is presently before the house is the subamendment presented on August 13 by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) the text of which can be found at the bottom of page 6807 of Hansard for August 13. We all remember that the amendment is to the affect that the question of the flag be referred to the people of Canada for their opinion by way of a plebiscite. The subamendment reads as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:
> "and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following—

And there are four questions listed for inclusion in the form of questionnaire to be sent out.

My point of order is as follows: The only question before this house concerns whether, assuming this matter is to be referred to the people by plebiscite, it is desirable that the four questions proposed by the hon. member for Regina City be included in the questionnaire.

When the first amendment was submitted by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), although there was objection from this side of the house to the debate veering on to a subject other than that of the amendment itself, the Chair ruled—and I bow to that decision—that since the amendment by the Leader of the Opposition was in the nature of an alternative proposal to the original motion, debate should be entertained simultaneously on the two questions. If we admit the principle of this decision, that the two principal questions be discussed at the same time, it does not prevent our maintaining that the present position is far different. There is no question that the amendment to the amendment is not an alternative to either the first or to the second motion. It amounts, in effect, to a restriction of the amendment. So, I repeat, the only question before us is whether or not, assuming the amendment should carry, it would be desirable that the four questions sugegsted by the hon. member for Regina City in his amendment to the amendment be included in the questionnaire.

Therefore, I suggest that until such time as the amendment to the amendment has been disposed of, any discussion or debate pertaining to matters other than the questions mentioned in the subamendment to the amendment would be out of order.

Mr. Lambert: I am frankly amazed at the virginal purity of the minister in putting forward this argument this afternoon. I find his choice of timing rather singular. I would draw to his attention the nature of the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) on Thursday night—

Mr. Pickersgill: That was before the amendment.

Mr. Lambert: It was on the amendment, at the time of the amendment. That was a very general speech. It went into a great deal of philosophy. It treated with the whole subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was before the amendment.

Mr. Lambert: It was before the subamendment, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) would know if he had been listening. I say that my remarks were to the effect that the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) made his speech at a time when the discussion was on the amendment. If I follow the argument of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), the speech of the member for Hamilton East at that time was on the whole general philosophy of a flag, and it had no relationship at all in a limiting sense. Therefore it is rather singular for the minister to come in now and attempt to pick at a speech and limit the debate in the way he has done. If this applies in this debate, Mr. Speaker, it should have applied at all times.

May I say that the minister and his colleagues, with all due deference to the Chair, have been permitted to range far and wide in all types of debate. Relevancy is a most difficult thing, and a past master of this art is the Minister of Transport who, and I give him full credit, endeavours to follow the rules. In this regard he will recognize that when I occupied the chair you now occupy I did follow the rules in respect of relevancy much more closely than heretofore by some of my predecessors.

The Minister of Transport quite rightly indicated that one can make excursions and be relevant, because we are debating the whole question of a flag. Even a debate in respect of the purport of the subamendment is relevant. If I interpret the hon. member's remarks correctly, he is leading the discussion to the subject of choices, because the subamendment refers to four choices available within the amendment. Therefore, I put it to Your Honour that everything the hon. member for Kent (Ont.), (Mr. Danforth) said has been entirely relevant. I suggest to the Minister of Justice, if he now wishes to put forward this argument: Physician, first heal thyself. If you are going to suggest such a policy, then let us make sure everyone complies, and I hope the Minister of Justice will rise in his place as the leader of the government and instruct his colleagues to bear in mind the question of relevancy in all debates.

Therefore I submit that the remarks put forward by the Minister of Justice on this occasion are far too restrictive and have had no application in practice or otherwise in this house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, since the the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has drawn my name into this discussion, I should like to make a few remarks. The hon. gentleman says that the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) had discussed the whole question of the flag generally as, I understand, have other hon. gentlemen, pursuant to a judgment made by Mr. Speaker in respect of the right hon. gentleman's amendment.

Since the hon. member for Hamilton East spoke, the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) moved a subamendment. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) pointed out that this subamendment was in an entirely different category from the amendment of the right hon. gentleman, and that the right hon. gentleman's amendment, according to the decision of the Chair, which we accepted when it was made, was an alternative to what we were putting forward, and that the debate on the two could not be separated. Anyone who can read can see that the limiting and restricting subamendment, which the hon. member for Regina City chose to tack on to his leader's amendment, deals with the nature, and only with the nature, of a plebiscite to be held, should the house decide in favour of a plebiscite.

Under our rules we are not supposed to have repetition of debate. We have had a debate on the right hon. gentleman's amendment, and on my right hon. friend's motion. The debate continued up until the hon. member for Regina City chose, as he had a right to do, to restrict that debate by moving a subamendment. It seems to me that my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, would have been derelict in his duty, when the hon. member for Kent (Ont.), (Mr. Danforth) commenced to speak about a range of subjects including parades on parliament hill, had he not drawn attention to the rules of the house with the intention, as the hon. member for Edmonton West well knows, to prevent undue and improper repetition of debate.

The Minister of Justice drew attention to the fact that there was only one question before the house, and that was the subamendment of the hon. gentleman for Regina City, and suggested we should confine our debate to that question until the house is ready to settle it. Once that question is settled we will then go back again to a debate on the right hon. gentleman's amendment, and the ruling of the Chair in regard to that amendment would then apply thereto as long as that debate should continue.

It seems to me, sir, if we are just going to have subamendments moved one after another in order to allow hon. gentlemen to pursue the same general debate, we are totally defeating the purpose of the rules of the house. Therefore it seems to me my hon. friend the Minister of Justice did the only thing which as house leader he should have done, in drawing the attention of the house to that point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is simply a repetition of the objection raised earlier.

Mr. Lambert: You will have difficulty salving your conscience as of now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) has stated that an amendment to the motion permitted a general discussion, in consequence of the ruling made some time ago by Mr. Speaker. He is supported by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). He stated that what was done when the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) moved the subamendment was to limit and restrict the ambit of the amendment. Nothing of the kind was done.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said the debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nothing of the kind was done. The subamendment is a means whereby the amendment is amplified and, in this case, an explanation of the actual wording of the plebiscite placed therein. I am not going to deal with the argument in this regard. I do not intend to enter into that debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) will do that.

To follow the suggestion of the Minister of Justice would be contrary to all the decisions made in this house since I have been here, and would be restrictive beyond justice in every way. It would apparently have the purpose in mind of denying the fullest of discussion in this house. There is no question about that.

This is a matter of great seriousness and importance, and if a decision is to be made I suggest Mr. Speaker should be in the chair. It would be most unfair to ask you, sir, the incumbent at the moment, to make a decision in this regard.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a reflection on the Chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman with his usual garrulousness says this is a reflection on the Chair. It is nothing of the kind. When a matter as important as this is being considered it is unjust to place you, sir, in a position of having to make a decision of such importance.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), coinciding with the return to the house of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who was absent for a week or so, during which period the house carried on very successfully without him, I should remind the house that now the Minister of Transport has nudged the elbow of the Minister of Justice and has urged him to exercise some restraint on the debate that is proceeding. He is trying to do it through a very narrow interpretation of the rules, and has suggested the subamendment, which simply is enlarging the amendment, should have a restriction placed upon it.

Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact we are familiar with the general debates in this house, and when two amendments cover the same area at the same time the discussion is not restricted in any way, shape or form. The debate ranges over the whole field. The same is true when we are on the budget debate.

In this particular instance I do not see how it is within the competence of the Chair to restrict the debate on the subamendment without making it extraordinarily difficult to carry on a debate in this house. The subamendment, which deals with four suggested proposals to put before the Canadian people, draws into the debate all the reasons for and against these proposals. When I speak in the course of this debate, and on the subamendment of course, I am entitled to say why we are proposing that the present official flag of Canada, the red ensign, be one of the samples put in front of the people. I am entitled to say why some advocate an addition to that red ensign. I am entitled to discuss why we would suggest that the present three-leaf design be put in front of the people; and also why it should not, because you can put both sides of the question. So how in the world can you limit a debate on this particular subject just because the Minister of Justice has the idea that a subamendment should be restrictive in the course of debate here in the house? If debate is restricted, then what are we to talk about? I suppose the usual suggestion will be made—"Let's not have any debate at all; let's have a vote". That is the type of indirect closure which is constantly being attempted to be imposed in this house. I suggest that the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) was on the point of developing his thesis and leading up to the various reasons why the subamendment and the amendment should be supported, and I cannot for the life of me see how it would be possible to effect a restriction.

With regard to what has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) earlier concerning the speech we heard the other night, I would draw the attention of the Chair to page 6801 of Hansard. The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) apparently spoke on the amendment, but no restriction was imposed upon him at all. At page 6801 appears a learned discourse, which we doubt was prepared by him, on the bitter irony in the current attempt—> —to becloud the issue by the effort of many to convince the Canadian people that any manifestations of nationalism on their part are not only belated but are primitive expressions of a backward people.

How the hon. member was able to relate that to the debate on the flag escaped the attention of the entire house. But he was permitted to go on; the Minister of Justice did not intervene then and say: "This colleague of mine must be restricted because we are speaking to an amendment dealing with a plebiscite concerning the flag". No objection was raised then by the Minister of Justice and I say that he should not raise any objection now.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this is another of those occasions where on principle I have to take a position which I wish I did not have to take. I deplore the length of this debate. I deplore the suggestion that it may be continued by further subamendments and all that sort of thing. But even so, Mr. Speaker, we do have to have regard for the rules. The rules which were there when we started, which we have observed thus far, must be the rules throughout the debate.

May I draw Your Honour's attention to citation 201 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which was quoted by Mr. Deputy Speaker when he ruled on the amendment to the main motion on June 16 of this year. Citation 201 makes it clear that when there is an amendment before the house the debate may range over the whole subject. Let me read the last few words of citation 201:

> In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

I am hesitating for a moment while taking cognizance of the fact that Mr. Speaker himself has now taken the chair.

Before Your Honour came to the chair I was pointing out that this is another occasion where on principle I have to argue for something for which I wish I did not have to argue. Despite my feeling that I should like to see this debate brought to a conclusion I am contending that, when an amendment and a subamendment are before the house, it is in order for the debate to consider all of the propositions which are before the house at that time. This happens time and again in this house. I have just read from the latter part of citation 201, which indicates that that is clearly the case when what is before us is an amendment to the main motion. That was the citation on which Mr. Deputy Speaker rested his case when he made the ruling on July 16, 1964, which is to be found at pages 4382 and 4383 of Hansard. On that occasion there was a question raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) relating to the amendment to the main motion.

In case some on the government side, such as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), were to contend that this is a subamendment rather than an amendment, I would draw the attention of Your Honour and the house to citation 202 of Beauchesne, where there are quite a few comments about subamendments. I am not going to take the time of the house by reading all these comments, but in the middle of citation 202(2) is this sentence:

An amendment, when undergoing alteration, is therefore treated throughout as if it were a substantive motion upon which an amendment has been moved.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the present situation is analogous to the situation which we had on June 16. What we have before us is a subamendment to an amendment, and citation 202(2) says that in this instance we have, in effect, a main motion to which there is an amendment. If citation 201 applied on June 16 I suggest it applies now.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, there are other ways in which we might find it possible to shorten this debate. I would hope that self-discipline might apply and that we might be able to reach some kind of agreement. But as far as the principle and the rules are concerned, I suggest that the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Transport are taking the wrong track and I hope they will reconsider their position.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise and challenge an opinion on parliamentary procedure given in this house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is so well known as an authority on this subject. However, it did happen in the course of my law lectures—not too often but sometimes—that a student had drawn my attention to the fact that I might not have been completely accurate in one of my statements on the law, and I trust that here I might be allowed to take the same position today.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) has been allowed, with no objection on my part, to deal both with the substantive question on the resolution and with the matter of the principal amendment. I am not going to repeat what I said previously, but this was precisely in accordance with your ruling, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that the main amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition was in the nature of an alternative and in the particular case of an alternative the debate takes place on both the original question and the amendment concurrently. This is exactly the situation provided for by citation 201 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, which has just been referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and which deals with a special subject, that of an amendment where all the words after the word "that" are deleted and a whole new alternative is proposed. I think that very citation defeats the argument which is proposed to the Chair in that at the bottom of page 168 we read:

In that case—

In that special case.

—the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

The very citation is predicated on the assumption that when you have an amendment to a question debate is restricted to the amendment as being a substantive question. It is only in the case where an amendment is in the nature of an alternative that, as the citation says, the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment. But in the case of a subamendment we read the following in citation 202, paragraphs 1 and 2, which in my respectful opinion disposes completely of the question:

202 (1). To an amendment, when proposed from the Chair, an amendment may be moved; but only two amendments can be proposed at the same time to a question.

(2) As the proposal of an amendment to an amendment originates a fresh subject for consideration, the new question thus created must, to prevent confusion, be disposed of by itself. An amendment, when undergoing alteration, is therefore treated throughout as if it were a substantive motion upon which an amendment has been moved. The original motion, accordingly, is laid aside—

The original motion accordingly is laid aside.

—and the amendment becomes for the time a separate question to be dealt with, until its terms are settled.

The position is very simple, Mr. Speaker. As long as the amendment is not one that calls for deleting all the words after "that", as long as the amendment to the amendment is not an alternative, then the amendment becomes the principal question before the house and the subamendment is one that must be dealt with purely and simply. The main resolution is laid aside leaving the way open for a debate which is restricted to the subamendment now being proposed.

When the hon. member for Hamilton East spoke and made the speech to which it is said I raised no objection, I would point out that it will be remembered, as appears in Han- sard, that he spoke before the amendment to the amendment had been proposed and he therefore spoke under the ruling laid down by Your Honour when Your Honour decided that the main amendment was an alternative that was to be discussed at the same time as the main resolution. I rose on the occasion of the first speech made or attempted to be made in the house since the subamendment was moved for the purpose of objecting and suggesting that debate be narrowed to the subamendment. Therefore I did raise this question at the very first and only appropriate time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to repeat the argument advanced earlier because you were not present at the time. Epitomized, it is in general that presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. What has happened here is that objection has been raised by the Minister of Justice to the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) dealing in general with the flag problem. It has been said that if we were on the amendment the discussion could be wide ranging but that the subamendment delimits the discussion to the matters contained therein. I submit that is a completely untenable position and if followed could only mean the application of the guillotine unjustly and unfairly.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I regret having to rise a second time but I will be very brief. First of all, I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice the fact that his argument, if he wishes to be consistent, must apply at the time of supply motions, must apply at the time of the budget debate and must apply at the time of the throne speech debate because subamendments in varying forms are introduced on those occasions. Amendments are introduced, some of which strike out all of the words, and yet debate has always ranged far and wide within the ambit of the main motion and the subamendment.

Even if, and it is a very big "if" the Minister of Justice were right at this time and in effect the main motion is to be laid aside in that there is a sort of progression under citation 202 (2) whereby the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition in effect becomes a substantive motion and the subamendment becomes an amendment, nevertheless the subject matter is so wide within the terms of the flag debate that the hon. member for Danforth—

Mr. Churchill: Kent (Ont.).

Mr. Lambert: Kent (Ont.); I apologize to the hon. member—cannot be said to be transgressing in any way at all in his remarks. I might say to the Minister of Justice that if he is able to persuade Your Honour that the argument he has advanced is a valid one, then I suggest that in future His Honour will have the gravest difficulty in enforcing such a restrictive interpretation of the rules of debate. With the greatest respect Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you it will be impossible to do so.

Mr. Speaker: It is my pleasant duty to try to render a decision in the face of a great deal of interesting and valuable advice from experienced parliamentarians, but in reaching a conclusion I must base myself on the authorities as I try to understand them. I am much impressed by the arguments made by various members and also by the Minister of Justice. I should like to cut short my decision and come to the point but I think it might be of use at this time to review some of the factors which enter into a decision as to relevancy of debate. It is a fundamental rule that debate must be relevant to the question being considered.

Mr. Lambert: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is Your Honour reading from a prepared judgment, or citations in regard to this matter?

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I will have to take my own responsibility in this regard.

> Stated generally, no matter ought to be raised in debate on a question which would be irrelevant, if moved as an amendment, and an amendment cannot be used for importing arguments which would be irrelevant to the main question.

That comes from May, sixteenth edition, page 421.

> A member, while speaking to a question, may not introduce a matter which is irrelevant to that question.

That is May, sixteenth edition, page 451. Again, in May, sixteenth edition, at page 421, it is also stated:

> The effect of moving an amendment is, rather, to restrict the field of debate which would otherwise be open on a question. This is not obvious in the case of the type of amendment which proposes to leave out all the words of a question and substitute a different (but of course relevant) proposition. But it is true even in this case. For such an amendment, by concentrating debate on the main question and the amendment as alternative propositions, tends to exclude the consideration of other relevant alternatives.

Now, today we had Beauchesne cited, citation 202, fourth edition, subsection 2, which it might be advisable to read:

As the proposal of an amendment to an amendment originates a fresh subject for consideration, the new question thus created must, to prevent confusion, be disposed of by itself. An amendment, when undergoing alteration, is therefore treated throughout as if it were a substantive motion upon which an amendment has been moved. The original motion, accordingly, is laid aside; and the amendment becomes for the time a separate question to be dealt with, until its terms are settled.

Then, in the same citation, paragraph 3 reads as follows:

Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment; if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

Now, along the same lines, in May's sixteenth edition, pages 424 and 425, it is stated, and I quote:

Another proceeding may also be resorted to, by which an amendment is intercepted, as it were, before it is offered to the house in its original form, by moving to amend the amendment first proposed. In such cases the questions put by the Speaker deal with the first amendment as if it were a distinct question, and with the second as if it were an ordinary amendment. The original question is, indeed, for a time laid aside; and the amendment becomes, as it were, a substantive question itself. Unless this were done, there would be three points under consideration at once, viz. the question, the proposed amendment and the amendment of that amendment—

Therefore, if the principles concerning the relevancy of debate as set out in the two authorities, Beauchesne and May, which I have just quoted are to be observed, the debate is now to be restricted to the questions which must be submitted in the proposed plebiscite.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the greatest of deference, sir, I find it difficult to understand how Your Honour is in a position to have a judgment prepared, as was the case recently when the flag resolution was divided. I find this difficult to understand, with the greatest of deference, and the fact that the judgment was prepared in anticipation of the argument being raised causes me to appeal against your direction. This, to me, is quite incomprehensible.

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to get into a debate with anyone. There is no mystery about these things. After all, I have been to school and I am able to think for myself on occasion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How did Your Honour know in advance what was going to be raised this afternoon?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I will answer that question immediately. Of course I did not know what was going to be raised this afternoon, but it does not take a genius to come into the house and grasp the situation. It does seem to me quite reasonable, especially in view of the authorities which are set out in citation 202, subsection 2. As I understand the situation, and I can put it in a few words, the original motion was made, the amendment was then made and it gave the alternative method to the original motion. Now we have an amendment of the amendment. I must say I did not find any great difficulty in arriving at a decision. I may be wrong, but at least I am entitled to reach my own decision.

Now I should like to clear up another matter, because there is no mystery about this. In so far as the splitting of the flag resolution is concerned, it was not so simple to reach a conclusion, but I did considerable homework and made up my mind without benefit of advice from anyone except the man upon whom I am entitled to rely, namely the Clerk of the House of Commons.

The house has heard the decision of the Chair from which the right hon. Leader of the Opposition has appealed. All those in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

"The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling of the Chair which is as follows:

A point of order having been raised relative to the subamendment before the house the Chair ruled:

that in accordance with section 2 of citation 202 and also May's sixteenth edition at pages 424 and 425, when a subamendment is proposed the amendment is for the time being treated as a substantive question and in consequence thereof debate must be relative to the question referred therein—

Is it the pleasure of the house to confirm the Speaker's decision?

Mr. Lambert: That is not the ruling—that the Speaker's decision be maintained—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest of respect, I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. McIlraith: You cannot raise it at this time.

An hon. Member: It seems you have changed the ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West—

Mr. Lambert: If this is an interpretation of Your Honour's ruling, I rise because this decision will be recorded in Votes and Proceedings and may have some very clear implications for the future. I would submit to Your Honour that the purport of your ruling was that the debate would be limited to the points in the subamendment and not the amendment. It is not a question that they should be relevant, because relevancy and limitation are somewhat different.

I should like to have it clearly understood that we have the precise purport of Your Honour's ruling as expressed in this question which is now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Certainly the intention of this ruling is that debate shall be relevant to the subamendment. I think that is quite clear. Perhaps the wording here is a bit clumsy. Perhaps the house will give me two minutes in which to review it with the Clerk.

With the consent of all hon. members, I should like to be very clear on this because I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West that this is an important ruling.

A point of order having been raised to the effect that debate shall be relevant to the subamendment now before the house, the Chair ruled as follows:

That in accordance with section 2 of citation 202 and also of May's sixteenth edition at pages 424 and 425, when a subamendment is proposed the subamendment is for the time being the question before the house and in consequence thereof debate must be relevant to the question covered by the subamendment.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon when I was interrupted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) on a point of order I had been dealing with the march of the flags on parliament hill. Had he been able to curb his impatience for just one more sentence he would have learned that I would have said that the fact that both flags were presented on parliament hill in such numbers was an indication that no one knew an actual desire for a distinctive flag, and in my humble opinion a plebiscite would be necessary to make these flags known. Had he not been so impatient he would have learned that I did intend to stick directly to the terms of the subamendment. But I hasten to point out that in the very terms of the subamendment, which asks—

1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

—I shall show that there has been a mad shambles made of the business of this parliament; that there has been hypocrisy in the claim which is made for the desire for legislation; that this government did deliberately misrepresent the facts to the people regarding a distinctive flag; and that the utter chaos and impasse this parliament is faced with today can only be laid at the doorstep of one man, and one man only—

Some hon. Members: Diefenbaker.

Mr. Danforth: —who in a statement to the radio stated—no, I am speaking of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of this government now in power. This man said on the radio in an interview that it would be unfortunate if this question was made an election issue because it would cause an unfortunate division in the country. How naïve can a leader of the country be when he believes that this will not be an issue in an election, whether that election is held three months or three years from now. I have never experienced a time when the Canadian population, especially in my area, has been so aroused over an issue as they have other this one.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, are they in favour of the red ensign? They show in the most determined way that they are in favour. They believe that the only way this matter can be solved is by a plebiscite. For in spite of the legal arguments put up by government speakers that there should not be a plebiscite, I am of the opinion that since this issue was deliberately placed into partisan politics by a political party, the only way that we can get it out of politics and have a responsible decision made is by letting the people of the nation decide the matter for themselves.

Are they in favour of the red ensign? We have had claims of all kinds made in this house. Who is to know whether 83 per cent favour the red ensign or 3 per cent favour the red ensign? Who is to know whether 83 per cent favour a distinctive flag or 3 per cent favour a distinctive flag? We have heard claims made in this house, but have we any valid proof of them? I have heard hon. members opposite say that the ethnic groups in this country are solidly behind a new flag. I challenge this statement, because I have spoken, both in my own riding and in other ridings, with members of ethnic groups and I find that this matter is a sore subject with them. Many of these people come from countries where it is said that the disintegration of symbols and the taking away of traditions has been the first step in the downfall of a nation, the first step in a loss of independence. They do not want to see this happen here. They see this as a danger, and when hon. members opposite stand up and tell me that the ethnic groups are in favour of a distinctive flag—this distinctive flag—I challenge them to furnish me with some proof. So far I have not heard or seen any.

Then we hear the claim that the youth of the nation are in favour of a distinctive flag. This is a deliberate misrepresentation. I say to you, sir, that the youth of this country are in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag when the question is put to them; but the question "Are you in favour of this distinctive Canadian flag?" is never put to them.

I have had only one letter from a student, who told me that gentlemen are coming round to his school and asking: "Are you in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag? If you are, Canada should have one; write to your member of parliament and say that you want to support Mr. Pearson's flag". Mr. Speaker, is this the support that the youth of the country are giving this flag? I say that this is deliberate misrepresentation. The very fact that these people say "a distinctive flag" and not "this distinctive flag" causes me to think that there should be a plebiscite. Let the people decide between the flags. Let the people make up their own minds what they want.

I can appreciate the position the government is in. I can appreciate why the government does not want a plebiscite; it is beginning to realize the awful truth—that perhaps the majority of the people in the country do not want this Pearson flag. What a horrible position this issue has placed the government in. And if I ever had respect for the parliament of Canada it is now, Mr. Speaker, because with a power group in this House of Commons determined to impose this flag on us, and with the realization that perhaps the majority of the people of Canada do not want it, here in parliament a determined opposition has a chance to make itself heard —that is, if we are not placed in the position where we cannot debate, where we are limited in debate, or if we are not held down in the manner we experienced this afternoon.

Mr. McIlraith: Order.

Mr. Danforth: We want to get the facts on the record, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. gentleman is now making a reflection on a ruling by the Chair confirmed by the house. I suggest he confine himself to the question before the house.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I will, of course, abide by your ruling in this matter. But the fact still remains that when we want to put facts on Hansard we run into trouble. And why? Are the facts damaging?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Danforth: Is this government afraid of the truth? Can they not stand on their own feet? Can they not take the credit for doing great things for Canada? Are they afraid? Do they think the flag issue is of such magnitude that the government is going to stand or fall on it? Is this what they are afraid of? Is this why we are having violent opposition to this flag?

I will deal with another point: Are you in favour of the three maple leaves flag?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: Hon. members opposite applaud. If the people of this country want or could want the three maple leaf flag, why must the government put on a public relations campaign to sell this flag? We speak of the traditions of the Canadian flag. What tradition can be found on the posterior of a bikini bathing suit on television? What tradition can be found on a blanket of a racehorse? What tradition can be found on the dresses of three college students? Are these the traditions of the Canadian flag we are asked to adopt? Is this the way?

This afternoon we heard in the house about 100,000 bumper stickers. Is this the way we earn a Canadian flag? This is college calisthenics. This is in the same category as the colouring books, the pigeons and all the rest of it. The people of Canada will not accept this.

Miss LaMarsh: Simmer down.

Mr. Danforth: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) says "simmer down". I am glad she made that interjection, Mr. Speaker. In the campaign she came into my riding—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I will change my words. I will say that I wish to thank the minister because if it had not been for her remarks about the Canadian red ensign, remarks which ensured my re-election to the House of Commons, my campaign would have been much more difficult.

Miss LaMarsh: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member, who has now said I made remarks with respect to the red ensign, to produce proof of same in the house. It is not true that at any time within the county of Kent I made a speech on that particular subject. My remarks were directed more particularly with respect to the voting record of my hon. friend previously and not the flag at that time. I challenge him to produce such evidence before he makes such allegations.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to get into a personal argument with my hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Danforth: —but perhaps she will recall a certain tea party where questions were asked on the red ensign—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Lambert: Well, now, wait a minute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I am sure the hon. member would not want to continue too long in this vein and will soon get back to the resolution before us.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that has been raised, surely I have the right to answer a question posed to me by the minister.

Mr. Lambert: On a phony point of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. gentleman does have the right to reply. I was only suggesting to him that possibly he would not stay too long on this particular topic and that he would get back to the motion before the house.

Mr. Danforth: I do not have to stay too long on it because the candidate was asked a question on the red ensign and he hedged, but the hon. lady did not hedge and that is the reason I am here today.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I remember no occasion, except for one which was a private matter, when my hon. friend was present at any meeting at which I was present. I assume my hon. friend knows the rules of the house and that when he makes such remarks he makes them on his honour, and challenges remarks which I make on my honour as a member of the house.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to let the matter drop. The minister has made her statement and I have had the opportunity to make my statement. I rely on my statement and if necessary will furnish proof of my statement. Mr. Speaker, because of the fact statements have been made that this is a deliberate concession to the province of Quebec, because statements have been made that the government has sold out, because all these statements cast doubt on this country of ours and could create a division, I sincerely believe that the only way in which these doubts can be resolved is to have a plebiscite based on the subamendment and let the people show whether or not they are in favour of this new Canadian flag. I am convinced that the people of the province of Quebec are unjustly accused—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: —because all they are doing is asking the government to live up to its campaign promises, and nobody in Canada should be penalized for that. Unless we have a vote of this nature we have no idea whether the majority of people in Quebec, Ontario or any other province are in favour of this flag or the red ensign, or a combination of compromise, or perhaps the one maple leaf flag.

I am very sincere and most serious about this matter because, as I have stated before, the people of Canada are very much concerned about the outcome and about the way the matter has been handled. Too many people are being unjustly accused of acts for which they are not responsible. There are accusations and counter accusations and this problem must be solved. Here in parliament we must find a method of solving it that will work to the advantage and meet the wishes of the majority of the Canadian people.

If the people of Canada are given a chance to make their views known I believe they will not accept one flag of one man, of one particular party. There is too much of the future of Canada at stake. I am absolutely amazed at the number of people in this country who are concerned about the fact that any man in Canada would dare to remove the crosses from the Canadian flag. Why do they want to remove the crosses? People take a very serious view of this. Where are we going in the design of this flag?

May I say I hope a way can be found out of this impasse. Let the people decide. Is the government afraid? Do you not dare to let the people decide?

Mr. Favreau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that the decision which was rendered, appealed and confirmed after appeal, is so fresh in our minds that we have no reason to have forgotten it and we should not depart from it. Under that decision the question is not whether or not we should have a plebiscite.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, it is.

Mr. Favreau: This is a matter which is theoretically assumed on the basis of the decision. The only question is, granted we should have a plebiscite, are the four questions submitted in the subamendment proper for inclusion in the questionnaire? I submit respectfully that all discussion of whether we should have a plebiscite instead of a vote by the responsible members of parliament is out of order on the basis of the decision rendered this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order we heard the ruling this afternoon and Mr. Speaker read from Beauchesne. We do not need to repeat those passages. I have read Beauchesne as well, and the rule says that when there is a motion in front of the house and an amendment and a subamendment the main motion in effect is set to one side, the amendment becomes the substantive motion and the subamendment is in amendment of that. According to the rules the amendment plus the subamendment are the subject for debate—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lambert: That is what you argued this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: —so the hon. member is within his rights in talking about the value of a plebiscite.

Mr. Danforth: This is the second time I have been interrupted. I have tried to abide by the ruling and keep directly within the terms of the subamendment. I would say this. The subamendment asks if you are in favour of the Canadian red ensign or of the three maple leaf design. We have heard hon. members state why they are not in favour of the red ensign. I listened to their deliberations quite respectfully in silence, because I was interested in hearing their views. I have come to the conclusion that when they make their choice they will be doing something that no enemy of Canada has ever been able to do, that is lower the red ensign.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Danforth: I will go one step further, Mr. Speaker. I can say when they make their choice I will be wondering if it is not pure irony that the mad pursuit of this change will settle nothing. The province of Quebec will still fly the flag of Quebec; the province of Ontario will still fly the red ensign; the province of Newfoundland will fly the union jack and British Columbia will fly the union jack. This is an impasse. This is a horrible situation in which Canada finds itself. I hope there will be statesmen in this house who will stand up and say what they believe is best for Canada rather than what is best for a local headline.

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): At this stage of the debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put forward a few of my views on this question, a question which should be at least of some concern to all Canadians. I am very much aware that it is of vital concern to a great number, and the indications that I have received from my part of the country are to the effect there is little or nothing wrong with our present flag. As a matter of fact, it has been and still is flown very proudly.

It is a matter of regret that this question has come before the country at this time when some elements seem to be in a state of unrest with regard to racial and economic matters. It seems to me that changing our flag at this time, especially in the manner that it is being pursued, will not ease tensions or create unity. Much of our national and historic pride is wrapped up in historic symbols which are now displayed on our flag, the Canadian red ensign.

I cannot believe that the majority of the people of this country wish to destroy the symbols and historic attachment for those symbols for which so many young men and women suffered and gave their all. I do not suggest that these young people went to war only because of a flag. They did so to fulfil their heartfelt obligations to the principles they have inherited and went quite prepared to lay down their lives to defend them. If the youth of this country feel that these historic symbols are no longer important, and I do not believe for one minute that they do —as a matter of fact, indications reaching me are to the contrary—then it must be because our educational system has failed to indoctrinate them with an appreciation of what has gone before. After all, education is an accumulation of what has been revealed in the past.

I was born in this country and under our present flag. During my lifetime, I have experienced some of the difficulties which one would expect to encounter in a growing and changing country. However, never once have I blamed these difficulties on my forebears, or the symbols which they produced. I still have to be convinced that the offspring of any race, whether born in this country or adopting this country and truly understanding the principles for which our symbols stand, would willingly seek to destroy them.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, some compromise is necessary and, as a legislator, I must not close my mind to this possibility. But in the light of the strong feelings evident on the measure which is before this house today, I beg of the Prime Minister and his government that they reconsider this matter. After all, I am sure that if those with strong views had an opportunity to air their views and to hear the strong views of others, no matter how contrary, all concerned would feel much better.

Before this house at the moment is an amendment and subamendment. These two amendments taken together, if accepted, would refer the choice of a flag to the people themselves. Since the people already have a flag, there is no urgency and a plebiscite could be conducted conveniently and without cost, during the next federal election.

In closing, I again appeal to reason, because in this case time is not necessarily of the essence. Should this house vote on this matter without the expression I have referred to and our symbols of the past disappear, I shall deeply mourn their passing. I commend to all people words which are contained in the new brochure of parliament issued on the occasion of Canada's recent birthday. I quote:

> Walk proudly through the home of all our freedoms. Feel yourself welcomed. Stand silently amid the brave, proud ghosts of men who forged our nation. Look thoughtfully on word-drenched walls, thick with a hundred years of history. Breathe deeply of an air that is, to you and yours, the very breath of life itself—for being Canadian, your breath of life is freedom. Guard carefully this heritage, that freedom's house may stand.

I emphasize the last line by repeating it:

> Guard carefully this heritage, that freedom's house may stand.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I had decided some time ago to take part in this debate and I thought it would be useful to prepare some remarks on the general scope of this subject concerning a national flag and the events that led to the present situation.

However, since there was an attempt to stifle us and since the situation has changed a little, I shall, therefore, change my speech.

Now, I accept the ruling given by the Chair although I do not agree with it at all. The Chair can impose a ruling upon us but not its reasoning. Therefore, I hope the house will not have cause to regret the decision made this afternoon. Let us get back to the subject now before us.

[Text]

Just in case somebody has some observations in regard to what they feel are the limitations of this afternoon's decision I would suggest that the first paragraph of the subamendment be read and it will be seen that the subamendment cannot stand by itself. It says:

> —that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following—

There is a reference to a prior clause. There is full discussion of a plebiscite "and that such a plebiscite" should contain certain questions.

Notwithstanding the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) there is no doubt whatever in my mind that both the amendment and the subamendment may be discussed, and that was the purport of the ruling, that the discussion should be relevant, and that is what I intend to be and what my colleagues intend to be.

During the course of certain remarks this afternoon it was indicated by some hon. members that they felt there had been sufficient discussion. Hon. members opposite are quite prompt to try to close down debate. We see comments in the press and elsewhere; and across the way they use that word "filibuster," which sounds so nice. But you know, Mr. Speaker, there are those in a democratic regime who believe in freedom of speech. Hon. members opposite profess they believe in freedom of speech as long as they are speaking or they intend to speak, but if anybody else wishes to express an opposite point of view, then of course the discussion is closed. These comments were made this afternoon and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is right to comment upon them. I have said what I want to say about them, but let it be quite clear that I reject them entirely.

I would like to hear the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) and a lot of others get us and speak on this question, and that brings me to the question, why a plebiscite? Do hon. members feel that they themselves are expressing the views of their constituents, that because of certain personal characteristics—

Mr. Favreau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is my duty, so long as it seems quite clear that the ruling made by the Speaker is not being respected and applied, to rise on a point of order, and I shall so long as I think I should. The decision which was rendered by the Chair this afternoon, and which I repeat was appealed and confirmed on appeal, was to the effect that the discussion is to be limited to the subamendment. The only question before us presently is whether or not, if there should be a plebiscite, it would be in order and appropriate that the four questions submitted by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) be included in the questionnaire. This is the only point before this house, and what the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has just said is that he intends to depart from the ruling which was rendered this afternoon. I submit respectfully on the face of his very assertion that any part of any speech in the house which does not concern that particular question ought to be ruled out of order.

Mr. Lambert: Well, Mr. Speaker, I reject entirely the argument of the Minister of Justice, and if he would read the subamendment he would see the word "plebiscite" is contained in it, and that is what I intend to discuss.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was the feeling of the Chair that the remarks being made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) at this point were rather of an introductory nature and that he would get to speak to certain aspects of the plebiscite in due course. That is why the Chair did not feel it should intervene at this point. I know the hon. member who has the floor, now knowing the purport of the decision rendered by the house this afternoon, will want to abide by it.

Mr. Lambert: I think I fully understand the purport of the ruling this afternoon as well as the Minister of Justice. I also think I know my rules a little better than he does.

In so far as the plebiscite is concerned, I maintain that the Minister of Justice himself is not one who can personally say that he can determine for the people of his constituency that there shall be one design, and that one design only shall be the flag of this country. I fail to see how an hon. member, on such a matter so personal to himself and to the people, can say that the flag shall be one design and one design only. That is all that is being presented to us. This, in essence, is the only choice before the members of the house, either to accept the flag or bring about the downfall of the government.

The Minister of Justice may think he has curbed debate as a result of what he did this afternoon, but what he has done is actually to split speeches into two or three, because these points will be brought out.

Mr. Favreau: At the proper time.

Mr. Lambert: Well, if the minister was trying to improve, or sort of get the debate moving along, I can assure him from experience that what he has done is merely going to reverse that.

Mr. Robichaud: Is that a threat?

Mr. Lambert: The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) asks, is that a threat. He used to sit over on this side and we could hear him quack quacking from the top of the fence. That is what he is doing now. He is not even in his seat. Let us not hear from the Minister of Fisheries.

In so far as what should appear in a plebiscite, the first question we propose is, are the people of Canada in favour of the red ensign? That is a very simple question. It is not like some of the polls that were taken during the course of the last few months which asked, "Are you in favour of a red ensign as against a distinctive national flag?" They did not say what was a distinctive national flag. It was the red ensign against the field. That is one question we are asking, and from the mail I have received I can assure hon. members that there are great numbers who insist upon the red ensign. They have the right to do so, the same way as other people have the right to insist on another design.

I do not wish to force a design on any person. This is something which is personal, something which derives from family antecedents, the part of the country in which one was brought up, or in which one now lives, or perhaps because of military experience. I myself was profoundly impressed by the red ensign this summer while with the maple leaf tour in June from Caen to Nijmegen. I attended the ceremonies at the Vimy memorial and on that particular day, and in that particular setting, with the Canadian red ensign flying across the Vimy memorial, the effect was most moving. It was a proud flag, joined there with what is possibly the proudest memorial to the men of this country who gave their lives for freedom. It was a symbol of Canada. That is how it struck me on that occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert: The red ensign was flying, also, at the cemeteries in Normandy, in the Pas de Calais area, at Ypres—all historic names—as well as at the cemetery where my own comrades lie. Then again, it was flying at Canada square in Dieppe and at the Dieppe cemetery.

This is how it affects some people. I will admit there are others who do not share these sentiments. My mail indicates a divergence of opinion. It is predominantly in favour of the red ensign, though, as has been shown by other polls. But I come to the conclusion, and I have tried to be as fair as I can, that the division within the country is very close as between the red ensign and a—I repeat the word "a"—distinctive national flag. Thus, if the three maple leaf design which is now proposed by the government were to have support of only 55 per cent of the people of the country, or 51 per cent, does this mean it is likely to command the support and affection and the loyalty of the rest of the people of Canada? This is what bothers me with regard to the division which has been indicated during this debate.

I have been talking about the red ensign. The next suggestion is a modified form of red ensign showing the British connection by the union jack and the French partnership in this country by the symbol of the fleur de lis. This may be one form to be considered. There are others which are proposed. We have seen a great number of designs combining the union jack with the fleur-de-lis on a red background. Let it be known that the red background gives a certain dignity and, shall we say, posture to a flag which is not apparent in many other designs.

The third design mentioned is that put forward by the government, the three maple leaf design. This whole flag business has been introduced at this time in order to give the country what some people have sought, namely a distinctive national flag. But we have to look at the word "distinctive". What does it mean? I looked it up in Webster's dictionary. The definition given is "Distinguishing from others; characteristic". Take the first meaning—"distinguishing from others". Is it suggested that the red ensign is not distinguishable from others? I have here a chart of the flags of 110 nations, members of the United Nations in December, 1962. If we look at this chart from the point of view of whether the red ensign is distinguishable from others, let me say there is not one flag that approaches it. This cannot be said for many other of the flags which appear on this chart. I could show hon. members many instances where there are almost identical flags with colours reversed or a slight change in design. Here they are—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I bring to the attention of the hon. member that it is not customary in this house to use documents, or exhibits, if I may use that term, of the type the hon. member is now using. He showed this exhibit and the Chair said nothing. But I know he would not wish to use it extensively. The hon. member might refer to a recent ruling of Mr. Speaker when flags were exhibited in the house. At that time Mr. Speaker ruled that they should not be so exhibited. I feel it would be very bad practice if members were to bring into the house for the purpose of supporting their arguments exhibits of the type the hon. member is now using in his speech.

Mr. Lambert: I realize certain difficulties which might arise if flags were spread all over desks, as was done on the occasion of the recent ruling, but I think a comparison between bananas and oranges is being made here. On the other hand, I am faced with a printing problem. I could ask that this chart be appended as an appendix to Hansard but the colours would not come out and therefore I could not make my point.

I have a list of the similarities here but I shall not go into the details. May I simply indicate that many of these flags are similar in appearance. And I am talking now about national flags; I am not talking about merchant marine flags or secondary flags where there might well be similarities. After all, because of the limitations imposed by the designs themselves, there are bound to be some similarities.

Let us consider the other part of the definition—"characteristic". Take the three maple leaf design. First of all, I am told on good authority that this is a botanical impossibility. Let us consider whether this design is characteristic of all Canada. I am only repeating an argument which is well known, but—

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lambert: Oh well, I know the hon. gentleman is the authority who put them together. May I suggest that the maple leaf is not characteristic of Canada as a whole. It is only characteristic to a limited region of the country. I think one could make as good an argument that because the buffalo once roamed in millions and millions on the western prairies, yet did not exist in eastern Canada, the buffalo is as characteristic to Canada as a whole as the maple leaf is to Canada as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, there is some difficulty in arguing that the maple leaf is characteristic to Canada as a whole.

Mr. Matheson: Why did the Meighen government recommend that the maple leaf emblem be adopted?

An hon. Member: You have already had the opportunity of making a speech.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member why the Meighen government recommended to His Majesty, King George V, that the maple flag—three leaves on one stem—should be the emblem of Canada?

Mr. Lambert: I feel there is some difficulty in associating some of these representations with any particular party or government. If one looks back to the antecedents of the red ensign one will find them in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald, and in various forms until 1904 when it was taken down by a minister in the Laurier administration. The hon. member has referred to a particular administration and I will mention another. The red ensign was taken down and replaced by the union jack during the Laurier administration.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the aesthetics of the maple leaf design. I should like now to deal with the fourth alternative. Perhaps I should not refer to it as an alternative because my hon. friend, shall we say a linguistic purist, suggests that the four choices should not be considered as alternatives, and I concede him that point. In any event, I find the fourth choice, the single maple leaf design, preferable to the three leaf design. Unfortunately the three leaf design has been supported by what I consider to be a very artificial argument, that is, that one leaf represents the Anglo-Saxon population.

Mr. Matheson: Nonsense.

Mr. Lambert: One leaf of the three leaf design represents the Anglo-Saxon side, one leaf represents the French side and the third leaf represents the other people of Canada.

Mr. Matheson: Nonsense.

Mr. Lambert: It was your own Postmaster General who used that argument.

Mr. Matheson: He was wrong.

Mr. Lambert: You say the minister was wrong, and I agree with you. This argument is a most artificial and unsupportable one, yet is the one that has been trotted out on occasion by the government to buttress this choice.

Mr. Matheson: Oh, no.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, the reasons I have given, make it possible for me to believe a far better and more acceptable design is that of the single maple leaf which represents unity of Canada. I would think far better of something which represents oneness or unity in Canada than of something which will permanently imprint a division in the minds of the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: It would only do so in your mind.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, someone suggests it would only imprint this division in my mind, but I suggest that was the reaction to the argument used by a government spokesman in respect of the choice of this symbol.

I think the official opposition has been eminently fair in putting forward these four choices. We have not rejected the choice of the government. We feel it should be put forward to the people as one of the four choices. The opposition has accepted as a choice a design with one maple leaf, which seems to have had its most enthusiastic sponsorship from hon. members to my immediate left. We have also accepted the red ensign as a choice. We have accepted also a modified form of the red ensign. We have done so in order to give the people of this country a chance to have some features included which they would like, and eliminate others which they feel should not be included. I think the opposition has been eminently fair in regard to the four choices.

I find myself, representing a large and populous riding, in a great dilemma in so far as the choice of a flag is concerned. Mr. Speaker, I conducted a poll in which I asked the constituents of my riding the following questions: Are you in favour of the proposed maple leaf flag? Are you in favour of the red ensign? Are you in favour of some other distinctive national flag? Those questions reasonably approximate the questions to be put to the people on this plebiscite. I chose the individuals to whom I wrote in this regard in an attempt to have a good cross section of the constituents from the standpoint of age, income level, ethnic origin, religion, urban and rural, yet answers were quite clear. In so far as the question in respect of a distinctive flag other than the red ensign, of approximately 100 people answering, 48 were against and 38 were in favour. In so far as the question regarding the red ensign, 58 were in favour and 32 were against. Approximately 60 people were against the adoption of a maple leaf design and 25 were in favour.

I also asked whether this whole question in respect of a distinctive Canadian flag would be divisive or promote national unity. Of approximately 100, 75 thought it would be divisive and 25 thought it would promote national unity. The people contacted were evenly split as to whether a referendum should be held or not.

Mr. Speaker, I think the poll I conducted was very fair. I think the method I used was more conducive to an accurate result than asking the people the one question: Are you in favour of the red ensign as against a distinctive national flag? A national poll has indicated that more people are in favour of the red ensign than of an unknown distinctive national flag.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the many other points I wish to speak on should be reserved for another occasion. I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. We have given a fair choice to the people of Canada. We have been fair from a political point of view. The three maple leaf design has been politically motivated, or at least it was born under partisan political conditions. We have accepted the N.D.P. suggestion as one choice, because we do not want to make a partisan political proposal in respect of a flag. To do so would be entirely wrong. I do not believe a national flag of Canada should be born under partisan political pressures; yet this is the method proposed to us and the method by which it is to be adopted. There was no choice offered. I should say there was a choice: Take it or leave it.

On that note, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the people of Canada should be asked to adopt a flag on a take it or leave it basis, and it is for that reason I ask hon. members to support the subamendment.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr. Lambert: That suggestion is much better than any made by the hon. member who sits there muttering in his beard.

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Lambert: Certainly.

Mr. Drouin: Could the hon. member tell us what would be his views on the flag issue if he had to reply to the four questions suggested by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) in a referendum? What would be his opinion then?

Mr. Lambert: At present, as representative of my constituents, I fully support the red ensign.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Matheson: Would the hon. member permit a question. He referred during the course of his remarks to a number of historic battles which occurred in the first world war. He also referred to his own comrades, and we know he is a veteran of the Dieppe raid. Did I understand him to suggest that we ever saw action under the Canadian red ensign before June 1944?

Mr. Lambert: I certainly did not. I said that I saw the sites of those battles in 1964, with the red ensign there representing Canada. There was never any suggestion that it was otherwise. But I certainly never made any pretence that I rode into battle under the red ensign. Whoever does so is going to draw fire right away. It would be ludicrous. After all, we are not back in the fourteenth century.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I am appreciative of the privilege to rise in this chamber at this time to make my contribution to this debate. Someone has said that no question since that old contentious question years ago out west—the execution of Louis Riel, who incidentally would not have been executed had he not previously caused Thomas Scott to be hanged—has been more controversial in this divided country than the question of this Canadian flag. I am sure you would agree that that is true. I am not taking a pessimistic view of the matter, because I think in the end good thinking and the proper use of compromise in the interests of all the people concerned will prevail, and that we will work out a solution to this contentious question.

Today this modern question of the flag is born of the same reasons that that old question out west was born. The former controversy, now far back in antiquity, was a needless development. It was born of bad politics, of hatred, of one man's lust for power and a certain amount of misunderstanding. A lot of those things apply today in this debate. Some men become so imbued with a lust for power that they are determined to ride roughshod over the sentiments, civil rights, institutions and emblems of God fearing citizens. Is it any wonder that this party, the Queen's loyal opposition, is taking an active part in this debate when these dangers are present? Riding roughshod—that is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is trying to do, and will do, if he can get away with it. His politics—those of the Prime Minister and his party—are bad at the present time, Mr. Speaker. He and his party as well as all other parties promised the people a distinctive Canadian flag.

At this point I want to cite the bad politics, the shiftiness, the deception finally and actually implied in this promise. The people of Canada—and I mean the majority of the people of Canada—calmly agreeing in the last election campaign to this, did not expect the resulting so-called distinctive flag to be one from which both the union jack and the fleur-de-lis would be absent. I am sure that every hon. member here will agree that that was not the general expectation of the people of this country. They expected to see those two old and honoured emblems, the union jack and the fleur-de-lis, on the promised so-called distinctive flag. But what a political play hon. members opposite have made of that word "distinctive", Mr. Speaker. Did Your Honour—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate very much to interrupt the hon. member. His speech is, of course, very interesting but before he goes on I feel I should read to him for his guidance the ruling of Mr. Speaker, which was sustained by the house this afternoon; I am sure the hon. member would want to limit his remarks in the light of the decision. His decision is in these words:

> That in accordance with section 2 of citation 202 and also May's sixteenth edition at pages 424 and 425, when a subamendment is proposed the subamendment is for the time being the question before the house and in consequence thereof debate must be relevant to the question covered by the subamendment.

I realize that the hon. member has to start somewhere and that to begin with his remarks have to be general. However, I would suggest that eventually he should come to the point of the question before the house.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, My remarks though general at the start, are not at the present time general. With all due respect and courtesy to you the paragraph I am citing now from my notes applies to paragraph 2 of the subamendment, which reads:

> Are your in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?

That is the subject about which I am talking at the present time. I am sure that simplifies that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not wish to argue —indeed I cannot—with the hon. member, but surely his argument cannot be that because there is a reference in the subamendment to the Canadian red ensign he can say anything about the Canadian red ensign. The question before the house is, what should be contained in the proposed plebiscite; whether the plebiscite proposed should include certain specific questions. My understanding of the ruling made by the house this afternoon is to the effect I have just stated. In any event I have read the decision which was made. I am not trying to make a general ruling, but if there is any difficulty I would be pleased at that time to give my opinion whether or not the hon. member is in order.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect to Your Honour, if you were listening to my words you would see that I am in order. Did Your Honour or any other member of this house ever anticipate, previous to our being informed of the Prime Minister's private choice of the trifoliate twig on a bedsheet as the Canadian flag, that it would be an emblem devoid of the emblems of the two great peoples who founded and developed this country? This relates to the second paragraph of the subamendment which asks:

> Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?

If you can make anything else out of that, Mr. Speaker and hon. members, it is beyond all comprehension of any parliamentary procedure ever invented by British institutions and handed down to us today.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Don't stop; read on.

Mr. Alkenbrack: You will get your chance to make your speech. It is too bad the hon. member does not take part in this debate. I think the answer to the question I just asked is no. What is it, Mr. Speaker, that motivates this policy? I think I can tell you. In his hunger for political histrionics and mastery of the stage, and for a sweep of 75 possible seats in Quebec, he would sell the birthright and the sacred symbols of the other remaining nine provinces. Hon. members will all remember Cowper, the famous English poet of the 18th century. I think his words apply this evening. He said:

> The age of virtuous politics is past and we are deep in that of cold pretence. Those we thought were patriots are grown too shrewd to be sincere, and we too wise to trust them.

What a state of affairs this country is going through at the present time. I urge my colleagues from Quebec, and I hope they are here in goodly numbers, not to be seduced by this gesture on the part of the Prime Minister and his administration, for there will be a day of payment if you are. There will be a future price you will have to pay if you dance to his fiddle.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In spite of the objections raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox a moment ago to the call to order from the Chair, I feel that the hon. member is completely irrelevant at the moment and I would advise and entreat him to keep in mind the decision of the house, not necessarily the decision of the Chair, which was reached by a vote this afternoon. The decision of the house is that the question before us now is the subamendment and certainly I cannot see how the hon. member can relate the points he is now making to the subamendment. They might be very relevant to the main question or might even be relevant to some extent to the amendment, but quite sincerely I do not think they are relevant to the amendment.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City last Thursday is in these words:

—and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following—

Then four possibilities of choice by the people are listed including the red ensign, the red ensign modified, the three maple leaves flag and the one maple leaf flag. Surely you are not saying, Mr. Speaker, that anyone speaking on the subamendment cannot discuss the advantages of voting for any one of these flags and compare the method of a plebiscite on four possibilities with the method suggested by the Prime Minister. If you were to so rule then surely there would be no point in a member saying he was in favour of the subamendment, and saying nothing else. I think a member should be able to compare the plebiscite method with the method proposed by the government and to point out the advantages with regard to the choice of flags. Surely if an hon. member prefers one of them he can, with all due respect, give us his opinion. Surely he is not going to be deprived of the opportunity of voicing his opinion as to which flag he prefers among the four listed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think it is rather useless for the Chair to try to argue with every member who disagrees with a ruling made by the house, but to my mind the question before the house now is the propriety of putting certain specific questions in a plebiscite. To my mind that is obvious and I would suggest that as much as possible the hon. member deal with that matter. As an example I would cite the speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton West which to mind appeared to be relevant and I considered it to be relevant because it dealt with these four specific points. If the hon. member will frame his speech within those confines I am sure he will have no difficulty with the Chair.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Clause 2 of the subamendment is in these words:

Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?

We have been discussing the lack of symbols on the suggested new flag, such as we expected would show the heritages of the two founding races. I exhort my hon. friends on the back rows of the Liberal benches, who by supporting this implacable flag policy of their leader remind me of a herd of trained seals on an ice floe that is rapidly breaking up, that they had better leave while they can.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Because of their actions their ice floe is breaking up. It is melting away and it is soon going to become uninhabitable in the gulf stream of truth. I appeal to them, Mr. Speaker, because of the untenable national position of their party as a result of the new low they have reached in the opinion of the majority of the people of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I swing back to clause 1, "are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign". What a play they have made on the word "distinctive". According to the dictionary "distinctive" means "marking a difference or separation". That is an ominous explanation, for by playing on the word "distinctive", which has been endlessly repeated by the Liberal party for the past year or so, they have certainly marked out a separation in this country. That honoured flag, the Canadian red ensign, is more than distinctive. It might better be termed "distinguished". It marks out no difference or separation in this country but nobly represents the symbols, aspirations and personal patriotism of every citizen of Canada.

What are the attributes of this distinguished flag? What are the synonyms of "distinguished"? Prominent, conspicuous, noted, glorious, illustrious and famous. Hon. members will agree that right here on the hill the appreciative lenses of thousands of cameras are pointed every day to capture the glory of this flag high up on the peace tower.

I swing to clause 3 of the subamendment, "Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design"?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Alkenbrack: This reminds me of a comparison that took place right out on the east lawn. On the day that the Prime Minister authorized the trial flying of his flag, the three maple leaves design, on a special pole in front of the Senate, a friend of mine, Mr. Brian Blackstock of Toronto, a schoolteacher, was showing two university professors from Texas the sights of parliament hill. They inquired as to what the meaning was of this flag flying on a pole while at the same time the Canadian red ensign was flying on the peace tower. Their comment was: Surely you are not going to adopt this for your country's flag in preference to the beautiful banner flying from above. They said that to them the new flag looked like the flag of one of the emerging nations of Africa or resembled a flag of commerce, advertising a product for sale.

An hon. Member: Soap flakes.

An hon. Member: Imperial oil.

An hon. Member: Molson's ale.

An hon. Member: Canada Packers.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The youth of Canada, many of whom know the meaning of the component features of the red ensign, are asking the government and parliament especially to maintain this distinguished flag as the flag of our country. There are thousands of our people, especially those who in their youth have been boy scouts, girl guides or wolf cubs, who have learned the meaning of this flag and its features. They have learned to honour and respect this flag. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, who the base, arch conspirator would be on the right hand side of this chamber over which you preside who in years past has told the youth of this country and indicated to them by the example of action and use, "This is your country's flag flying over this hill and the public buildings across the country, the Canadian ensign", but who now says "This is not your country's flag; I have another one which I ask you to honour from now on". This is just like taking good parents away from a child, substituting another set of parents, and asking the child immediately to love and honour the new parents while the real ones still exist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Hon. members opposite may laugh, but I think it is a good comparison. The youth of this country say, do not give us a meaningless flag; do not give us this pale creation which is one man's choice.

This is the reason we need a plebiscite.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

You have already called to order several times the hon. member who has the floor. Now this afternoon, a question was put to the house and the house asked that we restrict our discussion to the subamendment now before us. So I wonder how many times the Chair will have to repeat the same thing. The comments being made by the hon. member who has the floor are completely irrelevant. Therefore, I feel you should ask the hon. member to stick to the subamendment.

[Text]

Mr. Smallwood: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe the hon. member has any right to get up and start lecturing our members. He has no point of order at all.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to bring to your attention at this time the discrimination shown by the Chair against members on this side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: In support of my statement I can quote no better authority than your ruling, Mr. Speaker, of May 4. I quote from Hansard, page 2892:

> My understanding of the practice in these debates is to consider both the amendment and the subamendment at the same time and not to be too restrictive so as to eliminate all discussion which might not be strictly relevant to the subamendment.
> I think we should take into account that in order to be acceptable the subamendment must relate in some way to the main amendment. This would indicate that remarks of the type now being made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano are relevant.

These two paragraphs I have just quoted from your remarks indicate that the Liberal members of this house are enjoying privileges which are tonight being denied the members on this side of the house. I do bring before you, sir, a very sound question of privilege.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize that the decision to which the hon. member refers was actually rendered by the Chair. I remind him also that the decision with which the Chair now has to contend is a decision of the house itself. The Chair was quoting, for the benefit of hon. members who had the floor from time to time, the decision reached by the house this afternoon.

In so far as discrimination is concerned, it seems to me that what the hon. member has quoted is proof of just the opposite. The decision which was reached at the time was really in favour of the hon. members who were speaking from the left of Mr. Speaker and was to allow them a little bit of latitude. I feel that at the moment the hon. member is entitled to some latitude. The reason I have interrupted from time to time was simply to quote the decision of the house for the guidance of all hon. members on both sides of the house.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Why then was the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) permitted to rise, and without recognition by the Chair, interrupt the hon. member in his remarks?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister without Portfolio rose on a point of order and the hon. member who had the floor yielded the floor by sitting down. The minister had a right to raise a point of order, just as the hon. member for Cape Breton South had a right to raise a point of order. I think we would make better progress and it would be to the advantage of all concerned if we allowed the hon. member to continue his remarks.

Mr. Smallwood: You keep quiet and listen over there; perhaps you will learn something.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I was talking about the request of the youth of this country to give them a live flag, a flag that could grow with the country. They say, do not give us a dead flag. This trifoliate flag cannot be added to. The three maple leaves on the white background are confined by the two blue bands at the end. This flag cannot grow. Whatever heraldic balance it possesses, that is the way it must stay down through the ages. We need a flag like the red ensign that has evolved, grown and developed with the country and whose make-up can accommodate further growth. The Northwest Territories and the Yukon will soon be provinces, so some day these provinces will need symbols on our flag.

Paragraph 3, Mr. Speaker, asks, are you in favour of the three maple leaf design? In looking over this scheme of collusion between the government and certain provincial components of the country, I note that hon. members on the government side have been most anxious to get the Prime Minister's flag through as quietly as possible. They reveal themselves by their own, individual actions. Orders have been given to their back benches: Do not debate the question; let the opposition founder against our rocks of silence; when the opposition carries on the debate long enough, then we will accuse them of obstruction. For some time now Liberal strategy has urged members to keep quiet regarding the flag, and this has been illustrated tonight.

Paragraph 2 of the subamendment asks, are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign and changes made thereon to show the main heritage of the founding races? We are urged not to say anything to hurt the feelings of Quebec because of the fear of dividing the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, how deceptively naïve can you get? How deceptively naïve are the occupants of the government benches? How gullible do they think we are? How gullible do they think the rest of the country is? There is a cause for every effect and this debate, no matter how long it may take, is the effect of a cause. The cause is the bad performance, the deceptive politics of this government. The cause has already divided the country as it has never been divided hitherto and the scars will take many years to heal.

Referring to paragraph 3 again, Mr. Speaker, and the three maple leaf design, I may say this:

Canada is often portrayed as a muscular Jack Canuck in high boots, tight breeches, khaki shirt open at the chest, and felt hat, a doughty, durable, indestructible character, the twentieth century epitome of the pioneer, and the indomitable spirit that built this country under the surveillance of law and the union jack and red ensign. But this portrayal is not the true Canada. Canada is fragile, as the Prime Minister has lately learned. Canada is a 4,000 mile assembly of many races, many regional interests, many creeds, each often on a different curriculum, but of course all studying at the same school of life, Canada, and of many varied economies, but all working together. That is what we should be doing here.

The Liberal party has hurt Jack Canuck and the picture of Jack as I have just given it. It has hurt this country and now, by this ill founded flag measure the Liberal government proposes to inflict more wounds on Canada, wounds that may never heal. I say to the Prime Minister, "Stay your knife, let the noble banner that with faith, justice, patience and charity helped build this country continue to wave over us and we will go on to greater unity and greater accomplishments." Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the end we can work out something that will suit all the people of this country.

I have mentioned the tactics of the government and the lack of debate from the government benches. If this trifoliate white sheet is any good, if it is worthy of succession as Canada's flag, one would assume it was worthy of support on the positive side of this debate. But no, it is a conspicuous fact that by the silence of most of the Liberal party—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that at this point he is beyond the limitations of the debate when he discusses whether there have been contributions or not from another part of the house.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I was just saying, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite evident this trifoliate flag gets little support from members on the Liberal benches.

Mr. Sharp: Let parliament decide.

Mr. Alkenbrack: The Toronto Telegram of Thursday, May 21, portrays the Canadian red ensign, our flag, trampled and torn, its flag staff shattered, lying on the muddy field of politics. It has no business there. The Prime Minister and his administration which put it there have much to answer for and will certainly pay for their actions when the people of this country are given the opportunity of judging their acts.

Why is it that more Ontario Liberals do not take part in this debate? I have here a clipping from the Campbellford Herald of Wednesday, July 29, showing a survey which reveals Northumberland county wants the ensign. The Cobourg Sentinel-Star conducted a survey and makes this comment:

> Mr. Foster Russell, editor of the Cobourg Sentinel-Star, in a recent editorial chided Dr. Jewett, member of parliament, for her stand on the Pearson flag issue, saying that she did not represent the wishes of her constituency in her stand for the discard of the red ensign.
> To prove his point, he conducted, at his own expense, a survey of the county, making a spot check of 662 citizens in a house to house canvass—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I think I have to try again to make the argument I made to the hon. member a moment ago, that although this might be relevant in another part of the debate it seems to me it is not relevant to the specific question before us now.

Mr. Alkenbrack: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, this clipping is relevant to clause 1, clause 3 and clause 4 of the subamendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair. It is the Chair's opinion that this article may be of great interest and may be relevant on some other occasion, but I believe that though it does relate in some way to either clause 1, clause 3 or clause 4 of the subamendment, that is not the point before the house. The question before the house is that the amendment be amended by adding thereto certain words, and the question is whether these words should be added to it or not; and I would ask the hon. member's co-operation.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, earlier Your Honour suggested that members might indicate the propriety—that was your word—of listing the four subjects for the plebiscite. The hon. member who now has the floor is indicating that there is a need to ask the question about the red ensign, because of the desire of the people to express their wishes on that. I took that to be the substance of the article he was reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The argument made by the hon. member is interesting but I still feel that it is a little far fetched for the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox to claim that what he is reading now is relevant to the subamendment before the house. I do not think it is necessary for me to read again the question before the house or the authorities cited by the Speaker this afternoon, but perhaps I might take one minute to refer to the main citation, No. 202(2) in Beauchesne's fourth edition, which states:

> As the proposal of an amendment to an amendment originates a fresh subject for consideration, the new question thus created must, to prevent confusion, be disposed of by itself. An amendment, when undergoing alteration, is therefore treated throughout as if it were a substantive motion upon which an amendment has been moved. The original motion, accordingly, is laid aside; and the amendment becomes for the time a separate question to be dealt with, until its terms are settled.

I have read the question which was put by Mr. Speaker this afternoon and on which there was a vote of the house. I think that the argument the hon. member is now making is not relevant to the question before the house.

Mr. Alkenbrack: In short, Mr. Speaker, the people of Northumberland, like the people of all our districts in that part of Ontario, want their wishes known in this chamber. The results of the survey were: ensign; 300; union jack 92; maple leaf 132, other flag 45, no opinion 57, total 626, which is almost five to one against the three leaf Pearson flag.

I am also convinced that this proposed new flag design is unacceptable to the people of Leeds, and I deplore the ill founded policy of nothingness, and nihilism, advocated by the hon. member for that riding. Of course, he being the architect and author of this three leaf flag, this heraldic hallucination—

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of privilege.

Mr. Alkenbrack: —which he and the Prime Minister will substitute—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Leeds has the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I think I have been gratuitously involved in this discussion and I think the hon. member, if he considers this matter with any honesty at all, appreciates there is no Pearson design, there is no Matheson design; there is simply the advice taken on the grant that was accepted by the former Conservative government and which is now the heraldic law of this nation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) was rising on a question of privilege. I doubt whether it was a question of privilege. The hon. member was making an argument, and I would point out that he has a right to rise later on in the debate to explain what he may have said in order to clear up what might have been a misrepresentation. But I do not think there is a question of privilege here and I would ask the speaker who has the floor to continue his remarks.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order with regard to an expression used by the hon. member for Leeds. He implied that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack) was not speaking with honesty and I would ask the hon. member for Leeds to withdraw that imputation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Certainly no hon. member can impute dishonesty to another member, and I am sure the hon. member for Leeds would wish to explain to the house that the words he used went beyond his thoughts and that he did not intend to impute dishonesty to the hon. member.

Mr. Matheson: Certainly I hasten to withdraw anything which would impute any suggestion of dishonesty to an hon. member who is also my friend and neighbour in Ontario. But I do think in fairness to myself I should be allowed to put this point before the house—that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I said a moment ago, the hon. member will have an opportunity to speak again in the course of this debate. If he feels there has been some misunderstanding or misinterpretation, he may speak again by way of explanation. He has now withdrawn any imputation which may have been contained in or inferred from his remarks and I suggest that the hon. member who now has the floor be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was discussing this heraldic hallucination, this piece of nothing which the hon. member for Leeds and the Prime Minister have substituted for something. That is all. I can agree that nihilism, or nothingness, is his doctrine and his forte. "Do away with everything we have found to be good" he says "and in its place let us have nothing". By the same Mathesonian token this means we should go further and formulate and adopt a new language having no connection with either French or English and no trace of tradition or old values. Hooray for the nihilistic new Liberal policy—nothing.

An hon. Member: That will suit the N.D.P.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I should like to point out to the government if they would avoid capsizing on the shoals of fact, that Canada is only as strong, as united, as unanimous and as happy as are the several provinces. One of the provinces namely Manitoba, in disagreement with the position taken by the government regarding the flag has already named the red ensign as its provincial flag. Seven other provinces are flying the red ensign from all their public buildings and their citizens fly it from the verandahs and rooftops as never before. Newfoundland, as is its ancient and honourable usage and custom flies that great and respected banner, the union jack. What is the reason? They have finally come to life. They have realized they are in danger of losing this emblem which is so dear to them and which has meant so much to their fathers and mothers down through the years.

I respectfully suggest to the government that the value of the opinions of the premiers of the provinces be recognized in deciding this vital national question. The government need have no fear of politics being a factor in present circumstances when four of the provincial governments are Liberal, four are Conservative and two are Social Credit—a very fair balance sheet which I think would yield a lot of wisdom. I suggest this should be done even if it should be decided to take a referendum. Let us first have the advice of these men. They could help select a flag which would take nothing away from the recognition of either of the founding peoples.

I have here an article from the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday June 17, 1964. It states:

> The Prime Minister appeals for everyone to accept the decision of parliament, whatever it is. But there will be more chance of general acceptance if the flag of Canada is selected with reflection and careful choice. Democracy demands that dissenting voices be heard before the will of the majority prevails—

This house tonight does not seem to be too willing to grant this democratic privilege.

> —perhaps including the method suggested in these columns on June 3—a postponement of decision long enough to allow a meeting of premiers and party leaders to give their views on the flag. Our thought was that even should such a conference fail to attain unanimity it would enable the federal government to demonstrate clearly it had sought unanimity.

I am in favour of the amendment and of the subamendment, particularly of the paragraph which asks: "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to interrupt the hon. member. I may say his time expired some five minutes ago but he was given this additional time in view of interruptions and points of order which were made while he was speaking. Unless he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue his remarks—

An hon. Member: We have suffered enough.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret the hon. member cannot continue without unanimous consent and there definitely is not that.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Sometimes I wonder, with all due respect, whether the House of Commons is here to decide the affairs of this nation or whether we are simply here on a hair-splitting expedition. This man Beauchesne is a very learned gentleman, but I do not think his book was ever written in order to throttle debates in this house. I do not see how we can discuss the subamendment and the amendment unless we talk about the substance of what we are here to talk about, that is, the flag.

The people of Canada want to know—and this is what they ask me in almost every letter I get—what we are doing about the flag. This is a subject which usually is too hot to handle. Politicians shy away from the subject as a rule. They are not shying away from it tonight. You can see they are not. We intend to attack this problem until we know what we are fighting about. So, with permission of the house I want to tell hon. members what this flag means to me. I cannot argue in a vacuum. I cannot tell others what it means to them. But I have a right to say what it means to me and I know I speak for at least a million Canadians when I do so. I do not wish to parade my war service but after all I cannot deny my origins. I cannot deny that I am of British origin. When I am speaking about a flag would you ask me to say that I am willing to give away a tradition of my race? The British people are a proud race.

Mr. Sharp: That is right we are.

Mr. Bigg: One of the reasons we are a proud race is that we face every difficulty that comes before us in a chamber such as this with free discussion, with kindness and with patience, and we make positive contributions. It is very difficult to make a positive contribution when emotions are aroused and we lose our tempers and call each other names. This institution was not based on that kind of performance and it has stood for 2,000 years.

One of the things this flag has stood for, Mr. Speaker, is this institution. We are allowed to take part in a free discussion in this chamber, and I say to you that if you allow this freedom of discussion to be stopped by closure, by booing and catcalling, or by calling each other names, this institution may well become a great Stonehenge—a circle of silent stones, and freedom will be wept for at that grave.

I have visited Stonehenge on the island of England. Perhaps Stonehenge is a circle of silent stones now because freedom died in Britain 3,000 years ago and was reborn under the Christian cross. I do not know whether people believe anything any more, or whether any of us believe anything.

The origin of the cross in this flag lies in the fact that Joseph of Arimathea took our Lord and Master down off the cross. He knew what a cross was. He saw the Son of God hanged on a cross. He took that body down and is the man who supposedly brought the first cross to Britain 2,000 years ago. I am not a hairsplitter or a quibbler but let us say he brought the first cross to Britain 2,000 years ago.

I am not a history teacher but a Canadian, born on a homestead out west. In case you think I am a displaced person perhaps I should state that I have a little native blood in my veins. I have this native blood in my veins because John McKay, who came out to Canada with Alexander Mackenzie, married a native out in western Canada. That was seven or eight generations ago so there is no need for you to be superior. Do not bother to look up your own family trees.

My grandfather was a Hudson's Bay factor at Lac la Biche in 1874. I will not go back in my family's history further than that.

An hon. Member: We are just envious.

Mr. Bigg: My grandfather loved these native people and treated them fairly. When the natives burned down the fort they spared him and his family because of his honest and square dealings. This took place in the days of Louis Riel. Louis Riel believed in the British crown. Why should those who scream about Louis Riel being such a patriot now desire to do away with the British flag and the British crown? Why should they want to create another Stonehenge? Do not forget that the British crown and flag stand for the first cross brought to Britain 2,000 years ago.

I will not vote for any flag that denies to Canada the heritage of the Christian cross. The fact that there are three crosses in the union jack and in the corner of the red ensign does not make those flags any less loved. The red ensign was the flag representing a union of the cross of St. Andrew and the cross of St. George in 1801. We also included our Irish friends because we have always admired them. Most of Britain's good soldiers were Irishmen, including Montgomery and Alexander. Many Irishmen saw fit to fight many wars under the British flag.

I am not a waver of the British flag as the last word for democracy or freedom, but I say this, that under the British flag more freedom has been spread across this planet than under any other sign. I challenge you, one and all. Which of you who want to pull down our flag and trample it in the dirt would dare to go across the line and suggest they should take their "glory" down and trample it in the dirt, and expect to live. Are we going to be something less than the land of the north and the land of the free? We are all very quick to jump to our feet, throw out our little chests and show our visitors from the south our fishing holes and our important resources. What is our most important resource? I suggest our most important resource is our love for freedom and for fair play. That is our greatest resource.

Do any of you remember what happened to Uncle Tom, or do you remember Uncle Tom? Uncle Tom knew where to find freedom. He found freedom under the British flag. You want a distinctive flag for Canada. I suggest we have a distinctive flag. I say we now have the most distinguished flag on this planet. I do not put our flag ahead of my country. Our flag is only a rallying point. Our flag was at that place where the Van Doos and the First Field Regiment stood side by side on the battlefield.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Bigg: I should like to continue.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, please.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member who has the floor will realize that when another hon. member rises on a point of order he should be heard on that point. The Minister of Justice has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Favreau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As everyone will agree, we would really have closure if I were not allowed to express my point of order.

Mr. Smallwood: Make sure you have something to say this time.

An hon. Member: Shut up and listen.

Mr. Favreau: I do not wish to repeat the argument that was made this afternoon, but I should like to suggest very respectfully that the debate now is directed toward a question of what would constitute a proper questionnaire to be put to the people of Canada if there is to be a plebiscite. We are bound in this regard by the decision rendered this afternoon by Mr. Speaker. That decision was appealed and confirmed on appeal. We are presently limited by the Speaker's decision in which he made the distinction as between that decision and the previous one rendered in respect of the principal amendment, stating that we are not concerned here with an alternative and, therefore, not concerned with the merits of an argument as to whether the red ensign is a distinctive Canadian flag. We are concerned with questions to be properly included in a questionnaire to be put to the people. So long as we do not discuss the matter of the drafting of the questionnaire but instead attempt to discuss the merits of the principal question we are out of order, as ruled by Mr. Speaker as recently as this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. The Minister of Justice has stated we are concerned with questions to be included in a proposed plebiscite. Surely in discussing those questions to be placed on a plebiscite an hon. member may give reasons why those questions should be included, and that is exactly what the hon. member has been doing.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing I like better than to be challenged in my own field. I happened to take the trouble to obtain some legal training, before coming to this house, in anticipation of running into this type of argument. In every statute on our books one will find an interpretation clause. I am sorry I must use the facilities provided by an interpretation clause before referring to the meat of my subject. I have yet to get to the meat of my subject.

If I have not done so already, I should like to explain, what a flag means to some people, because some people I know do not know what a flag means. Mr. Speaker, I am using an interpretation clause to speak on the point of order. I am attempting to give a lawyer's answer to a lawyer. If you would like a citizen's answer to a citizen I invite you to stand up and tell me what a flag means to you and why you think the Christian cross should be removed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member concluded his remarks on the point of order?

Mr. Bigg: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the point raised by the Minister of Justice is well taken. On the other hand, I think the argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has substance also. But we are definitely bound by a decision of the house made this afternoon to the effect that we should discuss this specific matter relating to the plebiscite.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to be fair and lucid, and I think most hon. members are able to follow my argument. But what is a flag without history? How can we say whether or not we will have a plebiscite if we do not know what a flag is? A flag is a rallying point for all national sentiments. The national sentiments of those of British origin are very strong, but they are not exclusive. Let me take my lawyer's training again and say that Canada is not one nation. Canada is a legal entity consisting of two main races of people joined together with an evolutionary system of government. The events which occurred on the plains of Abraham in 1759 no longer count. It does not matter who won the battle.

Mr. Clancy: It does.

Mr. Bigg: In the treaty of Paris in 1763 Canada was ceded to Britain, which perhaps is an unfortunate truth. That may have been an unfortunate event in history, but I claim that by 1864 we had reached another stage in the evolution of our country. In 1864 the Fathers of Confederation met at Charlottetown, and I gather there will be another meeting there shortly to commemorate that event. I hope that the hundred years since 1864 have not been without their value. I hope that when this meeting takes place we will take another look at this legal entity of ours which we call Canada and which we hope will be a nation, and perhaps at that time we will reaffirm what one might call our marriage vows.

I for one have always been willing to meet Canadians of French origin on an equal footing. In case I am called to order I am talking about our dual heritage behind our flag. I am taking great pains to try and learn la belle langue française and I shall continue to do so until I can converse as fluently in the French language as I can in my own.

I would submit that we are not in fact two different races of people, in the sense of being black or white, or distantly related. I think it can be said that the French and English are very closely related indeed, if not by actual blood certainly by culture. Their respective cultures have intermingled so much that it is hard to tell where British culture ends and the French starts. I am sure that many of us on reading our school history books were moved to tears at the story of Joan of Arc. I would be proud to have the flag of Joan of Arc incorporated in any Canadian flag.

An hon. Member: Who wants it?

Mr. Bigg: I would want it. That is why I have the right to stand up in this house. My family happen to be of Norman-English blood. My name in Norman-English is spelt "Bygge" and means "barley". After a thousand years we are proud of our dual ancestry in Britain. Here in Canada after 100 years we are proud of our dual ancestry in Canada.

I am not trying to stir up strife here, Mr. Speaker. I am asking for co-operation. I am asking for the same level of brotherhood which is always being talked about and for the right to give my side of the story. One of the reasons I am proud of my British heritage is because I am also proud of our French. I do not think we can build a nation in Canada unless we take this attitude and are willing to forget the plains of Abraham and the last hundred years of bickering. Why not start now on August 17, 1964, and cut that out and get down to brass tacks? But we are not going to get down to brass tacks, any more than we did on the plains of Abraham where we used cannon, unless we sit down and talk things over. The battle of the plains of Abraham was 200 years ago. Have we learned nothing in 200 years? We failed with cannon, so let us get together and compromise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bigg: I am talking of the dual cultures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may be talking of dual cultures, but I think the dual culture part of his speech should be related to the plebiscite and to what questions are to be put on the plebiscite.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members do not know what a flag is, how can we decide that matter? I believe that the people of Canada do know their flag, because I have travelled through Ontario this last week and seen thousands of flags flying. Yesterday I went to Belleville and in a store there I saw being sold over the counter the Pearson pennant. There was a great big sign two feet square outside saying: "The flag of Canada".

Mr. Monteith: Shame.

Mr. Bigg: Now, it may well become the flag of Canada. I for one will be the first to serve that flag if and when it is ratified.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: I said if and when. But I say to hon. members opposite, do they think they have the right to make the decision, if they have not the courage to stand up and say why? I am not afraid to stand up and say why. There are 15,000 people in my district of French ancestry or of French relationship and a great many of them are proud of the present flag, the red ensign. I am willing to take a democratic vote in Canada on any design. I believe in democracy and my ancestors have believed in it for 2,000 years, ever since the dignity of man was once and forever held up before God and man—the Christian ethic. I should like to hear someone stand up and tell me—I would much prefer it was the Prime Minister—why I must take down the present standard as my standard of behaviour.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Read Hansard.

Mr. Bigg: They took Joan of Arc's flag down. They put her lily banner in the dirt. and she was only a woman. But what a glorious woman she was. She put her lily banner out in front and never looked back, and with her very small army swept the ranks clear. She put the rightful heir, I am led to believe, on the throne of France. Then the king of France ratted on her, and you know the rest. Now she is a saint. Which of those opposite in their male pride will stand up and say that they think the lily banner of France or the cross of St. George should be laid in the dirt?

I am not running down, Mr. Speaker, home-made designs. I know where the flag was made. I know who drew it. He has boasted about it openly. He is the man who gave us a new flag. It was given to a man with great courage and determination, a man brave enough to put an economic gun to our heads and say: "Take this flag or you will lose your $18,000 a year". But my dear fellows, do you think there is any amount of money that would make me sell my flag or my country? They hang their heads and say: "Isn't that drivel?" But it is not drivel to me or to the 30,000 men who may never see the flag again. Are they going to rub it off all our national monuments?

An hon. Member: We will rub you off.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: Stand up and say that. Stand up and say it.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Bigg: Have I the floor or haven't I?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has the floor but the hon. member for Cape Breton South is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member on the other side who made that threatening remark should have the courage to stand up, identify himself and repeat it, or is he ashamed to do so?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I did not utter the remark, but one thing that is running out is the opposition's sense of humour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I do not think anything we can do can destroy the parliamentary system, no matter how we mistreat it. It has lasted too long. But I do appeal to hon. members to put their petty opinions to one side. If you have not got the courage to stand up and ask for a free vote and if your leader has not got the courage to allow a free vote, then we have no alternative but to put the matter to the people of Canada in a plebiscite. This is the substance of the matter. We are down to it now. Have we not got the courage to stand up on our own feet and say what we think? We have just had a glorious example of the lack of it. I would not like to think that kind of behaviour was typical of any segment of our population. I know that the people in the galleries and the people throughout the country are not ashamed to stand up and say where they stand on the flag and I want to give them that opportunity.

Some might say, when did you dream this up? I have never sidestepped the question of the flag. In Hansard for January 21, 1962 you will find a 20 minute speech by me on the subject. I begged hon. members then and I got little response. So I am not being partisan in this matter. I think we have all been delinquent. We all know what our flag has been and we might as well have ratified it 100 years ago. French Canada has always been proud of her allegiance to the British crown, at least in the last 100 years, and if they are not now, then I say stand up and say so. This is a free country. That is one of the advantages of being a Canadian.

Do those people who talk about secession really want to secede? I am sure Newfoundland does not want to secede. All the people there want to do is to retain their British traditions. Joey Smallwood told you that in no uncertain terms and you had to change your original resolution. Many people across the country admired the Prime Minister temporarily when he said: I will come out and cut the Gordian knot; I will give you the opportunity to make a nice clean decision on the flag; I will offer you this flag so that you can clear up the issue once and for all, so that you can stand up and be counted and be Canadian.

That sounded fine, but when Joey did not like it a two-headed resolution was brought forward. Now we are going to have two flags. If you go to Britain and talk to the Queen you wave the union jack but if you are somewhere else you wave something else. Is this the way to be united? I am sure there is not one member in this chamber who does not believe in democracy and if we had a free vote and the vote was 51 to 49 I am sure we would all stand up and sing "O Canada", salute the flag and say God save the Queen. If this is not so I am very much misled. I am in the wrong company if this is not true. This is what I thought when I first came here and this is what Joey Smallwood thought when he led his loyal little island into confederation. He said: We will now become part of the brightest star in the British crown. He meant that. Don't think Joey didn't mean it. He is not going to be nice to you boys if you do away with the flag. You know that, so you have backed down.

Now you are ready to back down, for what? Is it for the $18,000 and the splinter groups because you have not got the courage to stand on your own feet? Oh, they are going to bring in an amendment and you are going to vote for it because that is the only way to save your political future.

Mr. Plourde: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

If the Conservatives have nothing but stupid things to tell the house over and over again, it would be better for them to remain seated, because we are ready for the question.

Their filibustering tactics are detrimental to the interests of the Canadian people. I am getting sick and tired of the Conservatives.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no question of privilege. The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Bigg: We have the first question in the suggested plebiscite, will we retain the red ensign? Of course we should. Second, should we have a modification? I do not like backing down at all, but I certainly put my country ahead of my own personal opinion and pride. I would say that if we must have a modification of the flag I love in order to keep Canada one I will vote for it. Third, should we have the three maple leaves flag? I see little merit in it though I like the maple leaf. We used to sing "The Maple Leaf Forever" and it was a term of derision. A lot of people in Canada did not like it. But what did we of British origin do? We abandoned any idea of making it our national anthem because it divided us and we have adopted "O Canada", a French Canadian song with very strong religious overtones. We have compromised and accepted that, many of us perhaps with heavy hearts, but those who want to see a greater Canada and who love this country will take "O Canada" and sing it with that much more enthusiasm because it is one of the beloved songs of our French brothers. We have compromised. I do not think there has been one word said in any part of the house against that decision.

I for one would like to see a package deal and have national service also. Some will say: Oh, this is an old soldier speaking and he cannot forget. No, it is hard to forget the friends, the volunteers I served with. It is very hard to forget and I will not forget them. But I am not going to put sloppy sentiment ahead of the unification of my country. So I say that if the majority of members of the house in a free vote will stand up and conscientiously say that they honestly want to do away with everything we have had in the past, that only with this new flag can we march on as a fully united country, that every man jack, be he native North American or French or English, will rally to these colours and if needed will give up his time, his money and loved ones, put them all on the table and say, "I will go", then I will accept that decision. Some enlisted because they were unemployed but I will not say that about my friends. I will not say that about the ones who did not come back. I will not say it about the boys in bomber command. I will say this to defend myself, which I rarely like to do. If I am the only yellow one in the family it is a peculiar thing because in my father's family there were four brothers, one of whom was in the British navy, one in the Strathcona Horse, one in the South African police and my father was in the mounted police. I have three brothers. My oldest brother was in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Let us keep them flying. My second brother was in the Royal Canadian Navy, the senior service, and my youngest brother was in the R.A.F. I myself tried to fly and could not qualify so I had to go into the lowly artillery.

I appeal to the soldiers and non-soldiers. I really believe we do need symbols. We do need a rallying point. There are times when nothing else but the sight of the old flag rallies you out of the dirt, and not the flag on a pole like the hon. member for Edmonton West said. No, you do not go in for flying the flag, but you fly it somewhere. You fly it deep down inside you where it cannot be got at when you are darned good and scared. There are no heroes in battle. You land on your face in the mud but you still get up and go on again simply because you marched into school 15 or 20 years before singing "O Canada" and looking at a little piece of red bunting flying at the masthead.

Do not ask me to turn my back on it, to forget it and never look at it again. If we have to have this new flag I want you to do this much at least. Parade a man from every regiment in Canada that ever served under the red ensign and let them march to the peace tower and lay the red ensign away with glory where it belongs. Do not let it down and say that it means nothing, because it means a great deal to a lot of people.

I do not like to have to talk like this. I do not want to have to go to the widows of this country and say that we have no flag. The people in Holland know that we do. All you have to do is take out one of these little flags about three inches square and show it to the people in Holland. They will crowd around you like a bunch of chickens for a crust of bread; they will be glad to have you back. You should have seen the tears running down their faces when we went into Amsterdam. Where these little flags came from I do not know. The people waved them in Amsterdam. You say, what battles were you in? Everybody cannot fight battles, but we can all be patriots. Is there something smelly about that word now? When nurse Edith Cavell died, she was not ashamed to say "Patriotism is not enough". Do you know what she meant?

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Bigg: What would you like to order? If you people really want me to sit down, I will. The single maple leaf design is only a political compromise and everyone in this chamber knows it. There would be nothing wrong with accepting the triple maple leaf if this would unite us. If it is going to unite us, if you are going to serve it, then there is nothing wrong with accepting it.

You laugh at the Legion and say they have no right to this flag. Are we taking it away from them? Were they all drunks? Were they all unemployed? Are they all drunks now? They were drunk with patriotism once. I am not willing to compromise on the single maple leaf design. I am not willing to take the triple maple leaf design on the basis of my own choice. However, I say again, and I will keep on saying it, that I am willing to bow to a democratic choice. If each and every one of you can stand up on a free vote and vote for this then I challenge you to request your own leader to do so.

I suppose that the four questions listed are good enough for a plebiscite. I honestly believe that if the people of Canada have this choice, then the first question will win on the first ballot. If there is any way of satisfying our Canadians of French origin I am certainly willing to do that. I have nothing but love and admiration for these people. They are our flesh and blood. The fact that they have a rather difficult and beautiful language should make no difference. We follow branches of the same religion, at least. Here again, I think we have had an evolution in religious thinking. If they had had an ecumenical conference 500 years ago, who knows, there might never have been a division in the Christian church.

We have listened to one of our members here speak about nihilism and materialism; taking everything out of the flag and having nothing left. I think there may be something in this modern psychology which is attempting to do away with our standards. If we lose faith in each other we stand to gain nothing. I am one who has always stood for individual enterprise.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Bigg: Is this not in order? It is the essence of our British culture just as I am certain it is of our French culture. The French are making a great contribution to our country. They are alive in the arts. They are intensely proud of their origin. I say if there is any way of giving them any more recognition, if there is any way we can cooperate to the slightest degree to make them forget the errors of the past or even the facts of the past, things we cannot undo, then I am in favour of that because we can certainly march on into the future together.

Let us have this referendum. If these four questions are not satisfactory, then perhaps we could consider others. I have thought about them and I cannot think of anything else which would improve them. We who are here have done a great deal to cloud the issue. We have said things, perhaps, that we should not have said. We have made this issue partisan, whether we want to or not. This applies to both sides. The only fair way is to go to the people and let them make this decision. I do not think it is necessary to have an election. There is a great deal of work we should do. I do not make this statement out of fear I assure you. You can look up the record. I think it would be a waste of time. I am sorry that no longer is the crown allowed to be the independent referee it used to be in the old days. Now the power to call an election rests in the hands of the Prime Minister. We all know this has been the case since 1925. It is up to him. There is no purpose served by looking at the Leader of the Opposition and saying, you fellows can force an election. The Prime Minister holds this stick and everybody in Canada knows it. This stick is being used, and I think it is an unfair one. I do not believe the flag should be a partisan question.

I have been giving you my own views. I have not been directed by any other member in this chamber. Perhaps some of them would have liked it better if I had not said some of the things I have said. However, there are times when if you do not speak, the very rocks cry out. I take full responsibility for everything I have said. I meant every word of it. I assure you that if we can find some flag design which will unite our country, I will be the first to vote for it and I will be the first to serve that flag when it is decided upon.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, it should be obviously a time of excitement when a nation is choosing a new flag. The fact that this is not possible should be abundantly clear to the whole house. The reason I make this statement is something I want to follow up, but I see the clock and it is 10.30.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOURS OF SITTING FOR FRIDAY, AUGUST 21

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): May I be allowed to revert to motions with the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Favreau: The various parties, through their respective house leaders have been advised that the opening session of the national conference on education will take place in this house on Friday, August 21. I, therefore, ask the consent of the house to move:

That when this house does adjourn on August 20, 1964, it shall stand adjourned until 2 p.m. the following day and that the relevant standing and provisional orders be suspended in relation thereto, so as to allow this session to be held in this house.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask this one question? Translated into layman's language, does that mean we will adjourn at six o'clock on Friday?

Mr. Favreau: Yes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

It being thirty minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, August 18, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Fifth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Loiselle.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I think this question should be directed to the Prime Minister. Has any consideration been given by the government to having a request made for a meeting of NATO foreign ministers, or the NATO council, in order that the deteriorating Cyprus situation, in particular, and the withdrawal of units from NATO, all of which is full of menace to the continuing integrity of the NATO organization, might be considered by that body?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, consideration was given by the government to a meeting of NATO foreign ministers to discuss and consider this very delicate and indeed dangerous situation. Our fellow members of NATO were approached to find out whether they felt it would be useful to have a meeting at this time; but the consensus within the NATO council was that while circumstances may make a meeting of this kind desirable and even necessary, they did not feel—the majority of them—that it should be held at this particular moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister and I should like to ask him as well, arising out of the current situation in Cyprus, whether the Canadian government is supporting the Acheson proposal for the union of Cyprus with Greece.

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry, but I did not hear the last part of the right hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The union of Cyprus with Greece; does the Canadian government support the Acheson proposal?

Mr. Pearson: This is a matter under discussion between the governments directly concerned and the Canadian government is not taking part in these discussions, at least at the present time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Even though it is not taking part in the discussions, has the government given any indication that it does in fact support this proposal?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. Our position in the United Nations force at this moment and in the present circumstances makes it important that we should maintain a position of neutrality in this matter.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has any progress been made in negotiations with the government of Cyprus regarding the extension of the terms of reference of the United Nations peace keeping force? May I ask the hon. gentleman also whether the fact that Archbishop Makarios is now playing footsie with Mr. Khrushchev is going to make any hope of such an extension less likely of realization.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think there are grounds for believing that the powers of the force as provided for in the original agreement with the government of Cyprus will be carried out.

Mr. Douglas: The minister speaks of the original agreement. Is there any hope of an extension of the present agreement to cover such things as the disarmament of guerrillas, in particular?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The disarming of guerrillas is not necessarily precluded by the present terms of reference. It becomes a question of the capacity of the force in face of the numbers opposed to it. In any event, new powers are now being discussed, as I indicated yesterday.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister if such powers are specifically stipulated in the agreement with the government of Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs is now in a position to answer the questions I asked him yesterday with regard to the withdrawal of Greek forces from NATO, particularly the extent to which this withdrawal is to take place, the proportion of Greek troops involved, and the implications of this on the general NATO position?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend reminds the house, this question was asked yesterday. The decision of the Greek government to withdraw elements of its land, air and naval forces from NATO was officially made known to the NATO authorities yesterday afternoon. Members of the house will recall that action of a similar nature, relating to air force units only, however, had been taken earlier by Turkey.

The Canadian government regrets that both these governments should have found it necessary, for national purposes, to remove forces which had been assigned as part of NATO's defensive strength. However, the matter is now being discussed in NATO and I do not feel I can go any further at this time.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister can tell us whether the Greeks have withdrawn the major portion of their forces from NATO, or only a small portion; and particularly whether the withdrawal of the Greek portion of the eastern Mediterranean headquarters at Izmir means that this will now cease to be an effective NATO eastern Mediterranean headquarters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker. In answer to the last question, there is no word of developments of that kind. The full extent of the withdrawal is now a matter of discussion, however, in the NATO council.

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister can tell us whether it is the intention of the government to recall to Canada the Canadian air force officers who are serving with the Turkish air force at the present time.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps I might answer that question, Mr. Speaker. The house has already been informed that shipments of mutual aid in respect of aircraft parts to both Greece and Turkey have been suspended. Previously, in order to facilitate the supply of spares and the return of equipment to Canada for repair, we had officers in both Greece and Turkey. Some time ago the office in Greece was withdrawn. This was in accordance with previous plans. The office in Turkey was given responsibility for liaison with both the Turkish air force and the royal Hellenic air force. They have been instructed, however, to cease visits pending further developments.

There are three service personnel, one squadron leader and two sergeants, and two contract field service representatives, one Canadair and one Rolls Royce, remaining in Turkey. All these people's tours expire within the next few months and they will not be replaced at that time, unless there is a stabilization of the situation in the meantime. One officer, who had just returned to Canada when his tour expired, was not replaced. That is the situation at the present time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister whether any of the 107 Sabre jets which Canada gave to Turkey were used by that nation in the recent bombing raids on Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps I could deal with this particular question, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the recent press report that Turkey, and perhaps also Greece, used Canadian built aircraft provided to them as mutual aid in Cyprus, the position on F-104's was given in detail by my colleague the Minister of National Defence, as the hon. gentleman will recall, on May 13 this year.

With regard to the F-86 aircraft, Canada undertook in 1954 a program for the provision of F-86 mark II aircraft to Greece and also to Turkey under the general program for the provision of mutual aid to NATO countries. In all some 107 aircraft were provided to each country, with spare engines and spares support. There have been reports in the papers that F-86 aircraft were used by both Greece and Turkey during recent days, but we are not in a position as of this moment to know whether such aircraft had in fact been supplied by Canada several years ago under the NATO arrangements for the mutual assistance program.

However, I should point out to the house that equipment given by Canada as mutual aid is provided on the condition that the recipient nation accepts responsibility for use of the equipment so received to strengthen the capacity of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to deter or resist aggression. The implications of this condition in the present circumstances are being brought again to the attention of the governments involved. As my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence pointed out, at the time when Canada decided to take part in the United Nations force in Cyprus there was a suspension by Canada of its mutual aid assistance program to Greece and Turkey.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could I ask the minister what steps the Canadian government takes to see that the recipients of military material, such as planes, use that material for the purpose for which it was intended; and in the event that the government finds it is not used for that purpose, is it the government's intention to have the material returned to Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, if it were confirmed that these planes had been used contrary to the requirement of use, the Canadian government would raise the matter at once in the NATO council.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the UN secretary general, U Thant, announced that he was negotiating an agreement with one country in order to send a reinforcement of 900 men to the UN force in Cyprus, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to assure us that those negotiations are not being held with Canada and that Canada is not involved in the possible reinforcement of the UN force in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I call the hon. member's attention to the reply I gave last Friday.

[Text]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is as follows. In view of the fact that it was reported at noon today by the Canadian Press that a large number of British troops had been withdrawn from Cyprus, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether these were troops under United Nations command or whether they were British troops which were under British command on the island? If they were under United Nations command, was Canada consulted in this move?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to deal with that question either later in the day or tomorrow, because I have a meeting this afternoon and I do not want to say anything before that meeting takes place.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that it was also reported in the same news broadcast that over 50,000 Turkish troops were mobilizing and were on board ships in ports right across from the island of Cyprus, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the meetings he is attending whatever its nature may be, make strong representations to any countries which are supplying troops to the UN command not to remove any further troops? Because it was also reported that Canada is now the only country with a substantial number of troops on the island. Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tells us at this point how many troops are at the moment under UN command in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there are around 6,000. I am sure no country would remove all its troops without the prior consultation of the participating members and without the authority of the secretary general of the United Nations.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the minister to impress upon the United Kingdom government the necessity or at least the importance of keeping its force on Cyprus at its present strength?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, sir.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Is the minister aware of the statement made yesterday in Canada by a Greek Cypriot student? She is reported as saying that the identification of the British and Canadian troops was not adequate, that often Canadian soldiers were taken for English soldiers in Cyprus and that the British troops were not as popular as the Canadian troops?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement.

SOUTHEAST ASIA—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, or perhaps it had better be directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge is now in Europe addressing members of the NATO council, searching for assistance for United States policies in southeast Asia, is the government of Canada giving consideration to providing assistance to the United States in this region?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We have already made statements on this matter and I have nothing to add to those statements, except that I believe Mr. Lodge will be visiting Ottawa within the next two weeks.

MALAYSIA—SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF MUTUAL AID FROM INDONESIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that Indonesia's aggressive attacks against Malaysia are continuing, the latest occurring only yesterday, would the hon. gentleman consider recommending to his colleagues that the hundreds of thousands of dollars now going to Indonesia be diverted to Malaysia to help that country defend itself against Indonesian aggression?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would want to give consideration to whether that was a wise suggestion.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not any or all of the other nations within the NATO organization have suspended mutual aid to both Turkey and Greece?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I may have misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Did he ask me what the others are doing, or what Canada should be doing?

Mr. Olson: No. My question was this—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am referring to the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nesbitt: I was asking the secretary of state if he would request his colleagues in the Canadian government to give consideration to cutting off the supply of aid to Dr. Sukarno, in view of his aggressive attacks on Malaysia, and diverting this assistance, which I believe amounts to some $350,000 or $400,000, to Malaysia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The aid given to Indonesia is not military aid. As I said I would wish to give consideration to the suggestion made.

Mr. Churchill: What kind of aid is it?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—FAILURE TO APPEAR IN COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the absence of the Minister of Justice perhaps he can enlarge his answer so it might cover the legal aspects of the question, as it relates to Hal Banks. Does the minister have any information for the house today in regard to the whereabouts of Hal Banks and the three other S.I.U. officials who failed to appear yesterday and for whom bench warrants have been issued today? Does the minister have any information about their whereabouts?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no information whatsoever in respect of the location of Mr. Banks. I do believe at least one of the other officers who failed to appear yesterday is in Canada. I believe they are all in Canada, but I have no knowledge of the whereabouts of Mr. Banks.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Justice. It has to do with the elusive Mr. Banks. Has there been any estreatment of his bail bond as yet? Is the acting minister in a position to say what endeavour has been made to locate him? I do not want to suggest that he is on the island of Capri, but that seems to be a place of some attractiveness.

An hon. Member: The minister is coming in now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I welcome the minister. If Banks would only turn up in the same way everything would be all right. Will the minister say whether there has been any estreatment of the bail? I also asked a question just before the minister came in to this effect. Is he in a position to advise whether there has been any indication as to the present whereabouts of Mr. Banks, particularly since he was said to be sojourning in New England?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I must be frank and admit that if I was not in the house during the last half hour, I was not with Mr. Banks either. I do not know exactly, therefore, his whereabouts.

Seriously, I have requested that whatever information is available be obtained; and whether precise or not, I am not in a position to furnish it to the house today. I hope to be able to say something about the matter tomorrow. In so far as the estreatment of the bail is concerned, I understand that this relates to the case with respect to which Mr. Banks was supposed to appear yesterday. I asked my officers this morning to obtain definite particulars from our counsel in this respect, and I will be in a position tomorrow to advise the house.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Has the Minister of Justice given instructions for the forfeiture of the $25,000 bond of Mr. Banks?

[Text]

Mr. Favreau: I must say that I have not given instructions for the estreatment of the $25,000 bond, for the following reasons. As I said yesterday, there is already a bench warrant issued, so there would not be much point in having the bond estreated. I am considering at the moment whether the cancellation of the bond, at this moment, would assist in obtaining the presence of Mr. Banks on September 14. In any event, I have taken no position on that or given no firm opinion. The main reason, as I have said is that a bench warrant is already available for the arrest of Mr. Banks should he show up.

So far as the bond is concerned in the case in which he was supposed to appear yesterday, I repeat that I have no final information, but my information at the moment is that crown counsel, acting for the attorney general of the province, intends to ask for its cancellation. As I say, we will have further information tomorrow as to the disposition of any motion that may have been made this morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Was he consulted in the first place about the advisability of granting bail to Mr. Banks?

Mr. Favreau: With regard to the $25,000 bond or bail yes, as evidenced by the fact that after consultation with the then crown attorney, it had been decided, by common consent, that it should be suggested to the chief justice of the court of appeal to refuse any bail—a fact which the judge noted in his judgment—and failing that to set bail at not less than $50,000.

However, the chief justice, guided by his own experience, decided that $25,000 bail would be adequate. He gave his reasons in his judgment.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister not now agree with the criticism that was raised by the opposition some weeks ago, that it was a most dangerous course to follow to give Banks bail and not assure in the bail bond that he should remain within the jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. Favreau: I just said, Mr. Speaker, that I have the greatest respect for the honourable chief justice of the court of appeal, who was appointed by the previous government. On the occasion of his appointment I wrote my predecessor Mr. Fulton to congratulate him. I just said that we thought we should object to the bond being granted, but I still say that I respect the decision which was rendered at the time. We still do not know whether Mr. Banks will present himself on September 14.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With regard to the kind of bail bond that is taken, does not the responsibility rest at all times upon crown counsel to see that the judge shall have before him the assurance that the wrongdoer will turn up? I see the minister is receiving assistance from the law student sitting beside him. I am directing the question to the minister. Is it not a fact that at all times the judge accepts what crown counsel suggests, if it is reasonable and right?

Mr. Favreau: Evidently the responsibility for suggesting to the court what attitude ought to be taken with regard to bond rests with crown counsel at the moment when crown counsel may give information to the court. But as of this moment it is the sole responsibility of the court to decide, under the court's authority, what the bond has to be, that is if the court reaches the conclusion that a bond must be set. In this particular case I say that crown counsel has fully discharged his responsibility toward the people of Canada, first in objecting to the bond; second, suggesting the bond ought not to be less than $50,000; third, respecting the court's decision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Banks seems to enjoy some solicitude.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): In view of the fact that Mr. Banks seems to have appeared on parliament hill on every occasion upon which there were dealings with the Department of Transport, has thought been given to the possibility of sending him a telegram to appear on parliament hill?

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I would like to direct to the Minister of Industry. Are copies of Hansard being sent to Mr. Banks so that he may be kept informed of the interest of this house in his whereabouts?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of Mr. Banks' address.

[Later:]

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice relative to the disappearance of Mr. Hal Banks. In view of the fact that Mr. Banks is vice president of the S.I.U. of North America and still draws $20,000 a year salary from that organization, has the minister or any of his officials contacted the head office of the S.I.U. to ascertain the address to which they are mailing his cheques?

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. With respect to the statement he made yesterday concerning the repatriation of the Canadian constitution, I should like to know whether the government intends to inform parliament of the amendments it proposes to our constitution and the methods it suggests for amending our constitution in future, that is after the B.N.A.A. has been repatriated—

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; as soon as there is something to report on this matter naturally we would want to inform parliament.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Could he tell the house whether the federal government has initiated talks with the provinces concerning the repeal of subsection 1, section 91 of the B.N.A.A., especially as far as the unilateral amending of the Canadian constitution by the federal government is concerned?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we have only been considering a procedure for amending the constitution to repatriate it to this country, in the light of the forthcoming meetings.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, my question was whether there had been direct conversations with the provincial governments concerning this particular article 91(1).

Mr. Pearson: I would have to look into that, Mr. Speaker. I will inform my hon. friend tomorrow.

CANADIAN FLAG

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he any statement to make concerning his meeting with the leaders of the four parties this morning, as regards the Canadian flag?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker. We had a discussion this morning which was not concluded. We are going to meet again on Thursday, so I prefer not to say anything until after that meeting.

PUBLIC WORKS

OTTAWA—TABLING OF TENDER DOCUMENTS RESPECTING LEASING OF SPACE IN UNFINISHED BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Leader of the Opposition I wish to table the tender documents in respect of a public tender called by the Department of Public Works for the provision of leased accommodation for the Department of Labour and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

FINANCE

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—ADJUSTMENT IN ACCORDANCE WITH COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could the right hon. Prime Minister inform the members of this house of the reasons preventing him from increasing family allowances in keeping with the increase that has taken place in the other sectors of the national economy since 1944?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Following the representations of the dairy producers federation, can the minister tell us whether he intends to reconsider the cheese policy which he announced on April 29 last, and either restore the 30 cents per hundredweight subsidy on milk or refund the premium of 3.6 cents lost by cheese factories on second grade cheese?

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker, before the events referred to a few moments ago by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) materialize, I should have liked to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) a question, but since the Minister of Agriculture cannot be present, would the Minister of Forestry be kind enough to ask him whether he received, yesterday or the day before, a request from the dairy products manufacturers' federation? Also, could not the Minister of Forestry take it upon himself to assist the Minister of Agriculture in settling the urgent problem raised by the Quebec province dairy products manufacturer's federation?

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this is a question for the order paper.

QUEBEC—FEED GRAIN SUBSIDIES IN ST. JOHN AREA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry.

I read order in council 1155 concerning grants for the transport of grain to various parts of the country and I would like to ask the Minister of Forestry if there has been any error or if the wording is correct, because section 2(2) of schedule 4 provides that grants will only be applicable to farmers of the Saguenay area. As the order in council makes no mention of the Lake St. John region, must I gather that no assistance will be given to farmers of the Saguenay-Lake St. John region?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is referring to paragraph B. I have the order in council here and I can assure him that his constituency is covered under paragraph G of schedule A.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell us if it is pure coincidence that the Îles-de-la-Madeleine and Newfoundland regions will both get higher grants of $15 and $25 a ton respectively? Is it only a coincidence or is it because those two regions are represented by the minister himself and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill)?

Mr. Sauvé: That has always been the policy of the department as far as that constituency and that province are concerned.

[Text]

U.S. POLICY CHANGE RESPECTING MEAT IMPORTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence perhaps the acting minister could reply. Is the hon. gentleman now able to state the policy of the government with regard to the embargo placed on Canadian meat entering the United States? Some two or three weeks ago I asked a similar question and the parliamentary secretary said he would take it as notice, but we have heard nothing since.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the minister left a minute ago. I will bring this question to his attention.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANTEEN DISTRIBUTION OF MATCH BOOKS WITH NEW FLAG DESIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister aware that military canteens are being supplied with pocket match containers bearing the imprint of the new Liberal proposed three maple leaf flag and, if so, did he authorize their distribution?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must admit I am unaware that this is being done, but if it is being done out of mess funds that would be outside the direct jurisdiction of the department and under the jurisdiction of the officers in charge of messes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ask the Minister without Portfolio.

BAGOTVILLE, QUE.—EXTENSION OF WATER SERVICE TO NEIGHBOURING COMMUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Could he tell the house whether we can hope for an agreement between his department and a group of municipalities of Chicoutimi county concerning a metropolitan water works project that could supply the R.C.A.F. base at Bagotville?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of meeting with a delegation from Chicoutimi county concerning a waterworks project which could at the same time supply the Bagotville R.C.A.F. base.

The department now has that request under consideration and I hope it will be possible to give an answer in the affirmative.

RETIREMENT OF REAR ADMIRAL OF ATLANTIC FLEET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence and follows up a matter discussed yesterday. In view of the difficulty of going into details on orders of the day, would the minister be ready to discuss with the special committee on defence the principles underlying, or the reasons for, the forced retirement of Admiral Brock?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, I do not think so. There are many factors which enter into these judgments which are very carefully thought out in advance of decisions being taken and, as I indicated yesterday, I do not think it would be in the interest of either the services or the individuals concerned that there should be a post mortem in each case, because there will be many such cases running through the whole ranks structure.

STATEMENT ON RECOVERY OF ARMS STOLEN IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Last Thursday the hon. member for Medicine Hat asked a question with regard to the recovery of arms stolen from the Fusiliers de Montreal armoury earlier this year. I am now in the position to reply to this question. I am informed that of a total of 110 weapons stolen, 97 have since been recovered. The investigation is being continued with regard to the remaining 13.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF CHINESE ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ian Grant Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration may I direct this question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of widespread interest, will the parliamentary secretary tell the house whether further consideration will be given to prolonging the Chinese amnesty and adjustment program, and also to revising the regulations with regard to landing requirements for all immigrants?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister.

Mr. John N. Turner (St. Lawrence-St. George): Would the parliamentary secretary also transmit to the minister the question whether he would consider in future giving at least three months' notice before lifting the amnesty, so that Chinese people in Canada might be given an opportunity to apply, and also publishing notices of the policy in the Chinese language newspapers in Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest of the parliamentary secretary in this matter possibly the Prime Minister might answer and relieve him of this fear and this solicitude which is shared by us, and which was brought before the house by the hon. member for Regina City.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be even happier to relieve the right hon. gentleman of some of his fears.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, from the apparent indication of things it won't be long before he and I will be changing positions.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

CONSTRUCTION OF COMMEMORATIVE BUILDINGS IN PROVINCIAL CAPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State following up questions I asked him previously. Has he now received replies from all the provinces regarding the centennial memorial project building grants, and has he reached a final understanding with the premier of the government of Saskatchewan regarding the use of the grant in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the best way of answering that question is for me to read the reply I sent to Mr. Thatcher on August 14, 1964:

I am now in a position to give an answer to your letter of July 7. As you already know, your request has raised an issue which has for us some complications.

On January 23, I wrote to provincial ministers responsible for centennial celebrations, offering, on behalf of the federal government, to participate in the financing "of a single capital project, which would preferably be comparable in spirit and function with the buildings in Charlottetown and Quebec city and be built in the provincial capital."

You are aware that this confederation memorial program provides further assistance to provincial governments, apart from the $1 per capita grant program which was designed to apply to all areas within each province. That is why we thought that the memorial program would lose much of its significance if it were to apply to several cities or areas in a province. I hope, therefore, that your government will find an alternative way of offering special assistance to Moose Jaw.

We have, however, taken into consideration the commitments made by the previous provincial government, the great importance you attach to this matter, the fact that none of my provincial colleagues in the national committee has opposed your proposal, and the similar features of the plans envisaged in Regina and Saskatoon. Because of all these particular circumstances, we are prepared to consider these plans as a twin project for the purpose of the federal grant provided, of course, that our maximum total contribution will not exceed $2,500,000.

Mr. More: As a supplementary question, may I ask the Secretary of State if this proposal requires a matching grant from the province?

Mr. Lamontagne: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. More: As a further supplementary may I ask the Secretary of State if he thinks a suitable building can be erected for $2,250,000.

Mr. Lamontagne: Would the hon. member repeat the question, please?

Mr. More: I ask the Secretary of State if he thinks a suitable building for this project can be erected for $2,250,000, which is the sum now available with the provincial grant of $2 million and the federal grant to Saskatoon and Regina?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, our contribution under this program provides for a maximum amount of $2½ million, or not more than 50 per cent of the total cost of the project. I am quite sure that funds will be found in Saskatchewan to build these memorials.

Mr. More: I think it is important to clear this up, Mr. Speaker. In other words, 50 per cent of the cost of a project might involve federal and provincial grants and, in addition, the federal grant will not exceed the provincial grant. Is that correct?

Mr. Pearson: Fifty per cent.

Mr. Lamontagne: The only condition we have imposed under this program is that we will not pay more than 50 per cent. The other 50 per cent may be financed by the provincial government, or the city or locality involved, or by both.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): As a supplementary question can the minister say with respect to these buildings in the different provinces throughout Canada whether the federal government scrutinizes the system of contracting and subcontracting in the construction of said buildings?

Mr. Lamontagne: Yes, Mr. Speaker, because we have a signed agreement with the provinces covering all these aspects.

Mr. Bell: Then is the minister fully satisfied that in the building at Fredericton, New Brunswick, the system of subcontracting meets these federal standards?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am not in a position to answer that question, but I shall have a reply tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMPLETION OF TRANSLATION OF BEAUCHESNE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question?

In view of the numerous deficiencies in Beauchesne's book on procedure, during the debate yesterday and before, could the Prime Minister tell the house what progress is being made in the translation of that book and tell us when hon. members will have such a translation of Beauchesne?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am not, but I will look into the matter and see whether I can make a statement on it tomorrow.

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the public interest in this matter, could the right hon. gentleman tell the house whether the government has made a decision as to filling the vacancies in the electoral districts of Westmorland and Waterloo South and, if the dates have been decided on, could he now announce those dates?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This matter is still under consideration.

Mr. Scott: In view of the fact that in the ridings of Laurier and St. Denis the by-elections were completed within 44 days of the members' resignations, and in view of the fact that the riding of Westmorland has been vacant for 82 days and the riding of Waterloo South for 52 days, could the Prime Minister give an explanation for the haste in the one instance and the delay in the other?

Mr. Pearson: That would require quite a long statement.

BROADCASTING

APPROVAL OF TRANSFER OF WINDSOR RADIO STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport with reference to the transfer of radio station CKWW, Windsor, to WWKC Holdings Limited. Was this transfer approved by the Department of Transport before being referred to the board of broadcast governors?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): That would be quite impossible, I would think, under the law as it stands. As I understand it, the Department of Transport receives these applications and refers them to the board of broadcast governors for its judgment, and there would be no action of any definitive sort taken by the Department of Transport, or by the minister, or by the government—whoever makes the decision in these matters—until the board of broadcast governors had held its hearing.

Mr. Douglas: May I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State and ask whether his department is making any representations to the board of broadcast governors with reference to this transfer?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): My department does not make representations before the board of broadcast governors in these cases, but the recommendations received from the board of broadcast governors are always very carefully considered by the government.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Monday, August 17, consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, when I began my remarks last evening I mentioned that the day a nation unfurl its new flag should be a time of excitement and enthusiasm; it should be a time when the various divisive elements become united and stand behind the new flag, the new symbol which everyone can accept.

That this is not possible at this time should be patently clear to the house. We hear some very sincere, vintage speeches being made by hon. members on this side of the house, but we notice a surprising poverty of speeches from the other side of the house. I am wondering why this is so. Can this be because there is a lack of conviction on the part of hon. members on the other side of the house who are being asked to support a flag for which they cannot quite speak up? Can it be that there is an unwillingness on their part to do so because of the feeling that their constituencies might have them do otherwise? Why is there no enthusiastic response to defend the flag?

I think of some of the very notable speeches that have come from this side of the house, and I noticed hon. members opposite listening with great interest to the very reasonable and reasoned arguments that were undoubtedly put forward. I am just wondering why the indifferent attitude of hon. members opposite is so evident and why they cannot be persuaded by this kind of reasoning. Surely the Prime Minister himself must be quite chagrined over the turn of events since the introduction of the main motion, a motion that he hoped would bring about national unity but which has now brought about the greatest division in our country that we can remember.

With regard to this very point of national unity, Mr. Speaker, I would think all members on all sides of the house are certainly anxious to strive for and do all those things that will contribute to national unity. For this reason I fail to understand why, when a reasonable suggestion is put forward, such as has been made by the Leader of the Opposition, to put this question before the people of Canada in the form of a referendum, the suggestion cannot be accepted. Surely this is a nation-saving move, an excellent and honourable way for the Prime Minister to get out of the dilemma in which he now finds himself.

In this tenth day of debate of this issue there is, I can assure the house, no less enthusiasm for speakers on this side of the house to defend the actions taken by earlier speakers or to defend the measures that will really bring about the national unity that we all expect. I have mentioned the lack of speakers from the other side of the chamber. One hon. member said this reminds him of a lawyer appearing in court with no witnesses. Why is this so? Is he unable to bring witnesses? Are hon. members opposite unable to muster arguments in the defence of their choice of a national flag?

I believe that members on all sides of the house must be receiving the kind of mail that we on this side are receiving. I cannot accept that merely because my neighbour happens to be in another political party the residents of that constituency are not writing the kind of letters that I and other hon. members are receiving. This makes me believe that hon. members who are not willing to tell the house of the kind of letters they are receiving are simply unable to do so because they are not in accord with the main motion put to the house by the Prime Minister.

As my witness I would call an editorial appearing in the Daily Graphic of May 21. This newspaper enjoys a wide circulation in my riding. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> The Canadian people have never been directly asked if they want a new flag. Surely this is the first step; it seems to us the question should be asked directly, in a national referendum, and not in the conflict of a partisan election.
> If we give birth to a flag out of today's dissension, by a pressed vote in parliament, what will it mean? Further dissension, undoubtedly.
> Consider, instead, with what pride and fanfare a flag ... and maybe a better flag ... might have been produced by a dominion-provincial conference that will, in due course, have to consider constitutional changes.
> Today is hardly the time, in the face of angry dissension, to force the flag issue on the Canadian people.

I believe many of us have come to feel this way, and that is why there have been repeated requests by speakers to have this matter held over for a few months so that feelings on this issue may be cooled and brought more into line. Coming to the point under discussion—to which I am sure we must limit ourselves—namely the referendum and the plebiscite itself, I would call as another witness an editorial which appeared in the Portage Leader, which says in part as follows:

> Limitless debate on Canada's flag is right ...
> It would be best, of course, if the Canadian government were to give the people of the nation the privilege of voting in a plebiscite on this question.
> It appears unlikely that Prime Minister Pearson is willing to extend to us this democratic luxury, but in the absence of such a plebiscite, it is then most necessary that every member—wherever seated in the green chamber—should be allowed to express his views with all the eloquence at his command.

This we are doing at the invitation of the Prime Minister. This editorial continues:

In some matters, members of parliament have a duty to follow the program proposed by the party to which they belong and which has given them the privilege of sitting in the governing benches of the House of Commons.

Any man who sought and gained election on the strength of a pledge that he would scrap our national ensign and replace it with some other device must in honour adhere to this commitment.

How many did? . . .

The vote on the flag issue should be completely free. Of course, it will not be. While Liberal members in the government benches have been promised that they will not be punished if they should rebel against the party line, they will be voting under a manifest discipline. Those Liberals who put loyalty to the flag above loyalty to the party may reasonably expect to lose favour in the party caucus.

This, however, is an issue on which individual members will prove their stature by acting independently and relying on the electorate rather than the party organization to pass judgment upon their actions.

With the New Democratic party and the Social Creditistes allied to the Liberals on the flag issue, it is expected that Mr. Pearson's pennant may gain parliamentary approval.

If it does, it will be a sad day for Canada, for many thousands of Canadians will be bitterly offended at the affront to the flag which they have saluted with great respect all their lives.

This is the sort of issue which can only lead to disunity. In our parliamentary democracy, however, the people—not the government—make the final decisions. Whether or not we have a plebiscite, the people will decide on the issue of the flag.

This is the good thing about parliamentary democracy that stems from the United Kingdom—the people can speak at least once in every five years. And they speak with thunderous authority.

I would remind the house that this question has developed at the insistence of the Prime Minister; he is the one who is inviting this discussion, and this is an indication that the Liberal government is not ready to test its popularity with the people of this country. Perhaps it is unwilling to test its stand in a referendum, and maybe that is the reason we are not being given the luxury, if I may call it that, of such a referendum.

With regard to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City, the first question reads:

1. Are you in favour of the red ensign?

We are asked to consider whether this is a proper question to appear on a plebiscite. I would merely call to mind a sample of some of the the mail which has come to me. First of all I should like to read a brief extract from a letter received from a study group in Winnipeg. One of the signatories to the letter is the mayor of Assiniboia. The letter reads in part:

The loss of the red ensign would cause a split in our nation such as we have never known before. This split added to the Pearson bicultural rift could spell the ruination of our future as a nation.

We believe that if the people of Canada fully understood the traditions represented by the symbols on the red ensign, they would overwhelmingly endorse its retention as our flag.

Were it not for the restrictive ruling made yesterday by the Chair I would have wanted to make additional comments about the meaning of a flag. However, I would refer hon. members to the excellent address of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who went to some length to explain the real purpose and meaning of our present flag.

This is a letter which I have received from McCreary, another part of my riding. It reads:

In regard to the national flag for Canada I am in favour of the red ensign. I am strongly in favour of the decision being left up to the people at the next election.

That is endorsing a referendum, and I have had numerous letters supporting the same step. I was also very interested to receive a petition from some collegiate students. About 100 names were placed on this petition from the Carberry collegiate, which puts forward in a very well worded resolution their arguments why they felt the red ensign should be retained as our national flag. Finally, on this first question I should like to mention that I received a letter from Westbourne which really is critical of any proposal for a referendum. However, it goes on to say:

I am not in favour of the tri-leaf flag. I think the red ensign does quite well—

So that even those letters which are critical of our stand—and they are not many in number—are still not in support of the proposed flag, the trifoil maple leaf design. I have mentioned the earlier speeches made in this house, and I have been most impressed by some of the arguments which have been put forward. I am hopeful that more people, as they become aware of the issues at stake, can be persuaded to think again about this very important step which the government is considering.

The second part of the plebiscite, question No. 2, reads:

Are you in favour of the red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?

I have already indicated a strong preference for the red ensign, but I personally am not inflexible in my stand. I also feel that many people across the country would quite readily accept a modification of the red ensign.

Here we have an odd situation which has developed. We have people who are very much in favour of the ensign and who say "Why all this fuss? Let us make the decision and make it final, and then stop any further debate". Then we have other people who say "Here is a new flag. This is what we want. Let us not continue needless debate; make it final and take a vote". Then again we have others who say "Why is a flag becoming a major issue in the first place, when there are more important things to discuss."

So it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that we have unanimity across the land at least on one point, and that is impatience at the length of time it has taken to come to agreement on this issue. I suggest to the Prime Minister that if there cannot be agreement, then this is no time to pursue the matter further, and that the judgment of the government must be that the temper of the land will not allow a decision to be taken on the matter. Certainly we do not want to make a decision in haste, like some other decisions taken by the government which have not proven too helpful to the development of our national affairs.

Coming back to the question of accepting modifications to the ensign, I think this is a point which will bring us together. If those of us who favour the ensign are able to say "Yes, we will compromise on a modification", and if those who feel strongly for the maple leaf design can bring themselves to say "We will accept some change or modification to our proposal", then perhaps we can come together with regard to a modification, which is suggested in question 2 of the proposed plebiscite.

I have been reminded of some remarks made by Rev. Gordon Smyth of the Parkdale United church on the question of symbolism. He said:

> It is impossible to cut symbolism out of the affairs of men and nations. The roots go deep. If a man were to resolve never to use a symbol again, he could not shake hands with a friend, put a ring on the finger of his bride, kiss his child or take a sacrament. Human nature requires symbols. The heart craves after some tangible expression of the intangible.

I suggest that the removal of symbols, which would mean removal of some of the traditions which we have come to revere, would be a serious undertaking, and that it ill behooves anyone to do this without proper attention being paid to the matter. I also suggest that such a step should not be taken in any kind of haste. I believe Canadians generally have an abiding faith in divine Providence, and that most Canadians share a trust under the only flag they know. If we are to do away with all links with past traditions, are we thereby indicating that we have become insensitive to the prayers for guidance of God and blessing upon Queen and nation, which mark the start of every day's sitting of this house? The country which does not honour its past has no future.

I would remind hon. members of the emphasis which is placed by this parliament on tradition at the opening of every session. We look at the mace on the table before us and are impressed with the years of tradition which it represents. I am sure that no other ceremony in Canada is as colourful or as dignified as the opening of parliament at the commencement of every session, because that is a ceremony filled with tradition. I suggest to hon. members that the complete removal of those symbols which have become so meaningful on our national flag without full regard to the implications of such a step would be a very dangerous action to take, if it is ever successfully taken. I repeat that the country which does not honour its past has no future.

I would mention at this point the third question on the plebiscite, which really forms the second part of my argument. I interject here to say that I have heard it said that there are too many questions on the proposed plebiscite. It is said that if there are four questions to be answered this will defeat the possibility of any one question being answered in a clear, decisive manner. However, I suggest to the house that really the four questions fall very neatly into two parts. The first two questions deal with the red ensign and modification thereof; the second two questions, questions 3 and 4, deal with the maple leaf design and modification thereof.

Again I point to the wording of the proposed plebiscite, which refers to "among the questions to be placed before the people". It does not say that these are the only questions. Perhaps the questions could even be modified further. I find very little difficulty in supporting entirely the subamendment as it now appears.

Referring to the second half of the subamendment dealing with those questions in respect of the maple leaf, permit me to name as my further witness a person eminent in public affairs, Dr. Eugene Forsey, who has been often quoted in this house and who reminds us all that we have at this stage accepted the fact that Canada is a bicultural country. If that is so, why then are we so anxious to change and keep out of the flag any implication or indication of this fact of biculturalism? Certainly the design as proposed gives no indication of this fact of biculturalism. As Dr. Forsey has said, every human vestige of our country and everything distinctively Canadian has been carefully excluded from this design by this legislation.

Of course we all realize that Canadians have carried the maple leaf insignia on their uniforms in times of war. However, this fact has been played up out of all proportion. The Royal Canadian Legion is aware of this fact, and what segment of the population is in a better position to appreciate it? What segment of the population deserves more respect? It is true that veterans wore the maple leaf in battle, but I am certain they were not marching under the maple leaf design but rather were marching into battle for ideals associated with the Canadian ensign, which have been lauded by so many capable speakers already.

The authority I have referred to, Dr. Eugene Forsey, and another eminent historian, Dr. Creighton, professor of history at the University of Toronto, wrote an open letter to the Prime Minister dated May 27, 1964, in which they say something about this distinctive new flag which I think should be repeated. That letter reads in part as follows:

> We applaud your decision to seek a distinctive national flag for Canada, and recognize your courage in doing so. We believe, as you do, that the flag should be a source of national unity, and that it should be unmistakeably Canadian in character. However, we protest that the maple leaf flag is neither of these things. Its only advantage is that it is innocuous, that it produces tepid approval, mild disapproval, or indifference, and that it can therefore be adopted without any display of strong feeling whatever. We have a despairing feeling that this insipid flag, instead of promoting national unity, will produce only an indifferent response, and in doing so will subtly undermine the Canadian will to survive. We believe profoundly that this negative approach to our national symbols erodes our national spirit.

Later in this same letter these gentlemen state:

> We believe that Canada has a distinguished culture of its own. We believe that this is a positive culture. We believe that the basis of this positive culture is a frank acceptance of both the English Canadian and the French Canadian civilizations. We believe that a distinctive Canadian flag should reflect this positive fact.

[Mr. Enns.]

> We are not in the position of a country with a revolutionary tradition, creating itself anew; we exist because we have inherited the past without a revolutionary upheaval. It is false and dispiriting to adopt a flag which subtly ignores the truth of our own nature. This is not the kind of symbol to rally a bewildered . . . nation.

I think these are very eloquent arguments that we should be careful and slow in the removal of these things and the introduction of new symbols in our flag without paying due regard to the effect on the minds of the people of this country as a result of these significant changes. The adoption of a flag is not the kind of measure that can be amended from year to year. Very often we say that parliament decides an issue and the Canadian people must accept the decision of parliament, but most economic measures can be amended year by year and changed by increasing or decreasing the amount of expenditures, or by adopting new policies as for example in respect of foreign affairs. We know from our experience to date that the adoption of a national symbol on a new flag can and usually will arouse great emotional crises throughout the country. It would certainly be folly for anyone to suggest that parliament can come back in five years and improve on the flag by adding to it, changing the colour, or making some other change that might then be appropriate.

For that reason it is very important that the type of flag to be adopted is one that will really be accepted by all Canadians. I submit we will not know of this acceptance until there has been a national referendum held along the lines suggested in the sub-amendment now under discussion.

National unity and harmony are too important to be driven, introduced or threatened at this delicate stage of our Canadian history. I suggest that every precaution possible should be taken, in respect of any undertaking similar to the adoption of a new flag, to assure ourselves that we are helping to continue and strengthen a united nation willing to stand together regardless of the issues that face the country. I am confident that somehow this can be accomplished, but I believe this will require an honest effort on the part of all members to conduct themselves in such a manner that extreme positions will not be taken, but rather that positions of reasonableness will prevail.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have hesitated to take part in this debate, not from any lack of conviction but because no one with respect for our parliamentary institutions would wish to contribute to the filibuster now under way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if anyone had any doubt that a filibuster is under way this doubt disappeared on Thursday evening when the hon. member for Regina City moved his subamendment which is now under discussion in the house. The purpose of that subamendment could only be to prolong the debate. Indeed, when your ruling was challenged, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members opposite made it quite clear that they hoped you would rule that they could repeat their speeches over and over again.

Mr. More: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to a question of privilege. I think under the rules it is not proper for a member of this house to impute motives to other members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. More: Certainly the minister has directly imputed a motive to me in respect of my action in this house on Thursday night. I took the action I did then to indicate what a plebiscite should be, and I ask that the minister withdraw the imputation in respect of any other intent.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to speak to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The imputation of motives was not directed solely to the hon. member for Regina City; the minister included all the members of the Conservative opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: There is general agreement, apparently, amongst the members of the Liberal claque.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: The trained seals, the successors of the 1956 Liberals.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that we allow the minister to answer the point raised by the hon. member for Regina City, and perhaps the clouds will disappear very quickly.

Mr. Churchill: May I have the privilege of finishing my sentence?

Mr. Speaker: Well, I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had finished when he got off the particular subject which had been raised as a point of order and began making general remarks. I thought it was time to intervene.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, there was an interruption from the other side which perhaps might have been called to order and corrected. I wanted to finish my remarks by saying that the minister, in addition to withdrawing the imputation of motives with regard to the hon. member for Regina City, might at the same time withdraw the imputation of motives with regard to the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the opposition seem to be very sensitive today. If anything I have said offended them in any way, if I imputed any motives to them to which they object, I certainly withdraw. I should like to say this to you, Mr. Speaker, however. Whether or not this was the intent —I shall not really impute motives—this is certainly the result. This subamendment is prolonging the debate, in my view quite unnecessarily. Anything that is being said on the subamendment could have been said on the amendment.

If one examines the proposition put before this house, the four questions that might be asked on a referendum, one is led to the conclusion that the house could not take a decision on this particular subamendment without further subamendments. If I were to agree that there should be a plebiscite, Mr. Speaker, I would not agree with these four questions and I would have to move a series of subamendments. I do not agree, and I am sure that the majority of the members oppose a plebiscite. I challenge the opposition to let the question come to a vote.

Mr. Grafftey: A free vote.

Mr. Sharp: It will be a free vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Martineau: In view of the minister's statement that it will be a free vote, will he say whether the government would continue in office if the motion were accepted?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada speaks for this party and is the house leader. He will answer. I say this to my hon. friend, that it will make no difference to the votes of the people on this side of the house whether this is a free vote or whether it is a vote that may result in the defeat of the government. We believe in this flag individually.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a great deal of argument, when former matters were before the house, that nothing was going on that even faintly resembled a filibuster. There are a few innocents abroad who believed that. Today I do not believe anyone has any illusions about what is going on in the house. Hon. members opposite are determined to prolong this debate as long as possible and prevent parliament from acting.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Will the minister permit a question? My question is, who has charge of the business of parliament, the government or the opposition?

Mr. Sharp: May I say this to my hon. friend, that if a party is determined to prolong the debate there is very little that can be done by any group, regardless of whether it is in the minority or the majority. I suggest to my hon. friend that the question of who is in control of this house may be answered by saying that the house leader attempts to lead the house, but if my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition does not choose to follow there is nothing he can do about it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we think about filibusters our minds go to other places where filibusters have been attempted. I want to suggest to my friends opposite—

Mr. Peters: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There was a ruling made yesterday that speeches should be related to the subamendment. I would strongly urge Your Honour to enforce this ruling.

Mr. Sharp: May I just speak to this point of order? I think it ought to be cleared up once and for all right now that I am opposed to the subamendment. I am speaking against it. Are only those in favour of it to be given the privilege of speaking on it?

Mr. Peters: I suggest that the hon. member who has the floor should contain himself. The decision of the Speaker yesterday was very definite, that the debate should be relevant to the subamendment. I suggest that all speakers be held to that ruling.

Mr. Sharp: May I suggest that what I am saying is strictly relevant to the subamendment, which I contend is part of the filibuster.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order. I think the house would welcome a ruling as to whether a discussion of the nature of a filibuster is related to the subamendment before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I think the ruling made yesterday by the Speaker, and confirmed by the house, was to the effect that the debate at this particular stage should be confined to the subamendment. I would hope the minister would keep his remarks within the bounds of the ruling that the Chair made yesterday.

Mr. Sharp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May I refer, then, immediately to the subamendment. I am discussing the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City which appears on page 6808 of Hansard, and which suggests that the amendment before the house be amended by adding thereto certain words containing four questions. I am speaking to the subamendment and I am opposed to it. I am giving reasons why I am opposed to it.

Before the debate on the subamendment goes any further, or before what I contend is a filibuster proceeds any further, may I offer my friends opposite a few words of advice. I am not personally concerned about the prospect of a prolonged debate on this subamendment or a prolonged filibuster. I have been reconciled to it for some time now, so have my colleagues and so, I am convinced, have most of the members of this house. My concern, and it is a concern which I share with all thoughtful Canadians, is as to the effect the prolongation of this debate in an indefinite manner will have—

An hon. Member: Change the business.

Mr. Sharp: I am talking about the subamendment which prolongs the debate indefinitely.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Martineau: In view of his statement regarding the filibuster, so-called, and his concern about the indefinite prolongation of this debate, can he say if he is ready to recommend that the government bring in closure in this debate?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, as I said I am prepared to stay here indefinitely. My concern with the indefinite prolongation of this debate by devices such as the subamendment which we are now discussing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The interruptions are such that I am not able to hear very clearly what is being said.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, my concern with the indefinite prolongation of this debate which this subamendment would lead to is not so much with its effect upon parliament. I think parliament can survive a filibuster, although it certainly won't enhance its reputation; and the people of Canada won't enjoy the filibuster, but they will survive it too. But what about the party led by my right hon. friend, who unfortunately is not in his seat at the present time? I regret his absence because I do not like referring to the right hon. gentleman when he is not here, and that is the only reason I mentioned it.

How long can this party that he leads remain united if it continues to pursue what I regard as this irersponsible and desperate manoeuvre, trying to prevent parliament from reaching a decision on this vital issue by this device of subamendments and in any other way they choose to carry on the debate? There was a time when I had an admiration, a rather reluctant admiration I must say, for the Leader of the Opposition as he led his party out of the wilderness. He led it to power. He led it to one of the greatest electoral triumphs in the history of this country. In those days he proclaimed his vision of Canada. He spoke of one Canada, united and strong. He led a rejuvenated Conservative party that seemed temporarily at least to have submerged its reactionary tendencies. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, have they abandoned this prospect of a united Canada?

Mr. Grafftey: No.

Mr. Sharp: Is this subamendment which I am debating a substitute for policy?

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Sharp: That is what I have always contended, and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) confirmed that this party opposite has no policy on the flag, when he spoke like that. Are hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly those who speak the same language as I do, prepared to see their party torn asunder and disintegrate?

Mr. Dinsdale: Worry about your own party.

Mr. Sharp: Is their party going to wither away into a regional party of reaction?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): May I ask the minister since when was he so concerned about the future of the Conservative party?

Mr. Sharp: I shall answer that question directly. I have concern for it, and it is not only my concern. I have here an editorial from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald that answers directly the question asked by my hon. friend opposite:

> By pursuing its present tactics to the point of forcing an election—

And until I heard the Leader of the Opposition today welcoming an election, and with all that humility he has asserting that they were going to succeed the present government—indeed, calling for an election—I did not know whether this was true.

> By pursuing its present tactics to the point of forcing an election, the Conservatives, either willingly or otherwise, would find themselves appealing to English speaking Canada only. Such a campaign would mean the defeat of the ten Conservative M.P.'s from Quebec, excepting possibly Léon Balcer.
> The party of Macdonald and Cartier no longer would be a national party, flexible enough to accommodate all regions of the country and all segments of the electorate.
> It would leave moderate Quebeckers no alternative to the Liberals and it would give—

Mr. Martin (Timmins): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman or yourself, sir, could inform the house whether the party of Macdonald and Cartier is found in the subamendment?

Mr. Sharp: My trouble is that I do not find the party of Macdonald and Cartier in this house. That is my concern. What I would like to see is some of the spirit of Macdonald and Cartier, not a plebiscite, not a subamendment to prolong this debate. Let me read further from this editorial, because it is relative to this point:

> Conservatism, the peculiarly Canadian brand of it so laboriously nurtured by Sir John A. Macdonald, and rooted in the creation of unity out of diversity, would become—if it has not already become—the prisoner of prairie populism.
> It is a bitter memory to recall that the Conservative party between 1958 and 1962 held 50 of Quebec's 75 seats. Today, it has ten and seems determined to lose those. If it does, not merely the Conservatives, but the entire nation will be the loser.

That is my answer. Mr. Speaker, as a Liberal I should not be concerned about the future of the Conservative party, but as a Canadian I am; and when I see the dissension in the ranks of the Conservative party it hurts me as a Canadian, because I want to see that party strong and united, able sometime, perhaps, to take over the government of this country again.

Mr. Coates: I assume, Mr. Speaker, from the latitude you are allowing the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this debate that all further members, so long as this subamendment is being debated, will be allowed the same latitude in covering the field.

Mr. Sharp: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will deal fairly with all sides. I believe I am being relevant. I believe I have a right to say why I am strongly opposed to this subamendment. When I heard myself challenged, along with other members on this side, to get up and speak, what was I supposed to do; support the subamendment? I am strongly opposed to it, and I intend to give my reasons.

The other evening I listened to the Leader of the Opposition speaking on the television program "The Nation's Business." What interested me most about his remarks on that occasion was not his appeal to the people to write in to the government in support of the red ensign which, since my hon. friends would like relevance, is the subject of one of the questions proposed in the subamendment. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition was anticipating the motion he was going to put before the house when he appealed in advance for that sort of response, but predictably that appeal produced very little result. Certainly none of it came my way, and I consulted among my colleagues and found little response had come their way either.

That did not concern me particularly because that is what I expected, but what did concern me, and concerned me mightily, was the suggestion in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition that the fleur-de-lis should appear on the Canadian flag along with the union jack. Where did this suggestion come from? Did it come from the deskmate of the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer)? I should like to have an answer to that question. Did it come from any of the members of the Conservative party from the province of Quebec? I am sure if this suggestion had been put to any of those hon. gentlemen they would have spurned it with contempt. To the people of Quebec this suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition—and I have heard it echoed by a number of speakers on the other side, none of them French Canadians—must have appeared as a clumsy and gratuitous piece of appeasement; it must have appeared to my French Canadian friends as a bone thrown out to a troublesome minority to keep them quiet.

An hon. Member: Does the second part of your resolution appeal to them?

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition did not mean it that way. I give him the benefit of the doubt. But whatever he intended, that is how it appears; just plain, unadorned appeasement by one who had not taken the trouble to understand the true sentiments and true feelings of the French speaking people of this country. I say now, to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. gentlemen opposite, let us forget about trying to appease anybody in connection with this flag. Let us all work toward a flag which is truly Canadian and which represents all of us, whatever our origin and language, a flag which symbolizes our unity, not our divisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: In this subamendment—and I will be strictly relevant, as I have been—in the second of the questions proposed for a plebiscite, the hon. gentleman apparently was thinking of a union jack with a fleur-de-lis in the fly.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Sharp: What would this proposal mean? To me it would not represent the unity of Canada. It would be a perpetual reminder of our divisions. Yesterday I listened to a number of speakers, taking part in the debate on the subamendment, who boasted of their British origins. I could boast like that, too. I am, I think, of pure Scottish blood, though there is perhaps a little Irish mixed in somewhere.

Mr. Nowlan: Unfortunately, not very much.

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps that is right; I would like to have a little more. I received part of my education in Britain. My father fought in the first world war, and I certainly take second place to no one in my respect for British institutions or my dedication to the British connection. Moreover, I represent an English speaking constituency. I think I know one French speaking Canadian in that constituency, a very eminent lawyer. Other than that, I think they are all English speaking. Does this mean I should insist upon the union jack appearing in a Canadian flag?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Sharp: If that is the attitude we are never, in this country, going to get a flag which is acceptable. I am very proud of my British heritage, but I tell this house one thing I am even more proud of, and that is of being a Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: As a Canadian I call upon all my fellow Canadians in this house to seek a flag which represents Canada at home and abroad. Such a flag should say, to borrow a phrase of the Prime Minister's, "I stand for Canada". It would be a flag for all of us; for those of my background and experience, for those of Ukrainian origin, for those who came from Germany and Poland, for all the peoples who make up the mosaic of our culture.

During the last few days I have made a point of listening to the speeches made in this debate both on the subamendment and on the amendment which is still before the house and which hon. members opposite do not wish to come to a vote. I must say that all those to whom I listened spoke with great sincerity. They stated with sincerity their convictions about a Canadian flag, and this is as it should be. I have no quarrel with that; I hope I am speaking with some conviction myself now.

But as I listened to those speeches I must confess I was disappointed. Hon. gentlemen opposite spoke of their devotion to the red ensign. They spoke of the Christian symbolism of the crosses of the union jack. I listened very carefully and I was very impressed by some of the speeches, particularly those made by members from western Canada. Perhaps I have a little affinity with them because I spent the first 30 years of my life in that part of the country. But what I missed—and I hope the hon. gentlemen opposite will understand my concern—were evidences of the spirit which I believe must animate Canada, a spirit of tolerance and conciliation. The devotion of these hon. members to the red ensign, I can understand, but what I cannot understand, and what every thoughtful Canadian must deplore, are the derisive references to the proposal put forward by the Prime Minister as a design for Canada's flag.

I will never speak with disrespect or with derision about the Canadian ensign; I can assure hon. members of that. I do not think anyone in this house will do so. Regardless of the outcome of this debate, the red ensign will always have an honoured place in Canadian history. As hon. members opposite are fond of saying, many people fought and bled under that red ensign, so regardless of whether or not in continues as the flag of Canada, it will always be honoured. But to me, and to millions of Canadians who think like me—and there are millions of them, I can assure hon. members opposite—the three red maple leaves are also an honoured symbol of Canada, and my blood boils when members opposite refer to that symbol in disparaging terms. I do not need to remind them how many times we hear them refer with a derisive note in their voices to the "Pearson pennant".

An hon. Member: That is what it is.

Mr. Sharp: There it is again. The national symbol of Canada is being treated with derision.

Mr. MacEwan: It is a Liberal flag.

Mr. Sharp: Throughout the world, wherever Canadians travel and wherever Canadian soldiers are buried, the maple leaf stands for Canada. I feel that hon. gentlemen opposite, when they allow their partisan feelings to overcome their reason, might take care before they cast slurs on what has come to be known as a symbol of Canada throughout the ages, or throughout a hundred years, which amounts to ages in our history.

Listening to this debate on the subamendment—and I think this is relevant because I am referring to remarks made by hon. gentlemen on the other side when speaking on the subamendment—I was shocked as well as disappointed by the recurring theme that the proposed flag, the three maple leaf flag which is also mentioned in the subamendment, constitutes an appeasement of Quebec. This theme recurs throughout. It recurs in the letters I get. I regret to say it has also occurred and recurred in the speeches of my hon. friends opposite. If my hon. friends opposite are determined to alienate not only Quebec but millions of English speaking Canadians like myself, that is the thing to go on saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: There is nothing whatever in the maple leaf design reminiscent of Quebec or of French Canada. The maple leaf is in fact the one generally acknowledged symbol of Canada. We have no other, and the one embodied in this resolution has the sanction of widespread acceptance and recognition. When I hear it suggested, as some hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested, that the maple leaf flag mentioned in the subamendment is appeasement of Quebec, I ask them this: Was the sovereign of the day seeking to appease Quebec when she approved the three maple leaves as the distinctive Canadian symbol on the Canadian coat of arms nearly 100 years ago? Was this appeasement of Quebec? Was King George V seeking to appease Quebec when he approved three red maple leaves as the Canadian symbol? Was the government of Canada seeking to appease Qubec when it designed the second world war discharge button with its three maple leaves? Was the Canadian Legion seeking to appease Quebec when it adopted the maple leaf on its badge? I could go on, Mr. Speaker. This is what hon. gentlemen opposite are saying, that this is appeasement of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Which ones? Name them.

Mr. Sharp: As an English speaking Canadian representing an English speaking riding—

Mr. Bigg: Mr Speaker, would the minister permit a question? I spoke for 40 minutes last night, and I never made any such statement at any time. You can count me out of that. I love Quebec as much as any other province of Canada. I hope the minister does, too, and will stop this partisan speech.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I listened with the greatest respect to the speech of my hon. friend, as I hope he will to my speech. There was as much politics in his speech as there is in mine. I am as sincere in my remarks on the flag as was my hon. friend. He made no disparaging remarks about Quebec in his speech, and I thank him for it. As an English speaking Canadian representing an English speaking riding, I resent the implication that this flag is appeasement of Quebec. If I believed that, I would vote against the resolution.

To return, Mr. Speaker, to the words of the subamendment and the particular proposal put forward in this house by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More), I do not think—I say this with all sincerity, and I am sure that anyone who looks at the proposition would agree—the proposed plebiscite with these four questions will advance the cause of the Canadian flag, nor will it advance Canadian unity. A plebiscite of this kind will do the very opposite. Everyone knows there are differences of opinion about the design of a Canadian flag; you do not have to have a plebiscite to determine that. When I consider the shades of opinion throughout the country on the flag, four questions would only begin to cover the vast panorama of ideas.

An hon. Member: It is at least democracy.

Mr. Sharp: We do not need a plebiscite to prove that we are not all agreed as to what might be a preferable flag. The argument that those who would lose in such a plebiscite would be reconciled by the knowledge that they had been voted down is certainly the most fatuous of all propositions. In my view a plebiscite, regardless of the questions—these four or any others—would only serve to harden attitudes that up to that time had been tentative, flexible, open to persuasion and tolerant.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one way by which Canada will have a national flag, and that is by the decision of this parliament. Let us live up to our responsibilities; let us get down to the business of making a decision. I do not mind a debate, but let us not have a filibuster; let us not have indefinite debate which has no purpose other than to avoid the taking of decisions.

Mr. Grafftey: Then give us a free vote. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Sharp: When I look back on the history of this country and at some of the great and momentous decisions that were taken, I do not find very much evidence of plebiscites. The only plebiscites that I have been able to find were not very satisfactory ones. I think we had some sort of a plebiscite on prohibition, which did not prevent anyone drinking. Then we had a plebiscite on national conscription, which I do not think did very much to cement the unity of this country.

I can imagine what Sir John A. Macdonald would have done with the idea of a plebiscite about confederation. You can just imagine the series of questions: Do you favour union of Ontario and Quebec? Do you favour union of Ontario and Quebec and the maritime provinces? Do you think Newfoundland should be in? And so on. One can imagine all the questions. Sir John A. Macdonald was a more sensible man; he knew that these great decisions are settled in parliament—and that is where this one is going to be settled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: If I may take another idol of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), did Sir Robert Borden take a plebiscite before he insisted upon the independence of Canada within the commonwealth?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, since I am brought in, does the hon. gentleman know that the Liberal party advocated a plebiscite in 1916 and 1917?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, that was a little before my time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: You are out of your depth, anyway; it is away over your head.

Mr. Sharp: The Prime Minister of Canada has taken the lead by proposing the resolution for a distinctive national flag in which he has endeavoured to embody Canada's national symbol. He has taken the responsible course of a responsible statesman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: I invite my hon. friends opposite, and particularly the Leader of the Opposition, to abandon their negative role, which gets its best representation by this futile subamendment and which is doing so much damage to his party, and for that reason to the country, and join with the Prime Minister in achieving another great step forward in our development as a nation.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, now that the government has taken part in this flag debate and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) has said what has hung so heavily on his soul and has bothered his conscience over the last few days, I want to now take part in this debate on the flag. Regardless of what it may be called by any newspaper or any other news media, and even by the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any other member of this house, who have said this is a filibuster, I intend to take my part in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Thus, Mr. Speaker, I want to take my rightful opportunity as a member of the House of Commons to state my view and express my opinion on this very important subject. We listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce start his speech with a lot of drivel and end up with emotion. He wanted to impress on the House of Commons and the country the fact that he held the red ensign dear to his heart, but he felt that it should be discarded and another flag substituted in its place. With regard to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) that the red ensign should include something of French Canada as one of the founding races in this country—the fleur-de-lis—the Minister of Trade and Commerce immediately charged that this was appeasement. I ask, appeasement to whom? Is it not appeasement to take away the union jack from the red ensign? I ask, appeasement to whom? I wish, Mr. Speaker, that the minister had not made his speech, because I had not intended to speak in this vein. I am not of British origin and I am not of French origin; I am proud to be of Ukrainian origin and I am also a good Canadian.

It is furthest from my thoughts and mind to divide the people of this country. I think it is our duty in this House of Commons to bring people together in a democratic fashion in the best way possible. It is our duty to bring them to agreement. But we are not finding agreement in this country today. It makes me as a Canadian other than of French or English origin bleed to find the two founding races fighting between themselves, causing disunity for political and partisan reasons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: That is not so in this party.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I believe in a democracy for this country. This is what all Canadians who are used to living in a democratic way believe in. They are used to having the opportunities presented by a democratic country. Opportunity is the dearest thing democracy gives to the people—opportunity to work, opportunity to realize ambitions, opportunity to voice opinions. But this is what the present government is trying to take away from the people of this country. This government has set its course and has said that the people of the country shall have what the government gives them. It is all very well to say that if any legislation which is passed is found to be detrimental to certain areas of the country the government which initiated that legislation, if it is still in office, or an ensuing government, can change the legislation so that the people receive equal benefits. But once a flag is approved it cannot be changed. And who takes the responsibility in this case?

Mr. Sharp: Parliament.

Mr. Starr: Do 19 million Canadians take that responsibility? No. When the final vote is counted in this house, about 150 members of parliament, whipped into line in most cases, will say to the Canadian people: "This is the flag the Prime Minister told us to vote for. This is the flag we voted for, and this is the flag you are going to have for all time".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps this might be a good time for the Chair to intervene—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: It is too late.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think it is my duty to remind the hon. member who has the floor that he should as much as possible bear in mind the amendment and the subamendment which are now before the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear protests, but the part of the hon. member's speech which was heard by the Chair referred to the question of a plebiscite. I realize that the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) has to move to his subject, but I would ask him to keep in mind in due course the decision reached yesterday by the house.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I always try to abide by your ruling. I have respect for any occupant of the chair in this House of Commons. But my conception of the situation is that the subamendment proposes that the people of Canada should have the opportunity to express their opinion on four distinct questions. My remarks up to this moment have been directed to that and I do not intend to stray away from it. If you feel I am straying away from the subamendment at any time, please bring the fact to my attention; but up till now I beg to differ with Your Honour, even though I respect your decision. I still think I am keeping within the subamendment now before the house.

I suggest that other vital matters which have come before the people of this country, matters not so much in the federal field of jurisdiction because the opportunity has not presented itself in the federal field, but matters within provincial areas of jurisdiction and municipal areas of jurisdiction, have not been settled by the bodies governing those areas but by referendums which have been submitted to the people. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, if we continue on this path—and I believe this with all my heart—we will cause more disunity in this country than we have ever seen before, and we will never be able to heal it. I appeal to the government. It is not too late now. I speak with all sincerity when I say, give the people of this country the opportunity to say what they want.

The subamendment provides four choices. Those who wish to retain the red ensign will have the opportunity by secret ballot to indicate their feeling. Those who want modification of the red ensign can by secret ballot say so. Those who want the three maple leaves flag can so indicate by secret ballot. Those who want the one maple leaf design can also speak. And we know from experience over the years that the people of this country will abide by the majority decision.

We are divided in this house, Mr. Speaker, and we are divided over this subamendment. There are those in the house who feel that the red ensign should be retained because it has served this country for so many years. Children have been born under it and immigrants have come here and found freedom under it. I speak as one whose parents came to this country at the ages of 17 and 16. They married here without a friend. Why did they come to Canada, Mr. Speaker? They came here to find freedom of opportunity, justice and liberty, things they never enjoyed in the country from whence they came. Because that flag gave them that opportunity, they worked hard. The opportunity was there and they were able to make a living in this country. They were able to set the foundation for people like myself to participate in the active life of this country, and they were, as I am, good Canadians. Surely those who would like to see modifications of the red ensign have a desire to give a prominent place to the two founding races.

I come from people who believe in tradition and who do not throw tradition out the window when it has served its usefulness. I come from people who do not discard tradition in order to appease. I think it is good tradition that will not allow people to throw their parents out the door when they become too old. People have a responsibility to look after those parents. All of these things are part and parcel of human nature and upbringing.

We also have the proposal for the three maple leaf flag by the Prime Minister and the government. Surely those people who want to support it should have the opportunity of doing so by secret ballot, because here in this house we find the government as well as some other hon. members supporting this proposal. We also have a group of members in this house who feel that the one maple leaf flag is the flag that should be adopted for Canada. Mr. Speaker, we are divided in this house on this vital issue. I submit the country is being divided, and is perhaps even now divided. Many people have very strong feelings about this issue and unless we give them an opportunity to express those feelings by secret ballot, and experience the satisfaction that they have had a voice, we will never heal the wounds that will be inflicted upon this nation. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this is the only way we can remove the flag issue from partisan politics.

Most of us have our constituents and their votes in mind when we vote on issues in this house. Let us take this issue out of partisan politics. I appeal to the Prime Minister to play no favourite with anyone, and let the people of this country decide this issue. All of us in this house have politics in mind during the debate on any issue, because we are all here as politicians. Most of the members in this house conduct polls in their ridings to find out the feeling of the majority of the people. Is that the procedure we are going to follow in deciding how to vote on this issue? Certainly that is the procedure most members will follow. I am sure every member representing a French Canadian riding will follow that procedure and vote in favour of the three maple leaf design because that is the will of the majority of the people in Quebec. What consideration is being given to the feelings of the people of Ontario? How are we going to heal the wounds that will be inflicted on half the people in a riding because they are divided evenly on this issue? Should one follow the wishes expressed by one half of the people in the hope that the remainder will forget about the situation? Certainly those people will not forget.

Mr. Speaker, I again urge the Prime Minister and the government to take this issue out of the arena of political partisanship in which we have found ourselves embroiled. Perhaps to do so will necessitate the spending of more money. Surely we are spending money in this country for various other reasons probably not as important as this. In my opinion this whole issue is one of the most important to come before this house since I became a member in 1952.

Let us consider for a moment the effect of the adoption of a new flag on the unity of this country. Do the Prime Minister and the government think that the adoption of the three maple leaf flag will bring unity to this country? That thought is far from the truth, Mr. Speaker.

As I said earlier, I am not of British origin, but I have often looked at British people and marvelled at the tolerance they have displayed. I do not know what would happen in another country if a symbol of the people's heritage was removed from the flag. I am not sure that there would not be a revolution. People's hearts must bleed when they witness that happening. Who is going to take down the flag which has stood in this country for so many years as a symbol to the people who came and built this country and provided the opportunity to those of other races to come here and enjoy the liberty provided under this flag? Surely their hearts will bleed as a result of the adoption of the proposal of the government.

In view of human nature one cannot expect to take away something which is dear to the people's hearts, throw it out the window and have unity. Unity will never be created in this country if we follow that course, and I appeal to the Prime Minister and the government to abandon this mad policy. Give the people of this country an opportunity to speak silently one by one. I am sure they will make a choice and they will all agree with the choice of the majority. I am certain these people will not agree with a decision made by 150 or 160 members in this house, which is rammed down their throats. Those members will have to say they combined to adopt this flag for Canada and the people must accept it whether they like it or not. They must say to the people, this is your flag and no one can amend it.

Mr. Speaker, I think we must pursue a solution to this problem with a little more sanity. I think the government must reconsider its position and should not be adamant in its stand. Let us consider how the three maple leaf design was introduced. Let us consider the tortuous path its introduction travelled. The first unveiling of this three maple leaf design was carried out by the Prime Minister before a group of newspapermen in his own home. Even the cabinet was not aware of this design.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Starr: Even the caucus did not know about the design. In fact, no one knew about it other than the Prime Minister, and he wanted to observe the reaction to it and called the members of the press—

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Starr: Do you have a point of order or a question of privilege, not that it really makes much difference?

An hon. Member: This is just an excuse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, irrespective of the remarks just made, my rising on a point of order to obtain the ruling of Mr. Speaker is not an excuse. A decision was rendered yesterday afternoon, and I think the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) has now turned exclusively to a discussion of the main resolution before this house. That decision indicated clearly that a debate on a subamendment must be limited to the subject of the subamendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the solicitude of the Minister of Justice does not command very much support. He stood silent when his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) was speaking. Surely we have not come to an occasion in this House of Commons when every time the Minister of Justice feels that anything said on this side contravenes the rules, as he would interpret them, he has to be listened to. Why was he so silent? Why did he sit so inert when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking?

Sir, the hon. gentleman who was speaking may not be speaking in a way that appeals to the sentiments of hon. gentlemen opposite, but if ever there was an hon. gentleman speaking with authority of heart and experience, it is the hon. gentleman for Ontario (Mr. Starr).

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Justice has intervened in what I have said, but certainly I am not going into the history of both parties, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) did. I am staying entirely within a discussion of the subamendment, and have referred to the flags that subamendment has proposed as choices for the people of this country. I referred to the tortuous steps that were taken to introduce the new flag in an attempt to obliterate all tradition of this country. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce describes as appeasement the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to have a fleur-de-lis on the red ensign, in an attempt to give the prominence to the founding races of this country which is their due, that is improper description. I have not endeavoured to go into the whole tortuous speech that he made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And false, too.

Mr. Starr: He said that this was a gratuitous piece of appeasement in order to satisfy the French founding race of this country. After the unveiling to selected members of the press gallery the Prime Minister, without consulting his cabinet, without consulting the caucus or parliament, unveiled this flag before the Canadian Legion at their convention in Winnipeg. Only then did he go to the cabinet and ask for approval.

[Mr. Favreau.]

These are the steps taken. After that he came to the Liberal caucus and got their approval. Then he came to parliament. Meanwhile, sir, what was happening? Pins were appearing all over this country and being sold over the counter, on which there was the three maple leaf design, before parliament had an opportunity of discussing it. There were bathing suits in this design, too; they looked a lot nicer. The proposed design for a Canadian flag is now being put to commercial use. Is this the way in which a flag design for this country should be treated? We have bumper stickers, flags put on twigs and flown upside down to be used by reporters for the purpose of pictures, as happened last Saturday to the Leader of the Opposition and me. This is being foisted upon the people, and I think it is wrong. I think the people are beginning to resent this procedure.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister and his government to reconsider their position. This emblem that has been proposed by the Prime Minister is being used for every other purpose except a flag. The Minister without Portfolio has ordered 100,000 bumper stickers.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I did not place an order for 100,000 bumper strips, as stated by the hon. member for Ontario. However, I know that so many people are asking for them throughout Canada that 100,000 would be far from enough to meet the demand.

Mr. Lambert: There is no point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Starr: I was absolutely right, the Minister without Portfolio has ordered 100,000 bumper stickers. This is the purpose for which this proposed emblem is being used, even before it has been hoisted on a flagpole to be respected by the people of this country. This design is being made up in bathing suits, bumper stickers, and boloney is being sold under this insignia. Is this the sort of emblem of which we, as Canadians, can be proud? All of these stickers are being made, boloney, beer and all the other products are being sold under this insignia. This is what we are being asked to adopt as a flag. Everything else that has stood for our flag in the past is being dumped out of the window.

Mr. Favreau: I rise on a point of order. I suggest that it is up to the hon. member for Ontario to show that the type of discussion he is giving us now has anything to do with the question of whether or not the questionnaire should read a certain way, as the hon. member for Regina City has suggested in his subamendment.

Mr. Starr: There are four choices listed in this subamendment, and I am discussing each and every one of them. I am discussing how they came about. I am saying that the red ensign has been our flag for years. Sacrifices have been made under it, freedom and opportunity have been found under it. I am discussing also how the three maple leaf flag has been brought about; that is all I am doing. These four questions are in the subamendment.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Some hon. Members: Wasting the time of the house; filibuster.

Mr. Favreau: —I suggest that what the hon. member is doing now is making a speech which has nothing to do with the drafting of the questionnaire. It deals with the merits of the original resolution before the house. The decision rendered yesterday directed this ought not to be done.

Mr. Churchill: May I speak to the point of order? Before you entered the chamber this afternoon, sir, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking. He dealt with the general subject of what he called the filibuster, gave us a lecture on that and made a personal attack on the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In his absence.

Mr. Churchill: He discussed the Conservative party, its present position and its future. He then made a reference to the Leader of the Opposition and his address on a television program last week. He drew attention to the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition that some symbol of French Canada might appear on our flag. These were some of the subjects he discussed without interruption by the Speaker. It was a wide open debate. We ought not now to be denied a similar wide open debate just because the Minister of Justice is attempting to intervene.

There was no interruption from this side of the house. I suggest to you that reference should be made to Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 110. At the bottom of the page you will read this:

> Freedom of speech is a sacred principle and if there is a place where it should be fully respected that place is the parliament of the nation, and it is the Speaker's responsibility to see that this principle is not infringed upon.

The Minister of Justice is attempting to infringe upon the freedom of speech of the hon. member for Ontario when it was allowed, without interruption, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I suggest to you, sir, that the member for Ontario should be permitted to speak with the utmost freedom on this subject.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, on this issue our party does not intend to follow the partisan attitude and the political tones that have been injected into this flag issue by the Prime Minister and the government. I say that, sir, in view of what has been said by the Prime Minister. He has taken away the opportunity of the members of his party to vote according to their conscience. They must follow the line of the government on this question. He has stated his government will stand or fall on this issue, and that makes it a political issue. We do not intend to follow that line in this party. We believe this is a highly emotional issue and that the people of Canada should have an opportunity to voice their opinion by means of a referendum. There should be a vote by secret ballot in this country. I say this procedure will bring satisfaction to the people of Canada because they will have had an opportunity, as they have in the past, to decide the matter by a vote of the majority. It will bring unity to this country. We will have a country of which we can be proud, with a flag that will be chosen by the people themselves and not by politicians in this House of Commons who must knuckle under the whip of the party.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have the privilege to rise in the flag debate at this time and to be the first to congratulate the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) who made such an eloquent speech in defence of democracy. I must reiterate his words in reference to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). I was amazed and discouraged to see a minister holding such an honourable position making such a partisan, prejudiced speech as he did in reference to the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and in reference to their right to get up in this house and speak in the interests of Canada's very distinctive national flag.

I want to support unequivocally the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), and also to support the subamendment proposed on Thursday last by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More). In my opening remarks I want to say that the undemocratic principle injected into the flag issue by the Prime Minister, in the manner in which he introduced the matter into the house, means that the Prime Minister has sown a wind and he will reap a whirlwind. I can substantiate that statement by an article which appeared lately in the press, referring to the plebiscite or referendum, an article by that well known and eminent writer, Patrick Nicholson, under date of August 12. He said:

> The campaign strategists of the Liberal party have been halted in their tracks—stunned.
> As most, but not all, Canadians know very well, parliament has long been stalled in its work largely because of "the flag issue." As the majority, but by no means all, of Canadians are uneasily conscious, this is dividing the country even more disastrously than the stormiest issue recorded in our history books—

He goes on to state what a recent poll showed:

> It quickly became obvious that "Mike's maple" had attracted overwhelming support among French Canadians, while the lukewarm enthusiasm for it elsewhere was gravely tempered by the resentment, as some M.P.'s have expressed it, that this was "yet another concession to French Canada."
> The lopsidedness of cross Canada sentiment on the flag issue has just been revealed by a nation-wide poll, whose sensational results were given front page columns in Ottawa's thoughtful French language newspaper, Le Droit
> The poll discovered that a majority of Canadians, in every province except Quebec, prefer the Canadian ensign to the maple leaf design. It also ascertained that about one third of all Canadians would prefer some other flag, such as the union jack or another design, or were ignorant or indifferent about the whole issue.

I do not want to be called to order on this, Mr. Speaker, and so I would like to point out that it refers to the subject of the subamendment in that it deals with whether we should have a maple leaf or a compromise on the red ensign. He goes on to say in this article:

> The significance of these figures, in the eyes of all Liberal strategists thinking in terms of an election, is that they clearly show that the flag issue would bring disastrous Liberal losses in nine provinces, and leave that party largely as the political arm of French Canada.

This is a salient point. As the hon. member for Ontario so eloquently put it, we do not want to have an issue which, when developed and brought to a conclusion, will divide our country and bring disunity to this great nation, something that will take several generations to heal. Therefore it is evident to most Canadians and to us here in this house that we should take the advice of the Leader of the Opposition and have a plebiscite on this matter to give Canadians a chance to look at it on a compromise basis, and decide in the quiet of their own hearts what should be a flag for Canada.

[Mr. Southam.]

Many Canadians today are asking a number of questions which I think should be answered by the various members sitting opposite. I was very glad this afternoon to see at last a member of the cabinet get up in his place and speak, after having been silent so long, but let us hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Benidickson). Let us hear from the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn), from the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey), from the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Temple), from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd), and from many others opposite who have sat silent. Let them answer some of these questions.

Why did the Prime Minister decide to bring the flag issue on to the Canadian political scene at this time? It was not in the throne speech.

Why does he not allow a free vote in parliament at this time?

Why does he want to hold the threat of an election over the heads of Canadians?

Why does he want to place this issue ahead of other more important pieces of legislation facing this parliament?

Why does he want to add this most divisive issue to the already over-charged political scene?

Why is he not striving for unity in Canada rather than sowing seeds of disunity?

Why is he taking the advice of the wrong people in these questionable decisions?

Why is he relegating what was once a great Canadian political party into a petty, selfish, partisan group representing only the political arm of French Canada?

Why does the Prime Minister want to take the Christian symbols off our flag?

Why does he jeoparidize the political well-being of so many of his own party members?

Why this all or nothing stand of the Prime Minister?

Why does the Prime Minister want to bury the past?

Why does the Prime Minister not want to set up a committee of both houses of parliament, as Mr. King did in 1945, to come to an agreement on this issue? Why? Why? Why?

These and many more questions are being asked by the people of our great nation.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, and people outside Canada also are asking these questions too, and this is causing me a lot of worry. When the peoples of the outside world look through the window and find us divided in our parliament over this contentious issue they ask the same questions, and the only person who is getting any satisfaction out of it is Mr. Khrushchev himself.

Let us take a look at what some of our people are saying about the plebiscite or referendum, and I think we would do well to take a look at outside opinion as well as expressing our own viewpoints in this house. In deciding to rise in this debate and give my own personal viewpoint I also want to give the viewpoints of the constituency I represent.

Last fall, prior to this debate being introduced, I sent a questionnaire to the people of my riding, a questionnaire which had five questions on it, the first being, "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign or a change?" In order to get a cross section of opinion I did not write just to my executive committee or my own personal friends. I directed the questionnaire to the reeves and councillors of the 25 municipal governments that lie within the boundaries of my riding, some 150 people in number, 25 municipalities, each with six councillors and an elected reeve. I felt these people would represent the opinion of the people of that area very well. Among other questions, one was, "Are you in favour of unemployment insurance for farm labourers?" Another was: "Are you in favour of lotteries?" But the first question was on the flag, and without exception the replies I received said they were in favour of the red ensign or a modification of it. To me this indicates that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is right in asking that this issue be decided by the people of Canada through means of a referendum. I think, also, that my hon. friend from Regina City (Mr. More) was right in putting forward this subamendment specifying certain alternatives so that everybody might have the democratic privilege of making a decision on this issue.

Many hon. members have referred to the position taken by the Royal Canadian Legion, among them the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) in his eloquent address the other day. I think the voice of the Royal Canadian Legion, of the Canadian corps association, of the Orange Lodge of British America and of other organizations of this character should be given full consideration. I might add that the British Israel world federation has produced a pamphlet about the flag setting out its origin, its symbolism and its significance. I would recommend this publication to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) who spent so much time in his amateur endeavours in heraldry before coming up with the maple leaf flag. I suggest that if he has not studied this pamphlet he might do so, because what is set out here is well worth reading. The heraldry and traditions of the red ensign are given, as well as the origins of the union jack, and so on.

I should like now to read into the record some comments regarding a plebiscite by Mr. Heesaker, dominion president of the Canadian corps association. He says:

> The comments of our Prime Minister that those who support the retention of the Canadian red ensign are endeavouring to pressure the government into an election, have been made by him to simply confuse the flag issue. It is not the supporters of the present Canadian national flag who have been pushing this flag issue to the priority decision position that it has at this date reached in parliament, but it is the Prime Minister's personal endeavour to place his flag design on the flag poles of this country that has resulted in this issue reaching such controversial prominence. With such divided opinion through Canada on the flag question, we cannot understand why Mr. Pearson will not allow the people of Canada the opportunity to choose between the Canadian red ensign and his new suggested maple leaf choice.
> We feel the supporters of the Canadian red ensign are more democratic in their viewpoint than the supporters of the maple leaf design for they are willing for this question to be submitted in referendum form to the people of Canada and to abide by their decision, where the maple leaf flag supporters are reluctant to trust the approval of their proposed new flag to the people of Canada! We do not wish to see our government waste money either, for it is the people of Canada who supply the money. The flag question ballot could be placed in with the regular voting ballots in the next scheduled general election of this country, and there most certainly is no need of either an election to be called, nor a ten million dollar immediate referendum when the question can be placed before the voters of this country when the next regular general election is scheduled, and in the meantime, the present national flag should be flown as it has been for the past many years until the people of Canada signify to the contrary.
> Our organization fully realizes that there are many important national problems before the present members of the House of Commons that should most definitely take precedence over the flag question, and again we reiterate, that it is not the supporters of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag, who are forcing this issue to the foreground in parliament.

It goes on to say:

> In conclusion, I would like to mention that for the past half a century or more this country's prime ministers and members of parliament have always indicated that Canada's veterans' views were respected statements by citizens who had served their country well in war, and were continuing to serve it loyally in peace through the welfare and service work of their organizations. During the past few weeks because of our present Prime Minister's open combat attitude against the veterans organizations views on the flag question, politicians, newspapers and general citizens, have openly ridiculed the ex-servicemen, who down through the years since 1900 have served Canada both home and abroad. This type of criticism by those particularly in government authority has damaged the prestige and character of "service organizations" and we trust that it was never the intention of our present government to do so.

There are others, in addition to the organizations I have mentioned, which support the red ensign and which have made strong pleas for a referendum. Here is a copy of an open letter to the Prime Minister. It states:

Please endorse red ensign which is my flag as third generation Canadian.

Our union jack symbolizes freedom without licence, equity without denial of personal rights to free men under it. Appeasement of minorities unjustly penalizes majority, and fatal to tolerant unity.

Here is a lady writing from Winnipeg, Manitoba. She puts her plea in the form of a little poem, and I think it would be timely to place it on record, too:

The Ensign

This is the flag for which men died
In bloody, and ugly, and nightmare battle,
This is the flag!
This is the flag which death-bound rattle of guns
Could never still,
This is the flag!
And now they fling its tatters to the waves,
And cry with glee, and trample underfoot
Bright honour's face,
O Canada, O Canada .....
I weep for all our race!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but he did indicate a moment ago that he would be referring to messages and a poem which, he said, had relevance to a referendum and to the red ensign. I heard no reference at all in those citations to anything having to do with a referendum or a plebiscite and in the circumstances it is my duty to remind the hon. member of the decision of the house yesterday.

While I am quite prepared to give the hon. member all possible latitude, I feel his remarks should be confined at this stage to the specific point which is now before the house.

Mr. Southam: Thank you. I can assure Your Honour I do not wish to depart very far from the rules of relevancy. But since other hon. members have been allowed a certain flexibility I thought I was sufficiently in order.

To revert to the subamendment, it is my belief, as I have stated earlier, that this matter should be placed before the people of Canada, now that it has given rise to such widespread controversy. I feel, as the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) said so eloquently, that the people should have an opportunity at some time in the future to go into a booth and mark an "x" opposite the flag of their choice. If this were done, we would never be faced with the accusation that the steps we are now taking are undemocratic and that such an important issue was being decided on a political basis. At this time in our history we should demonstrate to the people of Canada and to the world in general that we are democratic in our principles and that we solve our problems through democratic procedures. We on this side of the house should not be accused of filibustering at this time. We feel very deeply on this issue, which is one which goes to the hearts of our members. It is an emotional issue, not an economic one. If the Prime Minister would take this opportunity, which has been given to him by the Leader of the Opposition, to adopt a plebiscite, using the provisions outlined in the subamendment as a guide, I am sure we could settle this question without further controversy. I am confident this is the way in which the people of Canada feel it should be settled.

In closing my remarks I should like to say that I am definitely in favour of the retention of the red ensign. I say this on my own behalf and on behalf of my constituents, and I believe I am speaking also for most of the members of my party. I believe they would be agreeable to the compromise solution outlined by the hon. member for Regina City, and once more I should like to reiterate what others have said before me, namely that any country which dissociates itself from the past will have a questionable future.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam)?

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Would the hon. member allow a question?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Two members have risen at the same time. I believe the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) is asking permission to put a question to the hon. member for Moose Mountain, if he wishes to answer.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has advocated this process of referendum in the selection of a flag. Would he be good enough to indicate to the house what countries have selected flags in this fashion?

Mr. Southam: I would like to answer that question by asking another question. I would like to ask the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) what country has disposed of its flag by the method now being taken by this government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Is the hon. member trying to imply that he does not want a flag by proposing that the referendum be held at the next general election?

[Text]

Mr. Charles J. M. Willoughby (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before entering into this debate with regard to the subamendment I wish to also voice my approval of what was said by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). I offer my congratulations to the hon. member, who so ably expressed my personal opinions and I am sure expressed the feeling of everyone in the party to which I have the honour to belong. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we are now engaged in what is a most unnecessary and a most critical debate. It is unnecessary because the question should never have come before parliament; it is most critical because it is causing serious emotional complications throughout Canada, it threatens to divide our country beyond repair, and it is bringing discredit to the House of Commons at the present time.

We in parliament are spending time on an issue with regard to which the Canadian people wish to express their individual opinions. The answer is obvious in the subamendment, that Canadians must never be forced to accept a flag design contrary to the wishes of the majority; and it is their democratic right to be allowed to express their opinion. I offer no apologies for being somewhat repetitious. Repetition to correct an injustice is always justifiable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Willoughby: All Canadians ask is for justice, and for this flag resolution to be railroaded through is not justice. We want justice with a purpose and we want justice without partisanship. A lot more important things could be done in the House of Commons at the present time than arguing about this flag issue. In my opinion the flag issue should never have come before the House of Commons. We see, in an editorial which appeared in the last night's Journal what people think of this debate. I believe this is a particularly important editorial and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read it in part:

> Any flag that Mr. Pearson might ram through in these circumstances would serve as a symbol of division rather than unity.

How true that is:

> Canada cannot afford that.
> And as to legislation—the cost of Mr. Pearson's clinging to his course is indefinite postponement of the following business—

Then the editorial cites eight important bills that are before the house at the present time and are being sidetracked while we continue in the house, on this divisive flag issue, trying to obtain justice for the people of Canada.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Willoughby: Certainly.

Mr. Moreau: I was interested in the hon. member's statement that he agreed with everything the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) had said. As I recall it, the hon. member for Ontario stated that this is the most important thing to face parliament since he has been a member. I wonder how the hon. member reconciles that statement with what he is now saying.

Mr. Willoughby: The answer to that question is obvious, Mr. Speaker. This important debate has been created because of the fact that the people of Canada insist on having a voice in what is going on in this house, and this is being denied by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Willoughby: I think it is time we in Canada asked ourselves, where are we going? Another question that could be most usefully asked is, what is the purpose of Canada as a nation; what motivates our principles as a nation? Where are we going, Mr. Speaker? Canada has a personality complex, and this demands co-operation and not wrangling over an issue such as the one we have before us at the present time. We must solve this matter and we can only solve it through wisdom. I hope some wisdom will be brought into this issue before we have finished.

Experience is the greatest guide for wisdom, and wisdom is synonymous in many ways with experience. Where do we find experience in this issue? History relates experience. Can we learn through history; can we learn to avoid mistakes by the study of history? I claim that we can, and we should and we must. Canada insists on going from crisis to crisis. If we are not in an international crisis, if we are not in an international war, we create a crisis among ourselves. It seems to me that the crises we create in our own country, crises of our own making, mean we are happiest when we are in a turmoil.

The flag resolution of the government is causing great and deep bitterness, not only in parliament but particularly throughout this country. It is the greatest crisis since the first world war. This is where we get back into history. I would say it is probably the greatest internal crisis since confederation. I can recall, as I am sure other members of this house can, that one of the greatest crises we had in Canada was in 1911 when the reciprocity treaty was being brought into this house. How did they settle that question? The issue was so serious that it was dividing the east from the west—western Canadians wanted reciprocity; eastern Canadians did not want reciprocity. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in his wisdom, said, "This is a question for the people". He went to the people. Reciprocity was defeated; but everyone in Canada was satisfied—and they were satisfied because a plebiscite had been held.

Let us come down to 1917. This is another point in history. In 1917 we were at war. Conscription was considered unnecessary. The government of the time did not think they would have a plebiscite for conscription; they thought they would enforce it. This was in spite of the protests of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said this was an issue that should be sent to the people. Mr. Speaker, all of us in this house know that the fact this issue was not sent to the people was one of the biggest mistakes made in Canada. It created division in our country, division so great that it has taken a whole generation to clear it up.

Now let me come to 1944 when we had a similar situation. Canada was at war. However, precedents offered guidance. The government of the day, under the leadership of Mr. Mackenzie King, realized that the conscription issue was something which would divide our country and asked for a plebiscite on the question. In spite of the urgency of wartime we took time to hold a plebiscite. Naturally some people were not satisfied with the result, but in general there was no resentment and it kept the country from being divided.

Those were times of war, Mr. Speaker. Today there is no war; at least, there is no war as far as this country is concerned. There is no urgency to this matter. We have had the present flag for at least 40 years and it has been our official flag since 1945. Why do we have to rush into this question and decide it now when during the course of our previous history it has been shown on several occasions that on an issue of this type only a plebiscite can clear the matter up? This issue today, if it is not dealt with by means of a plebiscite, promises to create the greatest cleavage Canada has ever seen, and I say that knowing the sentiments of the people throughout the country, having spoken with them from coast to coast. This crisis is the result of an ill-conceived step on the part of the government. The flag issue has become political when it should be outside party politics. The government should never have forced a particular design of flag on the country and said: Either the flag is accepted or we will have an election. This matter is too serious to treat lightly, in a "take it or else" fashion. This is something which must be discussed. It is not a question which is going to affect us only today; it will affect our country for generations to come. We want our children, our grandchildren and our great grandchildren to say that we have a beautiful flag. Therefore we must be careful to give them a flag which will make them proud to be Canadians. This flag issue, if properly handled, can solve the problem of national unity, there is no doubt about that. If it is handled properly our national unity will be stronger than it has ever been in the past. A national referendum, as suggested in the subamendment, will overcome any resentment. The people must decide this issue, Mr. Speaker.

At this time I could go into the history of the red ensign but I realize that I would probably be speaking outside the terms of the subamendment. Suffice it to say that the red ensign has represented the united life of our country. It has represented Canada in peace, in war, in commerce. It is the emblem of our nation and is recognized throughout the world. It also indicates the design of Canadian history. It shows our association with that great organization, the British commonwealth of nations. It has a glorious history. The history of how it came about is, of course, well known to this house; but let me briefly say this. The three Christian crosses of St. George, St. Patrick and St. Andrew are part of our tradition and history. We just do not eliminate such things easily. We must not allow ourselves to discard all our traditions. The shield is of course traditional. It represents parts of Canada and denotes the great history of our founding races in generations past, and I hope for generations to come.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, why is it necessary under these circumstances to eliminate the union jack from our flag, whatever may be the design decided upon? That question has never been answered. Why is it necessary to have a second flag and call it the union jack? Has any other country in the world two flags? I do not know of one. I do not see why we should have two flags. Is one flag to be flown in one part of Canada and a second to be flown in the second part of the country? Would that be in the best interests of a united Canada? Would it not differentiate between parts of Canada and create a more serious division? I say, let us deal with this subject by creating unity, not division, in our country.

Some people complain about our present ensign because its design is similar to the British merchant marine flag. But what more honourable organization could it resemble? The British merchant marine has been the organization which has kept alive the British commonwealth. It has done more for the progress of the world than any other organization. Why should we not be proud to belong to, and be associated in our emblems with, that great commonwealth of nations?

On the other hand, a design has been proposed which this house is asked to accept, they say without argument. This design represents the merchant marine of another nation, a nation not particularly friendly to this country. Why should we accept their design and discard one with such tradition and connections with the commonwealth of British peoples? Many flags of different countries resemble each other. Sometimes when travelling around Europe one must almost take out the geography book to see which flag he is looking at. There may be a little variation here and there, with the same colours being changed around in different ways. But there is nothing wrong in having a flag which resembles another flag. These are all petty criticisms and are ineffective.

The red ensign has been accepted as Canada's flag. It is known throughout the world as Canada's flag. People throughout the world do not know what we are talking about when we say we want a new flag. How long would it take Canada to produce another flag which would be recognized throughout the world as such, as the Canadian red ensign is now so recognized? The question is, Mr. Speaker, where are we going from here? What do we mean by a distinctive flag? In my opinion a distinctive flag is one which we can recognize as Canadian, which will be recognized throughout the world as Canadian, one which will be approved by Canadians, is acceptable to Canadians, and will unite Canadians. That is what the subamendment wants to bring about, and it is exactly what we are after. The people wish to have a voice in the choice of a flag. The people want to indicate which flag should be adopted. A referendum will not only give us an indication of their choice but create unity, which I believe is very important.

It is not a dereliction of the duty of the members of this House of Commons to suggest that this issue should be referred to the people. I think this suggestion indicates we have confidence in the people of our country to choose that with which they will be satisfied. A decision to adopt a flag without a referendum I believe is an insult to the intelligence of the people of this country who wish to express their opinion.

Mr. Favreau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Willoughby: Certainly.

Mr. Favreau: Does the hon. member not think or believe that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was correct when he stated that under the British system of principles a plebiscite was a negation of the existence of parliament?

Mr. Willoughby: I am sorry, I did not understand the last part of the question.

Mr. Favreau: Does the member feel the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was correct when he argued that under the British system a reference to a plebiscite was the very negation of the existence of parliament?

Mr. Willoughby: Mr. Speaker, I am not certain what the hon. minister is referring to, but I should like to state that the history of our country would indicate, as evidenced by the several examples I cited, that a referendum is the answer to this kind of issue.

An hon. Member: You do not agree with your leader.

Mr. Willoughby: I do not question my leader's statement at all, but I do suggest the issue he may have been discussing was probably something entirely different from and unrelated to this type of issue.

An hon. Member: He was referring to conscription.

Mr. Willoughby: I am not sure what the issue is you are referring to and therefore cannot discuss it more thoroughly.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I believe the holding of a referendum would constitute a compliment to the people of Canada. The government has indicated that it obtained a mandate as a result of the last election and now has authority to bring in a new flag. In my opinion that suggestion is entirely wrong and I emphatically disagree with it. The members of the government party must remember that they formed a minority government and were elected by a minority vote in this country. They must also remember that very few voters knew there was a flag plank in their platform. In my opinion 99 per cent of the voting public did not realize there was a flag plank in the Liberal party's platform. The majority of people are amazed to now learn of the existence of that plank. I am sure had they known there was a flag issue, as some of them must have known, they were not aware of the proposed design. It is my belief there is not one man in this House of Commons today who had any idea about the proposed flag design. I do not agree with the suggestion that because the government obtained what it has referred to as a mandate from the people of this country, most of whom had not the slightest idea there was to be a new flag, nor of course of any proposed design, it should be allowed to force a flag upon the country. I think the suggestion that the government has obtained a mandate in respect of the flag issue is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this flag issue and the new design proposed by the government could not have been placed before this parliament at a worse time. We have a splinter parliament and we are creating a splinter nation. We need a unified nation. We should not carry this debate to a point of creating an irreparable division of the country.

If there is a desire on the part of the people of this country to have a new flag perhaps we should go to the Indian citizens and ask them their preference. Those citizens have lived under our flag since we came to this country and took it from them. I have not heard one Indian express a desire for a new flag.

There are millions of Europeans in this country. We have listened to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr). He is of European origin and has voiced the opinion of millions of citizens of other racial origins who have adopted Canada and its emblems, and fought for Canada under the red ensign. These people have not expressed complaints but are proud to be Canadians. I suggest it is extremely questionable that the majority of the people in Canada today wish to replace our present red ensign.

I am sure the people of Canada do not resent the maple leaf as one of our national emblems but rather are very proud of it. The people of Canada do resent being forced to accept something without being allowed to express an opinion. They resent arrogance of any kind but particularly when it is displayed in respect of a most serious issue of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, I am here in this chamber to represent my constituents. Some members of this house have suggested they are not here to represent their constituents but to express their own personal opinions. I repeat that I speak and work for my constituents and can say that the majority insist there be no change. I have received hundreds of letters asking me to oppose any change in the present flag.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to ask a question. He has said he is here to represent his constituents. Does he not think that under our parliamentary system he is properly here to represent all of Canada and not just his constituents?

Mr. Willoughby: Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question I should point out that it is absolutely obvious that my constituency is part of this country of Canada. My constituents are proud to live in a part of Canada and their voices must be heard in this country.

I have received a few letters representing the other side of the argument, and I have had the privilege on several occasions to talk with the people who wish to have a new flag. I have asked these individuals whether they favour the adoption of this proposed design but have yet to hear one answer in the affirmative. Most of them were surprised when I told them the proposed design was the one they must accept without the benefit of choice. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that a stroll down the main street of Kamloops is similar to a trip through a hornets' nest. Everyone asks me what we are doing about the flag issue and suggests that we should retain the red ensign.

Many think that the letters we have received are the result of an organized propaganda campaign. I represent ten Canadian Legion establishments in my constituency and I know how the members feel about this issue. These people have a right to voice their opinions in this country. They have fought for this country and their suggestions should be given some consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that press polls are not always accurate, but they do indicate that the people of Canada are two to one in favour of the retention of the red ensign. I challenge every member from British Columbia—I am glad to see there are at least two here—to ask their constituents to see what they should do on this flag issue. I ask these same men to ask their leader for a free voice on this vote. I ask them to vote according to their conscience and according to the wishes of their constituents. If they do this, I have no doubt what the result will be on this particular issue. I know we will have a plebiscite.

I do not believe that the holding of a plebiscite means it is necessary to have an election. I believe that the holding of a plebiscite could await the next general election. There is no hurry about this. We have had this flag for many years. The plebiscite could await the next general election and in this way it would not cost us anything at all, just a ballot. Then a flag would be chosen which would be acceptable to all the people.

I am not trained in heraldry. I do not know anything about flag design. I have no training in art, but I appreciate a good picture when I see it. I have some feeling when I look at a flag. I want to look at a flag of which I can be proud. I want to be able to say, "I am a Canadian; that is our flag; is it not beautiful?" There must be a certain amount of colour balance in this thing; I think that is the way you describe it. It must not be insipid. It must not look like a piece of wallpaper. It must have something of which you can really be proud. It must have some history. It must be something to which we can look forward with enthusiasm.

My constituents are protesting. There is something lacking in this particular suggestion for a new flag. They want to retain the red ensign. I do not believe we are going to create more division in our country if another design, including some symbols of our historic background, is available. If democracy is to be made to work, we must respect the wishes of the people. People must be allowed to express their opinions. These people who are so anxious to preserve our present flag should not be restricted. Minorities should be allowed to express their opinions the same as majorities. A plebiscite will appease their antagonism. It would prevent national disunity. A plebiscite, as suggested in the subamendment, will leave no doubt as to what we should do.

As I say, this has become an extremely emotional issue, and this is the most dangerous thing that can happen to our confederation. As I have said, there is no hurry for a decision on this matter. A referendum can be held at any time. This is not an election issue and never should have been considered as an election issue. There should never have been any mention of an election in connection with this issue. It should have been dealt with in a reasonable way and the people should have been allowed to choose what they wish. It should have been outside party politics. This matter has become a purely partisan one in this house and we should not allow it to further divide our country, or we will be in for serious trouble.

A vote for a referendum, as I have suggested, is a vote for freedom of choice. It is a vote for unity within confederation. It is a vote for democratic principles and it is not necessarily a vote against the proposed flag. Is the government so confident of its design, is it so confident it is right that it is afraid to let the people vote on the issue? If the government feels the public are in favour of this new flag, what could they be afraid of? What would a plebiscite change? If they are right and the people are in favour of this, as they say, what are they afraid of? I appeal to the members of this house to let us have a national flag and not a party flag.

Mr. Boulanger: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Willoughby: I shall be finished shortly, and then you can ask your question.

In closing, I should like to say this: I think that this plebiscite, as recommended in the subamendment, is the best thing for Canada at the present time. I say, let us unify ourselves as Canadians. Let us be a parliament with a purpose. Let us declare our wishes as Canadians, and let us accept the flag as Canadians. Let us unify our country. Let us march forward under a flag of which we can be proud. Let us get back within the realm of sanity. Let us have leadership and not chaos. Let us support the subamendment in order to preserve the unity of our country and march forward under a flag of which the vast majority of Canadians can say, "I chose that flag."

Mr. Boulanger: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he know of a country which was given a flag through a plebiscite or referendum, whatever you call it?

Mr. Willoughby: This question was answered a few minutes ago. If the hon. member will tell me of a country that has changed its flag in the manner in which we are attempting to do here, then I will answer the question.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time simply to say that if my friends on the right will ever permit me to do so I will vote for their amendment, and for a plebiscite on the flag. I have been in favour of a plebiscite from the start of this flag debate since I believe it is a very fair and reasonable way of settling the issue. I have been waiting now for three weeks in order to vote for the Conservative amendment. I will vote for it just as soon as they allow me to do so.

In a few more days I have to leave to go to my constituency on important constituency business. I am afraid that the vote will be taken before I can return. I should like to get it on the record, if I may, that if the Conservatives would allow me to vote for their amendment, I would do so now. If I had a vote I would vote in favour of the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question; let us vote.

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, on an emotional subject such as the one we have been discussing it is the duty of a member of parliament to register his position. A number of things have been mentioned on the flag question and I make no apologies for repetition.

The subject is one which should not have been introduced for debate in this house but which should have been settled by a plebiscite. The question of whether or not we should vote on a Liberal party flag is one that should not be brought before the house. In western Canada the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) replied, "Oh, we had an election and the people voted for us. We had a flag plank in our platform." The only time the Liberal candidate who ran against me mentioned the flag was when he hesitantly agreed with the Legion in his home town that the red ensign was the best flag for Canada. That was the last we heard of the flag issue from him.

We should be attending to some other business in this house, matters that should be brought in and discussed fully, not things that will be hauled away from the house before being decided. There are health and welfare matters that should be discussed. There are agricultural matters that should be discussed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): My hon. friends yell order but I would refer them to these words of the subamendment, "and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following", and I would point out that certain questions are listed and there are others that might be listed. One of the other things we could be talking about is agriculture, even though a recent issue of a western farm paper said there had not been much time spent on agriculture, mainly because the previous minister of agriculture had done so much that there was little left to do right away. These are some of the things we should be discussing rather than spending our time dividing the country on a very emotional issue.

If we are to have a flag agreeable to a majority of the people, how do we achieve it? You certainly do not achieve it the way the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has attempted to do so. You do not antagonize the people of Canada, and then force a flag on them. You do not divide the country and then force a flag on it. This is not the way to get a worth-while flag for the country. You do not take a flag and thrust it down the throats of the Canadian people.

When the Prime Minister first brought forward his flag proposal he had far more support for the maple leaves than he has now. The Liberals are losing support because of their arrogance and contempt for the people of Canada. How much better it would be to have a referendum and settle this question properly. Among the questions which the subamendment proposes is that of the red ensign and the modifications that might be made to it. Personally I am in favour of the red ensign with modifications, to show the heritage of our history. I am and will be utterly and forever opposed to the three maple leaf foliage which, as the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) pointed out, is no more than a carton trademark, something I personally would hesitate to fly at any time.

What are we going to have if we adopt this flag? We are going to have everybody in Canada flying their own flag. People will say, "Mr. Pearson can have his flag, and so can I." That is their attitude towards this subject, which has been bungled, and bungled badly by the government. I believe I speak for a majority of my constituents when I say we should have the red ensign with modifications to show our dual heritage. Such a flag would show something of the freedoms we have in Canada, freedoms we would like to preserve.

One of these freedoms is freedom of the press, which to all intents and purposes we have lost at the moment. We have newspapers like the Edmonton Journal coming out with large editorials dealing with the red ensign and the plebiscite—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I have the impression that the hon. member is straying away from the subject before the house.

Mr. Bigg: He is right on the dot.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I feel he is straying away from the subject matter now before the house and, as he knows, there was a decision of the house rendered yesterday. I feel it is the duty of all hon. members to try to abide by the decision of the house, which was to the effect that hon. members taking part in the debate at this stage—

An hon. Member: What about the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —including the Minister of Trade and Commerce, should limit themselves to the specific point at issue.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): On that point, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to establish some of the reasons why I think the second question in the subamendment is the one I favour, and why I think it is an ideal solution as a plebiscite question. I see nothing out of the way in stating why I think the red ensign with modifications is a good idea to have as a question in a plebiscite.

I was mentioning that we were losing some of the freedoms we fought for over the years, and one of those freedoms which we have pretty nearly lost is freedom of the press. If Your Honour will allow me I would like to point out two or three instances in this regard. The most blatant one is the recent dismissal from Maclean's of six editors because they would not follow the Liberal line, and there was not one pressman with enough gumption to stand up and defend his fellow journalists who were thrown out of their profession because they would not follow a flag with three maple leaves. Is this the kind of freedom we are going to have under these three maple leaves, which I would like to label as the pettiness, pomposity and petulance of the Prime Minister? The three maple leaves are going to take away our freedom. This is not the kind of flag I want to live under, nor the kind of flag my constituents want to live under.

I would like to mention that the managed press in Canada is kowtowing to the Liberal line. The Edmonton Journal had a long editorial in favour of the red ensign and a plebiscite, but it got the word shortly thereafter and it has been particularly quiet ever since. It published the results of its own referendum and in northern Alberta, an area which is basically Anglo-Saxon but which has a mixture of all nationalities and has a substantial number of our French Canadian friends, who are some of our best citizens, this area was 65 per cent in favour of the red ensign.

We need the union jack on our flag to preserve this very vital freedom, this freedom of the press which we are losing, if we have not already lost it to big business which controls the publishing industry. These people are trying to mould public opinion in favour of the foliage flag, in favour of pettiness, pomposity and petulance.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question? I was wondering if he was not aware that three maple leaves was the emblem of Canada selected under a Conservative administration?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The three maple leaves were designed by a former king of England and I am surprised my Liberal friends would pick them up as a slogan for Canada. We in western Canada, if we do see maple leaves, certainly do not see three of them on one stem. I do not think it is a botanical possibility in any case. As I say, personally I have no use whatever for this foliage flag and I will never fly it in any place over which I have jurisdiction, wherever I may be. As I have said, this foliage flag means nothing. I can only say it is a product of petulance, pettiness and pomposity on the part of the Prime Minister. It probably reflects more than anything else the attitude of this government to date. We have seen budgets come and go. We have seen 60 days of decision come and go. We are now in the midst of a flag debate, which will continue because it is of vital importance to the majority of the people of Canada.

This is not something which hon. members opposite can decide, because they believe they are almighty. They are not. They will have to answer to the people eventually. If they persist in trying to force this foliage flag through, and if they succeed, it will be known as a Liberal party flag. It will be a political flag and nothing more.

Miss Jewett: Passed by parliament.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Passed by parliament by trained seals following a leader. Have a free vote if you want to talk that way. Have a free vote, and I would like to see how some of the hon. members over there would vote, including the hon. lady.

An hon. Member: What would happen on your side?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Don't worry about our side. This three leaf flag will become a political flag—a flag which will go out on every piece of Liberal propaganda in the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Of course it will, particularly in certain areas, because the Liberals believe in a policy of divide and conquer. This is a dictum of the Liberal party and it dates from the days of Mackenzie King: You cannot win the country politically if there is unity; you must have the west fighting the east and then you pick up the pieces and become the big cheese. This was Mackenzie King's dictum, way back; the only way to win political power was to divide and conquer, and we in the west suffered from that policy for many years.

I say to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) that if he and some of his hon. friends from Quebec were less interested in the question of provincial autonomy and more interested in Canada as a whole we would have more success in building up a greater country. He might also be helping the people of his province a great deal more than he has done in the past if he would think in broader terms and contemplate a wider horizon. We in western Canada have always been accused of being radicals, even on occasion of being separatists. But we believe in Canada and we are willing to make sacrifices in order to remain part of Canada. I want to see Canada grow. I do not think it can grow under this three maple leaf device. We believe it is much better to have the red ensign which means something to our people, and I am sure even those members in the back benches of the Liberal party must have been thrilled when the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), of neither Anglo-Saxon nor French origin, got up and made the speech he did this afternoon. It was an example of what Canada can and should be under a flag such as the red ensign, perhaps with modifications to show our dual heritage. In this way we could go ahead in unity. The only manner in which this could possibly be done now is by means of a plebiscite.

We did not force this flag issue on the House of Commons. It was brought on by the Prime Minister saying, in his petulance, that he must fulfil at some time at least one of the promises made during the election. So he pushed this issue before the house in an effort to force this flag down our throats, trying to force upon us an artistic monstrosity which does not mean anything and which the majority of Canadians do not want. It is not good enough for the hon. member to say "just vote on it".

An hon. Member: On the plebiscite.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): There are others on this side who want to speak. I was talking earlier about freedom of speech. This is something which may be unheard of in Liberal ranks. But we believe we should learn from history and we would like to have the red ensign continue as our flag. We believe in the freedom of speech and in the freedom of the press and we would like these things to continue. We have had an example in this very debate of what might happen if we did not enjoy freedom of speech. We would have a foliage flag forced down our throats without regard to the opinions of the people of Canada, which would be a most divisive thing and would spoil the heritage on which this nation is built. We need this plebiscite. I think all hon. members, particularly those in the back row over there, should sit down and re-examine their positions; indulge in a little self-hypnosis and come out in favour of the subamendment.

May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had said that if we go ahead and pass this foliage flag of three maple leaves, which I designated as representing the pettiness, the pomposity and the petulance of the Prime Minister, we would cause nothing but disunity in Canada. I would like to spend just a few minutes saying how a plebiscite of the nature outlined in the sub-amendment could foster unity in Canada and make it a better, greater and more prosperous nation. One of the most serious things that is besetting confederation at the moment is this unsettling idea of the disunity that has been fostered, particularly in the province of Quebec but also in my own province in western Canada. While not so much has been heard about it, there is in each of the areas of Canada, I am sure, that local pride, that local necessity to promote their own area which fosters regionalism and makes separatism feasible to the people in these areas. This is, after all, Canada's greatest problem at the moment.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has done a disservice to Canada by bringing forth the flag issue at this particular time. There is no doubt about it, nobody asked for a new flag particularly. Why should we change our flag; this is the question. It is not a question of giving us a flag all of a sudden; we have had a flag for 100 years. Why should we have a new one right now, when we have all sorts of problems that are related to confederation, that are related to our being a vast country different in geographical areas, different in areas of ethnic origin, different in what people are doing, and different in economic potential. In the face of these problems, why should we suddenly try to give them one little symbol that is supposedly going to make them all happy? But, Mr. Speaker, it is not going to do that. Ordinary common sense tells us that this is going to be a divisive issue; that this is going to foster disunity, not unity. The only way we are going to get that on to the right track, the only way we can try to bring Canada to that kind of unity we would all like to see, whereby all peoples of all ethnic origins can live, work, prosper and develop together, is by having a majority vote on this very emotional question.

It is not good enough for a few cabinet ministers, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) this afternoon, to rise and rant and rave about filibuster, and so on. This issue is far more important than that. I would have thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce would have had more knowledge of the people he is governing than he displayed this afternoon. We must have, if we are going to achieve unity, that area of co-operation that is necessary to do this. Whether you want to call it co-operative federalism, or not, does not matter; but we have to be one country.

I am sure the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) appreciates that you cannot go around stealing industries from one area and giving them incentives to settle in another, providing jobs in one area at the expense of another. This is the sort of thing that will also foster disunity, and it is already taking place to a certain degree. We need something that is going to bring us unity. We are not going to get it under this foliage flag. We are going to get it only if we have a plebiscite.

I think the idea of having four questions is a good one, because this will give people in all parts of Canada a chance to express their opinions and they want to express their opinions. The Liberal party did not fight the last election in most areas of Canada, on the question of the flag at all. As I said earlier my Liberal opponent mentioned it only once. He said he was in favour of the red ensign and then backed off this question for the rest of the campaign. This was pretty general in the rest of Canada. So to say now they have a mandate to bring in a new flag is just nonsense, because they do not have a mandate to bring in this kind of flag at all.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we need a plebiscite as a unifying force in this country, as a democratic way of settling a difference. Then the majority decision will be accepted by the people of this country. Along this line we need, in order to promote unity in Canada, the communications media orientated to Canada as a whole. We have had the C.B.C. and other communications media, notably the press, orientated mostly to promoting themselves and not at all to promoting Canada. They have been destructive instead of constructive. They have not promoted the idea that we should have one Canada and a single symbol for one Canada. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, a single symbol that will make Canada united is one that has an historic background; one that will give our dual heritage full play; one that is acceptable to the people who came here from other nations partly because the union jack was on the flag we are flying and its freedom was all they wanted. This is the only reason many people came to Canada in the first place; I have been told this many times. People of our various ethnic groups want their chance to say now what kind of flag we are going to have.

There are the four questions that could be posed to them if a plebiscite were held. There is the question: Are you in favour of the red ensign? Are you in favour of the red ensign modified—as I am—to show our dual heritage? Are you in favour of the three maple leaves? If we can trust the newspaper polls—and I never trust anything that is printed in the newspapers any more, after having come to parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —the majority of people in Canada in nine provinces do not want this foliage flag. That is, if you can trust anything that is printed in the newspapers, as I say. I do not; I am just putting that forward.

The other question is with regard to the single maple leaf. The only disadvantage I see to a single maple leaf is that it does not denote anything. I think the three maple leaves denote, as I have said, several characteristics of this government and of the Prime Minister, but the single maple leaf would not denote anything. It is not a national botanical specimen, and we in western Canada would rather have the beaver or even the buffalo. We think these are national emblems. Why do we not have a rose?

Mr. Guay: Or Diefenbaker.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): We could do all right with that, too. Still the question remains that all of us have to think on a proper basis along more than strictly provincial lines. This is the serious challenge thrown out to all members of parliament. We must quit being regional in the sense that we must have a particular flower or leaf from our area to be used as a symbol. The easiest and most historic thing which will unify Canada is for us to have a red ensign modified to show our dual heritage.

I say let the people of Canada decide. Let the people vote on a plebiscite composed of these four questions. Surely the only other answer is for the government to allow a free vote amongst its backbenchers without any brainwashing. That is the only alternative to a plebiscite. If the Prime Minister will lose some of his pomposity and petulance, then we can get on with the business of Canada and settle the question of a symbol very easily. Once we are prosperous and working together this can be done. To continue in this manner is to continue to divide the country, and confederation will be meaningless in the near future if the government persists in its pattern to date.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the constituents I represent in the historic county of Pictou I wish to take part in this debate, which itself is an historic one. I subscribe to the terms of the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More), and I shall be referring to it in my remarks more fully.

This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) brought forward in his speech a few matters which he said pertained to the subamendment; and in view of the fact that he was permitted to carry on and bring forward various matters I think at this time I should be able to comment briefly on the points he raised. The minister said that the official opposition were carrying out a filibuster in this debate. As pointed out by my hon. friend the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) on another occasion, a filibuster means to impede the progress of legislation. In this case it means to impede the progress of the House of Commons and of parliament itself. That is not the interpretation which I place upon my speaking in this debate, Mr. Speaker, nor is it the interpretation of the official opposition or of many people in this country.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is on record as pointing out that the members of this house should speak in this debate and have the right to have their say. If hon. members opposite do not wish to do this, that is their business. But if we on this side do wish to do this, then that is democracy at its highest.

Several months ago one of the members sitting on the other side—I will not point him out—said to me when sitting down at the table one day: "What is the point of going on with the debate on the flag? You are going to lose the vote anyway. You might as well give up the ghost." Yesterday in this house, someone on the other side—it is recorded in Hansard as "An hon. member"—said "We will rub you off". This was said after the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) said names would be rubbed off monuments. If we, the official opposition, and the people of this country were to give up the ghost and cease to fight, then certainly nothing would be accomplished in the way it was accomplished during the period since confederation in making this country of ours the great country it is. If the allies in the last war had given up when the Germans told them that they would defeat them, so what was the point of keeping on, where would we be today? They even sent a spy over to England to talk the U.K. and our allies into surrendering. I believe it is worth fighting a battle when principles are at stake in which you believe; and we certainly have principles on our side in this case.

The minister also said that the control of the business of the House of Commons is in the hands of the leaders who were meeting today. I took some notes of what he said, but as they are not verbatim I can be corrected. I might point out it was a different matter in 1962, when the government of that day was charged by the opposition with being in charge of the business of the house, rather than the various leaders of the parties. It is a different matter, now that hon. members opposite are on the government side. The official opposition were also accused of irresponsible manoeuvring. It seems to me that in this regard the irresponsibility should be placed at the doorstep of the Prime Minister and of the government for bringing forward this flag resolution and pressing it upon the people of Canada. Let us put irresponsibility where it belongs and look at this question in an objective manner.

Confederation in the spirit of Macdonald and Cartier was also mentioned. I think the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) got up and asked, where was the spirit of Macdonald and Cartier. Of course, the Minister of Trade and Commerce wondered about that, but said it is not present in this modern age. I suggest that in this debate the members of the government have no free vote. The minister said that parliament should decide the issue of the flag. I suggest that parliament is the proper body to look into this question and decide the issue if hon. members on both sides of the house are given a free vote and are able to vote as their conscience dictates. In the days of Macdonald and Cartier, when men from all over the country were brought together to form and to weld the nation which we have today, there was certainly no doubt as to a free vote. Those Fathers of Confederation became members of this house and of this parliament of Canada and they were free to do so. They were not pitched into it by any party. They showed their own independence, and we need more of that in this parliament today.

The minister said, among other things, let us not appease anybody. I am not going to go beyond the terms of the subamendment, but in speaking of appeasement let us not forget that there is another resolution to follow, that concerned with the adoption of the union jack. As has been said on a previous occasion, there are two flags—one for show by the government and one for Joe, the premier of Newfoundland.

The minister also said he has been disappointed by the speeches of opposition members. He said there was sincere evidence of spirit but none of tolerance and conciliation.

Mr. Byrne: And he will be disappointed with yours, too.

Mr. MacEwan: The hon. member's greatest contribution to the house is to sit there and mumble. Sometimes he appears on Hansard and sometimes he does not; but in either case he makes no real contribution. I hope that he will speak later on. I always like to hear him speak and to read his speeches, because they can be used on other occasions.

With regard to the question of a free vote I thought I might look into the original stand taken by the Prime Minister and dwell on that for a few moments. First there was to be a free vote given to the members of the House of Commons. Other members have made this suggestion and I think it is worth repeating at this time.

There was a suggestion that any vote on the flag issue would be considered as a confidence vote and any defeat in respect of the Prime Minister's motion would be considered to be a defeat of the government. Following that suggestion, of course, the Prime Minister challenged the opposition to an election. This then became a political football.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) this afternoon read part of an editorial which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. This evening I should like to read from the May 21, 1964 edition of that newspaper. I do not intend to read this item completely, Mr. Speaker, but I feel portions of it should be repeated during this debate. The portion I wish to quote commences as follows:

> The so-called "free" vote on the flag issue is so much double talk, a mere sham.

The article then continues:

> It matters little that Mr. Pearson says that any member of the Liberal party voting against the design submitted by the government would not be read out of the party. To our mind, such assurance is meaningless, and is not characteristic of Mr. Pearson.

Another portion of the article states:

> We do claim, however, that the Liberal members would not line up unanimously behind the government's choice of flag—as it appears they are going to do—if party loyalty and the government's future did not hang in the balance. It is impossible to believe, for example, that all the Liberal members from the Atlantic provinces—where sentiment in favour of the red ensign seems overwhelming—would vote contrary to the wishes of their constituents.

The article then indicates that the flag issue is different from other issues brought forward by the government. This issue has been brought forward as a political football. It involves a flag proposed by the Prime Minister, with the help and assistance of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), and will not give Canadians the opportunity of expressing their views. The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that parliament should decide this issue. I would be in support of that statement if a free vote was held.

In reference to item 3 of the subamendment relating to the three maple leaf design, as other hon. members have pointed out, this does not represent a distinctive Canadian flag. Maple trees do grow in various parts of the United States and other countries and are certainly not distinctive to Canada. Mr. Speaker, I received an interesting letter in this regard, as did the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales), who quoted a portion of it, which appears in Hansard of July 3, 1964 at page 5019. I should like to repeat that quotation as follows:

> If Canada should have a new flag ... it should at least have a definite Canadian identification and not maple leaves.

Mrs. Young of Avondale Station, one of my constituents sent me several samples of our maple leaves. Following your ruling last night, Mr. Speaker, in respect of the various flags produced by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) I decided not to bring the samples with me. I should like to read a portion of Mrs. Young's letter as follows:

> Enclosed please find a few samples of our maple trees. So that you may have the evidence to show the Prime Minister that the red maple of Canada is not the one he plans to paint red on his flag. The Canadian red maple is rubrum, and the one shown on the flag designs we've seen, look more like the "Norway maple" which is an introduced tree, or the "sugar maple" which is Canadian and American but not red in colour. It turns yellow in autumn.
> We think the Prime Minister and others should be better acquainted with our beautiful red maple whose leaves are distinctive but not like the Norway maple.

The suggestion is that the proposed design with the three maple leaves is not representative of a maple leaf distinctive to Canada. Undoubtedly the hon. member for Leeds dealt fully with this matter, and he will correct me if I am wrong when I say that the evidence indicates that the proposed maple leaf on the flag design is not distinctive to Canada.

I should like to read from an article written by Mr. Roland Sherwood, which appeared in the Pictou Advocate of June 4, 1964 with reference to the three maple leaves. I do not intend to read the entire article but only the pertinent portion. He says:

> This new flag design, with the maple leaves, throws the whole set-up out of kilter.

He is referring to the red ensign and "O Canada". He then goes on to say:

> The design looks to me as something good for some group or organization, but not as a national symbol. However, to keep everything in focus, I have a suggestion for Mr. Pearson. If he is determined, and I respect his determination, to have the three maple leaves on a white background, with the two blue bars on the ends, then I suggest that he scrap "O Canada" in favour of "The Maple Leaf Forever" as the national anthem. At least this would be consistent. And one other thing. Since the proposed new flag has a large white field, it will be difficult to keep clean, once it hits the flag pole and starts to "brave the battle and the breeze". So, if the maple leaf design becomes the national flag, I suggested that Mr. Pearson make arrangements to have a package of "Breeze" given with every flag purchased. And let this be our rallying cry:
> The maple leaf our emblem dear
> Upon our flag we sees.
> With all our might
> We'll keep it white
> By using new blue Breeze.

I have made reference to that article, Mr. Speaker, to indicate some of the feeling toward the suggestion that this design is distinctively Canadian. Many of us have witnessed small flags on car radio aerials which are copies of the red ensign and the maple leaf design, and we have seen what a few weeks have done to them.

In reference to item 1 of the subamendment, Mr. Speaker, which deals with the Canadian red ensign, I received a very interesting letter from a retired army colonel. In this letter he refers to a visit to a tobacco shop operated by a Mr. John Dallas of New Glasgow. I might say that John Dallas is a well know merchant of Grecian origin who has lived in this town for many years. The letter in part states:

> I was in his shop on Wednesday morning for my paper. He had a paper in his hand at the time. I hardly got into the shop when he demanded to know, pointing to the red headlines on the flag issue, what do you think of that? Then he went on to say, there were two cuts on the front page, pointing to the Prime Minister's flag, "that is not my flag, this one is," meaning the red ensign, "it is the one I want, I will never put that so and so thing up," again pointing to the maple leaf design.

Mr. Speaker, that represents the feeling of only one citizen in this area who came to Canada many years ago and who operates a small shop in this community. That gentleman has been treated well by the town, country, province and indeed Canada. He expressed his feeling about this proposed design, and the red ensign. I fully endorse his views.

Shortly after receiving that letter I read an edition of the New Glasgow Evening News dated July 22, 1964 which contained an article in reference to this same Mr. John Dallas. That article reads as follows:

The philosophy of "don't throw away—save everything," has paid off for 81-year-old tobacco shop owner John Dallas.

Apparently this gentleman saved old cigarette packages which displayed various flags in existence as far back as 1914-15. The article then continues as follows:

Dead in the centre of the display is the flag of Canada, as yet—the red ensign.

As Mr. Dallas said, "That is the flag I want. I will never put that so and so thing up. The red ensign is my flag." And I, too, join with him and say the red ensign is my flag.

Many speeches have been made about letters received by members. I must state that I have received letters from members of Legion branches, branches of the I.O.D.E., the Silver Cross women and, indeed, from some younger people of my constituency, who endorse the red ensign.

As I pointed out, I hope that this problem will be solved soon. I hope the Prime Minister will withdraw the resolution so that the people of Canada may follow the procedure laid down by the subamendment and make their wishes known. As I told some of my colleagues, last night I was awakened at 1.30 by a telephone call from one of my constituents who was most irate about this matter. I assured him we were going into the matter fully. He was very disturbed. I hung up the phone, and at a quarter to two I received another call from him so I hope in heaven's name the Prime Minister does withdraw this resolution so that we can all have a little peace and quiet in this country. I slept on this matter, and this speech is the result.

In so far as the matter of the referendum is concerned, it can be pointed out—

Mr. Favreau: What time did your caller call back that same night?

Mr. MacEwan: About 1.45. He still could not get to sleep. He was calling from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and he was very put out, as the Minister of Justice can well understand, not with Charlottetown but with the matter of the flag.

In so far as the matter of the referendum is concerned, perhaps I can just quote briefly from a newspaper article. The referendum, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) last night and the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) this afternoon, encompasses four different points. They are these: 1. Are you in favour of the red ensign? 2. Are you in favour of the red ensign with changes thereon to show the main heritage of the founding races? 3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaf design? 4. Are you in favour of the one maple leaf design? I think this subamendment should carry.

In so far as the referendum is concerned, as I have said perhaps I could quote briefly from the Globe and Mail for August 13, 1964.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEwan: I hear a little noise down in the corner there. The monkeys are at it again. I wish somebody would put them back in their cages and give them some peanuts to keep them quiet.

This article is by Bruce West, and reads in part as follows:

I am sure that many of us who now oppose the scrapping of our present proud flag would be willing to shut up and bow to the will of the majority if a referendum indicated that a new flag were desired by this country.

It might be painful, but not nearly so painful as the prospect of having this flag foisted upon us by a government which really gives its members no other choice but that of voting for the adoption of a new standard.

As I've often said here before—

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. MacEwan: This is very enjoyable; just listen.

—it seems to me that there is hardly any other question which deserves a free vote of the people more than that of what kind of flag they must live under.

The pertinent part follows:

Surely the democracy of which we have always been so proud hasn't fallen so low that such a choice can't be made in a free and honourable manner. Once the referendum has been set up it would then be expected of all politicians that they would refrain from making any mention of the flag issue until after the people had expressed their will.

Any politician who attempted to inject the question into any of his harangues would then be clearly labelled for what he was—a tinhorn opportunist who was attempting to make capital out of a matter which should be considered above politics.

In this way we could probably preserve far more unity than under the present conditions, in which the flag issue can and does become a political football.

Then, there is this final paragraph:

Let the country speak on this matter. The answer will come from the soul, where it should come from when dealing with the question surrounded by such a great deal of honest sentiment. Once the country has spoken in this healthy manner, dissension on this subject will cease, no matter which way the vote may go.

As was pointed out in the issue of Labor of July 4, 1964, in a letter to the editor:

Prime Minister Lester Pearson has stirred up a hornets nest by wanting to destroy our lovely red ensign and put one of his own in its place, and what a tame thing his flag is. We already have maple leaves on the ensign. Our whole setup—Britain and the commonwealth—came from God's promise to Abraham in Genesis 33-11: "A nation and a company of nations shall be of thee."

Finally, as I have already stated, I am in favour of the red ensign and the sub-amendment which gives the people of Canada the opportunity to speak on this matter. The parliament of Canada cannot decide this issue since a free vote has not been accorded to all parliamentarians. I do not believe the present resolution before us will create the necessary unity in Canada. I have enjoyed the company of many of our friends from Quebec on many occasions. I have gone to army camps with them. I have been associated with many of them here in our House of Commons and I have enjoyed the House of Commons with them. I have enjoyed social occasions with them when we sang that old French Canadian song—not Alouette, that came later—The Regiment. I enjoyed that very much. I think there must be ways of further unifying this country other than the presentation of this resolution by the Prime Minister. Let him take cognizance of this. Let the government take cognizance of it. Let us go ahead so that in 1967 when we celebrate our 100th birthday we can show the necessary unity and we can fly a flag of which all Canadians can be justly proud.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising is to—

[Mr. MacEwan.]

Mr. Boulanger: Shorten the debate.

Mr. Marcoux: Perhaps, if that is possible, but especially to say something new in a debate which has been repetitious for some time now. It is also because I have young children and cannot afford to come here and listen for days on end to the speeches which the Conservatives seem likely to continue for the next several days.

Mr. Boulanger: Shame.

Mr. Marcoux: They are aware of the fact that the duty of the head of the family who has been elected a member of parliament is to sit in the house during several months and also be with his family when he can take a few days off. It could happen that I might not be in the house when votes are taken on minor questions, but I want my constituents and all the members of the house to know that I am in favour of a distinctive national flag and that I support the motion proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). In addition, if it was necessary to select a flag with a single maple leaf, green instead of red, with darker blue stripes, horizontal rather than vertical, I wish to say that I would still favour any such flag, as long as we finally select a distinctive national flag and bring this debate to a conclusion.

I understand some Conservative members are pleased to see more visitors in the public galleries during the summer than at any other time of the parliamentary year, but I feel rather ashamed that after 97 years of confederation and three years away from the centennial, we are still without a distinctive national flag. It seems to me that we should put an end to our discussions as soon as possible in order to be able to proudly hoist a fully Canadian flag.

As others pointed out earlier, we have nothing against the red ensign, or the French flag or still against the union jack, but we feel it is time, as I said in my speech of June 1, which is reported on page 3808 of Hansard, Canadians were proud enough of themselves, of their past, but also of their present achievements, to adopt their very own emblem.

Far be it from me to accuse those who take part in this debate with being dishonest and simply wanting to force their views on us. The matter is too serious and national unity is too important for me to accuse some members, regardless of their parties, with being dishonest or attempting to divide the country, because I am convinced that both sides are in favour of unity within the country. However, they do not all use the same means. Some resort to stronger action and others to gentler methods. I feel the motion put forward by the government is better suited to promote Canadian unity than the amendment proposed by the Conservative party.

Now, to come back to the subamendment, I think it is of no importance whatsoever whether the referendum includes one, four, ten or a hundred questions. A referendum is essentially an ultimate method of reaching a decision, one which can only be appropriate when there are no other means of settling a problem, especially when the decision put to the house would run counter to a commitment already made during an election campaign in respect of a well-defined policy.

We know that, in 1942, for instance, a referendum took place to release the government from one of its formal promises. Let us say it was a neat way to impose conscription on a group which wanted no part of it. That referendum was justified because the promise had been made, fallaciously or not, and the government wanted to be released from it.

If we were to pursue the argument of the Conservative party to absurdity, it would mean that no decision could be taken by parliament without a plebiscite being held.

Today, I heard the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) say that the government should be more respectful of democratic opinion. That is exactly why we were elected and it is because we live in a democratic country that we must take in the house a stand which meets the wishes of our constituents. Whether we spend a month, five months or a year discussing this matter, we will still be under the obligation to vote in the house, according to our conscience, it is true, but also according to the wishes of the majority of our constituents.

If the amendment proposed by the Conservatives had to do with the flag's shade of red or blue or the number of leaves, we could say that we have here an amendment on which to make a decision. But what is before us is a request to hold a referendum and the subamendment sets out in detail reasons for it which we could discuss forever. If we want democracy to prevail here in the House of Commons, the matter should be put to a vote. Let hon. members give their opinion in the house, let the electors know what it is, there is no objection to that, but let it be done after the vote, in the fall or later.

I am convinced that the house would give unanimous consent to let hon. members who have not had the opportunity to speak before adjournment to do so when the session resumes its normal course in the fall, provided that the vote is taken beforehand.

I say this because we know it is a most controversial matter and as there are 19 million people in the country, we will never reach a true solution. The only solution is to vote on the issue here in the house, because it will have to come to that sooner or later, even if the debate goes on for one or two years. In my opinion, that is what we should do, because after listening to all the arguments, I did not learn anything new about the referendum these past few days. Hon. members are only repeating the same arguments in a different way or quoting different newspaper editorials or taking ever so much time to explain why a certain stand will be taken. Now, filibustering is not serving the cause of the Conservatives or that of any other party. Every parliament is generally against resorting to a filibuster, even if it is a democratic or parliamentary procedure. It is a procedure which reminds me of the drowning person who will grab at anything, a dead leaf, a piece of wood, although knowing it is to no avail. But if the one who comes to his rescue realizes that the drowning person is trying to pull him under, he only has to hit him just hard enough to calm him down and bring him safely ashore.

I think hon. members have taken their stand and they now should vote accordingly. I am therefore pleading with the Conservatives to stop their filibuster—or whatever they call this—stop prolonging this debate which, in any case, will end up by a vote being taken in a very democratic way.

We might in the same manner, have opposed the 11 per cent sales tax. We made representations and, finally, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) agreed to a compromise. He maintained the tax, but it started at 4 per cent and gradually escalated to 11 per cent. I realize that such a measure was unpopular; I know that other members could have extended the debate indefinitely until the minister should decide to withdraw it. But since the minister refused to withdraw the measure, the Conservatives decided after all to end the debate and to allow the question to be put, and this 11 per cent tax was passed.

I am sure that if the government were asked to use a little darker blue and to have smaller leaves, they would be prepared to agree, because those are minor details, but to ask that a motion which has already been submitted to the house be completely changed, I think this is absolutely impossible, especially since the adoption of a flag was a promise made during the last electoral campaign by the party in office. Even we, of the Social Credit, had submitted a project which is different although it was a reasonable and clearly distinctive flag design.

We also know that the party in power finally accepted, after several about-turns, to bring nuclear arms into the country. Some members objected strenuously, but finally, the measure was passed and now certain formations of the Canadian army are equipped with nuclear armaments. Some were against it, and are still against it and always will be. But the measure was passed although for a time, the opposition played its role which was to prevent the government from getting nuclear arms, until it had exhausted all the reasonable and legitimate procedures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that after observing the rules of the house when he was talking about a plebiscite, he wandered away a great deal from the subject in the last few minutes.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, I was not dealing directly with the plebiscite, but with the consequences of the normal development of events which take place in this house, in a democratic way, because of the attitude of the members who were elected by the people.

I do not want to go farther, Mr. Speaker. I would like to quote several letters from voters who took the trouble to write to me—organizations like the St. Jean Baptiste society, the Jaycee's of Quebec city, the students of Laval University—and ask me to fight tooth and nail in favour of the flag proposed by the government.

I do not want to delay any longer the debates of the house, but I say that several persons and organizations wrote and asked me to support the measure introduced by the government, which is consonant with my personal opinion, so that it is twice as easy.

In conclusion, I will relate a fact—I hope that you will allow me to do so, Mr. Speaker —which happened last year during the international scout jamboree held in Greece; if my memory is good, it was near Athens, but I am not sure. The Canadian scouts were represented by various units coming from different parts of the country. There was namely a unit from the province of Quebec, and the government of that province had given its scouts the fleur-de-lis flag in order to show that the were from the province of Quebec.

All Canadian scouts were quartered together. Suddenly, an English scout decided to organize a display of flags; a British scout decided to have a display of all the flags. He went around all the units asking them to come for a parade with their own distinctive national flag. When he came to the Canadian unit, he said to the leader of the Quebec company: Come in with your flag: Canada must parade with its flag. The scout replied: But this is not Canada's flag, it is the flag of the province of Quebec. The other asked: Where is the Canadian flag? The scout answered: It is the other over there. The scout leader retorted: But it is not that one; this one is everybody's. We want a distinctive flag.

He then asked the Quebec company to take part in the display with the Quebec flag.

That means that even the British people, who have undoubtedly great respect for the Queen and the traditions, realize, when they see the flag which is presently considered as Canada's flag, that it is not a distinctive flag, and they insist on Canadians having a flag which would distinguish them from the British group.

Mr. Speaker, I will not dwell any longer on that matter. I merely wanted to change the atmosphere a little to show that, in spite of all, we want to co-operate with the government, not because we like the flag as such, but because it is a distinctive flag.

To conclude, I submit that the official opposition should not force the government to avail itself of standing order 33 which is the closure rule, nor of standing order 52, which is the rule concerning the previous question.

With all the consideration I have for the Conservative members who oppose the flag and with all the consideration I have for those who have taken part in the debate on the students loans legislation in a rather lengthy fashion, I think that we must finally come to a decision and that the government would not be blamed, in these circumstances, if they introduce a motion to apply the rule of closure. I am sure that if any member of the house could do it, this motion would be introduced, perhaps right now.

I therefore, suggest to the government that, if the opposition continues its filibuster, its extension of the debate, it should take its responsibilities and move to apply either section 51 of standing orders which deals with the previous question, or section 33 which deals with closure of debates.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, if he allows me to do so.

I should like to know whether the hon. member can answer this question: Does the fact that a member of the house, even though he is a Conservative, uses a privilege reserved to any member of the House of Commons, that is the privilege to speak, as the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency has just done, mean that he is filibustering? As a matter of fact, I have not yet spoken and I intend to do so before the end of the debates.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer the hon. member's question. Nobody is deprived of the right to speak, but this is simply a normal resolution brought forward in the usual fashion and which is discussed usually in a reasonable number of days and finally put to the vote.

Then, under those circumstances, it happens that a number of members, from each party, are designated to speak—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the subject matter of the discussion between the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency is somewhat different from the subject now before the house.

Mr. Valade: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question about the referendum?

Mr. Marcoux: Yes, provided the house allows me to answer it.

Mr. Valade: Would the hon. member answer the following question?

On March 17, 1962, when the hon. member still belonged to the Social Credit party, his former leader, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) stated that if his party assumed office, he would hold a referendum on the flag issue within six months following his coming to office.

Was the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency in favour of that commitment? If not, why did he not denounce it at that time?

Mr. Marcoux: To my knowledge, the leader of the Social Credit party at the time had not made such a statement.

[Text]

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): I think at the outset I should read, or place before the house, exactly what it is I propose to talk about tonight. My speech will of course be circumscribed by Your Honour's ruling of yesterday, but I should like to put the amendment on record again. It reads as follows:

> That all the words after "that" in line one be deleted and the following substituted:
> "As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag."

This was later the subject of a further amendment by my hon. friend from Regina City (Mr. More) who moved:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:
>
> "and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:
> 1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?
> 2. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?
> 3. Are you in favour of the three maple leaves design?
> 4. Are you in favour of a one maple leaf design?

This is the ambit of the discussion at the present time.

I wish to say right now, Mr. Speaker, where I stand on this question. First, I am in favour of the subamendment providing for a plebiscite, with the four questions set out to allow people to express exactly what they want to vote for. I am also in favour of the continuance of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag. I want to tell you right now, Mr. Speaker, exactly why I am in favour of our red ensign continuing as Canada's national flag. In the first place, it has been Canada's flag for many years. It is a flag that has been carried and honoured all over the world. It is a distinctive flag, because no other nation in the world has a flag that looks like the red ensign. It has been said that New Zealand's flag, Australia's flag and the flags of several other countries are the same; but they are not—they have blue ensigns. There is not another national flag in the world that looks like the Canadian red ensign.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency that is made up of 70 per cent central Europeans. We have there about 40 different national origins. Thirty thousand of the people whom I represent are of Ukrainian, Polish, Czechoslovakian, Austrian and Rumanian origin, including also the other central European countries. I represent about 6,100 people of Anglo-Saxon origin, about 1,300 people of French origin, nearly 3,000 people of German origin, and the rest are made up of other national origins of 40 different countries.

In the last election campaign I held about 45 election meetings. At every meeting where the flag became an issue or was talked about at all I was asked where I stood on the flag question. I said, "Naturally, being a veteran, belonging to the Royal Canadian Legion, and being a Canadian, I stand for the Canadian red ensign as Canada's flag". Whenever the flag was mentioned and I made that statement I received the applause of everybody at the meeting, of whatever national origin they happened to be. I was told by Americans that this was the only stand to take. Thousands of Ukrainian people have told me they came to this country from their homeland because they did not have freedom there. They came to this country and found freedom under the union jack. They have told me that any flag which did not bear the union jack on it somewhere was no good for them.

I have, as a matter of fact, some 1,300 native Canadian Indians in my constituency. These people look on the union jack—the red ensign now—as the Queen, the person with whom their treaties were made, the great white mother. They want to see a flag with a union jack on it; it has to be the Canadian red ensign or some modification thereof. They prefer it as it is but, like the rest of us who are reasonable people, will certainly make a concession to the rest of the people if others want a maple leaf or a fleur-de-lis or something else on the flag. But the first choice is the Canadian red ensign, as is.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to mention Quebec at all, but I just want to say right now that I thank the good God that the whole of Quebec is not represented by people like these who are yapping all the time. Whenever a person gets up to speak in English, these people are yapping. They talk about our dividing the country, but when we have something to say and get up to say it, they interfere all the time. It is they who are dividing this country, and not us.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fane: Yes; you can yell "Order" till you are black in the face.

[Mr. Fane.]

[Translation]

Mr. Beaulé: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw what he said.

[Text]

Mr. Fane: It does not matter—

[Translation]

Mr. Beaulé: Mr. Speaker, I rose on a point of order. I asked the hon. member to withdraw what he said.

An hon. Member: He does not understand.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Is the hon. gentleman rising on a question of privilege or a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Beaulé: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member made insinuations about us and I ask him to withdraw them.

[Text]

Mr. Fane: Mr. Speaker, do I have to retract the truth?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane) began his remarks he was completely within the ambit of the motion before us. I would suggest that he continue in that vein.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Speaker, I never intended to get off the track at all. As you know, when I am told what the limitations are, I usually stick to them; but when remarks are passed such as those that have been passed, I naturally have to reply. There is another thing about the Canadian red ensign. I have travelled a great deal around the country. I was recently in the United States. I travelled to—

Mr. Byrne: Texas.

Mr. Fane: No, I didn't go to Texas. I didn't go to Kootenay East either. Perhaps some time the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) will be big enough to stand on his feet and make his own speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crouse: He sits there and "byrnes".

Mr. Fane: I was a member of a committee of this house that went to Colorado Springs, the headquarters of the air force section of NORAD. It was a very great pleasure to see the Canadian red ensign flying beside old glory on a flagstaff of equal size. It was certainly very wonderful to see our flag there.

The same situation prevailed in Norfolk, Virginia, and in Bermuda. I was recently at a Rotary convention in the city of Toronto. There were around 16,000 people there; they were mostly from the United States. When they saw from the badge I was wearing that I was a Canadian they said, "You are a Canadian. What do you think about this flag issue?"

Fortunately I did not have to go into too much detail, but I told them that there was no issue, that it should not be an issue because it was entirely phony. I said the majority of the people of Canada wanted to continue with the red ensign, but this government had decided that the flag should be changed. These people said to me: "Why in the name of heaven would anybody want to change that beautiful flag which you now have?" That is the way the Americans feel about the Canadian red ensign. Naturally I did not talk to all 16,000 who were there, but I did personally talk to about 200 people from the United States, which I think is a pretty good cross section. Other people were there from all parts of the world and I talked to many of them, and they felt the same way about the matter.

As I said a minute ago, the flag issue seems to be very unnecessary at this time because it was not an election issue. Certainly it appeared in the platform of the Liberal party that within two years of election a Liberal government would submit to parliament a design for a flag which could not be mistaken for the emblem of any other country. If they had done that there might be something to say for it, but they did not. The flag proposed by the government, with the exception of the maple leaves, is almost exactly the same as the flag of the republic of Guatemala. I might also point out, quoting my hon. friend from Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood), that the proposed flag is not too much different from the merchant marine flag of the Soviet union. It has the same colours; it has red in the middle and a white background. Therefore, how can anyone think that the flag presented by the Prime Minister is distinctive, that there is no other flag like it? That proposition is fallacious. Are we to give up the flag which has had its beginnings as the flag of the British merchant navy for a flag not too different in looks from the Soviet merchant navy flag? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what are we coming to? What is the outlook of a Prime Minister who would bring into this house a flag like that, and try to ram it down the throats of parliament and impose it on the people of Canada? That is exactly what is happening here, Mr. Speaker.

That is why this party is so opposed to this flag. It was not a definite election promise. Only a few people referred to it. In my constituency it was not a general issue in the last election, and the people were not told what kind of flag they would be asked to accept. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that 90 per cent of the people in my constituency will not accept this proposed flag. If we held a plebiscite I would venture to say that 90 per cent of my people would vote entirely for the red ensign.

During my visits back home I meet a great many people, and since the question of the flag has become an issue only three people have said to me that we should accept the flag proposed by the Prime Minister. One of these people was a man who originated in Quebec, one was a man who originated in Poland and the other was a man from Scotland. They told me they would accept this proposed flag, and they are the only three constituents out of 45,000 who have openly supported this flag. The rest of the people have said to me: "Go ahead and get the Canadian red ensign continued as our flag. If you cannot do anything else about it, then if possible get a plebiscite and let us vote, because so far we have not had a chance to say whether we want a different flag from the one we now have. The way we feel is that no flag without the union jack on it is any good for us".

These people are also wondering, as I am, what force impelled the Prime Minister to bring this flag issue to the fore at this time when it was unnecessary to do so. The Prime Minister has lots of other election promises which remain unfulfilled and are more important to the economy of the country than changing our national flag. Was somebody blackmailing him? Why did he pass it on to parliament? That is what the people want to know. They say: "Why fight an election on the flag issue? We will be forced to vote for the candidate who supports the flag we want, whether we like him or not". That is another reason the flag should not be made an election issue. These people are also wondering why the Prime Minister did not first unveil his flag in the House of Commons, in parliament. That is why we are here. If we are to pass judgment on this flag and to decide under which flag we should live, we should have been the first to hear about it and to see it. We were told this afternoon about all the devious ways in which it was unveiled before being presented to the house.

I was at the annual convention of the Royal Canadian Legion in Winnipeg and I heard the Prime Minister put forth his ideas about what should be our national flag. He did not get very much support. It was unfortunate, but the reason he did not get a good hearing was that the initial opening ceremony at conventions of the Royal Canadian Legion is a sacred one. It is a ceremony of dedication to those Canadians who did not come back from the wars. These people feel that the Prime Minister has desecrated their sacred service.

Mr. Speaker, I have told you why I support the red ensign and why I do not support the flag proposed by this government. I have indicated that I would settle for a modification of the red ensign if the adoption of such a modification would unite Canada. I do not believe a flag containing three maple leaves or, for that matter, containing one maple leaf would be adequate and assist in uniting this country.

If we desire to have a flag containing national symbols, why do we not include a symbol representative of those citizens who lived in this country before the white people came? Surely we should have something representative of those Canadians we see fit to call North American Indians.

There have been suggestions made in respect of members serving in the armed forces in Canada under the symbol of a maple leaf. Of the 34 years I was in the service I wore the maple leaf on my uniform for only two years. For the remaining period of time my badge depicted either a beaver or a horse. I think too much consideration has been given to the use of the maple leaf by the armed services.

I suggest the government should give consideration to the amendment proposed by the opposition and hold a plebiscite on this national flag issue. I think by following that course the government will obtain the opinion of the people of Canada and avoid any future argument. Certainly some segments of the population will be in favour of the new flag while others will be in favour of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as it now appears or as modified. I think the only way out of this impasse is a plebiscite which would allow the people of Canada to come to a decision in respect of a Canadian national flag. The people of Canada have not had an opportunity of voting on this flag issue; whether we should have a national flag, or whether we should change our present flag. I do not suggest that we hold an election—and I do not make that statement because I am afraid to face my electors.

I am quite sure the other members of my party are not afraid of the results of an election, but I am sure that if an election is held the flag issue will be obscured and the end result will not be clear. For that reason I say we must have a plebiscite containing those questions suggested by the subamendment.

Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested by some members on the government side that the member for Regina City (Mr. More) should not have moved the subamendment to the amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I am sure that had the government offered a plebiscite it would contain the question: Do you prefer the flag proposed by this government or would you rather have one covered with pink polliwogs on a rainbow rampant? There would have been no choice offered. The population would be in the same position the backbenchers on the government side find themselves in at this time. The Prime Minister has said that he would consider an adverse vote on this flag issue as reason for an election and the defeat of his government. That is why his members support his proposal. While I do not shed any tears for them because they are all free, white and 21 and have made this decision with their eyes open, I would hate to be in their shoes at the time of the next election, having backed the proposal for a new flag which displaced the Canadian red ensign.

I have only referred to the Canadian Legion as being in support of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as the national flag, but there are innumerable associations also in favour of that retention. I have also referred to the many letters I have received from my constituents who are in favour of the retention of the red ensign. I have not received one letter from one constituent expressing support for the government proposed national flag.

I have received letters from other parts of Canada. In fact, I have a pile one and a half feet high on my file tables. I am very pleased to have received those letters and have attempted to reply to them all, but this is an onerous task. Some of those letters have been in favour of the new proposed flag.

I wish the Prime Minister was now in his seat because I should like to suggest to him that he should recall the final four lines of the poem "In Flanders Fields" written by the late Colonel John McCrae. I do not think it is necessary for me to quote it but I will do so for the benefit of those who are not familiar with the words.

To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.

I would ask the Prime Minister how in the name of heaven on November 11, Remembrance day, he is going to be able to say along with the rest of the veterans: "In the morning and at the going down of the sun we will remember them".

Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I hear some hon. members across the way crying "carried". I hear some hon. members on my left saying "let us vote". I do not believe that these members who say these things deep down in their hearts, believe that those who feel they have a duty to express their thoughts on this subject should not do so.

In rising to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I realize it is most difficult to make an original contribution on a subject that has already absorbed the attention of the house and has resulted in some of the finest contributions to debate since I became a member of this house in 1957. I should like to refer specifically to the speech made today by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), and in the earlier debate to the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I rise, Mr. Speaker, because this is a subject which touches the hearts and minds of many Canadians and crosses party lines, or indeed should cross party lines. Last Sunday afternoon I attended an outdoor church service. As I was leaving the grounds where this service was held I saw a very good friend of mine. I say that he is a good friend, but on election day he does his best for the Liberal party in an effort to defeat me. I jokingly said to him, "I am leaving for Ottawa in a couple of hours, is there a message you would like me to take to Mr. Pearson?" He said, "Yes, there is. You tell that man to put his flag in mothballs and put it away." You can see, therefore, that a subject like this does cross party lines. This man, while a good friend, is not a supporter of mine, and I doubt if he ever will be because if one knows the traditions in some areas he realizes that people do not change their political affiliations.

We have before us a subamendment which provides the means whereby Canadians can make a selection from what appears to be the more acceptable flag designs submitted. If I were to vote in such a plebiscite with four choices, I would choose the Canadian red ensign. However, I am democratic enough that I am willing to put my personal choice to the test. The question in my mind, and in the minds of many Canadians, is why the government is unwilling to put its personal choice to the test.

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): But not in the form of a plebiscite. Let us not become confused about the meaning of importance and urgency. While I consider no subject of greater importance to the Canadian nation than the selection of a flag I, at the same time, associate no great urgency with its selection. The greatest danger facing this house at the moment is what the end result of thoughtless haste might be. The government would be well advised to remove this subject from debate in this chamber and provide a cooling off period, while carrying on with the more urgent matters facing this house and the country.

A few days ago I had the very great pleasure of taking part in the annual Gaelic mod at St. Ann's in my constituency at which time, as usual, the Scots met together to demonstrate to the world that they have kept faith with their historic past. Now, is this not the crux of this debate? Is not the objective of the official opposition to try to convince the government that the flag approved by the members of this house should be one which keeps faith with our historic past?

Canada is a nation composed of many cultures, many traditions, all of which have contributed to the strength, the diversity and the unity that make our country unique. In order to be vibrant, to be forward looking, to be progressive, a country must foster a national pride and love of country; must cherish its traditions and base its progress on what has proven of value in the past. So it is with Canada. The many races that are today an inherent part of Canada have enriched our culture and developed our economy. We have only to look around us here to see the proof of that statement.

I am reminded of the annual Dominion day celebrations here in Ottawa when the lawn in front of the parliament buildings echoes to the songs and dances of many nationalities, originally brought from distant lands but which now form an integral part of the colourful mosaic that is the Canadian way of life. These are the traditional things which are prized by groups individually and by nations collectively. These are the inherent strains of our Canadians nation which we must strive to preserve and protect. These are the elements, Mr. Speaker, which make Canada distinctive, for without these distinctive elements Canada would soon lose something of its appeal, its very reason for being. Each and every one of us has a responsibility to preserve what has proven of value in the past, for we of this generation are the channel through which our traditions and cultures will be passed to the rising generation. Canadians of Scottish origin, particularly Cape Breton Scots, have diligently discharged their responsibilities in this regard.

As a Scot representing the constituency of Cape Breton North and Victoria, I would be remiss in what I consider my responsibilities if I did not participate in the debate on a subject of this importance, and speak out against any government, no matter of what political party, which by its actions would eliminate all traces of our historic past in proposing a flag design such as is embodied in the resolution before us. Think for a moment of our history. The earliest settlers of Cape Breton came from France and our island became the jewel in the French crown, the Gibraltar of the north. Indeed, at the height of its fame as a French colony, Cape Breton was known as Isle Royale, the royal island. Years later there was an influx of Scottish settlers, some 30,000 strong, and they utilized their traits of perseverance, integrity and love of country to build upon the foundations of the earlier French settlements. These two strains, the French peasant and the highland crofter, are still strong in Cape Breton. Together, they have made our island a place of unique interest to the many visitors who come to our shores. They have done this by preserving their traditions and promoting their culture as a part of their everyday life.

Then, think for a moment of the history of Canada. The pattern of development in Cape Breton can well be applied to the country as a whole. You will recall that it was the French who first established settlements along the shores of the St. Lawrence and who later made their way by canoe and foot into the unknown interior, opening up the great fur trade upon which the early economy of the country was based. We do well to remember their struggles, their trials and their tribulations in this field under almost impossible conditions.

But it awaited the contribution of the Scottish highlanders to transform the fur trade into an industrial development of fire, imagination and boldness which took traders and explorers all the way from our eastern shores to the gulf of Mexico and to the Pacific and Arctic oceans. The Scottish characteristics of daring and tenacity complemented the know how and perseverance of the French voyageur and the result was, in large measure, a great new country.

The early French and Scottish settlers showed their willingness and their adaptability to work together for the common good. Of all the contributions made towards the successful building of this nation, none have been greater than the efforts of these two races. And to their credit, down through the years they have striven to preserve their own cultures and their own traditions. Our annual Gaelic mods to which I referred earlier, are a good example of the success of the Scots in this regard.

In these days, when strife and conflict characterize many actions and reactions in Canada, let us not forget the enrichment to our society by the many other groups who have come to these shores seeking a new home. Each group has made its contribution and the country is the greater for it; the loss of even one would leave Canada a poorer nation. In my constituency, where we once had only the French and Scots, we today find people representative of every ethnic group in this nation. These people have indicated an appreciation of the contribution made by the French and Scots to the development of our area and, at the same time, the French and Scots have derived great benefit and diversity through the infusion of these groups, that has added lustre to the development of our area and its culture and traditions. They have together, I feel, developed reverence for the Canadian red ensign and what it stands for.

Unfortunately, there is a tendency by some in this country today to discount and discredit the traditions, symbols and cultures which constitute the Canadian mosaic. We must not let ourselves be swayed by this lack of awareness of the things that have made Canada great and which will keep her great. We must not be lulled into allowing our interest to weaken or our fervour to abate in our devotion to the things we hold dear.

I am not, nor have I ever been, a flag waver. I must confess I did not discuss the flag question during the last election campaign or any other campaign, but then neither did my Liberal opponent, nor anyone else on either side, so far as I am aware. I do not feel the voters of my constituency or, indeed, of this nation, expressed their opinion on this flag question during the last campaign. I am in favour of keeping the Canadian red ensign as our national flag because it keeps faith with our historic past. At the same time, and because this was not discussed during the last election campaign, I am unwilling to allow the government to make a decision for me or for my constituents on a new flag design, until I know their feelings on our present distinctive flag.

Some speakers have mentioned letters they received, and representations which were made to them. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I have received many communications but only one of them was in favour of the proposed new flag. If I were to go by the mail I have received I would of course vote for the Canadian red ensign, but through the process of a plebiscite the people of my constituency would have an opportunity to say what they favour, as would people elsewhere throughout the country; and if the majority were in favour of the proposed new flag then I would be the first to honour forever whatever new flag the majority favoured.

How can any one man, or small committee of individuals, select a flag for 19 million people without first endeavouring to ascertain from them whether they desire any alteration or change in our present flag? The plebiscite now requested by the official opposition and the choices suggested in the subamendment are in my mind the more democratic approach for selecting a flag, and I approve of this approach and will vote for it when that moment arises.

Why should there be any objection to this subamendment or, indeed, to the amendment in relation to a plebiscite? We are not a people who have been held in political or economic bondage within the British commonwealth and, as a result, had any sign or symbol which reminds us of colonial rule. We are a nation which developed through political evolution. We are a living example to the world that it is possible for a colonial possession to become an independent nation. Not for us was there a war to achieve independence; not for us was there violence or the threat of violence. Since we did cut our colonial ties in an orderly manner, there was no oppressor, no feeling of casting off the bonds of an evil oppressor, no feeling that we must wipe away any sign or symbol from our national life which would remind us of a time when we were not free. Quite the contrary, I think it can be freely said that Canadians have a feeling of respect and of good will towards the homelands of their ancestors. I do not believe they wish to tear out of their flag, which has evolved with our growth to nationhood, all references to their past.

We are not a people who are ashamed of our beginnings. I do not think we are a people who want to put some kind of a blackout over our past, as if we did not know our ancestry or that we were ashamed of it. And I do not believe Canadians are the kind of people so haunted by feelings of inferiority that they must proclaim they belong to a free and independent state.

Let us have a plebiscite on this question. Let us get the views of the Canadian people in a free, democratic manner. Let the people of Canada decide whether they feel a new flag is in the interest of national unity; let them decide whether a new flag would give them a sense of pride in their country.

Personally, I believe Canadians now have a sense of pride in their country and have confidence in its future. If they do not, then I do not think all the flags in the world would give them a proper sense of pride and of confidence. Any sense of pride and confidence a flag could possibly give would then be a false and phoney pride and unworthy of our Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, there is but one sure, certain way to obtain the views of Canadians on this question: A plebiscite is the answer.

A flag which is going to fly over us and which will command our loyalty, devotion and sacrifice—yes, our lives, if need be—should be a flag that is born in the hearts of its citizens and reflects the best and truest in all of us, and that speaks for the people, because the people spoke for it. And then it would not be Pearson's personal preference, a political platform promise, or a pennant pushed through parliament by a prejudiced party.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to take the opportunity of assuring you, sir, that my remarks this evening on this subject will be on point, constructive, not provocative or repetitive and, I hope, persuasive. The first question I think we should consider on the subamendment is the basic one of whether a plebiscite is justified. This is a question which has been asked a great many times in this house during the present debate. I have assured you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to be repetitive, and since I did discuss this matter at some length in the course of my remarks on the amendment on July 2 last, I do not intend to repeat what I said on that occasion. However, I think a brief summation might be in order.

I think it is clear to all students of government, and of parliamentary government in particular, that while in most circumstances members of parliament are sent here to decide public issues—I would say this is true in at least 99 per cent of all instances—there are always exceptions in human institutions and there are certain times when a plebiscite or referendum is clearly justified. These are instances where members of parliament do not have at their disposal any special knowledge or information which their constituents lack. This, of course, is the case when moral or emotional issues are involved —issues such as capital punishment, for example, the use or non-use of alcohol, or a decision about a national flag as in the present instance. In none of these cases do members of this house have any greater knowledge of the subject concerned than do their constituents. Consequently, they cannot, in a sense, act as representatives at all, and such matters are fit ones for a plebiscite.

This afternoon, when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Willoughby) was speaking, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) asked him if he disagreed with the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, at one time, it was alleged had objected to a referendum being placed before the Canadian people. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice, who is such an eminent member of the Canadian bar, would not have shown more discernment in a matter such as this. The subject he referred to was, I take it, the referendum on conscription held during the second world war. It is clear that in a case such as that, members of parliament have a great deal more information at their disposal, both confidential and otherwise, than do their constituents and for this reason a referendum would be unsatisfactory. In fact I think it proved to be so.

It has been said during this debate that the discussion has gone on too long. The word "filibuster" has been used repeatedly.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Nesbitt: In the first place, the word "filibuster" is a word which Canadians have borrowed from the United States. It is quite unsuitable to apply to our parliamentary government and it has a connotation, from things we read in the United States press and things which actually go on in the United States congress, which has no application to the affairs of this country in the sense in which it is used. In any event, a filibuster is justified in certain circumstances, whether in the United States or in Canada. It is most certainly justified when a minority government attempts to force down the throat of parliament what is apparently—and I will come to this in a moment—a proposal which commands the support of only a minority of Canadians. I can think of no instance when a filibuster would be more justified, if such were the case.

During this long debate—and it will probably continue for a while—the public discussion which has gone on both in this house and outside on this important subject has been I think very valuable. This is something which has in my opinion been overlooked by many who have taken part in the discussion. We have seen a great number of criticisms in public media of information and elsewhere saying: Get the flag issue decided; get it out of the way; sweep it under the rug; it is costing too much money; it is taking the place of things of more value, pension schemes and the like. I do not know what we are coming to in this country when we place a dollars and cents value on every subject which comes up. I am shocked at the extent of criticism of this kind. It proves we have no moral values any longer in this country; everything is calculated in dollars and cents and if you cannot place a dollar value on something it is not worth discussing. Well, in my opinion there are many things of great value to which a dollar label cannot be attached. The symbols of our country and of what we stand for and the principles we choose to follow are among such things. Some of the shallow criticism we find in the press from pseudo-intellectuals who edit our press—and I think of the Ottawa Citizen in this connection, among others—should be reconsidered.

In this regard there are three important and constructive things which have come out of our discussion. First, it has been shown that a large percentage of the people of Canada are very interested in the subject of a Canadian flag regardless of their views as to what its design should be, or should not be. The people are interested in whatever is to symbolize our country, and in what we stand for. This is good. It is a matter of great importance and value. Everyone will agree, I think, that any flag design must command at least a majority of public support. The discussion has clearly shown, I think, as a result of the work of the press, Gallup polls, and the like, that apparently no present flag which is much in the public eye has more than, at the best, the support of 40 per cent of the people of this country. I refer to an article which appeared recently on the front page of Le Droit, and a column by Mr. Patrick Nicholson. The figures he gave, and I have not heard them refuted, showed that of all the provinces of Canada the province of Quebec offered most support for any design, but even this amounted to not more than 40 per cent, in all Canada. The red ensign had a majority of support—a small one, perhaps—in the other nine provinces, and it came second in Canada with a substantial 30-odd per cent. Apparently neither of these flags have a majority of public support behind them.

The discussion has led to a better understanding of the points of view of members of this house as well as of the points of view of others throughout the country. I know it has helped me a great deal. I do not agree with all that other speakers have said during this debate, but at least I have a better understanding of their views now than I did before the debate started. So I think these are three constructive things which have resulted from this debate.

There is one most unfortunate thing which has resulted from this debate and it is something most of us deplore. As a result of these discussions, both in this house and in the country, a great deal of bitterness has been engendered. The debate has been divisive in many ways and that is a most unfortunate thing. But, after all, it is the government which is responsible for having initiated this debate at this time and it is the government which must take full responsibility for the unfortunate aspect I have mentioned.

Since it appears that only a minority of the people of Canada support any flag design, we in this house should all know the real facts of the matter before parliament makes a decision and the only way in which this can be done is by means of a plebiscite. A referendum is too binding on any government; the holding of a plebiscite is the way to go about it. Then we would have the real facts instead of the educated guesses of public opinion pollsters. If we had a plebiscite, parliament could properly decide its course of action. After such a plebiscite, the Prime Minister himself might be a little less unrelenting and adamant with regard to the position he has taken.

I realize there are difficulties attached to drawing up the proper question to be placed before the electorate in a matter of this kind. But the four questions that appear in the subamendment are perhaps the only possible or logical ones that could be presented to the public in this regard.

The first question in the subamendment concerns the red ensign. This is of course one of the very logical flags to place as a choice before the electorate. This is the flag we have had for quite a number of years. We have had it officially as the flag of Canada since 1946, which is something a large number of the public do not seem to realize at all. Is it a distinctive flag? I think it is, in a great many ways, and a great many other people do also. This flag is very highly regarded and very much wanted in many parts of Canada. I agree that certain regions wish it more than others, and some regions do not wish it at all, apparently. I conducted a little plebiscite of my own in my region, and 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the people, at a minimum, would like to see the red ensign retained. But I also found in my own area that people are not that rigid. They would prefer the red ensign to be retained, but I found that people in our part of the country are flexible and reasonable and I think would meet the viewpoint of other people in this country if that should prove necessary.

Also, Mr. Speaker, people in other parts of the country have very deep feelings—this also applies to my own area—on the subject of the red ensign. It is something under which they have been raised; it is something that symbolizes to them our institutions of parliamentary government, freedom of speech, the courts. You cannot just disregard people's views in this matter, because they are very sincerely held views. Then, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) this afternoon, who came to Canada at a very young age and is of Ukrainian origin and this applies to other members of so-called ethnic groups, which is a term I do not really care for very much, Mr. Speaker —these people are very fond of the red ensign because they made Canada the country of their own choice; they came here because, as was so eloquently pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for Ontario, of the institutions for which the red ensign stands. For this reason, because the red ensign is so strongly viewed as a symbol of Canada in the hearts of so many people —well over 30 per cent—this is clearly one choice that should appear on a plebiscite.

The second question concerns a modified form of the red ensign. This has come about as a result of public discussion of this matter, which I mentioned a few moments ago. This has been a very valuable result of the considerable discussion on this matter. I know this modified version of the red ensign is a matter of personal preference. I would prefer to see something of this nature myself. This would be my first choice, although if a vote did come in this house I feel obliged to support the red ensign because that is the wish of my constituents; and to be logical in my discussion that must be my stand. But as a purely personal choice I would like to see some modified version of the red ensign to bring together as other hon. members have mentioned the symbols of the two principal cultural groups in this country. I believe these things are necessary in order for a flag to be meaningful. A flag that is invented out of thin air so to speak, or as a result of some pedantic thinking, some sort of deep delving into abstruse subjects in producing designs is sometimes not the best method. It may have real meaning in the heraldic sense, but from a practical, common sense point of view it may have very little meaning.

The next question on the subamendment is of course concerned with the maple leaves flag which has been suggested by the Prime Minister and his party. I think most of us are aware that probably the very, very large majority of people in the province of Quebec prefer this flag. Most of us understand, as a result of public discussion of this matter over some period of time, why the people of Quebec prefer to see a flag design which does not incorporate the union jack. I do not agree with them but I can understand their point of view. I sympathize with them without agreeing, because I can understand their point of view. They feel the union jack is a symbol of something rather unpleasant in the past. I also know that the suggestion that there be the fleur-de-lis on a modified red ensign is something that is objected to and I can understand why it is objected to. It is because to some people it represents, to put it in the vernacular, the letting down by the Bourbon kings in 1759. I can understand why neither of these symbols would be particularly agreeable to the people of Quebec, and I think most of us can understand this as a result of public discussion both here and elsewhere. There is, of course, certain support in other parts of Canada for the flag presented by the Prime Minister. It has not as much support as has the red ensign, but it has substantial support. I think we must all recognize that fact. For this reason, most certainly the flag presented by the Prime Minister and his party should be on any plebiscite to be held.

The fourth item is the question of a single maple leaf flag, which is really a modified version of the Prime Minister's suggestion. That design has appeared before this house, in the press and elsewhere as a result of lengthy public discussion. Since there is apparently some considerable following for this design—how much, we do not know, but I believe most of us have received representations and letters to this effect—this likewise is a design that should appear on the plebiscite.

When the real results of public opinion are known as a result of a plebiscite—and this is the only way in which it can be known—we will be in a much better position to decide upon a flag design. There is no other way of determining public opinion in this regard, apart from educated guessing by pollsters, which does not mean very much; very many people tell pollsters they have no opinion because they feel they are not expressing the opinion that is expected of them. A good example of this occurred recently in connection with the California primaries in the United States election. There were supposed to be so many undecided people, but they clearly were not at all undecided; they supported Senator Goldwater. They thought this was perhaps not the popular thing to say at the time, but that is what they were going to do.

I believe that on an emotional issue such as the flag many people will not say what they want to do; they want to keep their opinions to themselves; they do not want to get into quarrels with their neighbours and so many other people. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I believe the results of a plebiscite might be very surprising. Anything else would be merely guessing, and the only way to ascertain the wishes of the people is by holding a plebiscite. If a plebiscite is held, we will have some real results in this house upon which to base our opinions and our final decision. Then I think perhaps even the Prime Minister might revise his opinions on what he should do.

If the plebiscite showed that a large majority, or even a substantial majority of the people of Canada supported any design, no matter what it was, I believe any member of this house would be very glad to support that flag design and accept it as the Canadian flag. This would then be an end of the matter. But if no majority should appear, not even a simple majority, for any one flag as a result of such a plebiscite, another course of action would have to be taken.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Matheson: I certainly respect the fairness of the hon. member's presentation. Does the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) consider that the method used in 1921 by Mr. Meighen to adopt arms, and the method used by Mr. King in 1945 to adopt a flag, namely order in council, was inappropriate or undemocratic; and would that method be appropriate today?

Mr. Nesbitt: The method used on occasions in the past may well have been appropriate for those conditions, but at the present time I do not feel those conditions would be at all appropriate. Here there is public controversy over the matter whereas on the other occasions there was not. One must adjust to the times.

Mr. Boulanger: No, there is not.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) may feel there is no public controversy, but he must be living in a rather rarefied ivory tower, to say the least. If it was found from such a plebiscite that there was not even a simple majority for any flag—and I really cannot understand why government members seem so sure about this, yet are alarmed at the thought of a plebiscite—then I would suggest that a parliamentary committee, consisting, say, of ten members drawn from all parties on an appropriate basis, be set up to try and decide on a flag design. Although I realize there are some who would not agree, I feel that a time limit should be set of three to four months. Then that parliamentary committee, knowing the real feelings of the people as a result of the plebiscite, could get together with such a time limit and work out some compromise design which might be mutually unsatisfactory to everyone, as it is said, but might be reasonably satisfactory to most people in Canada.

Mr. Patterson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Patterson: The hon. member has referred to the possibility of there not being a majority.

Mr. Nesbitt: No, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not agree with my hon. friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). I do not normally disagree with him but on this occasion I do. I feel that a transferable vote in a matter such as the flag would result in almost no opinion at all or a hodge-podge of opinions. I feel that this would not produce a satisfactory result.

I say that for this reason, and this is my next point. If you have a parliamentary committee to try and arrive at a compromise design, I am sure that this could be done. There have been a number of discussions amongst hon. members, and I am sure a number of hon. members present are aware of them. Several flag designs have been privately and informally discussed. These flag designs might well meet the points of view of quite a number of members on both sides of this house, and might be even more appropriate than some of the designs suggested so far. I will not go into the details of these designs, but many hon. members know to what I am referring. If a parliamentary committee were set up, and if none of the present flag designs could command a majority of public support, the flag designs which are being discussed could present a compromise point of view, would receive a chance for consideration and might meet some mutual point of view.

If such a committee were set up, I suggest of ten members, on which every party had appropriate representation, it would also have to be made clear that the decision of such a committee would not need to be unanimous. Clearly you might run into some maverick or ornery character, to use the vernacular, who would not agree. But if 80 per cent of three quarters of the committee agreed on a design, the design could then be presented to the house for consideration.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Brewin: I am very interested in the suggestions he is making, but what would he suggest the committee do if, for example, as a result of the plebiscite you get 35 per cent of the people for the red ensign, 10 per cent in favour of the red ensign with some modification to indicate the heritages of both founding races, 25 per cent in favour of three maple leaves and 30 per cent in favour of a single maple leaf? It seems to me that we would be in a situation of utter confusion and it would make it very difficult for parliament to act.

Mr. Nesbitt: I can see very little point in this, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), for whose opinions I have a high degree of respect, did not hear what I said. I said that if none of the designs proved to command even a simple majority of the people of the country, there are a number of other designs which are being promoted here and elsewhere which could be considered. I know a number of people who prefer the red ensign but would accept another design, to which I will not refer at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit another question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In that case, if the committee came up with some design other than the four proposed designs, would not that design have to be presented to the country in yet another plebiscite? Would not the same principle which calls for a plebiscite now have to be employed again?

Mr. Nesbitt: Well, that might well be the case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brewin: A plebiscite to the death.

Mr. Nesbitt: This is one of the problems we have here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: We want to live to see the issue resolved.

Mr. Nesbitt: I imagine that this is why it is difficult to meet points of view. There may be faults in suggestions which are made, although I do not see any faults in this suggestion; but when suggestions are made in this house hon. members have set views and are not prepared to listen to new ideas. I think that is the case with most of the government members.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit still another question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Moreau: It seems that we are never going to get a vote on the plebiscite question, but I was wondering whether the next suggestion from the opposition might be that we have a plebiscite on whether we should have a plebiscite.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I think everyone is charmed with the wit of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau) and would probably be half right.

Mr. Scott: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Nesbitt: No, well, yes, I would be delighted.

Mr. Scott: I was wondering whether the problem could not be solved by having a plebiscite in which we list the 2,900 designs we have received, and have a transferable, preferential ballot, and then we could give the statistics people ten years off to tabulate the results.

Mr. Matheson: Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: Certainly.

Mr. Matheson: My hon. friend is making a very serious speech and I think a helpful one. However, I am sure the hon. member recognizes that the recommendation of the Prime Minister in his resolution is an endeavour to honour what has been an emblem which goes back nearly 100 years. Is it possible that he or any of his associates or colleagues in his part of the house have any ideas how this emblem, which was formally adopted in 1921 under the Meighen government in the reign of King George V, could be preserved in a fashion more acceptable than the resolution presently presented?

Mr. Churchill: It is on the coat of arms.

Mr. Nesbitt: In reply to my hon. friend's question, it could be preserved in the Canadian coat of arms. In reply to the question of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), facetiousness is all good fun and we all enjoy it, and he and the hon. member for York-Scarborough are some sort of twins in this regard, although they are not of the same party. However, in order to finish my remarks I will have to ask hon. members, if they have any more questions, helpful or otherwise—

Mr. Knowles: —to submit them to a plebiscite.

Mr. Nesbitt: —to keep them till the end. Regardless of the rather interesting and amusing little interlude we have had through the efforts of the members of the Liberal and New Democratic parties I still believe a parliamentary committee of ten members could arrive at a design acceptable to the house. If the hon. members for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau), Danforth (Mr. Scott) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who showed a remarkable sense of humour which I did not think he possessed, would agree, perhaps we could commence with a plebiscite.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps it was the hon. member who excited it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am very glad to have excited something in the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if I may say that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: Be careful.

Mr. Nesbitt: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up more than my allotted time as I know there are other members on the government side who wish to speak. I would be very pleased to hear them make some suggestions. I am sure all members would be glad to receive them. I do not believe we have heard from any member of the government party other than the Prime Minister.

Mr. Robichaud: Where were you this afternoon?

Mr. Nesbitt: We did hear something from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), but I do not think he was very helpful.

Mr. Robichaud: You were asleep.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry to have created any difficulty, Your Honour, having promised earlier that I would not make a speech of a provocative nature. However, you will realize that under certain circumstances one must change his intentions.

It has been said that a plebiscite would cost approximately $6 million. That may be the case but there is no reason why such a plebiscite could not be held during the next federal election. No one, except members on the government side, seem to think there is any urgency in this flag matter. I am sure that as long as we have a flag by 1967, which is our 100th birthday, that is all that is necessary. If the government does feel there is a reason for having a flag before 1967, in order perhaps to fulfil the Prime Minister's election campaign promise of two years ago, there is no reason why such a plebiscite could not be held this fall in September or October. Regardless of the $6 million cost, if a referendum assisted in the creation of national unity and obviated the necessity for further divisive debate it would be worth it.

Perhaps we could form a parliamentary committee of the type I have suggested, to arrive at some decision in regard to a national flag within a two year period of time allowing the Prime Minister to fulfil his promise, making everyone happy. I think it is important that this divisive debate taking place both in this house and in the country as a whole be concluded. I expect one of my friends on the government side to say that all we have to do to effect this result is discontinue our remarks, and the debate will conclude. I think that is a correct statement but there is one thing wrong with it. We now have a minority government attempting to force a minority view down the throats of the population of Canada.

Mr. Macaluso: How could we do that?

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West, in one of his customary bright interjections has said: "How could we do that?" If my hon. friend from Hamilton West is so sure of his position why does he object to a plebiscite?

Mr. Macaluso: Let us vote on it. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Oxford how he thinks a minority government could force anything down the throats of the majority of members?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to make remarks in reference to other parties in the house, but it is suggested that the smaller parties will support the minority government.

The design being proposed by the government is not a design proposed by other parties. Since the Prime Minister has made it very clear in this house that unless his design is supported there will be an election, and since most members of this house, as well as the majority of this country's population, do not want an election at this time, I think the government can expect to receive support from other parties.

Mr. Douglas: Oh, come, come.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Nesbitt: No, not at the moment.

Mr. Speaker, I hear the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) say, "come, come, come". I do not think my friend wants an election at the present time. I do not think that the majority of the members of this house want an election at this time.

Mr. Robichaud: What have you to say about that which your leader said this afternoon?

Mr. Nesbitt: I do not know how the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) would know what was said this afternoon. I did not see him in the house during most of this afternoon.

Mr. Robichaud: I was here all afternoon, sir.

Mr. Nesbitt: I do not know where.

Mr. Matheson: Would a free vote help?

Mr. Nesbitt: I suggest that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) put that suggestion to his leader.

Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned it is the view of the majority of the members of this house that we now face a difficult impasse. This impasse was created by the government.

Mr. Boulanger: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nesbitt: This impasse was created by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) and by his government.

Regardless of that fact, Mr. Speaker, I have made some attempt this evening to be constructive, although that is very difficult to do at certain times. I suggest the only way out of this very difficult impasse, which exists not only in this house but in this country itself, is to hold a plebiscite. If the results of that plebiscite indicate that a substantial majority is in favour of the proposed flag design then it should be adopted. If a majority indicates a preference for another flag, that flag should be adopted. If only something less than a majority indicates a preference toward any particular design then the matter should be referred to a parliamentary committee. I think that is the only way of solving this impasse which has become extremely difficult not only for this house but for the country as a whole. This continued debate is divisive and costly. I do not think any group here will be able to force a view on another. There must be a little give and take on all sides, and I hope all members in this house will realize that fact. I am sorry that some hon. members opposite apparently do not agree.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the flag presently proposed by the government is unfortunately regarded as a partisan flag in a great many places in this country. I agree that perhaps the country as a whole does not take that view. We cannot adopt a flag to represent national unity, our ideals and ambitions for the future, that is in any way regarded as a partisan flag. For that reason I hope that the hon. members of this house will make an attempt to co-operate and perhaps make concessions so that we can make some arrangements for the adoption or retention of a Canadian national flag. I do not suggest that what I have proposed is perfect.

In a rather witty and humorous way a number of members have pointed out some theoretical objections to my proposal, and although I do not feel they are practical, I will admit that there are difficulties. I am not narrow minded in respect of this matter and will be glad to listen to any other suggestions hon. members wish to make, particularly those hon. members on the government side. Someone must make some suggestions if we are to conclude this debate. Members of parties other than the government party have made suggestions. Those suggestions may not be entirely suitable, but as long as the suggestions are being made I think we are progressing.

Mr. Speaker, I see that it is now 10.30 so I will resume my seat.

It being thirty minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

MR. HARKNESS—PRESS RELEASE RESPECTING FIRST ALBERTA MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I rise on a question of privilege. It has to do with the perpetration of a distortion of history, or an attempt to rewrite part of the early history of the province from which I come, namely Alberta. I have in my hand a press release put out by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources which states:

> Two plaques honouring Frank Oliver, founder and publisher of the Edmonton Bulletin and first member of the House of Commons for Alberta, will be unveiled in a joint ceremony by resources minister Arthur Laing and Edmonton mayor William Hawrelak on Monday, August 17.

Further on the press release states:

> Oliver founded the Edmonton Bulletin in 1880 and was publisher of the newspaper until 1923. He was the first elected member for Alberta in the House of Commons—

These statements that Hon. Frank Oliver was the first member of the House of Commons from Alberta are completely incorrect. The Parliamentary Guide, which contains a history of the constituencies of Alberta, states, under the information for my own constituency of Calgary North:

> In 1887, when the old Northwest Territories were first given representation in parliament, the whole of the old territory of Alberta was created an electoral division with one member. In 1903, the territory was divided into four constituencies, and by the Act of 1906-07, the representation was increased to seven.
> The record of the original district of Alberta was as follows:
> 1887—W. W. Davis, Conservative
> 1891—W. W. Davis, Conservative
> 1896—Frank Oliver, Liberal
> 1900—Frank Oliver, Liberal

Then it goes on to state:

> Under the act of 1902, Alberta was divided into four constituencies, Alberta, Calgary, Strathcona and Edmonton, the electoral records of which, up to 1908, were as follows—

And the members elected in the first election in 1904 were: Alberta, John Herron; Calgary, M. S. McCarthy; Strathcona, Peter Talbot; and Edmonton, Frank Oliver.

I fail to understand how the department of northern affairs came to put out a press release of this kind. The inaccuracy is repeated in various other ways. For instance, only last night there was an editorial in the Ottawa Journal stating that Frank Oliver was the first elected member from Alberta, and so on.

I have, of course, no desire in the world to take anything away from the position Hon. Frank Oliver holds in the history of Alberta, and I fully agree with this plaque having been put up to his memory. The fault, however, was not that of the historic sites and monuments board. I have received a copy of the inscription on the plaque that was erected, and there is nothing incorrect on it and no statement that he was the first elected member for Alberta.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think the only thing the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources can do is issue another press release correcting the first one and apologizing for it. He should also give due credit to W. W. Davis, who was the first member elected for Alberta. I also suggest that a plaque should be erected to W. W. Davis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should write a letter of apology to Mr. Rider Davis, the son of W. W. Davis and a barrister in Fort MacLeod at the present time.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think we are agreed that these were very great men. I would say particularly that Hon. Frank Oliver was a very great man. The people of Edmonton think so, as I gather from the number who turned out the other day. We want the statements that we make to be accurate, just as accurate as the plaques that we put on these buildings. I will certainly look into this matter, and I thank my hon. friend for drawing this reputed inaccuracy to my attention.

However, I think Alberta entered confederation in 1905, and the statement we made was that Mr. Oliver was the first elected member from Alberta. He had represented, as had Mr. Davis, the Northwest Territories, which at that time included the great Canadian plains as well as everything north of them. In those days that man must have had the largest constituency in the world.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources did not catch the significance of all I stated. Alberta sent a member to parliament for a long time before it became a province. For ten years W. W. Davis was that member. He was succeeded by Frank Oliver. When the province was divided into four constituencies and sent four members to parliament at the time of becoming a province, the constituency of Alberta itself was represented by John Herron.

PROCEDURE

Tenth report of special committee on procedure and organization—Mr. Speaker.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*INCOME TAX ON HOSPITAL INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Question No. 1,226—Mr. Fairweather:

Is it proposed to make employer paid hospital insurance premiums subject to income tax and, if so (a) which provinces will be affected by this change in policy (b) what considerations support a policy which would permit different federal income tax provisions for different provinces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): No. However, in the case of provincial hospital insurance plans which require that premiums be paid by the persons covered, if such premiums are paid by the employers for their employees, then these payments are taxable benefits to the employees. (a) Not applicable since there is no change in policy. (b) There is no difference between provinces as to the application of federal income tax provisions.

COST OF FILM "MR. PEARSON"

Question No. 1,369—Mr. Alkenbrack:

1. What was the total cost to the taxpayers of the film "Mr. Pearson"?
2. Did the C.B.C. pay Mr. Richard Ballentine for his professional services in connection with the making of this film and, if so, how much was he paid?

[Mr. Laing.]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. Total payments were approximately $35,200.

2. No. Payment was made to Intervideo Productions Limited of which firm Mr. Ballentine is president. Because this was a business arrangement in a field in which there is competition, it is not customary to require the corporation to disclose the amount paid for such services.

CROSSING OF NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT

Question No. 1,395—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has a report been received by the Minister of Public Works from Northumberland consultants in reference to the construction of a transportation link across the Northumberland strait and, if so, when was such report received?
2. Does this report offer grounds for an earlier estimated time for the actual commencement of construction of the crossing?
3. Has a request been received from the premier of Prince Edward Island for a copy of the said report?
4. Has a copy been made available to Premier Shaw?
5. What dominion government departments are studying the report?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes. A progress report was received on May 29, 1964 and an amendment thereto on June 24, 1964.

2. No.

3. Yes.

4. The report was commissioned by the Department of Public Works and is under study by that department with the departments of finance and transport who will report to the minister. No release will be made of the report until the studies are completed and reviewed by the minister and his colleagues.

5. Answered by 4.

*DAUPHIN, MAN.—TOWN DIRECTORY

Question No. 1,551—Mr. Forbes:

1. Did any department or agency of the federal government engage Henderson Directories Limited of Winnipeg to compile the addresses and occupations of householders in the town of Dauphin, Manitoba and, if so, at what cost?
2. Do all postal areas having letter carrier service engage private firms to compile a postal directory?
3. Is the Post Office Department provided with a copy of the directory free of charge?
4. Are the addresses in the directory examined by post office officials to determine if they are correct?
5. Are the directories available to the public free of charge and, if not, what is the price of each copy and where may it be obtained?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. No.

2, 3, 4 and 5. No. The Post Office Department does, however, compile householder directories for those areas where a commercial directory is not available. The directories are set up by electoral districts and are available through postmasters at $2 per copy. A commercial directory is available for the town of Dauphin, Manitoba.

"DO NOT SHIP" LIST—APPLICATION FOR REINSTATEMENT

Question No. 1,560—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many people who were on the "do not ship" list have applied to Commander Robertson of the maritime appeals board, for reinstatement in the S.I.U. by (a) letter (b) personal visit (c) telephone (d) telegram?
2. Of those who applied, how many have had their appeal heard?
3. What, precisely, step by step, has the procedure been in hearing these cases?
4. Of those who have appealed, how many have been reinstated and, what are the names of those reinstated?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1, 2, 3, 4. The board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions have provided the following information:

The maritime appeals board is a quasi-judicial body which obtains its jurisdiction from the S.I.U. of Canada. It is thus an internal organ of the S.I.U. Within the limits imposed by the nature of its operations the following statistical information can be disclosed. Since the maritime appeals board was established, 38 former members have applied to have their cases heard:

A. Nine have been reinstated, namely: Bigelow, Stanley; Chutskoff, Peter; Crimmins, T., reinstated upon payment of dues; Dalton, Patrick; Dronfield, William; Gregory, W.; Grubb, C., reinstated upon payment of dues; Hannan, C. L.; Williams, John N.

B. Ten have been ruled eligible for reinstatement as probationary members upon application to the S.I.U. of Canada, namely: Bragg, William; Chambers, Ronald Arthur; Kendall, Louis; Langlais, Guy; Leclerc, Leo Joseph; Madeo, Eugene; Pothier, Antonio; Spears, Clyde; St. Laurent, Jean Paul; Wiseman, John.

C. Ten are now before the appeals board, namely: Gardecke, Victor; Hall, William Brearley; McIntaggart, Michael; Morin, Edward; Neville, Richard; Osborne, William; Dower, Vincent; Plant, Real; Ranta, Henry; Savard, Jacques.

D. Six are now before the appeals board awaiting proof of membership in the S.I.U., namely: Anderson, Max; Bath, David; Cameron, Gordon R.; Clement, Armand; McNeil, John James; Swam, Donald.

E. Two not concerned with membership in S.I.U.—disagreement with union over arbitration of pay dispute, namely: Johnson, Warren F.; Johnson, Agnes.

F. One appeal denied, namely: Wood, John J.

*MAIL THEFTS

Question No. 1,593—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Since April 22, 1963, how many mail bags were stolen in Canada?
2. What is the total amount of money thus stolen?
3. What is the total value of the stolen parcels?
4. What is the total number of the letters stolen?
5. What action does the government intend to take in order to stop robberies of this type?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): 1. Two hundred and ninety from April 22, 1963 until July 23, 1964.

2. The amount of money stolen as a result of the theft of mail bags is $715,640.20.

3 and 4. The post office does not maintain a record of the value of parcels accepted for mailing or the number of ordinary letters enclosed in mail bags.

5. Postal robberies are not different from other robberies and the police forces which have the jurisdiction, take such action as they deem most appropriate in each case with the view to eliminating criminal activity of this type. Postal investigating officers extend to the police the fullest co-operation and assistance in cases involving the Post Office Department. The post office has been providing additional security where improvements of this type are practical.

R.C.M.P. POLICE DOGS

Question No. 1,603—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Does the R.C.M.P. use police dogs in its work?
2. How many police dogs does the R.C.M.P. own?
3. Where were these dogs trained; by whom were they trained?
4. Where are these dogs kept permanently?
5. What uses are made of these dogs?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): 1. Yes.

2. 21.

3. The majority of these police dogs were trained at the R.C.M. Police training kennels located at the Twin Maples farm, Ramsayville, Ontario. Some dogs received their training at the R.C.M. Police training kennels, Sydney, Nova Scotia, before these facilities were moved to Ramsayville, Ontario in 1961. These dogs are trained by qualified members of the R.C.M. Police who are attached to the staff of our training kennels.

4. On completion of training, the police dogs are transferred to various points throughout Canada and kept under the personal care of their masters. At present police dogs are located at the following locations: Corner Brook, Nfld., St. John's, Nfld., Sydney, N.S., Truro, N.S., Moncton, N.B., Ramsayville, Ont., Brandon, Man., Dauphin, Man., Stonewall, Man., Prince Albert, Sask., Saskatoon, Sask., Yorkton, Sask., Red Deer, Alta., Peace River, Alta., St. Albert, Alta., High River, Alta., Kamloops, B.C., Cloverdale, B.C., Nelson, B.C., Nanaimo, B.C.

5. They are employed to a great extent in searching for lost and missing persons, particularly children; lost and missing property and objects which may have been used in the commission of an offence. They are also used as an investigational aid in the tracking of suspected criminals; in excise and liquor searches, and on rare occasions in defence of members of the force subjected to armed attack. They are particularly useful in searching for dangerous criminals in wooded or enclosed areas during the night where human senses are unable to detect the presence of other persons.

S.I.U. "DO NOT SHIP" LIST—REINSTATEMENT APPLICATIONS

Question No. 1,604—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Were the following people on the "do not ship" list of the S.I.U. of Canada: John Wood, Edward Morin, William Hall, Maurice Marrinan, Red Boulton, Omer Boudreau, Pat McManus, David Swam, Carmel Deguire, Ken Lewis, J. Romack, Mel Grandy, Mike Sheehan?

2. How many of these people have applied to the maritime trustees for reinstatement in the S.I.U. and for permission to work again on Canadian ships?

3. Have these applications been studied by the maritime trustees or by any other agency established by the trustees or by the S.I.U. of Canada?

4. Have any of the applications of these people for reinstatement been approved and, if so, by whom?

5. If the applications have been rejected, for what reasons have they been rejected?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. The board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions have provided the following information:

(a) John Wood: The case appealed to the maritime appeals board, from expulsion from the S.I.U. of Canada by union trial. Appeal denied. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

[Mr. Favreau.]

(b) Edward Morin: The case appealed to the maritime appeals board from suspension from the S.I.U. of Canada by union trial. The case is presently before the maritime appeals board. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

(c) Maurice Marrinan: Reinstatement in S.I.U. ordered by the Quebec superior court. Reinstatement offered by S.I.U. of Canada. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

(d) Red Boulton: No record in board of trustees' files. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

(e) Omer Boudreau: Advised to apply to the maritime appeals board for reinstatement. No application received. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

(f) Pat McManus: Advised to apply to maritime appeals board for reinstatement. Letter returned, "address unknown". Appears in schedule 44 of the Norris report as having been placed on the D.N.S. list.

(g) David Swam: No record with the board of trustees or the S.I.U. of Canada.

(h) Carmel Deguire: No record with board of trustees. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

(hh) William Hall: Appears in schedule 44 of the Norris report as having been placed on the D.N.S. list. Appeal pending.

(i) Ken Lewis: Application form for appeal to maritime appeals board mailed on June 4, 1964. No reply. Never on D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

(j) J. Romack: Advised by letter to appeal to maritime appeals board. No reply. Placed on D.N.S. list according to schedule 44 of the Norris report.

(k) Mel Grandy: No record with board of trustees. Not on the D.N.S. list within the knowledge of the S.I.U. of Canada.

As far as is known to the trustees the union possesses no record of a D.N.S. list and schedule 44 of the Norris report constitutes the only available record of such a list. No member of the S.I.U. of Canada has been barred from sailing since the imposition of trusteeship by the operation of a D.N.S. list or any equivalent.

With the absence of complete files on the D.N.S. list as it previously existed, it is impossible for the trustees or the union to state positively whether a man was on the D.N.S. list at any time. All steps are being taken, however, to obtain accurate information on persons who may have suffered as a result of the existence of this list and to effect a restitution of membership rights.

The maritime appeals board is a quasi-judicial body established by the S.I.U. of Canada. Disclosure of its reasons for accepting and rejecting appeals could prejudice its function and it is felt that details of its inner workings should not be disclosed.

IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM, WATER STREET, YARMOUTH, N.S.

Question No. 1,622—Mr. Crouse:

Is the government giving consideration to carrying out an improvement program in the area known as the Bluenose public wharf district, Water street, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia which includes a town dump, a junk yard, and a collection of old boats, and, if so, when will this program be commenced?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State of Canada): In November, 1963, the province of Nova Scotia forwarded to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation a request from the town of Yarmouth to investigate a proposal for the acquisition and clearance under section 23, N.H.A. of two areas. One of these areas is a site of approximately ¾ acres at Water and Forest streets in the Bluenose public wharf district. Since then, discussions have been held with municipal officials concerning this proposal in relation to the need for redevelopment in other areas of the town. These discussions are continuing and it is expected that sufficient information will soon be available upon which a program of improvements could be considered by the municipality.

MASTER OF FISHERIES PATROL CRAFT "SCATARI LIGHT"

Question No. 1,624—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Who was the master of the fisheries patrol craft Scatari Light prior to April 16, 1964?
2. How long had the individual been master of the craft?
3. What are his qualifications?
4. Why was he transferred; was his transfer a promotion and, if not, for what reason?
5. Is the former master of the Scatari Light a veteran of world war II?
6. Is the present master of the Scatari Light a veteran?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries):

1. Martin Patrick Picco.

2. From May 11, 1959 to February 21, 1964.

3. One year high school; navigation school, Toronto and Halifax. In March 1963 was issued certificate of competency as master, home trade steamship, 350 tons and home trade tugboat.

4. (a) Redisposition of vessel crew personnel; (b) no; (c) answered by (a).

5. No.

6. No.

TIMMINS, ONT.—BENEFITS FROM MINERAL DISCOVERIES

Question No. 1,630—Mr. Peters:

What surveys have been conducted by either the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or the Department of Industry to ascertain what role can be played by the federal government to ensure the maximum benefit to northern Ontario from the recent finds of copper and zinc in the Timmins area?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): No surveys of this type have been made by the Department of Industry. However, the department is following closely developments in the Timmins area and is prepared to provide assistance to interested companies to help them arrive at a decision regarding the establishment of smelting facilities. Such assistance could include the granting of special tax concessions available to new manufacturing and processing enterprises which locate in designated areas of which the Timmins national employment service office area is one.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys carries out continuous mineral economic appraisals of the Canadian mineral industry, although it is not the role of the department to do assessments that are the normal responsibility of a company.

At this stage in the development of the northern Ontario copper-zinc developments at Timmins, some general assessments of employment have been made but no detailed surveys have been done relative to benefits that may accrue to that area.

NEW INDUSTRIES ESTABLISHED IN QUEBEC

Question No. 1,634—Mr. Laprise:

1. Under provisions of the Income Tax Act granting income tax deductions in certain districts, how many industries were established in the province of Quebec, and in what localities?
2. What sums did each such industry invest?
3. What is the number of employees working for each of such industries?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. The government is aware of 23 industries in the province of Quebec which have signified their intention to take advantage of the designated areas' tax incentives under section 71A of the Income Tax Act. These industries are planning a combined capital investment of over $63 million and will employ approximately 1,400 people. They are to be located in eight of the 13 N.E.S. office areas which have been designated in Quebec. Those firms with the shortest lead times to set-up are now reaching the production phase. The government is aware of eight of these which are now in commercial production. They are located in the designated N.E.S. office areas of Louiseville, Matane, St. Jean, Shawinigan and Val d'Or.

2. The eight firms have estimated the following capital investments: $136,000, $121,000, $105,000, $90,000, $60,000, $42,000, $55,000, and $90,000, respectively.

3. The eight firms have estimated that they will be employing the following numbers of workers: 5, 60, 13, 39, 25, 8, 6 and 2, respectively.

SUFFIELD COMMUNITY PASTURE

Question No. 1,638—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

1. What was the cost of operation of the Suffield community pasture for the years 1961, 1962, and 1963?

2. What were the total grazing fees collected for the years 1961, 1962, and 1963?

3. Does the army find it much easier to control livestock on the bombing area since the establishment of the community pasture?

4. Has the army command at Suffield issued any complaints with regard to part of their land being used as a community pasture and, if so, of what nature?

5. Has the 1 cent per head per day which is collected for municipal purposes been distributed to all municipalities close to the pasture and from which cattle are drawn, in view of the fact that no land was taken from local improvement district No. 24 and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. 1961, $27,124.41; 1962, $28,480.24; 1963, $34,457.41.

2. 1961, $42,285.72; 1962, $35,178.22; 1963, $47,442.75.

3. Stock in the community pasture are fenced in and controlled by P.F.R.A. staff. Establishment of this pasture has not altered the problem of control of stray cattle in the operating range. Impounding measures continue to be necessary on the same scale as in the past.

4. The defence research board has not complained as the community pasture on the S.E.S. range was establishing in 1961 to assist farmers in carrying cattle under the severe drought conditions of that year on a temporary basis only. The full range facility is required for the proper execution of the D.R.B. program at S.E.S.

5. The answer to part 4 of question No. 1,541 indicated the levy of 1 cent per head per day had been received by local improvement district No. 24. This information was based on tentative list of recipients to whom funds would be forwarded. Subsequent information has indicated the funds were paid to the Alberta department of municipal affairs for distribution to those local government agencies which provide local services in the areas adjacent to the Suffield pasture. The areas from which the cattle are received are not necessarily the areas to which the funds are to be distributed as the funds are for the purpose of assisting local governments which provide services adjacent to the pasture.

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO ICAO

Question No. 1,643—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. What are the names of the president, vice president and members of the Canadian delegation to the international civil aviation organization?

2. Are each of these persons bilingual?

3. What is the salary of each?

4. Are their offices located in the international civil aviation organization building in Montreal?

5. How many Canadian officials are attached to the international civil aviation organization?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1, 2 and 3. Canada is one of the 27 members of the ICAO council and, as such, maintains a permanent delegation in Montreal. There are two Canadian government officials on the delegation: Mr. R. Duder, permanent representative of Canada at the ICAO who is bilingual and who gets $15,100 a year, and Mr. T. H. Prescott, elected member of ICAO's air navigation commission who is unilingual and who gets a salary of $10,400.

4. The offices of the Canadian delegation are located in the International Aviation building which is also ICAO's headquarters in Montreal.

5. 234 Canadian citizens work at the secretariat of ICAO.

S.I.U. STAFF CHANGES

Question No. 1,647—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many new employees have been taken on the staff of the S.I.U., since the appointment of the maritime trustees, in the positions of vice president, secretary treasurer, port agent, despatcher, or full time organizer?

2. How many of the people occupying any of the positions listed above have resigned or have been removed since the maritime trustees were appointed, and (a) on what date did each terminate his service (b) for what reasons?

3. (a) Who are the vice presidents of the S.I.U. of Canada and what vice presidencies do they hold (b) who are the port agents at Vancouver, Fort William, Thorold, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec city, and Halifax (c) who are the full time patrolmen of the S.I.U. at each of these ports (d) who are the dispatchers of the S.I.U. at Montreal (e) who are the paid organizers—full time and part time—of the S.I.U. in each of the above ports (f) who is the secretary treasurer of the S.I.U. of Canada?

4. (a) Do any of the persons taken on staff of the S.I.U. since the maritime trustees were appointed have criminal records and, if so, what is the name and record of each (b) have any of the new staff people hired since the maritime trustees were appointed ever been charged in court with committing any indictable offence and, if so, what was the charge?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1, 2, 3. Some of the positions listed are normally elected offices while others are staff positions to which employees are hired depending on the seasonal requirements of the industry. Information concerning staff employees is regarded as a matter of internal operation of the union, which unions are not normally required to divulge. The trustees feel such information is privileged and it would be a breach of their duty to make it public. The following elected officers are serving in positions as indicated:

Leonard J. McLaughlin, executive vice president, Montreal; Donald Swait, secretary treasurer, Montreal; Roderick Heinecky, vice president, west coast, Vancouver; Raymond Doucet, vice president, east coast, Quebec city; William Glasgow, port agent, Toronto; Stanley Devine, port agent, Halifax and Saint John; John Royce, elected patrolman, appointed agent, Fort William; Rene Turcotte, elected patrolman, appointed vice president in charge of organization, Montreal.

4. The release of such information even if it were available, would not, in the opinion of the trustees, be in the public interest.

CHARGES ON GOVERNMENT WHARVES

Question No. 1,648—Mr. Groos:

1. How many government wharves are there in each province?

2. What is the scale of charges authorized to be levied on users of these wharves?

3. Are the charges identical in each province and, if not, what are the differences?

4. How much money has been collected in each province from users of these government wharves in the years 1962 and 1963?

5. Have any changes in policy been made since 1960 with respect to charges to be levied for use of government wharves and, if so, what were the changes?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Answer in so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned:

1. Province	Number of wharves
Newfoundland	415
Nova Scotia	379
Prince Edward Island	106
New Brunswick	217
Quebec	408
Ontario	636
Manitoba	47
Saskatchewan	18
Alberta	35
British Columbia	385
Total	2,646

These wharves have been constructed by the Department of Public Works and transferred to the Department of Transport for administration and control, and include all federal wharves that are open to the public.

Answer in so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

The following answers refer, only to wharves administered by the Department of Transport under the Government Harbours and Piers Act:

2. The schedule of charges is to be found in the government wharves regulations as established by authority of order in council P.C. 1964-104, January 23, 1964, and effective March 1, 1964.

3. Yes.

4. Gross collections:

Province	1962/63	1963/64
Newfoundland	57,154.70	74,232.99
Prince Edward Island	74,576.01	69,620.22
Nova Scotia	115,840.67	149,281.45
New Brunswick	39,732.24	45,587.51
Quebec	401,358.79	388,317.92
Ontario	250,107.16	399,446.44
Manitoba	1,985.70	1,763.37
Saskatchewan	1,565.43	1,559.92
Alberta	1,453.25	1,202.00
British Columbia	85,134.72	82,378.95
Northwest Territories	4,095.55	4,818.15
	1,033,004.22	1,218,208.92

5. There has been a standard schedule of charges for the use of government wharves for many years. There has, therefore, been no change in policy in recent years but there has been increased effort to collect more realistic charges in the light of (a) increased construction and maintenance costs, and (b) to reduce to a minimum unfair government competition with private industry.

Questions

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Question No. 1,649—Mr. Cyr:

Is a federal civil servant whose services come under the civil service commission allowed to take an active part in (a) federal politics on behalf of a member or a party during a non-electoral period (b) federal politics on behalf of a candidate or a party during an electoral campaign (c) provincial politics in favour of a member or a party during a non-electoral period (d) provincial politics in favour of a candidate or a party during an electoral campaign?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): It would not be appropriate to give an answer to this question, as it would be in the nature of a legal opinion. The matter is dealt with by section 61 of the Civil Service Act.

*C.B.C. COVERAGE OF GOLF CHAMPIONSHIP

Question No. 1,650—Mr. Jorgenson:

1. How many C.B.C. personnel attended the Canadian open golf championship in Montreal?
2. Of these, how many were (a) camera men (b) technicians (c) others?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the 1964 Canadian open golf championship was given actuality coverage, simultaneously, on the four services of the C.B.C., English radio and television and French radio and television. There were 92 employees engaged in the project of which 11 were cameramen, 42 radio and television technical staff and 39 others including commentators, producers, script assistants, floor managers, scorekeepers, etc.

HUNGARIAN IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA

Question No. 1,651—Mr. Korchinski:

1. How many immigrants who had fled from Hungary after the uprising were admitted to Canada?
2. How many have since left Canada?
3. How many have taken out Canadian citizenship?
4. How many applicants for citizenship have been refused because of violation under the Criminal Code?
5. How many applicants have been refused citizenship for other reasons?
6. What was the total amount of money expended by the Canadian government on behalf of these immigrants?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. During the period 1956 to 1960, 37,727 Hungarian refugees were granted landed immigrant status in Canada. The maintenance of separate statistics in this respect was discontinued at the end of 1960 since the bulk of the movement had been completed by that time.

2. Canada exercises no form of exit control over persons wishing to leave the country whether they are citizens or legal permanent residents. Persons leaving Canada are not required to report their departure to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and consequently this department would have no knowledge as to how many have left Canada since they were admitted.

3. No statistics are kept which relate to the number of former Hungarian citizens who escaped following the 1956 uprising and who subsequently acquired Canadian citizenship. The majority of such persons would have become eligible for citizenship in 1962. It is known that some, namely the children or the wives of Canadian citizens, were eligible for and were granted citizenship from 1957 onwards. The following table shows the number of former Hungarians who have been granted Canadian citizenship during the calendar years 1957 to 1963, inclusive, and for the first six months of 1964: 1957, 3,242; 1958, 1,651; 1959, 971; 1960, 859; 1961, 727; 1962, 14,604; 1963, 6,551; 1964, 2,403, (January 1 to June 30).

4. The courts do not report statistics of this nature. Therefore no information on this question is available.

5. The courts do not report statistics of this nature either. Therefore no information on this question is available.

6. The immigration branch conducted a review several years ago of those readily identifiable expenditures which were directly attributable to the Hungarian refugee movement during the period April, 1956, to February, 1961. These included such items as ocean and inland transportation, accommodation and maintenance in Canada and grants to the provinces under the special Hungarian refugee agreements and which amounted to $15,231,696.14. It must be remembered, however, that this does not represent the complete picture of the branch's financial outlay since it is not possible to distinguish what portion of the other over-all operational costs such as salaries, communications, travel, etc., can be attributed to the Hungarian refugee movement.

CENTRAL VICTUALLING DEPOT, ESQUIMALT, B.C.

Question No. 1,658—Mr. Chatterton:

1. Has the central victualling depot at the dockyard, Esquimalt, B.C., been taken over by the army service corps and, if so (a) on what date did the takeover take place (b) what did the staff of this depot consist of before the takeover (c)

what does the staff consist of as of the end of July, 1964 (d) what is the reason for the increase of staff?

2. Prior to this takeover did civilian drivers make deliveries and, if so, what was the annual cost per civilian driver and what is the present annual cost per army driver including training, pay and allowances, recruiting, uniforms and all direct and indirect costs?

3. Is the army service corps at the depot providing additional space for its operations and, if so, for what reason and at what cost?

4. Has the naval hospital in Esquimalt now been formally changed into a tri-service institution and, if so, (a) what was the staff complement before the change (b) what is it now, and (c) what is the reason for the increase in staff?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, (a) 1 April, 1964 (b) one officer, 16 men and one civilian typist, (c) seven army, 12 RCN, three civilians, (d) as army personnel have had no previous experience in victualling ships, it was agreed that naval personnel would remain at the depot until 1 October, 1964. On that date the numbers will be reduced to those needed to run the operation.

2. Yes, $4,555.20 per year. No change has been made in the use of civilian drivers.

3. The army are using exactly the same space formerly occupied by the RCN. However, prior to the transfer it was approved to carry out extensive repairs to the cold storage facilities which has resulted in cold storage space being rented from the Canada Packers' plant at Ogden Point while the work is in progress.

4. Yes, the hospital at HMCS Naden became part of the Canadian forces medical service on 15 January, 1959— (a) 104; (b) 96; (c) not applicable.

ELECTRIC POWER PRODUCTION AND EXPORTS

Question No. 1,667—Mr. Caouette:

1. What amount of electric power was produced in the province of Quebec during the years 1961, 1962 and 1963, and what proportion of that production was exported from Quebec?

2. What amount of electric power was produced in the province of Ontario during the years 1961, 1962 and 1963, and what proportion of that production was exported from Ontario?

3. What amount of electric power from the province of Quebec was exported to the United States?

4. What amount of Canadian electric power was exported to the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1 and 3.

CANADIAN VOTE ON UN TRADE RESOLUTION

Question No. 1,680—Mr. Bell:

With respect to the United Nations conference on trade and development, held in March, 1964, in Geneva, and attended by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was the special principle reading as follows: "All countries should co-operate in devising measures to help developing countries to build up maritime and other means of transport for their economic development to ensure the unhindered use of international transport facilities, the improvement of terms of freight and insurance for the developing countries and to promote tourism in these countries in order to increase their earnings and reduce their expenditure on invisible trade", adopted by the plenary session of said conference and, if so, how did Canada vote and for what reason?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The special principle referred to was adopted in the plenary session by 92 in favour, 7 against, with 17 abstentions. Canada together with a number of other industrialized countries abstained because it was felt that the special principle should make it clear that the building up of maritime transport in developing countries should be based on sound economic criteria.

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITION 64-1852

Question No. 1,682—Mr. Aiken:

1. With reference to competition No. 64-1852 of the civil service commission, to what departments of government will successful applicants be posted?
2. For which positions will a knowledge of both the English and French languages be required?
3. Have any appointments been made under this competition?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the civil service commission as follows:

1. The civil service commission.
2. A knowledge of both the English and French languages will be required for positions in those areas of operations where the incumbent will be required to maintain liaison with educational institutions and other sources of supply and to examine candidates in the French or English language as needed.
3. No.

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITION 64-661

Question No. 1,684—Mr. Aiken:

1. With reference to competition No. 64-661 of the civil service commission for a supervisor of construction accounting, Department of Public Works, what particular duties require the ability to speak, read and write in both English and French?
2. In this competition does a bilingual person have priority over the statutory preference for veterans?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the civil service commission as follows:

1. The incumbent of this position will be required to deal orally and by correspondence with contractors, consultants, etc., some of whom are French speaking.
2. To be successful candidates must be bilingual. The statutory preference for veterans will apply in ranking the successful candidates.

CREATION OF CREDIT AND CAPITAL

Question No. 1,685—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. For the period January 1, 1954 to December 31, 1963, what was the increase of the money supply or the creation of new credit or capital?
2. What was the amount for each year?
3. What was the percentage of increase for each year?
4. For each year during that period, what was the increase of the new capital of the Bank of Canada?
5. For each year during that period, what was the total increase of new credit in commercial or chartered banks?

[Translation]

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1, 2 and 3. See Table 1 attached.

4. The capital of the Bank of Canada has been $5,000,000 during the period named. The bank's rest fund was $10,050,367 at the end of 1953 and 1954, $20,403,347 at the end of 1955, and $25,000,000 at the end of each year since 1955.

5. See Table 2 attached.

USE OF SPACE, WORLD FAIR

Question No. 1,686—Mr. Laprise:

1. To date, how many and which countries have indicated their intention of participating in the 1967 Canadian world exhibition?

2. How many other countries are expected to announce their intention of participating in the exhibition?

3. As a result of the interest shown in the exhibition is it expected that there will be a shortage of space on Notre-Dame and Ste Hélène islands, to the extent that space reserved for green or water areas will be used to increase the size of buildings or for the construction of new ones?

4. If less area is devoted to greenery and water, will the exhibition be less appealing in appearance?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. To date, sixteen (16) countries have officially announced their participation in the 1967 world exhibition. They are: Canada, United Kingdom, Belgium, France, Morocco, Netherlands, Austria, West Germany, Venezuela, Israel, Iran, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Malaysia, United States of America.

2. There are negotiations on the way with many countries and it is expected that a substantial number will announce their participation shortly.

3. Last fall, when the master plan was being prepared, it was impossible to determine the exact area which would be required without knowing the number of participants and the lot sizes they would like.

Consequently, it was planned to have green and water areas which could allow for expansion or contraction for exhibition area.

Up to the present time, the green and water areas have not been changed to any great extent.

4. We envision no major diminishing of area devoted to greenery and water which would affect the appearance of the exhibition.

TRAVEL BUREAU BRANCHES, NEW YORK AND OVERSEAS

Question No. 1,694—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the estimated cost of operating the Canadian government travel bureau's branch overseas for the fiscal year 1964-65?

2. How many employees are associated with the operation of the above noted branch?

3. How many inquiries have been received to date in association with this branch's operation?

4. What is the estimated cost of operating the Canadian government travel bureau's branch in New York city for the fiscal year 1964-65?

5. How many employees are associated with the operation of the above noted branch?

6. How many inquiries have been received to date in association with this branch's operation?

[Mr. Pennell.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. The estimated cost of operating the Canadian government travel bureau's branch office at 19 Cockspur street, London, England, during 1964-65 is $115,000.

2. The establishment of this office consists of five continuing employees posted from Canada, three locally engaged personnel, and one temporary emergency appointee.

3. The following is a breakdown of the number of inquiries received at this office: (a) April 1/64 to June 30/64, 21,471 (fiscal year); (b) January 1/64 to June 30/64, 47,959 (calendar year).

4. The estimated cost of operating the Canadian government travel bureau's branch office in New York city during 1964-65 is $103,925.

5. The establishment of the New York office consists of five continuing employees posted from Canada and one locally engaged seasonal employee.

6. The following is a breakdown of the number of inquiries received at this office: (a) April 1/64 to June 30/64, 21,432 (fiscal year); (b) January 1/64 to June 30/64, 34,119 (calendar year).

FEDERAL BUILDING, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 1,695—Mr. Coates:

What is the government's intention with regard to the construction of a new federal building at Amherst, Nova Scotia?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): This matter is under consideration.

FEDERAL BUILDING, BRIDGEWATER, N.S.

Question No. 1,698—Mr. Crouse:

Has the government given any consideration to constructing a new federal building at Bridgewater, Nova Scotia, adequate in size to contain the post office and other federal agencies in the town?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Consideration is being given to the construction of a new federal building in Bridgewater.

CENTENNIAL COMMISSION SUPPORT FOR INDIAN CONFERENCE

Question No. 1,703—Mr. Fisher:

1. Was the recent national Indian council conference at Sault Ste. Marie supported in any way, including financially, by the centennial commission?

2. Was any representative or agent of the centennial commission at the conference in Sault Ste. Marie and, if so, did he or she stay with the council members at the motel from which some of the council members were evicted?

3. Was any money supplied by the centennial commission used to fly any delegates to the council meeting and, if so, how much and for what persons?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. No.

2. No.

3. No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE OFFICE FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,704—Mr. Tucker:

Has the government given consideration to the opening of a regional office in Newfoundland in which to conduct unemployment insurance business for the province of Newfoundland and, if so, what has been the decision?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): The unemployment insurance commission has considered the need for a regional office to conduct unemployment insurance business for the province of Newfoundland. It was decided that a regional office for Newfoundland could not be justified.

CONTEST FOR CENTENNIAL MUSICAL THEME

Question No. 1,706—Mr. Prittie:

1. Has the national centennial administration received a proposal from the Richmond centenary council for a Canada-wide contest among musical composers for a march to be adopted as the official musical theme for all centennial functions?

2. Has the administration rendered a decision on this proposal?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Yes.

2. No.

EXTENSION OF WHARF, LIVERPOOL, N.S.

Question No. 1,707—Mr. Crouse:

Is the government giving any consideration to extending the present government wharf at Liverpool, Queens county, Nova Scotia, which is presently inadequate to handle the shipping in this area?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Yes, consideration is being given to extending this wharf.

REPAIRS TO TUG "GLENLIVET II"

Question No. 1,708—Mr. MacEwan:

1. What were the names of the tenderers and the amounts of the various tenders for repairs to the tug Glenlivet II?

2. To whom will the contract be awarded?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. Ferguson Industries Limited, Pictou, N.S., $2,715; Sydney Engineering & Dry Dock Limited, Sydney, N.S., $6,001.60.

2. The contract has been awarded to Ferguson Industries Limited.

PURCHASE OF JET PLANES FOR CABINET USE

Question No. 1,710—Mr. Coates:

1. Have negotiations been entered into and/or completed for the purchase of two DC-8 jets for use to transport the Prime Minister, members of the cabinet and other V.I.P.'s?

2. If so, what is the price for such aircraft?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

*MEETING WITH MINISTER RESPECTING FEED GRAIN SUBSIDY

Question No. 1,715—Mr. Fairweather:

1. On what date is the Minister of Forestry or his officials receiving a delegation representing the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which will "attempt to negotiate a more equitable and easily administered policy" relative to the interim freight assistance program for feed grains?

2. Will an opportunity be given to members of parliament from areas affected to participate in the meeting with the delegation?

3. What further changes in policy are contemplated which will serve to (a) lower rather than increase prices of feed, and (b) make the method of administration of the interim policy less complicated and expensive?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Minister of Forestry): 1. The Minister of Forestry and his officials will receive the delegation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on Friday, August 21, 1964.

2. The meeting is essentially to give an opportunity to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to express their views privately to the minister.

3. Such changes if any will depend upon the outcome of the meeting.

TENDERS FOR OFFICE SPACE REQUIREMENTS, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,722—Mr. Lambert:

1. How many tenders were received with respect to the tender calls made by the Department of Public Works for office space requirements for (a) the Department of Labour (b) the department of northern affairs?

2. What were the names of the tenderers with respect to the above, and what is the amount of the annual rental with respect to each tender?

3. What was the location of the property with respect to each tender?

4. Were the respective tenderers the owners of the properties in question and, if not, what was the nature of their beneficial interest in the property?

5. If any property was subject to the exercise of an option (a) was any option exercised subsequent to the optioning of tenders, or (b) dropped subsequent to the optioning of tenders and, if so, in either case?

6. Was any mortgage financing on either property for which lease contracts have been signed contingent upon the securing of a long term lease with the government of Canada and, if so, which ones?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. Forty one interested parties took out project briefs and six tenders were submitted from four companies for both requirements.

2. Names of Tenderers	Annual rental
Laurentian Realty Limited,
proposal "A"	$605,119
proposal "B"	667,937
Campeau Construction Ltd.	616,691
Ottawa Commercial Realties Limited	775,000
Assaly Construction Limited	825,100

The sixth proposal was from the Campeau Construction Limited who offered to accommodate the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in addition to the Department of Labour in the same building at the same proportionate per annum rate.

3. The property locations were as follows: Laurentian Realty Limited, south side of Laurier between Kent and Bank streets. Campeau Construction Limited, west side of Kent street between Laurier and Gloucester streets. Ottawa Commercial Realties, north side of Laurier west between O'Connor and Metcalfe streets. Assaly Construction Limited, north side of Laurier between Bank and O'Connor.

4. Laurentian Realty Limited obtained an option on the property in question on May 29, 1964, to be exercised up to and including the 30th day of November 1964. Campeau Construction Limited owned the property. Ottawa Commercial Realties Limited owned the property. Assaly Construction Limited held a letter of commitment to grant an option dated July 16, 1964.

5. It is the custom of the department to deal with persons having a firm interest in the property. It is also common commercial practice to do so. In this specific case the department asked the bidders to provide proof of their control of the site whether by ownership or by option and in the event of the latter stipulated that the options run for a period of six months from the date of closing of tenders. The department has not ascertained whether any of the options in question were either exercised or dropped following the opening of tenders.

It is assumed that in section (a) and (b) of the question the word "optioning" should read "opening".

6. No knowledge of this.

[Mr. Lambert.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FINANCIAL AID TO MEDICAL STUDENTS, ETC.

Question No. 1,570—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

As of this date, what scholarships, bursaries, loans or other financial aid (in kind, number and amount) does the government of Canada make available to (a) undergraduate medical students (b) postgraduate medical students (c) undergraduate dental students (d) postgraduate dental students (e) undergraduate nurses (f) postgraduate nurses (g) undergraduate pharmacists?

Return tabled.

EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS CONVICTED OF INDICTABLE OFFENCE

Question No. 1,690—Mr. Prittie:

Has the civil service commission or any of the following departments or agencies of the government any regulation or rule which states that persons who have been convicted of an indictable offence shall not be employed and, if not, how many persons in this category were accepted for employment in 1962 and 1963: Department of Justice; Department of Trade and Commerce; Department of National Health and Welfare; Department of Veterans Affairs; Department of Defence Production; Department of Agriculture; Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; national film board; dominion coal board; national capital commission; board of broadcast governors?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the materials tabled yesterday by the Minister of Public Works satisfy motion No. 157, and that, consequently, this motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. Lambert: That is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this motion be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stewart: And I ask that motion No. 134 be allowed to stand.

OTTAWA—TENDER CALLS FOR OFFICE SPACE REQUIREMENTS

Motion No. 157—Mr. Lambert:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the tender calls issued by the Department of Public Works for office space requirements for the Department of Labour and for the department of northern affairs.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—FAILURE TO APPEAR IN COURT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, not in any way intruding on the questions which were asked yesterday regarding the elusive Mr. Banks. I should like to ask the minister whether, having regard to the unusual course that has been taken in connection with the Banks case—his ability to get out of the country if in fact he has done so, and all these things of that nature—he does not think a probe into the whole question regarding Mr. Banks should be made in order to remove some of the suspicions that are in the minds of people in respect of the elusive nature of this gentleman.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, surely there has been nothing unusual in the dealings of the Department of Justice and other departments in relation to Mr. Banks. I think in view of the facts as they have been stated, namely in relation to the stand taken by the crown concerning first the opposition to bail and second the insistence on a very high bail, it would take a really very suspicious person to still be suspicious.

I may add this in relation to Mr. Banks' whereabouts. I have nothing more to report than what I did not state yesterday. The bench warrant which has been issued against him has been remitted to and is presently in the hands of the provincial police of Quebec, and the R.C.M.P. has offered all co-operation for the purpose of locating the object of the bench warrant.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, everything was answered but the question. I will elucidate what I had in mind so the minister will have that information. He said one would have to be suspicious if one were to raise any doubt regarding this man. I am not going into that question. One just has to look at the period of years that he has been in Canada and the protection that he has apparently received from the department of immigration and elsewhere to answer that suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party over to the right have a personal interest in this matter. My question is this. Is there going to be an investigation by the Department of Justice into the degree to which this man has been able to flout the laws of this country? Will the Minister of Justice tell us whether there has been any request made of the United States immigration authorities to ascertain whether he crossed into the United States and, if so, when?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear in my mind that there is no reason to bring about an investigation such as is suggested. However, I agree with the right hon. gentleman that to the extent that information might be obtainable from the United States, it would be proper for me to ascertain whether any such request has been made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say whether up to the present time his department or counsel retained by the federal government have asked the United States about this man, as to whether he crossed the line? Surely that would have been one of the first things done.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer this particular question at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Does he have the impression that Mr. Banks is still in Canada or does he feel that he has fled the country? What is the minister's personal impression at this time?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect and friendship for the hon. member for Villeneuve, and without trying to evade the question, I feel it would not be proper for me to express any feeling which is not corroborated by facts.

[Text]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest in and importance of this matter, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has asked or contemplates asking the F.B.I. in the United States or Interpol to determine the location of Hal Banks.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, this seemed to be implied in the question which was put to me by the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Winch: I am asking if the minister has requested the F.B.I. or Interpol to do this.

An hon. Member: Get Perry Mason.

Mr. Favreau: —but I am unable to answer that question at the moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding may I say it is not the F.B.I. I have in mind but the Department of Justice.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister believe that $25,000 bail for a free spender like Hal Banks is a large amount?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think I must answer that question. I made it clear yesterday that it would be contempt of court on my part to comment on the decision as to bail which has been rendered by the chief justice of the court of appeal of Quebec.

Mr. MacInnis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why does the Minister of Justice insist that Mr. Banks' bail was high? He is the one who has been insisting that this is high bail.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the report that Great Britain has withdrawn 198 troops from its contingent in the United Nations Cyprus force. Was the Canadian government consulted regarding this matter? Is this the first of a series of withdrawals, or is this the only withdrawal which is contemplated by the government of the United Kingdom?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the 25th of June the secretary of state for commonwealth relations announced that it was the intention of the British government to reduce the size of their contingent in the United Nations force, which at that time numbered 1,800, to between 1,100 and 1,200 men. It is in consequence of that statement that the strength of the British contingent as of the 14th of August was reduced to 1,034.

However, this figure is not to be regarded as completely final because part of the reduction effected consists of troops which are being rotated. There are indications that when this rotation has been completed the figure for the United Kingdom contingent will be increased to the point where the British and Canadian contingents will be roughly equivalent in size. The figure for the Canadian contingent as of the 14th of August was 1,130. British logistic support, which is of course of vital importance to the whole force, is being maintained at its present level.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give the house the assurance that there will be no unilateral withdrawal of Canadian troops until such time as the United Nations itself decides that they can no longer fill a useful role as a peace keeping force in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will remember that I dealt with this question some time ago, and within the context of what I said then, of course, the decision is one for the United Nations.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister a further supplementary question with reference to the announcement that an agreement has been reached between the United Nations and Archbishop Makarios regarding the partial lifting of the blockade against the Turkish Cypriots. I would like to ask the minister whether this does not make it clear that the government of Cyprus has been blockading the Turkish Cypriots and seeking to starve them into submission, and whether this does not make it perfectly apparent that Archbishop Makarios, behind the screen of the United Nations peace keeping force, has been systematically seeking to liquidate his opposition?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend's commentary will speak for itself. There is an agreement now with the government of Cyprus, arranged by the United Nations representatives, to provide for the immediate re-establishment of the water supply in the affected area and to provide for an adequate flow of food and fuel. This arrangement also assumes that the Turkish Cypriots would guarantee freedom of movement for all civilians in the Kokkina and Lefka areas. Provision has been made for the movement of Turkish Cypriots from the Kokkina area under United Nations forces supervision. Finally, the entry of food and fuel into the Turkish Cypriot sector "in reasonable amounts" to be determined by the international committee of the Red Cross has been provided for, with an immediate allocation of kerosene made to relieve the present acute shortage of fuel.

The humanitarian aspect of the situation has been put in the hands of the international committee of the Red Cross, with the full backing and assistance of the United Nations peace keeping force in Cyprus.

CONGO—EFFORTS OF UNITED NATIONS TO PREVENT BLOODSHED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In regard to the continuing violence in the eastern Congo and Burundi, can the minister tell us whether any effort is presently being made by the United Nations to prevent any further bloodshed in the eastern Congo and to resettle the Watusi tribe that has come across into the Congo from Rwanda?

I also have a related question referring to questions posed last week. How important is the communist Chinese influence behind these disturbances, so far as the government is aware?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any precise answer to the last question. I stated recently that there was evidence of this kind of penetration. There have been discussions initiated by the United States, between Mr. Harriman, and the Belgian foreign minister with regard to the situation in the Congo.

Mr. Thompson: As a supplementary question in view of the fact that two prominent United Nations officials were killed yesterday, has there been any communication with the United Nations or any indication by the United Nations of action being planned?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As my hon. friend knows, the United Nations force has left the Congo. There continues to be a United Nations office there, but beyond that I cannot offer any further information.

MALAYSIA—SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF MUTUAL AID FROM INDONESIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of reports in today's Globe and Mail that President Sukarno of Indonesia is promoting a large demonstration, with shouts of "Destroy our enemies, Britain and America" being carried on, would the government now decide to stop handing out Canadian taxpayers' money to aid this man, and give it to our friends in the area instead?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I said yesterday, I will give consideration to the wisdom of the suggestion made at that time by the hon. member and renewed by him today. I would point out, however, that the assistance given to Indonesia is not in the form of military aid. It represents the continuation of a policy which was pursued by the former administration, and up to now, has been observed by this government. I believe Australia, Japan, New Zealand, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany and the United Nations specialized agencies are all giving non-military assistance to Indonesia. They have not indicated that as a result of President Sukarno's actions toward Malaysia there is any intention on their part to curtail such non-military assistance. However, the matter is being reviewed.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the house the nature of the aid which is being given to Indonesia? Is it mainly food and technical assistance?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is wheat flour and some technical assistance.

Mr. Douglas: We are not going to make any friends in Indonesia by refusing to help feed them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is why I said I could go no further than examine the suggestion made by the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the secretary of state not agree that the economy of Indonesia is in a very bad condition, and that giving aid to President Sukarno to help him out in this way is helping him in his war-like activities?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not believe that giving assistance to countries necessarily means we are furthering their ideological objectives. We are sending wheat to China, but I do not believe the hon. member for Qu'Appelle could be branded as a supporter of communist China.

Mr. Nesbitt: The secretary of state has suggested we are giving wheat to China. We are selling it to China.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the hon. member for telling us the obvious.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—ARDA PROJECTS IN NORTHWESTERN COUNTIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. Does he intend, in co-operation with the Quebec provincial authorities, to set up rural development programs for the ridings of northwestern Quebec, that is, the constituencies of Villeneuve, Chapleau and Pontiac-Témiscamingue?

More specifically, did he receive requests from the Quebec government to encourage the construction of slaughter-houses and cold storage facilities designed to meet the needs of that area?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the initiative in this field is the sole responsibility of the Quebec government. We have received no request as yet in regard to the matters raised by the hon. member.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of reports that the Ontario legislation respecting private pension plans does not provide the amount of portability that was anticipated, could we not in this parliament compensate for this disappointment by expediting action on the Canada pension plan, and toward that end could not the new resolution be put on the order paper at an early date?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are presently examining the whole question of portability with the provinces. So far as expediting the pension legislation is concerned I would be very glad, Mr. Speaker, to approve and support any step that can be taken toward that end, and for that purpose to finish as soon as possible the debate on the resolution now before the house.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister not aware of the fact that if the resolution respecting the Canada pension plan were on the order paper the desire of all members to get to that order of business might shorten the flag debate?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that whether the resolution is on the order paper or not, this is an item of business we will proceed with as soon as we can after the flag resolution is settled.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the latter statement on the part of the Prime Minister does he now give the assurance that before we adjourn, if the flag resolution is passed, the pension resolution will be brought in and the pension legislation brought before the house?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as I have already informed the house, when the flag resolution is disposed of we hope to take a very well earned recess, and immediately after the recess we will be in a position to proceed not only with the pension resolution but with the pension legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is not the question I asked. Will the Prime Minister, in the interests of the Canadian people, give the assurance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that this is going to be introduced; not the second or third revised edition of the Minister of National Health and Welfare but a final one that will assure that the pension legislation will receive immediate attention? If he does we will be behind him on the pension legislation 100 per cent.

Mr. Pearson: I will be very glad, Mr. Speaker, to give that assurance and I hope my right hon. friend will, in his turn, give me an assurance that we will be finished with the flag resolution in time to deal with the pension legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, apparently it is to be postponed until after a vacation. I ask the Prime Minister, is the legislation drafted?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we will be ready to proceed with the resolution and the legislation, and if the right hon. gentleman will only agree to some reasonable time limit on the debate on the flag resolution we can go right ahead with the pension resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I put it to the Prime Minister that the work has not been completed, the legislation has not been drafted and final agreement with the provinces regarding portability has not been attained.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as is often the case my right hon. friend is ill informed.

Mr. Knowles: As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister, at the adjourned meeting he is going to have with the party leaders tomorrow, will discuss the possibility of shortening the flag debate and getting the first stage of the pension legislation over before a recess.

Mr. Pearson: I will be very glad indeed to discuss that matter and I would hope, as a result of the meeting tomorrow, as a first step in that desirable course we might agree on a time limit that will bring debate on the flag resolution to an end at a reasonable time, and then we can proceed at once with the pension resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith: Closure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all the evasion indulged in by the Prime Minister will he now answer me definitely? Has the legislation been prepared, and has there been agreement with the provinces on the question of portability? Why doesn't he answer that? Why does he evade with all of this?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the agreement with the provinces has been completed, and the legislation is being drafted and will be ready for the house as soon as my right hon. friend will agree to put an end to the filibuster on the flag resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me we have had considerable discussion on this matter. The time devoted to the question period is very short today, and if there are only one or two more supplementaries I hope we could get through with them very quickly.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Would he not be prepared, for instance, to consider the feasibility of a quick legislation for a personal pension plan in favour of the Leader of the Opposition, so that the House of Commons may get rid of him forever.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I would be delighted to give the most favourable consideration to that proposal were it not for the knowledge that my right hon. friend does not approve of increases in the income of members of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this last question to the right hon. gentleman further evidence of the close alliance with the Creditistes?

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON EXTENSION OF CHINESE ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): In reply to questions raised yesterday by the hon. member for St. Paul and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and following my declaration of last Friday on the adjustment statement program affecting immigrants of Chinese origin, I have reviewed the situation in the light of the experience of the last few days. I think hon. members will be interested to know that on Monday alone approximately 400 immigrants of Chinese origin came forward to regularize their status in Canada, which indicates to me that there are still a large number of this category of immigrants who have not taken advantage of this program.

In view of the above, the date of September 1 will apply only to individuals entering Canada on or after that date, and I have so advised my officials. This means in effect that the adjustment statement program will continue for the time being to apply to immigrants of Chinese origin who have entered the country previously. It seems there is a consensus that this program should come to an end. I sincerely hope the members of the Chinese community will continue to exercise their prerogatives and come forward to regularize their status. I intend to keep a close watch on the situation, and will report to the house at an early opportunity.

I will communicate the contents of my answer of today to the editors of the Chinese language newspapers in Canada.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does Your Honour not feel that statements such as the one just made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—and I may say in passing that I believe all of us welcome it—should be made on motions, particularly on Wednesday when lengthy announcements of this sort cut into the time allotted for questions?

Mr. Tremblay: I was replying to two questions which had been asked yesterday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether the suggestion made yesterday by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will be accepted, in order that Chinese may get three months' notice if there is a change in policy?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, this suggestion, like all others which have been made, is being looked into, and I shall be glad to consider them when the program is brought to an end.

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO ORDER FOR NEW DESIGN PENNANTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister without Portfolio.

Could the minister tell us whether his order for three leaf flags was placed with Japanese manufacturers?

Hon. Yvon Dupuis (Minister without Portfolio): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION RESPECTING DELINQUENT NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with the United Nations and is based on the action of the United States house of representatives in voting unanimously to urge that country's delegation to press for steps to be taken under article 19 to deprive delinquent United Nations members of their voting rights. I should like to ask the secretary of state whether similar instructions are being issued to our representative at the United Nations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Actions taken in the legislature of another country are, of course, matters for that country alone. As to the course Canada will take, the government will of course give our delegates the necessary instructions when the assembly opens. But article 19 is clear. The international court of justice has given an opinion as to the legal obligations it entails. I would hope, however, that it would be possible for the Soviet union and other delinquents to make payments, even partial payments, so as to avoid any confrontation in the matter.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

THOMPSON, MAN.—REPORTED REDUCTION IN NORTHERN ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the increasing cost of living in many parts of northern Manitoba, and in view of the fact that northern allowances for some federal employees have been drastically reduced while in some areas northern allowances for other federal employees in other departments have remained unchanged, will the Postmaster General look into the situation concerning employees of his department in Thompson, Manitoba, who I understand have suffered drastic reductions in northern allowance payments?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Simpson: Your Honour has ruled that this is a question for the order paper, but these people have just been advised in recent days that their allowances are to be cut off, or drastically reduced, and I was wondering whether the Postmaster General would not look into this situation.

HOUSING

REPORTED INTENTION TO INCREASE INCENTIVE BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Doucett (Lanark): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether the winter house building incentive bonus is being increased from $500 to $750.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, there is no intention to increase the amount of the winter house building bonus.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PAYMENT OF TELEPHONE BILLS OF CREDITISTE MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Would the Minister of Finance tell the house whether the government intends to pay the telephone bills of the Caouette's Ralliement members which amount to $1,600, with two especially noticeable, being in the amounts of $457.65 and $412.55?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Labelle who has asked a question should start by minding his own business.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): But he pays his bills.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF COMPLETION OF TRANSLATION OF BEAUCHESNE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Quebec East I promised to make a statement concerning the French edition of Beauchesne. On August 7, 1964 my colleague the Secretary of State, in answer to a similar question, indicated that the French edition would be ready at the end of this month. I have been informed this morning that sufficient copies of the French edition will be received from the publisher for distribution on or before Tuesday next.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Tuesday, August 18, consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I should like first—

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding—

Mr. Speaker: I should like to advise the house that members of the New Democratic party spoke to me just before I came into the chamber, and it slipped my mind momentarily. I believe there was general agreement that the hon. member for Greenwood would be the next speaker. I am wondering, therefore, whether the hon. member for Rosthern would stand aside for the moment.

Mr. Nasserden: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this house, and perhaps you yourself, sir, will have observed that except for a commendably brief and witty speech by the hon. member for New Westminster, the members of this party have not until now participated in this debate on the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City, nor indeed in the debate on the amendment since it was resumed a week ago.

This is not because we are not interested in this debate. On the contrary, we are very much interested in the debate and have definite views on the subamendment and indeed on the whole flag issue. The reason for our restraint, Mr. Speaker, is our view that an unduly prolonged debate on this subamendment, or on any other subamendment, on the amendment itself or on the main motion, would be extremely damaging to parliament and therefore to Canada itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: Once the main issues have been made clear, continuation of debate on such an emotional subject can only serve to cause bitterness and, what is perhaps equally bad, boredom and irritation about the whole subject. I have found Canadians with a variety of opinions as to the solution of this flag question; but I have found an almost unanimous view that prolonged and repetitious debate is unnecessary and does no credit to Canada or to parliament. I do not deny the right of individual members to put their convictions on this subject on the record if they think they ought to do so, but I appeal to all hon. members, in the interests of parliament and of Canada as a whole, to do so with brevity and restraint.

It is my belief that parliament should not be in almost continuous session. One of our jobs, of course, is to debate in this house; but we have another important job, and that is to get back to our constituencies and discuss with them face to face the issues of today and correct some of the false impressions about parliament and other public issues which are only too prevalent. As far as I am concerned, I also believe that parliament needs a reasonable recess for thought and recuperation.

As a relative newcomer to parliament I would hesitate to put forward this view were it not for the statements of a great parliamentarian whose authority, I am quite sure, will not be denied by any member here, least of all by members of the official opposition. I wish to read something said by Mr. Winston Churchill in 1931:

> If you wish to say what is wrong with parliament...it is that it sits far too long in the year. I would lay down that except in times of war or great national emergency parliament should not sit more than five months, with the ordinary short intervals, say, occupying six months of the year. That ought to be the maximum.

Then again in 1944 he made a similar statement to which I call the attention of members of this house:

> Do not...ever suppose that you can strengthen parliament by wearying it, and by keeping it in almost continuous session. If you want to reduce the power of parliament, let it sit every day in the year. one fifth part filled, and then you will find it will be the laughingstock of the nation, instead of being, as it continues to be, in spite of all the strains of modern life, the citadel as well as the cradle of parliamentary institutions throughout the world—

I should like to read another quotation from this book, which is called "Our Parliament". It is about the British parliament, and the author is Strathearn Gordon. He discusses the length of sessions and says this:

> Why don't M.P.s work for more than about eight months in the year? The answer is that they do—but not at Westminster.

The same is true of Ottawa:

> Most ministers undoubtedly look forward to the "holidays", when they are free from parliamentary cares, as the periods when they can put their best work into their departments.

I call this to the attention of hon. members:

> But for ordinary members, too, reasonably long adjournments are a practical necessity. When a man has for many weeks been living a sort of double life, spending late nights at Westminster, speaking in his constituency at the week ends, working in the train in between, with his private affairs neglected and his nerves in shreds, it is surely right to allow him time to recuperate and think. Three hundred and seventy years ago the Lord Keeper was expressing the idea in almost lyrical Elizabethan style:
> "The sessions" (he said) "cannot be long; by reason of the springtime, 'tis fit that gentlemen should repair to their countries; the justices of assize also to go to their circuits.
>
> "So the good hours"...

[Mr. Brewin.]

I commend these words to the house; they were spoken by the Lord Keeper 370 years ago:

> "So the good hours should not be lost in idle speeches, but the little time we have should be bestowed wholly on such businesses as are needful to be considered of".

I think we should bestow our time reasonably on the sort of business that ought to be considered. There is another reason why this flag debate should not be unnecessarily prolonged and should be terminated at a reasonable time. Important as this issue of the flag is—and no one denies its importance—it is even more important that we should clear the decks of this contentious issue so we can get on with the other tremendously important business that lies before this house.

Today we mentioned the pension plan. There are many other items of legislation that ought to be dealt with. If we prolong this debate now, or put it off until some other time and resume it again, the decks will not be cleared for us to deal with that which is needful to be dealt with.

The subamendment before the house proposes a complicated plebiscite on the flag issue. I believe such a plebiscite would be divisive; I think it would be an evasion of our responsibilities as elected members of parliament. I think it would be productive of strife, bitterness and perhaps even boredom throughout the nation. I believe that we in this house were elected to take the burden of decisions in the interests of Canada as a whole. I think that if we could take a referendum, as was suggested in this house yesterday, to determine whether we should have a referendum on the flag issue, the Canadian people would tell us in no uncertain terms to do the job we were elected to do and to do it soon.

After all, Mr. Speaker, what would the referendum proposed by the subamendment solve? I suspect it would solve nothing at all. It would still leave parliament to act. Supposing, as I suggested frivolously—although it would not be funny if it in fact happened—we had a plebiscite based on the subamendment and found that 30 per cent of the people were in favour of the red ensign, 10 per cent were for the red ensign plus embellishments, 30 per cent were for a single maple leaf flag and, if I get my arithmetic right, another 30 per cent supported the three maple leaves emblem produced by the government as put before us in the main resolution. Supposing we were faced with that situation. Would the referendum have solved anything, or would we have to renew this interminable debate all over again?

Mr. Willoughby: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he believe that a preferential ballot would produce a vote such as suggested by the hon. member?

Mr. Brewin: Well, I rather rule out the preferential ballot in my mind because the hon. member for Oxford, who sits on the front benches of the same party as my hon. friend and who was asked that question, said he did not think a preferential ballot was workable, and I rather accept that view. The preferential ballot would contain so many complications and difficulties that I doubt it would solve the problem.

Mr. Coates: There are far too many complications in the Pearson flag.

Mr. Brewin: I think the government flag too is a little too complicated. I would prefer to see a single maple leaf.

There is another reason I suggest the subamendment should be dealt with expeditiously and rejected. It is that there is a solution available which all Canadians, or nearly all Canadians, would accept, I believe with a sigh of relief, and which would represent a non-partisan approach to the problem. This solution would be, in our view—and in this I speak for my party—to amend resolution 44A to substitute a single maple leaf design, and to amend resolution 44B to accept the Canadian red ensign as the symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth. The first proposal would satisfy the vast majority of the Canadian people, particularly the younger generation, who seek a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mr. Churchill: How do you know?

Mr. Brewin: Well, I know only from the letters I have received from young people and from those I speak to, and I can assure you there are a great many of them. But I could be wrong. What I want to say to the house is that in our view a single maple leaf design is the simplest, the strongest and the most distinctive design. Above all, if it were adopted it could not be considered as a one party approach to the problem. I know there are people in all parties, including the official opposition, who would be quite willing to accept this single maple leaf design and get rid of the stigma, if it is a stigma, of its being produced by one political party. That is not the sort of flag which perhaps we should have.

The reasons I give for accepting the Canadian red ensign as the symbol of the commonwealth in place of the union jack are these. We all respect the union jack, but it is the national flag of Great Britain. The modern commonwealth is much more than Great Britain. The Queen is the Queen of Canada as well as the Queen of Great Britain. The red ensign—and in this I may get some mild degree of support from the official opposition—as the letters received by many hon. members including myself indicate, has achieved a measure of recognition and loyalty in the hearts of many Canadians. But the solution which we propose—the adoption by this house of a single maple leaf flag as a distinctive flag for Canada, and the adoption of the Canadian red ensign as the symbol of the commonwealth—would in my judgment achieve a greater degree of acceptance than any other solution and it could be supported, as we have found out, by members of all parties in this house.

I believe the overriding consideration which should affect us all is not the views of our constituents alone, although naturally we take them into account. I believe that what should concern us most is that which will achieve the greatest measure of Canadian unity, and best serve the welfare of Canada as a whole. That is the matter which should inspire us. Therefore I urge that all of us in this house move with all reasonable dispatch, without cutting off the right of anyone who wishes to speak, but speaking with brevity and restraint, to such a solution, which I believe would find favour throughout Canada.

Mr. Chatterton: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member not agree that any flag, be it the single maple leaf or some other, in order to be free from any partisan political connotation should have been recommended by a non-partisan committee with a fair degree of unanimity?

Mr. Brewin: If we could start all over again I must say that I think a non-partisan committee would be a good way to start. But I do not think we can remake history. We are now well on our way into a protracted debate in this house of a matter which has been fully discussed all over the country, and I think we should deal with the propositions now before us and deal with them soon.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate all those who have taken part in this debate and who have participated in helping to define the limits within which the various political parties in this house are dedicated to national unity. Indeed, sir, there are those who by their silence have revealed a wholesome awareness that democracy still tugs at the hearts of Canadians. It is a reminder to all of us that Canadians have a depth of feeling for and appreciation of national purpose, so much discounted by our press and by many of our fair weather politicians. I would be surprised that anyone should dare suggest that this was a matter to be disposed of in haste lest we all repent it later. I shall have something further to say later in my speech regarding the remarks made by the hon. member for Greenwood.

The forging of national unity and national purpose is no mean task requiring anybody to placidly admit or yield or concede without question the traditions of our heritage. The resolution before us authorizing a distinctive flag for Canada, with the amendment and subamendment, should have brought us to one of those happy, joyous, inspiring moments of our history. It should be a moment of mutual confidence, appreciation, trust and respect.

I say to you, sir, what a pity that is not the case today. I think of the Prime Minister, a man of reputation, a Nobel peace prize winner. I think of his zealous claims as to his devotion to diplomacy. I think of this minority government and the opportunity allowed him to share with all Canadians the choice and popularity of a national emblem. I remember the boasts made by his colleagues in his party during the election campaign that this was a man who cared about his country and its people. I think of those first few brave words of his in regard to this matter, that there would be a free vote in parliament.

Thinking of these things, sir, I also think of his threat of a general election should his party fall on this issue. I am reminded of those other careless acts committed by this government. This ill-fated parliament, born of minorities and intrigues, is witnessing another of those acts of carelessness which so vividly portray the petulance of the present Prime Minister.

We might well have overlooked that in itself, in the normal course of events had parliament been given an opportunity to fulfil the function for which it was created, the orderly dispatch of the business of this country. This measure before us was not a part of the planned program of this government for this session. Suddenly several weeks ago it was thrust upon us as a challenge to a general election. This party in the official opposition has no confidence in the present Prime Minister or his government, but we did not challenge the government to a general election. That challenge came from the lips of the Prime Minister. My leader, Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, and all of us on this side of the house deplore this interruption of the business of the parliament of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: By the same token we on this side of the house cannot neglect our duties even in the face of the blatant threat of the Prime Minister. We have said before, and I wish to say again today, that in comparison with the urgent and vital problems facing Canadians, this appears to be a most trivial manoeuvre undertaken by the Prime Minister. There are compelling reasons, sir, to believe that this manoeuvre is the most provocative in all Canadian history. Several months ago I indicated in this house that it was apparent that this is the most careless prime minister in Canadian history. Events since then have confirmed and strengthened that belief. Indeed, a few days ago I was not surprised to hear the hon. member for Leeds credited with drawing attention to the fact that this was also a stubborn prime minister.

I ask you, sir, what has that carelessness on the part of this Prime Minister cost in terms of national unity? That question can be measured in part by the increasing cost of living borne by every household and by the multiplying burdens of those in distressed circumstances wherever they reside in Canada. That, sir, is only a small part of the cost, measured in frustration, that has been occasioned parliament, which has labelled this as one of the most unproductive parliaments in Canadian history, and which throughout its course has revealed the chief magistrate of this house as most irresponsible in the performance of his duties. The attitude taken at the time of the first Gordon budget and maintained here in the aftermath of that catastrophic event, paved the way for the present impasse.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: Those weak, misguided and indeterminate groups, the third, fourth and fifth opposition parties, have encouraged that carelessness in this house.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I certainly do not like to interrupt the hon. member's interesting speech, but if he could restrict himself to the subamendment it would be very much appreciated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to speak on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour listened to a speech by the hon. member for Greenwood who time after time departed from the subamendment. Surely the same rule should have applied to him. I say that with great deference.

An hon. Member: What about the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday afternoon, when I was not in the house, made a gratuitous attack on me, but when I came in he said no more.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that hon. members will appreciate the difficulty of defining relevancy. I was a little upset at the course that the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood were taking, but he seemed to tie them in at the end. I have been listening very carefully to the hon. member for Rosthern, and I hope he is going to do the same thing.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on the point of order. I should like to draw your attention to the fact that last night the member for Quebec-Montmorency dealt with sales tax, nuclear arms and a scout jamboree held in Greece. Surely if hon. members are to be called to order in this house the rules should apply equally to all hon. members, and not just to a special selected group.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Let me make it clear. I have not called the hon. member to order. I just suggested that if he could confine himself to the subamendment he would be very helpful indeed.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Byrne: It may be difficult to define relevancy in respect of the speech by the hon. member for Rosthern, but I think if we look closely we can find one rule which you may be able to enforce, and that is the rule in respect of a member reading his speech.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Byrne: It is apparent that the hon. member is reading his speech word for word, as has been done by so many other members in the course of this debate.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the same point of order. I had no intention of doing so, but because of the interjection just made by the hon. member for Kootenay East, who has the gall to bring to your attention the fact that hon. members are reading their speeches, I must say that he himself cannot even deliver a speech in this house without reading it.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I have no argument with what the hon. member may say in respect of whether my speeches are good or bad, but I can say that I have been in the house since 1949 and have not read one speech in all that time.

An hon. Member: That is far too long.

Mr. Byrne: Perhaps I have not delivered a good speech, but neither have I read one.

Mr. Speaker: In an attempt to settle the issue may I say that in my opinion the hon. member for Rosthern is merely referring to his valuable notes.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate your assistance, because I intend to tie together the ends I have left so far and some others I wish to refer to, bringing my argument to bear on the very matter before the house at the present time. I must say that I have yet to hear the hon. member for Kootenay East make a speech in this house. I dare him to make a speech in this house on this particular issue.

When I was interrupted to receive your valued advice, Mr. Speaker, I was about to indicate how the third, fourth and fifth opposition groups in the House of Commons have individually and severally contributed to that sense of security within which the Prime Minister has sought to satisfy his search for a place in Canadian history. Each of these groups in turn has risen to save the face of the Prime Minister and his minority government. I think it should be noted, and I direct these remarks through you, sir, to the hon. member for Greenwood, that it was the N.D.P. members who were so zealous in this regard at the time of the vote on the first budget, when the first revealing indication of the ineptitude of this government was given. They sat in their places and refrained from expressing an opinion, the only opinion that could have affected the course the Prime Minister might have taken at that particular time.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member addressed a question to me which I would be very glad to answer, but it seems to me to be totally irrelevant. Therefore I think I will not answer it now.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot of phony points of order, but that is not even a phony one. Thus it is that the time of parliament has been frittered away by cabinet ministers who are not required to do their homework. Budgetary items and legislative items have been presented prematurely.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nasserden: Valuable time has been consumed and the study of government proposals has been a fruitless wasteland.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume these are rather rambling introductory remarks to the subamendment. Would the hon. member please get to the subamendment as soon as he can? In saying that I am simply trying to enforce the order of the house.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, that is my desire, and I want to point out that this matter raises the whole question of national unity in this country and the strains and stresses that are in effect in various sectors of this nation today. Surely at this time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has placed so much emphasis on this important matter we are not to be debarred from bringing in the background of what has taken place that has brought parliament to the impasse in which it finds itself today. Everyone in this country knows that the real and tangible problems of Canadians have been left almost untouched. In no province has this carelessness been felt more acutely than in the fair province of Quebec. Farm conditions in that province have deteriorated—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: —below those which prevailed when this government came to office. Unemployment has become a spectre—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Nasserden: —in large areas of that province—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I certainly do not want to interrupt the speech which the hon. member is making. It may well be that in certain phases of this debate the remarks he is now making might well be in order, but at this particular phase I think it is necessary for him to adhere fairly closely to the terms of the subamendment, and I would ask him to do so.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I assure you that if we are to deal with the subamendment we have to deal with the factors that are present in this nation today before we can decide on what should be presented to the Canadian people in a referendum or plebiscite for them to make a decision. I was about to say that as a result of what has taken place unemployment had become a spectre in a large part of the province of Quebec, when the rest of the nation is booming. We have heard an arrogant discounting of the seriousness of the situation by cabinet ministers across the way. All of these things have contributed to that feeling of neglect that is so evident and so widespread in the province of Quebec at the present time.

There is another disservice that has been committed against the province of Quebec, a disservice that has been nurtured by the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet as they have gone about the country emphasizing the divisions, emphasizing the suspicions, emphasizing the prejudices, all of which has resulted in a further isolation of Quebec from the rest of Canada. We in this party, the official opposition, deplore that measure of encouragement that has been given the advocates of separation by these thoughtless, immature manoeuvres shared by almost every member of the cabinet opposite.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: Into that divisive atmosphere this careless Prime Minister has thrust this resolution, contemptuously seeking to drive the wedge of division even to the point of an election if necessary, all that coming from a Nobel peace prize winner, all that coming from a diplomat, all that coming from a man who was said to care for his country and his people. I say to you, sir, that this is one of the most pitiful, one of the most shameful manoeuvres ever undertaken by a Canadian prime minister. It is also the single most irresponsible action in Canadian history ever given priority over urgent domestic issues.

Mr. Byrne: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nasserden: It is held out to Quebec as a shelter against the outrage of promises unfulfilled by successive Liberal administrations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Kootenay East on a point of order.

Mr. Byrne: Before you came to the chair, sir, I drew to the attention of Mr. Speaker that the hon. member was reading every word of his diabolical speech. I think there should be a ruling on this point at this time. I would ask that the Sergeant-at-Arms go and stand beside the hon. member to determine whether or not the hon. member is reading his speech.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ricard: I think you are irresponsible.

Mr. Churchill: You had better give the fascist salute.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Nasserden: This measure is held out as a gesture to Quebec—

Mr. Favreau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nasserden: —as a shelter against the outrage of unfulfilled Liberal promises.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The Minister of Justice on a point of order.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, it seems quite clear that the way into which the hon. member who has the floor is engaging at the moment has nothing whatsoever to do with the subamendment. The discussion on the subamendment must, as has been ruled, assume that the amendment would carry, and what the hon. member is doing at the moment is denying the fact that the question of the flag ought to be dealt with at all. Personally I must add quite frankly that the rule to the effect that it is not appropriate to read speeches has never appealed to me. That is my personal opinion. I think it is a good thing at certain times for members to be allowed to prepare written statements so they may state carefully what they wish to tell the house. However, here is one example of the fact that the rule is appropriate sometimes because the hon. member, not being able to depart from his text, cannot abide by the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, we have just heard from the Minister of Justice but I noticed yesterday that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was directing that famous tirade against us the Minister of Justice pounded his desk, even though much of what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was totally irrelevant. I also noticed that the same thing applied when the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking this afternoon. The minister was pounding his desk at a time of total irrelevancy. I say that what is fair for one should be fair for the other. The Minister of Trade and Commerce certainly was reading his speech most of the time, but I am not worried about that. I am talking about irrelevancy.

Mr. Favreau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness the hon. gentleman will remember that I said personally I did not disagree with the reading of speeches, and approved of it so that members could more carefully prepare their notes. However, I also said that in some cases the fact of being glued to a text and not being able to depart from it may prevent a member from abiding by the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Coates: Is that why you did not object to the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Members of the house are all aware that the reading of speeches is not conducive to the best form of debate, but there are times when a member has to refer to notes that he has in his possession. I am somewhat more concerned at the moment with the content of the hon. member's speech than I am with the extensive notes to which he appears to be referring. I know the hon. gentleman will agree with the Chair when I say to him it is at times very difficult to draw a hard and fast line of relevancy, but in view of the subamendment and the ruling by the Chair, confirmed by the house the other day, I am sure the hon. gentleman recognizes that, having made his introductory remarks, he should now continue with remarks which are relevant to the subamendment. May I ask him again to assist me in seeing that this is done?

Mr. Skoreyko: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; on reading the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) in yesterday's Hansard I notice that, as reported on two pages, he was brought to order at least three times. A minister of the crown deviating from the subamendment, as he did yesterday, would seem to me to be a course of action which it would be all right for the rest of the members of the house to take. Since the minister was not ruled against yesterday, and since the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) was not ruled against today, I cannot honestly understand how Your Honour could ask the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) to restrict his speech precisely to the subamendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is a difference as far as hon. members of the other parties who spoke are concerned: they were not dealing with the amendment to the amendment, but were rightly protesting against the filibuster which Conservative members are staging.

Members of the other parties were discussing the filibustering tactics of the Conservatives which is pure nonsense in the eyes of the people. In fact, that party has shown by its actions that it is the most separatist party. It is a fact that it is trying to set our two racial groups against each other.

I think representatives of the other parties in the house should try, and this is important, to calm down members of the Conservative party who are still keeping us here in the middle of August.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): With reference to the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking yesterday I happened to be in the Chair, and if the hon. gentleman will look back over Hansard I think he will see I asked him to do the same thing as I am now asking the hon. member for Rosthern to do. If we are going to have any order in debate we have to abide by the rules that the house has given to the Chair, and which the Chair is now trying to encourage hon. members to follow. I would think that the hon. member for Rosthern could continue now, and I hope he will make remarks that are relevant to the subamendment.

Mr. Nasserden: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau). He has shown a facility during the life of this parliament to seize the rules to stifle debate and prevent the expression of opinion in this house. Always he likes to hold a gun to your head, as he did prior to the Easter recess. I do not intend to be intimidated by his repeated undermining of the purpose of the rules. The rules were not made to facilitate the government itself. The rules were made for the House of Commons and its members, and I would suggest that this minister of the crown is one of those handicaps the Prime Minister has had to contend with in trying to get business through the House of Commons.

The Minister of Justice might well listen to the opposition. He might well open the door to his own backbenchers to take part in this debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

[Text]

Mr. Nasserden: I am not surprised—

Mr. Rondeau: On a point of order—

Mr. Nasserden: —that the Prime Minister—

Mr. Rondeau: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Will the hon. gentleman sit down please. May I ask the hon. member for Rosthern to continue his remarks on the subamendment in relation to the questions that should be contained in a plebiscite for the flag.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I would ask you to refer to standing order No. 34, paragraph (2), of the House of Commons.

> Mr. Speaker or the chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech, and if then the member still continues to speak, Mr. Speaker shall name him, or, if in committee, the chairman shall report him to the house.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to apply this standing order in the case of the hon. member who has the floor now.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The Chair is well aware of the standing order to which the hon. member refers, and I am sure the hon. member would wish to leave it in the hands of the Chair as to whether or not this standing order should be applied. At the moment I am just encouraging the hon. member for Rosthern to make remarks that are relevant to the subamendment before the house at the moment.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When the interruption took place I was about to mention those new frontiers of development and achievement that Canadians in every part of the country are looking toward today. I wanted to say that the province of Quebec is no different from any other province in that respect, except perhaps in the magnitude and complexity of the particular problems involved in the retention of continuity of things that are of greater importance in that part of Canada than in many other parts of the nation. I do not know why members on the government side want to deny me the right to say that, particularly the Minister of Justice.

In trying to come to the meat of the amendment and subamendment we should take a look at our history. I do not think there is a more romantic chapter in our history than that of French exploration and settlement in Canada. The church, of course, carried much of the early work in New France. In reading our history we cannot help but acknowledge the contribution made by both Protestant and Roman Catholic missionairies who were the first to recognize fully the importance and the significance of the discovery in North America.

At that time both France and Great Britain were enterprising nations competing for world commerce. The struggle for supremacy in North America is one of the intriguing stories of world history, and none of us need feel too much ashamed of the struggle that took place. Nor should we ever sell short the destiny that the results of that struggle gave to Canadians. That history is the story of the development of self-government. Nor should it ever be forgotten how tortuous the road might otherwise have been had it not been for the decision of the 13 colonies to establish an independent republic south of the border.

Indeed, sir, all of these events influenced and shaped the commonwealth of nations that is the great heritage that Great Britain will leave to the ages. I like to think that the union of French and British Canadians contributed something worth while to the development of the commonwealth as we know it today, despite the competition between the commerce, ambitions and achievements of both the mother countries.

The pioneers came to mark and hack out a new world. Many of them wanted to free themselves and future generations from the old controversies, the old traditions and old prejudices that had failed to fulfil their hopes in the lands of their origin. All of us sometimes regret the restrictions which are allowed for only a limited and somewhat token achievement of the destiny which should be ours. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that despite this fact, Canada is still a land of hope and promise, and I am convinced it is also a land of hope and glory.

Many of the restrictions to which I have referred have been the product of compromise. During the past 97 years a new factor has enriched our national life. Thousands and thousands of new Canadians have chosen to dedicate their lives and their toil to the building of this nation. These people have come from many lands. These people have a varied background. They and their families today comprise more than a third of the population of Canada. These people are anxious to be recognized as Canadians, without any prefix or qualifications. National unity, for them, is a simple matter. They seek no special privilege. They seek only the guarantee of equality within this nation with the rest of the people of Canada. Those new Canadians who have settled in the old province of Quebec have been quick to respond to the atmosphere and environment of that province, as have Canadians who settled in other parts of the country where the response has been equally harmonious. These people recognize that more important than the origin of their neighbours is the spirit of their neighbours.

It is natural that an emerging and developing nation should have growing pains. This does not mean that our foundations should be discarded and forgotten. The founding influence of France and Britain cannot be washed from our history. It is a matter of fact. The battle of the plains of Abraham defined a new challenge for those who would inhabit the area comprising our country. The decision on Queenston heights held a measure of victory for all who claimed this territory as their home. As a consequence, French Canada was able to exert an influence in the developing commonwealth and in world affairs which might otherwise never have presented itself.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: The Act of Union of 1867 was an act of convenience not without some measure of tolerance and compromise—

Mr. Byrne: Subamendment.

Mr. Nasserden: —and it has changed, or, rather, Canada has changed in the intervening years. The importance and significance of a united nation north of the forty ninth parallel is more vital today than it was a century ago. The challenge of tolerance and compromise is still with us though the means have changed and the purpose has, to some extent, changed as well. We who are new Canadians are impatient with those, whatever their origin, who live in the shadows of suspicion sipping the poison of prejudice and division. We deplore the treachery of those who have lived to nurture the narrow ambitions of political parties. What I have to say in this regard is not poetry. It is the chronicle of a political party which has for more than 50 years sought to isolate Quebec and French Canada and to treat French Canadians as their private preserve.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Nasserden: Who has not heard the proud boast of the Liberal party, particularly during election campaigns or times of stress, that they alone were capable of representing Quebec and French Canada? I have heard it in my constituency and I say that this tactic has mutilated national unity. I would have hoped that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) would have learned something from the slogan of the Creditistes—"You have nothing to lose".

An hon. Member: By listening to you.

Mr. Nasserden: That slogan, and its temporary acceptance in the province of Quebec, indicates the extent to which the past 50 years of Liberal appeals has borne fruit, as far as the people of that province are concerned. I find it difficult to believe that ministers who have gone up and down this country during the last two years feeding the fires of isolation could be unconscious of the effect this would have on national unity in Canada. My sympathies are with the people of the province of Quebec. I see the cry of separation as a cry against the treachery of the Liberal party, rather than as a cry against other Canadians. The results of the actions taken by this government have been most divisive and most provocative, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Is this the kind of leadership we need in this country today.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Nasserden: Is this the action of a man who cares? Is this what we expect from a Nobel peace prize winner? Is this the policy—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Smallwood: On a point of order, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) has been sitting in his seat throughout this debate making interruptions and reading his paper. Last night, when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane) a veteran of two world wars, a man who carries the scars of one of them, was speaking, he did not have enough courtesy to keep quiet—

Mr. Byrne: I have sat here with some restraint, Mr. Speaker, since drawing to your attention the fact that the hon. member has been reading his diabolical diatribe word for word, and now another member has brought the matter to my attention I ask you once again to rule on the question of whether the hon. member is, or is not, reading a speech which has been prepared elsewhere. He is uttering words which he neither understands nor can he pronounce.

Mr. Smallwood: On that point of order, the minister not only read his speech but he released it to the press before he read it. We should like to hear the hon. member get up and read one instead of being afraid to do so.

Mr. Byrne: I should like to read citation 144 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. As far as I am concerned, there is no question but that the hon. member is reading his speech word for word. I can see he is doing so. I can see him turning the pages as he reads. Citation 144 states:

> It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech for the reason that, "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention."

It is my contention that one person has been writing most of the speeches we have heard from the other side during this debate. His views should be entitled to a hearing only once during the course of this discussion. As I say, the hon. member is reading his speech word for word. If it were a reasonable speech I might put up with that, but it is a diabolical diatribe against the Prime Minister, and I ask the hon. member to make an oral speech of his own or to leave the chamber.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): It is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that the words used by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) are unparliamentary. He should be asked to withdraw the word "diabolical".

Mr. Otto: On the point of order, I wish to deplore the attitude of some of the members on this side of the house as well as in the other corner, as shown by the constant interruption of speakers. Mr. Speaker, you are in the chair; you are paying attention.

If it is the right of anyone in this house to bring a speaker to order, it should be yours, without interruption from other members. I would respectfully ask all members to respect Mr. Speaker, who is listening, paying attention and, we trust, will bring the speaker to order if he thinks it necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Toronto takes objection to what I am doing. One only has to refer to Beauchesne again to see that it is the duty of an hon. member to rise and point out to the Chair when the rules of the house are being violated. This I am doing, and I intend to continue to do so as long as the hon. member continues to read such a diabolical speech.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, please. I think all hon. members of the house know that every member who rises in his place to speak has the right to speak without being interrupted other than by a legitimate point of order or for the purpose of asking a question. The hon. member who is now making a speech has the right to continue without being interrupted. I have also made remarks as to what the house expects of hon. members who are speaking, namely that they should not read their whole speech from a prepared text. I have advised the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) that the Chair would expect him to make a speech on his own, even though he did at times have to refer to his notes. I think the hon. member should be allowed to continue although the time allotted to him has expired. Because of the number of interruptions with which he has had to contend, I want to be fair to the hon. member and will allow him a few extra moments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to thank you for your ruling. I also want to congratulate the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). He has shown himself in this house to be one backbencher across the way who does not knuckle down to the whip on that side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: I might also say that I have always made my own speeches and my own notes. While I refer to notes at the present time, I make no excuse for doing so. This is a very important matter, and on the pages of Canadian history each one of us will be recorded—what we say and what we do not say. If the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) will consider that, he may think about what he should say on this occasion. The subamendment before us—

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Byrne: I believe I am completely in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege or a point of order?

Mr. Byrne: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member infers that it is improper of me to draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that he is reading his speech. This is quite in order, and I still contend that the hon. member is reading his speech. I cannot prove it is not his own speech, that he did not write it, but at least I do know and can see with my own eyes that he is reading it word for word.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, the subamendment before us is an appeal for common sense. It asks the Prime Minister to consult the Canadian people as to their wishes in this regard. I ask you, sir, what request could be more reasonable than that, on a matter of such great consequence not only to us but to the generations that will follow in Canada? I ask the Prime Minister, why has he insulted parliament with his "take it or leave it" attitude, reinforced by the threat of a general election?

But there are other questions to which the handling of this matter gives pre-eminence. I ask the Prime Minister, why has he taken unto himself the choice of a national emblem design? I will deal with that design at the proper time, Mr. Speaker, if this measure is proceeded with. In the meantime I would like to put on the record my own stand made in regard to this matter on a former occasion in the House of Commons when a private member's bill was before the house. I refer to the bill brought forward by the then hon. member for St. Boniface:

> I am inclined to believe that the flag of Canada should emphasize that dual personality and preserve it for future generations. This is a matter that is taking on more importance with the passage of the years. As the intermingling of the two great races, and those others included in our third dimension, are gradually and surely changing by a process of erosion and diffusion, the differences that in the beginning seemed so important are today still important because they are giving this nation a distinctive character and personality before the world.

I referred to some of the new Canadians in these words:

> Many of them fled the old lands of Europe and other continents to escape conditions and circumstances that these institutions have prevented from taking place here in Canada. To many of them the union jack will forever be a reminder of their homeland or birthplace, simply because it represented a haven here in Canada against the old established inequities which had held for them little or limited hope for the future in the land of their birth. To them a Canadian flag without some resemblance to the union jack just does not seem possible.

I went on further to say:

> Whatever the design finally approved by parliament and the Canadian people, it should be a reminder to us of our beginnings as a nation. It should reflect the part that Great Britain played in the development of our institutions. It should also reflect the personality of Canada as it has developed under the enriching influence of French culture. But more than that, it must also reflect the personality of a nation having that third dimension, that of those who chose Canadian citizenship after the destiny of Canada was decided in the articles of confederation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think this might be a good time for me to advise the hon. gentleman that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, there were a great number of interruptions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I would say to the hon. member for Rosthern that there were quite a number of interruptions, some by hon. members of the house and by the Chair, too, on occasion. I have given the hon. gentleman a fair amount of extra time. However, if the house would agree to giving him another moment or two—

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Then I have to advise the hon. member that I think his time has expired, even with the allowance I have made for him.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure there are no notes on my desk from which it could be presumed that I shall be reading my speech. I am rising to take part in this debate because I feel, as many members here have expressed, this is a very, very important issue. I do not agree with those members or those people who have said this is not an important issue; nor do I agree with those members who have accused some hon. members on the opposition side of the house of having some motive for their speeches other than that of deep concern for their constituencies and their nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Otto: I, for one, choose to believe, rightly or wrongly, that everyone who has taken part in this debate has done so with sincerity, integrity and believing that he represents his constituents and speaks for them. It is probably a matter of some surprise that constituents could be divided on this issue, just as this house is, but I sincerely believe this is so.

Some have said that the proposed flag was an appeasement of Quebec. We have heard a denial from the minister that the three maple leaves design was an appeasement of the province of Quebec. Possibly some hon. gentlemen do not believe the minister, but I say now that it was not an appeasement of Quebec. I am not a minister nor likely to be one. Neither have I ever said anything in this house which I did not sincerely believe to be true; and in this case I know it to be true.

Some hon. members, including the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and others, have said that this flag will divide the country. No flag, sir, will divide a nation that is not already divided; nor will it unite a nation which prefers to live in separate solitudes.

The flag issue is not the real issue here. The subamendment is not the issue either. We are not debating here these four choices. We are not debating whether there should be a plebiscite. We are not really debating the flag. What we are really debating is our national unity, which is a matter of great importance. I think we should recognize that this is what we are really debating.

Accusing fingers have pointed to our side of the house, and it has been said that this is a matter of great excitement; that we are going to excite the people and that this is the wrong time. It is said that this is the time for reason, for calmness, for coolness, sometimes even procrastination. I for one believe in excitement if the issues involved and the theme of it is great. I believe in excitement if it helps to bring to the surface grievances which have existed for some time, and if it helps to solve them. So there is nothing wrong with excitement. As to calmness, reason—that cool, calculated sense which is desired of us—this is not going to be possible in this issue. For as I have said we are discussing our national unity. We are discussing our destiny. The real issue is our love for our country. It does not take reason to love: It takes heart and guts to love.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) made a very impassioned speech, and there is no doubt in the world that every word he uttered was a matter of great concern to him. On occasion we have to say what we have to say no matter what the cost. On occasion we have to shed a tear or a drop of blood. But we have to love our nation and the unity of our nation.

At other times we will fear for our nation and be afraid for it, and this brings me to the topic which, as I have said before, we are really discussing. We on this side have wondered how it is that so many people in Canada are staunchly entrenched behind the red ensign, a fact we did not expect, people who would otherwise have fondly and readily welcomed a new distinctive flag. It is because they are afraid, and have gathered under the ensign in fear and apprehension of one thing —the division of this nation. They fear the division and separatism about which they have heard.

Let me review for a moment some of those matters which might have given rise among Canadians in English speaking Canada to such apprehensions, which might have caused the red ensign to become the banner for English speaking reaction, as I believe it has. Let me review some of these matters, not in the light of what we see here, because we have the benefit of listening to speeches made by, for example, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) and others, which have pointed out that separatism and division is not the clamour of most of the people in Quebec. We know that the cries for separatism and for division are really the mumblings of political idiots and charlatans. But the people of Canada who rely on the newspapers and radio for their information do not know this. They think that this is something which is desired by all of the good people in the province of Quebec. That is not so; but as I say, they do not know it. Let us consider this for a moment. Do not let us consider the acts of violence, but some of the statements of the premier of Quebec regarding the role of French culture. I recall reading in a brief presented to the federal-provincial conference that he stated it is the role, in fact the duty—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is of course, extremely unpleasant for the Chair to have to rise, perhaps all too often, to interrupt hon. members in the course of their speeches, but I do feel it is my duty to remind the hon. member of the decision taken by the house the day before yesterday to the effect that, at this stage at least, remarks should be limited to the very specific aspect of the sub-amendment. I would therefore entreat the hon. member to relate his speech to the sub-amendment.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat what I said at the outset, that we are not really debating the four points of the sub-amendment. I am saying that what is really involved is the question of our national unity, and I am trying to prove to you why. Surely you cannot deny me the right to do this. I have been referring to some of the strange statements which have been made and which might have given rise to fear and apprehension, and this matter will not indeed be solved by the four questions contained in the sub-amendment. These fears and apprehensions have been caused by statements made by the premier of Quebec and his ministers.

Indeed, in this very house the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) said in a speech about education that there are two official races in Canada. What are we non-official Canadians to think about this? Is there some cause for concern in the rest of Canada among the six million who are supposedly non-official Canadians? I should like the house to consider the economic policies of Quebec, especially in connection with giving preference to business. I am not dealing with efficiency, but strictly provincialism. I want to review all of the things which in all fairness lead one to the conclusion that at the present time there is not a national political party in this house. I could refer, for example, to some of the strange statements made by the group on Your Honour's far left. All of this has led to apprehension and fear in Canadians. And fear for what? For national unity and for all we so vigorously seek.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we are united, that we do have a feeling of identity and unity. Otherwise we would not be objecting. No one would object. Therefore it is our duty at this time throughout the course of this whole debate, not just when discussing the four questions, to state emphatically and irrevocably that this unity shall be preserved. Then the support behind the red ensign will fall. There is no reason for it at all except fear, and it is up to this house to show this. It is not enough to hear from the treasury benches that in all probability there will be no separatism or division because it is not economical or feasible.

I think it was a perversion of the national feeling for the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) to recommend to this house that a committee be formed to study the effects of separatism. Division and separatism are not subjects for study, even academically. In this 97th year of our life we should be able to take for granted that this country is united and will always be united, and that there is no other choice or possibility of choice. In that way, sir, there would be no need for this subamendment or a plebiscite. There would be no need for support for the red ensign, as there obviously is at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I have said time and time again that I do not acknowledge or recognize any form of division in this land. I should like to say that unless this House of Commons proclaims that this nation is united and that the provinces shall be united for better or for worse, and will so remain. Such action would be followed by adverse reaction, until militant action will be followed by militant reaction. At that time we would have only one choice; to choose sides and wait.

Mr. Speaker, I support a new and distinctive flag, and will do so if it comes to a vote. I support the three maple leaves design because I am not afraid of division or separatism in this country. I am not afraid because I will not tolerate such division or separatism. I will not tolerate in my mind even a suggestion of division. I would not even consider a thousand reasons produced by a special committee why separatism is feasible. I will not listen to even one member of this House of Commons who declares the possibility or advisability of separatism. I am not afraid to support the new distinctive flag on the basis of that feeling.

In conclusion may I remind hon. members of what we have done during the course of this debate, by amendments and subamendments. When the resolution was first proposed the idea caught fire from coast to coast. Every Canadian, whether naturalized yesterday, or whose forefathers have lived here for 300 years, was concerned. During this debate we have, little by little and bit by bit, abused this great idea and converted it into a plaything for all the members of this house. We have degraded this great idea and converted it into a cudgel that one right hon. gentleman may use to hammer at the head of the other. We have turned this great debate into an internal palace dialogue which only we can understand. We have left the people of Canada completely on the outside and they have now lost patience with us. They do not understand the temper of this debate. We are going to lose their respect, as they have lost respect for this house.

I plead with all hon. gentlemen to say what they have to say in loud and clear tones. By all means, all members should express their opinions, but they should not pervert this debate by moving amendments, subamendments and more subamendments. I beg you to help in concluding this debate, so that we may give the Canadian flag back to the people, to whom it belongs.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the few suggestions I will make to the house this afternoon, concerning the amendment and the amendment to the amendment moved in regard to motion 44(A) asking for a referendum, are not intended to extend unduly this debate, but rather to put forward the views of my constituents on the matter, as well as the views of my own party on the amendment and on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr Speaker, this debate on a really Canadian distinctive flag will, at least, have served to bring to the fore Conservative members whom we had never heard before, because yesterday, for instance, we saw and heard for the first time in the house this session the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns).

Mr. Speaker, this debate gives us an idea of what eternity will be like. Except for one or two, the speeches made by the Conservatives and their leader did nothing but pit one race against the other and they give us quite a true picture of what eternity will be like in hell.

Mr. Speaker, to say that I am against consulting our electors on important matters would not be true because with regard to the flag, I took the initiative of sending a letter to all the family heads in my riding, asking them what they thought. The 3,500 replies I received, in addition to the numerous conversations I had with people personally or by telephone every week end in my riding, enabled me to know the general opinion of my electors on that matter. Mr. Speaker, I feel that if the Conservative members had acted thus, they would not have to evade their responsibilities by calling for a plebiscite.

Some hon. members would like the motion to be referred to a parliamentary committee. In my opinion, that suggestion is unacceptable and is no solution, because the next time the matter would be raised in the house, we would have to start all over again.

This debate has to be brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible and the problem must be solved without delay. Let us put an end to this discussion and carry on with the nation's business. We have been elected to represent our respective ridings and our countrymen. Let us discharge the responsibilities with which we have been entrusted.

For some weeks now, the administration of the country has been bogged down by the slow progress of parliament's business which is due to the systematic filibustering of the Conservatives. The house is losing considerable time listening to the empty speeches of the Conservatives who call for a plebiscite to determine whether the Canadian people are in favour of the red ensign, of a modified version of the red ensign which would include the main symbols of the two founding races, a three-leaved flag or a flag with only one maple leaf.

Why does the amendment to the amendment stop there?

Mr. Speaker, day after day and week after week, we have been getting and are still getting numerous suggestions about the flag design. Most models are quite interesting and would be truly acceptable. Why should they not be included in the referendum? Why limit the choice to four designs?

Some Conservative members told me that they would be ready to accept a flag showing the union jack, the maple leaf and the fleur-de-lis. Someone told me, one day, that a flag should not be a collection of "imperial botanical specimens" including the maple, the thistle, the rose and the lily.

Mr. Speaker, a referendum on that matter would be useless and unfair to the Canadian people; it would only divide the country even more. While the Conservatives persist in stretching the debate on the flag—

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question—

Mr. Laprise: —Canadians suffer unfairly—

Mr. Vincent: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Laprise: Yes.

Mr. Vincent: The hon. member for Chapleau said that Conservative members are bent on having this debate go on for ever. Could he tell us how many members of the Ralliement Créditiste have spoken in this debate so far. What percentage of the total number? Could he tell us also whether that percentage is larger or smaller than the percentage of Conservative members who spoke on this matter?

Second question. How much time did the house spend some time ago to settle the internal problem of the Social Credit which was by far less important than the national flag issue?

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, to answer the first question asked by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, I may say that if he had intelligently followed the discussion, he would know that I am the first member of the Ralliement Créditiste to take the floor on the matter of a referendum, on the amendment and on the subamendment.

One thing that I find strange and quite ridiculous, is that the leader of the Conservative party moved himself an amendment to the main motion 44(A) and not being satisfied—he probably made an error and recognized it—his party moved an amendment to that amendment. That is the most ridiculous and most stupid thing I have seen in this house.

As far as the second question asked by the hon. member is concerned, I shall reply this: not only in the interest of the house, but also in the interest of the whole country, it was much more important, for the future of the nation, to ascertain where the Ralliement Créditiste should sit in this House of Commons than to discuss the flag issue as it is being discussed now.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are going through an economic crisis comparable to that of the thirties, before the last world war. We are living through a similar crisis: the farmers and the workers, especially those in eastern Canada, are made to suffer unfairly from that situation. And the Conservatives persist in preventing measures which could remedy that situation from being presented to the house.

Unemployment is undeserved—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I listened with much interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Chapleau, but it seems to me that by referring to this debate, to the number of speakers who participated and to points of that nature, he strayed away from the subject matter under consideration, that is the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, and I would ask him to come back to the subject matter before the house.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In order to be—

An hon. Member: —to be what?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because the hon. member for Chapleau referred to certain things which I shall not mention, except his statement to the effect that yesterday the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa was taking part for the first time in a debate this session. In that connection, I should like to refer him to page 107 of the index of Hansard, French edition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will admit that he is certainly not rising on a question of privilege. If he feels that certain remarks of the hon. member for Chapleau are incorrect, he will have the opportunity to take part in the debate and to reply himself.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not in the house earlier. I am sure that if the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa had been in his seat a few minutes ago—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Could the hon. member resume his seat? I appreciate the point the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska is trying to make but if later the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa wants to make a correction to the remarks made by the hon. member who now has the floor, he will have an opportunity to do so. Even if he has already spoken, he will be able to take part in the debate a second time to make the correction he wants to make.

Mr. Laprise: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your remarks and your advice on that matter but you will admit just the same that I was led afield by the remarks made by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. Here is what I want to point out about his question of privilege. About the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa—and I checked the index of the debates of the House of Commons—I did not find his name anywhere.

Now, to revert to the subject of the sub-amendment, I would like to say in conclusion —not because I was intimidated by the remarks and the interjections which were made, but because I did not intend to speak at length—that Canadians—I received many letters and comments in answer to the personal inquiries I made in my riding—or most of them do not insist so much on a particular flag design, but rather on a distinctive flag, which will represent all sections of Canada.

What Canadians ask especially is not so much a red flag, a blue flag or a white flag including all kinds of flowers or symbols one can think of, but rather a small green flag with figures on it, which would enable them to buy the things they need to give their families a decent living.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that instead of continuing this debate indefinitely, we should adopt the distinctive Canadian flag, settle this matter once and for all and then revert to the business of the house in order to introduce pieces of legislation likely to solve the problems facing the Canadian nation today.

[Text]

Mr. Enns: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am told that the previous speaker said that my speech yesterday was my first intervention in debate on the floor of the house. I would merely refer the hon. member to the index of Hansard where he will see that there are some 14 or 15 entries under my name. In fact to be exact there are 22.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, it was most refreshing to hear the speech of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) today and it makes what I have to say a good deal easier. I should like to ask that member, however, to concentrate his thoughts on what is the real reason for the division in Canada today. What has brought about the trouble of the moment? There is no question in my mind that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is the prime mover behind it all. What I have to say today makes me a little annoyed, because in an offhand remark earlier today which the Prime Minister should never have made he used the word "filibuster".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Pugh: It is all right for you over there to say "shame" but I am the one who is saying "shame" and I intend to make my speech. I simply want to refer the Prime Minister to his original remarks in this debate when he emphasized the fact that he wished every member to make his contribution. To my mind it is totally unreasonable for him in an offhand way to try to deny us our rights as representatives of our constituents and to use scare tactics by referring to a filibuster. I wanted to make those comments before proceeding with my main remarks.

My purpose in speaking today is twofold. First, I believe quite sincerely that the Prime Minister has put the Liberal party in a rather poor position. My second point is that in my own humble way I would like to offer a few suggestions and if possible give him a little help, because if he does take my advice, ultimately he will be helping Canadians.

At this stage in the debate we are on the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) which without reading it into the record, says that in any plebiscite there will be contained questions on four flags, the red ensign, a modification of it, the government's proposed flag or a modified form of the government's proposed flag.

Mr. Churchill: That is the N.D.P. proposal, the last one.

Mr. Pugh: Yes, the N.D.P. proposal. The government has got itself into a rather impossible position brought about by a so-called mandate. Speaking for my own constituency, I know that no such mandate was sought. The first we heard of it was a rather long and extraordinary series of questions put to the Prime Minister with respect to a new flag. In an election these things are known to the people and eventually they trickled down to British Columbia, where the candidates were asked questions about the flag issue.

I do not know what the Liberal members now in the house said they would do, but I just wonder how the Liberal party can claim in any way shape or form that it actually got a mandate from the people on the flag issue. Prior to the election the Liberal party published advertisements in the newspapers in British Columbia outlining the policy it would follow if returned to office. I shall not make reference to all the things they said they would do, and later on said they would do in 60 days, but have not done. I am looking at this published manifesto of the Liberal party and no reference was made in British Columbia to a new flag. What I have in my hand is a full page advertisement from the Victoria Colonist of March 31, and nothing about the ensign was mentioned in it.

However as I have said the news trickled down into British Columbia, and at the election meetings which were attended by the four candidates—Liberal, New Democratic party, Conservative and Socred—we were asked, and I remember it so well, "If a new flag is proposed, would you do away with the red ensign?" The Liberal candidate replied, "You will throw away the red ensign over my dead body."

Mr. Byrne: That fellow isn't here.

Mr. Pugh: He isn't here now, but he was a good Liberal. You may make your speech in your own time. Often enough you read your little book and point out "We shouldn't really interrupt the person who has got the floor and is speaking." My Liberal opponent spoke a lot more sensibly than some members opposite, and said they would only do away with the red ensign over his dead body.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pugh: No; afterwards if you like. The government has got itself into a ridiculous position with respect to the red ensign, a position that is untenable.

The second point I wish to make is in reference to the feelings of people in my own constituency. I have received many letters, and a preponderance of them were in favour of the red ensign. In fairness I say I have received some in favour of the government proposal, others who would like a modification of the government proposal and others still who say, "Let us look for another flag altogether." The opinions expressed in the letters were backed up by those I received as I went through my riding.

With regard to polls, I would like to quote from the Penticton Herald which conducted a local poll as a direct result of the clamour that was going on over the flag issue. This is the issue of the Herald for June 10 last and the heading is, "For ensign 89 per cent."

> Almost 90 per cent of all those Herald readers who voted in the flag poll which ended last Saturday backed the red ensign, and this surely is significant. Many red ensign backers even went to the limit in their vehemence by defacing the ballot coupon provided for readers supporting Pearson's maple leaf flag. One reader scrawled across the maple leaf side—"No, no, a thousand times no, I'd rather die than say yes." But most ensigners simply cast their ballot without emotional embellishment.

There is a lot more in this report which is not very favourable to the Liberal party, dealing with the manner in which the flag issue was introduced, but I shall not read that.

We have also had independent Canadian polls, and when I heard the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) say the vast majority of people favour the new flag I thought he might have dropped dead in his tracks. If he knew anything about polls he would know that in eight out of nine provinces there is a preference for the red ensign.

I next wish to deal with the so-called free vote. These are points on which the government has got itself so far out on a limb that it must do something, and I will have suggestions to make later which I think will be helpful. When you consider a free vote it looks nice. The Prime Minister is a great man for making nice statements right off the bat. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) asked him a question on May 12 as reported at page 3164 of Hansard. He asked: What about a free vote; are you going to give us one? Those are not the hon. member's exact words but that is the substance of the question. And the Prime Minister replied—and these are his exact words:

> When the time comes to submit the decision of the government in this matter to the House of Commons I would hope every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates and that there would be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense.

That is fine. Everyone would say: the Prime Minister is a good boy. It will be a free vote and no party whips will be in evidence. The right hon. gentleman changed that pretty quickly. I think someone else started to talk to him. Anyway, a week later, on May 19, the Prime Minister said the government would stand or fall on the flag question. Well, I sure hope they fall flat on their faces, because, boy, do they deserve it! They have done a most divisive thing. The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) was talking over there, and I liked some of the things he said, but he slithered over one little thing. He did not bring out why we were having this divisive thing at the present time. He said Canada is great, we are all here; there is no division; we should all pull together. I agree with him 100 per cent. But he missed one point. The Prime Minister has brought this question before the House of Commons and in all petulancy he says: A free vote? Nothing doing, boys, you are going to sit here until this thing is voted upon. Furthermore, you are going to miss your holidays. Mr. Speaker, I enjoy holidays as much as anyone else though I do not regard time spent in my constituency as a holiday, but rather as a chance to get to know the views of the people in my riding. That is one of the sensible things the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said this afternoon. I think we would all like to get home, not as I said to have a holiday, but to keep in touch with our constituents.

The hon. member also said a rather silly thing. He said we should be getting on with the other business of this house. I am sorry. We have finished the business which was proposed by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the house over there. We have finished every last scrap with the exception of this flag question. I remind hon. members that we have finished the other business which was before us, and now we should sit until we have finished this, regardless of how long it takes and regardless of loose statements such as the one made by the Prime Minister today regarding a filibuster.

I mentioned the divisive effects of this issue. Many people have spoken on this subject. It is a matter of opinion, depending on what one stands for, how it is treated in this house. There are two sides to every question, but apparently, there are five sides here. I feel strongly enough on this subject to be willing to sit here all through the summer and through the fall if necessary. I couldn't care less, because I feel I am right and that I am speaking for my constituents and for a great many more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pugh: Let us not divide Canada. Last night I was feeling a little blue because I could not get on the list, there were so many extra speakers. I went upstairs and just before six o'clock I was having a talk with a friend. I asked the question: Who do you think is winning in this flag debate? And he gave me a very sensible answer. He said in answer to my question: Do you think anyone is winning? From that point on we began to discuss the effect of this flag debate on Canada. I rather liked his remarks. They were good. Let us not worry about winning in the House of Commons; let us start worrying about what is happening in our various constituencies throughout Canada.

Who would have thought when we got into this flag debate we would have seen such a variety of feeling? May I quote from an article entitled "Another Slant on Flag Issue" written by the Rev. A. V. Bentum, pastor emeritus of St. Andrew's presbyterian church, Penticton. He is not a man of my faith, but he is a man I respect, and I quote from this article because of its acute and reasoned assessment of certain qualities to which we as Canadians in many instances pay only lip-service. The article is a little long but I think it is necessary for me to read it at this time.

> Few would have suspected, when Mr. Pearson in his election speeches promised to do something in the matter of a distinctive flag for Canada, that it would have provoked such a variety of feelings when implemented. One cannot help feeling, nevertheless, that it is good to have these feelings brought out where we can look at them.

A large number of Canadians may feel that the matter is a "storm in a teacup". Some have said that they "couldn't care less". Such an attitude is as much to be deplored as the one which rabidly and unreasoningly takes sides. The flag is a symbol of the feeling which binds us together as a people.

No matter how much we may desire to expand nationalism into the wider internationalism, we shall not succeed unless we can learn to feel something positive for each other in the smaller groups. In a culture which exhibits a trend to the impersonal, one becomes apprehensive of this "couldn't care less", attitude. It is, unfortunately, all too prevalent.

Again, there are some who regard the attitude of these Canadian veterans who prefer the red ensign as reactionary, obscurantist and die-hard. The feelings of this group of citizens should not be sneered at, or passed lightly over.

Ties which have bound men together, especially in grim situations and circumstances, are not easily broken or cast aside. Those who have never lived outside the security of their own land cannot know the feelings which such a symbol as a flag can evoke.

We appear to be living in a day and generation when loyalty and veneration for anything, except oneself, is all too rare. Displays of positive sentiment may be considered weak or outmoded. Chivalry and courtesy belong to the dead past.

Violent and destructive feelings are more in evidence in many groups and areas of the world. There seems to be a rebellion against tradition and authority, which could be useful if constructively directed, but with it there seems to go a rejection of discipline.

That very word implies regard for others, since it comes from the same source from which we get the word 'disciple'.

There may be something intriguing about "sweeping the board clean", as it were, and starting out with an entirely new flag design. Is this attitude not too consistent with what we have been saying; the apparent desire to disown one's own history?

Some sections of our society find their ideals and leadership in their own peer groups. They do not want any part with ancestors or past history.

The end results of this are to be seen in the often-lacking idealism, and the failure to profit by past experience, which is really historical perspective.

We in Canada are not a nation without ancestors, past history or historical ties. It must surely be part of a nation's strength to foster and preserve these. It may be the lack of them which causes new nations and cultures to go to emotional excesses in trying to find causes and binding ties. Those nations which have shown strength in the past have usually been the ones which have had respect for ancestors, and venerated their own history.

One hopes that we in Canada, while adding new chapters, through new sons and daughters both natural and adopted, will not discard the heritage that is ours, in a willingness to appear modern, by being cynical about sentimental attachments to the past.

Whether the red ensign should be the flag for Canada or some other, need we obliterate all reference to the cultures which have played such a large part in the making of the nation?

A truly Canadian flag need not be less Canadian in character should it show in its composition some relationship to the flags which so many sons and daughters have loved, fought under and for which they have lived and died.

I am glad I have read that to the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I interrupt for one moment?

Mr. Pugh: Absolutely. I do not mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the hon. member began his remarks he indicated that they would be related to the subamendment and I am just wondering whether he is not departing now, to some extent, from that purpose.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you let me finish putting that on the record. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this government has got the country in an uproar, and I want to try and do something to help this situation. I related this to the fact that the mandate which was given out with regard to the red ensign—which is No. 1 on the plebiscite—was never a mandate in my riding; it was never a request by this government. In fact, it was directly and distinctly, on more than one occasion, denied by the Liberal candidate who ran against me in the last election. Incidentally, this flag question was raised during a previous election campaign; I believe in 1962. Like many other members in this house at that time, particularly those from British Columbia, I believe there was a denial that the red ensign would ever be taken away from Canada. Have I much time left, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might advise the hon. member that according to the record I have from the table he has until ten minutes after five o'clock.

Mr. Pugh: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to take the full time because I believe I have pretty well covered what I wanted to say. I will now deal with the choices which are offered by this plebiscite, and I want to talk particularly about the red ensign. The red ensign is not a new flag, as some people would have us believe. I do not wish to read too much material into the record, but we all know that up to 1904 —when we had a Liberal government also— the red ensign fluttered over these parliament buildings. It had been flown on parliament hill from the time of confederation until 1904. It is a flag which over a long period of time —ever since I can remember—I have felt was my own flag, and my friends felt the same way. We used to put it up on my house on May 24, I remember so distinctly. There was never any question that it was Canada's flag. However, in 1904 somebody, on orders from the Liberal party, ran up the union jack. Questions were asked in the house, and finally the ensign, which had been hauled down, was put up again. Canadians had come to regard the red ensign as their flag.

In this connection I often think of one or two men for whom I have a fair regard. I do not mind saying that. An old fraternity brother of mine, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, had no illusions about changing this flag or, I think, about the diversity it would cause in Canada. In fact, when talking to General Crerar when he came back after the war and they drove up to the parliament buildings, he said, "General Crerar, your soldiers have decided one thing; that is, Canada's flag". He was referring to the red ensign which was flying over the parliament buildings. There is another man who many of us feel was a responsible citizen. He was a prime minister of this country, and his name is Louis St. Laurent. That right hon. gentleman said, when approached on the subject of a new flag, that he would not introduce a new flag because it would be too divisive of Canada.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the feeling that was evident throughout Canada at that time is the feeling that should be evident today. This is a divisive subject. I agree with the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), although I may differ as to the end result. The hon. member said we should take a new flag and, quite frankly, I think that was the one fault in a rather good speech. I do not think we should take a new flag at the present time.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Pugh: An hon. member said, "When". There could come a time when this is necessary, and no one should ever close the door for ever and ever on any change whatsoever in respect of a nation. My own views on the flag are well known in my constituency. I stand for the red ensign and I have made no bones about this. I think the first letter I received in parliament was asking my views on the red ensign—this goes back to 1958—and I answered that letter just as I have answered every similar letter I have received, whether they have been for or against the red ensign. I always say I stand for the red ensign.

[Mr. Pugh.]

I said, Mr. Speaker, there were two matters that I wanted to bring out in my speech. The first was that this government has got this country into an unholy, divisive mess. Consequently I believe this is a time for a little wisdom to be shown and I wish to offer one or two suggestions. I believe that the flag issue is far too explosive to be decided now. In my opinion the whole question should be stayed pending a very thorough and more mature consideration of this question. This is a time for an appeal to common sense. A plebiscite should finally be held.

I am not in agreement that we should put everything on this plebiscite, in whatever way, shape or form; but I suggest that a parliamentary committee, or a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, be held, and that the previous findings of the earlier committee on this subject should be considered. Incidentally, they were rather fine findings. However, they should be considered by the committee, and it should take a little time on this matter. They should go into everything that has happened in this regard since then, and should pay a little attention, perhaps, to this b. and b. deal that is running around Canada—not that I think much will come out of that. In any event, the committee should consider the results that come out of this royal commission.

Having used the word "finally" in regard to a plebiscite, I would say the committee's findings and recommendations should be put in the form of a plebiscite, preferably containing as few flags as possible. This plebiscite should then be put to the people of Canada. This is my suggestion, Mr. Speaker. It has been made before, but it is one I have felt right from the beginning was a proper suggestion.

I do not think a flag should be forced on Canada. This issue is too highly political in nature and it is divisive in the extreme. In my opinion Canadians should never have been put in this position. Let us not have a "take it, or else" flag. Now is the time—and I am using the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) last evening—for a responsible course to be taken by a responsible statesman. We have in this house different points of view, different forms of approach; and believe me, Mr. Speaker, this is not a time for railroading something through. This is a time for extreme caution, not because of the flag alone but also because of the dangerously explosive situation which exists in Canada. The flag is only one manifestation of this explosive situation. We hope that when a flag is decided upon it will be with us forever, and this is no time for undue haste.

Mr. C. E. Millar (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I make no apologies to anyone. In fact, it would appear that the time is fast approaching when those members who do not participate are the ones who are going to have to make apologies, not only in this House of Commons but in their home ridings as well.

In the riding I represent, Middlesex East, I have well over 100,000 sincere Canadian citizens. I am well aware that not all of them favour either side in this issue. I have had many letters from constituents, the large majority of them in favour of the red ensign. Many are in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag; but I have yet to receive one in favour of the Pearson pennant. How can the government of Canada deny to the people of this country the right to express their opinion, as requested by the amendment and the subamendment which have been proposed in this house? Frankly, I favour the retention of the red ensign. This is not unreasonable because I have a typical Canadian background and ancestry.

An hon. Member: What is that?

Mr. Millar: When I say that, I am referring to Scots-Irish. I make no apology. Nor do I belittle any other ancestry in this country.

An hon. Member: What about the Indians?

Mr. Millar: What about them? Are hon. members opposite going to give them a chance to express their views on the flag issue? I think it is true that in every constituency in Canada there is a division of thought. I do not think there is any member in this House of Commons who could stand up and say that all his constituents were in favour, one way or the other. How, then, can the government take a stand and say to the people: "This is what you will have as a flag. This is what you will accept; take it and like it"? This does not make sense. How can this minority government—and I repeat "minority government"—force their choice of a flag on the people of Canada? Is this their interpretation of democracy?

It is quite true that the government of the day would have us believe that they carry a mandate to introduce a new flag in this country. Nothing could be further from the truth. The present Prime Minister came to the city of London during the last election campaign and spoke to a group of over 5,000 people—a Liberal estimate, Mr. Speaker. During his speech to all these sincere Canadians the fact that this government contemplated the destruction of the red ensign was never mentioned. It is very difficult, as many speakers have said, to find any reference to destroying the red ensign and replacing it with another flag. However on turning to the Globe and Mail, in a report which carries a quotation from Winnipeg some time in April, 1963 this appears:

> Liberal leader Lester Pearson yesterday rejected the red ensign as Canada's official flag. He told a group of editors of ethnic newspapers that a distinctive Canadian flag should be one that could not be mistaken for the emblem of any other country.

Why did the Prime Minister not tell that to the 5,000 people he spoke to in London, Ontario, if it was part of his platform? It is one thing to promise a distinctive Canadian flag, but it is quite another to come to this parliament and say: "We have decided the flag that the Canadian people will have. This is what we have chosen for you: accept it and like it. Should this house not accept that flag we will be faced with an election".

Mr. Sharp: Parliament will decide, not this party.

Mr. Millar: Yes, with a free vote and a Liberal majority.

Mr. Sharp: No, there is no Liberal majority.

Mr. Millar: Look at your friends to the left. There is no question where they stand.

Mr. Sharp: They are supporting us.

Mr. Millar: I cannot help but think how interesting it will be when the next election comes along and the Liberals, the N.D.P. and the Ralliement Créditistes are all taking the platform and claiming credit for introducing the new flag. I never saw such a group of M.P.s so determined to commit political suicide as we have in the left hand corner of this house. I am wondering whether they are labouring under the illusion that the Liberal party will withdraw the Liberal candidates in their ridings.

If I may return to the Globe and Mail—and I think I am getting back to the subamendment—

Mr. Moreau: About time.

Mr. Millar: I do like to hear these interjections from the other side because it indicates that one is getting close to the truth. And it really hurts sometimes. If I may refer again to the Globe and Mail, Mr. Speaker, it does appear that there is still one Tory who writes for that newspaper who has not yet received the hatchet treatment. I refer of course to the columnist Mr. Bruce West, who remains loyal to the red ensign and is not afraid to say so, for which I give him credit. Bruce West in his column for Thursday, August 13, sums up the whole flag issue in one sentence when he says:

> I am sure that many of us who now oppose the scrapping of our present proud flag would be willing to shut up and bow to the will of the majority if a referendum indicated that a new flag were desired by this country.

Further to that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to state my own position, which is simply this. If the people of Canada indicated by a referendum, by a free vote, that they were in favour of any one particular design, I would be prepared to accept that design without even seeing it. This, I believe, is democracy. The majority should rule.

Mr. Moreau: The blind leading the blind.

Mr. Millar: That is what you would have us believe.

Mr. Boulanger: You are hardly supporting the red ensign.

Mr. Millar: Why doesn't the hon. member stand up and say that?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, I will do that. I say to my hon. friend that he does not stand up so much for the red ensign when he speaks like that, saying that he will accept any flag.

Mr. Millar: What I said was that I myself prefer the red ensign; but if the majority of the people of Canada indicate that they want something else, then I will accept that.

Mr. Moreau: A majority of the house.

Mr. Byrne: Let us have a look at it.

Mr. Millar: It will be the will of the majority. We have to sit and look at you, and you represent the majority.

Mr. Speaker, this is the whole question. What proof is there that the people of Canada want a new flag? What indication has there been of this fact? If the Prime Minister is as brave as he would have us believe, why does he not go to the people of Canada and give them an opportunity to express their opinion? I would love to see some of the hon. members opposite, particularly those from English speaking ridings, squirm when this flag issue is brought up at the next election.

An hon. Member: I did not squirm.

Mr. Millar: You may squirm the next time.

Mr. Starr: What other word could you use to describe it?

Mr. Millar: If the Prime Minister is convinced that the people of Canada are so anxious for a new flag, he should have no fear of providing them with an opportunity to so indicate by a vote; or is it a fact that the Prime Minister, in his manoeuvring, would like to solidify certain necessary elements of support before he takes that gamble?

It is time, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada were informed that this flag issue is not holding up the business of this country, or the business of parliament. The Prime Minister himself stood in this House of Commons this afternoon and said that he hoped the flag debate can be terminated so we can consider a well earned recess, and then return to this house and take up the pension legislation and other important business. Why does the press, as well as many other individuals, attempt to lead the people of Canada to believe that we are obstructing the business of this house and this country when it is a fact, as corroborated this afternoon by the Prime Minister, that the business of this session is now completed?

It is openly admitted inside and outside of this house that many people object to placing the union jack on any part of a distinctively Canadian flag. My question, Mr. Speaker, is this: Why were those same people so strangely silent at the time they were happy to accept the protection of the union jack in two world wars? There is no answer to that question.

The union jack and the red ensign represent the basic freedoms everyone in this country enjoys. Those flags denote the reason why many people from all over the world have chosen to come to this country and take the oath of citizenship under the red ensign. Should we be ashamed to display the red ensign as part of any flag of Canada? The answer to that question is no. Should we be ashamed to have the red ensign as part of any Canadian flag? The same answer applies to that question. Should we destroy parliament itself simply because it is patterned after the mother of parliaments at Westminster? If that reasoning is good on one side it must be good on the other side. This must also apply to our whole system of justice.

The whole purport of the amendment, as moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the subamendment, as moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More), is to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express their feelings and wishes. I think that is a democratic practice and we on this side of the house are in support of it.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Millar: Certainly.

Mr. Matheson: Can the hon. member indicate to this house any democratic country that has adopted a flag through the procedure which has been suggested by the hon. member?

Mr. Millar: I cannot name any country that has done this, but how many countries have had a flag shoved down their throats by one Liberal party? I shall go further, how many countries have had a flag forced upon them by the Prime Minister and a man such as he who is on his feet?

Mr. Matheson: Does the hon. member remember the fashion in which the interim flag that has prevailed since 1945 was selected? It was done by order in council.

Mr. Millar: I support this flag because it is a flag that I love.

Mr. Sharp: Are you going to impose your flag?

Mr. Millar: This flag has already been imposed, and it was a Liberal government that imposed it on the country. I am prepared to accept it. I refer of course to the red ensign.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member for Middlesex East permit a question?

Mr. Millar: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: My question is prompted by t.v. commercials. Does the hon. member realize that the remarks being made by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) can be likened to television, where there are more commercials than programs?

Mr. Millar: I should like to thank the hon. member for his question, but remind him that this condition is normal.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. members are enjoying themselves.

Mr. Millar: This government is the only government in the history of politics that has 29 different speakers, and every time someone on this side of the house makes a remark they object to, 27 of those speakers shout "order, order". They have not the nerve to stand up on their feet and say what they have to say, but hide behind their hands.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Millar: We love that sort of performance, and we are used to it.

Mr. Sharp: I had 50 members interrupting me yesterday.

Mr. Millar: You are an outstanding speaker. Mr. Speaker, I should like to state I enjoyed the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I do not like his attitude when he attempts to convince us that the government has made a decision for us and that we should say nothing more. I do not like his suggestion that the government has made a recommendation, and the Liberal party can make no mistakes, and that we accept their recommendation and keep quiet. I refuse to follow that suggestion.

I intend to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker—

Miss Jewett: Oh, no.

Mr. Millar: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett). I suggest she would do well to spend some time in her own riding in an attempt to discover the feeling of the Canadian people there whom she is supposed to represent.

Miss Jewett: I just came back from there.

Mr. Millar: I hope you have, and I hope to see you here after the next election.

Miss Jewett: I have news for you.

Mr. Millar: Mr. Speaker, in the entrance hall in front of this chamber there is a bronze statue in honour of one Lieutenant Colonel George Harold Baker, a member of parliament, who gave his life in defence of this country. As a part of this memorial there is a stone tablet upon which is carved a verse from probably the best known of all Canadian poems, which reads as follows:

> To you from failing hands we throw
> The torch; be yours to hold it high.
> If ye break faith with us who die
> We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

Mr. Moreau: That was not the red ensign.

Mr. Millar: Just listen Moe, and you will get it.

Mr. Speaker, to many Canadians, including myself, that torch is symbolized in the Canadian red ensign. I say that this government is breaking faith with every man or woman who has ever served in armed forces of Canada.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if this resolution is forced through the House of Commons, then the government should commission the stonemasons working on the building to destroy that tablet, because under this legislation it becomes a mockery.

Thank you.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that not much new can be contributed to this debate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCutcheon: —by a humble backbencher like myself. However, like the previous speaker I make no apology whatsoever for getting to my feet and taking the time of the house. It is my right and my duty as an elected representative, and I am merely acquiescing in the invitation extended to me by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of this country. I should like to pause for a second and ask: Who is there in this house to deny me the right to voice my opinion?

Some hon. Members: No one.

Miss Jewett: Who is?

Mr. McCutcheon: The Prime Minister invited us to speak. Yet this afternoon he referred to our participation as a filibuster. Be that as it may, I say in all humility that I hold the forlorn hope that in my humble way I might suggest something that could bring, so far as the greatest number of people in Canada are concerned, a happy solution to this impasse. I should like to say that whatever flag is chosen for this great dominion of ours I will honour and revere it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCutcheon: Furthermore, to put hon. members' minds at ease may I say I intend to heed the counsel of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) who suggested this afternoon that perhaps we should be brief.

I have examined in some detail most of the speeches that have been made in this so-called flag debate. Last Wednesday the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) led off and the purport of his remarks was to the effect that we should deport ourselves like gentlemen and members of parliament. Other hon. members have suggested that we should have a free vote. In my humble opinion the fact is that at the present time this is an impossibility because the political machine has whipped the boys into line and I do not honestly think that a free vote could be held.

A further suggestion that appears in reading some of the speeches is that the government might appoint a joint committee of both houses to study the situation. It has also been evident in practically every speech that has been made that there is a heartfelt desire on the part of every member that we should do our utmost to build unity in this country. Another good suggestion was made by the hon. member for Greenwood this afternoon, and I believe he quoted Winston Churchill as his authority. He suggested that members should be allowed to go home and discuss the situation with the people.

Every speech that has been made has contained certain common denominators, first a plea to achieve unity, and second a plea to remove the flag from party politics. Another common thought that has been expressed is that we should let the people themselves decide, as they should in a democracy. This thought is contained in every speech I have read, with the notable exception of one. I was disappointed, indeed I was dismayed, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) was the only one who did not have in his remarks—at least, it was not apparent to me—any idea that the people themselves should decide. His was an unswerving, dictatorial attitude with no give and take. His was the only speech I could discover in which the speaker actually referred to appeasement of Quebec.

I discovered something else in going through these speeches and it is something I do not particularly like, something that pains me a little. I refer to the fact that in so many places references have been made to the Prime Minister and he has been described as being autocratic, petulant, domineering and arrogant because, they say, of his insistence on a vote on the flag before a recess. I do not share these sentiments. I do not believe a man could become prime minister of this country and leader of a large political party unless he was a man of some stature. However I do believe that the Prime Minister is listening to bad advice from some cocky, opinionated advisers and if he persists in continuing to listen to them I feel he must be held responsible. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, this government has no reason to be arrogant or cocky. They have no mandate to force their will on the public. They should listen to the voice of the people. The government is in just about the same position as I am personally.

An hon. Member: Bankrupt?

Mr. McCutcheon: No, Mr. Speaker, not bankrupt financially, although I must admit I am not blessed with too much of this world's goods. However, the government is in the same position as I am so far as a mandate is concerned. When I get feeling too big for my britches and start to feel quite important as a member of this house, I turn my mind back to the election in April and rediscover the fact that I was elected by the large majority of 24 votes over my closest opponent. Now, this is not the point. In the election there were 931 more votes cast against me than for me, and those people who did not vote for me are entitled to their opinion and I believe I should endeavour at least to consider their viewpoints. This, Mr. Speaker, I propose to do so long as I am able.

I intend to try and be a representative of the people of my constituency and to be considerate of all of them. I would recommend this course to the present government because it is in exactly the same position as I, so far as a mandate is concerned, only it is worse percentagewise. I must realize that out of almost 8 million people casting votes, only 3½ million cast votes for the Liberal party. For these reasons I say consideration and moderation should be the approach of the Liberal party to the flag issue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, heeding the advice of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) I intend to conclude, and I have just this one last thought to leave with you. I say to the Prime Minister that this is a time for greatness. This is a time for him to stand for democracy. This is his opportunity to rebuff those phony advisers who are leading him down the garden path to oblivion. I say, Mr. Prime Minister, make your own decisions; appoint a committee or have a referendum; do something which will give the people of Canada a democratic chance to pick out their own symbols divorced from party politics.

Mr. Sharp: I have listened to the hon. gentleman's speech very carefully and I would like to ask a question of clarification. Was he advocating a plebiscite or a committee of this house, of members of parliament, to make a decision on the flag? I was not sure which.

Mr. McCutcheon: If the minister will read my speech tomorrow he will see that the door was left open for either one.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, on entering this debate for the second time I first wish to comment on the contributions made by hon. members to date. It is my considered opinion that the calibre of the speeches delivered has been of the highest quality during this debate, in fact the highest since I took my seat in 1957. There is good reason for this high calibre. It is because hon. members who have been speaking have been speaking from their hearts, have been speaking with a feeling that is only evident when speaking about symbols that represent your country, your history and your tradition.

We have heard many complaints from newspapers in this country, through their editorial writers, that too often speeches in the House of Commons are as dull as ditchwater and thus unfortunately, too many newspapers have reached a decision to print little or nothing of what is being said in the house on this important matter. I ask, when has the point been reached that the newspapers of this country make an assessment beforehand of what their readers should see and what they should consider?

If the newspapers of this country were realistic, if they were to go out into any group in any area of this country and sit down and talk with the people, they would find that no issue is more important or more discussed at present than this specific flag issue. I have discussed this issue with many people in many areas, and as a result of my discussions I wish to pose certain questions to the Prime Minister in the hope that he might, when he has the opportunity, take his seat in the house and give answers to these questions.

Mr. Choquette: Order paper.

Mr. Coates: My friend, if you consider this is the type of thing that should go on the order paper then I say, sir, you should not be allowed to sit in the House of Commons.

Mr. Choquette: I will resign then.

Mr. Coates: I believe the time has arrived when the Prime Minister must reconsider the position in which he has put the House of Commons on this important matter, for I am sure all members will agree that this debate has far reaching implications for the future of our nation. Many have contended that an election campaign based on this volatile issue would not be in the best interests of the nation. Accepting this as a correct premise, I ask the Prime Minister to consider what is happening in parliament now, and if this is really a substitute for an election campaign that is of benefit to our future?

I ask him this, sir, because no matter what is said in the house, he is the Prime Minister of the country; he is the man who determines what we debate and when we debate it. He can talk about meetings of party leaders all he desires but he is still the man who runs this country, or is supposed to be running it at this time.

I ask the Prime Minister if he does not believe that the flag design which he proposes as an alternative to the Canadian red ensign is not the type of design that will offend a large number of Canadians in every province of this nation? The Prime Minister in proposing this design suggested that we should have a resolution authorizing the flying of the union jack as an alternate design. It was his hope that those who would be offended would derive some consolation from the second flag.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. gentleman where he gets the idea that this is an alternative flag?

Mr. Coates: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Sharp: Where is your authority for saying this is an alternative flag?

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) will wait I think I will indicate it to him. It has to be an alternative flag. There cannot be two flags flying from every flag pole in this nation. Let us be realistic. One flag.

Mr. Sharp: One Canadian flag.

Mr. Coates: Right. I say to the hon. gentleman: Is this really an honest approach to the flag question? Can there be any assurance that any second flag which may be adopted will become a part of our Canadian nation for any length of time? The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) in his speech outlined what transpired in relation to a second flag in South Africa. Would this not also be the history of a second flag in Canada?

Now, I ask this question: Who is deriving the greatest pleasure from the action taken by the government on the flag issue? I suggest to the Prime Minister that he is providing a degree of pleasure for the separatists in the province of Quebec which they are not worthy of deriving. He has also produced a degree of extremism among many loyal Canadians throughout the nation which makes future Canadian unity a questionable subject. Does the Prime Minister want a flag which will aggravate the feelings of large sections of the population? Do French Canadians generally consider a flag design satisfactory when it will displease large sections of the population? I do not for one moment consider they wish any such result. Indeed, except for the vociferous separatist element in the province of Quebec I find little to indicate how the sensible and realistic Canadian in that province feels about this flag issue. I ask the Prime Minister to tell me how the good citizens in the province of Quebec who desire a united and progressive nation feel about Canada's flag. Surely, there must be some method of determining how the people of that province feel with regard to its design, or with regard to a design which would have an association with our history and traditions.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. member permit a question? Has he inquired of his own members from the province of Quebec to get an answer to those questions?

Mr. Coates: I certainly have and I find there is a degree of responsibility indicated in their replies to me which has certainly not been evident among the members on his side representing the same province, as indicated by the interjections they make every time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can take advantage of the interruption by the minister to inform the hon. member that he is obliged to direct his remarks to the subamendment. The hon. member is in a particular situation inasmuch as he has already participated in the debate; he spoke on June 17 last in connection with the amendment. Today, of course, he is speaking on the subamendment. It is a basic rule of this house that a member can only speak once on a question. It is in order, of course, to speak a second time on the subamendment, but surely any speech at this stage should be relevant to the new question and not to the old question on which he has already spoken.

Mr. Coates: Thank you. I think Your Honour will have no difficulty in finding that I will be speaking on the subamendment before the house.

I support the contention that the government has mishandled the flag issue so badly that it is not possible now to make a realistic appraisal of the subject within the confines of the House of Commons. Once it became a government measure, the flag design proposed by the Prime Minister became a government flag. It became a flag closely associated with the Liberal party. Such a flag has little hope of acceptance among those who do not adhere to Liberal philosophy in this nation. Indeed there are many who have adhered to the Liberal philosophy who cannot associate that philosophy with the design presently proposed. For this reason it would appear to be best for the nation if a plebiscite were held, since, apparently, this is the only means of taking the flag issue out of partisan politics.

At the same time it seems to me that in reaching a conclusion as to what the new flag design should contain the government has attacked this problem in reverse order. Would it not have been more sensible to have assumed that a large proportion of the Canadian public favours the Canadian red ensign? Before producing a new flag design, they should have assumed that this support was present and, in order to develop a new design which would inspire an even greater acceptance, they should have tried to evolve a design based on the Canadian red ensign—a flag which would have embodied in it an association with our history and tradition, as well as symbols which are not now contained therein but which could be developed in a new flag without making a complete break with the past.

I would have thought the government's study of the great flag debate in South Africa if it did nothing else, would have provided it with sufficient experience and knowledge to appreciate that the people of a nation, especially a nation which is bicultural in character, would not allow the rights of either a large minority or a small majority to be trampled upon. When this occurs, as is demonstrated in Canada today, only the extremists derive pleasure from the results of the decision.

As members of this house are aware, I have been a strong advocate for the retention of the Canadian red ensign. So long as this government considers that the only alternative available to the Canadian red ensign is their own proposed flag design I shall fight their action by every means at my disposal. If these two designs are the only alternatives which must be decided upon, then I feel I am doing my duty as a Canadian in avoiding a proposal which would destroy and eliminate any association between the flag of our nation and our history and tradition. At the same time, if the government were to indicate that they were endeavouring to introduce a flag design which would be more acceptable to the great majority of Canadians in all parts of this nation, a design which would also have an association with our history and tradition, then I would be the first to try to assist that government in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion.

Among all the letters I have received from every part of this nation I have found few whose authors, though they confirmed their belief that the Canadian red ensign should remain as our flag, were not also willing to concede that they would agree to alterations in that flag which would give greater recognition to the bicultural character of our nation as long as the union jack remained as a continuing symbol of the contribution we have received from our connection with the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Pepin: It is called the commonwealth of nations, now.

Mr. Coates: It is kind of you to correct me.

Mr. Pepin: You should know.

Mr. Coates: As far as I am concerned it is still the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Pepin: We know that perfectly well. It is obvious.

Mr. Coates: Surely this house cannot continue indefinitely—

An hon. Member: Certainly not.

Mr. Coates: —with a debate of this type. Surely, at some time, the government must realize that we have to reach a conclusion which will end the debate. To date, the government has been adamant that this house must accept the flag they have produced or else debate forever.

An hon. Member: May I ask a question?

Mr. Coates: I am not going to answer a question right now. Surely it is not the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition or of any of the opposition party leaders, but it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister of this nation—

Mr. Sharp: Which he is discharging.

Mr. Coates: No, he is not discharging it. I cannot agree with that at all. He is not discharging his responsibility to this nation as long as he persists in trying to force this parliament to adopt a design which he realizes a large proportion of the members of the house find totally unacceptable.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, Your Honour pointed out some time ago to the hon. member that the question to which he should be addressing himself was that of a referendum. I have listened to the hon. member with considerable attention, and I fail to see how the remarks he has made to this time are relevant to the matter now before the house.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. I think it would be a good thing to invite the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau) to occupy the chair for a while.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member who has the floor indicated a moment ago that this is the question to which he intended to address himself. I know he recognizes that, in view of the fact he has already spoken in the debate on the amendment, he is perhaps in a position where he should as much as possible limit his remarks to the specific question before the house. I feel that to some extent he has done that until now, but I would invite him to keep this in mind.

Mr. Coates: Surely, Mr. Speaker, when I am discussing two of the particular designs that are involved in the subamendment, I must be talking to the question before the house. If I am not, then I do not know when I would be. The point I was trying to make was that we cannot continue forever in this fashion, so long as the government persists with its plan to make parliament accept the design it is proposing at the present time. There are too many members in this house who say this design is totally unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: Surely, Mr. Speaker, in view of this fact, if the Prime Minister is determined to produce a flag he must move in the direction of trying to produce one that is acceptable to a majority, and a large majority. I might refer to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), that a flag is not something that should be decided upon by a bare majority of the members of the House of Commons. Surely we should have the type of support in the House of Commons, for whatever new flag is accepted, which will mean that at least two thirds of the members of this house find the design acceptable to them, which would be an indication that at least two thirds of the people of this nation found the design acceptable. At the moment there are 50 per cent of the people of this country either in favour of the design the Prime Minister has produced, or some other design, and 50 per cent of the people—or close to that percentage—are in favour of the present flag. There is no hope of ever reaching a conclusion of a debate based on two propositions when there is not any strong support for either one.

I might refer for a moment to the speech of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). If he did anything, he made one point abundantly clear. He said he did not imagine there would be the support in the country for the Canadian red ensign that is evident today. I think when this debate started there was not this degree of support for the Canadian red ensign, or else people had not made up their minds about the flag; they had not thought about it. However, Mr. Speaker, the problem is that suddenly they became aware of the fact that there was going to be a change, and they looked at the Canadian red ensign and saw it as a flag that represented freedom and liberty. When they saw what was going on, they rushed to this flag because it had provided in the past this freedom and liberty. What better reason is there, what better example of why we should have a flag that is representative of our past history and tradition, if it is not for the fact that at times of doubt people look to it and see in it those things that are representative of the history, tradition and liberty that we so dearly love.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister to give leadership to the country in this matter; to admit that what he has produced in this resolution with regard to a flag is not something which at this time the nation is willing to accept; that it is one which does not carry the large majority that is needed in the House of Commons for the adoption of a national flag. This majority is not available to him. The Prime Minister should either withdraw his resolution and introduce another which is more acceptable, or honestly say to the Canadian people, "This is not the time, I have found, to go forward with a new flag design. The Canadian nation is not ready for a new flag. I hate to admit this, but I have honestly found this out, and in all sincerity I now withdraw the flag resolution that I introduced into the House of Commons".

Mr. Speaker, many Canadians would have more respect for our Prime Minister if he were willing to adopt this attitude, rather than the attitude of endeavouring to produce a flag and foist it on the Canadian people, aggravating thousands, if not millions of people who do not want this flag, will not accept it and will not respect it even if it is pushed through this House of Commons. That is the thing that bothers me more than anything else; I do not want to think that we in the House of Commons are going to adopt a flag that a great many people in this nation will have no respect for, once it is hoisted on the flagpoles of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask about the business of the house, particularly the estimates that will be called for Friday.

Business of the House

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the flag debate will continue tomorrow. On Friday—if we reach Friday—we will proceed with the examination of the estimates of the Department of Forestry, to be followed by the estimates of the Department of Industry, to be followed by the completion of the discussion on the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, August 20, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

COMMUNICATIONS

TABLING OF AGREEMENT RESPECTING GLOBAL SATELLITE SYSTEM

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies, in French and English, of the agreement establishing intergovernmental arrangements for a global, commercial satellite communications system. This agreement is being signed in Washington today.

POWER

ONTARIO—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR-ELECTRIC STATION

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members that the premier of Ontario and the chairman of Ontario hydro are today announcing in Toronto that Ontario hydro has decided to build a one million kilowatt nuclear-electric power station. This project is the second largest nuclear power station planned anywhere in the world.

This decision is a major landmark for Canada in two respects. Ontario hydro has selected the type of nuclear power station that has been pioneered and developed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Also, Ontario hydro will build this station as a commercial venture. The two earlier and smaller nuclear power stations in Canada near Chalk River and at Douglas point on lake Huron were, in large measure, prototypes for purposes of experiment and demonstration.

By reason of the contingent financial risk in building a very large nuclear power station at this relatively early stage in nuclear development, participation by governments was desirable. No full sized nuclear power station of this type is yet in operation, so there remains a slight measure of uncertainty today as to how well they will perform. This will change when the 200,000 kilowatt nuclear power station at Douglas point, which will soon be completed, has shown that it operates successfully.

Agreement has been reached among the federal government, the Ontario government and Ontario hydro regarding the financing of this project. The estimated cost of the nuclear power station is $266 million, and this money will be subscribed by the three parties as follows. Ontario hydro will be responsible for an amount equal to the cost of the coal burning power station of the same capacity they are building at Lambton, estimated to be $120 million. The balance will be subscribed by the two governments in the ratio of 1.2 to 1, with the federal government advancing the larger portion. In terms of the present estimates of cost the federal government will subscribe $79.5 million and the Ontario government $66.5 million. It is anticipated that the capital advanced by the parties will be fully repaid with interest at normal rates out of the net operating revenues of the station. There is a good possibility of profit in government investments and reduced costs in the production of power. If all goes as planned, base load nuclear power will be cheaper than electricity generated from coal burning stations in the Ontario hydro system.

The location of the station has not yet been decided. As hon. members will know, the atomic energy control board has to be satisfied regarding safety and other aspects of any nuclear power plant for location at a particular site before it will issue a permit for construction. The board will wish to make a careful study of the proposed plant design before approving a specific site location.

I am sure all members of the house will share my deep satisfaction that the energetic and imaginative efforts of the federal government, through Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, to bring Canada to the fore in the field of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, has led and is leading to constructive and profitable undertakings of this kind.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a most interesting announcement by the Minister of Industry, and I am sure everyone in Canada will be delighted. The atomic energy program, which has been operating in Canada now for about 20 years, has proved a major success. Successive governments have shown equal interest in this type of development.

Construction of Nuclear Power Stations

In 1958, when we had the privilege of holding office and the problem of the development of atomic energy in Canada was under consideration, acting on the advice of the highly skilled personnel of Atomic Energy and using our own judgment we decided that we would advance the program by two years, which we did, taking a calculated risk that the development of the use of natural uranium and heavy water would really fulfil the expectations of our highly competent scientists.

That paid off, and our program was advanced. The nuclear development program has been operating the small nuclear reactor near Chalk River for almost three years now, and it is the basic plant to indicate the cost of producing power by this means. As a result of that decision which we made some years ago CANDU, the larger plant near Kincardine, has gone ahead and I think is to be in operation in 1965, working according to plan.

This new announcement is further confirmation of the successful work of our atomic energy scientists, who deserve the thanks of all Canada for what they have done over the years. Their activities have been observed by the world. Other nations working with a different type of uranium—enriched uranium —and other modifying agents, were perhaps earlier in the field, but they have come to see that natural uranium plus heavy water is likely to be the most economical method of producing electric power through the use of atomic energy.

The government of India and governments of other countries in the world are interested in Canada's satisfactory experiment, and I think we have a great future in the export of our knowledge with regard to this method of producing power. Almost every country is now power hungry. Even in our own country the supply of hydroelectric power has about reached its limit except in respect of a few major developments that may be under way. With the steady increase year after year in the demand for electric power I think this method will provide the answer, and in the long run it will relieve Canada, and certainly the province of Ontario, from dependence upon the import of United States coal for steam power stations. It has been estimated that by 1980, I believe, if we did not have this other source of power we would have to expend about $300 million a year for the import of United States coal. So the balance of payments will eventually be affected to our advantage.

[Mr. Churchill.]

I am sure everybody welcomes this announcement by the minister, and I should like to pay my tribute to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, with which I have worked for a number of years, and to the scientists who, working here in Canada, have produced something which has received world wide attention and has proved a great success.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the members of this party wish to join in expressing a word of commendation to the Minister of Industry, to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and to all those responsible for concluding this agreement. We feel this is another forward step in developing the use of atomic energy for the generation of electric power.

At the present time experiments are going on in various parts of the world in the field of atomic energy plants. At the present time the cost per unit is still uneconomic compared to hydro and thermal power, where there is cheap fuel available. But undoubtedly the cost of both hydro power and thermal power plants is going up, and with additional research in the field of atomic energy the costs in this field are going down. Undoubtedly the time is coming fairly soon, and I think engineers estimate that time at between ten and 12 years, when atomic energy will be competitive. We look forward to the day when we will build a national power grid in Canada, in which we will make use of hydroelectric power, harnessed tidal power, using atomic power particularly for peaking purposes. This would round out our whole power picture in Canada.

This is certainly a field of endeavour in which government planning and public enterprise can play a very important part in industrial development. This is certainly one of the legitimate fields for public enterprise and government planning. We commend the minister for this forward step and wish him every success in this undertaking.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we too share in the approval that has been expressed of such an agreement as has been announced today, as it relates to the production of power. It is to be noted that this project indicates the tremendous advance that Canadian scientists have made toward the economic development of nuclear power. Not only does it relate to our ability to produce reactors, but also to our scientists who have improved methods that make economical and practical the function of such reactors.

I note that this new project is going to mean a tremendous increase in the demands for uranium and heavy water. Certainly it will have widespread effects throughout our economy. I note too that the power to be produced by this project will feed into the area around the city of Toronto. I would refer to the need we have in this country for a national power grid, and I trust that the government is taking steps to bring about discussions with the provinces on such a project, because we will not have economic use of the electricity produced unless we do have a national grid.

I am somewhat concerned about the cost involved in this project. I note that it is going to cost the federal government some $80 million in addition to what will be raised by the other two contracting parties. This brings up the point again that money used in this way for public purposes falls into the category of social capital, and that there really is no need for the cost of such projects to be doubled as far as the taxpayers are concerned before they are paid off if we would make a few adjustments in our financial set-up.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we would commend the minister for concluding this agreement. We trust that further developments to meet the need for electricity in the rest of the country as well will go forward on an even more satisfactory basis.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it gives us pleasure to join with the spokesmen for the other parties in saying how glad we are to have heard the announcement just made by the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury). We are happy to find that the government has decided to provide funds for the construction of atomic power plants.

We wish to support the government's efforts in the development of such power plants for peaceful purposes. We hope Canada will play a leading role in the use of the atom for works of peace and that people will finally stop thinking of this famous atomic power only in terms of destruction, so that the human race may some day benefit from this marvellous gift God has given to man.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to say what has been the result of discussions between the secretary general or someone acting on his behalf and Archbishop Makarios regarding the increase, expansion or augmentation of the powers of the United Nations force? Has there been any forward step in this connection? Further, is he in a position to make any observation on the statement made by the French information minister calling for an end of foreign interference in Cyprus? What is the meaning of that expression, Cyprus being associated with the Congo and South Viet Nam in the statement to which I have alluded?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that there had been an improvement in the situation in Cyprus. As a result of the negotiations between the United Nations and the government of Cyprus, agreement had been reached with regard to the problems I described at that time. In so far as the further extension of the powers of the force is concerned, this is still under discussion and we are awaiting a report.

I am not in a position to comment on the statement attributed to the minister of information of France concerning foreign entanglements in Cyprus. I would simply point out, however, with regard to the statement made by another country, that NATO's interest in the Cyprus situation simply involves the natural concern of NATO with the problems of any member of the alliance. In this connection I am happy to note, as I am sure the right hon. gentleman and hon. members will be, that the governments of Turkey and Greece have returned to NATO the forces which they withdrew for the purpose of meeting what they regarded as their foreign policy, responsibilities in connection with Cyprus. NATO has a definite interest in this matter, but it is not an interest that is contrary in any way to the initiative of the United Nations, nor would it in any way interfere with this initiative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman has suggested I might agree with the commendation of the fact that both Turkey and Greece have once more shown their faith by action in NATO, I want to say that this is something that gives new hope of NATO assuring the peace of Europe.

I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether there has been any reaction on the part of the government of Canada to the representations from France concerning the question of foreign interference, to which I alluded in my earlier question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not aware that there have been any representations. There has been no official indication of any objection registered by France to the action taken by countries other than those directly involved in the Cyprus situation. Another country did make an objection. As a matter of fact the participation of France in the proceedings of the NATO council warrants me to believe that my interpretation is the correct one.

[Later:]

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister clarify the situation with regard to the financing of the United Nations force in Cyprus, in the light of the statement by the secretary general today that the force may have to be withdrawn even before September 26 because of the lack of funds to maintain it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is true the secretary general indicated today that the financing of the Cyprus operation is causing him concern. As I said in the house a week ago, Canada and Ireland, the only countries which with Britain are paying all the costs of their contingents, are not participating in the fund which is being provided voluntarily by certain countries. The fund is now delinquent by some $2 million. I would hope that as a result of the statement made by the secretary general today, other countries which have an equal obligation with regard to peace keeping under the charter of the United Nations will see that the United Nations is not rendered incapable of performing its functions.

CONGO—SAFETY OF CANADIANS FOLLOWING UN FORCE WITHDRAWAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of rapidly deteriorating conditions in the Congo can the minister tell us whether there are any Canadian citizens in this danger area and, if so, how many there are? Can he tell us also whether arrangements are being made to remove them to places of safety?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Last week I was asked a question along these lines. I indicated that we were making an assessment of the number of Canadians there and that we had asked Britain and the United States to assist our mission in making sure that precautions were taken for the security and welfare of Canadian subjects. I cannot give the house the precise number at this moment, but I will.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY INCREASE FOR GROUP B

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask him whether salary increases have been announced for group B, and whether he can give any information regarding them. I should like to ask him if it is correct that the increase has ranged from $90 per month to $240 per month for those receiving salaries from $2,400 to $9,100. Is it correct also that grade 1 clerks, stenographers and typists have received an increase of only $90 per year, that they have had no increase in 1961, and that there will be no review until 1965, which would mean an average increase of $15 per month for six years? Can the minister tell us if this information is correct?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Perhaps I should answer this question. There was a press release at twelve o'clock noon today announcing salary increases for group B civil servants.

The hon. member asked, among others things, whether it is correct that a great many things are true. As to part, at least, of his statement, it is not correct. These are increases in rates of pay. The increases range in certain classes and grades from $90 up to $700.

While the increase in the rates of pay as announced is 3.4 per cent, the increase in the actual pay for this group since the last pay revision two years ago has already amounted to 6.4 per cent. If the hon. member considers those figures together he will find that the increase in the earnings of the employees involved here will now amount to 10 per cent over the two year period, rather than the figure which he gave.

Mr. Douglas: I was asking about a particular category, not the percentage increase for the entire group. I was asking the minister whether it is correct that for grade 1 typists, stenographers and clerks the increase amounts to only $90 a year; that they have had no increase in 1961, and there will be no further review until 1965. This means that over this entire period the average increase will be only $15 a month for these three categories.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not agree with the hon. member's way of stating the position. It is not correct to state it as he does. In any event I can tell him that the increase in grade 1 rates just announced is $90 per year. That part of his statement is correct. The other inferences are not correct.

Mr. Douglas: Is the hon. gentleman, as the minister responsible, satisfied that a $90 a year increase for this category is an adequate amount in view of the services these people are rendering?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. The treasury board gave a great deal of detailed attention to the study of this problem. As the hon. member knows, increases or adjustments in pay are arrived at after a study of comparable pay outside the service without taking into account fringe benefits, and if the increase in any particular class or grade is found to be smaller than in another it is because that grade receives more than comparable classes outside. This is without considering the fringe benefits. As is known, the fringe benefits in the public service cost about 25 per cent, and the best estimate of the cost of fringe benefits in comparable employment outside the service runs at about 13 per cent.

Mr. Douglas: When was the last increase given to this group? I understand they had no increase in 1961, no increase until now, and that there will be no review until 1965. This will be a six year period with only one increase.

Mr. McIlraith: The cyclical reviews take place every two years. I believe certain classes in group B did not receive an increase when the last review took place in 1962.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING METHOD OF AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the premier of Quebec that there is a strong possibility that an agreement on the repatriation of the British North America Act may be reached next month at the premiers' conference, can the right hon. gentleman tell us whether he has been in communication with the other premiers or whether plans are being made for a general discussion on the matter, which is so important to this nation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I have been in communication with the premiers of all the provinces on this matter within the last week.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Is any amending formula being placed before the premiers for consideration, and would it be possible for this to be made available?

Mr. Pearson: I am not in a position to make it available now. I think the general understanding is that we begin where we left off at the last conference, at which agreement was very nearly reached. If there is anything I can report on the details of an amending formula before the Charlottetown conference I shall be glad to make a statement.

Mr. Douglas: Are we to take it for granted that the government is starting on the basis of suggesting an amending formula, under which amendment will only be possible by the consent of all the provinces and of the parliament of Canada?

Mr. Pearson: No, but we would start where we left off when agreement was nearly reached and a formula was agreed on by practically all the provinces.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I take it the Prime Minister is referring to the conferences which were convened during the period when the Conservative party was in office. I would ask him this. Has there been any change in the formula advanced by the federal government at that time, or any suggested change by any of the provinces, which causes the right hon. gentleman to express the hope that possibly, now, agreement can be achieved?

Mr. Pearson: I can only say that my hope, as expressed in the house the other day and as confirmed by Mr. Lesage's reported statement yesterday, is based largely on certain informal conversations which took place at Jasper at the recent provincial premiers' conference.

The right hon. gentleman is quite correct when he says I am referring to the conference of 1961 as a starting point.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) told us today that he will drive a spike in the Great Slave lake railway line when the latter crosses the 60th parallel north on August 29. Can the Minister of Transport tell us when the house will have the pleasure of hearing him say that he will drive the first spike of the Matane railway in the province of Quebec?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think I had better take that question as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RETIREMENT OF VICE CHIEF OF NAVAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Has he any comments to make about the compulsory retirement of Commodore Fraser-Harris at the age of 47?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make on the matter. I simply wish to say once again that the compulsory retirement of senior officers is part of our integration process.

It was understood that the integration program would entail retirements, not only among lesser ranks but also among senior officers. This is part of the normal integration process.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Can he tell us who will assume those duties from now on?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, the aim of that integration and the reason for laying off those officers is that there are no positions for those who are being retired.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF DIRECT SERVICE FROM NOVA SCOTIA TO BERMUDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the public demand for direct air service between Nova Scotia and Bermuda, can the minister indicate whether it will be possible for Air Canada to initiate such service for the forthcoming winter season?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pressing as this problem is, nevertheless this would be a good question for the order paper.

Mr. Regan: This is a question of urgency, Mr. Speaker, because it not only concerns passenger service but also freight service between Halifax and Bermuda.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Côté).

Mr. Regan: I would like to raise the matter at 10.30, Mr. Speaker.

MEDICINE HAT—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF SERVICE BY AIR CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the runways are now completed, and in view of the pressing need for air line service into and out of Medicine Hat, I wonder whether the minister is prepared to make representations to Air Canada so this service can be established.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to convey the hon. gentleman's suggestion to T.C.A.

INCOME TAX

DEPOSIT OF DEDUCTIONS BY EMPLOYERS IN LOAN AND CREDIT INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

In view of the announcement made by the minister that 300,000 employers will be able to deposit in their local banks their employees' monthly income tax deductions, will the government allow the small and medium employers doing business through caisses populaires or credit unions to deposit such income tax deductions in those credit and savings unions and will arrangements be made with the federations of caisses populaires and credit unions to that effect?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It does seem to me that, requiring a detailed answer as it does, this is a good question for the order paper.

HOUSING

HALIFAX, N.S.—LOW RENTAL ACCOMMODATION FOR NAVAL PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Postmaster General. It is the same question that I addressed to the President of the Privy Council a few days ago when the Postmaster General was absent. Is it proposed to have a conference on housing, as to the use of the recent amendments to the National Housing Act in Halifax? If it is, in view of the urgent need for low rental housing for naval personnel in Halifax, will the minister see that representatives of the Royal Canadian Navy are invited to any such conference?

An hon. Member: If there are any of them left.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the hon. member and other hon. members of the house, that the first of a series of meetings to discuss the amendments to the National Housing Act that were passed recently has been arranged. It will be held in Halifax on September 21 and 22. I will be there with senior officials of Central Mortgage and Housing; the provincial government will be represented, with their advisers; the city of Halifax and I hope other cities concerned will be represented. Certainly the point the hon. member has mentioned, namely the desirability of looking into the housing needs of naval service people, will be kept in mind and an invitation will be extended to an appropriate person or persons to attend.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether this is the beginning of a general program of housing conferences right across Canada? If the decision has been made to hold a series of regional conferences, is there anything the minister can report to the house in this regard?

Mr. Nicholson: As I intimated, Mr. Speaker, this is the first of a series of such meetings. It is hoped that meetings will be held in other provinces, and perhaps in more than one place in several provinces. This is the first of the series; another meeting is contemplated in Newfoundland in late September, and I am meeting with the Ontario provincial minister, Mr. Randall, next week and will discuss with him the advisability of arranging for a meeting in Ontario at an early, convenient date.

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, would the minister assure the house that representatives of the city of Dartmouth will also be invited to attend this conference, because this city is as much involved as the city of Halifax?

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Further to the last answer given by the minister, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask him whether the holding of one of these conferences in any particular area is contingent upon a request from the provincial authorities, or whether they are being arranged on the minister's own initiative.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, it is our intention, if the Halifax meeting is the success that we hope it will be and if the Ontario meeting is equally successful, to approach the proper authorities or officials in the other provinces, and municipalities concerned, and hold a series of these meetings in capital or other cities in most, if not all, of the provinces.

Mr. Scott: One further supplementary question to the minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the report released this week by the world health organization of the United Nations, in which it is said, "After the question of keeping world peace, metropolitan planning is probably the most serious single problem faced by man in the second half of the twentieth century", can the minister say whether he has given the consideration he stated he would give to the suggestion that we have a royal commission on urbanization in Canada? If such consideration has been given, is there any decision he can give to the house?

Mr. Nicholson: The matter is still under consideration, Mr. Speaker. In fact, when I was in the United Kingdom I had discussions with the minister of housing and local government along these lines. If a decision is reached to establish either a royal commission or a committee of this house to study housing, it will be announced in due course.

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister this question. Would he not agree that the 113 surplus housing units at Beaverbank might be well utilized in taking up the housing shortage for naval personnel at Halifax?

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO IMPORTS OF NEW DESIGN FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister confirm reports appearing recently in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald that quantities of what is referred to as the "Pearson pennant" have been imported into Canada from Japan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I cannot confirm this, Mr. Speaker. I have no knowledge of the matter at all.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the event that the present resolution on the flag is altered, will disposal be made of any surplus stocks of the Pearson pennant through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman is fully aware that the government has purchased no flags of this kind at all. These have been purchased by enthusiasts who like the flag.

[Later:]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister inquire into the quantity of three maple leaves flags being imported from Japan into this country? In view of the quantity being imported from Japan, does he think this is a good thing for industry and employment in this country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should use import controls to restrict in any way the activities of private citizens who are expressing their views and otherwise acting in what I consider a completely proper way.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on a point of order. Rule 178 of Beauchesne in part states that any member may ask informative questions of cabinet ministers. In this regard I asked the minister whether he would inquire as to the quantities of the three maple leaves flags that were being imported from Japan.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very happy to do so if the hon. gentleman will put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. I think this question is quite urgent because—

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no point of order there. The minister has given a reply, and that is all that is required.

WORLD FAIR

POSSIBLE CHANGE TO INCREASE CANADIAN CHARACTER OF SYMBOL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell us if the internal economy committee of the 1967 Canadian World Exhibition Corporation is now considering the question of giving a more Canadian character to the symbol already adopted by that organization?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the symbol adopted by that organization has proved to be very satisfactory. As the hon. gentleman knows, it received the highest accolade that it possibly could receive. In the circumstances it is being used extensively and is very successful indeed.

Mr. Martineau: What about parliament?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder whether the minister has ever compared the symbol with one that came to my hand the other day, which was used by the nazi women's farm army.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would not expect me to answer such a contemptible question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I recommend that the hon. gentleman look it up. He is going to get an awful jolt.

EXTENT OF PARTICIPATION BY COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he tell us how many countries, members of the commonwealth, other than the United Kingdom, have expressed their intention to take part in the 1967 world fair?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there was a question on the order paper about this which was answered the other day. I suggest that the hon. member should refer to it; I am sorry, I do not keep that information in my mind.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the government wishes to adopt a second flag, namely the union jack, as a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth, can the minister assure the Canadian government of the participation of the member countries of the commonwealth, other than the United Kingdom, at the 1967 world fair, so that this membership will be expressed in a concrete rather than a theoretical manner? Can he assure the house of the contribution of member countries of the commonwealth, other than the United Kingdom, at the world fair?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is able to answer quickly I suggest that we get rid of the question; if not, I suggest it be put on the order paper.

Mr. Valade: Then I want to debate this question on the next occasion, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask whether within the last few days he has received representations from the federation of manfacturers of milk products, and from the dairy industry of Quebec, pointing out the rather serious condition of the dairy industry and suggesting reconsideration by the government of its cheese policy, to restore the 30 cents per hundredweight subsidy on milk or refund the premium of 3.6 cents lost by cheese factories on grade 2 cheese; and what is going to be the attitude of the government regarding this question, which is of such importance to the dairy industry?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, I did meet a delegation so far as this matter is concerned, and we are considering it. We are looking at all the various problems which were raised at the meeting. So far as the dairy industry is concerned, the Prime Minister and myself met the president and secretary of the national dairy council this morning, and they assured us that the dairy industry is in the best position it has been in for 15 years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the report says.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. If the situation of the dairy industry is better than it has been for the past 15 years, can the minister tell us then why the Quebec and Ontario federation of manufacturers of milk products has asked him to take immediate steps concerning the dairy policy he announced last April 29?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, the statement I made was just repeating what the president and secretary had to say. I indicated to the right hon. gentleman that we are looking into the processors' problems. I think the president and secretary of the national dairy council were referring to the producers.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister accept an invitation from me to come into my riding and make the statement he has just made in the house to the farmers in my riding?

Mr. Hays: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I would be very pleased to go into the hon. member's riding.

Mr. Grafftey: And to make the statement the minister just made in the house regarding the state of the dairy industry, which is just not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement he has just made, that the dairy industry is in the best condition it has been for years, has the minister any intention of removing the butter subsidy?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, certainly we are not satisfied with it, and we are going to do everything we can to make it better.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): A supplementary question. Is this state of perfection and overwhelming prosperity in this branch of agriculture due to the fact that the minister took away $11.5 million from that industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE TAX REDUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. Seeing how much the tax reduction in the United States has been beneficial to the American economy, is the minister considering a similar step for Canada in the near future?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I think we should wait until the next budget, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED DAILY MEETING OF PROCEDURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice as house leader.

Since parliamentary reform is more urgent than ever, would the house leader consider, as a suggestion, that the committee on procedure and organization sit every day and hear witnesses, for the purpose of improving our parliamentary system, since we have to face a useless filibuster?

Mr. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I take note of the suggestion.

[Text]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO ACHIEVE PRICE STABILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the continuing rise in the cost of living index in Canada I wonder whether the minister has received a copy of the report from O.E.C.D. which comes out against price control by government as a means of ensuring that prices and profits are kept in line, but which further suggests that governments cannot stand by indifferently with respect to the behaviour of prices I wonder whether the minister has received that report and, if so, does he intend to bring forth a policy such as that brought forth by Britain and France to achieve some price stability?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps my hon. friend has reference to the fact that the cost of living and prices generally have risen in European countries to a far greater extent than they have in Canada. As he probably knows, the increase in the cost of living in Canada and the United States has been less than in any other countries in the world.

Mr. MacEwan: A supplementary question. Has the minister received a copy of the new report by O.E.C.D. in this regard?

Mr. Gordon: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacEwan: Does he intend to study this report quite closely?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SUPPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS BY FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the statement of strong support for the Hall commission's health charter for Canadians, issued a day or two ago by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, been drawn to the minister's attention? If so, will it be considered by the minister and by the government in connection with the decision as to when to bring in legislation on this matter?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it has not been drawn to my attention, so that I thank my hon. friend for mentioning it. May I assure him that I will look at it and, as always, everything which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has to say will be listened to with great and sympathetic attention.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister looks at the document will she take note of the fact that the letterhead to which it is attached has on it a strong, solid, bold, single maple leaf?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Could he make a report to the house as to the result of the summit conference held this afternoon?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not like this expression "summit conference"; it somehow puts us apart from the other members of the House of Commons. We did have a meeting this morning, but as we were not able to conclude our deliberations by lunch time we are meeting again tomorrow morning.

URANIUM

BANCROFT, ONT.—REQUEST THAT FLOODING OF MINES BE STOPPED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement today by the Minister of Industry that a new large nuclear thermal generating plant will be built in Ontario, and inasmuch as this probably substantiates the recent statement by Mr. Gilchrist, president of Eldorado, that perhaps the experts had not been accurate and optimistic enough in their forecasts for the demand for uranium, will the minister take the necessary steps to delay or halt the flooding by Metal Mines Limited, Bancroft, whose mines were closed down at the end of June this year? I understand that this flooding and repumping process is very expensive and cannot help but have some effect on the price of uranium.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Defence Production): I will be glad to have this matter looked into, Mr. Speaker.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INCREASED AID TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the minister indicate to the house what progress has been made in the investigation relating to the expansion of aid to the Caribbean area?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is aware, of course, that under the expanded external aid program, additional funds are being made available to the commonwealth Caribbean countries. Bilateral talks are now under way with those countries on specific projects.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will this be enlarged to include the Virgin islands?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister suggests that I remind the hon. gentleman that the commonwealth is free from the Virgins.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to divorce myself from the recent observation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is quite right. I was referring, of course, to the Virgin islands.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

VISIT TO OTTAWA BY NEW ZEALAND OMBUDSMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice which relates to a very distinguished citizen in another part of the commonwealth much more distant to that which has just been under discussion. In view of the visit of the New Zealand ombudsman, Sir Guy Powles, to speak to the bar association in Montreal in a few days, and in view of the fact on the eve of his departure from New Zealand he announced that he would be visiting the Minister of Justice here in Ottawa, could the minister inform us whether steps are being taken to make it possible for Sir Guy Powles to meet with the committee on privileges and elections in relation to the bill that is now before the committee in respect of an ombudsman in Canada?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an excellent idea, and I will take it up with whoever is concerned.

HAL BANKS—FAILURE TO APPEAR IN COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I should like to ask him whether he has consulted his department and can give a report to parliament relating to the whereabouts of the elusive Mr. Banks.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the R.C.M.P. is doing everything possible to obtain the required information in this respect, but I am not in a position as yet to report more precisely to the house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is the minister now in a position to advise whether United States immigration authorities have been asked whether Mr. Banks went into the United States and, if so, at what port and when?

Mr. Favreau: I have no information as yet on this subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have you asked?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, if his question was limited to whether or not I have asked I must say that I did ask my officers yesterday to ascertain whether we had asked the United States authorities, and I have just found a note, which was placed in my file before I entered the house, to the effect that the F.B.I. have been asked for information.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

CONSTRUCTION OF COMMEMORATIVE BUILDINGS IN PROVINCIAL CAPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert on Tuesday, I wish to say that I have re-examined our agreement with New Brunswick under the confederation memorial program, and it does not give to the federal government any control over the selection of subcontractors.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—POSSIBLE SALE OF DOMINION COAL AND STEEL CO.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry whether he can give any information to this house about the possible purchase of Dosco by interests in Quebec, possibly acting on behalf of the Quebec government.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I think this would be a transaction entirely beyond the ambit of the federal government. I know no more about this than I have read in the newspapers, like the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour concerning the interest in and the dependence of the coal industry on government subsidies. Could the Minister of Labour look into this matter so as to alleviate any concern there may be in Cape Breton at this time?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—ADMINISTRATION OF PLAN IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Finance. Can the Minister of Finance say whether arrangements have now been completed with the province of British Columbia for administering the student loans act in that province?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there was a meeting on Monday of this week with the officials of all the provinces, and we hope to have all the formalities worked out by the end of next week.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance how many of the provinces other than Quebec which will be operating on its own, have already designated agencies to look after applications under the student loans act?

Mr. Gordon: I hope to be able to make an announcement about this next week. I am not certain which provinces have finalized this particular matter.

SHIPPING

REMOVAL OF WRECKS FROM WATERS NEAR BRUCE PENINSULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister's department investigate the activities of the salvage boat Maitland Clipper which is removing antique wrecks of historical value from the waters off the shores of the Bruce peninsula?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to look into this urgent matter.

HIGHWAYS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION THROUGH YELLOWHEAD PASS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. On August 12 the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke asked the minister whether he was in a position to announce the government's intentions regarding participation in the announced program of the British Columbia goverment to construct a highway through the Yellowhead route. At that time the minister said he was not in a position to answer. In view of the fact that a week has now elapsed since the question was asked, can the minister answer the question today?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been reached on this matter as yet.

Mr. Skoreyko: In view of the fact that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources gave some assurance to officials concerned with this highway, while in Edmonton last week, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary to the minister would ask the minister to report tomorrow in respect of this matter?

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Wednesday, August 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it was just one week ago today that the hon. member for Regina City moved his subamendment listing four possible alternatives that might appear on a plebiscite if one were held on the flag. In the first six days after the debate started there was one speaker from the Liberals for every Conservative speaker, and each of the other parties put forward three speakers. However, in the last five days the type of debate has changed somewhat, in that the Conservatives have been putting up most of the speakers while the Liberal party has contented itself with two and the other parties with one each.

I suggest that one of the big changes that has come about because of the subamendment is a recognition by those on the government side of the house, in the press gallery and across the country that the debate on the flag has been dignified by very powerful speeches. One reason these speeches have had quite an impact is that people are now beginning to recognize that they are sincere expressions springing from the minds and hearts of the people who are speaking. These are not delaying speeches. Those members who have spoken are not only speaking for their constituencies but are speaking from the depths of their beings. This is why an impact is beginning to be felt not only in this house and in the press gallery but all across the country, and the realization is spreading that we are debating a most important subject in the history of Canada.

On June 30 I took part in the debate on the original amendment and at that time, thinking ahead to what future amendments might be moved, I used these words as found on page 4887 of Hansard:

I am not going to delve into the intricate problems of the wording of the plebiscite.

I used those words because, as hon. members who may wish to read my speech at that time will see, I was aware that one of the great arguments for a plebiscite was to give the people of the country the feeling that regardless of the variety of their opinions, they would be able to indicate their feelings to the government through a plebiscite. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City lists four choices on which the people of the country can focus their minds so the government of the day may have a realistic indication of where the weight of public opinion lies with regard to each of these choices.

When discussing the subamendment yesterday the hon. member for Oxford made a suggestion that aroused considerable interest among those of us who were listening. After listing the four alternatives in the subamendment he suggested that once the government had an idea of how the people felt about these alternatives, the government would then be able to see more clearly what they should do. He suggested a small committee of all parties in the house, and this suggestion immediately attracted interest and questions from every party in the house.

I should like to take the suggestion of the hon. member for Oxford and say to the government that rightly or wrongly they have got themselves into a mess on the subject of the flag. If hon. members will read the speech from the throne they will see there is not a single word in it about the intention of the government to bring forward a resolution on the flag, let alone three. It is obvious that some time after the writing of the speech from the throne somebody came up with a brilliant public relations idea. They said to themselves, we are in trouble on several matters before the house, we cannot get agreement with the provinces on several of our proposals, so let us create a great smokescreen by bringing up the issue of the flag and having a long debate on it which will give us time to resolve our differences with the provinces and get our material ready for the house, and maybe make the people forget the difficulties we were in during the first few weeks of this session.

Whoever proposed that idea must accept the responsibility for having led the party he supports into probably one of the most desperate traps into which this country has ever seen a government fall. They are in a desperate situation because of the trap into which they have fallen, in that at a time in Canada's history when everybody should be working toward unity the government unwittingly has introduced a subject that is divisive.

It is the responsibility not only of the government but of all responsible members of the opposition to try to suggest some way for the government to get out of the mess and the trap in which they now find themselves. We on our part have tried to suggest that one way out is by some form of plebiscite. We have been explicit to the degree that we have outlined four potential choices that should be included in the plebiscite. There may be others.

The hon. member for Oxford has gone one step further, and I think his suggestion should be considered by the government. Whether they like it or not, whether the country likes it or not, we in Canada are in a situation today that has explosive potentialities and no one wants to exploit that situation. The government are faced with three or four major decisions. A plebiscite is one way in which they can turn over the decision to the people. Ordinarily members of parliament do not favour the idea of a plebiscite as a good way to decide issues, but sometimes an exception has to be made in the case of moral or emotional issues.

When I spoke on June 30 I gave the precedent of the conscription debate. If I had been a member of the house in 1942 when that debate took place I think on the basis of the material before me and my knowledge of the facts I would probably have spoken against the idea of holding a plebiscite. But looking back with a historical perspective we realize now that, regardless of the logic of holding or not holding a plebiscite in that explosive situation, the plebiscite did serve to lessen the cleavage in our country.

When the time came for conscription to be enforced in Canada, the Canadians of English speaking background and of French speaking background who had been opposed to conscription accepted the will of the majority and served their country with distinction. They could do that because in spite of their opposition to conscription, the majority had spoken and they themselves had been given an opportunity to express their will.

We have put forward to the government, therefore, one way out of the difficulty, and that is the plebiscite. We have been explicit in connection with the plebiscite by outlining four choices that could be made. Now the hon. member for Oxford has outlined one more way out of the difficulty. I should like to expand that idea and add one major new ingredient. We know the government have to lose face in this situation, but that is their responsibility for getting into the mess. We have some responsibility on this side for helping them to lose as little face as possible, because this is a subject that concerns the very deep emotions of the people of this country.

I am suggesting to the government that they should consider the idea of a committee of all parties of this house. It need not be a large one. It should be small enough to do the job in several months yet big enough to encompass the opinions of all parties. In a democracy you can come to virtually unanimous agreement. I am positive, knowing the members of the house on all sides, that we can come up with something on which we can all agree. I know there has to be a willingness to see the other person's point of view. I know there can be no compromise on principles, but within those principles you can make adjustments. Nothing has been said during this whole debate across Canada which means we have to throw up our hands and say this is a complete impasse. If we allow people to talk together long enough, to meet with each other, then with reasonable good will we will be able, as we have in the past, to arrive at a solution to the impasse. We have no less belief and we have no less good faith toward our country today than we have had in the past.

I suggest that the idea put forward by the hon. member for Oxford might be a course the government could consider even before a plebiscite. I think I can speak for many members in this house when I say that we would be willing to accept this. However, the minimum demand for accepting this idea and closing up this house while the committee went to work would be that the government thoroughly understand four simple principles. The first principle is that, regardless of the pride of anybody, this flag must be something upon which the majority of Canadian people could unite. It must not be any sort of party symbol, because that will divide us for generations. It must be something on which we in this house and the people of this country can find virtual unanimity.

Furthermore, as part of this suggestion that the government join with us in setting up an all-party committee, there should be agreement by the parties going into this committee that they would support the conclusions of the committee if those conclusions are virtually unanimous. We cannot expect complete unanimity in a committee. If there is that willingness to agree beforehand, if there is that acceptance of the fact that the political realities of Canada demand we recognize these four principles which I am listing, then I think we can get out of this situation. Yes, there will be some loss of face here and there. If we do succeed in getting an almost unanimous opinion from this committee I am positive the majority of people will follow along. We do not want to divide Canada. We want a united Canada.

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hamilton: I wonder if I may conclude my four points; then at the end of my speech I will welcome any questions.

The second principle I have to emphasize has already been stated by the Leader of the Opposition. If we are to remain true to our background and our cultures, then any flag that brings unity must afford some recognition of our past history. This country was originally a colony of France and also several colonies under the British king. We have seen a slow evolution in growth from colony to nationhood. This is the warp and woof of our history. Without conflict we were able to come to the point where the descendants of these two founding races could live together. We have come to this point where we can live together because we have always honoured a declaration which was made in the eighteenth century by Governor Carleton that the language and religion of the French speaking members of this new country would always be honoured and protected. This is the foundation upon which the country of Canada was built and has continued to build. We must always, as good Canadians, remember the pledge that was made to the French Canadians at the time of the seven years war, that we would always honour their religion and their language.

We have been able to develop economically in this country to the point where we rank with the top five or six nations of the world. With the tremendous resources that we have, with the business and scientific know-how we are developing, our future is unlimited in a material sense. This material future must not be impeded by getting into the type of struggle or confrontation that nobody wants. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, this is the second principle; that any flag that is going to create unity in Canada must contain symbols of the past. To me it is not a concession to those of English speaking background that their symbols be on the flag; to me it is not a concession that the symbols of our French speaking fellow Canadians be on the flag. So far as I am concerned this committee would have my blessing and full support if it gave equal rights to both founding races on that flag.

No superior race or cultural group; no inferior cultural group; is that too much to ask? Is it too much to ask that the flag of our country should tell the story of how people from two different language groups came, for various reasons, to this continent, have learned to live together and intend to live together?

And we intend to live together by making certain that nothing of the culture of one group shall be destroyed. We are proud, and we should be proud, of the cultural inheritance we have received. So the second principle is that there shall be recognition of the cultural beginnings of our country. It can be done and these, I think, are reasons why it should be done.

When I was speaking on June 30 and thinking along these lines I used these words:

> I think if the people looked at this situation with all the political realities as they are—and the whole country both east and west wants this country more united—here is one way that I suggest would help. Whether there is going to be, if this plebiscite idea is accepted, a committee of intellectuals, a committee of this house, or even a committee representing the provincial governments, regardless of what type of group you get together to plan the bare terms of this plebiscite I think a plebiscite could be worked out whereby the great majority of these people who now feel they are a minority would feel they had a chance to express themselves.

I felt then, and I feel today, great faith in the democratic process. If you get people together, regardless of their political party or the colour of their skin, and they fail to find their way out of an impasse, then there is a lack of genuine democratic feeling somewhere. Now we have a history of democracy in this country which goes back a long time. We can solve the present difficulty as we have solved worse difficulties in the past. I say this to hon. members who distinguish themselves by speaking very rarely in the house. I am trying to put forward a proposal which will get the government off a hook of its own making. I suggest that if we were willing to agree to set up a committee, and if we could agree to accept the decision of that committee, then providing these principles were honoured—

An hon. Member: If.

Mr. Hamilton: Is there any great difficulty about honouring the principle that there should be recognition of the traditions of both the founding races?

The third principle which I think I should put forward has received relatively little attention during the course of this debate. I say that if we are to use a committee in place of the suggested plebiscite, such a committee would have to accept as a term of reference the proposition that there must be something of religious significance on the flag. We have nothing against a maple leaf as a Canadian symbol. What shocked many of us about this proposal of a flag with three maple leaves or a single maple leaf was the loss of a symbol which we have held most dear in western civilization for 800 or 900 years. When our ancestors gathered on the deserts of the eastern Mediterranean, trying to secure control for the Christian world over the home of Christianity, they had to find symbols around which to rally, so they picked different crosses. I am not ashamed of that, Mr. Speaker. Apart from the pennants of the knights and the nobles, this was the first use of flags on a major scale. These symbols, whether chosen by men from Britain or France or Germany, were the first in western Europe, and ever since our flags have borne something of a religious character to remind us of the history of western civilization.

I think this principle has to be followed by the Canadian people. When this matter comes to be considered in every home and in every church in Canada I do not think the people will be as happy with a flag which lacks any religious significance as they would be with one containing something to remind them that we are a part, if a small part, of western civilization with its Christian heritage.

I say this without any sense of pride or superiority for any religion. I say it simply because a nation without some realization that there is a power greater than material power lacks a necessary ingredient of greatness, both in this world today and in the future. Unless we submit to the realization that mankind is not perfect; unless we submit ourselves in all humility to the truth that there is only one power which is perfect, namely Godhead itself, a vital element is missing from our civilization. If we were ever to think that we in our mortal lives are capable of solving every problem, we would be running into grave danger. Unless we have sufficient humility of spirit to accept that on our symbols there should be a sign of superior power we are likewise sacrificing an important part of ourselves. These symbols may have weakened over the centuries, but there is still recognition in them of a power greater than we possess on this earth. So the third proposal is that any flag which would meet the terms of reference must be a flag of religious significance to some degree.

The fourth principle will be hard to explain, but I must try. Previous speakers have mentioned that ours is an evolutionary flag; it is not a revolutionary flag. I wish to draw attention to the significance of that suggestion before proceeding to consider another principle which I think we must accept. If we are to achieve the unity which we desire and which is necessary—this 80 per cent or 90 per cent unity in Canada—we must recognize that whether we like it or not this is a country of minorities. One minority, the French speaking Canadians, have always felt compelled to fight for their culture whenever they felt it was under attack. They have developed such a consciousness of this culture that they sometimes overlook the fact that the English—or les anglais, as they call us—are also a minority. French speaking Canadians, to use round figures, represent roughly one third of the population of this country. Canadians with English speaking backgrounds also represent roughly one third of the population. Now there are some six million new Canadians, or descendants of new Canadians, in this country, and they come from countries where other languages are spoken.

So we are all minorities. The political reality, therefore, is that we must always be careful when dealing with things which affect the spirit and the culture of our people. This means that we have to move slowly. We have got along so far because we have always protected the rights of French speaking Canadians as to their religion and language. We can get on in future if each minority group respects the basic needs of the others. One of the things which the Anglo-Saxon minority holds dear is the presence of its national symbol on the flag. This is simply a political reality.

The hon. member for Ontario spoke in this debate the other day in answer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He used an expression then which I hope will not pass unnoticed. He said he felt sorry as he saw his French speaking fellow Canadians in a confrontation with his English speaking fellow Canadians. As I read that statement, to his mind there is a confrontation between English speaking and French speaking Canadians, but that is not the way the French Canadian sees this question, Mr. Speaker, if I read the French newspapers correctly. The elite of the French Canadian editorial writers are pointing out—

An hon. Member: Why don't you let your French members speak on this question?

An hon. Member: Why don't you?

Mr. Hamilton: —the fight that is going on among English speaking Canadians. They see the English speaking people of Canada divided. They say that this matter of a flag is not one of life and death to the French Canadian; he has many more serious problems to worry about. To realize this, one has only to consider the economic living standards of the people of rural Quebec and those of the workmen in the cities and towns of Quebec.

An hon. Member: And the unemployment in Quebec.

Mr. Hamilton: These are the French Canadian's worries. Certainly he would like a flag, if he is asked, I suppose, along the line that has been proposed by the government; but it is not a serious matter to him, according to the writers in the French Canadian newspapers. But read the English newspapers, Mr. Speaker. I refer, for example, to the newspapers of Alberta which supported the Liberal party in the last election. They say this proposed new flag is a massive concession to Quebec; that Quebec people insist on this new flag. But they do not insist on it, if you can believe the French Canadian newspaper writers; and the French Canadian today is wondering what all this fuss is about. It is said that the Quebec people feel the government should get out of this mess and go on to other things. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest in the face of the political realities that exist today in Canada we have an opportunity to lay down a pattern for future behaviour in matters of this sort that will stand us in good stead for many years to come.

I have mentioned this fourth principle, for example. Anything we do in Canada affecting the culture of our minorities must be of an evolutionary nature. One of the great dangers that I see in the present technique of this government is that they have put before this house a simple resolution designed to change the flag of Canada. They have decided something that affects the deep moral and emotional feeling of a great segment of our nation, one of our great cultural groups; and by way of a simple resolution they have decided this flag is going to be our national flag, regardless of the fact that probably 35 per cent of the people of Canada very sincerely want something else that is part of their whole culture and tradition.

Perhaps we have a precedent in this regard. Let us go back to the words of a former prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. If my memory serves me correctly he said that by a simple resolution we could change the constitution of this country with regard to language.

An hon. Member: That was in 1950.

Mr. Hamilton: My colleague says that was in 1950. If we are going down this slippery slope of letting simple resolutions decide matters which so deeply affect minorities, we will always be in a state of alert in this country. I sometimes wonder, when we know that discussions are to be held among the federal and provincial governments on the constitution, whether one of these evolutionary steps could not be taken with regard to something that is missing from the British North America Act. I wonder whether the discussion should not only concern changing our constitution but should not also deal with a matter such as the flag, which is now so deeply a part of most of us. Should not the question of the flag be included in any change in our constitution and incorporated therein? It could be changed, but slowly and in an evolutionary way, without forcing a minority to its knees.

I have spoken at some length on these four principles, Mr. Speaker. I am going to repeat them. I would like to say to my hon. friends opposite that I put these principles forward with the realization that they commit me, and I think many of my colleagues here, to the acceptance in advance of a decision by a committee. If we are willing to accept this, the only limitations are the four principles I have mentioned; and surely we are all good enough Canadians that we can accept those four principles. Here they are. The first is unity, in order to get a virtually unanimous opinion on this question. In spite of all the cynicism I know this is possible. These four principles are broad enough for anybody who loves his country to accept. Unity means that you get virtually unanimous support in this committee. As I have said, I think it can be done, not in 60 years but in four or five months.

The second principle is that the symbols of our past should be on that flag, and that the symbols of the two founding races should be given equal place. There is no question of one group appeasing another and people saying that one group represents one third of our people and the other two thirds. This matter concerns our history, and you do not measure quantitatively how many there are in each group. It can be done, Mr. Speaker, if we accept equal recognition, with no superior group and no inferior group. If this is done I believe we can achieve virtual unanimity all across the country as well as in a committee.

The third principle, which I trust every member of this house supports, is that on the flag there has to be something of religious significance of this nation, because without that there is nothing ahead of us; we are just—without mentioning any names—in the position in which many of the new nations of the world find themselves, with no background, no common series of principles on which they can unite. As a result they have great difficulty building a nation.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

The fourth principle is very important for the future. We must accept the fact that with regard to matters on which minorities feel very deeply there must be evolutionary change, as opposed to revolutionary change. If you bring in a simple resolution such as we have before us to change a symbol that is so dear to the hearts of many of us—a flag—and force this down our throats, you will leave in Canada a near irreconcilable minority for at least a generation; and I know whereof I speak. The period of irreconcilability may be much longer.

We are suggesting that these four principles be used as terms of reference, to give the government a chance to close off this debate, to get something moving forward so that we may have a distinctive national flag, to get back to those matters that were contained in the speech from the throne, and bring unity to this country. I think these principles deserve consideration, Mr. Speaker.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, who will be dissatisfied with this type of proposal? Who will suffer from these four principles? First of all, I know the extremists will, and there are extremists on all sides. Second, those who want separation between the two founding races will be disgruntled. Third, those who believe in a republic will be dissatisfied; but there are not many republicans in Canada. Fourth, the communist party will feel dissatisfied because they want a flag which has no religious significance, and they do not want anything at all on the flag which refers to the fact that the French and English had a colonial background. We are proud of the fact that we have grown from a colony to full nationhood so peacefully and under evolutionary techniques.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that very few would feel disgruntled at this type of situation. And if I might just descend to the depths for a moment, there is another little group that will be dissatified; that is all these private enterprise friends of one or two members who are producing these new flags. They will have to call them all back in and lose a little money. However, I do not worry about them.

I suggest that if we keep these principles alive in our minds and accept the fact that the political reality today is that we are all minority groups; if we want to set an example of living together here, not only for our own satisfaction but for the whole world—we have done this in the past and we think we can do it in the future—then one of the courses open to the government is to hold a plebiscite. But if that is unpalatable to the government, then here is another suggestion which we have made, namely that this question be referred to a committee.

I should like to thank the members of the press gallery who in the last few days have been indicating to the people of the country that those of us who are speaking in this debate believe in what we are saying. I think this is right. We know now that we are speaking for our history and our principles, and we shall continue to do so regardless of the personal cost to each one of us. We cannot and we will not retreat beyond the principles I have just enunciated. Just as our fellow French Canadians cannot and will not retreat when their culture is attacked, so do some of us who are another minority refuse to change our minds on this essentially fundamental matter. I feel that if all good Canadians fight for the rights of those who have these feelings about their culture, to protect that culture, then this country can go forward.

I hope this suggestion which I have made, one week after the hon. member for Regina City moved his subamendment listing the four choices, will be accepted. This suggestion was originally proposed by the hon. member for Oxford as a follow-up to a plebiscite. I have now proposed that this step should be considered even ahead of a plebiscite, and I put it forward as a second alternative to enable the government to get out of the mess they are in. Because there is only one other choice, a choice that we all know no one wants, and that is that we go back to the country and fight this matter out in the wildest dogfight of Canada's history. And we will split this country as a result.

The country demands of us all—not only the opposition but the government as well—some effort to clear this situation away. You cannot get out of it now without losing some face. The flag was never mentioned in the speech from the throne. Hon. members opposite are in this mess through their own fault, and they will have to make some concessions to get out of it. But I am telling them now that I am not speaking in this way just because I am a Conservative; it is because I believe that my background and the background of many millions like me gives me the right as a minority to demand, and to always demand, that on the flag of this country there be something to represent the contributions we have made to this country in the past.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question before he sits down?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the hon. member's suggestion that his proposal could possibly have the effect of closing off this debate, I wonder whether he would comment further on his statement that if his proposed committee brought back a report we should accept it, I think he said, immediately. Does he propose that in these circumstances we would not reopen this whole debate?

Mr. Churchill: Don't commit yourself on that.

Mr. Hamilton: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I made it pretty clear in my remarks. One of the advantages of this suggestion is that we are trying to take this whole matter of the choice of a national symbol out of the realm of mass confrontation in this house and into the realm of a committee composed of members from all parties, which would be given the chance to see whether it could not come up with a suggestion which would meet these four principles. I do think there has to be some sort of understanding that there be a willingness on all sides, after the usual formal debate, to seriously consider the matter as something we should all stand behind.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask—

Some hon. Members: Make your own speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has expired by several minutes, but due to the importance of the suggestion I thought the house would not object if he continued. However, if he is going to make many more replies we need the consent of the house. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask just one more question, because I think the suggestion was put forward seriously and we have the right to understand its implications. Since the effect would be to cut off debate now, can the hon. member say whether he and his party would agree, when a report did come back, that there be either no debate or limited debate so that a decision could be made without reopening the matter all over again?

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question? I think he has put forward an interesting proposal. Would he prevail on the members of his party to allow the sub-amendment and the amendment which are now before us to come to a vote so he could put forward his suggestion in the form of an amendment to the main resolution?

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I made my proposal to the government in the hope that the leader of the government, who has some responsibility as the real house leader, would come before the meeting of the leaders of all parties with some tangible suggestion. I have put forward the proposal together with the terms of reference, but I think it is up to the Prime Minister to take some type of leadership. I have been putting forward an idea which I took from the hon. member for Oxford in the hope that it would receive serious consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, for the past three weeks we have been having a single debate, that on the resolution to give Canada a distinctive national flag. During those three weeks, we have heard very few members from the province of Quebec, and I think that many factors may be instrumental in the lack of participation of the Quebec members in the said debate, up to now.

We were quite aware, we from Quebec in particular, of the scope of the problem and of the discussions which the government proposal would stir up, and we did not want to add in any way to the discussion.

But I believe, following everything which was said since the beginning of the debate, that the time has come for us to break the silence we have kept so far, in this corner of the house in particular, in order to express another point of view and to bring, if possible, a little relaxation in this august assembly.

I must admit, although I recognize that all hon. members have the right to speak freely in the house, that one must be really thick-skinned not to jump out of one's seat upon hearing some of the arguments put forward since this debate started.

If I were sarcastic and mean, I could rejoice because we have witnessed since the beginning of this debate what looks like a fight to the finish between some English speaking elements. We have been used in the past to seeing French Canadians fight among themselves, discuss things fiercely, sometimes disagree deeply, but this time we are witnessing this disagreement within the country's English element.

But, Mr. Speaker, this does not make me happy, any more than I rejoice or will ever rejoice to see disunity among people of the same ethnic group.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think we could be happy with such a situation.

I will surely not try to refute all that has been said but there is one particular point on which I should like to set the record straight. On several occasions and no later than last night, some hon. members stated that the flag resolution is a surrender to the province of Quebec and that the Liberal party is selling the red ensign for the 75 Quebec votes.

Nothing could be farther from the truth, Mr. Speaker. Like their fellow Canadians, the people of Quebec have long been waiting for a distinctive flag; consequently, they are not the only ones who wish to have such a flag. Indeed, if the new distinctive flag is not accepted throughout Canada by the majority of the people, Quebec will not know what to do with it. It will just become another half kept promise probably carried out to get more votes.

Mr. Speaker, we would not know what to do with a flag which would not meet with the approval of the majority of Canadians, and if it is to be flown only in the province of Quebec, we do not want it. Our province already has its own flag and if we advocate the adoption of a distinctive flag for Canada, it is because we are convinced that the time has come to show some national pride and maturity.

If there is any one here who thinks that the Liberal members from Quebec were elected because of such a vague promise, let me tell him that he is sorely mistaken.

On the other hand, if some Liberal members from Quebec think they will be re-elected just because a new flag has been adopted, let me tell them that the people of our province have a most disagreeable surprise in store for them.

The Liberals are not entitled to any gratitude on the part of the Quebec people if they give them that so-called flag. That gratitude has already been expressed through the heavy vote Quebec has given the Liberals in the past following the many promises made on each occasion.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, if the Liberals think the problems of Quebec, as well as those of Canada as a whole, are going to be solved simply by means of the flag issue, they are bound to find out that those problems are much too complex to be settled merely by adopting the flag.

It was claimed for a long time that this matter of a flag was of the utmost importance to the Quebec people. But, to back the point I am making, let me refer to certain achievements of the Conservatives, when they were in office. The Conservatives have indeed given simultaneous translation to the House of Commons, requested so many times and even promised in the past. Has it helped the election of Conservatives in Quebec? No, Mr. Speaker, because today Quebec is aware that its problems will not be settled by symbols only. Its problems, like those of the whole country, go much deeper than that.

Mr. Speaker, should Quebec favour Liberal candidates at the next general election, it will surely not be because of the popularity of the Liberal party, but because the opposition parties will have failed to express their views and offer a much better solution to our present problems. If the Liberals win the next election, I think that it will be due to the weakness of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I have always been a strong supporter of any proposal to give national symbols to our country.

Today, the circumstances are such that I am one of those who are entrusted in this house with the extremely difficult task of voting on those symbols, at a time in our history when tensions between the various ethnic groups which constitute the Canadian people are such as to jeopardize the very basis of our institutions.

It is generally admitted that confederation survived thanks to compromises accepted by Quebec and for which we, the people of Quebec, unfortunately had to pay day in and day out.

Judging from the various viewpoints expressed throughout Canada as well as in this house, one would tend to wonder if the time was well chosen to start the discussion on this legislation which more than any other one is likely to bring a discussion based only on emotions and unfortunately to give some demagogues free rein to show their true colours, if not their skill.

Personally, I feel that there is nothing to be gained by further delaying the choice of a flag and that, on the contrary, this shock treatment—since it is certainly a shock treatment—will perhaps compel all Canadians to pull themselves together and put more emphasis on the many reasons to look for a better understanding on all those matters that divide us.

Certainly I would have preferred that the resolutions which have been introduced would not mention any colonial symbols. But as I said, I feel that we will have to be patient and probably accept a compromise in the hope that within a few years from now the percentage of Canadians by birth will increase and that those relics will disappear by the will of the majority of the Canadian people themselves.

As for us, Canadians of French origin, who settled here more than 350 years ago, we have been 100 per cent Canadians for a long time. But we still feel interested and touched by everything concerning France. That is why, even if it may seem difficult, we must try to understand the present emotions of the seven million Canadians of British origin who are being asked today to discard another symbol of our past as a British colony, to take one more step forward on the road towards complete independence in fact and in right. I recognize that such progress is proceeding at a snail's pace, Mr. Speaker, but I would rather have it slow and well ordered than quick and the cause of chaos such as that experienced by the majority of former colonies, whether French, British or others, which, in recent years, gained their independence at the cost of bloodshed and great economic and social upheaval.

The evolution of Canada is the result of long years of struggle which must be continued. To a certain degree, the French Canadians have been the catalyst in that progress towards complete emancipation of our country. We are being accused today, as we were in the past and as, unfortunately, we will still be for a certain time to come, of trying to divide the country, although it is completely the opposite.

We want a strong Canada, strong with the strength of all its parts, Quebec being one of them.

We are crying out against foreign control of our economy, not only in Quebec, but throughout Canada.

As our ethnic group had to fight for the last 200 years for its survival as a nation with a French culture on this American continent, we realize more than any other group, more than our Anglo-Canadian fellow citizens, the danger which the ever-growing influence of the American way of life represents, and how much it may jeopardize the future life of Canada as a separate entity. That is why, Mr. Speaker, Canada needs distinctive symbols.

I would, at this point, if I may, quote from an article written some time ago in the Montreal Gazette. I apologize to hon. members for my English pronunciation, which is unfortunately far from perfect though I wish it were. I quote:

[Text]

I am a "landed immigrant" from Britain who has lived in Canada for 12 years without bothering to take out Canadian citizenship (after all, I thought, this country flies a variation of the British emblem so obviously its citizenship must be merely a variation of British citizenship which I already had in full measure).

The day the new and distinctively Canadian flag is unfurled for the first time will be the same day I file my application papers. When I next visit England, it will be a proud moment when I can pass Canada house in London, see the Canadian flag rippling in the breeze and think: That's my flag.

I have waited 12 long years to become a Canadian with a flag, a national anthem and at least a modicum of national pride to call my own. Thanks Mr. Pearson, it looks as if I will shortly have my chance. The back of my (former English) hand to those who would deny me this chance.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the expression of view of a man who was born in England, and I feel he is not the only one to express this opinion. I hope that those who were born in Canada of English culture will be as much Canadian as this man intends to be, and support for Canada as much as possible the symbols we need so that we can be recognized as a really independent country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when reviewing the reasons which the Fathers of Confederation put forward to unite the various British colonies in America at the time, it is interesting to note that the first and foremost aim was to set up Canada as a distinctive country, which would be sufficiently strong to resist American assimilation. It is too bad that the matter of a truly Canadian flag was not settled then, as all those dissensions and discussions, and all those problems which we have to face today would not have come up at all. They probably expected that their successors would not delay in filling this gap, but they had not taken partisan politics into account, i.e. a state of mind which having been maintained and further developed, is now obstructing any decision on the flag.

Today, we are in a dilemma. The country seems to be hopelessly divided. But is this split really hopeless? Personally, I do not think so; I would hate to think so. No problem is hopeless when men of good will objectively decide to find a solution.

[Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John).]

Mr. Speaker and hon. members, if ever a matter, or circumstances called for a compromise, it is those which are now under consideration. Quebec is in no way committed to the design suggested by the Prime Minister. I am certain that the French Canadian people who are conscious of their responsibilities with regard to the preservation of harmony in this country, will, once again, as they did in the past, show sound common sense in this matter.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—and I do not intend to take more than the necessary time—I would like to appeal to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to his colleagues who support him in the house, to agree to reconsider their position, because, otherwise, they will plunge the country into a state of chaos as we have never seen before, and the result of this action could have unconceivable repercussions on the future.

Suggestions were made—one needs only to read in the Montreal Gazette the question "Do we want our flag?". And you have the former Ontario premier, Mr. Leslie Frost, who, I believe, is a good Conservative and wants to keep this unity we all want in this country. This man who is now well on in years and quite experienced in public administration, thinks that it is time for him to take a stand. He urges those who were and are still his supporters to reconsider their position and to accept a compromise.

I can appreciate the situation in which the Conservatives find themselves. They say: "This is the Liberal flag, the Pearson flag, and the rest of Canada will support him for 50 years". The Liberals, of course, have been paving the way by reminding people that conscription was passed by the Conservatives. One may expect the flag to be the cornerstone of the next election campaign, and that is why the Conservatives object to it as practical politics. On the other hand, if the Liberals expect to win the support of the province of Quebec with this flag, and if it is their only achievement, they have a very poor opinion of the Quebeckers and of their judgment, and it is high time they reconsider their position.

As far as I am concerned, I put my trust in the Quebec people, and in their judgment, and if the Liberal party comes to Quebec at the next federal election with only a Canadian flag as its achievement, let me tell you again, my dear friends, that it will be very much surprised because the Quebec people are much more realistic and practical than they were in the past. Simultaneous translation, set up by the Leader of the Opposition, did not bring him the deep gratitude of the province of Quebec. And it is not by granting to Quebec unimportant things, which they wanted and were entitled to, that he received the support of that province. The real problem is far more complex than that.

We shall have this distinctive national flag, for the great majority of Canadian people want it. Considering that this flag may be the fruit of the longest period of gestation ever, and that, for many, great moral suffering might have accompanied its birth, I am convinced that, afterwards, all Canadians, whoever they be, will respect and cherish it. Besides, it will have been the result of many struggles and probably many concessions, valuable concessions indeed, no doubt important ones. Even if, for the good of the country, whatever party we may belong to, we have to make concessions—I am sure there will be several in the province of Quebec, and I hope as many in the other parts of Canada—I believe we shall have to make such concessions and that we should, especially we, Canadians, come to an understanding and vote unanimously in favour of what will be not the Liberal flag or the Pearson flag, but the flag of Canada.

Mr. Valade: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Does the hon. member want to imply that due to the fact that he has decided to accept the three maple leaf flag, this flag should be accepted without allowing us to suggest other designs to the government?

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Certainly not, since I spoke of compromise. This flag design is far from meeting my personal taste, which by the way is not the taste of the majority of the Quebec people. And this is quite normal. To say that this design is beautiful, far from it. But, if I were to let my personal taste prevent possibly the adoption of the flag, I think that it would be a great disservice to the Canadian people.

[Text]

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting for many days for the chance to exercise my right and carry out my duty by speaking on this flag question, one of the most important issues, I believe, that has ever arisen in this country. Although I have very strong, personal feelings toward the Canadian red ensign, and probably there is no riding in Canada that feels more strongly toward the red ensign than mine, my position is not very popular. The stand I have taken has been one of moderation, and I shall try to make my remarks here today in the same key.

I was very disappointed yesterday to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) call this debate a filibuster, particularly when the Prime Minister himself invited all members to express their opinions on this question. Many of our members have not yet had this chance. As I have said, I have been waiting for many days for my turn to speak on this question.

I am speaking specifically to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More). I shall not read the subamendment, but the gist of it is that amongst the questions to be placed on the plebiscite are the following: Would you prefer the Canadian red ensign, or the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritage of both founding races? Do you like the three maple leaf flag or the one maple leaf flag? I have five arguments I will put forward in support of this subamendment or rather in consideration of the subamendment.

My first argument, Mr. Speaker, is that this government has no mandate from the people of Canada to introduce the maple leaf flag or any such flag that they may have in mind. I have with me a full page advertisement which appeared in the Victoria Colonist dated March 31, 1963. It is headed, "Policies of the Liberal Party, General Election, 1963." In looking over this full page advertisement I see many things that the Liberals promised. Glancing through it, I see that they are going to reform taxes, which they have done by increasing them; municipal loans for schools and parks are to be provided; provide mortgages for existing homes—I will bet that got them many thousands of votes—improve rural housing; set up an economic council; assist in retraining courses for industry; provide ten thousand $1,000 scholarships; improve public financing for universities; pensions to make possible retirement on half pay at age 65 with a maximum pension of $296 per couple; $75 old age assistance for single women and widows; collective bargaining for civil servants; restore unemployment insurance fund; create a fisheries credit agency, and so on. I could take another half hour listing the things that they have promised which they have not yet done, many of which they have already decided to abandon. No matter how carefully you examine this full page advertisement which was used in many newspapers across British Columbia, there is no reference whatever to a flag. How can the government, particularly when they were elected as a minority, presume that they have a mandate from the people to present this three maple leaf flag?

During the last election campaign I recall that the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos), now sitting in support of the government, who opposed me in 1961 and 1962, was on the same platform with me in 1963. I think he will confirm that in our area this flag question was not raised at all. If it had been, I am quite sure the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) would have said he was for the red ensign. This is my first reason for supporting the subamendment, that this government has no mandate from the people of Canada.

My next argument in favour of this subamendment is that if there is to be a vote on any portion of the flag question it will not be a free vote of the members of this house. At one time the Prime Minister promised a free vote. On May 12, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates), he said, as reported at page 3164 of Hansard:

> When the time comes to submit the decision of the government in this matter to the House of Commons I would hope every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates, and that there would be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, somebody prevailed upon the Prime Minister to change his position. I think by then he started to hear from the people across Canada. He has stated that this is a question of confidence in the government. I maintain therefore that any vote that may be taken here will not be a free vote in which every member on that side will vote according to his conscience or in accordance with the way the people of his riding feel. To prove this contention I will cite an individual case. Unfortunately, it happens to concern a very good friend of mine, the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos). I will submit evidence to show how members on the Liberal side have changed their views, or rather how they have been brought into line—I do not say they have changed their views. I will first of all read a letter which a constituent wrote to the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.). It is a letter from a Mrs. E. E. Fox, and this is the relevant part of it:

> Regarding that there are many different and decided opinions regarding this matter which is of such vital interest to all Canadians, I would urge that the red ensign be adopted as Canada's national flag; and, furthermore, that a proclamation of that flag be made without delay.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

This was the letter addressed to Mr. David Groos, M.P. Now here is the reply dated February 10 from the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) to Mrs. Fox:

> I thank you for your letter concerning the national flag of Canada, and for letting me know your views on this subject.
> Please let me assure you that I agree absolutely with everything in your letter and I intend to do everything I possibly can to see that our present flag keeps flying.

Maybe it was in a weak moment he wrote that one. That letter was dated February 20. Eleven days later the hon. member still had not changed his mind, because he wrote another letter, the relevant part of which reads—and I will quote it:

> I intend to do all within my power to retain the present Canadian flag.

Then on February 7 the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) wrote another letter to one of his constituents, as follows:

> Thank you for your recent letter concerning Canada's national flag.
> Just let me say I am in complete agreement with you and the many others of my constituents who have written to me in this regard, and I intend to do my utmost to see that Canada's present flag keeps flying.

Again, I apologize for having to refer to a particular hon. member but I am using this case as an example of how the whip cracks and members are brought into line on the other side. On May 21 the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) wrote a letter on the flag issue to the Victoria Daily Times and to the Victoria Colonist in which he said:

> The Prime Minister will be taking action on this matter within the next few days. I am free to vote as I wish and I will, naturally, be guided by the views of the residents in my constituency.

The letter went on:

> No flag will be acceptable to me unless it finds a large degree of favour right across the country—

With regard to the second part of the letter which I have read, I presume the hon. member has seen the result of the poll which shows that a majority of the people in nine out of ten of the provinces prefer the Canadian red ensign.

To revert to the first quotation I gave from the hon. member's letter, the part in which he said he would naturally be guided by the views of the residents of his constituency, I should like to ask: What are the feelings on this flag question of the constituents in the Victoria (B.C.) riding?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should perhaps bring it to the attention of the hon. member that the Chair has some doubt about the propriety of quoting letters exchanged between another member and a third person. This appears to be contrary to the spirit of debate, where an hon. member has to express his own opinions rather than the opinions of someone else, or of other members. I must say I have no authority before me on the point, but this is a matter which the hon. member might keep in mind in case he is considering reading other letters of the same type.

Mr. Nowlan: On the point of order, I do not think there is any authority for the proposition you have just put forward, Mr. Speaker. My understanding of the rules is the reverse and my impression at the moment is that the hon. member is perfectly within his rights in taking the attitude he has, and that he has proceeded in accordance with the rules which govern this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid I have to reiterate I have no authority before me at the moment. I have simply expressed the understanding of the Chair of the rules which govern our debates generally—that it is not in the spirit of debate for hon. members to quote from private correspondence in which they themselves are not engaged.

Mr. Chatterton: I would accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I might just say that the person whose letter I read gave me authority to use the letter. She, of course, owns the letter once she receives it. However I have no more letters to quote. I wish to proceed with my speech. I was referring to the letter which the hon. member wrote to the Victoria Daily Times which was made public by being published in that newspaper.

What do the people of the riding of Victoria (B.C.) feel about this question. The Victoria Daily Times had a poll, and I will read from its issue of May 20, 1964, concerning this poll.

> Not in recent memory has a public opinion poll conducted by the Times drawn such an intense reaction as the flag ballot.
> Times readers are concerned enough it seems, that they wish to make it a sincere test of opinion.

What was the result of this poll taken by the Victoria Daily Times? On May 29, 1964 the poll was closed. By that time 3,860 ballots had been cast. Of these, 2,847 were in favour of the red ensign and 1,013 were in favour of the maple leaf flag, that is, almost 3 to 1 in favour of the ensign.

I may say I have warned the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) that I intend to attack his position and I ask him to reply to the charges I have made. I see with satisfaction that he is making notes and I feel sure he would like to explain to his constituents the change in his position. I am using this case just as an example to show that if there is to be a vote on any part of this flag question it will not be a free vote.

It was interesting to note that yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) said it would be a free vote. I think he was flying a balloon. But even if the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) were to tell us tomorrow that there would be a free vote it would be too late, because the whip has cracked and the members have been placed in position; they have made their stand clear and they cannot change, now. To say, now, that there will be a free vote, would be a hollow ruse.

The next argument I wish to advance in favour of the subamendment concerns the actions of this government in creating disunity and division within the country. My colleagues from Quebec know that I have always been sympathetic to their case and that I understand their problems. I myself come from a bi-racial country where my own people were in much the same position as the French speaking people consider themselves to be in Canada. I wish to make it clear that the statements I propose to read do not represent my own opinions. What I am attempting to do is to show how people in various parts of the country are reacting to the actions of this government. I am almost scared, sometimes, to see the reaction of the people to the government's proposal. I propose to quote excerpts from letters I have received, just to show how people feel, and how the government had divided the country. Here is a letter which says:

> Some member of the opposition should rise to remark that Mr. Pearson is taking a course of action which will result in his place in history being that of the man who divided Canada.

Here is part of another letter:

> If we are adopting this flag merely to placate a vociferous minority, we are doing a grave injustice to the rest of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would earnestly ask the French speaking members from Quebec to listen to this to see how people in other parts of Canada feel toward them. Much of this feeling amongst these people has been created by the action of this government. I can tell the house that in 1962 I carried out a poll of my riding on this French question, and even I was surprised to learn how sympathetically the people of my riding considered the French problem. But this is not the case today.

The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto)—who, incidentally, made a very thoughtful and thought provoking speech—said yesterday that it is only a minority of Quebeckers who are creating this trouble. He went on to say that people in the other parts of Canada do not know this. He is quite right. They read the press, and do not know this. The C.B.C. in particular is terrible in this respect. Instead of trying to place the whole question in perspective, they emphasize the actions of this extremist minority in Quebec, and the people in the rest of the country, particularly those in British Columbia, think this is the way the whole of Quebec feels. Because of the present action of this government with regard to the flag, these people are caused to say, "See, we told you so". I want to impress on my French colleagues that this is doing them harm. This letter says:

> It was kind of you to show an interest in my small effort to stop the vicious plan to force on us a national flag only wanted by the lousy peasoupers.

I am very regretful, Mr. Speaker, that I have to quote this, but I am trying to convey to the government how these people feel. It is terrible that the action of this government is causing this type of bitterness. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I would hate to quote some of the letters I have received, but I have quoted these extracts in order to convince the government that their action is causing these people to feel more bitter against French Canadians. I have dozens of letters along these lines, but I think those I have quoted will suffice to make my point that the action the government has taken and the manner in which they are dealing with this question is creating disunity and division. It is causing harm to the whole country, particularly to the people of Quebec, because other people say this is done to appease Quebec.

I want to emphasize again, Mr. Speaker, that I have used these quotations to try and impress upon the government that this is how people feel. I regret it. I have a whole file of letters here from which I could quote; they are all along those lines. The fourth argument—

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chatterton: No. When I am through I will answer any questions.

Mr. MacInnis: You wouldn't recognize an answer if you got one.

Mr. Chatterton: I have a fourth argument I want to advance as to why the action of the government and the manner in which they are dealing with this question should be abandoned in favour of the subamendment. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) has so eloquently described it, the English speaking people of British descent—most of them, at any rate—feel very, very strongly about the question of the flag. I can best demonstrate this by quoting some of the expressions used in their letters. First I should like to read an advertisement which was placed in the Victoria Daily Times of June 8. It is an advertisement for the sale of a property and it says:

> Our clients along with Lord and Lady Cholmondeley have decided that since the government of Canada has seen fit to remove the red ensign that they simply cannot live under the three maple leaves and therefore have bestowed on us the exclusive privilege of selling their lovely secluded country estate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chatterton: I will now quote from an editorial which appeared in The Province of December 16 last. It says:

> But many Canadians, including thousands of veterans who fought for their country and to whom the flag has a special meaning, want to retain Canada's red ensign.
> It was good enough to fight for and for some of our comrades to give their lives for, the veterans say. Leave the flag alone.

Here is another letter from one of my constituents—a former Liberal, incidentally, who has changed his political affiliations since the flag issue arose—and I quote in part:

> —a desire to cater, for purely political reasons, to Quebec with its large degree of political influences...Does Pearson, after all the good work he has done, want to be known as the "great disrupter"?

The writer of that letter referred to Mr. Mackenzie King going down in history as the "great appeaser" and then refers to the Prime Minister being known as the "great disrupter". Here is a letter from a chap for whom I have a very high regard; he is very active in the Legion:

> I enclose copy of my letter to the Prime Minister regarding the flag question, the implications of which, in my view, are far deeper and more sinister than many people realize...
> I think this vicious thing should be fought against with every fibre of our being.

I have a great many other letters. Here is one from a young Canadian 16 years old:

> I always felt that Canada had a flag. It is the red ensign that is recognized around the world as Canada's flag. Do we have a justifiable reason for changing this flag? There must be a reason, one might say.

And so on. The fourth argument I have used is that people feel very strongly on this question of the Canadian red ensign. I am not one of those that say it must be the Canadian red ensign or nothing. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I have been severely criticized in my riding by some of my people for not taking that stand. But this is not the attitude we on this side of the chamber take. I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle put forward a very reasonable proposal with great sincerity when he said that we on this side are anxious somehow to arrive at a consensus on the question of a flag that will be accepted by members on all sides of the house; not just by the people of Quebec but the people from the other parts of Canada.

My last argument in support of the subamendment is that if this flag went through on the present basis, a great many Canadians would not accept it. Again, Mr. Speaker, I have many letters from individuals and groups indicating this stand. How can you introduce a flag in a manner whereby a large number of people will not accept it? Surely the government must realize this is the way people feel in some parts of Canada, and surely this must be cause for reconsideration by the government of their position. I know they are in a difficult position. In my view, this plebiscite with the four questions to be asked is an alternative. In view of the whole situation at the moment, I believe it is an alternative that might get us out of the mess in which this government has put the country. It is one alternative. I personally tend to favour the proposal made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I am not going so far as he went. He laid down four principles which could be contained in the terms of reference of the committee. I do not go so far as to say that those necessarily should be the terms of reference; I think they might be ones the committee could be asked to consider. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the flag which the committee might recommend need not necessarily conform in all respects to the four principles laid down by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. However, I think his proposal indicates that we are prepared to get together and see if we can arrive at a consensus on this question.

Two of my French colleagues on this side of the house have approached me in regard to the flag. I know they have become concerned about the position in which we find ourselves. They came to me with two flags and asked how I would react to them, knowing that I come from red ensign country. One of these flags did not have the union jack on it, although it bore some resemblance to it. I told both these gentlemen that if there was any kind of reasonable unanimity for such a flag in, say, an all-party committee, or for either one of those two flags, I would go for it; I would sell it in my own riding. I would do this, provided there was reasonable unanimity in the committee that considered these designs. It will be hard for me to do this, but for the sake of unity I would accept such a decision of the committee and sell it to my people, although I would be strongly criticized by a certain group. That indicates that we are prepared to find some solution. We have considered the matter, and I am sure the government must now have realized that we on this side are serious about it. Every hon. member who has spoken—and this applies to both sides—has spoken with sincerity and conviction. But this is a serious question and the government must realize that they must change their position. If they do not accept the suggestion of holding a plebiscite they should consider the idea of a committee such as that suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton). I am sure that even some of those on this side who have extreme feelings about the question will make an honest effort to find common ground so that this present divisive action of the government can be stopped and the people of Canada can get together and find a symbol acceptable to the majority of them. This would at least not create the strong feelings which have been aroused by the present action of this government.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, I was not unaware that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) was going to speak on this subject. He wrote me a note yesterday and told me so. He said there was nothing personal in it but he was going to make some comments which would require some answers. I must say I am a little bit surprised at the turn his remarks took in the early part of his speech but I will answer his questions.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I am one of the less partisan politicians in this house, and I try to be so in my remarks both in this chamber and in committee. First of all, let me say that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is quite right when he says I have been a supporter of and believer in the red ensign, and I make no apologies for that. For many years I was under the impression that this was our flag, and I have so answered when I have been queried on the subject.

As I say, I acknowledge and take full responsibility for what I said in the letters which he so helpfully produced on the floor of this house. However, I must point out that when this matter of a national flag for Canada became a great national issue I very soon became aware, as did a great many other members of this house, of the need for looking far beyond my own personal feelings, and I became aware of the need for taking a long term, detached view of this whole matter. When I did this and I had reached my own conclusion I lost no time in placing my thoughts and my views before the public in every way possible.

The people who live in Victoria are certainly in no doubt whatever as to what are my views on this point, and I have been exceedingly heartened by their reaction to my statements. I am not pretending that in Victoria public reaction is not divided on this issue, but by and large the Victorians, as I would expect, are taking a tolerant, restrained and understanding approach to this whole matter. I feel that I am competent to speak for them in this regard because I too, apart from being their member, get a fair amount of correspondence from my constituents.

I believe that many people who live in Victoria and who live across this land, now that they understand what are the proposals and have thought about the matter for a while, have changed their minds on this issue. They, like myself, have no fixed, immovable views on this matter, and certainly the volume and the content of my mail on this subject of the flag shows this to be true. In this regard I would thank the people of Victoria very much for corresponding with me on this matter and for giving me their views.

The hon. member made some reference to the fact that we are servants of the public in trying to point out what the people in our ridings are thinking. I should like to comment on that, but I notice it is now five o'clock, so may I call it five o'clock and continue with my speech at eight o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SECURITY PROCEDURES AND INVESTIGATIONS

On the order:

Resuming debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Orlikow: "That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations".

[Mr. Groos.]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, could this be allowed to stand?

Mr. MacNaught: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I can understand standing motions which have not been presented, as has been done on a number of occasions; but once a motion has been dealt with and is in the hands of the house, what is the rule or the custom? I understand that the rules committee determined that we would spend a limited amount of time on this type of thing. I see that there are 40 minutes remaining on this particular motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member referring to No. 123?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is why the Chair asked for the unanimous consent of the house. That is the only basis on which we could stand it, and I understand there was unanimous agreement that it be stood.

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry; I thought it was at the request of the government.

Mr. MacNaught: No; I said "By unanimous consent".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE GUARANTEE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA

The house in committee on Bill No. S-37, respecting The Guarantee Company of North America—Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie)—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Name in French.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie (Mr. Watson) could give us a few explanations on this bill?

[Text]

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, the sole purpose of this bill is to add a French version to the name of The Guarantee Company of North America. The French version of the name is La Garantie, Compagnie d'Assurance de l'Amérique du Nord. That is the only reason for the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Chairman, in 1964, this company wants to obtain a French name. Why is that need felt today? Is it because they are aware of the awakening in Quebec since our group has been sitting in the House of Commons, as a separate group from the province of Quebec striving to have recognized the need for the French language as well as the English language? That may be one of the factors which has prompted this company to introduce this bill. That may also be the reason why this company wishes to have a French Canadian name.

There may be other factors which have some influence in that respect, namely that this North American insurance company is thinking about the possibility of developing in the province of Quebec—since they realize the existence of that nationalist trend in the province and all across Canada—in order to have rewarding operations. Maybe they think that if they print a French name on their letterhead, on statements of accounts and insurance policy forms, they will have more customers, because all that would indicate they are a Canadian company.

When there is money at stake, companies go to work. I am not against that change in name. We must even be happy to see that an English company wishes to have a French name.

We are the ones, the Créditistes, who said that we would block all bills coming from the Senate. I think we must adhere to that principle, because we say that the Senate has no right to block bills like the one concerning the bank of British Columbia, as requested by Premier Bennett, that is a bank which would enable the government of British Columbia to be master in its own house.

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member who will admit, I am sure, that the reference he is making to another bill has absolutely no relevancy with the matter now before us.

Mr. Plourde: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that only to explain our objections to Bill No. S-37 now before us.

That is the reason why we object to the third reading of this bill. We are prepared to let it pass second reading today, in the hope that the Senate will soon decide to send us the bill we are expecting and which we want to discuss, namely the bill concerning the bank of British Columbia.

Now, if this company, established many years ago, feels that it needs a French name, we are delighted and we will permit this bill to be read a second time, but you may be sure that we shall oppose the motion for third reading. We shall oppose it, even though we are not against the bill itself, but we shall do this as a protest against the decision taken by the Senate respecting another bill.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, prior to the passing of the first clause of this bill, I should like to say that I think the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie should give us more explanations. I understand that The Guarantee Company of North America wishes, by means of this bill, to add a French name to the one it already has.

I am wondering if it only wants to make a change so as to have a French name or if it also wants to have a management that would satisfy the needs of French Canadians?

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, I can answer this question. The directors as well as the shareholders of this company are all Canadians. With regard to the company's employees, I believe the French Canadians are in the majority, accounting for 51 or 52 per cent of the personnel.

This company has always been a truly Canadian company. I have been informed that the greatest part of its business is done within the province of Quebec.

I agree with the hon. member for Chapleau and with the members of his party, that we should all be happy at this company's decision to add a French version to its name.

In reply to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Plourde), I am pleased to say that the house has read the bill a second time and that it has been approved by the committee on miscellaneous private bills. I hope that the hon. member for Quebec West will realize that this bill was approved by the committee on miscellaneous private bills well before he made his statement on the bills coming from the Senate.

That is why I think that our friends could let this bill pass without going back on the principles which they set forth several days ago.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Laprise: I thank the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie

(Mr. Watson) for his explanations and I congratulate him for the effort he is making to speak French. I hope the company which is adding a French name to the one it has in English will make the same kind of effort, but I cannot help wondering a little why it had to wait until 1964 before considering that a French name might improve its image.

As the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Plourde) pointed out, it could be due to the fact that, for the past couple of years there has been a French Canadian upsurge in the province of Quebec, with people getting together to ask for more French, not only in the federal administration, but within Canadian companies that are doing business with us and offering us their services.

So, Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the hon. member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie and the hon. member for Quebec West have said and I congratulate the company for having thought of giving itself a French name. I hope it will show the same attitude in all its initiatives concerning French Canadians and that it will give them the opportunity of doing business with it in the language of their choice.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

[Text]

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? Now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): No, Mr. Speaker. On the same principle, we refuse to have the bill read today for the third time and we ask that it be referred to the committee for study.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. Plourde: Nay.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CONGREGATION OF THE MARIST SISTERS

The house in committee on Bill No. S-38, to incorporate Congregation of the Marist Sisters—Mr. Dubé—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Chairman, as you can see from the title, the purpose of Bill No. S-38 which I have the honour to sponsor is to incorporate the Congregation of the Marist Sisters.

The congregation was founded in France on December 8, 1824. Its present field of action covers 11 countries, including Canada and more particularly the county of Madawaska in New Brunswick.

That religious congregation has always done some fine work. The Marist Sisters look after the education of the young, the ailing, the orphans and the aged and they do social and mission work. In other words, they spend their whole lives serving humanity. As outlined in section 4, the purpose of the bill is to enable the congregation to continue its work which includes the provision of educational facilities, the establishment of orphanages, convents and hospitals and to provide the congregation with the proper legal powers in that connection.

I think the hon. members will be pleased to grant its request which has already been endorsed by the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to approve the passage of this bill, namely the incorporation of the Congregation of the Marist Sisters.

As the sponsor of the bill said, that congregation was founded in France in 1824 and now it has members in 11 countries, which shows that it is in demand because of all the services it renders to society.

According to the provisions of section 4, one realizes that the community does its magnificent work at the request of various dioceses. According to the bill, it would have its headquarters in Hull. It is a central place and I think that the government will be able to give financial assistance to this community in order to establish an orphanage. There are too many youths and old people in Canada who lack the necessities of life and live in substandard housing. It would be a good thing if a building for the aged were built on behalf of those nuns who devote all their lives to the service of others.

Under section 6, they will be authorized to purchase and own property. It is quite normal for a congregation to own the land and building where it is performing its good work. If the corporation is not authorized to own its land and its building, how can it be expected to develop.

Therefore, I congratulate that corporation for having submitted this request and we have no objection to third reading of this bill, since our group does not have five but only four members. We do not want to delay indefinitely the passing of this bill, even if it comes from the Senate, because it has priority over certain bills presented last week.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to add a few words to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Quebec West, but I do not intend to kill this bill, far from it. I am in favour of the bill to incorporate the Congregation of the Marist Sisters. I am in favour of it, because such congregations are needed in the country and the province of Quebec and I also know that other similar congregations are needed throughout the world.

The sponsor of the bill told us that this congregation was founded in France in 1824. Since then, other congregations, for women or men, have been established with the purpose of assisting the sick and dispensing their services in the fields of education and others.

Even if there has been an evolution in the fields of education and hospital care, we still have a great need, in our country, for those people who dedicate themselves, day and night, to the welfare of their brothers and sisters, in short their fellow citizens.

Mr. Chairman, we do not want to kill the bill but rather have it passed, and we want to congratulate all those who, by any means whatsoever, have contributed to the setting up of that congregation.

The bill was examined by the Senate first and then referred to us. However, there is one thing we cannot accept: that the Senate of Canada, whose members are not elected but appointed, should take it upon itself to make a selection among the measures submitted to it, that is passing some and rejecting others. Mr. Speaker, we cannot tolerate such an attitude and that is why we ask all those who submitted private bills to the Senate and are waiting for them to be passed to exert pressure on the Senate so that it will pass them as soon as possible—

The Chairman: Order. Once again I am sure the hon. member will understand that he cannot go on as he is doing now because his remarks must deal only with the provisions of the bill under consideration.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I will conclude my remarks on Bill No. S-38 by saying that I agree with the sponsor of the bill and that I commend the persons mentioned in section 1, who will constitute the first board of directors of this corporation, for their initiative. I wish them every success and I hope they will get the co-operation they expect from everyone.

[Text]

Mr. Scott: I just want to place on the record an indication of the support of our party for this worth-while organization. We are impressed with what the sponsor has said and we are glad to lend our support.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 16—Territorial powers.

Mr. Olson: Before the last clause carries, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I notice the corporation is asking authority to pursue its objectives and exercise its rights and powers in any part of Canada. I note also that under clause 1, which we have passed, the directors are all residents of the city of Edmunston in the province of New Brunswick, and that the head office is to be in Hull, Quebec. I wonder if the sponsor of this bill could tell us why the head office is to be in Hull when all the directors seem to be from Edmundston, and I presume that is where this organization intends to carry out the functions set out in this bill.

Mr. Dubé: The head office is in Edmundston now. I believe the sisters intend to move the head office to Hull, Quebec, and that would be the purpose of the change.

MEOTA PIPE LINES LTD.

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. S-39, an act to incorporate Meota Pipe Lines Ltd.—Mr. Nugent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Acadia authorized by the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill to proceed with it?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Yes.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-39, to incorporate Meota Pipe Lines Ltd.

Mr. Scott: Could we have a word of explanation?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): As has been customary, a group of Canadian citizens, all residents of Edmonton, Alberta, are coming before parliament to ask for the incorporation of Meota Pipe Lines Ltd. The purpose of this company is to build a pipe line from southeastern Saskatchewan to southwestern Manitoba. Since the pipe line crosses a provincial boundary, the company must take out a federal charter. They propose to build 22 miles of pipe line, something in the neighbourhood of four inches in diameter, depending upon the size of the market available for natural gas. The pipe line is to be constructed from Gainsborough, Saskatchewan, to Melita, Manitoba.

I might add also that in asking for second reading, Mr. Speaker, it is a well established practice that bills of this nature are referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. The proposed president and general manager of the company, as well as other persons involved, are fully prepared to appear before that committee and give in greater detail the reasons for requesting this charter. If the company is fortunate enough to secure a charter, it will then have to appear before the national energy board as well as the conservation boards of the provincial governments involved. The rates to be charged, of course, are set by the provinces. The company will then have to secure a charter from Melita, Manitoba, in order to sell natural gas in that town.

The main object of this company is to transmit gas from Gainsborough to southwestern Manitoba in the hope that a market can be developed for this Canadian product. I might add that the people involved are all Canadian citizens and Canadian capital will be used to build the line and develop the market for this Canadian product for the greater convenience of southwestern Manitoba, which is not now served with natural gas.

If there are any further questions I shall do my best to answer them in the hope that we can proceed with this bill. I would say to those who feel they cannot pass bills of this nature in this house, that the bill will be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and the officials will be called to give detailed answers to any further questions hon. members might have. The bill will then come back to the house for third reading.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I just want to say on behalf of our party that we have no objection to sending this bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for further detailed study. It is well known that this procedure is followed. At that time the officers or petitioners, if I may call them that, for this charter will appear before the committee. Hon. members will have the opportunity of interrogating them and getting all the technical details with regard to what they propose to do with the charter.

I feel I should say one more thing. It is the practice for small oil and gas companies in western Canada to find the gas and then attempt to find markets for it. This is something that goes on all over Alberta and Saskatchewan. It would be fair to say we have dozens of pipe lines leading from the smaller gas fields to towns, villages and cities all over western Canada. This has been beneficial to the people who have developed gas wells and risked their capital to find those fields and develop them. It has always been beneficial to some of the smaller towns and villages which otherwise would never have had an opportunity to enjoy the use of natural gas. In this particular case it happens that between the gas fields and the town which will be using the gas will be a provincial boundary, and as the sponsor of the bill, or the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) speaking for him, has indicated, it is necessary therefore that the company should receive a federal charter.

There is nothing unusual about setting down a four inch pipe line for 20, 30, or 50 miles so that people farming along the way may have the benefits of natural gas in their homes or in their farms and also to provide for the needs of a small town which otherwise would not have the benefits of natural gas. It is somewhat unusual that a company must come to parliament because the line crosses a provincial border, but on behalf of this party I would recommend that the bill be sent to committee for detailed study since the arrangement underlying it is a common practice all over the western provinces.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, August 6, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Konantz for the second reading of Bill No. S-6 to incorporate the Bank of Western Canada.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Before this motion is passed I should like to say a word or two. We who come from western Canada naturally have a keen interest in the establishment of a bank which might bring a great deal of benefit to us.

I may say that the world of banking has been the subject of a great deal of interest over the years on the part of western farmers generally. The banks have had a long history of opening up their vast resources to farmers, only to foreclose their loans or call for their money at the worst possible times, to the detriment of their customers. This has been the history of banking in western Canada as far as farmers generally are concerned. In recent years, it is true, many farmers have been able to take advantage of loans guaranteed by the government and in these circumstances the banks have probably been more lenient.

As I say, the people of western Canada have taken a deep interest in the banking world. It may be of passing interest to note that banking and finance have been of particular interest to the province of Alberta, from which I come, for the past 30 years. This is probably why I picked up my ears when I heard some months ago that a bank called the Bank of Western Canada was to be established. In continuation of this interest I read the reports of the committee of the Senate with regard to this bank. I must say I was somewhat shocked to find that the only thing which was western about this bank was the name. Control, it seems, would rest in Toronto. The Senate banking and commerce committee was told that the purpose of the bank would be to help finance operations in western Canada and to aid small businessmen in western Canada. It was even suggested the company would build a couple of branch offices in Alberta and, I think, in one or two of the other western provinces.

This house is fully aware that many small businessmen are not able to do their banking in the larger cities. As one who represents a rural area outside Calgary I was particularly interested to learn whether this bank proposed to make any effort to aid the people I represent. I came to the conclusion after reading the report of the Senate committee, that the bank was simply masquerading under the name of "The Bank of Western Canada"—that control, and probably its interests, would lie in Toronto and in eastern Canada. It is for this reason I hesitate to see the bill pass readily this afternoon without anything further being said about it. I certainly hope it will be referred to the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons so that we can take another close look at the distribution of shares. I am told that since this matter came before the Senate committee on banking and commerce there has been a reshuffling of the ownership of these shares.

The company is asking this parliament for a great privilege. It is asking for a charter to operate a bank in Canada. This is a monopoly given to only a few, and while I support the principle that there should be more banks operating in Canada under federal charter I am somewhat dubious concerning this particular bank because of the attempt to masquerade under the name of "The Bank of Western Canada". If they had called it "The Bank of Toronto" I might have been less suspicious. Perhaps that name would have involved duplication. But why did they not choose another name? Perhaps they could have called it the "Bank of Eastern Canada". It would I think have been more appropriate for this group, and I would see less reason for hesitating about granting this charter. A person who tries to masquerade under a false name is always the object of some suspicion, and perhaps that is why I am suspicious of this particular company asking us to grant them a charter to operate under the Bank Act, together with other banks.

As I say, they are asking us for a valuable monopoly and we have every right to inquire closely into the ownership of this company to find out whether it will be Canadian and whether it will remain in Canadian hands. I should like to see the ownership in as many hands as possible rather than in only a few hands. From the reports of the Senate committee it appears that by and large three people will have a controlling interest in this venture. I have no objection to ownership by three people, but I wish it were 300. We would then have more people able to share in the benefits of the monopoly. This house should always concern itself greatly about the granting of monopolies. Monopolies give tremendous power to the companies benefiting by them.

I will end by saying that I wish the mover of this bill would say that it is proposed to refer it to the standing committee of the House of Commons on banking and commerce for further examination.

Mrs. Konantz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Among the 100 names that have been submitted as petitioners is listed the name of W. G. Konantz. I would like the house to know that W. G. Konantz is my son; he is an independent businessman; I have no interests in his financial arrangements at all, and I have no pecuniary interest in this bank. In order to alleviate any fears of hon. members of this house, Mr. Speaker, I will not vote on this bill when a vote is taken in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill No. S-6, to comment more particularly on some of the reasons why those large companies enjoy very special privileges which any other company is unable to get.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate on this bill, I would like to make a few observations on the Canadian banking system, especially on the control which financial interests can exercise on the economy of the country and also, directly, on the personal life of every Canadian citizen, depending on the good will of those gentlemen, the bank managers, who control our lives by the decisions they make.

It should be noted that those bank managers often meet and are quite in agreement when they attend board meetings of electric power, textile, paper, railways, tobacco or wheat trusts, to mention only those and, of course, they are all members of the ultra-secret Canadian bankers association. It is there that finance and the economy of trade and industry are controlled; it is there that low salaries and high prices are established.

There are eight banks in Canada and the four most powerful control 80 per cent of all Canadian business. All the branches, 5,600 of them, with ramifications throughout Canada, are the faithful and affiliated skimmers which reap everywhere, for the benefit of the central bank, the outcome of the people's labours.

The cause of every economic crisis, war and sudden change of capital is to be found there, rather than in the so-called deficiencies of international trade. If bankers are so powerful, it is because they have the exclusive power to create money as they need it, while all other citizens of the country must work to earn a living, and deprive themselves in order to save a little. They eventually get into debt with those institutions because even sovereign governments are under their yoke.

It is almost impossible for honest citizens to go up in the world of wealth because all millionaires made their money through flagrant and immoral injustices, company and bank acts which the governments use to give the directors of those institutions exclusive privileges, unmatched power to the disadvantage of the other institutions or individuals in the country, to the disadvantage of society and governments themselves.

The taxation system itself, as set up today by the governments and the municipalities, also favours the wealthy and the powerful to the disadvantage of the poor, the little fellow and the weak. Should not the governments, bodies of society to serve society, protect the weak as well as the strong?

Therefore, I ask all the very rich people, the small and big capitalists in 1964, to assess to what extent they have been, in some way, exceptionally favoured by those three major discriminatory institutions of modern society, the Bank Act, the company legislation and the fiscal legislation.

It will appear abundantly clear to the millionaires, the wealthy and the well-off people that their wealth was derived more or less from those three major injustices; it is their responsibility, therefore, to contribute, according to their means, to the readjustment of society, in order to restore a proper balance on the social, national, personal and family plan.

And you, the poor and underprivileged Canadians, do not think that this money will be given to you for nothing. Society will just allow you to take advantage, through a social readjustment, of the share you were unfairly deprived of in the past.

It is to be noted that banks are sound and good as well as useful and necessary institutions, but one must also recognize that one of the laws on bank credit constitutes one of the three great legal injustices of modern times. We do not have to demolish everything but to correct and better those institutions. Reforms are necessary if those institutions are to be adapted to the new conditions which they have themselves created, but until a competent authority puts the house in order, it is still better to respect the existing disorder than create complete disorder by revolt and anarchy.

For instance, an application for the setting up of a provincial bank has been rejected by the Senate.

The Senate has turned down a bill respecting a provincial bank and it wants to approve a bill sponsored by a few private individuals. The Senate is ready to give a charter to individuals, to private institutions, but it denies it to a province. A province deserves as much consideration as a few individuals—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he cannot refer, as he does at the present time, to procedures of the other house.

Mr. Latulippe: Far be it from me to make bitter criticism to appeal to the passions of the people. I merely wish to examine the facts of which the people are unaware and to explain what should be and what the people want. Studies improve one's mind, expands one's horizons and add to one's stature. To be practical, we will indicate a logical, social and legal way of carrying out such a reform in an orderly and peaceful fashion.

Consequently, I take the liberty of saying that the banks put out credit money and cheque money which are used by the people as instruments of exchange just as if they were legal tender. In other words, they are nothing but legalized bogus money. The banks have the power to increase the money supply by creating credit money.

They lend to themselves large amounts they create out of nothing and that is where they hold an advantage over those who must save to accumulate capital.

Pope Pius XI was clearsighted. Did he not say in an encyclical:

> What strikes us at the present time is the tremendous and discretionary power in the hands of a small number of individuals, this power is especially formidable among those who are the absolute masters of money, controlling credit according to their discretion.

They are infusing blood in the economic system which rests in their hands so that without their consent nobody could survive. The strongest alone still stand, that is the most aggressive and unscrupulous ones.

Therefore, we stated our reform proposals on many occasions and we repeat them: take away from the banks the issuance of credit money and the sovereign authority shall resume its role concerning the issuance of money, of all the money required for trade.

The real money based on the large production of Canada, plentiful, based on man, on his trading requirements and on his production capacities. We must therefore restore justice, make a distribution of ill-gotten gains and then set up an economic system to preserve justice and maintain a balance between social classes for the general welfare of mankind.

I am a member of the parliament of Canada in Ottawa. What does that mean?

In my riding of Compton-Frontenac, I am the representative of 22,000 voters, and of the 45,000 citizens who actually live in my riding.

To live, those 45,000 citizens need money every day, every month, every year.

That money that citizens of my riding need so badly is not manufactured in my riding, by any citizen of my riding nor in any other riding. In my riding the citizens produce all kinds of commodities for other citizens of the community; they make furniture, cheese, houses, churches, schools, roads, but no one manufactures money.

All across the land seven million citizens manufacture all kinds of things required by human people for their living in Canada, but no one can manufacture the money that all citizens need so badly to purchase the goods and services required for their subsistence.

The issuing of money is reserved to the Bank of Canada, as regards notes in circulation, which total approximately $2.2 billion, and since that amount cannot meet the circulation requirements and the need for exchange on the part of the people, private banks have been authorized to create some sort of credit money, script money, bookkeeping money, accounting money, money which cannot be seen with the naked eye, a permission which those private banks have used to the extent of over $17 billion, and that is eight times more money than the Bank of Canada supplies.

The result is that our eight private banks, taking advantage of this exclusive privilege to create money and all forms of capital, have seen their directors become board members of the 800 largest companies on the stock market.

That is why this kind of business may tempt newcomers, that is why we are being faced with applications for three new banks in Canada.

Must we accept or must we reject those three applications? Are we going to allow an increase in the number of companies and banks which are taking unfair advantage of the public through those money-making privileges, in the form of credit of all kinds, money, capital shares and bond privileges?

Personally, I do not think so. At least not as long as there is no control on the circulation of money in the interest of the people, of all people, of all citizens, of the 19,200,000 citizens of Canada, who are suffering hardship on account of the money control and the scarcity of this money so useful in everyday life.

For a long time the top sociologists of the whole world have been talking of an exclusive control of money and credit by bankers and capitalists. For many years economists have been asking for a better distribution of wealth and revenue among all the citizens of each country, according to its productive capacity.

For a long time too, people have been talking about the rights of many, but those rights remain a dead letter in the statutes, and never to be reflected in figures in our economy.

It remains to be decided, here in Canada, in this very parliament and once for all, whether we should let the whole people work and suffer for the benefit of a few profiteers who exploit everyone's labour, or whether we should control the situation and, at last, authorize the government, or the Bank of Canada, to control all issuing of money, credit, shares and bonds, representing the true assets produced and exchanged by and among the people. We have to decide that we approve profits derived from capital invested in banks and companies, but in keeping with the welfare of human beings and families. This has to be realized and corrected before we go any further, in Canada, with the founding of new banks—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the question to be raised at 10.30 o'clock p.m. this day is as follows: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan); air transport—provision of direct service from Nova Scotia to Bermuda.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Speaker, we were discussing the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) who put some questions to me during his address. I wish he was here so he could hear my reply.

He was inferring in his remarks that in view of the various polls that he had seen printed in the newspapers, and as a result of various letters he had received from constituents in his riding, perhaps I was being guided by someone other than those in my riding, or by my own views. I should like to clarify this position at this time.

I have made my stand on the flag issue quite clear and have let everyone in my riding know my feeling. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, when this issue comes to a vote it will be a free vote.

In reference to the matter of polls, so far as I recall there were three taken in my riding. I should like to make some explanation in this regard. One poll was conducted by the Victoria Daily Times. The figures my hon. friend used, almost three to one in favour of the red ensign, are absolutely correct. In fairness however to the people who marked their ballots in that poll and to the newspaper itself, I think I should point out that this poll started on the very day the new flag was made public. The poll began on May 20, lasting until May 29 and its results were published on May 30. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, during most of that time the actual proposals of the government were not known. It was not until May 26 they were made public in this house and May 27 that they appeared in the newspapers in Victoria. In all fairness to those who marked their ballots I must say they were not aware of the exact proposals as no mention had been made of the second part of the government resolution, namely the adoption of the union jack as the commonwealth flag. There was only a very vague reference in the newspaper to what the new flag would look like.

The second poll was one which appeared in a newspaper published on Mondays, the Victoria Observer. On the front page of that newspaper there appeared a cutout clipping to be sent to the member of parliament, and it was addressed to me. That clipping suggested in the last line: Please use your influence to ensure the retention of the union jack in the new flag.

As a result of that clipping, Mr. Speaker, I had no more and no less than 24 sent to me in my office. That fact would indicate that this newspaper has either a low circulation or that the thought contained in the clipping did not appeal strongly to very many people. I suggest, sir, that this is not a newspaper which has a low circulation.

Referring again to the poll conducted by the Victoria Daily Times, it might be worth noting also that this is one of three new daily newspapers, with coverage over the entire island and part of the mainland. It covers four complete ridings which are populated by some 293,000 people. Less than 4,000 people turned in ballots. Although I find the result of this poll informative to a degree, I do not think it is an absolute poll on which complete reliance should be placed. I particularly say that because there has been a subsequent poll introduced in this debate which was carried out by Gruneau Research Limited. I presume this poll took place some time during the month of July. The results of this poll were published in the Victoria Daily Colonist on August 6 and indicated that this was a survey of some 2,000 people across the country. By rough and ready reckoning, Mr. Speaker, that would appear to be about 200 people per province. It indicates that in the province of British Columbia the red ensign is favoured by 32.1 per cent, that the maple leaf flag is favoured by 29.9 per cent and another flag by 15.8 per cent. There were 17.9 per cent who did not care and 4.3 per cent who did not know. I would suggest the comparison between 32 per cent in favour of the red ensign and approximately 30 per cent in favour of the maple leaf design is not bad when one considers the new proposed flag had only been known to the public for, if I may refer to it as a sailor, a dogwatch. I think the results of this poll indicate that this flag it catching on across the country and will grow in favour once people become aware of its symbolism.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to waste much time in this regard but before I leave this question of who is guiding me I should like to point out one further fact, and this is something that has had some effect upon me, I must say. I find that the man who represented the Conservative party in the last election and who ran against me has placed his views in respect of the flag on record in a Victoria newspaper. He did so shortly after the government's proposal was made public. Mr. Chairman said:

> Many thousands of flag designs have been suggested over the past years. If this design has been deemed best, it should be adopted.
> The red ensign has been accepted as the official flag for some time now, and for most of that time all political parties have been demanding a new one that would be distinctly Canadian.
> Those who insist on a plebiscite to decide the issue are showing irresponsibility. It has been a major election platform of all major Canadian political parties for some years to adopt a new Canadian flag—surely they must represent a majority of the Canadian people.
> There has never been a better time to finalize the issue than on the eve of Canada's centenary. And Mr. Pearson, heading a minority government, cannot be criticized for trying to push it through wantonly.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say in respect of the poll question and now wish to make one or two remarks about letters that have been received. The letters I have received have not been very great in quantity and I find that to be somewhat surprising, coming as I do from Victoria where people have, as I have said before, very great affection for the union jack and for the red ensign. I would have thought that if anything would have aroused public reaction for or against, it would have been the last paragraph of my letter to the newspaper of June 10 which was referred to by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) this afternoon because, having explained what my own stand was to be on the flag, I said in that paragraph:

> Not all of these have been easy decisions to make, but I was sent to parliament to consider all aspects of proposed legislation and then to vote on behalf of all the people of Victoria. Bearing in mind both the present and the future of Canada, I firmly believe the moves I have outlined are both right and responsible, and I hope Victorians generally will agree.

That letter appeared in the weekly and daily newspapers in Victoria and as a result

I had something less than a flood of letters. Altogether since this issue came forward I have had considerably less than 200 letters or communications of one sort or another on the flag issue. Since June 10, when my letter was published in the newspaper, I do not think I have had more than 50 letters. These have by no means all been unfavourable, although I am not going to try to pretend they have all been favourable either. We know this is not an easy matter to decide. I am just pointing out the intensity of public interest and I am trying to show that as far as I can establish we have heard on this matter from considerably fewer than 5 per cent of the people who live in my riding, even if we assume that almost all of those who wrote to the newspaper and sent in their ballots come from Victoria—which they do not, of course, bearing in mind once again the wide distribution of this newspaper.

I should like to leave that point for a moment and go on to another matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) this afternoon when he claimed that the three maple leaves are a Liberal symbol. I just cannot accept that. I would like to pose these questions to the house. First of all, is it because it was a Liberal symbol that King George V in 1921 at the time of the government of Sir Robert Borden had the three maple leaves designated as the national emblem of Canada and incorporated these same three conjoined maple leaves in the coat of arms of Canada? I do not think so. Is it because it was a Liberal symbol that the former prime minister, now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), had three maple leaves placed on the bumper of his official car? Is it because it is a Liberal symbol that Her Majesty the Queen had the three maple leaves conjoined placed in a position of honour on her royal standard as Queen of Canada? I just do not believe so.

All these uses were made of this symbol because three conjoined maple leaves on a white background mean Canada. In my view, Mr. Speaker, it is because these three maple leaves are above politics, because they are highly respected and, I may dare to say, because they are a noble symbol that I personally find it very easy to support the flag motion, remembering all the time that the second part of the resolution calls for the retention of the union jack as the commonwealth flag. I remind hon. members that the red maple leaf, sometimes one and sometimes three, was used on the funnels of Canadian ships during world war II to distinguish them from British and Australian warships. I remember that in my own experience. I am told that today on Cyprus the three maple leaves are being painted and appear on the rocks anywhere near where Canadian soldiers are stationed. I am also told that when the defence committee visited the Atlantic coast the other day these symbols were appearing, perhaps unobtrusively but nevertheless appearing, in various spots down below in the engine rooms and boiler rooms and so forth of the ships in the Atlantic fleet.

Mr. Winch: A single maple leaf.

Mr. Groos: So I think it can be said without any fear of contradiction that the three red maple leaves also have a very firm place in the affections of our countrymen.

I want to skip over very quickly the matter of a plebiscite. My views on the plebiscite are somewhat the same as those of the mother of parliaments, where in the whole of the life of the parliament of the United Kingdom there has never been a plebiscite. We have had our own rather dismal experience here in Canada where we have had two plebiscites, I believe, neither of which was acted upon and neither of which seemed to solve anything. So this only confirms my attitude toward a plebiscite.

Deciding on a flag is a tough decision. If it were not, I suggest it is a decision which would have been made many years ago. But surely making tough decisions is our job in parliament. That is surely what we were sent here for. We cannot duck our duty by referring this matter to a committee or to the forum of public opinion in a plebiscite. I suggest that we are the biggest, most powerful and most expensive committee there is and if we cannot solve this matter I venture to say that certainly no committee can.

I should like to say something about another reason why I think this matter cannot be referred to a committee. Having regard to the length of time that this matter has been discussed in the house and with all the various ramifications and the stories we have heard about one flag or another, I believe that we ourselves are becoming somewhat confused, but we must think of how confused the public must be on this issue. I should like to point out some aspects of this confusion that have become apparent to me in my investigations, but as I will not have time to finish my address if I give them all I will confine my remarks merely to one. We have been told a lot about the red ensign and told in all sincerity, I know, of how it has been the flag under which Canadians have fought and died for a number of years, but particularly in the second world war. In my own experience I know that as far as the navy is concerned we saw little of the red ensign, unless a sailor happened to be serving in the merchant navy on a defensively equipped merchant ship. We flew the white ensign. We all know the air force flag which, incidentally, has the R.C.A.F. roundel with a maple leaf in the centre.

When it comes to the army I am on rather dangerous ground, so I took the trouble the other day to visit the national war museum. There I found some relics of Dieppe. I know there are hon. members in this house who were present on that occasion and I suppose that of all the Canadian feats of arms this is one that is remembered best as being a part of Canada. I saw hanging in our Canadian national war museum a flag. Under that flag there was this inscription:

This flag was captured by the enemy during the second Canadian division raid on Dieppe, August 19, 1942.

For nearly two years it hung, a prized trophy on the wall in the office of a German colonel there, and was then packed for shipment to Germany.

The fine loyalty of a French woman prevented this, however,

Madame Jovene, 8 rue Guerrier, Dieppe, extracted it from its packing case and concealed it until, a month later on September 1, 1944, the same second Canadian division recaptured Dieppe, when she proudly returned it to its rightful owners.

This flag, Mr. Speaker, was the union jack. I see my time is running out, but I am almost finished. Our job in this house is to legislate for Canada. Our particular problem at the moment is Canadian unity. I am looking, myself, for the kind of unity we have never had in this country. I hope that this flag will help. As I said before, we can resolve this issue and I, for one, am not unhopeful of the future. If we do not solve the difficulties of our time in our generation, then perhaps if we prepare the ground properly our young people will do so.

I do want to say one more thing, Mr. Speaker. Some reference was made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) to the fact that he was worried about the division this flag debate is causing within the country. He is frightened by the reaction. He put on the record a letter containing some reference to our fellow Canadians of French speaking origin. I will not dignify it by repeating it and having it placed in Hansard twice. He mentioned the fact a great number of Canadians are not going to accept this flag. Well, if he gets that reaction, it is not the one I get.

I should like to say that this brings up the question of who speaks for Victoria. In answer to that question I have just asked myself, I should like to read a short editorial contained in a weekly newspaper in the particular portion of my riding where I live called Oak Bay. Perhaps this indicates something of the reaction to the flag debate of the 95 per cent of the Canadians who have not been heard from so far. This editorial is written by Lance Whittaker, and it is entitled, "Who has The Right to Decide Flag Question?" I quote:

"No editorial comment from The Leader—

This is the name of this newspaper.

—on the flag?

This question has been repeated in many forms in the past two or three weeks.

The answer is simple but somehow difficult to make people believe: The editor is inhibited because he is not a Canadian.

Oh yes, he has lived in Canada for 40 years, and he was born in Britain and is a British subject...but he has never bothered to write to Ottawa to ask for that piece of paper which would make him a Canadian citizen.

Oh, I know it's only a technicality, but technicalities can be mighty important when one is arguing something as personal and close to the heart as our national flag.

All this came home rather forcibly when I sat down to write an editorial on the first announcement of Mr. Pearson's flag plans. The editorial "we" came rather lamely. When it comes to deciding a flag for a country, who is "we"? Obviously, it is those who were fortunate enough to be born in Canada, and those conscientious enough to request citizenship when citizenship was offered. The editor and publisher of The Leader is in neither of these groups. What right, then, to pontificate (under false colours) on the matter of the flag?

Oddly, when I inquired of those who have spoken to me strongly on the subject, (and there are a great many among our readers), it became clear that many making the greatest clamour are in my boat, but they do not seem to think it matters.

It matters to me.

Something else has become clear: Among those who can rightfully claim to be Canadians, by birth or citizenship, a new Canadian flag outweighs the red ensign—

These are his figures, not mine.

—about nine to one. (If you don't believe that, ask people; first ascertaining that they are Canadians.)

The desire for a distinctive flag by a large majority of the Canadians I have spoken to has nothing whatever to do with the Quebec problem. They could care less about Quebec; they are Canadians and they want a Canadian flag.

This is stupid? This is unnatural? I don't think so, and if I did think so, I have no right, as a non-Canadian, to say so.

That is why there has been no Leader editorial on the flag...but a letter has gone to Ottawa, to ask citizenship, belatedly, for a man who wants very much to become a Canadian.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Hamilton: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Groos: Certainly.

Mr. Hamilton: I understood the hon. member to say that this would be the most expensive committee that there has been. Do I understand from that the hon. member thinks our indemnity stops if we stop this debate, that the staff of the house would be dismissed and we would save money?

Mr. Groos: No, Mr. Speaker, of course that is not so. There are other things that this house might be doing.

Mr. Dinsdale: How right you are.

An hon. Member: You had better talk to your leader.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this discussion for two reasons. First of all to avail myself of a privilege of the house, and also to discharge my responsibility.

At the start of my remarks, I would be remiss not to commend my hon. friends and fellow members who described the aspirations and claims of their fellow citizens with due restraint. I shall follow in their footsteps and show as much restraint as possible, myself, in order not to change the tone of this discussion.

I would like to say, incidentally, that I agree with the views which my fellow member, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Chatterton) expressed this afternoon, when he said that our discussions in this house do not always find their true explanation over the mass media.

I agree still more with him when he says that the C.B.C., in order to speak only of one of those mass media, does not serve the people well.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ricard: I think that the manner in which the news and commentaries are given on the air frequently misrepresents what occurs in this house. I shall prove it by quoting some remarks made yesterday by a young man to whom I regularly send Hansard. This is what he said. He told me quite simply in the course of our talk: Do you know, Mr. Ricard, that I regularly read Hansard and the papers; and I hardly recognize the news as reported in the newspapers—at least in some papers, I should say—or as broadcast by the C.B.C.

That young man told me that what he read in Hansard was entirely different from what he heard on the C.B.C. newscasts and read in some newspapers.

At the beginning of my remarks, I congratulated my colleagues on this side of the house for the moderate terms they use to air their views. Most of my Anglo-Saxon colleagues in the house did not hide the fact that their constituents support the red ensign and that they feel it is their duty to speak as they do.

I must say that I have a lot of admiration and respect for them, for the courage they have shown in giving to the house the views and aspirations of their constituents, which unfortunately is not the case for the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) who said that although she represents a riding which favours the Canadian red ensign, she will not take her constituents' aspirations and views into account when she casts her vote.

I would also like to be fair towards the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) and offer him a few words of congratulations for the remarks he made yesterday. I think we must thank him for a drop in the number of interruptions which came until today from the people on the government benches who were trying to get untimely statements from us in order to keep up that campaign designed to get the public to believe, if possible, that the people on this side of the house are obstinate and will never give in.

On the contrary, all the members who have spoken on this side of the house displayed a great understanding and also stated their willingness to accept a compromise that would be reasonable for all parties concerned, so as to settle the ticklish problem concerning the national flag issue or rather the national flags, since we are talking about adopting two flags.

I said a while ago that I was rising in order to do my duty towards my constituents. I wish at the outset to state clearly the stand I must take as regards the Canadian flag, while basing myself on my constituents' aspirations and desires.

I must say that the freedom we are enjoying in our party also enables me to state that I am in favour of a national distinctive flag.

On this side of the house, our hands are not already tied by party discipline. We can voice our opinions as we please. We have the right and are free to vote as we see fit, and we also have the right to make our views known in whatever way we choose.

I regret that our hon. friends opposite do not enjoy that same freedom. If I am not mistaken, that should explain why the hon. members from the province of Quebec are not taking part in this debate. On those occasions when they did speak, they limited themselves to bitter remarks—

Mr. Plourde: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to remind the hon. member that the reason we, on this side of the house, are not saying anything on the flag issue is that our position is quite clear. We are definitely in favour of a distinctive flag and against a second flag.

That is why we refrain from speaking. We neither want to waste the time of the house nor bore the Canadian people.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, we heard the same comment last week from the hon. member who has just spoken, and yet, just this afternoon, one of his colleagues rose to speak.

Remembering a certain Good Friday, to be more specific that of 1963, I understand why some members have maintained a stubborn silence in this house. But this is not the case with us; and we are making a point of speaking as we wish in the house.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to remind the hon. member that not one of my colleagues has taken part in the flag debate today. Consequently, I suggest that he should come to the house to see who is present and who is speaking.

Moreover, the hon. member made derogatory remarks concerning an event which took place in 1963, and I ask him to withdraw those remarks.

[Text]

Mr. Smallwood: On that point of order, the hon. member said none of his colleagues had spoken. His leader said Quebec had a flag and did not want one.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all three members feel much better. Let us get on with this debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I asked that the hon. member withdraw the derogatory remarks he uttered when he referred to an event that happened during 1963.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to withdraw certain remarks if the hon. member would indicate what I implied.

Mr. Plourde: When you mentioned a certain Good Friday, and all you have said thereafter.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I regret that some particular events that happened on a certain Good Friday should bring sadness to the hon. member, but I should not be taxed with influencing his feelings. Naturally, I cannot withdraw remarks that are related to events which are not my responsibility.

A few moments ago, I said I was in favour of a distinctive flag. I have been careful not to say that I have taken a fancy to the three maple leaf flag but I am even more revolted with the way this flag was submitted to us.

Taking neither the house nor his cabinet into his confidence, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) went to Winnipeg to make his well known proposal. Even worse, when he came back from western Canada he walked into the house and said: "I have chosen a flag and I ask you to endorse it. A refusal on your part will be considered as a vote of non-confidence." Afterwards, he ordered his followers to toe the party line.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that is a dictatorial way of introducing such an important resolution which has raised such a controversy that the country is now on the verge of splitting up over the issue.

If, at least, we had been warned one way or the other, in the speech from the throne, that we would be called upon to choose a national flag this session, we would have no reason to complain since we would have known what was coming. However, there was nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate that this topic would be discussed in the course of this session.

Members on the government side claim that this legislation is being introduced to fulfil an electoral pledge. What about the other promises concerning issues just as important if not more so than the national flag?

For instance, I remember that during the last election campaign the Liberals promised full employment.

But, has any action been taken to find jobs for the 105,000 unemployed in the province of Quebec?

Among other election promises, there was the appointment of a minister of agriculture for eastern Canada in order to help eastern farmers. There was also the adoption of a labour code and the establishment of a minimum salary of $1.25 per hour. There was also the institution of a portable pension plan. All those promises have yet to be fulfilled. I could mention many other promises, but I will refrain from doing so.

For what purpose, then, was this project of a Canadian flag brought out of the blue? For a very simple purpose, Mr. Speaker. Conscious of its inertia, the government wanted to hide behind this resolution its weaknesses, its indecision and its inability to face up to its responsibilities.

This could have been overlooked if the Prime Minister had not raised the question of non-confidence. But after having done so is it at all conceivable that hon. members opposite would not fulfil their obligations toward their party? I cannot see it at all.

Mr. Speaker, it must be recognized that we are faced with a problem threatening national unity, and to substantiate my allegation, I wish to quote from a few newspaper articles which clearly prove that this legislation has given rise to serious concerns in various quarters.

I have here an article signed by Mr. Guy Cormier and published in La Presse on May 19, 1964 and entitled:

A flag or an expedient?

Having promised a flag to Canadians, Mr. Pearson is unfurling it today before an astonished or indifferent Canada.

Confused and irritated, judging by the noisy reactions to his speech delivered before the Canadian Legion in Winnipeg. Those who are unconcerned refrain from showing their feelings, as is only natural when anything is obtained after an unreasonable waiting period. A distinctive Canadian flag has been requested for a long time in the province of Quebec—

A little further on, the editor says:

The government leader proposes the maple leaf in the name of unity. One can hardly find another great virtue in the name of which he could push his proposal forward. Such unity is a wish, it is not a reality. It is less than ever a reality. Things first come into existence, then the symbols they represent are created. Mr. Pearson is proceeding by means of artificial insemination.

In its issue of May 21, 1964, the newspaper La Presse published the following article under the byline of Gérard Pelletier.

A symbol, yes, but of what?

Nobody will be led to believe that the flag issue is a major problem in Canadian politics. It is a matter which was left to deteriorate instead of being settled; it is only a matter of symbols and, whatever the solution which is adopted, this action by itself will have but little effect on our Canadian life.

That is a further proof, Mr. Speaker, that there are other and more urgent problems which have been tackled this session.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Further on, Mr. Pelletier says:

In fact, claim his supporters, it is not so much a flag that Mr. Pearson is seeking; it is a majority.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that this flag question was brought forward merely for electoral purposes. According to the various polls carried out in the name of the government, if the results had been as anticipated, you and I, Mr. Speaker, would not be here today, we would be in the midst of an election campaign. But after a while, it was found that the pill was not as good as it had been hoped for and for that reason it is intended to have only the three-leaved flag passed. However, according to the information we have, the people who sit on the government benches will refuse to change their original stand.

To give you a better idea of my village, I would like to quote from a couple of articles written by Mr. Harry Bernard, of St. Hyacinthe, in Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe of May 28, 1964. Mr. Bernard wrote, under the title

Mr. Pearson and his Canadian flag proposal

as follows:

Now, Mr. Pearson, the Prime Minister of this country, wants to give his flag to Canada, and he even claims that it is urgent.

In fact, it has been urgent for a long time, and Mr. Pearson never seemed to be too much concerned with that problem in the past.

So he has just discovered the necessity of a flag, and he insists that it should be distinctive.

And Mr. Bernard concluded:

Concerning Mr. Pearson's proposed flag which is seemingly an enlarged copy of the latest postage stamp issued in the country, it does not seem to have been well received.

It is too heavy, too decorative, too old-fashioned, not simple enough, not neat enough.

The maple leaf is acceptable as a symbol, but why should there be three leaves, and why should they be red rather than green?

And in another newspaper from St. Hyacinthe, in an article signed by Mr. Brodeur, one can read:

The Pearson versus Canadian Legion confrontation, last Sunday, in Winnipeg, reassures more or less the French speaking people entertaining some apprehensions, since the Prime Minister declared himself openly in favour of a distinctive flag. However, despite this courageous stand, the French Canadian people still feel some anxiety in connection with this symbolic emblem. They know, indeed, that the red ensign creates much unanimity in the English speaking circles and that the influence exerted by this majority may oblige the government to change its views.

And in conclusion:

To summarize, if the French speaking population cannot get satisfaction with a standard likely to inspire its patriotism, it will approach with more fervour the possibility of blowing up the bridges between the two nations.

All this to say, Mr. Speaker, that the motion has created in the general public worry and apprehension. I could quote many other editorials, but I shall limit myself to recalling an editorial which appeared in a Liberal newspaper, the Edmonton Journal, and reads in part as follows:

[Text]

This highly interesting editorial then goes on to say—and I should point out I am quoting from the Gazette, which reproduces the editorial which appeared in the Edmonton Journal—

Mr. Byrne: What date, please?

Mr. Ricard: It was June 19, 1963. Do you know when that was? No, I mean 1964.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: This editorial in the Edmonton Journal says this:

It should be pointed out that Quebec can expect no more concessions of this magnitude.

This is a Liberal paper saying this. The other day in one of the French language newspapers those words were attributed to one of my hon. friends, because he has quoted them. That is why we say that some of the publicity given this debate is not correct. Those words were not the words of my hon. friend from Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko); they were the words of the Edmonton Journal.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Ricard: With pleasure when I am through. However, I still have many things to say.

We are accused, Mr. Speaker, of filibustering.

[Text]

Mr. Byrne: Can you do anything else?

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: I think that this systematic campaign of whispering with a view to discouraging speakers from talking, is starting over again and that these people will have to be called to order.

I would ask particularly to the hon. member for Kootenay East who has just interrupted me—

[Text]

If the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) has so much to say, why does he not stand up and tell us what is his position with regard to the proposal which is before us? How is he going to vote on the first part of the resolution? How is he going to vote on the second part of the resolution? I should like to ask the same question of the members from the province of Quebec. Let them stand up and tell us how they are going to vote, because we are anxious to know. I see two ministers here from the province of Quebec. We are very much interested in knowing what is going to be their stand. Let them stand up and say something, because we would be interested to hear them.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked me how I am going to vote. I have not spoken on this matter but I would be very interested to know how the hon. member is going to vote and what he stands for. Is he going to support a distinctive flag for Canada? If he is, then why does he not sit down? He is saying nothing.

Mr. Ricard: Is it any wonder that no one else but the hon. gentleman can say something here, because he thinks he has a monopoly on intelligence.

[Translation]

Since the beginning of this debate, Mr. Speaker, we have been accused of filibustering—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: Who made those accusations? Those who do not have the courage to rise in this house and indicate their position. Their consciences bother them and they do not have enough courage to rise and express their feelings.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to remind you that you have only 10 minutes left for your speech.

Mr. Sauvé: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Ricard: I will pay in his own coin my hon. friend who has been so kind to me when I asked a question recently. When I am finished with my speech, I will answer his question, but not now.

Mr. Sauvé: I cannot understand the statement of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I think I answered his question concerning feed grain.

Mr. Ricard: The minister should at least understand that he should wait until the end of my speech.

Mr. Sauvé: I rose three or four times to answer your questions.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had remarked in French a few minutes ago that the hon. member had only ten more minutes under our rules, and I think he should have full and ample opportunity to finish his speech.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I have been interrupted a good many times, and I trust you will deduct the time which has been taken as a result.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, we are being accused of wanting to divide this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: We are being accused of delaying the proceedings of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, we must always be a little patient with our hon. friends opposite. Since they cannot speak, they have to do something and I think we should let them make a bit of noise. Let us be patient and allow them to make noise with their hands, which is just as good as if they were using their mouths.

Who conducts the business of parliament in this house, if not the government?

The whole responsibility for the march of events in the house rests upon the government. If the government, and I am not the only one to say so, brought forward this measure at an inauspicious moment, it must take the responsibility for it and not try to shift upon the opposition the odium of its blunder. The members of the government are the only responsible—

Mr. Rochon: The flag is our responsibility, yes it is true.

Mr. Ricard: It is the government which has the responsibility—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Ricard: Take all the time you need. I see the hon. member for Laval; like the others, the only thing he can do is interject from his seat. Stand up. How are you going to vote on the second resolution?

Mr. Rochon: The first resolution not the second one is being discussed now.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, could I direct a question to the hon. member who has asked me the same question twice? I would like to answer his first question—

Mr. Ricard: Later, Mr. Speaker. We saw that as soon as the flag issue was introduced, all the newspapers in the pay of the Liberal party started their campaign and right away we, in the Conservative party, were accused of indulging in a filibuster.

And yet, we had not expressed our views in the house.

These are the Liberal tactics which consist of setting the east against the west as that party has always done.

I will give you, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ricard: I will give you evidence of what I am saying—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Mercier is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, since the member who has the floor is speaking in French, I know that it is difficult for you at times to follow the debate closely and every point of his speech, but would you kindly call the hon. member to order, because his comments have nothing to do with the subamendment.

Mr. Ricard: If the hon. member had been in the house yesterday, he would have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce deliver a speech which was completely irrelevant to the subamendment.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair must take its own responsibility in respect of whether a member, in its opinion, is in order or not. I admit that the hon. member has been making some very general statements. Nevertheless, from time to time it seems to me his main thesis has been and is in respect of the design of the flag.

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order raised by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the hon. member is casting a reflection on the Chair's ability to understand in both languages.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I do possess the ability to understand speeches in both languages. I am sure I understand English better than that hon. member understands French. I am able to follow what hon. members are saying in both languages, and I am proud to say so. The remark made by the hon. member just points out his ignorance.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Well, bully for you.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that hon. members opposite advocate a policy of disunity. I am going to prove it, because I have here a sheet from the newspaper Le Clairon of St. Hyacinthe, in which the Liberal party published on April 4, 1963, that is, during the election campaign, the following advertisement:

Let us prepare the future of our children.

This ad read as follows:

The right to education is a fundamental right, but the Conservatives would only grant it to the English people.

That is how the Liberal party has always tried to divide the country.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ricard: That is the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This debate is on the subamendment, but as it is now ten minutes after nine, I regret to say to the hon. member that his time is up.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot allow me a question?

Mr. Ricard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that I have been cut off before my time was up.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house willing to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, as I note that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot does not intend to go on with his speech, could I ask him a question now?

[Text]

Mr. Ricard: My time is up.

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise in the house on this occasion. I should first like to congratulate the many fine speakers who have spoken in this house in respect of the subamendment. I certainly do not agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) when he refers to these speeches as part of a filibuster. I do agree with the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) when he said that he believed, rightly or wrongly, that everyone who has taken part in this debate has done so with sincerity and integrity. I believe these people represent the constituents for whom they have spoken. I do not agree with the unreasonable statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have sat throughout this debate and listened to some very fine and educational remarks in reference to this subamendment.

Mr. Speaker, last week I was invited to participate in a very wonderful ceremony in my constituency. This ceremony was in fact the official opening of a powwow on the Thunderchild Indian reservation. I was amazed at what took place during this ceremony, and a great deal went through my mind when I saw the R.C.M.P. officers dressed in their scarlet tunics standing at attention, along with these native Canadians, during the raising of the red ensign. I remembered at that time that here in parliament we were trying to destroy that symbol which these people have accepted so graciously. This fact caused me to do a lot of thinking. I have thought since I arrived back in the House of Commons that it was too bad that some of those members on the opposite side were not able to take part in that ceremony and witness how these people prize the red ensign. When I stood there and heard the national anthem sung in the Cree language I could not help but think of what was going on in parliament.

In the subamendment the first question set forth is: "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign"? We have many reasons to be in favour of the Canadian red ensign when we look back and think of what it has meant to us down through the years. However, one thing I have noted in the debate and which I have admired is that every speaker who has taken part on this side has said he is quite in agreement with some modifications being made to the red ensign if necessary to create unity in this great country. I have been very happy to see this attitude and I was also pleased with the proposal that the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), placed before the house and the government. I fail to see how the government could not accept such a proposal. There was no mention of the flag question in the speech from the throne at the commencement of this session of parliament and I cannot understand why the flag resolution could not be withdrawn at this time in favour of the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

Since the government took office it has withdrawn much of the legislation it has put before the house, and I think it would not hurt the government to accept the fact once again that they have made a blunder and to withdraw the resolution they have placed on the order paper, which is so unnecessary at this time having in mind all the disunity that the government has already created with the B and B gang. Without a doubt I think they should withdraw the resolution, admit that once again they have taken off in the wrong direction and come forward with a proposal for a committee as suggested by the two members to whom I have referred. The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) admitted as much yesterday and more Liberals should have been in the house to listen to the very fine speech he made. As found on page 7033 of Hansard he said:

> We on this side have wondered how it is that so many people in Canada are staunchly entrenched behind the red ensign, a fact we did not expect—

He admits this is so, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that as time goes on it will be found that there are a great many more people who are behind the red ensign. I recall that when I went home to my constituency on week ends at the time this matter first came up for debate people were very lukewarm and not much concerned about the flag debate or a change in the flag. In many cases they said to me: Have you fellows got nothing else to do down there but debate the flag? However, I have noticed lately that it is a different story. They come and pat me on the back and say: "Don't you fellows give in with respect to this very rude thing that the government is trying to do to this country". In my constituency I have people from every ethnic group in Europe. I might say I am proud of the French blood in my veins and the Irish blood also, but I am sure if my late mother and father were here they would be happy with the stand I am taking. My father was reared in Quebec before going to western Canada, and we were very happy to live under the red ensign. As I have said, however, we would be perfectly willing to accept some modification to show the great traditions of the founding races of this nation.

In my constituency there are many people who came from the province of Quebec and I have not received one letter opposing the red ensign as our national flag. I have people from every ethnic group in Europe in my constituency and I have not received one letter or heard one word from them opposing the red ensign. I have not received a single letter supporting the three maple leaves flag. I think it is a shame that this flag should be forced on the people at this time. I disagree with many who talk about the great expense this debate and a plebiscite would be to the country and all the tommyrot they utter in an attempt to force the opposition to give up trying to discharge its responsibility. Members of parliament are paid by the year as are the staff. The only additional cost is the stenographic staff. I say that we have our democratic rights and that if we want to stand up for the people we represent we have no other alternative but to oppose this ridiculous proposal, and we must do so.

Not having referred to the flag question in the speech from the throne I think that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) acted very unjustly when he appeared as guest speaker before that great body, the Canadian Legion and told them that this flag would be the flag whether they liked it or not. He was invited there as the guest speaker but he took advantage of the time and the opportunity to make a political speech and to tell them that this would be the flag whether they liked it or not. I think the Legion had no alternative but to boo and jeer him. He was invited there as a guest speaker but he took the opportunity to make a political speech and to try to unfurl his flag before that great organization whose members have done so much in two world wars and who are solidly behind the Canadian red ensign. I think this was a disgrace.

Many have seen the cartoons discrediting this great organization, the Canadian Legion, by implying that only the drunks in the Legion were supporting the red ensign. I think this is a shame. Many people in my constituency have not written letters but have come to me and said: If there is a majority in favour of this flag why do you fellows not go along with it? I say that these are people who would give up their flag and country for a political party, and in my opinion that is a shame. I do not rate very highly any group of people who will give up their flag, their country and their traditions for a political party.

The second question in the subamendment is: "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign with changes made thereon to show the main heritages of both founding races?"

I think I have covered that point. It has been definitely shown that we in this party are willing to go along with certain changes in the red ensign to show distinctly the heritages of the two founding races. I think this is very important. I for one would hate to see the union jack removed from any distinctive Canadian flag. I believe it has a place there and I think we have every right to ask that it be left there. But I would not oppose adding the fleur-de-lis or any other symbol. There are many ways in which this could be done.

I support strongly the proposal made by the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle but I also have a proposal I should like the government to consider. I suggest that the provinces should be brought into the picture. Let their representatives have a say as to what should be the Canadian flag. I think this is very important, Mr. Speaker, because when I go from one province to another across this country I do not want to find each one with a different symbol. I think this would be a shame. I would go along with the proposal for a committee to be set up on which each province would have representation and have an opportunity to voice its opinion. I am sure we have men and women who are qualified to be members of such a committee. I am sure this committee would come out with a flag of which we could all be proud, and I am sure that the heritage of the two founding races would be represented on such a flag. Then we could go from one province to another saying, this is our Canadian flag.

You go across the border to the south and go from one state to another and you will not find a different flag. We should have our own, distinctive Canadian flag. I think we should be broadminded enough to take this question out of politics by setting up a committee upon which all provinces would be represented. This committee would come out with a flag of which we could all be proud. We will never arrive at a decision in the House of Commons. We are, I suppose, trying to bring politics into this question of arriving at a distinctive Canadian flag. This reminds me of a cartoon I saw recently in one of the weekly newspapers. A tourist was standing looking up at two flags, one was the Esso sign and the other was the three maple leaf design. He said, "Just which one is your distinctive Canadian flag?" This is the predicament in which we find ourselves. We are well aware of the fact that very few provinces are going to accept the three maple leaf design.

When I return to western Canada and go through the cities I find that people realize something is going to be taken away from them which they have held dear and you can see more ensigns flying than ever in the history of our country. We should pull ourselves together. The leaders should reach agreement to take this resolution out of the Commons at this stage, set up a committee jointly with the provinces and bring in a flag of which we can all be proud. We were told in the early stages of this flag controversy that there was going to be a free vote. How quickly that wilted away. There will be no free vote.

We recall that there were not supposed to be two flags at the start. However, Joey Smallwood was not satisfied and said he was going to fly the union jack in Newfoundland. Then they introduced the union jack as a second flag. This is ridiculous. Surely, we can get down to business here and bring in a truly Canadian flag of which we can all be proud, and give all the provinces a chance to say that they were able to express their views on this flag. I do not know why the flag question was introduced at this time because there was no mention of it in the speech from the throne.

One of the questions referred to in the subamendment is: Are you in favour of the three maple leaves? I think I have made it very clear where I stand on the three maple leaves. We already have them on the red ensign. I have always respected the maple leaf, even though it does not grow in my constituency. I have always respected it because it has been our symbol as long as I can remember. However, I go along with the statement made by her worship the mayor of Ottawa, that this flag looks like three dead maple leaves on a field of surrender. This is what it looked like to me. I am sure a great many members sitting across the way feel the same way because I have heard some of them express their opinions on this flag.

Then, the fourth question in the subamendment is: Are you in favour of a one maple leaf flag? The one maple leaf flag does not mean any more to me than the three maple leaf flag. If something were added in the flag such as a beaver, a sheaf of wheat, a buffalo or even a good Hereford bull, that would mean more to me. These are some of my views on this subject. As I pointed out, the maple leaf does not grow in my constituency. I am sure, as many members of parliament will agree, we have many designers in this country and if we had a committee on which all the provinces of Canada were represented, we would have no difficulty in arriving at a distinctive flag.

I do not go along with those people, Mr. Speaker, who are saying how terrible it is that we are holding up parliament. We are not holding up parliament. We are representing constituencies and we have to exercise our democratic rights. We are well aware of the fact that if this three maple leaf flag is adopted we will have it for a long time. This is the reason people here are fighting this issue. They want justice and that is all these people want. They are not filibustering. They are speaking up for their democratic rights and they have a right to be heard.

I do not blame the Prime Minister alone for this situation. I blame hon. members sitting opposite for allowing this flag question to be introduced. What were they doing in caucus when they allowed this measure to be brought forward? They talk about a free vote, but they have no free vote. I blame those who are sitting on the benches opposite for not voicing their opinions, and allowing this matter to come before parliament. They should have spoken up instead of acting like a bunch of trained seals. I hope the Prime Minister of this country, that great Nobel prize winner, will take hold of this thing and remove it from the House of Commons. He would be making another retreat but he has made so many now that one more will not hurt. He should set up a committee and let us get on with some of the other business this government promised the people of Canada.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate this evening for two reasons. I feel I have an obligation, on behalf of the people I represent in the House of Commons, to place before this house some of the views that have been indicated to me by letter and otherwise. The second reason is that I think we have reached a stage in this debate when some of us at least should be discussing ways and means or possibilities of reaching an agreement on this resolution and the amendments to it.

I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria, (B.C.) (Mr. Groos) earlier this evening because I am faced with a situation similar to that which he described. I have received letters, telegrams and petitions from the people I represent expressing a wide variety of viewpoints on this issue. I wish to say, also, that I am in sympathy to some extent with the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu) who has just resumed his seat when he says we should take political partisanship out of the debate on a flag for Canada.

[Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake.]

Before this can be done, however, there are one or two essential concessions which must be made. One of these, in my opinion, is that there should be a declaration by the leaders of all parties in this house on behalf of their followers that there will be a completely free vote. As I said, I think I have an obligation to present to this house some of the expressions of opinion I have received. I have gone over these communications very carefully—there are dozens, perhaps hundreds of them— and I think the five or six from which I intend to quote are representative of the whole of the correspondence I have received. First, I have a letter from Taber from which I wish to read an extract. It says:

> I hope you will be able to support the government with your vote on the flag issue. I am not particularly concerned about the design chosen but I am, like most of those with whom I have talked, in favour of a distinctive flag for Canada free of British or French symbols.
> I am a British ex-serviceman of the second world war and a member of the Canadian Legion. The official attitude of the Legion I consider ill-founded.
> My Legion branch will be informed of the contents of this letter.

Well, here is an ex-serviceman and a member of the Legion who has clearly stated his position. He is in favour of a flag for Canada which does not carry the symbols of any other country. Here is another letter:

> Please be advised that a telegram has been sent to the Prime Minister of Canada which reads as follows—that the Medicine Hat junior chamber of commerce has gone on record as favouring the flag chosen by the government of Canada as the national flag of Canada.

I was not at this meeting when the resolution was passed by the junior chamber of commerce, but I understand there was a sharp division of opinion during the course of the debate and that the motion barely passed by a very small majority.

Here is another letter:

> As one of your constituents I would like to register a strong protest on the design of the projected flag as proposed by Prime Minister Pearson.
> While personally I would prefer the red ensign because it is the flag for which our boys fought and died, however, I would not mind a flag with one maple leaf (green or multicoloured on a red background).

This is a letter which indicates that the writer is not in favour of the design suggested in the motion. The writer is not particularly adamant about retaining the red ensign, either. So here we have another point of view. Here is a further letter:

I hope I am not too late to let you know of my very strong feelings on the red ensign.

As far as my family, relatives and friends are concerned, we believe we have a distinctive Canadian flag and want no tampering with it in any way, shape or form.

I plead with you to vote against Lester Pearson's pennant and if it means another election that is a small matter in comparison.

I think this represents a somewhat extreme position. Nevertheless, it is an opinion held by some of my constituents.

I also have a letter here from the I.O.D.E. of Medicine Hat saying:

We wish to inform you that, we of the municipal chapter I.O.D.E., are in favour of the red ensign being upheld as the national flag of Canada.

So it goes. Here is another:

Dear Mr. Olson,

In your work as our representative in parliament, it may help you to know how some of us feel and think on certain issues.

The ensign with its union jack, and the Canadian coat of arms on a red background holds a great deal of meaning to me.

Having worked with girl guides of Canada for many years, I have learned the legends of the patron saints. These men were not national heroes but dedicated Christians. It is this spiritual value that is uplifting and inspiring.

When I see the maple leaf, there is no special feeling involved except that we used to do a drill and sing the fine song in school; and a special folk dance I know ends with "The Maple Leaf Forever". The leaf itself holds no spiritual inspiration.

And, finally:

As a resident of your constituency, I wish to express my opinion on the Canadian flag issue.

I feel it is very important to the future of our country that we have a flag which is truly a Canadian flag. I am in favour of a maple leaf design or whatever symbol, that is a "Canadian" one, is adopted.

Both the fleur-de-lis and the union jack have flown over our soil in the past. The red ensign I feel is also a flag of the past. It is an adaptation of the flag of another country. It cannot any longer be a true symbol of a country that is populated by peoples of such varied and diverse cultural backgrounds. New Canadians arrive daily in our country. Let them be able to identify with a symbol that is truly Canadian. Canada certainly lacks national unity and sometimes I think a strong national feeling. Our feelings are either too "British" or too "American". Let us hope that a new Canadian flag will set us going as a strong united people with a strong national feeling for our great and wonderful country.

I may say, also, that all the Royal Canadian Legion branches in my constituency, sent me letters or telegrams expressing their desire that Canada should retain the red ensign. But the point I am trying to make in reading these examples of correspondence is that in my constituency there is support for the retention of the red ensign, support for a flag with the three maple leaves combined on one stem and an expression of support for a single maple leaf design. This places a member in a position in which it is impossible for him to vote on the subamendment, or on the amendment, or on the main motion, and represent all his people. I think one has to consider some of the alternatives. I wish to quote an editorial which appeared in the Medicine Hat News of May 14. It says this:

There should be no nonsense about voting along party lines in parliament when the government brings in its design for a national flag.

This was written prior to the introduction of the resolution.

This is not a matter which should be decided along party lines.

Prime Minister Pearson hinted that this may be the case when he remarked in the Commons Tuesday that "when the time comes to subject the decision of the government to the House of Commons, I would hope that every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates and that there would be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense."

Mr. Pearson is quite right, but he should go further and declare this a "free vote". Partisan politics have no place in an issue such as this. Certainly not the type of politicking demonstrated by Mr. John Diefenbaker, Tuesday who, after hearing the Prime Minister's remarks, said "another retreat".

It is precisely this kind of petty politicking which should be avoided when the question of a national flag comes before the house.

Mr. Pearson is right, too, when he says the issue should not become one of confidence or non-confidence in the government.

This is a matter for each member to vote on as an individual; a vote to be dictated by his constituents' wishes in so far as he knows them and his own conscience.

Let the issue be faced squarely and honestly with no taint of party politics.

Even tonight we heard the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu), a member of the Progressive Conservative party, suggest that partisan politics ought to be taken out of the decision with respect to this flag. I submit to you, sir, that there are three essential courses that must be followed if we are to avoid the difficulty that I can see down the road in this connection. First of all we must have a firm statement from the Prime Minister that when the vote comes on the subamendment, the amendment and the resolution, it will be a completely free vote. This vote should not be tied to anything except the choosing of a national flag for Canada.

By that I mean it should not be tied to the threat of an election; it should not be tied to some kind of compromise or concession with regard to anything else.

There has been a great deal of talk during this debate about the divisions in the country. This is beginning to sound a little hollow, because it seems to me that the longer this debate goes on, the more we are agitating those divisions rather than healing them, if they do exist. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the first consideration must be a free vote without any consideration other than selecting a national flag for this country. I should like to quote from a special letter to the Prime Minister of Canada from the Canadian corps association. This letter is dated August 5, and the last paragraph says:

> The flag issue as it stands now, is destroying the members of parliaments' democratic right as elected representatives to render a just decision, and similarly, if this subject is not settled by a plebiscite, the people of this country will be forced to vote for the candidate in their constituency who shares their flag views.

This is the important part, Mr. Speaker:

> What a sorry group of M.P.s we might have if candidates' over-all ability is pushed out of focus by only their opinion on Canada's flag.

I think we have come to the stage in this debate when we must seek some kind of compromise, if you want to call it that. When two immovable positions are taken, you may ask yourself, compromise in regards to what? If the reasons for taking those positions are not quite comprehensible, then it is difficult to decide how you can compromise. I hope the introduction of this particular design for a distinctive flag for Canada was predicated only on the desire to have a national flag adopted by parliament, and nothing else. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because we hear rumours that some of the Liberal members may add to their stature or enhance their position, particularly in the province of Quebec, if they can go back to the people with this pennant and say, "We of a Liberal government introduced into parliament and passed a distinctive flag for Canada". But the other side of the two positions has also to be considered. If the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his followers are continuing this debate solely because they do not want this particular design and they want the red ensign to remain as Canada's national flag, that is also an honest position. But we hear rumours that there may be some enhancement of their political position in parts of the country as long as they keep this filibuster going. I read one letter that indicates there is one person at least in my constituency who would welcome a general election on the flag issue. I want to say that I do not accept that position, Mr. Speaker. As I said, there are two sides to this question and I think we have to try honestly to find a compromise that will be accepted by both sides of the house. To do that, one thing is essential; that is, that every member or, if this is not possible, at least the spokesmen for every political party shall assume the responsibility of trying to obtain the acceptance of the design after it is passed, whatever it is, and will not attempt to use it as a political wrench in an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: One other thing that I think is important, Mr. Speaker, now the debate has gone this far and we have found a hardening of positions on both sides of the issue, is that when the flag is adopted, it ought to be a flag of parliament. At the present time I think many members of this house, and most of the Canadian people, feel that the design explained in the resolution—that is, three red maple leaves conjoined, on a white background with blue borders—is in fact a Liberal design or that it is, as it has been referred to, Pearson's pennant. I believe that the government, in order to reach some kind of compromise, ought to accept an amendment to the design and that amendment should come from somewhere in the opposition, be it from the Conservatives or any one of the other parties. Then when the decision has been taken, it will not have been a Liberal design or a Pearson pennant railroaded through parliament by sheer weight of numbers in the vote.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the three suggestions I have made—they are not new suggestions; I am not suggesting they are—ought to be seriously considered by both sides and both sides should try to come together on this question; otherwise I can see that this debate is going to go on and on. I believe that the positions, while they have hardened considerably, will become even worse. Then, when the decision has been taken, there will be wide division in the country in regard to accepting that flag, if it is the one described on the order paper at the present time.

Our party has stated over and over again that we will have a free vote in so far as our members are concerned. We are free to vote as our conscience directs and dictates on all the amendments and the resolution itself. This is what the Prime Minister asked the members of the house to do back in May; I think it was early in May but I am not sure of the exact date. It was approximately May 10. I think the time has come when he should give an undertaking on behalf of the government that they recognize that this is the way out. I would not be particularly concerned if the flag debate went on for another week or ten days, in spite of the fact that it is interfering with some of the other business to which parliament could be attending. It is not an unimportant matter to me, however. I do not know what the count is now, but something like 70 to 75 members must have spoken. I think that the rest of the members of this house, the other 190 or so, should also have the opportunity to speak on this flag debate before it terminates. Of course, what is happening is that hon. members do not speak just once. Amendments and subamendments are moved which provide an opportunity for each member to speak more than once, and this certainly carries the suspicion of a filibuster.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that we have to reach some kind of agreement, whether it be called a compromise or anything else, so that we can in fact get on with this matter. As I have said, I think we must have a declaration that there is going to be a free vote for the members of all parties in this house. Second, there should be an indication that the government will be willing to accept an amendment from the opposition so that the flag chosen will be the flag of parliament. That matter can be worked out at a leaders' meeting so that a suitable amendment can be proposed and accepted. Following that, Mr. Speaker, the matter could come to a vote and every hon. member of this house should assume the responsibility of obtaining or trying to obtain the acceptance of his constituents of the design, whatever it is and whenever it passes.

Mr. MacEwan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Olson: Certainly.

Mr. Crouse: Throughout the hon. gentleman's remarks he constantly described a filibuster the sincere and honest efforts made by the Conservative opposition. Would he indicate to the house his opinion of what constitutes a filibuster?

Mr. Olson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the definition of a filibuster is available to any hon. member who cares to look in one of the good dictionaries on the table. My impression of a filibuster is that it is a deliberate attempt to continue a debate for the sake of having time lapse, regardless of whether or not there is anything new to say on the subject.

Mr. Crouse: One further question, if I may. Would the hon. member not agree that the word "filibuster" has no place in the Canadian parliament because it is an American process whereby a man can speak for unlimited time and read into the record any amount of material, which can come from Sears-Roebuck or even a telephone directory. In this house, as I understand it, we can speak for only 40 minutes and our remarks must be relevant to the topic on hand. Would he not agree that this debate is far removed from a filibuster?

Mr. Olson: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I do not have a dictionary before me so I can only give the hon. member a vivid, literal definition of the word. Perhaps the manner in which a filibuster is carried on in Canada is somewhat different from the United States, but I would suggest that the connotation put on the word "filibuster" by most hon. members in this house, as well as most Canadians, is completely in accord with the definition which I tried to give a few minutes ago.

Mr. Skoreyko: Would the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Skoreyko: Would the hon. member permit another question. I wonder whether I could ask him exactly where he stands with respect to the resolution as it is, as opposed to the red ensign. He has read into the record letters both for and against the red ensign, but it appeared to me that he slithered along in the middle, a tactic for which his leader is well known. I do not want to imply that I have known the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) for this particular habit, but where does he stand?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my speech I made it abundantly clear that I felt it was my obligation and my duty to put before this parliament a reasonably accurate expression of opinion on the part of the people I represent in the constituency of Medicine Hat. I have done that. Now, if immediately after having done so I am going to have to say, before I have listened to the balance of the debate, what position I am going to take in this matter, it seems to me that this precludes my having an open mind on the suggestions which may be put forward within the next few days.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) rising to ask a question of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson)?

Mr. Smallwood: Yes, Mr. Speaker. For the last 20 minutes he straddled the fence and, like most Social Crediters, spoke out of both sides of his mouth at the same time. Would he now tell us whether or not he supports the red ensign?

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood) wanted to ask me a question. I do not think we should accept the preamble to his question, which was really a speech and he has already had an opportunity to make his speech. He asked me point blank whether or not I am in favour of the red ensign. I want to say to him and to all other members of this house that when I was elected to represent the people of Medicine Hat I did not have a firm opinion on every single issue which was going to come before this parliament.

Mr. Smallwood: All right, sit down.

Mr. Olson: But I did give an undertaking to them that I would consider matters in the light of the arguments presented to me and the expressions of opinion voiced by my constituents, and then I would reach a decision. I would say to the hon. member that if he will allow this subamendment, the amendment and the resolution come to a vote he will very soon find out how the hon. member for Medicine Hat feels about this issue.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne).

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, this will only be a small participation in the debate, but since the hon. member asked for the definition of a filibuster, I should like to point out that I have been unable to find a definition. However, I understand that it is a prolonged debate in order to prevent a vote. Nevertheless, there is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Kootenay East asking for the floor to make a speech or does he wish to ask a question?

Mr. Byrne: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will have an opportunity to make a speech and to participate in this debate later. The Chair would like to recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) at this time.

Mr. Byrne: Surely, Mr. Speaker, I can have—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, might I say at the outset that quite often I have to compete with others who wish to represent my constituency. To begin with I should like, through you, Mr. Speaker, to direct a remark to the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), who I thought cast certain reflections on the Chair a while ago when he inferred that the Speaker himself was not following the debate because of his inability to follow the French language. On my point of order the hon. member for Mercier, of course, got to his feet in order to give me a lecture on biculturalism. I should like to say to him, through you, sir, "Dūin do bhèal" I have no intention of translating that remark, although I am sure the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) understands it. The hon. member for Mercier is not aware that that is Gaelic, the native tongue of my ancestors, and I assure him I have no intention of translating it for his benefit. However, it is a commonly used phrase which could not be interpreted as complimentary.

In taking part in this debate I hope the Chair will see fit to grant me the same privileges enjoyed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), by the member for York East (Mr. Otto) and others.

Mr. Byrne: Do not worry, you have never been restrained by a word.

Mr. MacInnis: A moment ago the hon. member for Kootenay East rose and attempted to read again from a book. That seems to be his only ability, because so far he has not taken part in the debate. I suggest he refer to Hansard of yesterday where he will find that he is on record no less than 16 times, yet said nothing.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, it is my hope that I will enjoy the same privileges accorded to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others. I am sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) is not present, but in the event he does come and raise a point of order I should like to recommend some reading for him. I suggest that he read the second column on page 2892 of Hansard where the following words, uttered by you, sir, are recorded:

> My understanding of the practice in these debates is to consider both the amendment and the subamendment at the same time and not be too restrictive so as to eliminate all discussion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member will wait until a point of order is raised before replying to it. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I would invite him to come to the point at issue. I think what he read a moment ago would be relevant if a point of order was raised.

Mr. MacInnis: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I expected a point of order to be raised and could see no harm in quoting from a ruling by yourself made in this house. I certainly agree that no better individuals could be quoted in this house than Sir Winston Churchill, and some others, and suggest that perhaps I should be given the opportunity of quoting matters which concern this debate in order to substantiate the argument I intend to put forward. In any case, Mr. Speaker, I have recommended that reading material for the Minister of Justice.

I should now like to quote the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as they are recorded at page 6957 of Hansard of August 18, 1964. I feel these words are relevant to my argument that I should be given the same privilege accorded to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In the last column on page 6957 the minister is reported as having stated:

> This subamendment is prolonging the debate, in my view quite unnecessarily. Anything that is being said on the subamendment could have been said on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, those words were uttered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce within a day of the time he supported a vote on a ruling contrary to that statement. He did so to suit his own purposes. Many other members on that side of the house saw fit to reverse their feelings within a 24-hour period to further their own aims.

The Prime Minister when introducing this resolution, and this has been repeated time and time again, made it quite clear at the outset that he hoped each and every member of parliament would take the opportunity of speaking on this issue. The same Prime Minister in this house criticized members for doing what he invited them to do and used the word "filibuster" in reference to our speeches made in acceptance of that invitation.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone has an interpretation of the word "filibuster". Without becoming involved in the United States meaning of that word, or its meaning in other countries, I should like to state that a filibuster in this house would be defined as an attempt by one party, left to its own devices, to continue a debate as long as possible and, to use the words of the last speaker, use up as much time as possible. That in my opinion is what a filibuster might be.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) appearing on the T.V. network described a filibuster as something that denied him three minutes in this house.

Mr. MacEwan: It was a policy.

Mr. MacInnis: It was not a policy, as suggested by the hon. member for Pictou, but a progress report. I wonder whether we might expect the minister to give the C.B.C. another progress report at 10.30 tonight?

In reply to the suggestion that we are conducting a filibuster I should like each and every member to read Hansard of yesterday. Yesterday was a short day but the debate took less than 29 pages in Hansard. On those 29 pages are recorded 61 interruptions. Of the 29 pages, two full pages were required by rulings from the Chair. Surely no one can accuse us of carrying on a filibuster in view of the fact there were 61 recorded interruptions in those few pages. There were 61 identified interruptions. I am sure there were a great many more that were not identified.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

[Text]

Mr. MacEwan: The republican wants to know about the flag.

Mr. MacInnis: Is the republican talking over there again? Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for my inability to understand that language in which the hon. member speaks. I have been scolded before for this inability. I am quite willing to sit down and put on my earpiece and listen to that hon. member, who does not seem to have the guts to stand up in his place and put what he has to say on record. Perhaps it is his intention to hide what he is saying from me by using his native tongue. Please get up on your feet and say what you have to say so that I can put on my earpiece and listen to the translation.

Mr. Choquette: I should like to speak to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and I will do so in the hon. member's native tongue. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wishes to know if I have guts enough to express my views. I am in favour of the three maple leaves flag. Is that clear enough? I will vote for that design instead of carrying on a stupid filibuster. If my friend wishes, I will repeat that in French.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think there is a question of privilege there.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I am sure a review of tomorrow's Hansard will indicate that great assistance has been given toward the prolonging of this debate by hon. members on the other side of the house. In my own interpretation of a filibuster you could hardly say there is one going on here.

An hon. Member: Nothing like the truth.

Mr. MacInnis: During the debate charges have been made. We run into charges every day that the Conservative party is delaying the business of the nation. This is a most ridiculous charge and nobody is more aware of how ridiculous it is than the government. Every member in this house, both on this side and the other side, knows that if the government so wishes, the legislation to face us at the beginning of the week can be anything but the flag resolution. They could bring forward the pension legislation, provided it was ready or they could bring forward any other legislation they wished. Nobody on this side of the house has any control at all over the legislation that the government wishes to present to the house. Any inference that the discussion of the flag is holding up the nation's business is only an excuse on the part of the goverment for their inability to prepare the business of the nation and place it before the house.

In this respect I might also refer to further words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) as found on page 6958 of Hansard:

> May I say this to my hon. friend, that if a party is determined to prolong the debate there is very little that can be done by any group, regardless of whether it is in the minority or majority.

I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is trying to deny the responsibility of the government in presenting legislation to the house. I would also point out that he has referred to the government and his own party as a group. He calls them a group. There is no mention of the leadership of the party. Here I might draw a parallel with what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) once said about the party. You will recall his famous statement. The Liberal party has the platform and the program, and we think we have a leader. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not even gone as far as to recognize the fact there is a party or a leader. He now refers to them as a group.

An hon. Member: He wants the leader's job.

Mr. MacInnis: That is true. We all suspect he has his own ambitions.

An hon. Member: Get back on the track.

Mr. MacInnis: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that order be called. If the member insists on hollering "get back on the track" I simply say that in my opening remarks I asked for the same privilege that was granted the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was permitted to wander in any direction he chose without one word being uttered on that side of the house, without one word from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) who consistently rises in his place and tries to impose regulation on members on this side while members of his own party wander free and easy wherever they choose. The member who sits in his seat and hollers "get back on the track" should have been here to see the example set by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, an example which, if the Chair permits, I will follow. I would appreciate it very much if members on that side would not sit in their seats and insist on hollering and trying to direct speakers on this side in the direction they would like to see them go rather than allowing them to follow the example set by their own minister.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, this debate was thrown wide open by the complete disregard of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the ruling of the house as to what form the debate should follow. You say "get back on the track". That is a very difficult thing for this government to do because they have not found a track to travel on.

With respect to the presentation of this resolution to the house, it is my opinion that prior knowledge was given to members on that side so as to permit them to make what they considered bold statements back in their own ridings. I refer now to the members from the Halifax constituency in particular. Prior to the resolution being presented to the house these members made big, bold statements as to what their stand was going to be on the flag and under what conditions they would vote for the three maple leaves flag. I say that in my opinion they had prior knowledge. I am also going to say something factual about one of the cabinet ministers. I must say there are not too many of them here, but among those present—

Mr. Monteith: More than usual.

Mr. MacInnis: The Minister of Trade and Commerce indicates there are six. When you consider that the present cabinet is the largest and most expensive the country has ever had, six is not a great number. He should signal behind his back, not in front of himself.

Mr. Monteith: There is the seventh.

Mr. MacInnis: If there are six present I am going to make a statement for you gentlemen, and each one of you if you wish can get up and deny having anything to do with this. Nevertheless this statement is being made by me as a factual one. The house will recall the answers that opposition members received prior to the very secretive introduction of the flag resolution. Nobody was allowed to know what the flag resolution was going to contain. Nobody was allowed to know what the design was. It was a deep, dark secret which, as I said before, in my opinion was revealed to the Halifax members at least so that they could make these bold statements.

I say to the ministers of the crown who are present now that from the mouth of one of the ministers I heard him take exception to the choice of the three maple leaves and in taking exception to the three maple leaves flag, which was presented by the government a couple of days later, he also indicated what his personal choice was. In my opinion this was tantamount to a leak because the opposition was denied any indication of what the design of the flag would be before the resolution came before the house.

An hon. Member: Start bailing your boat.

Mr. MacInnis: I hear an interjection from a member representing Halifax. I hope that as a member of parliament he will declare his stand. At least the member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Kennedy) has a very good indication of where one of his constituents stands. I say that prior knowledge was made available to members of the Liberal party. I say that this knowledge was made available by a member of the government prior to the presentation of the resolution and in my opinion he revealed something that the Prime Minister was trying to hide.

Mr. Byrne: What is the point?

Mr. MacInnis: Oh, you want to know what the point is.

Mr. Byrne: Let us get to it.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Charlie McCarthy is at it again.

Mr. MacInnis: I would have to put the point in writing before the hon. member could understand it. He does not hear, he does not speak, he only reads. He has suddenly become the Liberal oracle on matters of order in the house. The day I see him stand up and make a speech in the house that has not been put down in writing either by himself or by somebody else, I will be greatly surprised. The hon. member took part in the debate 16 times yesterday and said nothing, and again on a number of occasions tonight and has still said nothing.

An hon. Member: Still sitting on his brains.

Mr. Byrne: If he would make a point I would sit on it.

Mr. MacEwan: We cannot do without you. You are the best straight man in the house.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is an exchange of conversation occurring between members on both sides of the house. I do not believe this is a conducive to good order. I ask hon. members to co-operate with the member who has the floor and give him a chance to complete his remarks without interruption.

Mr. MacInnis: Your request has been denied already by members on that side of the house, Mr. Speaker. It is very difficult to keep order on that side of the house. You say there is a chain of conversation. There may be a chain elsewhere, but there are only broken links on that side.

A few minutes ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) took great delight in trying to imply something other than what was meant by my remarks. I point out to him that it is my opinion also that the Minister of Transport played a great part—it may have taken upwards of two weeks—in introducing the resolution in this form. He thought it would satisfy the premier of Newfoundland. However, the request of the premier of Newfoundland has been denied, whether or not he liked it. Again I say that in my opinion the Minister of Transport played no small part in bringing about this situation. It may have taken longer than two weeks, and he can correct me if I am wrong.

I should like to point out that this flag question was not outlined in the legislative program in the speech from the throne. However, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) introduced this flag question before the national convention of the Royal Canadian Legion on a Sunday evening. This organization has endeavoured at all times to keep politics out of its deliberations. Nevertheless the Prime Minister took before this convention a very definite and very delicate political question. There was a great deal of criticism with regard to this action. On another occasion I raised a question of privilege concerning a cartoon appearing in the Ottawa Citizen with regard to this particular convention, in which the Liberal members took a great deal of delight although it depicted all legionnaires as a group of alcoholics with the exception of the Prime Minister. A few days following that this same newspaper was referred to on another question of privilege. With the support of this kind of yellow journalism, the Liberal party has been putting across its proposed flag design. I cannot recall the date, and I stand to be corrected, but I believe this same Prime Minister said he would not turn his back on the red ensign. Today the red ensign has been deliberately torn down in favour of the three maple leaf flag. The red ensign does not even appear as the second choice.

The convention at Winnipeg indicated quite clearly to the Liberal party and the Prime Minister that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst the veterans of this country with his choice of a flag. Who are the members of the Liberal party? I noticed that the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) was somewhat irritated by certain remarks in this debate, and I put the question to him directly: Does he feel he is more qualified to decide on a Canadian flag than some of the veterans who have served under this flag or some of the families who have lost loved ones in the service of this country? Does he think he is qualified to stand in this House of Commons and pass judgment on what these people should recognize as the Canadian flag? Is he more qualified than a private, corporal, sergeant or officer in the Canadian services who fought under this flag? Does he consider he should have a choice in this matter while Canadian citizens, many of whom are veterans, are denied an opportunity to express their opinion on what the Canadian flag should be? Does the minister honestly feel he should deny this opportunity to citizens of this country while he stands in this house and follows the dictates of his Prime Minister? I almost said "his party", but that would have been a mistake because it has been indicated to me already by a highly placed cabinet minister of the government that he is not in favour of the three maple leaf flag. While expressing his opposition to the three maple leaf flag, he indicated to me what his choice would be.

Now, here we have a highly placed minister of the crown who has clearly indicated his opposition to this maple leaf design. If the minister is present and wishes to deny it or if he sees these remarks in Hansard tomorrow and wishes to deny it, or if each minister wishes to get up I will take each and every minister off the hook in turn and then I will face the responsible minister with it. I will make the accusation in the house and tell him where and when he said it. I will tell the house what his alternative choice would be. I will remind the Prime Minister, then, that his cabinet is still divided on the choice of a flag. This information came to me from a highly placed cabinet minister. I say to the Minister of Forestry again, does he feel he is qualified to stand up in this house and vote on this issue when he denies the citizens across this country who are rightfully concerned the opportunity to express an opinion as to what the flag of this country should be?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Don't dignify him with an answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on some point of privilege?

Mr. Sauvé: I thought we had been elected in this parliament to take decisions. This is what the people who voted for us in our constituencies want us to do. The only thing we want is to vote, as members of parliament, and decide on this issue as soon as possible.

An hon. Member: A free vote?

Mr. Sauvé: A free vote, yes.

Mr. Monteith: You have a bureaucratic approach.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is 10.30.

Mr. Favreau: I would suggest the hon. member be allowed to complete his speech, unless he has quite a bit more to say.

Mr. Monteith: I suggest we call it 10.30.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps I could take this opportunity to raise a question of privilege and ask for the withdrawal of the last remark made by the interjector. He has said that the Minister of Forestry should not dignify me with an answer. I think that member should withdraw that particular remark, considering the fact that I still have ten minutes to go.

Mr. Byrne: I ask that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? I am afraid there is no opportunity at this time to consider questions of privilege or points of order. It is 10.30, and unless there is unanimous agreement amongst the members that we should continue after 10.30 I would suggest that the hon. member who has the floor, and who still has some time left, continue his remarks whenever this debate is resumed. If he wants to raise a point of privilege at that time, I think that would be the proper time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

AIR TRANSPORT—PROVISION OF DIRECT SERVICE FROM NOVA SCOTIA TO BERMUDA

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): It is with a feeling of true humility that I attempt to follow the previous speaker but I will try to show in the course of my remarks the same fine spirit of moderation and co-operation as he displayed.

My question to the Minister of Transport this afternoon dealt with the provision of a direct air service between Nova Scotia and Bermuda, with connecting flights to the rest of the Caribbean and other parts of the commonwealth in that hemisphere.

An hon. Member: Don't forget the Virgins.

Mr. Regan: My question had reference to the fact that in Nova Scotia in particular, and indeed in the other Atlantic provinces, there has been a long and historic trade relationship and much intercourse with these areas. The volume of trade over the years has been impressive and as a consequence, my people have had occasion to go back and forth quite frequently. It is most unjust, therefore, that maritimers wishing to fly to Bermuda and on to the Bahamas and other points in the Caribbean should have to travel by way of Montreal and Toronto. Not only have we had this close relationship for many years but we have a geographic proximity to this area which is not enjoyed by the rest of Canada.

We know Air Canada has been considering the introduction of a service from the Halifax international airport to Bermuda and I also know that when consideration is being given to this matter much is made of the volume of business which could be expected from such a service in the early years. I wish to suggest that when the officials of Air Canada are considering this matter they should bear in mind that the amount of traffic which they estimated for the Toronto-Nassau route turned out to be way below what was actually realized and that it has grown year by year. I think the service from Halifax would pay its way almost from the start, particularly if aircraft such as the Vanguard, which can also carry freight, were used. Such a service would enable lobsters from Nova Scotia, and possibly from other maritime provinces, to find a ready market in Bermuda or elsewhere in the West Indies.

We are told that one of the obstacles to the integration of such a service is that the British would demand reciprocity. In other words, they would have the right to put in a flight to some other part of Canada. I think the disadvantages of this are overestimated. Even if the British were to be given a flight to some other part of this country, the route from Halifax to Bermuda would soon become a popular and profitable route for Air Canada. If Air Canada is not interested in such a proposition, I suggest that Canadian Pacific Airlines or Eastern Provincial Airlines or B.O.A.C. might well be interested. It is not good enough that the people of the maritime provinces who wish to travel to Bermuda or to the Bahamas should have to go by way of Montreal or Toronto.

We will listen with great interest to the answer which the minister gives on this subject. The time has come when this service should be inaugurated. Indeed, it is long past. As a matter of fact we hope the minister will be able to announce that it will be brought into being in time for people from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island to use it during the coming winter, instead of being obliged to travel extra miles and spend extra dollars routing around Montreal.

An hon. Member: Rooting around Montreal?

Mr. Regan: I can assure the minister that if this service is provided in the immediate future it will prove more remunerative to Air Canada or to whichever carrier undertakes it than could possibly be envisaged.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am glad the hon. gentleman was not allowed to receive the somewhat laconic answer I would have been obliged to have given him, under our rules, earlier today. It is hard for many people to understand why a service which would obviously be so beneficial should not be provided.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that the service would pay almost from the outset, particularly if, as he suggested, an aircraft such as the Vanguard were used which could carry a considerable quantity of freight. In that case there might be a great deal of two-way traffic.

There is, however, one problem, and it is a problem which is under active consideration by the air transport board at the present time. That is the problem of the bilateral agreement we have with the United Kingdom. Bermuda is a dependency of the United Kingdom, and we would have to renegotiate our arrangements with the United Kingdom; and they, not unlike us in this respect, are anxious to make as good a bargain for themselves as they can. There is not any doubt that they would ask for, and would be justified in asking for, some concession from us in regard to their services to Canada.

I do not set this up as an insuperable obstacle, but it is the kind of consideration that has to be taken into account in matters of this kind. I know that T.C.A.—in fact I know it very well, because I asked them to do it—are at the present time giving active consideration to the amount of traffic they can reasonably expect on this service, and they have not reached any final view about this; at least, they had not reached any final view the last time I inquired, which was two or three weeks ago. But I would think, Mr. Speaker, there would not be any doubt that before very long this service would be a very profitable one.

I would hope, of course, it would not be just from Halifax but would be a continuous flight from St. John's—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —where in fact they could get at least as many passengers as they could from Halifax. The service would of course only be satisfactory if it were well integrated with the service from Canada to the Caribbean. That would possibly result in some of the traffic, instead of going direct from Montreal or Toronto being diverted via Halifax, which would give some of these people in central Canada a broader conception of their country than some of us feel they have at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I have to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to special order of the house of August 17 last, this house stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

It being forty minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, August 21, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—RECEIPT OF FRENCH TRANSLATION OF BEAUCHESNE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which, in my opinion, should be of the greatest interest to all members.

I should like to call everyone's attention to the fact that we have finally received the French version of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

The Ralliement Créditiste group, of which I am the leader, has been asking for the translation of that manual ever since we came here, in this house, in 1962.

The Conservative government, then headed by the Leader of the Opposition, initiated talks which finally resulted, under the present administration, in the translation and distribution of this work on parliamentary procedure.

Therefore, on behalf of my party, I should like to express our gratitude to those who have finally understood that, in matters such as this, the French Canadian element ought to be on an equal footing with the others. We do hope that in another field, especially as regards publications distributed by the printing bureau, the same principles of justice and equality will apply, so that Canada may be strong as well as united.

CANADIAN FLAG

STATEMENT ON MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, three meetings of the party leaders have been held this week to discuss the parliamentary situation arising out of what is now known as the flag debate. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to report that no agreement was possible on the subsequent parliamentary procedure for dealing with this matter. As leader of the government I felt that whatever procedure was to be followed, there should be accepted time limits on discussion to ensure that a decision would be reached at a reasonably early date. The principle of such limitation did not find unanimous acceptance.

There has been criticism that the government was attempting to influence a decision in its favour by the threat of an election if it were defeated on the issue. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I stated at yesterday's meeting, and I am glad to repeat it to the house today, that in our view votes on the resolutions and on amendments to them will be entirely free. That is, an election will not be at stake on such votes. Parliament will make its decision by individual vote of all its members. This position of the government is not tied to any other conditions or proposals.

The flag debate will continue next week, but I want to assure the house that no doors have been closed for any subsequent meeting on the party leader or house leader level to discuss the situation as it develops.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding or misconception of the position taken by the members of the New Democratic party I should like to say, very briefly, two things. First, we are appreciative of the statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to a free vote on the flag issue. We do not think this will make any difference in so far as we as individuals are concerned; if I were opposed to the maple leaf design I would vote against it even if the government were to call an election the next morning, and I think most hon. members would feel exactly the same way. Nevertheless it does remove from the members of parliament any imputation that their vote is coloured by the fact that a vote on the main resolution might involve an election. For that reason we welcome this statement by the Prime Minister.

The second thing I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, is that we are most anxious that if at all possible some compromise be found by which we can break the present deadlock which holds the House of Commons in its grip.

We have been favourable to the idea of setting up a small committee of the House of Commons to look into this matter to see whether there is some common ground that can be found. My colleague the hon. member for Greenwood put forth a suggestion the other day which, among other suggestions, might be considered. Members of this party feel that such a committee would be useful, and there is a strong possibility that it might find some unanimous basis upon which we could launch a flag. Certainly if this could be done it would be highly desirable; because in our opinion, if Canada is going to adopt a flag, it would be much better that it be launched with almost unanimous support of this house rather than on a divided basis.

The members of this group want to make it abundantly clear that we would only support the idea of setting up such a committee if there were some prior agreement that the debate on the report of that committee would be for a limited period of time. If that cannot be agreed upon we could quite easily find ourselves, when the committee returned at the end of its six or eight weeks of consideration, exactly where we are now and then proceed to have a protracted and interminable debate at a time when much more important legislative matters should be receiving the attention of the House of Commons. Therefore the members of this party feel that if we are going to spend a lot of time in prolonged discussion of this matter it is better to do so at a time when we would normally be enjoying a recess than to use up time which will be required to deal with the heavy legislative program which is on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker, I have merely stated the position of this party, and it is up to the other parties to state their positions. I would urge that members in every part of the house give serious consideration to the possibility of establishing a small committee of the House of Commons with the proviso that there be a limit on the debate regarding the report of that committee. It seems to us that if the government should make a concession in agreeing to such a committee rather than proceeding with the debate, as it originally intended, the other parties in the house ought to be prepared to consider a matching concession of limiting the debate on the report of that committee.

As the Prime Minister has said, and as was agreed this morning at the meeting of the party leaders, this matter is not closed, and I would urge most strongly that members in every part of the house give serious consideration to accepting this kind of compromise; because I am convinced that a long and tedious debate when the committee reports back will do nothing to enhance the prestige and effectiveness of parliament.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to comment briefly on the statement the Prime Minister has just made, and likewise to make the position of our party very clear, not only for the sake of the record but also for the information of each of us.

We welcome very much this statement which the Prime Minister has made, which brings us to a non-partisan position in the house as far as our vote is concerned on any subamendment, amendment or main motion. It is unfortunate, I believe, that this policy was not maintained from the very beginning of the flag issue. Nevertheless it is indeed encouraging that the Prime Minister has seen fit to make this statement now. It is encouraging to our group and I would think it is also encouraging to members on the government side. I believe this decision places again on the shoulders of each of us the responsibility which I believe the electors regard is ours of making a decision on this important issue.

We have had three leaders' meetings, and the fact that these meetings have taken place and that there has been sincere and keen discussion on every aspect of the issue that came before us is something that should also encourage us. However, it is not encouraging, indeed it is disappointing as far as I am concerned, that we were not able to arrive at a unanimous decision on some alternative course that would bring about the conclusion of this matter reasonably soon. I had hoped originally that some compromise alternative could have been agreed upon which would have meant amending the two resolutions on the order paper in such a way that we could all agree. Personally, and I think this is the unanimous position of the members of our party, that it would have been much better if parliament could have brought forth a flag that could have been known as Canada's flag because it had been decided upon as a result of the corporate opinion and action of parliament rather than just the government. Therefore I had hoped we could agree on some amendment to the design that would provide an honourable solution for those who favour the red ensign. A partial compromise has been accepted by the Prime Minister in his announcement of a free vote.

Our discussions also concerned the setting up of a committee, and I must say I agree completely with the statement the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has just made in this regard. If a committee could have brought us together in such a way that a recommendation would have come before the house with the assurance that debate would be limited to a reasonable time, and if the committee could have come forward with a decision on the basis of a reasonable majority, it would have done a great deal to improve the situation in which we now find ourselves and would have brought us to some satisfactory conclusion. However, if it is not possible to limit the debate on the recommendation of such a committee, and if its terms of reference cannot be such as to offer it some hope of bringing back a recommendation to the house, then mere postponment of the issue is certainly not going to assist in solving the problem.

I am convinced that a prolonged debate on the flag issue will produce irreparable damage as far as national unity is concerned. I should think every member of the house would agree with me when I say that, regardless of whether we are dealing with the flag issue or something else, it is our responsibility to carry on the proceedings of the house in a way that contributes to the over-all improvement and strengthening of the unity of our nation. I appeal not only to the other parties in the house but to every individual member that we should welcome unitedly the announcement the Prime Minister has made. In addition, we should not close the door to further discussions or to a future coming together that would end this issue in a way satisfactory to all Canadians and which will foster national unity.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the group I represent, I wish to say that I am very pleased with the decision taken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that a free vote will be called on the flag issue. The longer we discuss that matter, the more ticklish it becomes, and I feel that calling for a free vote will enable all representatives of the people to take a stand on that matter, because, after all, we are elected by the people. That procedure will enable a majority to choose a national flag for Canada, and the Prime Minister is certainly entitled to congratulations for his decision to give the whole house and each member individually the occasion to vote freely on the flag design.

However, unfortunate statements were made, especially in western Canada, to the effect that the purpose of the proposed flag was only to please the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker it is unfortunate that some hon. members, of whatever political affiliation, have made statements likely to stir up strife among various groups in the country.

As for me, I have found nothing in the action taken by the government or in the choice of the flag submitted to parliament that might please French Canadians in particular. I said in committee this morning, especially to the Prime Minister and to other party leaders present, that we wanted a distinctive national flag. Whether it includes three maple leaves or only one, whether the maple leaf is replaced by a beaver or a wheatsheaf, in short, as long as it will be a distinctive Canadian flag we shall support the government.

Mr. Speaker, in the third committee meeting we discussed it again and again. Before going to the meeting I said: "Behind closed doors or not, the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste will not attend any more meetings of political leaders on the flag issue." Our position is clear and I think a free vote would clarify the matter.

In my opinion, the best way to select a flag would be to stop this filibustering. We must put an end to the division which is shaping up in this country; let us stop setting one group against the other and, above all, a whole country or seven or eight provinces against six million French Canadians who are only seeking true unity in their country.

We are not requesting anything special, we are not set on having a Quebec symbol, but a symbol which is completely and genuinely Canadian. We are, of course, insisting on Canadian symbols in our national emblem, but no foreign symbols, not from France any more than from England. We want, of course, to belong to the commonwealth of nations, but with our own symbols, our nation's symbols. Thus, Canadian unity will be safeguarded.

[Text]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I refrained from saying anything following the statement by the Prime Minister because, as I understood it, the agreement, while not explicit in terms, was that the Prime Minister would state the facts in an entirely unprovocative and objective manner. However, some members of the committee or the group that met have seen fit to make observations on that statement. My failure to do so, therefore, would be misinterpreted.

I am going to make one or two observations, while refraining from participating in the kind of argument advanced by the last hon. gentleman who, if I were to answer him in kind, has in some of the policies he has advocated done a great deal to harm the unity of our country. I am not going into that, but the gratuitous observations impel me to maintain myself within the most circumscribed limits in replying to the statements he made.

The Prime Minister has stated that he has decided on a free vote. It is too bad that decision was not made earlier. It is too bad the statement having been made originally by him that a free vote would be declared, that on reflection, he later decided to refine the meaning of that term, and state that a free vote would be one in which all would be free to vote but if members voted against the government's stand it would be tantamount to a vote of non-confidence and ensure the calling of an election.

The decision announced today should have been made long ago. Indeed, in the intervening weeks there has been a freezing of attitudes; and while entirely approving of the need of such a declaration being made, the decision to do so today appears to be too late to permit the carrying into full effect of the meaning of that term.

Second, there has been a suggestion that we should get on with the important business facing Canada. Hon. members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition have strongly advocated the need of getting on with that business, but we are placed in a position where these important matters cannot be dealt with—matters of pensions, matters of agricultural economy, particularly in eastern Canada, and other questions of paramount importance which are being kept in cold storage pending the completion of the flag debate.

I think there would be widespread appreciation of the government—though I know it won't be achieved—if this debate were adjourned now and we proceeded with matters of importance to the economy of the country. Then if an adjournment took place the flag question could be considered fully after each of us had the opportunity of visiting our constituencies and being made fully aware and cognizant of public opinion. After all, Mr. Speaker, one of the great difficulties for those of us who have constituencies far removed from Ottawa is that we find ourselves cut off, as it were, from public opinion by inability to meet with our constituents and understand their views.

Mention was made of a committee of the house, and I take a very strong stand in that connection. I think a committee of the house, following the models of 1945 and 1946, would have been the proper way to start this question; in other words, not have the government introduce it and take the stand, "Either you take this or you find yourself challenged by an election." If we had had a committee where members could sit down together, as they sat down in 1945 and 1946, and they had come up with a virtually unanimous agreement, that would be the way to determine a flag for our country rather than introducing a model or design and then, because of pressure of public opinion and events, having to change the original.

If the original is changed now from the three maple leaves I feel for the embarrassment of many of those who have supported the government and who have been flying the tremendous numbers of these flags that have been imported into Canada from abroad. It is going to be very embarrassing to have to pull down the three maple leaf design if parliament decides otherwise.

My suggestion, and I advanced it tentatively, was that a committee of 15 would be an effective committee; not a large committee but one of 15 composed of seven members supporting the government, five of Her Majesty's loyal opposition and one each from the other parties. I feel that if at this time we were to adjourn the debate on this question and allow such a committee to get to work—and I would play my part in that connection; the committee members appointed by this party would go into the committee free and untrampelled in any way—a decision could be reached; for the choice of a flag is above and beyond political considerations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let the committee meet; give it a couple of months. During that time members could get together, realize the importance to the unity of Canada of arriving at a basis acceptable to Canadians as a whole—I think they would do it—and if, as I would hope there would be, in consequence of full discussion removed from the limelight of parliament, a recommendation was made that, as I said a moment ago, would be virtually unanimous, the matter would be concluded there and then; for I think the house would certainly, in general, willingly accept such a recommendation.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, if there was not a high degree of unanimity, then I suggest—and again I come back to this—that whatever recommendations came from the committee could be submitted to the Canadian people at the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to keep away from any partisan discussion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but the groans from over there indicate that they are trying to push a flag down the throats of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is why they are objecting. This is why we hear these unintelligible groans translating the thoughts of hon. gentlemen who have just interrupted. I believe in that way this matter would be taken out of the realm of partisan considerations. That is the reason I made the suggestion.

I join with the Prime Minister, who was fair and reasonable in every way in his presentation today, in saying that while we have not come to agreement in these meetings, our assembly together has been characterized by extreme frankness, candour and a fine spirit. That has been the theme throughout. I am glad the Prime Minister said that the door will not be closed, for the door must never be closed by members of parliament—for, after all, they are Canadians first—on any action that may result in the assurance of unity in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I wish to—

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Are hon. members rising on a question of privilege or a point of order?

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Mary.

Mr. Valade: —because I was the originator of these suggestions. I do not say that in personal homage; I am just saying I would like to say something on this subject because I submitted the suggestions to the conference.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The customs and precedents which we follow in this chamber decree, if I may use that word, that only the leaders of the different parties shall speak on this matter. This is not the time for general comments.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am in order, but I did not make any statement except on the facts of what occurred at the meetings. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition—and I am not complaining at all about it—referred to the suggestion that a committee should be established to look into this question. I think I ought to put on record that we on this side are not opposed to such a committee, but we do not think such a committee should meet for an indefinite period of time and thereby unduly delay this matter. In addition, we believe that the report of this committee should be subject to a time limitation of debate when it is received by the house.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—APPEARANCE BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE—ELECTION OF UNION OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I would direct one or two questions to the Minister of Labour regarding Mr. Banks. The first is this. Is the minister now in a position to advise the house when the members of the maritime unions board of trustees or a representative thereof will appear before a committee of parliament? This should certainly take place before adjournment.

Second, in connection with Mr. McLaughlin, who is a vice president of the S.I.U., I would ask the minister this question. Is Mr. McLaughlin, who is a candidate for the presidency of the S.I.U., one of those who await trial on September 15 on a charge of conspiracy? What did the maritime trustees do; did they pass as proper his candidature, with such an outstanding charge against him? Who are the members of the credentials committee; and did they give approval to Mr. McLaughlin being a candidate under these circumstances?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make further inquiries about the details of the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition. My understanding is that an election will be held this fall or later this year in the S.I.U. for a president and other officers. To my knowledge the board of trustees have not disqualified Mr. McLaughlin from standing for election although, as the right hon. gentleman knows, there is an opposition slate of candidates running in this election, which is a very desirable development in this organization. The board of trustees are, I think, making a very determined effort to see that these elections are conducted in a democratic way. There is a committee composed of a representative of the Canadian Labour Congress, of the Department of Labour, of the board of trustees and of the S.I.U. which would oversee the election to see that it is democratically conducted, and I am hopeful that this will be possible.

In connection with the question with respect to appearance of the board of trustees before a parliamentary committee, the hon. member for Port Arthur asked the house leader this question recently and it was taken as notice. I would prefer the house leader to deal with it, except that I will say that in his letter to me Mr. Justice Dryer stated his wish that the appearance be later in the session, and I interpreted that to mean some time this fall. I would prefer the leader of the house to deal with this particular matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am most grateful to the minister for his very detailed answer but I would ask him, in view of the fact that the charge facing Mr. Banks is one arising out of his labour activities, whether he is in a position to give the house today a progress report, or a lack of progress report or whatever it might be called, regarding Mr. Banks and his whereabouts.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say where Mr. Banks is. If he is outside the country then I am sure this is a situation which would be congenial to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is the circumstances under which he got himself out of the country, after long delay from the time the present government when previously in office gave him a welcoming hand; but is there any ground for believing, and does the answer suggest, that it has at last been determined that he is out of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be quite frank with the Leader of the Opposition. I have no definite knowledge as to the whereabouts of Mr. Banks. It has been suggested that he is in the United States, but there is no firm indication as to his whereabouts.

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL LABOUR CODE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister now in a position to tell us when the legislation respecting the national labour code will be placed on the order paper? In April we were going to get it as quickly as possible; in July we were going to get it soon, and three weeks ago we were going to get it as soon as possible and the minister hoped that would be soon. Will we get it next week?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether it will be on the order paper next week. I cannot give my hon. friend a definite indication when it will be on the order paper, but it will be soon.

Mr. Knowles: Will it be on the order paper during this session?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask whether he has received any protests from any of the civil service organizations regarding the increases in salaries which were announced yesterday for those in group B; and are these protests particularly centred upon grade 1 stenographers, typists and clerks owing to the fact that their increases are only some $90 a year and it is some years since they have had an increase, there being no immediate prospect of another one?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this morning I did receive a telegram, which I have not yet had a chance to study, protesting the inadequacy of the increases in respect to certain classes of civil servants. This and other protests, if they are received, will certainly be considered by the government.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. I understand those protesting have asked the Prime Minister or the government whether they would agree to having treasury board review these increases. May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to have treasury board do this?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to discuss the matter at once with the President of the Privy Council as head of treasury board.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, Is it the intention of the government to recommend similar increases for the House of Commons staff?

Mr. Pearson: I will have to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SUGGESTED FORMATION OF PEACE CORPS—PROCEEDINGS OF THIRD EDUCATION CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the Canadian government will support the idea of a commonwealth peace corps, the creation of which is to be discussed at the third commonwealth education conference which opened in this chamber this morning? Also, does the government have any specific plans to present to the conference in regard to this commonwealth peace corps?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the idea is, of course, a very imaginative one and certainly commands not only the attention but the sympathy of all hon. members of the house as well as of the government. I think I should reserve any further expression of opinion until I have had a chance to discuss the matter with the delegation to the conference. Perhaps I will be able to make a statement on the matter shortly.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question, or perhaps it is a related question, which I would address to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance and the worth of the statements which were made at the opening of the commonwealth education conference here in this chamber this morning, and in view of the fact that they were made in this chamber, I wonder whether copies of the statements by the Prime Minister, Mr. Massey and Mr. Gérin-Lajoie could be obtained and perhaps made an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: It will certainly be possible, Mr. Speaker, to circulate what I thought was Mr. Massey's very important statement to all members, because it has been reproduced and I received a copy of it myself. If members would like to have it appear in Hansard as an appendix I am sure it can be arranged.

Mr. Knowles: From my observation I believe a stenographic report was being made of all three statements, and I do think it would be worth while to have all three appended to Hansard.

Mr. Pearson: I am sure that can be arranged.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the three statements be made an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of statements referred to above, see appendix.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can the Minister of Transport confirm or deny a rumour to the effect that he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs intend to oust the Prime Minister from his position and replace him with the hon. member for Essex East in a short while?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I wonder how silly some hon. members can be, sir.

Mr. Valade: The only silly member is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

GRAIN

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO FROST DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could he inform the house on the frost damage to grain in the province of Saskatchewan and in the west? This is a very urgent matter.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the latest information I have received about the wheat crop in Saskatchewan indicates that there was more extensive frost damage than had originally been thought. On August 11, 12 and 13 there appears to have been fairly extensive frost damage which is now showing up in the inspections which are being made of harvested grain.

[Later:]

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the answer given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to my colleague the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale regarding the serious frost damage in Saskatchewan, is the minister considering applying the same policy the former government applied in 1961 in respect of the benefits of P.F.A.A.? I make specific reference to the fact that in that year we allowed the farmers who suffered damage to crops due to drought to cut them for forage for the maintenance of livestock rather than hoping they would reach maturity.

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer to this question would involve government policy. This will be announced by the Minister of Agriculture in due course.

AGRICULTURE

MEETING OF MARITIME FEDERATION WITH FORESTRY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Forestry whether he has met with the delegation from the maritime federation of agriculture today, or whether the meeting has been arranged for tonight.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the meeting with the delegation from the Canadian federation of agriculture will take place this evening at nine o'clock in my office.

OMISSION FROM TRADE REPORT OF DETAILS RESPECTING LAMB AND MUTTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, and in view of his absence perhaps the acting minister or parliamentary secretary could answer. My question arises from the fact that the weekly livestock and meat trade report of August 6 no longer lists details pertaining to lamb and mutton, in particular. In view of the fact that this is a very highly competitive part of the agricultural economy would the minister not see fit to reinstate or at least supply these figures in this report, so this trade can be aware of the competition that it faces?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question about this important matter. I will bring it to the attention of the minister on his return.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF DIRECT SERVICE FROM NOVA SCOTIA TO BERMUDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which is related to the reply he gave the house last evening relative to the possibility of providing service between the Atlantic provinces and Bermuda and the Caribbean. In view of the fact that the minister stated it may not be economically possible to establish this service on a regular basis, has he given any thought to recommending to Air Canada officials that a service be established either once a week or twice a month between the Atlantic provinces and Bermuda and the Caribbean area?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that it could be established on a more frequent basis than that. I think the real obstacle is not the frequency of the service but the revision of the bilateral arrangements with the United Kingdom. Incidentally, I might add that I spoke to the president of Air Canada about this matter this morning and told him I had announced that T.C.A. was going to start the service immediately. He was a little surprised.

MEDICINE HAT—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF SERVICE BY AIR CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question. When the minister was speaking to the president of T.C.A. did he suggest to him that it was time they instituted an air line service in to and out of Medicine Hat?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): In fact, sir, I invited him to dinner so I could talk to him about it at length on Monday.

PUBLIC WORKS

OTTAWA—ABSENCE OF QUEBEC FLAG IN GARDEN OF THE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Could the minister answer the following question which is often put to me. Why is the province of Quebec not represented at the garden of the provinces by its official fleur-de-lis flag?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which I would like to take as notice.

[Text]

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CORRESPONDENCE IN ENGLISH WITH QUEBEC RESIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry and Minister of Defence Production?

I should like to ask the minister whether he gave orders to Mr. J. J. Simoneau, officer of the Quebec office of the defence production department, to correspond only in English with his countrymen of the province of Quebec who do not know that language? I have several proofs to that effect.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I never gave such orders and I would never think of doing so. Moreover, I am certain that nobody in my department gave such orders.

[Text]

PUBLICATIONS

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question occasioned by the written representations which I think came to all members, including the Prime Minister, from Mr. Cooke of Liberty magazine, in which Mr. Cooke alleged that Liberty ceased publication because of the lack of advertising revenue occasioned by pressure from Time and Reader's Digest. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has changed its position, or whether it is going to continue to let Time and Reader's Digest enjoy the same status as Canadian magazines.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter is still on our list for legislative action in the autumn. I hope we will be able to deal with it before the end of this session.

Mr. Fisher: I have a supplementary question. The Prime Minister will remember that when it was put on the order paper indications were given that there was no intention of doing anything that would affect Time and Reader's Digest. The purport of my question was to ask whether the government's intentions had changed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will not mind waiting for a few weeks longer when I hope to satisfy his very legitimate curiosity in a way which I hope will be satisfactory to him.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REDUCTION OF ACTIVITIES TO ASSIST PRIVATE INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In connection with the recent announcement in respect of assistance to the film industry in Canada, can the minister inform the house whether the government plans a gradual withdrawal of the film making activities of government corporations, particularly in the commercial and theatrical fields, in order to further assist our private film industry?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): I have a related question, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

Since the C.B.C. refuses to let the public see the "Mr. Pearson" film, could the minister say whether it would be possible to hold a public auction for its sale so that at least part of the production costs may be reimbursed by private enterprise?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, it has been said many times that the film is the exclusive property of the C.B.C.

Mr. Valade: Does the Secretary of State refuse to let the public see it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, that question has been answered several times in the course of this session.

Mr. Valade: So, the answer is "no".

TRANSPORT

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—REPORT ON FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. I am sorry I have not been able to give him notice, but I do not think he will need it. Can the minister say whether the report of the feasibility study made to his department in respect of the Prince Edward Island causeway recommends against the inclusion of a railway, as unofficial reports of the last few days seem to indicate?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the second interim report was received a few weeks ago and we are in the process of examining it. Actually I do not think it would be proper at this time to enter into a discussion in this regard. Perhaps it would be a good idea for me to make a short statement one of these days covering the actual studies in respect of this project. It is my intention to do that.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's statement. If he would be good enough to make such a statement on motions, when he is in a position to do so, I know it will meet with the approval of people in the maritimes vitally interested in this matter.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

KINGSTON—RENOVATION OF NAVAL BUILDING FOR ARMY USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I had already called orders of the day, but if the question is short and urgent perhaps we can hear it now.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware that a national defence building at Kingston, Ontario, formerly used for navy stores and now occupied by the army, is being restored by the army at a cost of $250,000, and that Indiana limestone is being imported from the United States for refacing a building intended for military functions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a question for the order paper.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

1. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $1,381,000.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Chairman—

[Text]

Mr. Hamilton: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, before the minister makes his statement could we have clarification of just what items are to be before the committee this afternoon. The Chair will recall that when we were considering the estimates of the Department of Agriculture we debated and discussed briefly that portion of the minister's responsibilities dealing with ARDA, but our discussion was curtailed because of the lateness of the hour in reaching that item and because the minister had to leave before the end of the day.

My first question is, is ARDA up for discussion under these estimates today, and under what item? My second question has to do with feed grains. Under what item will this subject be discussed? If the minister could answer these questions of order in his statement we on this side of the house would know when we are to raise these matters.

Mr. Sauvé: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I want to make a statement about this problem at the conclusion of my opening remarks on the forestry estimates.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, today I have the privilege of introducing the estimates of the Department of Forestry for the year ending March 31, 1965.

Hon. members know that I took over the Department of Forestry in February 1964. I am, therefore, submitting my first estimates to the house and would ask hon. members to bear with me if I am not quite up to the mark in giving the explanations they will ask of me.

May I at the outset pay tribute to the first two ministers who were responsible for the Department of Forestry which was created in August 1960 by the government led by the right hon. gentleman who is now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The first incumbent of the Department of Forestry, who is now the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), has left an indelible memory in his department and he was succeeded in the discharge of his responsibilities by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson). Those two ministers gave to the department leadership which I find very difficult to pursue with the same energy, for having always been linked with the forest industry they were both particularly qualified in this field.

I do not propose to make a lengthy statement at this time when introducing the estimates of my department for the fiscal year 1964-65, as it will officially change its name and significance when the house is called to consider the resolution introduced by the government on July 2 last, which can be found on the order paper under No. 60. When that resolution and the ensuing bill are passed, the Minister of Forestry will be the minister of forestry and of rural development, and I will then have the opportunity of explaining to hon. members in what way the department of forestry and rural development will discharge its new official responsibilities.

[Text]

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle brought up the problem of the estimates covering ARDA, feed grains and the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act. All these estimates were adopted by the house on July 10. I recognize quite well that although the discussion lasted for 70 to 80 minutes it was short, and I am quite prepared on vote No. 1 of the Department of Forestry this afternoon to entertain discussion of problems relating to these three items although they were carried on July 10 under the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

May I be allowed to pay homage, Mr. Chairman, to the highly qualified personnel of the Department of Forestry and to the deputy minister, Dr. Rousseau, a well known scientist, who accepted the direction of a large and highly qualified team of researchers in the recently created Department of Forestry. Last year several special developments of considerable moment made history for my department. Outstanding among these was the convening of the first federal-provincial forest ministers' conference in Ottawa under the chairmanship of the then minister of forestry, now Postmaster General. The department also acted as official host to a meeting of the North American forestry commission sponsored by the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations. Dr. Rousseau, our deputy minister, acted as chairman of this important meeting. Leading foresters and forestry scientists from many countries attended this conference. My colleague the former minister of forestry, now Postmaster General, headed the Canadian delegation to the twelfth biennial conference of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations held in Rome.

A first step toward the development of a departmental organization orientated toward our function of responsibilities to the Canadian forest community was also undertaken. A draft report of the reorganization survey team is nearing completion. The main problems facing the Department of Forestry are the following:

[Translation]

Because the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Forestry is limited, since the administration of forests is the exclusive responsibility of the provinces, we feel that the department ought to make a special effort to direct its research work in order to meet the requirements of industry and the lumber business.

Consequently, I feel that it is extremely important to help in organizing, in co-operation with the provinces, the universities and the industry, the direction of the departmental research work, which is carried out in the field of the basic sciences or applied sciences related to forestry.

We feel that up to the present the efforts of the department were probably too limited and an extensive development in this field will be required.

On the other hand, the Department of Forestry has been urged for a long time to give more thought to forest fire prevention, a problem which, even though coming under exclusive provincial jurisdiction, could be solved to some extent through co-operation between the provinces and the federal government.

It is therefore our intention to try to promote more co-operation between the provinces in this respect, so as to eliminate the evil of forest fires in Canada.

Moreover, the federal government has a very definite responsibility in the economic field. We feel that the Department of Forestry, which is the result, as I said earlier, of the merger of two branches of the Department of Agriculture and of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, has not paid enough attention to the economic problem.

I feel that it will be absolutely necessary, in the coming year, to organize the economic section of the department to give it the importance it deserves and, especially, to give direction to the forest policy of Canada both on the national and international levels.

The 1964-65 main estimates total $19,469,700. This figure represents an increase of $1,482,800 over 1963-64, or about 7½ per cent. The increase is accounted for mainly in three objects of expenditure. The first, salaries and wages, shows an increase of approximately $460,000. The department has received treasury board authority to recruit up to 100 per cent of its establishment. This change from the earlier 92 per cent authorization has its effect on the salary total. The change is mainly due to the lifting of the freeze that was imposed on the department when it was established in 1960. In part, also, the increase is accounted for by reclassifications and statutory salary increases.

The second object of expenditure, "construction or acquisition of buildings, works and land" shows an increase of approximately $550,000, or about 37 per cent of the total increase. We have several substantial projects included in this category. One is a further amount of $1 million in vote 25 toward completion of a forest research laboratory in British Columbia. There is also a $600,000 item in vote 3 toward construction of an extension to the pulp and paper research institute of Canada laboratory at Pointe Claire, Quebec. On a somewhat smaller scale, we have provided $120,000 in vote 35 to build an extension to our Vancouver forest products research laboratory, and $92,000 in the same vote to erect a research saw mill at Petawawa, Ontario.

An over-all increase of approximately $300,000, about 20 per cent of the total increase, is shown for the construction or acquisition of equipment. Of this amount approximately $100,000 in vote 35 is provided to equip the research saw mill mentioned above at Petawawa. About $50,000 in votes 25 and 35 is intended for the purchase of heavy scientific equipment. Another $50,000 in vote 15 is provided to purchase heavy motorized equipment. A $30,000 item in vote 1 will equip the art and graphic section to work in support of our research elements.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

The balance of the increase is intended for various objects of expenditure. In a number of instances the dollar amounts are insignificant, but none account for more than about 5 per cent of the total increase. In some instances increases have been offset by decreases in other areas.

The department's supplementary estimates total approximately $800,000. Of this total by far the largest amount is a $500,000 item to permit continuation of New Brunswick's spruce budworm spraying program. This program, conducted in previous years, is a project sponsored jointly by the federal government, the New Brunswick government and the New Brunswick forest industries. Each participant contributes one third of the cost. There is also an item of $150,000 in vote 25A as an additional amount required for our new laboratory at Victoria. The $97,000 item in vote 15A is intended for the purchase of field equipment to support additional survey parties being sent into the field this year. Finally there is an item of approximately $50,000 in vote 10A to provide operating funds for our increased establishment.

Before I conclude my very short remarks on the estimates, Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to give some explanation of an answer to a question which appeared in Hansard concerning the number of employees recruited by this department from May 1, 1963 to May 31, 1964. The total number was given as 299, and some members were wondering why there had been such an increase. There is a very simple explanation. Of these 299 people who were recruited in that period, 225 were seasonal employees, graduates and students employed during last summer. Of the remainder there are 22 professionals, 26 technicians and 26 clerical and administrative staff who have been hired to replace members of our staff who left, or to comply with our establishment.

These are the very brief remarks which I intended to make this afternoon, Mr. Chairman. If we do not have time to conclude the estimates this afternoon I will be pleased to answer all the questions that I do not have time to answer in the house by writing to each member. I will do what I can to satisfy the members fully.

Mr. Hamilton: May I ask the minister a question on procedure? I wonder if the minister would find it acceptable, and the Chair would find it easier, if we were to agree that our discussion in the early stages this afternoon should be concentrated on the Department of Forestry, and then reserve the right under item 1, when all the forestry items are completed, to come back and discuss ARDA, the feed grain policy and such other related items? This would avoid mixing up forestry with a partial discussion of ARDA, feed grains, and so on.

Mr. Sauvé: I have no objection.

The Chairman: Is that agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gundlock: I thank the minister for his statement, and particularly his complimentary remarks with regard to the former minister. It has come to my attention that there has been a great need for this department. As we all know, it was established by the former government and I greatly appreciate the minister's remarks, particularly the complimentary way in which he spoke of the former minister. We all feel much the same. I say sincerely to the minister that I hope he will enjoy a similar association with this department.

I want to bring to the minister's attention this afternoon some aspects of forestry management, particularly as they relate to what is known as the eastern Rockies watershed. This area is important not only to my constituency but to the prairie provinces as a whole. I find some difficulty, Mr. Chairman, in separating the actual management and conservation of forests from water and soil conservation and the production that is so closely related thereto. However, in discussing forest conservation and production I have to bear in mind, as I said before, the relationship of the conservation of our water supply.

I have in mind an example or two to which I should like to call the minister's attention as well as the attention of the members of the department. The need is very urgent at the moment, and the sooner something can be done about this the better it will be for the whole country. I am referring to the recent floods we have had in this area. Practically everyone in this house has had his attention drawn to the floods that occurred on the eastern watershed of the Rockies, particularly in the southern area where most of the damage was done. Those floods were not entirely the result of an act of God but resulted from what I might almost term mismanagement. I do not choose to use that word at this stage, but there are one or two things that should be brought to the attention of the department and of people in general. It is something we have to be aware of and, as a matter of fact, should be aware of before it happens. That is the way real conservation and production are reached, to recognize the needs before things like this happen.

I may be just a little bit out of order, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to point out two examples, one of them being something that happened in a national park and the other adjacent to it on the eastern slopes of the Rockies. I believe it would be well for the minister and his officials to consider closer co-operation with the parks department because the first example I mention deals with an area of mature timber. A strong wind went through it and levelled this timber which, a few years previously, had been in its prime and, if handled properly, would not only have benefited the park and the people who visit it, but the country as a whole. Now, however, this watershed is completely waste.

With proper co-operation between the departments this could have been avoided, thus aiding the beautification of the park, the utilization of valuable forest products and the preservation of the watershed to maintain supplies of water for the adjacent areas.

I mention this example because the minister said he wanted advice. I do not purport to present this as advice. I do not pretend to be advising the minister, but things like this require urgent action and they are happening all over the country. The other day I visited in Ontario and a few weeks before that in Quebec, and in both places I saw the results of forest mismanagement in depletion of the soil and water supplies. If I may digress for a moment, there is one very real example of this in the reduced water levels of the great lakes and in the St. Lawrence seaway. The low levels in the St. Lawrence seaway have actually affected the delivery of western grain and other products. Boats are not able to load to their full capacities, which results in higher freight costs and stiffer competition for export trade.

The other example I want to mention is related very closely to forest management. I believe the departmental officials should co-operate with provincial authorities on the practice of allowing livestock to be pastured in forest areas. Some areas have been badly damaged by over-grazing in the summer months. They are very valuable sources of pasture for livestock producers and could become much more valuable, but the sorry fact is that some of them have been abused and neglected. This is something which is closely related to forest conservation and Canadian production as a whole, and if matters like this are neglected or ignored they can tend to deplete our water supplies.

In my area some people think we will never run short of water, which is used in three main ways, namely for irrigation—we have half a million acres under irrigation—for commercial demands, and for domestic uses. Other people however are beginning to wonder which use has a prior right. A few years of drought and, through neglect, a forest fire, would result in a reduction of the water supply. What would happen then when the three prime users would begin to vie and compete with each other for the existing supply?

The very fact that this department was created a few years ago has brought home more than ever to the Canadian people the great need for conservation, and I like to relate this to production, because through proper management we can aid the production of forest products and agricultural products and at the same time conserve our water supplies. I would like to relate this need for conservation to the ARDA program but I understand we will be doing this a little later and that other speakers will mention it. I think the ARDA program is a good one but I believe it has not been applied as rapidly and as usefully as it should. Related to forest production and conservation, it is a wonderful program. I complimented the minister earlier. I am quite sure he will take a very active interest in this matter, and before long I hope these two programs will dovetail and not only increase our production but our potential in this connection.

I also wanted to say something with regard to ARDA, soil and water conservation and the management and production thereof. I also have a word or two to say about feed grains. I will not say very much about these matters at this time except to mention that I am extremely interested in them and will be looking forward to hearing other hon. members putting forward their points of view this afternoon. This all ties in, Mr. Chairman; it is so hard to separate conservation from production. Forest conservation and production, water conservation, land conservation and their production are all tied together.

I shall conclude my remarks now, Mr. Chairman, and urge the minister very sincerely to keep these few suggestions in mind. I would also say that we on this side of the house, in spite of some of the things that take place now and then, are very sincerely interested in these matters and would be glad to co-operate with the minister and his department on any and every opportunity.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I cannot dissemble my disappointment at the introductory remarks of the minister. I will not say he was beating around the bush, but he reminded me very much of a former minister of this house, Henri Courtemanche, when he presented his first estimates. There was that diffident approach of, "I have only been here a few months", sort of thing, "and I haven't really got a grip on things. But you just wait. One of these days I am going to be there". I would like to point out to the minister that he entered upon his portfolio with a considerable reputation, a reputation that I think a great many of us respect; that of a man of energy, education and imagination. He has been given the responsibility of a portfolio that has a great opportunity. Yet here, when he introduces his estimates, we get in effect the old, traditional lead-off speech by a minister who is in charge of nothing more than a bureaucracy, tossing off a few statistics, a few remarks and a brief outline of the organization that has been prepared for him by his deputy.

I suggest to the minister that this kind of introduction is not what we expected from him and I do not think it is up to his capacities and abilities. I suggest he has a magnificent opportunity with this department, and so far he has not given any indication that he is going to seize it. I am not talking about feed grains and eastern agriculture; I am talking about forestry. I want to give credit to members who are no longer with us, having been defeated in elections. I refer to the then members for Nanaimo, for Comox-Alberni, Mr. McQuillan, and for Coast-Capilano, who are no longer with us. They shared with me the task of writing a committee report several years ago following many meetings of the committee on mines, forests and waters, which in many ways led to the creation of the Department of Forestry. I would also like to compliment the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who it seems to me was the man in the cabinet at the time who had the perspective as to what this department might be.

Mr. Dinsdale: The vision.

Mr. Fisher: I was bitterly disappointed—and I have expressed it in this house before—over the fact that the first minister and the one who followed him were in a sense carrying on what were nothing more than the traditions that had been established by rather effective but limited branches dealing with forestry; I am thinking particularly of the forestry branch and the forest products research organization. I have nothing critical to say, but if the minister would go back and look at the recommendations that came out of that committee he would realize we had a much wider and greater dream, or vision, if you want, for a federal Department of Forestry. He has not given any indication that he has anything of that sort in mind.

I suggest to the minister that he may be confounded over the fact that he is an ambitious person within the political framework and may be seeing his role more as a politician than as the imaginative leader of a department. I suggest that the way for him to move to a really senior place in our political situation is to really do something with this department. I believe that nothing has really been achieved yet by the Department of Forestry. As a matter of fact, if I could make the recommendation now or have any influence on it, after taking a continued interest in forestry and being one of those who wanted the department set up, I would say we might as well go back to the old situation, stick the forest products branch and the forestry branch back in the department from which they came, and look to the Department of Industry for the kind of imaginative development in forestry on the economic and industrial side that we would want.

As hon. members may be aware, I represent the largest constituency in Ontario. Its whole base is in the forest industry. It is perhaps the most productive part of Ontario, in dollar terms, where forestry is concerned. The regional, Port Arthur branch of the provincial department of lands and forests is probably the most important one in Ontario. In other words, the lakehead plays somewhat the same part and holds the same position in the pulp and paper and forestry industry in Ontario as the community of Three Rivers traditionally plays in the province of Quebec. Because of this basic economic factor, anyone who represents the area has to be concerned with and involved in forestry matters.

As a result of this I have spent a considerable time looking at American installations in the lake states; I have paid a visit to Finland and Russia to look at some of their forestry methods and the way they do things; I have had contact, as someone who established a forestry research library, at least with the literature on the subject; and I am very much aware—at least, this is my opinion —that we desperately need some kind of breakthrough in leadership on the federal scene in order to achieve the kind of solutions to our forestry problems which have not yet been forthcoming.

I would like to suggest to the minister some of the ways in which he should move and some of the reasons for the difficulties. I think one of the prime reasons for the difficulties in forestry relates to the very success of the forest industry itself; I am thinking particularly of the pulp and paper industry. I think the position was put in a nutshell by perhaps the most famous of all Canadian foresters, certainly the wealthiest, namely H. R. MacMillan. In 1957 H. R. MacMillan, with 50 years of professional experience behind him, said:

> It is doubtful whether Canada, with its present attention to forest management, can sustain today's annual cut in perpetuity, even by going farther north each decade into virgin forest (at greater cost for logs) or by using a higher proportion of inferior species (thus reducing our competitive ability in the foreign markets on which we depend).

I know of very little since 1957 which has changed that basic situation which H. R. MacMillan pointed out. One of the real tragedies is this. When I raised this matter in the house once before, one of the senior people in the forestry field in Ontario belaboured me in the forestry newsletter; but I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that one of the prime difficulties is the very success of the forest industry, which in its pulp and paper aspect has given the actual foresters as a profession really no choice at all. I think forestry is more than a science; to a considerable extent it is an art. But a forester has to take a very long view because he is dealing with something that moves in cycles. A decade means nothing when you are managing a forest. The very approach of the forester, with his long range view and concern for the whole climate and the ecology of materials, and the large corporation with its annual report and quarterly dividends, tends to pull things asunder.

One of the unfortunate things is that foresters, as persons professionally trained and dedicated to an ideal, have not made their way with great speed up the ladder in the country's industries. It is much more often the chartered accountant who becomes the big wheel, or the logging superintendent with an engineering background, and one of the consequences is that all too rarely in our forest industry do we have that kind of idealistic conception. A forester, I would put to you, does deal with an ideal. It is the ideal of the perfect forest with the best possible use being made of it. You cannot live in a Utopia and you cannot create a Utopia, but it seems to me that it should always be an ideal; and it should always be the ideal in forestry to have the kind of conservation in silviculture which is always considering the forest at its best and optimum use, and getting the most commercial use from it.

In Finland I was impressed with the way both private and public forestry has entered the country and enabled it to get a fantastic return from its forests. I would point out to hon. members that Finland is a country approximately the same area as my constituency with approximately the same amount of forest cover. In many ways we have a better soil and climate than Finland has. Perhaps we do not have quite as long a growing season but there is quite a similarity. Yet Finland, a country with four to five million people, is able to accomplish a tremendous amount in paying back reparation, in supporting one of the best and most attractive small countries in Europe largely on its forests. Those forests represent an area no more than what we have in my riding of Port Arthur in terms of square miles. Dr. Piha, head of Finnish forestry, when I told him I was so impressed with their practices in Finland, said to me: "I am afraid you do not get good forestry practices till there is a desperate shortage of wood; till people begin to realize that there is no alternative to good forest management. We had to wait for it in Finland". He said the same thing followed from his Swedish experience.

Then I asked him what the Russians were doing, and he said that they have so much forest land they are just biting into it and really do not know where they are going. I had the pleasure of going to Leningrad and talking to forestry specialists there, and I think his judgment was correct. The Russians do have so much by way of forested land that they really have not got a good preliminary survey under way yet and they are not sure as to their future. But they have a logging and management concept which I think is tremendously advanced. They have plans for their cut-over areas which are much ahead of anything I know or which has been conceived of in this country, particularly by the provinces.

I make these points, Mr. Chairman, about what I saw in Finland and Russia really to come to my conclusion, that I do not think the experience of any other countries can be at all translated. I did not come back from there with the feeling that there were great lessons to be learned from either Finland or Russia on the part of Canadian foresters. I am sure that some of our logging people could get ideas in the way of mass producing and whole tree logging, but I do not think you can apply experience of other countries to the kind of traditions and experiences which we have. However, I do think it is worth while going to see what other people such as the Finns and the Swedes can achieve by way of greater use of forest resources which are much greater than we have, and this is all tied in with a total use concept, which includes recreation, boating, camping, and living in the forest, things we have not even thought of or reached for yet.

Our problems in this country really come down to the fact that we have 11 different forest policies. Given 11 different forest policies, what role has the federal government in forestry? I can only put it in simple terms, Mr. Chairman: We have no role at all. I think it has been something of a charlatan here with regard to what we have been allowed to develop in terms of federal forest agencies, because these agencies really cannot play a positive role at the present time. They go through the motions, and they are rather good motions, of the forest roads program, the reforestation program, support for forest fire protection, a bit of general collusion on information, and some good research in forest products. But there is a tremendous limitation on it because of the variety of jurisdictions of operation, because of the jealousies which are in existence and because the forestry profession in Canada itself is not sure where it is going or what it needs to be doing.

I suggest to the minister that there are at least three places where he can look for and find opportunities to enlarge the scope of the Department of Forestry and to enable it not only to give leadership but begin to wipe out some of the varieties of standards which we possess. I want to start with what is the simplest one, and in a sense the least far-reaching. This is a suggestion I put to the former minister of forestry, who is sitting in the house now, but I never heard any more from him. I told him that he should be the first minister of forestry to realize that the best way to solve our Indian problem in this country is to tie in a real forestry development program with the Indians, who in most parts of the country live in forested areas, so that the Indian has some kind of economic confidence and is able to work in the forest. At the present time there is hardly a reserve in the country with a decent forest stand. I suggest that a lot of things could be renegotiated with the provincial governments. At least, they are now paying lipservice through their departments of lands and forests to doing something for the Indians.

Forestry work, whether it is planting trees for a couple of weeks in the spring or fall or whether it is actually doing logging work, is something which the Indians can get on to. It is a natural for the kind of community in which they are used to living. But there must be much more leadership coming from the Indian affairs branch in this particular regard. Several years ago I tried to set up a project on forestry work for Indians in a reserve near lake Nipigon and I wound up with an involvement of four different private organizations which held leases from the provincial department, and also the trade unions became involved. So this is the complicating factor: The forests of Canada are being exploited at the present time within the private management framework and the trade union framework. It is going to take a tremendous amount of development work and initiative, and the sort of expenditure that the federal government might provide, before we are able to make a breakthrough and employ Indians to work as trained technicians, or loggers, or people carrying out the most routine and simple kind of silviculture improvement work.

It is my suggestion that this is one of the things which the Minister of Forestry can do in the country, but it will not be done by sitting in an office in Ottawa listening to officials who are used to a bureaucratic approach for all their generation. It will not be any good going to the Indian affairs branch and talking to their officials, who think in terms of rations and some kind of handout program, of $500 here or $1,000 there, or letting them cut cordwood for the winter to keep their houses warm. It must be something which both the government and the minister throw themselves into. I suggest that this is one field which would take the Department of Forestry into almost every province in the country and give it and its officials and the professional people a much greater understanding of some of the problems met by the local communities.

I mention this because so often when I talk with foresters and loggers in the industry I encounter a kind of pleasant contempt which they have for the federal Department of Forestry. I do not go along with their contempt, but their attitude is usually based in dollars and cents terms. They feel if something pays, it is worth while, but that these fellows spend too much of their time in Ottawa and Petawawa, and forestry stations, frigging around with experiments. This department has sample plots all over the country, and what good are they? I understand if one could put the sample plots that have been established in this country end to end, in order to visit them all a man would have to go across Canada and back. As a matter of fact, I imagine a good deal of the foresters spend much of their time trying to make sure they have not lost track of all the records in respect of the sample plots. Perhaps I am exaggerating somewhat, but in many ways that is the situation.

I believe that if some of our professional foresters in the federal service were really at work bringing the Indians into a program associated with forestry, lumbering and logging, which was practical and really trained them, we would really begin to move the Indians off the reservations and provide the type of income that would do something for them. I should like to point out to the minister that I have on occasion witnessed an Indian who got out and worked for a pulp and paper company and eventually earned $6,000 or $7,000 per year. If one really wishes to consider the materialism aspect of this situation, he has only to look at that kind of Indian who is earning a good income, which captures him, so that he begins to move up in social class terms. This may sound crude, but this is the kind of thing we need for the Indians in order to give them the kind of income and economic future that will enable them to share in the material things we have and provide educational opportunities for their children. The Indian is not going to do this as long as he is sequestered on a reserve, living on the rations, handouts and paternalism that he now receives from the Indian affairs branch.

The Indian affairs branch was very pleased last year because in my area they found the opportunity of appointing an officer to look after the educational and employment opportunities for Indians in northwestern Ontario. He is looking after the employment and educational opportunities for about 16,000 Indians scattered 800 miles east and west and 500 miles north and south. What kind of an impact do you expect to make in respect of creating employment opportunities for Indians with that point of view?

I suggest to the minister that the first step he must take as the Minister of Forestry to really achieve the kind of reputation he would like for his department is in the direction of using the forestry industry as a means of making the Indians in our country full time citizens with economic opportunities. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, the minister will not have an easy job in this regard. The situation will vary from place to place in the country, and a successful approach will require a tremendous amount of diplomacy, having regard to trade unions in particular, and provincial departments. I think the people in Canada have good will and intentions in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal now with the second point I wish to draw to the minister's attention. When I was rather young I travelled a good deal in northern Minnesota and was rather impressed by the example set by the United States civilian conservation corps. During the depression years the civilian conservation corps employed 3,000 boys and young men during the first year it was organized and 5,000 in its second year. This is the kind of undertaking we need to deal with the growing problems with which we are faced. We would be required to follow this example on a smaller scale, of course, but through such an organization I certainly can see the possibility of both a meaningful conservation program developing, about which so many foresters love to talk at conventions—and that is about all—as well as some useful conservation being carried out by young people. This program could also include the planning and developing of parks.

It seems to me we have built a raft of schools all over this country under the vocational and technical assistance act. We have spent an astronomical amount, approximately $500 million. I think within two or three years this program will cost the federal government almost $1 billion. This is a good program, and certainly provides training schools in many parts of the country, but the basic industry relies upon forests, which in many ways have been disappearing. One can talk a good deal about sustained yield, but approximately 35 per cent of the cut-overs in the pulp and paper country of Ontario and Quebec are really not regenerated to any degree of quality. Considering the kind of personnel we have, water pollution, low water levels, the demand and response in respect of the parks we have created, I feel a civilian conservation corps could play a tremendous role in this country. Such a program would tie in perfectly with the kind of practical education opportunities we wish to provide a great many people.

In Ontario there is a junior forest rangers scheme in operation. Young lads are put to work during their summer holidays, but there are almost ten times as many boys who want this opportunity as there are opportunities provided by the department of lands and forests. The greatest demand for this kind of opportunity exists in the larger urban areas where the population is concentrated. Such a program would tie in magnificently with forest management and would help in respect of thinning, planting and a return of our forests to the magnificence they possessed in their natural state.

I realize that the question which must be in the minister's mind in this regard, in view of the fact he is from the province of Quebec, concerns provincial jurisdiction. I suggest this kind of program would have to be a shared program, and that it could not be just one allowing a national group of individuals to run around in uniforms and work in the bush. I think the minister should approach this problem by working with one provincial forestry department which might be co-operative, such as the department of forestry of British Columbia or Ontario, and find out whether after a trial run of perhaps two years it would be possible to take a number of these people, who are looking for work and training under schedule 5, and are carried by the Department of Labour, in an attempt to develop a team of men who would receive training and perform useful work in our forests.

I can visualize a number of ways that this program could be tied in with ARDA. The minister will acknowledge that ARDA does allow a training program on a regional basis as far as financing is concerned. It seems to me that ARDA could be used in this way to provide the framework of a program to carry out this kind of thing.

Mr. Chairman, we need a minister of forestry who has sufficient imagination and drive to take advantage of this opportunity and move with it. I believe my suggestion is practical, although I realize one of the difficulties that was encountered in the United States in respect of the civilian conservation corps developed because it became a political football. Both the civilian conservation corps and the W.P.A. became political footballs. I remember the signs which hung in United States bars and which said: "Don't shoot it; it is not a bear, it is a W.P.A. worker having a sleep." That was the suggestion on the sign.

I agree that a program of this kind cannot be developed on a sound basis of the people who are to participate in it are a select group. Mr. Chairman, I can visualize the potentialities of such a program. Many good things could be done in this way and I recommend this idea to the minister as the second thing he should do as the Minister of Forestry.

The third thing I should like the minister to do is tackle the problems which face the forestry production industry in Canada. Surely the federal Department of Forestry, which is the senior department, should have some idea of the future need and demand for foresters in this country. There is considerable confusion in this regard. Recently in the lakehead area we have had discussions about attempts to establish a degree course in forestry. We have had a tremendous variety of prognostications in respect of the need for foresters, the required level of training for men who now know this industry in its entirety. We have also considered how far we must train individuals required in the different technical sections of this industry.

It seems to me that the forestry industry will continue to be the basic and most important element of our economy, and it is for that reason I suggest the minister could best become informed and enthusiastic about forestry in Canada by carrying out a study in respect of future needs in the field of forestry personnel. He should make this a very wide ranging project, because the situation is continually changing.

People have the conception that a forester is someone who wears a boy scout hat, high boots and travels around marking or blazing trees. It is a much more complicated field than that and it has much more variety. I think we need to know more about what our needs are in this field at the present time. Again, there is no central agency that really knows these things. Certainly the Canadian institute of forestry, which is the foresters' national organization, has really not come up with anything like this. I suggest to the minister it is with this organization he should co-operate and work in getting a draft of our future needs in terms of foresters and technicians. I think this would fit into the other two proposals I have put before the minister and I would hope they would at least interest him.

The one thing I would ask of the minister is that he would at least consider my suggestion seriously. I do not expect him to give the usual defence, what I might call the Henri Courtemanche defence, which would be to get up and read something prepared in rebuttal by his officials, pointing out all the worth-while little things that the Department of Forestry does or has done or plans to do. I have seen that in the department's annual report and in the publications that are listed here. I should like to suggest to the minister that we need something much bolder and more creative. He in particular more than anyone who is likely to fill that post has the opportunity, because for some reason he has the reputation. If the minister has been good enough to create the reputation, I think it is about time that, given the job he has, he began to come through and back it up with something solid.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to make a few brief observations in a general way with regard to the estimates of the department now before us. Others of my colleagues will be dealing with various aspects of the estimates and also with ARDA and the various programs to which reference has been made this afternoon. I should like to extend my congratulations to the minister on his appointment to this portfolio but in doing so I express some disappointment that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was transferred from the Department of Forestry to the Post Office Department. I believe he is a man of experience who was prepared to give definite and positive leadership in the department. I do not say that, however, with any intention of downgrading the present minister. I feel he will build upon the foundation laid by his predecessor, as his predecessor built upon the initial work of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton in setting up the department.

As I have indicated, Mr. Chairman, I want to make some general remarks in regard to the Department of Forestry. I think we all recognize the fact that forestry is one of Canada's greatest industries. I suppose there are those in various parts of the country who will sometimes question that statement because of the fact that in their areas forestry does not particularly concern them. In fact, we were talking in a jocular fashion a little while ago and one of my colleagues said he did not have a tree in his constituency and therefore he would not presume to speak on forestry. Nevertheless I believe all of us in the house today recognize the tremendous importance of the forests and the forest industries to the Canadian economy.

Like one of the other speakers today I was somewhat disappointed that the minister did not take this opportunity to present a challenging program to us and outline some of the things he is contemplating as far as the development of the department is concerned. However, a very interesting pamphlet came to hand just recently from the Department of Forestry. It is publication No. 1002 titled "Canada, A Forest Nation". I think this is basically true. I should like to refer to several sections. It begins with the statement that Canada is a forest nation and the second paragraph reads as follows:

> The total forested area of Canada is more than 1,700,000 square miles. Productive forests—those capable of producing usable timber—cover one million square miles. About 80 per cent of this forest land is publicly owned and administered by the ten provincial governments which make the forest crop available to the forest industries through a variety of systems. The remaining 20 per cent is made up of farm woodlots, forest land owned by companies and individuals, and of areas for which the federal government is responsible.

With respect to the annual forest harvest it states:

> The annual harvest from the forest averages 3,200 million cubic feet.

Further on it states:

> The forest industries employ over 300,000 and pay out $1,200 million in salaries and wages each year. Woods operations account for about $400 million in salaries and wages and provide employment in the neighbourhood of 80,000 man years, or the equivalent of 80,000 year round jobs.

Then it goes on to refer to the pulp and paper industry and to the fact that over a period of 50 years it has grown to become Canada's leading manufacturing industry. The pamphlet goes on to set out some of the important facts with relation to Canada as a forest nation. I think this information should be of real interest to many who come from sections of the country that are not forested. I give this information once again to indicate the fact that the minister has jurisdiction at least to a certain degree over one of Canada's greatest industries. I also wish to point out in this connection that even as forestry is one of Canada's great industries, so in my own province of British Columbia it occupies a very important place. The hon. member for Vancouver East interjects that British Columbia has 60 million acres of forest. I have here a pamphlet headed "British Columbia, Facts and Statistics, 1963". It contains some very interesting information with regard to British Columbia and I should like to put a few of these facts on the record. With regard to forestry it states:

> The forests form the backbone of the British Columbia economy and contribute most to provincial income and employment. The estimated net value of production of all forest industries amounted to $850 million in 1963, or approximately 36 per cent of total production.

The report goes on to state:

> Of all manufacturing industries in British Columbia, lumber ranks first, pulp and paper ranks second, while plywood constitutes the fourth largest industry in the province. At present the British Columbia forest industries produce nearly 70 per cent of all the lumber manufactured in Canada—

I think this is something for us to appreciate.

> —20 per cent of all the pulp, almost 15 per cent of all the paper, and approximately 85 per cent of all the plywood. The forest industries are an important source of employment. In 1963 they directly employed approximately 78,000 persons.
> During the year 1962 British Columbia exported to foreign countries $602,400,000 worth of wood and wood products. Of this total, 75 per cent went to the United States, while 12 per cent went to the United Kingdom. The most important wood products exported in order of their value were: Lumber, $303,500,000; pulp, $123,600,000; newsprint, $105,900,000.

I think we in British Columbia have a tremendous heritage and a wonderful opportunity so far as this particular aspect of our economy is concerned. As I have pointed out, it is important not only to Canada but to British Columbia. Of course, as indicated by the percentage of the wealth that is accumulated from this source in British Columbia, there is a tremendous contribution in turn to our national economy.

Now, the entry of the federal government into the areas of activity and responsibility that have hitherto been considered of provincial concern now extends to forestry. I just read a booklet the other day pointing out the periods of time during which the federal government moved into certain areas that previously had been under provincial jurisdiction. It referred to national health and welfare, labour and the trend now to accept certain responsibilities with respect to the education of our people, especially in higher education. This trend has been extended now to forestry. Here, we come again to the importance of federal-provincial relations. Forestry comes under provincial jurisdiction, yet it seems as though the problems in this area are of such a magnitude, so widespread and so general across the country, that it seems advisable the federal authorities should assume some particular role so far as the development of our forests is concerned.

This was pointed out by the hon. member for Port Arthur as presenting one of the problems, the fact that we now have ten provincial jurisdictions and a federal jurisdiction. If there is going to be satisfactory progress made in the various fields of endeavour there will have to be close co-operation and liaison maintained between federal and provincial jurisdictions. I do feel, however, as I have pointed out, that unquestionably the establishment of the federal Department of Forestry has been worth while. It has a legitimate function to perform so long as it is careful to confine itself to those matters outlined when the department was set up.

Reference has been made to the matter of conservation. We know that this is a very important part of forestry development in our country. If we do not have proper conservation and reforestation, then the time is going to come when we are not going to have any forests. This has been recognized by those who have been interested in this particular matter, and a great deal of attention has been given to it. I was reminded the other day, when there was a discussion taking place on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, that natural resources were included in the setting of the bases for the equalization grants, but no attention was given to the cost involved. The gross income was considered.

I should like to refer to a brief statement from a publication dealing with British Columbia forest industry facts, which states that the provincial government received $35 million in direct revenue, exclusive of income and sales taxes, from the sale of timber licences and stumpage in 1963, but the British Columbia forest services spent $17 million on all phases of its activities which included protection and the renewal of the resource. We see here therefore that in the province of British Columbia, and I imagine in other provinces that have extensive forest resources, a great deal of money is expended on the matter of conservation. I feel that in all of our discussions and in all of our negotiations we should remember, or the federal government should remember, that there is a great deal of money spent in conservation and promotion of these different things which should be taken into consideration. This includes, of course, fire protection to which the minister made reference in his introductory remarks.

There is just one other matter to which I should like to make a brief reference, and that is the matter of research. I think it is very necessary for research in this particular field to be accelerated. A certain amount is being done in universities by provincial governments. Then of course the industry itself is expending considerable amounts of money on research. However, the problems that affect the forest industry are more or less general. I suppose there are some local problems, but to a large extent the problems that affect the industry are country-wide, from one coast to the other. I feel there is a legitimate area here in which the federal department could expand its research facilities. The minister made some reference today to the fact that facilities are being extended in the province of British Columbia. We do appreciate this. As I pointed out, this is one of the fields in which I think those in the forest industry have a part to play. They could do so by pooling all their resources, pooling all their research facilities. Only in this way will adequate and effective progress be made in the field of research.

As I have stated, Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make these brief remarks. Other matters will be dealt with when we come to the various items.

Mr. Hamilton: There is no department of the government of Canada that can better be described as the Cinderella department than the Department of Forestry. I do not believe I need to hold up the committee by reminding all Canadians that the forest industry, not only presently but for long years in the future, is the most important industry we have in Canada. Under the constitutional arrangement that we have, this industry is under the ownership, management and control of our ten provincial governments. The only direct control the federal government has in this field is in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Having mentioned the simple realities of the background of the situation, I may say it has become increasingly clear in the last 15 years that something was drastically wrong with the handling of our forests in Canada. There is no need quarrelling about how this complicated situation developed. The fact remained that something had to be done. The reasons something had to be done were clear. In 1949, for example, the food and agriculture organization pointed out in its report that tremendously increased demands would be occurring in the world markets for products of the forests. This report in 1949 should have warned us in Canada that we, with our tremendous base of forest resources, should begin to plan for the day when we would be under pressure to supply the market.

In 1959 the food and agriculture organization of the world published its second report, pointing out once again in a revised form that the calculation on which the demand factor had been predicted in 1949 was wrong and it should have been much greater than had been indicated in 1949. It was on the basis of the 1959 report that the government of the day decided to do something about the challenge facing the forestry industry of Canada. We based our decision in setting up a new forestry department on the fact that demand by the people of the world for the products of the forests, primarily in paper products at that time but also in sawn lumber, would increase at such a rate that if something was not done in the lumber and paper producing countries of the world there would be a serious shortage all around the world. This was the first premise on which we worked.

The second premise on which we worked was that since the ownership of the forests and their management lay in the hands of the provincial governments, it was impossible for the officials of the branch of forestry, which was then in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, to deal on a basis of equality with ministers and deputy ministers at the provincial level. It seemed clear to us that if we were to take advantage of the opportunities that existed in the markets of the world for the products of the forests, we had to raise the status of this branch to the full level of having its own minister. It is, after all, our No. 1 industry; and this was done.

I would like to be able to say that in the intervening four years much progress has been made, but quite frankly I am appalled at how little has been done to meet the challenge of the opportunity that exists. As the hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out, you cannot move in the forest industry quickly and get the results you want. All your planning is based on 20, 30, 40 and even 100 years ahead, but the basic fact is that the demand is there, and just as the people of the world need food, so do they need the fibres of the forest.

In the Department of Forestry there is collected under one department three main branches. Each one of these branches, whether it be the forestry resource section, the pathology and entomology division or the forest products division, have concentrated in their respective divisions probably more brainpower and more dedication than any other department of government which we have. Yet with all this ability—undermanned, not supported fully by treasury board, not achieving what they should be able to achieve—in spite of all this tremendous asset, we are missing the boat.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

To my mind the reason is very simple. Because they are restrained by the constitutional limitations on what they can do under the federal government, the tremendous achievements and accomplishments within this limited framework have not been sufficient to make a big impact on what I think is the crucial challenge before us.

The hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out what he thought was the problem. I can say this, and I think the minister will understand as his predecessor understood—this is not a partisan political criticism—that there is a problem and a challenge that has to be met, but it cannot be met by the minister's officials. This is a challenge to the minister. The responsibility rests on his shoulders, and if I may repeat a bit of what the hon. member for Port Arthur said, knowing from the minister's background and from the province of Quebec the difficulty he will have in the constitutional field, in spite of all the difficulties they place before him the country expects from the Minister of Forestry, to use the words of the hon. member for Port Arthur, such diplomacy, such charm, such practical inducements that he can lead these provincial departments, not only of forestry but all the ones that surround that industry, into the light of the opportunities that now exist. The opportunity is there. I said this to the minister's predecessor, that no minister in any government had a greater opportunity to serve his country well than did the Minister of Forestry.

What are some of the things that can be done to bring these provincial governments to see the light of opportunity? First of all they should be impressed with the fact that the federal government has a place in this picture, and the place the federal government has is in the marketing arena through the Department of Trade and Commerce. Second, it has a place in taxation policies, yes and even monetary policies, which have a direct bearing on the success or failure of getting the provincial governments, through their control of the forest licences, to do the things that the national interest demands.

A moment ago I mentioned the reports of F.A.O. in 1949 and 1959. So desperate is the situation that in 1964 F.A.O. did not choose to wait until 1969 for its regular decennial report, but issued a special report just a month ago, appealing to the whole world and warning the whole world not only of the impending shortage in pulp and paper products but also in sawn lumber.

Look at the figures of the proportions of use of wood products in Europe. Just a few years ago 80 per cent of the forest production of Europe went into the sawn lumber section of the industry. Now that is rising to 90 per cent and 95 per cent, to meet the demand for sawn lumber as the people of Europe rehabilitate themselves and have better standards in their housing. Thus the demand for sawn lumber is rising at a very rapid percentage rate, and as they lessen the supply of wood production going into paper production this gives us an opportunity.

Just a few months ago I visited the mainland of China and in conversations I had with vice-ministers of that government one of the things they emphasized to me was that in addition to the farm machinery and fertilizer they needed for their 300 million acres of farmland, they had to face up to the practical fact that they would have to come into the markets of the world and buy newsprint in tremendous quantities. You can readily visualize why that is so.

Over there in the score of provinces in China the great forests of centuries ago were denuded and those which were left were burned off by the Japanese, with result that only two provinces have forestry reserves of any substance. You cannot take a nation of 700 million people and leave it without paper. What is the use of educating 80 million students in their schools unless there is something for them to read? How can they build up an industrial nation without the paper on which an industry is based? Here is one of the greatest demand factors that the world has faced in the last 10 years, and the only thing that stops unlimited purchases by the Chinese of paper and paper products in world markets is the fact that they have to earn the money to buy them; and they are desperately striving to do that. But here you have a demand factor. If the intentions of that government are going to be met, they want as a minimum to put a newspaper into every home in China. There are 700 million people in this one market, compared with 200 million in the United States and Canadian markets. Even if the newspaper that goes into those homes has only three or four pages, or even eight pages, as compared with our many-pages newspapers, the demand factor is tremendous.

When the Chinese look around the world for sources of supply they see the great forest reserves of Russia, but they know these forests will not meet their need because their products have not yet been adapted to the making of pulp and paper. They know that in the southeastern United States there is a potential for increasing production in pulp and paper because of the rapid growth of the forests in that part of the world due to the climate. But the potential is limited, in the face of this tremendous demand. They look at the heavy pressure on the forests of western Europe and see there is not much hope for them there. They look at the forests of the tropical areas of the world. They are not yet suitable for pulp and paper production on a large scale. Then they know that the one area in the world which can help them out is Canada, with its tremendous forest reserves.

How, then, I ask the minister, are you going to take opportunities like this, when as minister you have no control over the provincial governments except in regard to inducement in connection with markets? This is where the leadership test occurs. I think the minister should accept the fact that our paper industry, for instance, has grown up like Topsy and is to too large a degree integrated with the markets of the south. It is not a case of the production of a forest limit being available to buyers all over the world; the product of that timber limit is dedicated to the same newspaper in the United States every year. In too many cases this is so.

So far no provision has made any effort to change this situation. I am sure the minister also knows that, generally speaking, the forests of Ontario eastward are fairly well dedicated to some form of production right now. He knows that the only available virgin forest for pulp and paper production are in Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. These areas of the interior of British Columbia through to Manitoba cannot easily assimilate pulp and paper mills, even though there is a demand factor in the world for their production, because they are cut off from the place where the demand exists. The demand for pulp and paper products is first in Europe, where the growth rate is nearly 15 per cent per year. It is slowly and steadily increasing in the United States, I think by about 5 per cent. Then there are these virgin markets in China that I have outlined. But these areas cannot possibly get into those markets because they are in the centre of the continent. The mills on the eastern seaboard, on the St. Lawrence seaway and the coastal areas of British Columbia are to a large measure dedicated to southern market integration and their production is taken up by those markets.

I put these facts before the minister because on the basis of these facts, with the market opportunity here, with the system of marketing that is going on, I am sure the minister, with his reputation of getting over tremendous difficulties, can see the obvious solution to the problems. This one challenge met in the next five to ten years would be the greatest contribution that could be made by any minister of any department of any Canadian government, in dollars and cents; there is no question about it.

I do not know precisely how many more new mills we could develop in virgin forests. My guess would be, somewhere around 20, or maybe as high as 30; but that is all. Here we have a demand factor much greater than this extra number of mills could meet. This raises the proposal of the hon. member for Port Arthur. I know that the departmental officials all know that sooner or later this country has to turn its attention to systematic silviculture; but that is not going to come easily in view of this nice, comfortable rut into which the forest industry has got itself, particularly on the paper side, in dedicating its production to markets southward, when most of the new markets are eastward and westward.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the second challenge which the minister faces is how to make a breakthrough in this respect and induce the industry to look for greater marketing opportunities. The minister must impress upon the industry that in the long run not only will they be meeting the dividend requirements of their directors day by day or year by year, but there will be an increasing use of their products and a much greater production within the limits of their territory as the years go by—if not now, then 25 or 30 years from now.

The minister must use all the techniques at his command to get the industry to depart from the well established tradition of relying upon the type of cutting they carry out and leaving regeneration to nature. All this must be challenged. I am no scientist, Mr. Chairman, but I know enough about it to realize that the scientists can talk about it, write papers on it, and get no place. This is what is happening. The minister, with all the prestige of a federal ministry behind him, has to take the case to the industry, to the provincial ministers, and eventually to the people of Canada. He can do it if he will hold out the inducement of more money at the end of the rainbow. I do not think I was wrong when I said earlier in my remarks that the forest industry is the Cinderella industry. Take it out of the kitchen and put it up at the top level.

I do not think there is any question about it; many of us would just love the opportunity of accepting this challenge and tackling the problem. I personally am envious of the minister, that he has this great opportunity in his grasp. If he does measure up to the opportunity, I will be the first to praise his name; but if he does not; I will be there as hard as I can go asking for action. He has one of the best groups of men ever collected around a minister. They will give him all the scientific information on production, control of disease, forest products research, and so on. But the minister's job is to realize that only he has the prestige, working within the limitations of the constituency, to get rid of these tremendous taboos that have been built up over the last 60 years and make a breakthrough in the ways I have suggested.

There are many sidelines I could lead the minister into. I do not think I would be wrong in suggesting that with all his opportunities, and in spite of the reluctance of the provinces—because they have treasury boards too—he could take much of the land in Canada which has no particular purpose and rededicate it to forest use. That might be done under the individual farm program, under ARDA, or through the county forests. But do not forget that it might also be done under the national forests. We have never moved into that field in Canada. There are arguments both for it and against it, but it cannot have escaped the minister's notice that in the last congress in the United States a bill went through one of the houses allowing the minister there to take over a ten year period some 50 million acres and add it to the national forests. The use of these national forests is not limited just to watching trees grow; it is also used for other purposes, mainly recreation.

In addition to that the hon. member for Port Arthur has spoken with some reason in expressing satisfaction regarding the tremendous contributions made by the civilian conservation corps in the United States in the 1930's. He suggested that we should take a look at this in Canada, and I agree with him. Not only do our forests lend themselves to a great business opportunity for the country, but they serve as a training course for young people not only from rural areas but from our cities, who have two months every year in which they could serve their country well. I do not follow things in the United States closely but I understand that they expect to have one million people functioning under the youth conservation act the minute it goes through this year. Unfortunately, in Canada we could only speak of about 100,000; but these 100,000 could not only be used on work in the forests but could be tied in with the recreational and redevelopment activities around our cities and would provide a working force which would not only assist in their training but would also build assets for which there are markets at the end of the road.

I think I have said enough to indicate that there are some things which the minister will have in his mind, and I will be looking forward to the introduction of his bill in the house which will set up a new department. I do not blame him for reserving till that time his own personal philosophy, and for taking that opportunity to describe in some detail what he intends to do about these things. I hope that the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur and myself will have some bearing on the ideas which he will be presenting at that time.

While I am on my feet, although I may be a little out of order in asking for clarification, I should like to say now that I realize that much of this redevelopment work which will be done under ARDA will have to be through the forestry arm. Over the next few years we are going to require thousands of foresters, in the same way as over the years we have developed thousands of farmers. These foresters will be devoted to the shifting over from a very inefficient method, in my opinion, of handling forests into the more efficient methods of silviculture in areas close to civilization. In this field, which is purely within the hands of the provincial government, the key to the situation is that the federal minister can dangle before the provinces opportunities for markets. Where his persuasiveness will be really required is in the fact that the provinces will have a positive return.

If I may give an example, the province of Ontario puts 100,000 acres a year into reforestation. It is estimated that there are eight million acres as a minimum which should be shifted into forests in Ontario. At the rate they are going it will take 80 years. But the demand factor is on us now and in five or ten years the world will be in a precarious position in regard to supplying the needs of the woods section of the economy. I suggest that this matter is very urgent.

If I may move a little further into this field, let me say I know the difficulties cannot be cured all across the country all at once. Under the ARDA concept you have an opportunity of selecting certain areas upon which you can concentrate. I have been watching the reports coming in from the interlake area and the news from Gaspé, and they have been getting the facts out. But on reading these reports I keep finding the prejudices of the past coming into them, even when people are supposed to have approached the subject completely from an all-resource use concept. In the report on the interlake area of Manitoba, which I assume the minister has seen, there is outlined the various opportunities for redeveloping the whole area between the two lakes in Manitoba. But they forgot the forestry part. If I were minister and paying half the cost of that study I would say: "Look, I don't mind paying half the cost, because this report came at the initiative of the province of Manitoba, but have you not forgotten something?" Forestry provides one of the great opportunities for redeveloping that area, and because the provincial authorities in Manitoba have been disappointed so often in the last 20 or 25 years about getting pulp and paper mills you cannot blame them in one sense for being disillusioned. However, it is the purpose of the minister to restore their faith and not to overlook the possibility of that type of use in the redevelopment of that area.

Likewise in the clay belts of Ontario and Quebec. I drove through that area last week end to look at it once again. In an area of good land where the farmers are farming good farms, I see 90 per cent of the area going back into natural forests. I know the land is good but they are suffering from a very simple missing ingredient—lack of markets. I know the initiative lies in the hands of the provinces under ARDA to make proposals, but that does not stop a livewire minister from having frequent chats with provincial ministers and telling them they are overlooking something. I should like to see a good land area on the northern slopes going to Hudson bay, James bay and Quebec. Take this area on as one where you realize that there is a market for these products which are there—beef and wood products. These may be combined. There are people there trained to do this sort of work. As the hon. member for Port Arthur mentioned, you have an Indian population which adapts itself to this type of work. Another area which I think is ideally suited, with good land but cursed with a lack of markets, is the Lake St. John area in Quebec. The whole area up from the Saguenay I should like to see looked at as an area like the Gaspé and the interlake area in Manitoba.

We accept the principle that the provinces must provide the initiative, but not the whole thing entirely. I suggest that the minister make a proposal to the provinces and they may bring forward something as a result. But it must be suggested. If two, three or four areas in Canada are being given the opportunity of going into pilot operations on a silviculture approach, this gives an opportunity to the trained men in the minister's department to work with the ARDA people and show that forestry can produce dollars and cents per acre in a superior fashion to what is now being produced from marginal agriculture and nutritional soil.

I thank you very much for allowing me the privilege of putting these ideas before the minister, because after the hon. member for Port Arthur had spoken I could not resist the opportunity of expanding his remarks.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I should like the opportunity on the occasion of the minister's estimates being before the committee to take a few minutes of this committee's time to make a few remarks both to affirm some of the statements made just now by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and to discuss a particular problem related to forest and potential forest land in part of southern Ontario surrounding the city I represent.

Coming as I do from an entirely metropolitan riding perhaps I should establish my qualifications to make some remarks on this subject. I think possibly I may claim a more intimate and longer standing association with the federal government forestry branch than almost any member of the house, being the son of a man who was an employee of the federal forestry branch for 40 years, ultimately becoming a director. I have heard from him and his associates many expressions of the frustrations about which we have just heard from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, in respect of the problem created by division of jurisdiction over Canada's forest resources, and the particular frustrations of people with scientific training in forestry and related sciences who see what Canadian forests are capable of, what they require and the way in which they are failing to receive the attention they deserve.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

One particular area that seems of importance to me, and that I should like to stress today, relates to some of the marginal lands, some of the worked out lands, and some of the farm lands in southern Ontario stretching right from the Quebec border to lake Huron which, initially cleared as long ago as a century, or a century and a half, have over a period of time been worked out or by maltreatment ceased to be productive for farm purposes.

I think it has been clearly established over a period of years, including consideration by the Senate committee on land uses in Canada, that there is a great potential for this land, and a great opportunity for various levels of government to introduce and encourage reforestation of these lands, which perhaps should never have been taken out from under forest cover in the first place. A great many recommendations in respect of the development of these lands have called for intervention of governments. I point out there is a great deal of initiative on the part of private operators, and chiefly individuals who have over a period of years both for profit and purely on the basis of a hobby, established tree farms in areas where they have engaged in reforestation in an attempt to put these lands again under tree cover.

One of the difficulties that has stood in the way of people carrying on this enterprise has been the manner in which, over a period of years, property assets represented by these reforestation projects, have been treated for tax purposes. In this respect the federal government does not have sole and absolute jurisdiction.

The first difficulty arose in that area which might generally be described as death duties where both the federal government, by way of estate tax, and the provincial government, by way of succession duties, have levied taxes against the assets of deceased persons. The remarks I have made I address both to the Minister of Forestry and his colleague the Minister of Finance, for consideration at the time of the budget. I would also suggest that the Minister of Forestry keep these ideas in mind for consideration when he is next talking with provincial governments in respect of agreements between federal and provincial governments which are initiated on the basis of the present statute, and which were originally negotiated on the basis of the Canada Forestry Act.

The chief effect, I would suggest, of the present arrangement in respect of estate taxes and succession duties is the encouragement of bad forestry practices because of the necessity of recovering cash to pay these estate taxes and succession duties. The necessity for a quick turnover so that the claims of the crown can be satisfied means that bad forestry practices may often be followed and land that has, with great care, been brought slowly along to the point where it might be put to a sustained yield basis, may for example have to be subject to strip cutting altogether, or other bad forestry practices which will yield an immediate or early cash return. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it deserves the consideration of both the federal and provincial tax authorities, to see how, by constitutional arrangements and related legislation, changes can be effected, making it possible to postpone the payment of succession duties and estate taxes until such time as, in accordance with good forestry practice, the forest crop on any particular land is realized. In the case of lands which are on a sustained yield basis I suggest a formula could be worked out for periodic payment of succession duties and estate taxes or, if it is land on which the forest is ultimately brought to maturity and is going to be cut clear, then at such time the estate taxes or succession duties which may have been outstanding, with added interest, could become payable.

At the same time, I would suggest that municipal taxes may have a serious effect on tree farming and tree farmers in our different provinces, and that efforts should be made to recast the structure of municipal taxes so they recognize the special character of a forest. As hon. members know, land devoted to forestry may for very many years, in accordance with good forestry practice, not yield any income at all. But, as we all know, nothing is more certain than that each year the county tax assessor will be around to collect his mite from the owner of the land.

Mr. Chairman, what I am suggesting again today is that the payment, or if not the payment perhaps the assessment arrangements under provincial legislation, could be changed so that the assessment and payment of municipal taxes could be postponed until the crops from the particular land is realized, in accordance with good forestry practice.

In respect of these various amendments, and for inspiration in connection with this type of amendment, I would suggest the minister and his department could possibly look to some of the measures which have been enacted in the United Kingdom in recent years for the purpose of encouraging the owners of particular lands to maintain them under forest, and to follow good forestry practices. In particular I would refer the minister to the provision in the United Kingdom death duty legislation which defines timber and agricultural land, or that devoted to timber in a particular way, at the lower rate which is applicable to that part of a person's estate which is under forest. I think both the provincial and federal governments should seriously consider this kind of amendment to our taxation statutes, which in the long run I suggest would ultimately lead to the same revenue but would adjust the structure of the taxation in such a way as to be consistent with the manner in which these very valuable resources by Canadians should be developed and realized.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is five o'clock. I will therefore wait until the next opportunity to make my remarks.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

ANNUAL VACATIONS ACT

PROVISION FOR THREE WEEKS HOLIDAY AFTER FIVE YEARS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-54, to amend the Annual Vacations Act (three weeks after five years).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple and straightforward bill, the entire purport of which is contained in the title. The bill proposes to amend the Annual Vacations Act which is already on the statute books, to provide that an employee with five years employment shall have three weeks annual vacation with pay. As hon. members are aware, at the present time the act provides for one week after one year and for two weeks after two years of employment. The present act goes no further. But in this day and age a great many people, especially those who have served for any period of time, do have a longer vacation each year than two weeks, and it seems to many of us that such a provision ought to be part of our national labour legislation.

I hope it can be clear at this time, because it has not always been clear with respect to these bills of mine, that this does not refer to civil servants. It does not refer to federal employees. It refers to workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction. I mention that because on two or three occasions when I have had companion bills before the house I have read the next day in the press that the member for Winnipeg North Centre was again trying to get something more for federal civil servants. I do that in its place, Mr. Speaker; but this is general labour legislation which applies to all those workers in Canada the nature of whose employment is such that they come under federal labour jurisdiction. These include railway, transportation and communications workers, bank employees and quite a long list of others. The list has been put on the record a number of times.

Although the list is a long one we know that labour matters in this country are the subject of divided jurisdiction. Some come under federal jurisdiction, some come under provincial jurisdiction. Roughly speaking, about one tenth of the labour force comes under federal labour jurisdiction and the remaining 90 per cent come under provincial jurisdiction.

The purpose of this bill is to improve a piece of federal legislation that we already have. Actually, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the request, if I may call it that, made in this bill is a very reasonable one. In fact, it is so reasonable I am almost ashamed of it. Instead of asking for three weeks vacation with pay after five years I think the bill should have asked for three weeks after three years or four years at the most. But around this place one has to learn to expect things to move slowly, especially with the 1919 Liberals still in power, and so if we could get this much at least it would be a bit of progress.

But I say, Mr. Speaker, that no one can deny the utter reasonableness of this proposal. It is not breaking new ground as to principle. The principle is already established that by federal labour legislation we declare that workers who come under that jurisdiction should have holidays with pay. So far we have provided just two definitions. We say that those who have worked for one year shall get one week's vacation with pay and we say that those who have worked for two years shall get two weeks vacation with pay. It is our contention that we should widen this definition and say that those who have worked for five years shall get at least three weeks vacation with pay.

Because this proposition is so reasonable I hope that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), who I see in his place and who as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour will no doubt be replying, will treat it in the simple, straightforward, reasonable manner in which it is presented. I hope he will not give us another of those profound orations that go all around the subject but fail to deal with the simplicity and straightforwardness of the proposal. I do not know whether he can do it but I throw out the challenge to him. He has been on his feet a lot this week and has had a good deal of practice. I suggest that today he come up with something new, and what he really ought to come up with is an admission that this proposition is so reasonable that the government is prepared to accept it. If he cannot do that, the least it can do is to ask the house to refer the subject matter to the committee for that further study that is so often a way out for the government.

One of the other answers that the parliamentary secretary no doubt will make is that this is an item in a national labour code and why does the member for Winnipeg North Centre not wait for the national labour code and see if this provision is not included in that code? As the hon. member for Kootenay East knows, I have been waiting and waiting and waiting. For a while he sat over on this side of the house and he complained about having to wait and wait and wait. At the moment I am not going to rehearse the long wait it has been for most of my lifetime, since 1919, but I remind the parliamentary secretary and the house of how difficult it is to get action on this simple matter at this session of parliament.

As everyone knows, in the last session of parliament, the first after the 1963 election, we were told categorically we would get a labour code at this session of parliament. Sure enough, when we met on February 18 it was promised in the speech from the throne. That promise is to be found on page 2 of Hansard for February 18. Two days later the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and as found on page 57 of Hansard he underlined during the course of his speech this promise in the speech from the throne, a national labour code, and said it would be brought forward at this session.

Four days later the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) spoke in the same debate and as recorded on page 157 he confirmed that a national labour code would be brought in at this session. In the meantime we have had many weeks, many months, of the session, and where are we getting? On April 21 I asked the Minister of Labour for about the umpteenth time if we could expect the national labour code to be put on the order paper soon. His reply was that it would appear on the order paper "as quickly as possible". That is to be found on page 2397 of Hansard for April 21. We let a few weeks go by, but because "as quickly as possible" did not seem to be very fast I asked a similar question on July 13 and the answer is to be found on page 5380 of Hansard where the Minister of Labour said that the national labour code would be on the order paper "soon".

On August 4, as recorded at page 6351 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) if we were not going to get this on the order paper soon in view of his promise that it was coming soon. Some members will recall that he replied that I was misquoting him; that it had not been promised soon, but only as soon as possible. Well, there is a fine distinction between those phrases. When I was able to show the minister that he had said "soon" on one occasion, he came back with that interesting quip to be found on page 6351 of Hansard, that it would be on the order paper as soon as possible, and he hoped that would be soon.

Well, as the parliamentary secretary knows, I asked the minister a question about this matter this afternoon on orders of the day. He was still unable to give an answer as to when this matter would be on the order paper. I must say that in reply to one question I got a definite, one word answer, "Yes". What was the question to which that reply was made? The question was, will it be on the order paper at this session? I see my genial friend, the parliamentary secretary, nodding his head confirming what the Minister of Labour said. How long is this session going to last? It could be the longest session in history. Sessions have been known to last over three calendar years. There is no requirement that a session be prorogued so long as there are items on the order paper with which the government wants to proceed. This session may go on interminably.

Miss LaMarsh: It already has.

Mr. Knowles: For once, I agree with an interjection by the hon. lady, who just said that it already has gone on interminably. But look at what that does to the things we have been promised. I suggest that is not good enough, and because that is not good enough I say to the parliamentary secretary that he should not give this item in a national labour code the kind of treatment he has given some of the other measures I have introduced.

I say to him also that it is no use using the argument that these things should all be introduced in one package. He knows very well that if I were to introduce a bill containing all of the things in one package he would say, "You are asking us to swallow too much at once; you should introduce these things one at a time." I say to the parliamentary secretary as simply as I can, in terms I am sure he can understand, that this is a simple, reasonable proposition. There is no new philosophy, no new principle. It is already the law of the land that workers under federal jurisdiction must get holidays. All that is asked is that those employees coming under federal labour jurisdiction should receive three weeks holidays with pay after five years of service. I put it to the parliamentary secretary: Come on, come through today.

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: The new parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Regan: Thank you. I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate for a few moments in this discussion. There is no question but that a review of Hansard over the years will show that the question of annual vacations with pay has long been of keen interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think he would have to grant, however, that over the years some progress has been made in that direction. There was a time, of course, when there was no provision for paid annual vacations, but there is provision at the present time. I think that the time the hon. member took this afternoon might well have been utilized in telling us how he reached the exact formula of three weeks after five years. Why not two and a half weeks or four weeks? Why not four years, ten years or seven years? I think it would be very interesting to know the amount of research the hon. member conducted on this particular aspect of the bill before presenting it.

I believe that therein lies the consideration the government must give before coming forward with minimum standards legislation that covers not only vacations with pay but also minimum wages, the length of the work week and so forth. This is legislation that will be forthcoming at this session and, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) said in the house today, it will be on the order paper before this session is completed.

Mr. Knowles: When is that?

Mr. Regan: The hon. member, I believe, would have to agree that there is no magic advantage in having legislation on the order paper when we have a backlog of legislation on the order paper for which priorities have already been established. If there is no end in view for the present debate that is under way, if the pension legislation has to be dealt with next and if there is other legislation to come, what is the advantage? You have the undertaking of the minister that it will be dealt with at this session of parliament. I suggest there is certainly no great advantage in having it on the order paper now as compared with having it on the order paper a month from now.

Mr. Winch: You can settle it right now.

Mr. Knowles: This bill is on the order paper; let us pass it.

Mr. Regan: In so far as the subject matter is concerned, we have already pointed out to the house that there should be a considerable amount of research given to this matter of the type that has been undertaken by the Department of Labour. This research should be directed toward the length of the vacation, and after how many years of service it should be given. The hon. gentleman did not go into that question at all, although in his research he may have done so. At any rate, I believe he would agree that there should be research conducted into these questions. How much vacation should a worker receive and after how long a period of work?

The principle has been rather widely accepted in collective bargaining for some years that there should be a gradual extension of vacation periods according to the length of service of the employee. I suggest this is a recognized principle, that the worker who stays a long time on one job has some sort of vested interest. He perhaps builds a home in the area and so perhaps becomes more settled in that particular region. He puts his children into the schools of that region to which they become accustomed. In general, he is contributing more, acquiring more of a vested interest in that particular position. By the same token, he may or may not be progressing on the salary scale by staying on the job over the years. I feel this is a sound principle and he is entitled to a greater amount of vacation.

The hon. gentleman's formula suggests that after five years service three weeks should be granted. Certainly, as many members of the house know, there are collective agreements in the country today that do provide three weeks vacation after five years. There are collective agreements that provide four weeks after ten years and some provide four weeks after 20 years. This is an extension of the principle. There is a great deal of variety in the provisions of collective agreements in this country today concerning the length of the vacation period. Certainly I feel, despite the fact that the hon. member has pointed out only one out of ten Canadian workers is subject to federal jurisdiction, that it is desirable to extend this principle. A great many of these people are covered by pretty good collective agreements and I refer, for example, to the railway employees. Other employees should have something comparable.

Even so, I think it is good that the federal parliament should be concerned about this question. The federal parliament, in general, should show the way for the provinces when it comes to minimum standards for employee benefits of this type. I think that this is the next best thing we can do to having full jurisdiction. As the hon. member pointed out, there is divided jurisdiction today and, as a consequence, our legislation directly affects only very few.

I would be accused by some of my hon. friends of being a centralist if I said it is a shame that all the workers in the country are not subject to federal legislation with regard to labour standards, but I think it is unfortunate that there is not uniformity in this regard across the country. I think federal legislation as it has existed in the past, and as it will be in the labour code which will be presented for discussion this session, is a good thing to show the way to provinces, and I would hope those provinces that do not have as good legislation would see fit to fall in line as time passes.

Dealing with the progressive philosophy of such legislation I would point out that there are many people in Canada who are not subject to the protection of trade unions, and many who do not have the benefits of collective bargaining agreements, people who are at the mercy of their employers. But let me hasten to say that sometimes the employer is a very benevolent man or company and takes good care of them. Unfortunately that is not so in other cases. In England, on the other hand, a higher percentage of the working population has always been subject to collective agreement. Over the years in that industrialized economy there has been such a history and tradition of trade unionism that even those who are not protected by a trade union, because the number involved may be too small for a union to be effective, are by custom and tradition covered by the principles of the legislation.

Unfortunately we in Canada find that something less than 25 per cent, or some such small percentage of our workers are unionized, and there are whole areas of the country where many people are employed in small industries, in the retail trades and other work, who do not have the protection of collective bargaining. This type of legislation, and that which will be included in the national labour code to be presented by the Minister of Labour, will be important to these people because it will provide them with that sort of protection. It gives them coverage by law that other employees sometimes receive by negotiation through collective agreements.

Over the years in my law practice I have encountered trade union people who have not been in favour of widespread legislation to provide minimum standards, because they say if one goes too far in that direction then what need is there for a person to belong to a trade union, and thus it would be difficult for unions to maintain their membership. I do not suggest this has been a general statement. I do not suggest it comes from the enlightened trade unionists, but the answer to it is obvious in that there is always need for collective bargaining and collective representation for workers.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regan: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: Before he sits down would he tell us if he favours the principle of this bill?

Mr. Regan: If the hon. member has not gathered from my remarks whether I do or not, then I have been totally ineffective.

Mr. Knowles: Granted.

Mr. Regan: Thank you. I only want to say I favour the principle of this bill very much. I am not sure whether I said earlier that I questioned whether it should be this exact amount for this exact number. I think we should have full facts and figures to determine this.

Mr. Winch: How many years do you want for your research?

Mr. Regan: I do not want any years for my research. Fortunately the Department of Labour, with its vast resources, has already done this. If the hon. member will contain himself just a little, I would point out to him that the Minister of Labour has already indicated that before this session is finished parliament will have the opportunity to debate a national labour code, which I think hon. members on that side will find attractive. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I support the principle of this legislation; but I am sure my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre will look forward to seeing the legislation which the minister is introducing.

Before I sit down perhaps I might be allowed to say that along with other types of legislation that go hand in hand with this, such as that covering minimum wage standards, hours of work and so forth, I would like to see consideration given by the house toward providing a statutory security clause so that a worker who has worked 15 or 20 years in a job, in a place where there is not a collective agreement and where there cannot be a union for one reason or another, cannot be booted out by the employer when he reaches the age of 50, or becomes half a step slower because of his advancing years, without that worker having the right to have his case reviewed by some committee of the labour relations board to determine whether there was proper cause for his dismissal. This would recognize that a worker who has spent a certain amount of time in the job, possibly 15 years, has acquired a vested interest in that job and has contributed to the enterprise, just the same as its owner. I would like to introduce a bill to that effect on some future occasion and—

Mr. Knowles: If the hon. member does so it will not be talked out by this side.

Mr. MacInnis: Referring to this security business, can the hon. member cite any examples where this may be taking place in industry, and does he not realize that in industry the unions in negotiating their general agreements protect the worker in this instance?

Mr. Regan: I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis) missed the point of what I was saying. I was speaking about the worker in a store where there are only three people, or in a small plant where there is no trade union. The hon. member knows there are many people in our own province who, for one reason or another, do not belong to unions. What I am saying is that legislation of this type would provide to a man who did not have the protection of a collective agreement the same type of security of tenure, so long as he was a good employee, that the trade union can provide in a larger industry.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member might re-read what he has just answered me, especially with reference to clerks and others who do not have the advantages of unions. If he is talking about Nova Scotia he is not entirely correct.

Mr. Regan: I do not want to pursue this point because it is not relevant to the bill, but as a lawyer I have acted for the I.R.W.D.S.U. in many places in Nova Scotia and I know that only a very small percentage of the clerks in that province have collective agreements at the moment, and that there are many employees in stores in Nova Scotia who do not have the advantage of the protection of a trade union.

I would conclude my remarks by saying I support the principle of the bill and I look forward to the idea of increased vacations according to the principle set out in the bill. I look forward with keen anticipation to the national labour code which will be introduced by the man who I think most of us would have to agree is an excellent Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen).

Mr. Winch: You also believe in Santa Claus.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the principle of Bill No. C-54 is likely to draw the sympathy of every hon. member.

In my opinion, the spirit of the bill is better than the suggestion made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) who said that it would be advisable rather to deal with the seniority of Canadian workers and guarantee them the same position at 55 years of age, if their usefulness is half of what it was 20 years before.

I think that the best solution then, and I hope that it will be included in the labour code which is supposed to be introduced in the near future, that at 55 years of age, if a man is unable to work any longer, he should then be retired with a sufficient pension to make room for younger men or the growing generation. This way, I think that everybody will be respected, and the labour code will play quite a satisfactory part in the whole country.

Coming back to Bill No. C-54, under which, after five years' employment, any employee should be entitled to three weeks' holidays, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells us that this legislation will affect about 10 per cent only of the Canadian labour force.

We must not forget that even though Bill No. C-54 affects only 10 per cent of the Canadian labour force, this legislation will have the same results in each of the Canadian provinces. This is probably the objective which is in the back of the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that this bill passed in Ottawa will have results in every province, that everywhere the same specification will be adopted, namely, "three weeks' holidays after five years".

We have no objection to three weeks' holidays after five years, but I object—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would permit a question. He realizes that I do not mean mandatory; but I do agree that it would give a lead to the provinces.

Mr. Caouette: Well, that comes to about what I said.

[Translation]

Quite sincerely, Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the granting of three weeks' holidays after five years of employment but as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated a while ago, the results of such a legislation at the provincial level would be that the owners of small businesses like groceries, haberdasheries and restaurants would be hard put to balance their budgets and would find it impossible to abide by the law and give their employees three weeks' paid holidays every year.

I wonder whether it is truly necessary to enact either federal or provincial legislation in that respect considering the existence of collective agreements as it was mentioned a few minutes ago.

In this day and age, several Canadian industries give their staff three weeks' holidays after five years of service. Several private enterprises do so. No federal or provincial legislation was necessary to achieve that. That is why we have unions.

My good friend from Winnipeg North Centre is familiar with the work done by unions in Canada, because he has been a union member for years. Under the circumstances, why not let employers and employees settle their differences through the unions?

When an industry is able to give three weeks' vacation after five years of employment or when a businessman or a private enterprise are able to do so, there are no more difficulties, in my opinion, and the principle of the three weeks' vacation quickly becomes a fact in many fields or sectors of our economy.

However, what I cannot admit is that we, in Ottawa, decide to enact legislation which does not provide that it will concern only 10 per cent of the Canadian labour force but which obliges the whole country to give three weeks' vacation after five years of employment.

In my own business, we give three weeks' vacation after five years of employment. We did not need federal or provincial legislation to do so. But we acted and we still act in good faith. In fact, throughout the country we see that more and more of those cases are settled more and more easily.

I wonder if federal legislation which would have implications in the provinces—because it is intended to give direction to the provinces—would not be likely to disturb many small businessmen and industrialists who do everything in their power to maintain their business and their trade in operation.

So, why compel those people, why drive them up against the wall? Because in the end salary increases or longer vacations do cost money, and ultimately the consumers will be the ones to pay for them. There will be an increase in costs, in the price of services or products, and those who will get three weeks' holidays or higher wages will be the ones to pay for those increases. Because the businessman, the industrialist—and my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre knows it—when I have to increase my employees' salaries, it is obvious that the consumer who comes to have his car repaired pays more per hour than he did before.

It happens in every field of the economy.

My good friend from Winnipeg North Centre should, therefore, think about that. Why always introduce measures that will further burden the Canadian consumer. To take a certain amount from one pocket and put a lesser amount back in the other pocket is no solution, I think.

I appreciate that this bill will please employees since it provides three weeks' holidays after five years of service. But they are the ones who will pay for those holidays, because then carrying charges and operating costs will rise and that, in turn, will entail a rise in retail prices to be paid by the consumer. We are always back where we started. The solution suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reminds me somewhat of the dog going around in circles chasing his tail.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the line of his argument, may I ask him how he justifies his contention that old age pensions, family allowances and things like that ought to be increased? Does not the same thing happen; they have to be paid for? Is the hon. member not aware that these principles of social justice are part of twentieth century thinking?

Mr. Caouette: You are still in the seventeenth century.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend does not know where he is.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, this is what I shall say to my hon. friend: Old age pensions and all social security are paid by the Canadian people anyway. If my good friend who is sitting here in the house had understood what Social Credit is suggesting as an alternative, as the true social security, he probably would not have moved a bill in this vein.

Now, we are paying for social security, whereas Social Credit has for 30 years been asking for the distribution in Canada of a national dividend which would not come out of the people's pocket and would increase the income of every Canadian citizen, being based on Canada's national production. This dividend would be paid directly to the Canadian consumer, without creating either inflation or deflation, while maintaining a steady commercial balance. If my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre realized this, he would not ask silly questions like the one he just directed to me with regard to old age pensions and social security.

Mr. Speaker, we are going around in circles, and I shall say and repeat, that as long as we continue to look at the matter from that angle, we shall probably also continue to accept legislation like Bill C-54 or a similar one. We shall go on with the same system, which is the very cause of this legislation.

If the Canadian worker received his due share of the tremendous production of Canada through the development of our natural wealth, he would not need three week's holidays a year, because he probably would take two months' leave paid by the surplus revenue from the development of this country's natural wealth. But such things are overlooked.

This year Canadian production will reach $46 billion in goods and services, and because of that outstanding production, the total national revenue will amount to some $34 billion. Now, there will be a gap of $12 to $14 billion between production and purchasing power, that is the total national revenue of Canadians. No one talks about filling that gap, but they talk about raising taxes again which will further reduce the revenues of the Canadian people, leaving aside millions and billions of dollars of goods which will not be disposed of.

We see that the government is looking for markets throughout the world, while some Canadians do not even have the bare essentials. The first market is always the domestic market. Then it is in order to try to increase our imports and exports and to try to balance them as much as possible, but I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, instead of introducing every year—undoubtedly in order to make some political capital—legislation calling for three weeks' vacation, should take a look at Social Credit suggestions. Then he would be useful to his electors in the Winnipeg North Centre riding and to all the people, all across Canada.

[Text]

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, judging from this debate I think it is time we took a recess. We seem to be coming around full cycle. Earlier this session, in fact on March 6, on a Friday such as this, in a private members' hour such as this, and playing to a crowd such as we have here now, I got up and spoke to a bill. For some strange reason the bill was introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and when I look at that bill and then look at the bill before us today I find that even the bills are practically the same. It seems to me that if the private members' hour is going to get as repetitive as the flag debate perhaps we should call a halt and go home.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps we should pass both.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Hahn: As I did then, I congratulate the hon. member for introducing this bill, and I do so on two counts. First of all, like the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) I agree with the principle contained in this bill and think it has a great deal of merit. It should be given serious consideration. Second, I bow to the experience of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because when I look at Bill C-15 which we debated on March 6 and when I look at this present bill I find two very similar items which probably could well have been incorporated in one bill. The hon. member's years of experience in the house has enabled him to split these bills and thereby gain two trips to bat. I hope that perhaps we younger members by following some of these learnings and teachings of our more experienced elders will also acquire some useful ideas as parliamentarians.

The bill we have now is one which (a) I agree with in principle and (b) I do not think should pass today, and for much the same reasons as were evident in the last session, or in the previous debate on March 6. I think everyone agrees that holidays with pay are desirable and necessary; and I think we all agree, at least I certainly do, that three weeks after five years is a reasonable proposition. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) suggested that we should do a lot of research into this problem. I do not think that on this particular point a lot of research is really needed. I think three weeks after five years is reasonable. I believe that to some degree industry, and particularly those segments of it which are unionized and are negotiating contracts, has decided to recognize this in some of the agreements which have been signed. I also agree that we need standards on statutory holidays, standards for hours of work, minimum wage legislation, legislation covering employees' safety—in fact, all the things which should be embodied in a proper and comprehensive labour code.

I am as anxious as the hon. member to see this labour code brought forward, but I feel strongly that it would be wrong to do these things piece by piece by piece. I feel that our labour legislation, instead of being embodied in a series of acts, should be contained in one comprehensive act, and I feel that that is the only logical and sensible way to do it.

As stated in the speech from the throne, such a labour code is to be brought forward this session. I know the hon. member has been asking "When, when, when?", and I know a number of us on this side of the house have been asking the same thing, because we are as anxious as he is.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the hon. member a question. Does he get any better answers than we get?

Mr. Hahn: Perhaps I should give the hon. member the standard answer—"If he will only be patient—". I have every confidence that we will have a labour code on the order paper and before this parliament at this session. There are certainly a great number of us on this side of the house pushing very hard for it, and I think with some degree of success. So to me it is not logical to introduce these bills and pass them one at a time; rather it is logical to embrace all our labour legislation in one code, bring it in, debate it and get it through. This I am hopeful, in fact reasonably certain, will happen this session, and for that reason we should not, as I see it, pass this particular bill at this particular time.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan), when he was speaking on this bill, made several points which I think are worth commenting on. He spoke about the role of the federal government and its labour legislation setting the standard for the provinces to follow. I heartily agree with this. I know we do not have the jurisdiction in the labour field, but I also feel that federal labour legislation will provide a strong incentive, a strong target for the provinces to shoot at. I think if we enact good labour legislation it will only be a matter of time before the provinces follow suit. Public pressures would ultimately force them to do so.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) worried about the effects of a good labour code on the possible bargaining position of unions. He was afraid if we introduced labour legislation possibly the argument could be advanced that we do not need organized labour because the government has done this for us. I think this is a false argument. I do not think the government should or ever would get into specific legislation dealing with wages. This must be a matter for negotiation. Many fringe benefits are matters for negotiation.

What we are attempting to do here, as we should do with all our social legislation, is set minimum standards below which we do not expect Canadians to live and exist. It is then the job of the free enterprise part of our economy, in this instance the employer and employee, through their unions or as individuals to negotiate above this minimum. I feel that a comprehensive labour code could be introduced that would provide a reasonable base, but still allow ample scope and incentive for trade unions to carry on above that level, industry by industry and community by community across the country.

The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) raised some rather interesting points to which I take strong exception. I take issue with the thesis he was trying to advance. For instance, he indicated that holidays with pay, minimum wages and so on, could be detrimental to certain industries, and he cited the case of the owner of a small store who could not afford to pay certain minimum wages or give holidays. My feeling is that as Canadians we cannot afford to have that type of industry or operation existing in our country. If the operation is below a standard that is decent and reasonable we cannot tolerate it. If that operation can only survive without paying a reasonable wage scale and without providing reasonable amenities to the employees, then in my opinion it has no right to exist in our society.

I think the line of reasoning advanced by the hon. member for Villeneuve can be reduced to the argument: Why pay anything over and above starvation wages? We can follow his reasoning in respect of the economics argument, that an employer may not be able to afford these things, down to a point where we reach a ridiculous situation, supporting conditions of employment likened to those which existed before the industrial revolution. Of course I think we all agree that this is not satisfactory, and I do not believe many people in this country would seriously accept that thesis.

We all agree that there are minimum standards, and that the federal government has a responsibility to legislate in respect of them. Even though they do not apply to all people in the country, they at least would set a standard that should be followed. A standard having been set by the federal government, presumably then the provincial governments would set their own standards so people will be effectively covered and protected.

Following the reasoning of the hon. member for Villeneuve, who suggested that instead of social security we might have Social Credit, I would ask him this question: If we change from social security to Social Credit what do we have to lose? I think we have a great deal to lose.

Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is extremely anxious to hear from his adversary and friend, the parliamentary secretary, and has been waiting now for over half an hour. I do not want to deprive him of that pleasure, so I will allow the parliamentary secretary to answer some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit me a question?

[Text]

Mr. Hahn: Certainly, if the hon. member will allow me "un moment".

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Before condemning the Social Credit doctrine, has the hon. member tried to understand it? Has he ever studied it or has he tried to understand it before he condemns it as a whole?

Mr. Habel: He cannot understand it, since you do not understand it yourself.

[Text]

Mr. Hahn: I do not condemn it in total. I do condemn certain specific points raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve in his speech dealing with this item. I condemn those points of view that were raised. In respect of my comprehension of Social Credit, as the Speaker has often said during the question period, this is too large a subject to be dealt with during private members' hour.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief.

I fail to understand the logic of the arguments of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn), that we should not let this bill pass at this time because there is a labour code about to be introduced by the government. If such is true, that is wonderful and I think we would all welcome it. However it seems to me it would be very wise to let the subject matter of this bill pass to the appropriate committee in order that discussion can take place, because after all we are not sure just when this new labour code will come, or in what form.

Mr. Hahn: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Thompson: I think the time hardly permits that, Mr. Speaker.

In so far as it is within the authority of the federal government to legislate on such labour matters, the intention of this Bill C-54 is sound and practical. Certainly we live in an age of potential leisure, and stand on the threshold of an age when the labour of men's hands will produce far more with less effort. We had better begin to prepare, and this is one very small step in that direction.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that it is reasonable at this time to permit this bill to pass to the appropriate committee for further study, as far as the subject matter is concerned, that committee being the committee on industrial relations. We will then be better prepared to accept this labour code, which we are given to understand will be brought forward this session.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I regret that time will not permit me to give a full answer to the many questions raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As usual he began his speech by telling me that the Liberals made promises back in 1919.

Mr. Winch: Yes, and we are still waiting for them to be fulfilled.

Mr. Byrne: I was not in the position to make policy in those years.

Mr. Knowles: You probably had more influence then than you have now.

Mr. Byrne: I was catching gophers out in the Maple Creek area, and getting three cents per tail, in order to make spending money.

If the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made promises as far back as 1958, you will recall that in very great measure they have been fulfilled.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Byrne: It may seem strange to the hon. member that the Liberals are still around, in view of his suggestion that they made promises back in 1919 and have not fulfilled them as yet. The Liberals are still here and have been in power since 1919, with the exception of a few short periods.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour appointed for consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, would the acting house leader indicate whether there is any change in the program for next week, and is it possible for him to give an indication of the estimates to be considered next Friday?

Mr. Laing: I am unable to do that, Mr. Speaker, but on Monday we will resume debate on the motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister, as outlined in orders of the day under item 44(A).

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

ADDRESSES AT OPENING OF THIRD COMMONWEALTH EDUCATION CONFERENCE

Address of the Prime Minister, The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson when welcoming the delegates to the third commonwealth education conference, House of Commons, Ottawa, Friday, August 21, 1964.

It is my pleasant duty today to welcome you, as I do most warmly, on behalf of the Canadian people and government, to the third commonwealth education conference.

As you open your 15-day conference, I do not envy you your assignment. I confess that there have been occasions in the last 30 years or so when I have felt that the teaching profession had many advantages over diplomacy or politics; and that I hadn't sufficiently appreciated my good fortune many years ago, when I was on the faculty of the University of Toronto. But when I look at the challenge facing today's educators; when I look at the problems confronting you, I am forced to conclude that my escape from a teaching career may not have been such a misfortune for me after all.

The objectives and the agenda of your conference are certainly impressive. For man's every goal—the good life, happiness, security, even global peace—depends in the end on education; on closing the "education gap" which is fundamental to every other gap.

It is encouraging to see in such a conference as this, delegates from all continents and races, working together in harmony and partnership in a cause so vital to mankind's future, We welcome, along with the representatives of 17 independent members of the commonwealth, delegates from many British dependencies and territories—some 16, I believe. The progress of these regions toward independence and, if they so desire, commonwealth membership—and the development of their resources to sustain the obligations of independence—is a source of deep satisfaction to us all.

This march of colonies to independence is also a fine tribute to Great Britain's enlightened record of "disengagement from empire"; one that others in the world might emulate.

Before your conference president delivers the inaugural address, perhaps I may be permitted to add to these remarks of welcome a few observations on the recent commonwealth prime ministers' conference which was attended by leaders of governments representing people of diverse races, cultures, creeds and colour, from all parts of the world. The conference made several proposals which will, I am sure, be before you for consideration.

—proposals for new, co-operative development projects; for additional study of techniques in administration and development planning.

—proposals for the possible formation of a new institute to provide specialized training and research to senior administrators concerned with development problems in new countries;

—proposals for strengthening existing commonwealth programs; for promotion—possibly through a commonwealth foundation—of interchanges and closer contacts within professions;

—proposals for a commonwealth medical conference;

—proposals for possible forms of technical assistance to the developing countries which would permit them to participate in the establishment and use of a global system of satellite communications.

Even more significant evidence of the spirit that guides the nations of the new commonwealth in their co-operative endeavours, was the prime ministers' agreement on the importance of the commonwealth's attitude to those interracial problems which threaten the orderly development of mankind.

"As a community of many different races", the prime ministers said, "the commonwealth is itself an almost unique experiment in international co-operation among people of several races and continents."

The co-operation we seek depends primarily on mutual understanding; and understanding is the goal of all education. We made progress toward that goal in London, in the "declaration on racial equality" which was unanimously and wholeheartedly accepted.

The importance of and the need for such a declaration of racial co-operation and equality was never more apparent. Racial discrimination and the intensification in many areas of mutual fear between races must be, for us all, one of the most disturbing features of the present world situation; the root cause of difficulty and danger in many unsolved problems.

The problem of course exists both within and outside the commonwealth. But obviously if the commonwealth could not meet its own challenge, confidence in our brave experiment would have been badly shaken, if not destroyed—not only among our own members, but among other millions of people who see in the commonwealth example their best hope for co-operation between races.

With this in mind—and I am quoting from the communiqué—"The prime ministers affirmed their belief that, for all commonwealth governments, it should be an objective of policy to build in each country a structure of society which offers equal opportunity and non-discrimination for all its people, irrespective of race, colour or creed. The commonwealth should be able to exercise constructive leadership in the application of democratic principles in a manner which will enable the people of each country of different racial and cultural groups to exist and develop as equal citizens."

Canada of course takes a special pride in this conference; in the progress made in this field during the past five years. The decision for a commonwealth conference on education came on the initiative of the Canadian government of the day in 1958. This fact naturally makes us feel doubly privileged to have this third conference here, in our capital.

In the progress made in carrying out the four co-operative programs recommended by the first conference at Oxford, this country has demonstrated its faith in and willingness to help underdeveloped and emerging countries and people. I can assure you that we will continue to do that.

As part of this objective, we wish to help make other nations educationally self sufficient. So an ever increasing proportion of our increasing aid programs goes directly for educational purposes.

In the next two weeks you will be assessing the results of this co-operation recommended by previous conferences. You will be recommending ways to improve present forms of assistance; weighing new proposals against problems seemingly defiant of any solution. You will again be asking whether in a world in which no country has enough scholars and teachers, the limited supply of those who can help should be reduced by sending them to the developing countries to teach and to assist, in the establishment of basic programs of study; or whether it would not be better to bring more of the students and scholars from the developing countries to train in established facilities outside their new borders. Both are necessary. But an expert judgment of what the proportions should be, one to the other, would be helpful.

You have before you an agenda which would make the wisest and most energetic blanch. I congratulate the liaison council and the liaison unit on putting forward such a challenging agenda and on their planning and organization of the conference. Among the subjects for committee discussions, I notice that for the first time, the uses of mass media—television, films, tape recordings; the uses of electronic sound and sight—in education—are to be considered. The potential here, of course, staggers the imagination. It will in time affect almost everything you are discussing. It can be the most significant method ever devised for closing the educational gap at a rate beyond our fondest hopes. But it can also become the most frightening of all the results of modern technology in its tendencies to "dehumanize" society.

Before concluding, may I say how fortunate we have been to secure as president of the conference one of our outstanding and most distinguished citizens, Right Hon. Vincent Massey. My own deep respect and admiration for him is shared by all Canadians and indeed by all who know him. His long and brilliant career of public service as educator, in the broadest sense, businessman and diplomat was climaxed when he became, as Governor General, the first Canadian representative of the monarch in Canada.

I am honoured and privileged to welcome you to Ottawa and I am delighted now to be able to turn the conference over to its president.

Address given by Right Hon. Vincent Massey, C.H., at the opening of the third commonwealth education conference, Ottawa, Friday, 21st August, 1964.

My first words must be of gratitude for the honour of being asked to preside at the third commonwealth education conference. As a Canadian, I welcome you to this country, which is proud to be your host for the meeting; as president of the conference, which is so important for all our countries, I welcome you to this opening session.

[Translation]

Allow me to use our other official language to wish a most sincere and cordial welcome to French speaking members of the conference.

Many of you will not have been in this country before. I am glad to know that a number of you will be travelling in Canada when the conference is over. So that you will better understand what you see, I should like to tell you a little about the background. Here, as elsewhere in the world today, the one certain thing is change. In the course of my own lifetime, I have seen Canada evolve from an agricultural economy to a largely industrial one; from a colony to a sovereign state; from a country with no foreign relations to one represented in over 60 nations.

We have a complicated national pattern. We are a land of many cultures. There is a large French part, a large English part and a host of smaller ethnic parts. Every part by itself is a minority, separate and distinct. Quebec is the home of French culture in North America and so is more than just one of our ten provinces. Some say that our plural society is a mosaic; others call it a salad. Canada in recent years has received great waves of immigration from Europe, increasing our population since the second world war by more than two millions, but these newcomers have not been caught up and reshaped—differences are welcomed here. In spite of this increase, you may be struck by the fact that our population is small for so large a country—even that which we have is, to some extent, reduced by emigration. Many immigrants have made Canada a stopping point on their way to the United States, and many native born Canadians have moved south. Though immigration surpasses emigration, it does not fully replace the skills and drive of those we lose.

Canadian life has been influenced to an extent we sometimes hardly realize by the fact that we are a northern country. This is reflected in the way we live and, indeed, in our national character. We lie between two giant neighbours and are flanked by two great oceans opening out to the occidental and oriental worlds; this results in as many problems as advantages. In Canada there are six time zones across our 4,500 miles of breadth, and we require systems of transportation and communications which would be regarded as unjustified were it not for the fact that national unity demands the east-west links which offset the ever-present pull to the south.

Canada is a monarchy, indeed, she has been since her beginning, whether the crown was French or English. Now the crown of the kingdom of Canada is Canadian. We are really not a young or shapeless country. We are in our fourth century of settlement and are about to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of our constitution. That document is today one of the oldest constitutions in the world continuously in force. It establishes the principle of "peace, order and good government". This time-honoured objective was chosen in preference to the alternative formula "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness". The choice indicates a society founded upon allegiance instead of social contract, a society reflecting the organic growth of tradition itself rather than one created by an explicit act of reason or will.

Canada has practically no revolutionary background, few national myths and folk heroes. Her existence has always been too precarious, her dependence upon "mother countries" always too real, and her peoples' jealousy of their cultural heritages too intense to permit flirtations with adventure. However, as you will be aware during your sojourn here, we are now passing through one of those periods which most countries, and all federations, experience, of constitutional and political strain and readjustment to a new equilibrium. The hereditary sense of tolerance and compromise which has enabled us to carry on over the generations will, I have no doubt, ultimately help us to settle the questions which today beset us. We have learned tolerance in a hard and practical school. As a Canadian writer has said, "Not only was this country formed out of ... defeated racial and political groups; some of these groups had once been bitter enemies of one another...and they had to live in peace..."

However, compromise in Canadian life has always somewhat blurred our image of ourselves, and has often discouraged bold initiatives in nation building. Through the early years another handicap was our status as a dependency. But this has not been without its compensations. Having been a colony ourselves, we understand more acutely the feelings of those who travel a road with which we are already familiar. Our only wars have been in self defence or for the liberation of other peoples. Our tradition has been peaceable, without even internal strife except enough to remember and fear its possibility.

The result of history, geography and colonization is that there are attitudes and things which are peculiarly Canadian, Canada did not just happen. It was built and is maintained by the concerted efforts of her people. Western and northern Canada have been a workshop, planned and ordered by government and business established in advance of settlement.

For national schemes we have employed the device of the crown corporation, a semi-independent governmental body containing features of both public and private enterprise.

Yet the result—though socialistic—has not been socialism, perhaps because here the public is suspicious of "state planning" and "nationalization". The technique of the crown corporation, a characteristic Canadian compromise, may well be of value to countries with similar problems.

Another result of the Canadian experience that may interest other developing nations is our practice of federalism. Although our loose federal constitutional structure, with vast areas of power vested in the provincial governments, has sometimes made it difficult to tackle some national problems, it has allowed the establishment and development of a single state in which the two major European cultures and a host of minorities have co-existed and flourished.

This confederation is one of the two great political experiments with which Canadians have been concerned. The other one to which we have made a significant contribution is the commonwealth itself, for its pattern of independence, growing from responsible government, was first developed here in Canada a century ago. The peculiar constitutional principles which caught on in the whole empire, and transformed it, emerged as we solved our own relations with the mother country; we became a constitutional laboratory in which the nineteenth century empire was created. The new commonwealth after the second world war was built on ideas of association which Canadians advocated in opposition to those of imperial federation and a united front which found favour in some quarters in Great Britain and the other dominions.

The plural and diverse communities of other commonwealth countries have much in common with this one. In unfeignedly welcoming the new countries to their independence, congratulating them on their achievement and wishing them every happiness and success for their people, we Canadians also hope to be known as understanding and helpful. Like Canada, the more recent members have been formed by practical compromise through a process of evolution, rather than by the application of logic. Indeed, this process is still being adapted to the commonwealth's growing number of member countries. Though necessary and unavoidable, the growing pains of nationhood are always difficult and sometimes severe. They are not unknown to us. One of the great indefinable bonds of the commonwealth is the special and active interest assured to new members in facing the difficult problems that are bound to arise in setting up a sovereign country.

I am one of those who believe in the commonwealth—I admire its concept and respect its functions; as a Canadian I am proud of it—any of us who have been concerned with its growth could hardly feel otherwise. The commonwealth began here when three colonies in British North America were federally united in 1867. A few years before Sir John Macdonald, the principal architect of what became Canada, said:

"We are fast ceasing to be a dependency, and are assuming the position of an ally of Great Britain. England will be the centre, surrounded and sustained by an alliance not only of Canada, but Australia, and all her other possessions; and there will be thus formed an immense confederation of freemen, the greatest confederacy of civilized and intelligent men that has ever had an existence on the face of the globe."

From these origins we have passed through four identifiable stages. First, from the British North America Act of 1867 to the statute of Westminster of 1931—the so-called "old commonwealth", about which Sir Wilfrid Laurier observed in 1907, "The proper basis of the British empire was that it was to be composed of a galaxy of nations under the British crown."

Second, from the statute of Westminster to the independence of India and Pakistan, involving the beginnings of the "new" commonwealth with its republican members. Mr. Nehru, so sorely missed by all of us, said in 1950:

"We are members of the commonwealth—that rather strange and odd collection of nations which seems to prosper most in adversity—it does teach us many lessons, and in the sense that we get on best together when we meet in complete freedom and comradeship and we know that there is going to be no pressure or compulsion exercised upon us."

Third, from the independence of India to the establishment of Malaysia, the widening of the "new" commonwealth.

Fourth, there remains a period of adjustment in many places. In this last stage, the great decolonizing function of the commonwealth is being concluded. Its shape and boundaries have now been more or less defined. There only remains a time of mutation or consolidation.

Realizing what we have to work with, we must decide what we wish to do with it. Now is the moment of our greatest opportunity. To know what we should do, it is worth considering what we are and where we are going.

In the last 17 years the commonwealth has grown from five independent countries to nearly 20. The 70 million people in this group of nations have increased to 700 million—a quarter of the world's population.

Many attempts have been made to define this association of countries. Mr. John Holmes, the head of our institute of international affairs, has spoken of it as:

"an association among countries of various races and continents which, in spite of wide differences of political practice and international orientation, share, as a result of a common historical experience, certain constitutional and legal attitudes, governmental and business practices and habits of working together. It is a matter of faith and will."

Many adjectives have been applied to the commonwealth. It has been called "shapeless, unorganized, unstructured, anomalous, illogical". Some of our more advanced theologians have even suggested that we accept the inevitable, dismantle the traditional apparatus, abolish the nomenclature, and suppress the ritual in the hope that the essential faith will survive in hibernation to re-emerge in its own time, transformed and revitalized. Others say that there is no chance of survival at all, that the commonwealth is fit for nothing but the reminiscences of aging statesmen. An anonymous writer, not very long ago, delivered himself of an utterance, rather less than statesman-like, when he said "The commonwealth has really become a gigantic farce."

Of course it is not only in Great Britain that some politicians would seek to blame the commonwealth connection for one or other or indeed all of their domestic ills. There will always be those who dream of solving their problems by denying their duties and historical or sentimental attachments, to seek the illusory freedom of total irresponsibility, predicated upon no principle higher than a policy of pure self interest. That is not our way. Because there is implicit in the concept of the commonwealth, values of duty and honour and service, no definition of it can be wholly satisfactory. It is much easier to say what it is not than to say what it is. It has been described as a club, but a club has certain set rules and obligations which the commonwealth does not possess, at least so far. It is not a power bloc. It is not a diplomatic unit. It is not an economic force. It is not even a group of like minded people or of like minded nations, and yet in a sense it can sometimes be those things, although it is none of them. It does confer certain economic advantages on its members. In fact, the commonwealth is often justified in some countries by the expectation of more favourable economic terms. It has also political advantages. Canada uses it as a counterbalance to the United States. Perhaps for this reason, Canadians may have been guilty of underestimating the economic factor and stressing the political. Certainly the commercial and financial advantages of membership have, for many years, been of rather less importance to Canada than to other members. The commonwealth has also certain military advantages. A number of recent incidents have shown the readiness of members to help one another, even in the absence of formal treaty commitments.

Besides these non-sentimental realities, we are also a network of personal relationships. A recently published handbook named 85 organizations and societies in Britain alone concerned with various aspects of commonwealth relations and the list is certainly far from exhaustive. These organizations, ranging from the commonwealth collection of micro-organisms, to the consultative space research committee, reach their apex at the prime ministerial level. Regular meetings and constant interchanges of information are as valuable as their results are immeasurable. After all, we have in this room today a vivid example of how the commonwealth can be put to work.

Such relationships and advantages are not in themselves the commonwealth. They are components but they give us only glimpses of the whole. It remains an almost completely informal association and this, in many ways, is perhaps its greatest merit. Lacking rigidity, it cannot be shattered by a blow in any one place. The commander in chief of Hitler's navy reported in September, 1940, "The British empire is not expected to collapse owing to the peculiar innate force of the political objectives embodied in the commonwealth of nations".

Through its development since the war, the commonwealth has shown striking adaptability. Indeed, to quote a recent comment, "... one of the most persistent of illusions is that it is essentially a conservative and stable institution. In fact, it is a supreme triumph in wild, zestful, fantastic innovation." Making a virtue of necessity in accordance with its genius, the commonwealth today glorifies its diversity and freedom from commitment. It possesses what has been called "invertebrate informality". It finds its virtue not in unity of policy but in a search for understanding, for the sharing of views and constant consultation among its members.

It is often asked what is the value of these functions; has the commonwealth any future? It is important to remember that it does exist, and that it influences the international relationships of each of its members. Those who have experienced it believe in it, and their attitude must be recognized as partially a matter of faith. The fact that the mystique is difficult to define and unacceptable to some critics, does not mean that it can be discarded.

The United Kingdom's negotiations with the common market tore the last shred of illusion away from the commonwealth. It was a moment of truth when the full extent of the post-war revolution had to be recognized and accepted. Many are now realizing that what then seemed a death rattle was, in fact, a birth pang of a new stage in our development.

The shape of the commonwealth and the full contrast of its diverse interests, have been borne in upon us. Aware of our differences, and of the realities of our situation, we can see that we none the less form the only grouping of nations which bridges the many divisions of a much divided world. The rich and the poor, the east and the west, the tropical and temperate, the developing and the developed—all these are contained in our family grouping. We have on hand a supreme opportunity to help one another and to set an example for other countries in the mending of these differences that threaten our existence.

For the commonwealth to meet the challenge of mutual assistance, it must be recognized that each country has a responsibility in leadership. Although to do this we must abandon the idea of the commonwealth as an English institution, no one will ever forget the greatness of the British legacies. The railways, harbours and industries which Britain built are far less important than the institutions of government, above all the values which she brought to our peoples, and left with them. These have made the deepest impact. Today the greatest testimony to British genius can be seen in the civil service, the judiciary, the armed forces and even the playing fields, which stand for the finest in British traditions. It is a record that history is unlikely to ignore. It will be remembered with the contributions of Greece and Rome to world civilization. But the past must not be allowed to dominate the present. As Professor Silcock of the University of Malaya said not long ago:

"The commonwealth is no longer a wheel with only one centre of force and drive. If it is to survive at all, it will be as a lattice of increasing intercommunications and interaction. No monopoly of initiative and concern should be expected of the government, the people or the press of the 'mother country'."

To draw people together is, of course, the function of the United Nations and it has sometimes been said that its existence makes the commonwealth unnecessary. The answer is that the ties which hold the races and continents in contract are frail and tenuous enough; every reinforcement is worth while and among other contemporary international organizations with which it can and should be compared, the commonwealth has shown more internal consistency than any other. As Mr. Nehru pointed out at the time, India did not leave the commonwealth over the Suez incident because, in his view, it would have been a retrograde step to sever any link that exists between nations.

Though there may be impatience and trespasses upon civil liberties among member states, one can ask how much worse things might be without the commonwealth influence. In all our countries there is a substantial body of opinion—conscious of the sins we have committed in the name of effective government, of the mixed history of colonial rule, of racial intolerance—which insists that we must not expect all the traditions of Westminster in countries where unity is frail, illiteracy is high, and the economy a baffling puzzle. There should be patience and good intention in watching and helping others to solve the paradoxes that beset the final stages of colonialism in various corners of the world. If our multiracial fraternal society has any reason for existence, the most immediate is to resolve these problems.

Our way is to take a pragmatic route to the realization of higher ideals. We cannot all have the same constitutional mechanisms. But, equally, we must not expect too much of the commonwealth's now respectably established tradition of limitless elasticity. Though all nations must work out their own salvation, there are certain values—civil rights as much as racial equality—that we must preserve at all costs. Up to a point it may be claimed that variations on the democratic theme to suit local conditions are permissible. It may even be argued that, as regards patently deplorable manifestations, the wisest course is to maintain contact in order to exercise such restraining influence as is possible and to encourage the democratic forces that must ultimately prevail. But certainly there is a line beyond which we cannot go in tolerating the membership of governments which deny the few but fundamental principles which have distinguished the commonwealth. These are values of individual liberty and human respect, and how fully we are committed to them is, I think, exemplified by the recent declaration of racial equality made at the prime ministers' meeting in London. Here we see the unique and constructive leadership which the commonwealth can exercise in securing the application under difficult circumstances of democratic principles.

Of course, allowances must be made. It has been said that "people who live differently, think differently". Countries in diverse stages of development cannot possibly subscribe to identical political ideas, still less to identical practices. There are those who wish to see established one all-encompassing institution, covering the commonwealth like an umbrella. There are others who feel that structural formality can only assuage, not cure, internal weakness and dissension. Certainly the idea that disunity among governments can be avoided simply by the creation of international councils is an illusion. At the same time, however, and provided we have a constructive attitude of mind, the innumerable contracts nurtured between our member states over many years, which I have mentioned—governmental, professional, cultural, economic, educational and so on—offer an excellent mechanism for a real contribution to the world order. At their recent meeting, the commonwealth prime ministers conceived of a secretariat that I have no doubt will greatly encourage this function. To quote the communiqué:

"This secretariat, being recruited from member countries and financed by their contributions, would be at the service of all commonwealth governments and would be a visible symbol of the spirit of co-operation which animates the commonwealth."

Better than talking about the commonwealth is the willingness to use it. Here we have a great conference which exists within the pattern of our relationships, a gathering which reflects a common purpose. No better practical link can be found than in the sphere of education. It was H. G. Wells who said "Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe". If we accept as an initial proposition that, next to peace, the world's greatest need today is a general lift in the standards of living of the poorer nations, then I think it is obvious that broad educational advance should be our primary objective. Education must now be regarded as a human right. As such, it is an end in itself, without reference to costs and returns. Its chief purpose is to develop the human personality so that men may take advantage of their spiritual, intellectual and material gifts, to preserve and transmit a society's values and enable people to understand the world in which they live. Only an educational system based on such sound social purposes can develop human resources effectively. Without it, there can be no continuing economic growth, nor can political power be broadly distributed. Undoubtedly, education may cause social tensions since it creates new aspirations and new needs besides opening up fresh opportunities and widening horizons for individuals and nations. It can, however, be the force that also relieves tensions and creates understanding not only within a nation but on an international level as well.

Within the commonwealth, education has always been a common exchange. Even ten years ago more than 50,000 overseas students were receiving instruction in our various countries; the vast majority of them were from other members of our association of nations. Then, less than six years ago, I am happy to say, on Canadian initiative, the commonwealth trade and economic conference at Montreal decided to institute a scheme of scholarships and fellowships. Subsequently, at Oxford and later at New Delhi these plans for straight academic exchange were amplified to include the provision of teachers and teacher-trainers.

If I may inflict some figures upon you, beside the 250 scholars involved in the commonwealth scholarship program, there are some 800 students from the developing countries who are studying or training in Canada under Canadian aid programs and some 160 Canadian educators are serving abroad in commonwealth countries. Since 1950 more than 4,500 scholars and others from the developing countries have received training in Canadian institutions under various Canadian scholarship programs.

Whatever we may think about these programs, it must be admitted that much remains to be done. There are those who say that if we ordinary Canadians knew more about it, we would be inspired to greater efforts. It is true that as recently as 1962 our contributions to these programs of development amounted to only some $60 million per annum, less than 1 per cent of our federal budget. But about a year ago all this underwent a profound change. It now seems probable that in the fiscal year 1964-1965 upward of $230 million will be available for commitment by Canada to grants, development loans and special credits. Perhaps, as some of our own informed people have said, our attitude is still one of "how much can we spare" instead of "how much can we share", but at least it must be admitted that we are today sparing more freely.

Mr. Lewis Perinbam, until recently secretary general of the Canadian national commission for UNESCO, has pointed out that at present the only centre for commonwealth studies on this continent is to be found at Duke University in North Carolina. He has suggested that, as we approach Canada's centenary, it would be fitting to establish for the use of all our members a Commonwealth study centre in Canada, fully equipped and staffed to perform functions perhaps too obvious to list, and which would be under the aegis of the federal and provincial governments. Perhaps the world's fair building in Montreal might be used to house this Commonwealth study centre.

Of course, Canada's experience is only one example of what is being done about education in the commonwealth. Every country is involved and countless people are now familiar with the problems—the urgent question of the supply of textbooks, for example. But for the newly developing countries the need is frequently for people rather than equipment or money—people with knowledge and experience. We are all in need of more teachers today. Here in Canada we are acutely conscious of this, but our problem is subtly different from that of the less developed countries. We are concerned about automation; about a new way of life which provides all man's wants with little labour and, it seems, at the touch of a button or under the guidance of a computer. Compare this situation with that of some other lands where the most primitive of methods, requiring much labour and a great amount of time, do not produce enough for one man, let alone his family. The problem abroad is to build from the bottom. We are told that in Asia eight million primary school teachers will have to be trained by 1980; this would require 500,000 more teacher-trainers. In Africa, over the same period, the need will amount to 700,000 additional primary school teachers, and, on the educational top level, about 80,000 more members of university staffs.

This third commonwealth education conference is concerned with the vast difficulties involved and the complicated solutions required. We are presented with a frontier giving us abundant opportunities for thought and action. The great heritage of ideas and knowledge which the commonwealth countries offer, can broaden the framework of our co-operation and enrich each member. Aid for education is not really aid at all; it is a form of partnership. Education is a true meeting ground for donor and receiver.

In a sense all nations are "developing" countries. To be economically retarded does not mean culturally backward. If many commonwealth countries are for the moment less advanced than others in economic terms, this cannot dull their great history, rich in cultural and social achievement. We all have something to learn from one another. This is very true of those of us whose origin is European. One recalls the words of Mr. Nehru at the opening of the second conference in 1962:

"European civilization has a magnificent record and yet many people immersed in [it] ...had in the past, not so now perhaps, no knowledge of the rest of the world and of the great things the rest of the world has done in the past. It is not a good thing for any cultured and civilized man not to know what has happened elsewhere..."

Through education, reason and observation can be brought to bear on the everyday problems of man's relations with the world and the people about him. Education opens the door of understanding, and besides showing the way to prosperity, lets in the light of peace. These, one need hardly say, are goals worthy of our greatest efforts.

Statement of acceptance of the Chairmanship at the third commonwealth education conference by Honourable Paul Gérin-Lajoie, Quebec minister of education, Friday August 21, 1964.

Mr. President, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Minister for External Affairs, distinguished representatives,

I am deeply impressed by the honour which you have bestowed upon me, in asking me to preside over your work. I do not believe that this honour is offered to me so much in my personal capacity; above all, I see in it a homage to Canada, which I have the honour of representing here with my colleagues from the Canadian delegation, to Quebec, my home province, of which I am minister of education, and to all my fellow countrymen.

[Translation]

I wish to see a special meaning in the fact that you chose a minister from a French speaking government to preside over a conference bringing together countries with different languages and cultures, that is true, but where English constitutes a historic bond. Quebec actually forms within the Canadian confederation an homogeneous but different element. Almost a century ago, the two founding races of Canada decided by common agreement to enter into a pact which would enable them to live together while respecting one another's characteristics, language, social and political institutions, and safeguarding also their own interests and aspirations.

English Canada and French Canada are therefore made up, within one country, of both distinctive elements and essential, even integral parts, the union of which has permitted to create, develop and maintain Canada.

[Text]

Our distinguished president, Right Hon. Vincent Massey, is one of those Canadians who has best understood the profound reality and fundamental importance of Canadian dualism. As an eminent member of the English speaking community, who has to his credit both a highly distinguished public career and many literary accomplishments, he has acknowledged publicly and in numerous circumstances the essential contribution of his French speaking compatriots to the Canadian identity.

The selection by this conference of a chairman from Quebec also suggests to me a parallel between the commonwealth and Canada; for both today are in their own way primarily dedicated to fostering increased understanding and closer co-operation between partners, while respecting individual particularisms; indeed, it is from this very diversity that the commonwealth today derives its main strength and its purpose, and Canada, its unique personality and character.

I earnestly hope that our exchange of views and the sharing of our varied experiences will make possible a keener appreciation of our solidarity, and that our conference will facilitate an even more active participation of the commonwealth in those tasks for which it is particularly well suited. This accomplishment in turn, while strengthening the bonds which link our governments and peoples, cannot but contribute to greater co-operation and friendship within the whole community of nations.

Because of that sense of equality and of mutual respect inherent in the commonwealth, I know that I can rely on your fullest collaboration toward the success of this conference, particularly since we are all gathered here to seek answers suited to our multiple educational problems. In return, I assure you of my own keenest co-operation in the services of this third commonwealth education conference.

CALLS TO MONTREAL NEWSPAPERS BY FORESTRY MINISTER

Question No. 1,491—Mr. Pigeon:

Did the Minister of Forestry make any telephone calls to La Presse and/or Le Devoir in Montreal since June 4, 1964, and, if so (a) to whom were such calls made (b) what was the cost of such calls, and (c) to whom has each such call been billed?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): (a) The Minister of Forestry was in communication by telephone with Mr. Michel Roy of Le Devoir on July 5, 1964, as explained in Hansard of Friday, July 24, 1964, at page 5923, as follows:

Hon. Maurice Sauvé Minister of Forestry: On July 5 last, I was at the meeting of the Quebec Liberal federation in Quebec. In the afternoon I met some newspapermen with whom I discussed the problem of the strike at La Presse on a friendly basis and in view of my trade union background, from 1952 to 1955, when I took part in several collective bargaining agreements and in the settlement of many labour disputes. I therefore discussed with those newspapermen the problem of La Presse.

In the evening, between seven and nine o'clock, I tried to make a phone call, but all public phones in the Laurentide hotel were busy, so I went to the reporters room to make that call.

At that time a reporter from Le Devoir was giving a report of the activities of the convention to his information manager, Mr. Michel Roy.

Following the telephone call of that reporter, I asked to talk to Mr. Michel Roy...

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES, MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,531—Mr. Fisher:

1. How many prevailing rate employees are there with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, technical services branch in Ottawa?

2. What are their occupations?

3. What consideration has been given in the past four years to bringing these employees within the civil service?

4. Have the employees indicated any desire to become civil servants?

5. What are the difficulties which prevent such a change or transfer?

6. Is there any record of representations on this subject from any of the civil service associations?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): 1. Sixty four positions, one of which was vacant on July 15, 1964.

2. Labourer, labour foreman, machinist, machinist foreman, toolmaker, sheet metal worker, welder and layout man, motor mechanic, electrician, carpenter, foreman carpenter, light equipment operator, handyman.

3. In response to representations received early this year, the department asked for advice on current treasury board policy regarding change of status of prevailing rate employees. The department was advised that there has been no change in the policy which was established in 1959, when it was decided by treasury board that exempt employees would not be brought under the Civil Service Act.

4. Representations to this end were made by a staff association which claimed to represent the wishes of 48 of these employees.

5. See answer to No. 3 re treasury board policy.

6. Yes. The department received representations on this subject in a letter dated January 30, 1964, from the civil service association of Canada.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION CONTRACTS TO FAIREY AVIATION

Question No. 1,599—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the dollar value of contracts awarded by the Department of Defence Production to Fairey Aviation for the fiscal years 1959-60, 1960-61, 1961-62, 1962-63 and 1963-64 and the estimated value of contracts for 1964-65?

2. What was the employment figure for the above years and the present employment at the plants located at Eastern Passage and Halifax international airport?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. The dollar values of prime contracts awarded by the head office and district office of the Department of Defence Production to Fairey Canada Limited are as follows: 1959-60, $8,050,641; 1960-61, $3,710,599; 1961-62, $3,963,526; 1962-63, $3,684,905; 1963-64, $2,097-793; 1964-65, (April-July 31) $2,848,935*.

* Information on the value of contracts placed in 1964/65 is available only to the end of July. An estimate of the value of contracts placed to the end of the current fiscal year cannot be made since it is the policy of the department to award contracts as the result of competitive tender, wherever possible.

These figures, while in direct reply to the question, do not reflect total plant work load attributable to Canadian defence expenditures since they do not include subcontracts received from other prime contractors of D.D.P. Nor do they necessarily reflect annual expenditures made by D.D.P. in Fairey due to the fact of overlap on contracts from one year to the next. Following is a table which more nearly reflects actual expenditures on prime contracts per fiscal year at Fairey: 1959-60, $3,751,000; 1960-61, $4,063,222; 1961-62, $2,096,627; 1962-63, $3,884,695; 1963-64, $3,266,685; 1964-65, (April-July 31), $968,300.

2. Total average annual employment figures for the combined staffs at Eastern Passage and Halifax international airport are as follows: 1959-60, 865; 1960-61, 915; 1961-62, 854; 1962-63, 803; 1963-64, 759; 1964-65, 738 (estimated).

SAKIMAY INDIAN RESERVE—VISIT BY R.C.M.P.

Question No. 1,612—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the R.C.M.P. visit the Sakimay Indian reserve on July 18, 1964 and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) did the R.C.M.P. have search warrants when they searched Indian tents and houses on the Sakimay Indian reserve (c) were dogs used at the Sakimay Indian reserve on July 18, 1964 (d) what was the purpose of taking dogs to that Indian reserve (e) were the police dogs kept on a leash while they performed their duties at the Sakimay Indian reserve?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): So far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned:

(a) Yes, to police a pow-wow on the reserve; to enforce the Indian Act and to keep peace.

(b) Members did not have search warrants. No houses or tents were searched, but several vehicles were searched and seizures of liquor made. Appropriate charges were laid under the Indian Act or Saskatchewan liquor act in these cases.

(c) Yes, dogs were there but were not used except as indicated in the answer to question (d).

(d) To protect the police cars and any exhibits stored in the police cars. During a similar event last year, police cars were damaged and some exhibits were stolen when the cars were unattended.

(e) The dogs were not performing any specific duties except as indicated in the answer to question (d). One dog was kept in the car at all times. One dog was let out for a few minutes and kept on a leash.

*RADIO STATION CKPM

Question No. 1,613—Mr. Irvine:

1. Who are the incorporators of the company that presently operates radio station CKPM?

2. What individuals were the applicants before the board of broadcast governors requesting a grant of licence for radio station CKPM?

3. On what basis, grounds and reasons did the board of broadcast governors grant such licence?

4. How many applications were made before the board of broadcast governors within a period of five years prior to the granting of CKPM of their licence for a similar licence in Ottawa, and who were the applicants therefor?

5. Who are the present shareholders (preferred and common) of the company that operates CKPM, what is their distribution of shares and are they Canadians?

6. If CKPM is operated by individuals rather than a corporation, who are they, what is their personal interest and are they limited partners?

7. What networks is CKPM affiliated with and what other individual radio stations is it affiliated with?

8. What is the capitalization of the company, or net worth of the partners of the partnership?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. James A. Stewart, Mrs. Ailsa Stewart, William Gordon Burke-Robertson.

2. The application was made by James A. Stewart on behalf of a company to be incorporated.

3. The board of broadcast governors recommended the approval of the application by Mr. Stewart, indicating that in the opinion of the board the proposed new station would provide a desirable additional AM radio service to listeners in Ottawa.

4. Nine applications were referred to the board by the Department of Transport for an AM radio licence in Ottawa since July 1959, as follows: October 1959, by James A. Stewart; October 1960, by James A. Stewart; February 1962, by J. W. Pellie on behalf of a company to be incorporated; July 1962, by Roger Seguin on behalf of a company to be incorporated; August 1962, by Sudbury Broadcasting Co. Ltd. (French language); August 1962, by Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (French language); December 1962, by Radio Prestige Ltee (French Language); December 1962, by James A. Stewart; July 1963, by James A. Stewart.

5. (a) The Department of Transport has always treated the lists of shareholders as confidential. (b) The shareholders are Canadians.

6. CKPM is operated by a corporation, Confederation Broadcasting (Ottawa) Limited.

7. None.

8. Authorized capital $100,000.

HYDROGRAPHIC SURVEYS EXPENDITURES, B.C.

Question No. 1,663—Mr. Barnett:

What, for each of the fiscal years commencing with 1920-21, are expenditures made for the seacoast of British Columbia by the Canadian hydrographic surveys?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): 1963-1964, $939,795; 1962-63, $1,008,997; 1961-62, $946,497; 1960-61, $681,282; 1959-60, $619,000; 1958-59, $692,000; 1957-58; $479,000; 1956-57, $527,000; 1955-56, $380,000; 1954-55; $404,000; 1953-54, $428,000; 1952-53; $323,000; 1951-52, $188,000; 1950-51, $197,000.

Note: Expenditure records for the period prior to 1950-51 are not available.

IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA, 1901-1911

Question No. 1,670—Mr. Choquette:

1. How many immigrants entered Canada between 1901 and 1911?
2. What was their country of origin?
3. How many of those immigrants were English speaking and how many French speaking?

Questions

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. See attached table.

2. See attached table.

3. Not available. See further explanation in response to part 3 of question No. 1,676.

examined at the time of their application as to their ability to speak either or both of Canada's two official languages. However, it was not until January of this year that information respecting language ability was recorded in such a way as to enable tabulations to be produced in this respect. Of the 51,323 immigrant arrivals during the first six months of 1964, 22,975 were able to speak English while 4,317 were able to speak French. A further 1,053 had some knowledge of either English or French but it was not considered sufficient to permit their carrying on a conversation.

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITION 64-263

Question No. 1,683—Mr. Aiken:

1. With reference to competition No. 64-263 of the civil service commission for planning and research officers, Department of Public Works, for which positions is the knowledge of both the English and the French languages required?

2. What positions are presently available to be filled from this competition?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. There are three positions to be filled at the present time. It is essential that at least one be filled by an officer with a knowledge of both the English and French languages.

2. Three planning and research officer positions.

PUBLIC WORKS TUG "CANSO"

Question No. 1,692—Mr. Coates:

1. Is it the intention of the government to remove from service the Department of Public Works tug Canso and, if so (a) will a replacement be provided for the Canso (b) if no replacement is planned for the Canso what does the government intend to do about the crew of the tug?

2. Were tenders called for the replacement of this tug prior to April 22, 1963, and did the present administration cancel this tender call?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, at the conclusion of the 1964 dredging season. (a) No replacement is planned. (b) The crew will be laid off at the end of this season and will be considered for alternate employment elsewhere in the public service according to their qualifications, experience and length of service.

2. No.

FISHWAY CONSTRUCTION, QUEENS COUNTY, N.B.

Question No. 1,716—Mr. Fairweather:

1. What is the total cost of the fishway built on the Salmon river, Queens county, New Brunswick, in 1963?

2. How many men were employed on construction of the fishway and how long did it take to build?

3. What is the result of the latest count of salmon using this fishway?

[Mr. Badanai.]

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. An adult salmon counting fence was built on the Salmon river, Queens county, New Brunswick, in 1963. Total cost $15,813.70.

2. Construction was by contract and consequently information re number of men employed not available.

3. To date no salmon have passed through this counting fence. It is a late run river and it is not anticipated fish will enter until the fall of the year.

GRAIN UNLOADING FACILITIES, SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Question No. 1,723—Mr. Fairweather:

Are there facilities at the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, to discharge a cargo of grain as well as load such a cargo and, if not, what plans has the national harbours board prepared to add this necessary facility and by what date?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): There are no facilities for the discharge of waterborne grain cargoes at Saint John harbour, and the national harbours board would not feel justified in recommending the installation of such facilities without evidence that they would be used to the extent necessary to warrant the expenditure.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY WIDENING, CALGARY, ALTA.

Question No. 1,724—Mr. Woolliams:

1. With reference to the widening of the trans-Canada highway through 16th avenue north Calgary, what financial share, if any, is the federal government contributing to this necessary improvement?

2. Under the agreements with the provinces, does the federal authority make contributions to the improvement and widening of the trans-Canada highway, irrespective of what route it follows?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. No requests have been received for participation by the federal government in the widening of the trans-Canada highway through 16th avenue north Calgary.

2. No. Canada will only share in construction costs on the route designated in the trans-Canada highway agreements. The shareable portion of construction costs is limited to that required to construct a two lane highway to a specified standard as provided for in the trans-Canada highway agreements.

Question No. 1,434—Mr. Herridge:

1. What was the policy adopted with respect to the purchase or expropriation of land surrounding Buffalo Pound lake in connection with the building of the Saskatchewan dam?
2. What were the number of parcels of land purchased or expropriated?
3. What was the acreage, assessed value, and amount paid for each parcel purchased or expropriated?

Return tabled.

TRADE

DIVERSION OF CANADIAN WHEAT AND FLOUR BY RUSSIA TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the Prime Minister because the matter covers more than one department. It has to do with an article in the London Sunday Times of yesterday's date regarding the diversion by the U.S.S.R. of wheat sold under the contract between the U.S.S.R. and the Canadian wheat board. Is it a fact that some 250,000 tons of wheat and flour under the 1963 contract with the U.S.S.R. were diverted by the purchaser, the U.S.S.R., to Cuba; and was this action agreed to by the Canadian government? Naturally I should like to know too whether the wheat board asked for the views of the Canadian government before consenting to this diversion.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did notice the report to which my right hon. friend has referred, and I am going to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to deal with the matter.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members may recall from my disclosure to the house last year of the terms of the agreement between the U.S.S.R., the Canadian government and the Canadian wheat board, there were in effect two agreements, one of them under which the U.S.S.R. purchased certain quantities of wheat and flour on which credit terms were available, and a second agreement relating to the sale of wheat and flour for Cuba. Under that second part of the agreement sales were strictly for cash.

To make the position quite clear, Mr. Speaker, under the Canada-U.S.S.R. trade agreement concluded last fall there was a sale of approximately 252,000 tons of wheat and 175,000 tons of flour for direct shipment to Cuba on a cash basis. I might add that all shipments of wheat and flour purchased under the Canada-U.S.S.R. wheat agreement have been completed with the exception of a small quantity of flour to be delivered shortly to Cuba.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would then direct this question to the Prime Minister. With respect to the diversion of this wheat and flour to Cuba, has there been any complaint made by any friendly government?

Mr. Pearson: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker; and even those governments which have cut off normal trade with Cuba have agreed, I think—I am speaking particularly of the United States—not to prevent the sale to Cuba for cash of exports of certain foodstuffs and medical supplies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Among the countries in the western hemisphere that have discontinued trading relations, recognition and the exchange of representatives, are there any which are allowing the diversion of wheat or wheat products to Cuba?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot answer that question without an examination. I shall be glad to look into it. I should add that the countries to which my hon. friend refers are selling direct to Cuba for cash, foodstuffs and medical supplies.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question. I ask the Prime Minister if he knows of any international commitment which Canada has made which would preclude our selling wheat either directly or indirectly to Cuba.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—REPORTED RENT INCREASES IN VETERANS PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister who reports to parliament for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and because of the imperative nature of my question, may I direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that within a few days hundreds of veterans in the Fraserview veterans project in Vancouver will be facing an order increasing their rent by 80 per cent, with the alternative of agreeing to a purchase price which is unacceptable to them or an eviction notice, I ask the Prime Minister if he will interest himself to see that this order is withheld pending a further investigation of the complaints. I am asking if this can be done in view of the fact that the order is to take effect within a few days.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will look into the matter immediately as requested by my hon. friend.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THOMPSON, MAN.—STEPS TO ASSIST EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that Thompson, Manitoba, has suffered an exodus of more than 3,000 residents since August 12, can the minister inform the house whether he has taken any steps to encourage negotiations or bring about renewed negotiations in order that another place in Canada might not become a ghost town?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I wish to advise my hon. friend that whatever steps can be taken by the national employment service, as an agency of the Department of Labour, will be taken to assist in the situation. If my hon. friend could be more specific as to what particular matters he has in mind, I would be glad to take the question as notice.

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE LOCATION OF NEW AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to which either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Industry and Minister of Defence Production could reply. Are they in a position to inform the house of the progress made in the talks and negotiations between the Peugeot and Renault companies, as well as the Quebec government, on the one hand, and the federal government, on the other, concerning tariff concessions to be granted to those companies if they were to establish themselves in the province of Quebec?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add at this time.

PROTESTS RESPECTING RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): With further reference to the recent salary increases, may I ask whether a message has been received by the Prime Minister from Vancouver respecting the dissatisfaction particularly of clerks and typists, grades 1 and 2? The message states that these employees were overlooked in the last group B cyclical review and have now been granted paltry increases of $90 and $120 per annum. The telegram asks for an immediate review by the treasury board. In the face of what the Prime Minister said the other day, is he prepared to say that the matter is being reviewed by treasury board so that a measure of fairness and justice will be done to these people?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said on Friday the matter will be looked into at once. It is under close examination, and I hope a statement can be made on it tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it before the treasury board?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I think it will be the president of the treasury board who will report to the house on it tomorrow.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ISSUE OF NEW STAMP WITH INSCRIPTION "QUÉBEC LIBRE"

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. Would he tell the house whether a new stamp, bearing the words "Free Quebec" was issued lately by the department?

Mr. Alexis Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): I shall refer the question to the minister.

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY—REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the chairman of the Atlantic development board that the engineering feasibility of the harnessing of the bay of Fundy tides has been confirmed, is it the intention of the government to request the board to initiate immediately an economic investigation into this matter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take that question as notice, and I hope I or one of my colleagues will be in a position to reply tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): As a supplementary question, in view of this announcement will the Prime Minister also reassess the other projects in the maritimes such as Passamaquoddy and Mactaquac, and will there be any diminution in government interest in them?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, these projects are all related to each other, and I hope we would not decide on one without examining the relationship of that one to all the others.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BURNT OUT PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs but in his absence I shall direct it to the acting minister. In view of the impassioned demands being made continually upon members of this house relative to veterans allowances, otherwise known as burnt out pensions, before this session closes will there be legislation introduced to take care of their increased costs since the last amendment of 1961?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs I shall take this question as notice and bring in an answer tomorrow or the day after.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand that there will be an answer tomorrow?

Mr. Cardin: Tomorrow or the day after.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—DESIGNATION OF PROVINCIAL AGENCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is ready to make any report as to the various agencies in the provinces to which students should apply in respect of the student loan legislation?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope very much to be able to make a full statement probably on Thursday or Friday of this week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE DELAY IN PURCHASE OF NEW EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Is he in a position to inform the house whether he intends to wait until the special committee on national defence presents its report to make a decision as regards the purchasing of the new military equipment recently recommended by his specialists' committee?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention to do so.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): As a supplementary question, does the minister expect that the government will make a decision on the matter of these anti-submarine weapons by late this fall?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would hope so.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO LEASES OF WATERFRONT PROPERTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport but in his absence perhaps the acting minister might take it as notice. Can the minister advise the house whether reports current in Vancouver over the week end regarding the issue or transfer of leases on waterfront properties to the Coal Harbour Development Company are correct? Is so, may I ask him whether the views of the Vancouver west end and downtown ratepayers association have been taken into account and, further, whether there is financial stability in the company to which these leases have been transferred?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I will be glad to take the question as notice and give an answer tomorrow if possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Last week the right hon. gentleman told me he was giving consideration to calling by-elections in Westmorland and Waterloo South. I was just wondering whether they will be called in the next 44 days so that representatives of these constituencies can participate in the flag debate.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This is naturally an important factor in the consideration I have been giving to this matter. I hope to be able to make a statement later in the week about the date of these by-elections.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF ESCALATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, may I direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that we are still awaiting the installation of certain escalators at Winnipeg international airport, can a statement be made soon as to when these installations will be made?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I will take the question as notice.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR TEXT OF SPEECH BY DR. DEUTSCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. It arises from a speech by Dr. Deutsch which was widely reported in the United States. Since the annual report of the economic council was given to us only a short time ago, and since there was very little in that report which seems to dovetail into, or be a replica of, what Dr. Deutsch came out with in terms of Canada's economic growth, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider seeing that the complete text of what Dr. Deutsch had to say in the United States is made available to all members of the house.

[Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke).]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would be very glad to discuss the matter with Dr. Deutsch and see whether the text of that speech can be made available to members.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Thursday, August 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. More.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I referred to the introduction of this flag resolution and to the Prime Minister's open invitation to members to participate. It is a well known fact that members on this side of the house have since accepted that invitation and have made their observations on this subject. The Prime Minister saw fit on one occasion to refer to this as a filibuster. Whether the participation to which I have referred is known as a filibuster or not, I can tell the house that I personally am proud to take part in this debate.

When I spoke on Thursday I also gave reasons why I personally believe that the term "filibuster" as applied by the Liberals to the debate is certainly not applicable to what has taken place in this house. I indicated that in Wednesday's debate, which took up fewer than 29 pages of Hansard, there were two pages of rulings from the Chair, 61 identified interruptions and in all more than 100 interjections by hon. members. There were, in addition, speeches by an hon. member of the New Democratic party and by a representative of "the Liberal group", to repeat a phrase used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the course of his own contribution, during which he made no reference whatsoever to his leader, or to the Liberals being a party.

This reminds one of the statement made by the Minister of Finance during a television broadcast when he said he "thought the Liberal party had a leader." In this case the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not recognize that there is either a party or a leader. Of course, as was mentioned on another occasion, the hon. gentleman has his own ambitions and is probably directing all his energies in that direction.

The Minister of Forestry took exception to certain remarks I was making and rose to tell the house just why he was present as a minister. It is interesting to see that as reported on page 7106 of Hansard, in the second column, the minister's first sentence was:

> I thought we had been elected in this parliament to take decisions.

This fact is clearly indicated by the Liberal party when it takes the decision, the personal decision, of the Prime Minister and gives it its blessings. It has been my understanding that we as members are here to make decisions. Of course it is a very simple matter to make a decision, but it is our further duty to make the right decision. Much doubt has been cast on the decision of this house to introduce to this country a three maple leaves flag which is the personal choice of the Prime Minister.

I say it is his personal choice, Mr. Speaker, because in my own province, as I said before, the two members for Halifax, in my opinion with prior knowledge, made these very bold statements which are a clear indication to the Prime Minister that his personal choice has not been accepted within his own party. These two hon. members made it quite clear that any support which they would give the three maple leaves flag was qualified support.

I further indicated, Mr. Speaker, that the members of his own cabinet are divided on this particular matter, and I threw out the challenge that one particular minister had informed me that his choice would be anything but the three maple leaves flag. He was against it. At the same time he indicated to me what was his choice, which is a clear-cut indication that within the cabinet itself this party is divided. And why should it not be divided? It is the personal selection of the Prime Minister. The Minister of Forestry indicated that we were here to take decisions, but hon. gentlemen opposite are giving the decision of the Prime Minister their blessing.

Why have we not heard from the Liberal members on this particular matter, Mr. Speaker? Why do they not get up in support of the three maple leaves flag? Why have we not heard from the two members for Halifax, who qualified their support for the three maple leaves flag? Let us hear them get up now and give their unqualified support. Let us also hear from the cabinet minister who is quite dissatisfied with this proposed flag. These opinions were all expressed prior to the introduction of this resolution, so let us hear these hon. gentlemen support the three maple leaves flag; and give it unqualified support, not the qualified support they indicated they would give when they knew what the resolution would contain.

Mr. Regan: I would not support your filibuster.

Mr. Mandziuk: They have nothing to say.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member now interjecting is well aware of what I think of his ability, especially when he was trying to chair a certain committee.

Mr. Mandziuk: Which member?

Mr. MacInnis: He does not even show enough ability to make himself properly identifiable. The finger of blame in this debate has been pointed in many directions and for many reasons, but as far as I am concerned the finger can only be pointed in one direction, and that is in the direction of the Prime Minister himself, who has made a personal choice and imposed it on the members of his party. Perhaps I should say "group", because after all that is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce called it. He has imposed on his own group his opinion of what should be the flag design.

The Prime Minister has now said that he is willing to allow this matter to go before a committee. This was the suggestion put forward some time ago by the Leader of the Opposition. However, the Prime Minister's willingness to allow it to go to a committee comes rather late, considering that his action to date has put his own members in such a position that they are more or less obligated to go along with the pressure put upon them by the Prime Minister, which was made quite clear when he introduced his resolution in the first place.

I say the finger can be pointed in one direction and one direction only, namely directly at the Prime Minister. Should he not wish to take my word for this, perhaps he would like to go back to some of the advisers he was looking to for advice not too long ago. He might question the advice of Mr. Ryan of Le Devoir, to whom I understand he went for advice. He might ask what Mr. Ryan thinks of this particular flag design; and in that connection he might read an editorial which appeared in that paper over the week end in which the lack of leadership on his part in pointed out, a matter which his own group is fully realizing is the case today.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the usual sort of contribution is coming from hon. members opposite. I have invited them to get up, if they are in favour of the three maple leaves flag, and give the house their unqualified support for the personal choice of the Prime Minister. But that they cannot do.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the fairy tales told by the hon. member in the last ten minutes have nothing to do with the subamendment and should be ruled out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I have been listening intently to the speech of the hon. member, and frequently during the last few minutes he has referred to the question of designs. There was the question of the three maple leaves and of one or two other designs alluded to by the subamendment. In my opinion, although he is being rather general he is within the ambit of the subamendment.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to you for putting the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) in his place. However, through you, sir, I would call his attention to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, his own colleague, to which he did not see fit to rise and raise a point of order. If I have strayed I submit I have not strayed nearly as far as did the hon. member's own colleague, the minister, on that occasion.

With reference to the three leaves design, it has become obvious across the country to many members of the Liberal group that what the Prime Minister has tried to do in foisting his personal choice upon this parliament has become a very difficult task, and quite possibly hon. gentlemen opposite will rise in their places within the next few hours or days and those who can will indicate their reasons for supporting the three maple leaves flag. But I would very much doubt whether many of them could do that with a clear conscience.

Today we have a flag flying which was referred to by the late Mackenzie King as the official Canadian flag. We have flying today a flag which was recognized by Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent, who said that no new flag should be a party flag. We have flying today a flag which was recognized by the present Leader of the Opposition when he was prime minister. In conclusion I can only say that if it was good enough for the three prime ministers prior to this administration coming into office, it is certainly good enough for this present Prime Minister leading the group he is in in this house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be recognized even though I have not yet risen. Perhaps I might attribute my recognition to the shadow cast by my six foot five inch frame when I do rise. This reminds me of the situation one found, as a small boy born in the days before there was complete pollution of our streams, before our rivers were dammed and all the brooks had been frozen, when one walked along the banks of a brook in late February or early March and heard the sound of a little water trickling underneath the ice. Then one could run back home and say "I think spring is coming". Sometimes, of course, spring was followed by a freeze and the water would stop running. Sometimes the water kept on running and it would not be too long before one could hear the cracking and booming of the ice in the lakes and would know that a complete thaw had taken place; that not only had spring arrived but summer, even a belated one, was not far removed.

Certainly this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I am speaking in an atmosphere similar to that sound of running water underneath the ice, and at this stage I should not want to say anything or do anything which would result in a freeze and stop the running of the water. We can always be optimistic, and perhaps it behooves all of us at this time to be very careful of the situation.

Mr. Speaker, there are one or two general statements I should like to make while carrying on this debate. In the first place I think all members here are fair minded, subject to some political pressure, and will admit that this debate has been of a very high standard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: Did I hear something from the other side? I might have known that some would disagree.

This has been an emotionally charged debate in respect of matters which are very close to many of the members. This is a debate which could have aroused bitter feelings, recriminations and statements which would be very difficult to overlook or control in a parliament such as this. Of course there have been political overtones, as there always are when dealing with matters of this kind; because in a proper sense of the word this is a political body, and politics are bound to be interspersed in our activities.

I do suggest there have been less politics and more sentiment and expression of feeling during this debate, considering the subject matter. I am sure that students of parliamentary history, when reading the speeches made during this debate at some time in the future when many of us are no longer members here, will find it very difficult to understand the comments of some of the press columnists to the effect that this is a very poor parliament. A poor parliament could not have produced a debate such as we have had, and I refer to speeches made by hon. members on all sides of this house. Some great speeches have been made. Of course all the speeches made have not been great, but on the whole parliament as an institution can be very proud of the debate which has taken place.

As I have said, I am sure that students in the future, after we have been long since forgotten individually, will read this debate not only to discover the history of Canada but because of its high quality. The speeches have been emotionally charged, but the situation has been adequately handled. I am sure speeches to be made from now on will continue to be of that high order.

Mr. Speaker, there are two misconceptions I should like to deal with at this time. One has been the suggestion that this debate is a filibuster. That suggestion has been made casually by one or two hon. members opposite, although not by those in the front row. That suggestion has been mentioned casually on occasion by the radio and press men. The suggestion was given an official position a day or two ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who referred to the debate as a Tory filibuster. That was the first time the expression was used by an hon. gentleman in the front row opposite. That minister had the nerve and temerity to call this a Tory filibuster.

I remind that hon. gentleman that we are speaking here today at the proper request of the Prime Minister, who said it was the duty and responsibility of all hon. members in all parties to not only express the feelings of their constituents but their own feelings as well. I agree with the Prime Minister that it is our duty to express our opinions, and that is exactly what we are doing and have been doing for a week or more. It is true that one or two speeches have been made in repetition, and that two or three speakers have spoken twice during this debate. That is understandable for various reasons known to hon. members who have had the responsibility of marshalling the debate and arranging for speakers.

Generally speaking there has been no repetition. This is the first time I have spoken during this debate, and I know there are other members on this side of the house who have not spoken but who will, I am sure, take part in this debate. They will not be taking part in a Tory filibuster but will be expressing their opinions in response to the wishes of their constituents. Our constituents expect us to speak, Mr. Speaker, and for some of us in any event our consciences demand that we do so. I think in all fairness that fact is generally recognized by hon. members on the other side of the house.

Mr. Speaker, I think there has been a little suggestion, outside those one or two references by hon. members opposite who criticize us because we are taking up some time, that this is in fact a filibuster. There has been some criticism on the part of radio commentators and editorial writers who suggest this debate is being carried on for purely political purposes and that we are speaking only for the benefit of the people back home. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that these intellectual halfwits who have no knowledge of sentiment or emotion themselves are hardly in a position to speak for those of us who do feel keenly and strongly about this matter.

If anyone desires a political reply to the charge of filibuster, Mr. Speaker, I call upon that distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Blair Fraser, who has never been recognized as a Conservative apologist but who has been accused of writing apologia for the Liberal party. He is a personal friend of mine, and I absolve him of that latter charge entirely. Mr. Fraser several days ago, commenting over C.B.C., said this was one of a number of false statements being put forward by certain people. He wanted to deny emphatically that it was the purpose of the Conservative spokesmen in the House of Commons, who were exercising their rights, to conduct a filibuster.

The second misconception, Mr. Speaker, is related to the suggestion that we are blocking or interfering with the nation's business. I must say that we are very concerned with the nation's business. I remind hon. members that the Prime Minister outlined the business which had to be done before the flag debate commenced and suggested that after the flag debate was concluded there was going to be a recess of parliament. The business to which the right hon. Prime Minister referred has been completed and we are now dealing with the flag debate. If we are interfering with anything, Mr. Speaker, apparently we are interfering with our own vacations. There may be those who think we do not deserve to have a vacation because we are now receiving the huge sum of $18,000 a year. In any event, no one could suggest we are blocking the nation's business, because we would be away from this place were it not for this particular debate.

I think all members of parliament, not only those on this side, have been subject to a very caustic and critical press because of the fact they are prepared to participate in and listen to this debate when, were it not for this debate, they would be out of here. Again, if one wants to call an unprejudiced witness, in that same radio broadcast to which I referred a few moments ago Mr. Blair Fraser said no one could accuse the Conservative opposition of interfering with or interrupting the business of the country because if we were not dealing with this issue we would be away on our vacation and the business of the country would not be under discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government has nothing ready.

Mr. Nowlan: The Leader of the Opposition says the government has nothing ready. We are at least giving them time in which to produce something. We hope that when we get through with this matter they will be able to produce something, and if they do we will deal with it.

I wish to make one further reference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We all appreciate the real and obviously sincere concern which he felt for the future of the Conservative party. It almost brought tears to our eyes to realize he was so concerned about our future and, as I said, we appreciate it. But I will tell him that having been here for quite a few years and having taken part in public life in this country for many years, I have a very high appreciation of the contribution the Liberal party has made to the history and development of this nation, and I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce shares these views and recognizes the countribution which the Conservative party has made to the history and development of this country.

With all due respect to hon. members farther down this side of the house and the contributions they have made from time to time for the good of the nation, I think everyone realizes that the two great old parties have been largely responsible for the development of Canada, and I hope and expect that this will continue to be so. But I want to assure the Minister of Trade and Commerce that his worry about our future is no greater than our worry about their future. What we are afraid of is that the Liberal party, as a result of their actions in this debate and the attitude they have taken, are going to become a sectional party rather than a national party and will largely cease to exist in certain parts of the country.

On Friday the Prime Minister made a statement which was very belated but very welcome. Apparently when the votes are taken on the amendments and the motion before the house the party whips will be relaxed and hon. members may vote as they see fit. This is certainly a rather belated conversion. As I have said, I do not want to deaden the sound of running water and I certainly do not want to raise any blood pressures at this time, but I think anybody will admit that the action of the government in bringing forward the flag resolution and the way it has been handled has been characterized, to put it gently and kindly, by a certain degree of stupidity and a high degree of stubbornness. No more kindly description could be applied to what has happened.

We were told that a flag had been produced by somebody for which the Prime Minister apparently took credit, although most of those on the other side do not know who produced it; and we were told that we could take it or leave it and if we did not take it there would be an election. If ever before there has been a political blunder in a highly emotional situation such as this, I have never seen it. I doubt that there ever has been such an action since confederation which affected people generally in their hearts, their souls and their minds to the extent this has, and which has been characterized with such stubbornness and such stupidity as the government has shown up to now. Therefore we welcome the statement of the Prime Minister that there will be no political pressure brought to bear on hon. members opposite when we come to vote, in that the whips will be off and the fate of the government will not be determined in any way, shape or form. In other words there is not going to be an election—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Three months late.

Mr. Nowlan: —because of the result of the vote. In that connection I draw attention to a former political leader in this house who was succeeded by an hon. gentleman to my left. I refer to Hon. M. J. Coldwell who was leader of the C.C.F. party in years gone by and who is one of the distinguished parliamentarians of this parliament and country. I wish to quote from a speech he made in the house on December 9, 1953. As found on page 748 of Hansard he said:

> No partisan recommendation should be made. When a recommendation is made to parliament—

He was referring to a flag.

> —the government should feel that it would be acceptable at least to the vast majority of members in all parts of the house. The matter of choosing a national emblem is too important to have connected with it any sort of political controversy either in the house or across the country.

Those words, uttered in 1953 by one of the distinguished parliamentarians of this country and of this century, are words which I would commend to all hon. members at this time. As I say, we welcome this conversion on the part of the Prime Minister, belated though it is. Some of us cannot quite forget the communist trials in the Stalin era when men were so brainwashed while they were confined that when they were released and brought into the open courtroom they confessed to sins of which they had never heard because they had been brainwashed to that extent. I hope that the brainwashing which has taken place on the other side of the house has not been of such severity and intensity that hon. members opposite cannot recover from it before we come to the vote.

I see that time is passing, Mr. Speaker, and as I did not mark the time I started I must watch myself. A partisan decision as to the flag was the first mistake that was made by the government. The second mistake which I suggest has been made by the government in dealing with this matter was when the proposed flag brought forward by the Prime Minister and the government was denuded of all historical significance, of everything which bespeaks our pride, our history and our traditions.

I have heard it said that the red ensign does not have a great deal of history behind it. There has been debate as to when it was used first. It has been said that it was flown over the parliament buildings up to 1904 and that it was then taken down. I have heard it suggested that it was not used during the first world war and that it came into use by virtue of some order in council long after the first world war was over.

I can speak with some little authority in this matter because I happen to be one who as a very junior soldier served in France for a very short time during the first world war. I well remember Sir Robert Borden, for instance, then prime minister of Canada, coming to Tincques in France on July 1, 1918, Dominion day, and Canadian ensigns were flying to welcome the prime minister. I am sure that others in the house including the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who served in the first world war, can vouch for the statement I am making today.

If one wants further corroboration one does not need to go to a Tory politician or spokesman. I would refer the house to General Andrew McNaughton, who could hardly be described as a Tory supporter. I have been talking to him lately. He was commander of the Canadian corps of artillery during the first world war and was a great soldier and a great leader in the field. He said that the Canadian red ensign flew over the corps headquarters at that time. He remembers it very well, and he was proud of the fact that it was there.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask a question on that point? Was it not the blue ensign? Was not General Currie's flag the blue ensign?

Mr. Nowlan: I am not sure what General Currie's flag may have been. General Currie was commander of the Canadian corps, which was almost equivalent to an army command, although it was only recognized as a corps. General Currie may have had his own flag and it may have been the blue ensign. However, so far as the Canadian corps troops were concerned, so far as the Canadians serving in France were concerned, it was the red ensign that was flying.

As I have said, I think the second mistake which was made in connection with this proposed flag was the denuding from it of all references to our tradition, our pride and our history. You are taking a flag which is rich in history, which is colourful, and discarding it. I remember the first day I came into the courtyard of this House of Commons. Perhaps to some extent I was emotionally aroused because I was taking a seat in the House of Commons. However, I have never forgotten the picture of that red ensign flying over the peace tower. I never can forget it. I can say, and I am sure most hon. members will agree with me, that in colour, in richness and in the general picture that this flag presents, it is second to none which is flying anywhere in the world today.

Now, if the resolution is adopted we are starting literally—and I do not mean to make a pun—and figuratively with a clean sheet. We are going to do away with our history and our tradition. In that connection I should like to refer the right hon. Prime Minister and other Liberals to the statement of a great liberal—not Liberal in the political sense—President Woodrow Wilson. We all recognize him as one of the great liberals of the North American continent. He said this in an address on June 14, 1915:

> The things that the flag stands for were created by the experiences of a great people. Everything that it stands for was written by their lives. The flag is the embodiment, not of sentiment, but of history. It represents the experiences made by men and women, the experiences of those who do and live under that flag.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that is as fair a definition of a flag as one can get, and I commend it to hon. gentlemen opposite. The corollary to that mistake is the belief that the Canadian people would accept this denuding of our flag, this stripping of our heritage and tradition. There has never been a greater example, I will not say of political stupidity but of political ignorance, than has been shown in connection with this matter; to think that the Canadian people would stand idly by and see the flag which millions revere being cast aside so that we start off again with a clean sheet. If any government thought that would be accepted by the Canadian people, it is absolutely beyond my comprehension.

The reason for it, of course, or so we are told, is that this will achieve national unity. Feeling strongly as I do on this matter, and I know I am speaking for many others who feel the same way, I may say that if by throwing our flag into discard, by coming up with a new emblem of some kind or other, we could achieve national unity; if we were convinced of that, I think we would pay that price to achieve national unity. The trouble is you hear statements made by hon. members around this building. I am not referring to any one group or province or anything else, but we hear that this will not achieve national unity. The flag is only the beginning. Our problems are much deeper, and unless other solutions, financial, constitutional and otherwise are found, national unity will not be achieved. Finally you are told that this flag is simply a problem for English Canadians. Now, when you are facing that situation it is rather difficult to be convinced that if you are prepared to drop the red ensign, if you are prepared to start with a new sheet, you are going to achieve national unity.

We are asked to give up everything, many of us are, which we hold dear; everything of our pride, our history and our traditions. We are told afterward that this does not achieve anything in the end. Are we to scrap the flag we have, the flag which is flying over this building today, that warm, colourful, beautiful symbol of our history and our heritage? What are we to accept in exchange? We are prepared to make an exchange if we were sure it would be the means of accomplishing national unity, but we are not prepared to do it on the information we have at the moment.

We are asked to swap, and for what? We have a suggestion brought forward by the Prime Minister—I am not saying he developed it, but it is reported that he did—concerning the three maple leaf design. I had someone check with the office of the Secretary of State, and I found that there were 24 different copyrights on the three maple leaf design. They cover everything from beer to boloney and many other products in between. There are those who suggest one maple leaf as the design. I do not want to cause any discomfiture in that particular quarter, but I found that there were 327 copyrights issued covering one maple leaf. These are the matters which we are supposed to debate. We are asked to strip the hallmarks of our history and accept a copyright design for beer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are told that all this will achieve national unity, but I doubt it. There are extremists in all places; there are extremists both English and French. There are extremists in various provinces. We all have to recognize that fact. I recognize it, and I make apologies for some of the English speaking extremists just as I am sure some of my hon. friends from Quebec make apologies for some of the extremists in their own province. A country which has no pride in history has very little hope for posterity. I am sure the French Canadians have pride in their ancestry, just as we have in ours. I am wondering what the habitants who came to the defence of this country and fought under the union jack to defeat Montgomery and save this country from becoming a colony of the United States would think today. I would think they would turn over in their graves if they heard some of the statements which are allegedly being made by their descendants in this country.

It is not only limited to Quebec. I am speaking now from a prejudiced, personal position. I come from the ancient province of Nova Scotia. I come from that most ancient of constituencies, Digby-Annapolis-Kings, which includes Port Royal, the ancient capital of this country. This is the place to which Champlain came. He settled in that rich valley and developed enough courage and strength during two or three years to go on and establish French settlements at Stadacona and Hochelaga. We have a Port Royal, which name was changed only a few years ago by commission from the postmaster general in order to re-establish that old name. In that little community you have the Order of Good Cheer, which has been going on for over 300 years and which was established by Champlain. It is meeting regularly now and has been for more than three centuries. Surely this is part of our heritage, part of our tradition. One can say it has not got much to do with the flag, that you don't get a kettle on a flag; but if you scrap your traditions, if you start scrapping one then scrap all the others.

I simply point out that we have a French Canadian heritage not only in the province of Quebec, of which all Canada is proud, but we have it in my own constituency, in my own town, Port Royal. We are very proud of it, and we want to see it maintained.

My own position—and the Prime Minister said we should make our own positions clear—is very simple. In the two or three minutes left to me I want to say that in the first place I believe in supporting the red ensign. I believe it is a beautiful flag, a flag of history which contains our heritage and our traditions. I will support it as long as that is feasible in this discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: Some modifications may be developed. I can think of modifications which can be developed following suggestions which may be coming forward with respect to one maple leaf. Somebody said to me today, "I thought you and your party were in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. Why have you been telling the people you are in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag if you don't intend to support the maple leaves flag?" For years my party has stated it has been in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag, but I never dreamt that by adopting a distinctive Canadian flag we would denude it of everything of our history, traditions and heritage. I thought it would be possible with the red ensign to superimpose a maple leaf, or any other emblem, but I never thought the proposal meant the elimination of everything pertaining to our pride, history and traditions. That is what I meant, and that is what I believe my party meant when we said we were in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag.

Providing these ancient hallmarks are preserved we are prepared to accept any modification, maintaining the red ensign substantially; but I am not married to that. If that is impossible, if we cannot do that by agreement in this house, I support the proposal for a plebiscite because I believe, sir, in this matter—

[Editor's Note: And an object having been thrown from the gallery:]

Mr. Nowlan: It's all right. I don't think it's his heart's blood; I think it's his brains.

Mr. Bigg: It will be a live bomb next.

Mr. Nowlan: As I said, Mr. Speaker, if necessary I am prepared to accept a plebiscite on this matter. I do not think it is necessary, but certainly it is better to have that, to have all the Canadian people consulted, than to have any decision forced upon us by any government majority. Or as an alternative, as the Prime Minister hinted on Friday and as the Leader of the Opposition has also mentioned, the question of a committee of the house, should be given very careful consideration if that is the only avenue possible.

I read in the paper, or heard something this morning, to the effect that "this man Diefenbaker" would not agree to a committee and that he wanted interminable debate thereon. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that for any committee which may be set up there would have to be ground rules established first, and as I understand our rules, ordinarily a majority report is printed and there is no minority report. I do not think anyone in this parliament would expect a committee to be set up which would simply bring in a bare majority report, but I think in this case there would have to be a very substantial majority in favour of the committee's report, and it should not require a unanimous report because we do not want a situation where one or perhaps two people veto the decision of a committee of this house. But if you had a committee set up with ground rules established, whereby there would have to be substantial unanimity in the committee's report, then I do not think there would be any need to debate it at length afterward in the house. In that way we would either get a substantially unanimous report accepted with very little discussion or we would not get a report at all, and in that event we would still be faced with the situation which exists now.

I apologize to the house, Mr. Speaker, for having taken up its time, but I have stated my own feelings on this matter and I am confident that men and women of good will, as the great majority of men and women in this house are, can work out this matter sitting down together and discussing it. I am confident we can arrive at a solution to this problem, which is probably the greatest emotional problem we have been confronted with, certainly since conscription and possibly since the beginning of confederation. This country in its first century has shown evidence of the development it can achieve, and I am certain its second century is going to show greater progress.

I am confident that by reason, by good will, co-operation and discussion we will be able to work out a solution to these problems which confront us, and that we can look forward to the second century of our confederation's history with even greater pride than that with which we look back on our first century.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, on rising at this time to speak on the subamendment—and I understand we are being held very closely to the terms of the subamendment—I would point out that I desire to comment in particular on the first paragraph of the subamendment—"Are you in favour of the red ensign"?

I want, in introducing my remarks, to state definitely that not only am I a Liberal, but I am a Liberal of the Liberals. I would say to you, sir, there has not been a national convention of the Liberal party in Canada nor an Ontario provincial Liberal convention, outside of the Hepburn years, at which I was not an authorized delegate and entitled to vote, since 1923.

A national flag is the visible evidence of a country's soul and the symbol of its pride, and without it a nation is a dead thing. We have a national flag. We have a distinctive national flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: I am very happy to live under it, and I will do everything within my power to maintain it as the distinctive national flag of this nation. In 1919, as a boy of 17, I spent my summer vacation in the city of Ottawa and was here when the national Liberal convention was held at which Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King was selected as leader of the Liberal party. I acted as a scrutineer, at the age of 19, in the federal election of 1921, scrutineering for Eddie Lapierre who was the Liberal candidate in Nipissing when we won that riding from Charlie Harrison, who had been a Union government man and in 1921 ran as a straight Conservative. For 45 years I have taken part in provincial and federal elections as an active Liberal and have voted in many parts of Ontario as I moved from paper to paper during the course of my university years, before settling permanently in Toronto on Canada's major daily and outstanding weekly.

In the Canada Gazette in 1924 we find a certified copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on January 26 of that year. It reads:

> The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 23rd January, 1924, from Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, prime minister and secretary of state for external affairs, submitting that he has recently had his attention drawn to the practice which prevails of flying the blue ensign with the Canadian arms in the fly over the office of the high commissioner for Canada in London.
> The reason offered for this variation from the union jack, which is flown over all Canadian government buildings in Canada, is to be found in the need very generally felt by Canadians in London for a distinctive emblem which will afford a ready means of distinguishing the character of the buildings over which it floats, and the portion of the empire to which they belong.
> The Prime Minister considers that this purpose would be served by the employment in this connection of the red ensign with the Canadian arms in the fly, which though originally authorized by the Admiralty to be flown over vessels of the Canadian mercantile marine, has come to serve a wider application, having been displayed in times past from the government buildings in Ottawa, and quite generally throughout the country, where it is still often spoken of as the 'Canadian flag', meaning thereby, the distinctive emblem of Canada.

In this minute the word "distinctive" is used twice and the word "distinguishing" once. I quote further from the minute:

> The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends without contemplating any variation from the present practice regulating the flying of flags from the government buildings within the Dominion of Canada, and assuming that no local regulation would be violated thereby, that the requisite authority be given for displaying the red ensign with the Canadian arms in the fly, on suitable occasions from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government, and situated without Canada.

I point out that when the Canadian red ensign was designated as Canada's distinctive flag, every seat in the province of Quebec was held by a Liberal member, and W. L. Mackenzie King, with that backing behind him, and knowing the red ensign was acceptable as our national flag, took the action which resulted in this minute of a meeting of the privy council. It still holds.

However, in 1945, at a time when there was some uproar developing with regard to a national flag, there was a further order in council concerning the use of the Canadian red ensign. It is P.C. 5888, dated September 5, 1945. It reads as follows:

Whereas the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, reports that by order in council P.C. 134 of January 26, 1924, authority is given for displaying the red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly (commonly known as "the Canadian red ensign") on suitable occasions from all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated without Canada;

That the Canadian red ensign was employed by Canadian forces during the present war; and

That, until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag, it is desirable to authorize the flying of the Canadian red ensign on federal government buildings within as well as without Canada, and to remove any doubt as to the propriety of flying the Canadian red ensign wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag—

The order in council continues:

His Excellency in council, on the same recommendation is further pleased to declare and doth declare that it shall be appropriate to fly the Canadian red ensign within and without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mr. Speaker, the word "distinctive" appears four times in these orders in council, and the word "distinguishing" appears once.

As an active Liberal I attended the 1958 leadership convention of the Liberal party and I voted wholeheartedly for the leader we selected; I would vote for him again if another leadership convention were to be held tomorrow. But I want to give the house some facts and figures with regard to the claim that this party is committed to the realization of a new flag for Canada within two years of election.

As I say, I attended the 1958 convention, and I attended the national Liberal council meeting in 1960. Normally at those meetings I am placed as a member of the committee on health and welfare or the committee on labour, sometimes on both. I am interested in these three fields of human endeavour and I always will be.

At these conventions they hold a plenary session, as they call it. That is a fine, big sounding word. A plenary session is held just before a rally breaks up. Some pleasant things are said, good wishes are exchanged and the delegates go home. Usually half of them have already gone home before the plenary session opens.

Well, at this particular plenary session I listened intently while the recommendations of the committees in which I was most interested were brought forward as suggestions from the resolutions committee. I happened to be sitting to the right of a Liberal member of the Senate. The chairman of the resolutions committee said the party was committed to a distinctive national flag. This was the first I had heard of such a proposal and, let me point out once more, I was an authorized delegate to the convention.

I turned to the senator who was next to me and said "What is this all about? A distinctive national flag? I must get up and ask about that." He put his hand on my shoulder and said "Hold your horses. There is an element in the party that wants a distinctive flag, a flag different from the one we have now. But in the orders in council the word 'distinctive' appears and reappears. We have a distinctive flag now." "Well," I said, "If that's the way it is, I will keep quiet." I did not know there was any motion going in with regard to a distinctive flag. It was voted on, together with the other recommendations, about 20 minutes before the rump convention ended.

Later I looked at the orders in council, having never looked at them before, and found, as I have reported to this house, four references to the word "distinctive" and one to the word "distinguishing".

I am speaking today because I do not believe the great bulk of the Liberals across this nation of ours are committed to the doctrine of a new flag for Canada different from the red ensign. I have in my hand a press clipping from the Toronto Star of May 19, 1964, in which William MacEachern, one of our ablest writers and a senior man in the news room of the Star, reports on the introduction of the flag question into this parliament. The first paragraph reads:

Prime Minister Pearson today invited the opposition to throw his minority government out of office in a no-confidence vote Monday if it doesn't like the government's flag policy.

If a vote of no-confidence wins support of the majority in the house, the government must resign and a new election must be held.

Canadian Flag

Further on in the article, Mr. MacEachern quotes the Prime Minister as saying:

"Some people are forgetting that we have a very formal commitment as a party which is binding on the government to bring about a decision within two years of the election. We are getting toward that month. We only have now 10 months. From now on we will have to be a little more specific."

I have outlined to the house what happened when I attended this Liberal convention as a properly designated delegate, as I have attended so many Liberal party rallies and gatherings of one kind or another. I had never heard before of this proposed new flag, although I was told a certain element of the party was asking for one. This was when the senator explained to me that the word "distinctive" covered the situation because it appeared in the orders in council. Then we were suddenly presented with a flag design in the month of May, 1964.

Now, as a good Liberal—and I believe I am a good Liberal—I will not disclose what goes on in the Liberal caucus. It is one of the unwritten laws that one does not disclose what goes on in caucus once the doors are closed. But I can tell the house this. I am not prevented from disclosing what does not go in a Liberal caucus, and I would point out that we never saw any details of this flag until Votes and Proceedings of May 26 were issued on May 27. The opposition saw this design as soon as we did. If this denotes that the Liberal party caucus has given its approval to the design in question, I would like to know when it did so. I attended all the caucus meetings and the design was not shown and, as I say, we did not see it until Votes and Proceedings appeared on May 27.

I wish to draw attention at this point to a piece of campaign literature put out by the Liberal party. The heading is "Time for Action—Vote Liberal". This was circulated in my riding in March, 1963. The country voted in April, 1963. There are ten pages to this small leaflet, and every word in the report was written by the national Liberal federation or the Ontario Liberal federation, the address of which is 100 Adelaide street west, Toronto, Ontario. I paid for the printing of upwards of 25,000 copies by Spalding Printing Company, 16 Queen Elizabeth boulevard, Toronto. There is not a single reference in those ten pages to a flag. That piece of publicity was given to me and, as I say, circulated in my riding of York-Humber.

I hold here in my hands two pieces of Liberal publicity, one addressed to my second daughter, Miss Catharine Cowan, 55 Humberview road, Toronto, Ontario, who is now a graduate of Trinity College and who in June completed one year at the Sorbonne in Paris and has a certificate for French and historical studies from that body. The other is addressed to me at the same address. There are five pages of Liberal publicity in this literature which was mailed out to I do not know how many people, and never a mention is made of the flag question in any way, shape or form.

I have another piece of Liberal publicity in my hand entitled "The story of Liberalism in Canada". I do not see any date, but it must have been printed since 1958 because it carries two pictures of our present leader. In this piece of Liberal publicity I am proud to read this statement:

The achievements of Mackenzie King and his colleagues were best recorded by the man who succeeded him as prime minister, Louis St. Laurent, who said in 1948:

"In recent years Canada has achieved even more than national unity within her borders. We had the unity required to make a vital contribution to victory in war. We have worked hard for the restoration of peace in the world. We have maintained in our own country a level of employment and prosperity never before known. Most observers, I think, would say that ours is the happiest country in the world".

They are the words of Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent in 1948. He said that "in recent years Canada had achieved even more than national unity within her borders." If we have not unity now, whose fault is it? The Liberal party was in power from 1948 till 1957 and we are now back in power again. I just wanted to bring this piece of Liberal publicity to the attention of the house.

During the course of the recent election campaign a gentleman came to me and pointed out that a booklet had been issued entitled "The policies of the Liberal party; general election, 1963". At the bottom of page 5 of this booklet I find this statement:

Within two years of taking office, a new Liberal government will submit to parliament a design for a flag which cannot be mistaken for the emblem of any other country.

I read this statement in this printed booklet and I asked my friend, a Liberal, "How many copies of this booklet were printed?" About ten copies came to my Liberal committee rooms in Toronto and I never knew one speaker to refer to it. Printed on it is "National Liberal federation, 251 Cooper street, Ottawa," and it is printed by Gauvin Press, of Hull. It contains the policies of the Liberal party. Long before the bottom of page 5 is reached we see these statements:

> It means adequate pensions. It means better health care, available to all when needed...It means...improving democracy in our political institutions.

It continues:

> The first aim of Liberal policies is a Canadian identity that creates unity without uniformity...
> The second aim of Liberal policies is to increase our national wealth...
> But security, happiness, achievement are not possible for us alone. The fourth aim of Liberal policies is that a growing, progressing, Canada will have a constructive influence for peace and progress throughout the world.

As I say, this statement about the flag appeared on page 5, almost as an afterthought. I have given hon. members the history of it, and I am glad to draw the attention of this house to this point.

Since this flag debate commenced I have spent three different Saturdays in Toronto doing research. I spent one entire morning in the offices of the Toronto Globe and Mail, another in the offices of the Toronto Evening Telegram and the third in the offices of the Toronto Daily Star. I enlisted the services of a very dear friend of mine who served in the first world war and has been suffering from the effects of trench warfare for more than 40 years now. He is a gold medallist in the field of advertising, a man respected in all fields of publicity in Canada. I asked him to note for me all the advertisements which had appeared on behalf of the national Liberal federation in the city of Toronto during the election campaign in 1963, and I have a complete list. With this list in my possession I went to these three newspaper offices and read every one of those Liberal party advertisements which appeared in the three Toronto papers. I have to report to this house that not once was mention made of any change in the flag of this nation.

Mr. Bigg: Same old gang.

Mr. Cowan: On April 8, 1963, we had the election. On the Friday previous, April 5, we had a tremendous meeting of Liberal supporters in the Maple Leaf gardens. I contributed a great deal of money to that meeting and helped make it the success it was. We are supposed to have had 22,000 people present at the Maple Leaf gardens, with an overflow in Massey hall. The Toronto Globe and Mail for April 6 said of this meeting on April 5, "Crowd fills gardens and Massey hall. Giant Pearson meeting and the crowd that flocked to the biggest political rally in Canadian history...There was a military band to set the buoyant mood of the evening". But no mention of a flag is made anywhere in that report of the meeting. I sat on the platform and heard every word uttered in Maple Leaf gardens, but not once was there any mention made of a change in our flag.

In the Globe and Mail for April 1, 1963, there appeared what are known as teaser ads, but no mention was made of the flag. On April 6 there was a full page ad in the Globe and Mail with all our pictures. It said "Here's where decisive government begins. It's time for action. Vote Liberal". But no mention of the flag.

In the Toronto Star there is no mention made of a flag in the report of the Liberal rally held in the Maple Leaf gardens nor in the advertising connected therewith. An ad which appeared on April 6 says "Canada needs a majority government."

In the Telegram for March 30 our leader is quoted. The report says: he added that the government should spend not a nickel on anything that would not increase production and reduce unemployment. The Telegram on April 4 carried a Liberal party advertisement which said "Unless we can elect a government that can restore stability and create the climate for economic expansion, few of the other issues raised in the campaign will be capable of solution. It is first necessary that we elect a stable government with a working majority".

Well, Mr. Speaker, we did not achieve that first necessity, a stable government with a working majority; but the advertisement said that was the first necessity.

The report in the Telegram for April 6 in connection with this giant meeting held in Maple Leaf gardens and Massey hall quotes the Prime Minister as saying that it was "the largest and most significant meeting ever held in Canada". Why was no mention made of the flag at the largest and most significant meeting ever held in Canada? The report goes on: "Mr. Pearson said Canada's problems today are too serious to be entrusted to any coalition. He pledged unselfish and effective leadership, not one-man government which breaks apart under strain".

This is the type of report contained in the three Toronto papers to which I have referred, and I can tell this house that no mention was ever made of the flag question. We were told always to vote for a stable government, because there is no alternative to a stable government. We have not got a stable government now, and if there is no alternative what have we got? That is the question I put to this house at this time.

I would point out there are many references today that "Only by adopting a new and distinctive flag are we going to restore unity to this country. Only by putting up another piece of bunting will we restore unity to this country."

I should like to quote from the front page of the Toronto Globe and Mail of August 6, as follows:

> The time has come to reach a decision on the official Canadian flag in the interests of national unity and to give Canadians a much-needed sense of pride and confidence in their country—

That is what Mr. Pearson said.

I should like to point out that I for one have a sense of pride and confidence in this country, as I believe millions and millions of other Canadians have pride and confidence. I have not seen anyone running around with head down, despondent over the fact that we now have the red ensign as the national flag, as it was okayed by the Mackenzie King government in 1924 and again in 1945.

I should like to impress upon you the claim that the Liberal party is supposed to have a mandate in respect of the flag question. We are told that the government of the day has a mandate. I went to the office of the chief electoral officer and spent some time there on two occasions, as well as some time in my office here in the House of Commons doing some research in respect of this so-called mandate. I should like to point out that I am now speaking as though Sherwood Rideout, the late member for Westmorland, were here. The 129 Liberal members in this house do not even have a majority vote in the 129 ridings they represent. If we total up the votes cast against the sitting Liberal members we find they exceed the number cast for the sitting Liberal members. We are told we have a mandate, but I do not see how we can have a mandate on the basis of a minority vote. In looking up the definition of "mandate", it is interesting to find that it means "a clear instruction, authorization or direction." That definition is taken from Webster's third new international dictionary in the parliamentary library. One could also refer to Murray's Encyclopaedic Dictionary, which gives the same definition, and to the 1902 Contemporary Review, December, page 809, which states:

> No practical politician can desire to lay too much stress upon the mandate theory of a general election.

[Mr. Cowan.]

When there are a thousand questions of the day how does one claim to have a mandate on any particular one, particularly when the point at issue has not been mentioned during the course of the campaign?

I should like to refer to an address given yesterday afternoon on the C.B.C. radio hook-up. The program is known to many people in Canada as "Capital Report". Yesterday afternoon Mr. Donald McGillivray of the Southam newspaper service spoke from approximately 2.20 until approximately 2.30. He was speaking on the flag issue. I hope most members heard his address, although I do not suppose many did in view of the fact that members are only able to take vacations on week ends. During the course of Mr. McGillivray's remarks he said:

> Mr. Diefenbaker hasn't got the full support of all members of his party on his flag stand. The Quebec members have been the most unhappy since most of them have little chance of winning on a red ensign platform.

He then went on to say:

> The Conservatives...in their speeches in the Commons have pounded away at two things... And the second is that people believe that the replacement of the red ensign by a new flag is some kind of concession or appeasement to Quebec—
> The second is harder to answer because the new flag is, in fact, related to the needs of Quebec. There would be no urgency about changing the flag now if it wasn't for what is happening in Quebec. The Conservatives disagree with him but Mr. Pearson obviously feels deeply that the union jack on the flag is such a standing affront to Quebec that it must be quickly removed if the country is to be kept together.
> But this attempt to meet the grievance of one minority group—

I refer to Mr. McGillivray's report because it would be heard from one end of Canada to the other on the C.B.C. network.

I was not in the house on Friday last. I went to Toronto on Friday morning to be present at the opening of the Canadian national exhibition which, I may say, does not enjoy a $47 million subsidy from the federal government but operates on its own. There appeared a report in Saturday's Globe and Mail in respect of statements made in the House of Commons on Friday regarding a free vote.

I should like to make some reference to this free vote question. How can we have a free vote in this house when the resolution stands in the names of the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of Justice? I suggest there could be no free vote under those circumstances. There are individuals in this parliament who hope to be appointed as senators, judges and perhaps to diplomatic positions. I am not one of those individuals. I am not a lawyer and could not be a judge; I am not a diplomat, so could not be part of the foreign service. I suggest there is no record in Canadian history of a free vote question being introduced in the House of Commons by a prime minister of any day. There have been many free votes, but I suggest it is impossible to have a free vote when the resolution stands in the names of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. I maintain that in order to have a free vote the resolution should be introduced in the name of someone other than those gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker, if you intend to restrain me I should like to point out that I am dealing with the main resolution.

Mr. Speaker: Without attempting to be too facetious I should like to point out that before we can vote on anything we have to clear up the subamendment. I hope you are going to propose something we can vote on.

Mr. Cowan: I suggest that we vote in favour of the red ensign when dealing with the first clause of the subamendment which reads:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the words:
> "and that in such a plebiscite among the questions to be placed before the people should be the following:
> 1. Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?

I ask the voters of Canada to vote yes in answer to that question when the plebiscite is placed before them.

Mr. Speaker, I have so many notes here I will be able to speak for 40 minutes on each and every amendment and subamendment that is proposed. I should like to quote from the front page of the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, March 13, 1963. The article to which I have reference gave me great encouragement during the last campaign, and gives me a good deal of encouragement now. In the lower right hand corner there is a two-column heading "Pearson doesn't reject red ensign as our flag". I should like to read this report, by Southam news services, under that heading:

> Pearson doesn't reject red ensign as our flag.
> Sherbrooke—Liberal leader Pearson said today he had "never rejected the red ensign as Canada's flag and do not do so now."
> Commenting on reports out of Winnipeg last week that he wanted to see something other than the red ensign as Canada's national flag Mr. Pearson said that he merely wanted a distinctive Canadian flag.
> This was Liberal party policy and in mentioning it to a group of ethnic editors in Winnipeg he said that "there are people in Canada who think the red ensign can be mistaken for another emblem", such as the naval ensign or the Australian flag.
> To reject the red ensign would mean the rejection of a British symbol, the union jack, which means much to so many people who have served and fought under it, and this he did not advocate. But he did want a search to be made immediately for a unique Canadian flag.

That quotation is from the Ottawa Citizen of March 13, 1963, within four weeks of the election in 1963 when this minority government was placed in office. I should also like to refer to a dispatch which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on May 16, 1962, written by Thomas Sloan who was reviewing meetings that took place at Chicoutimi. We have this report of a Chicoutimi meeting:

> The fact, however, that the flag is still an issue and not merely a means of getting applause was forcibly brought home to Mr. Pearson at his final meeting of the Quebec trip Monday night. There the Liberal member in the last House of Commons for the riding of Lapointe, Augustin Brassard, publicly pledged that if a Liberal government did not adopt a national flag in two years, "I invite you to ask me to return to private life."

Of course the next month Mr. Brassard was invited to return to private life.

> He received hearty applause for that statement, as he did for another, which was perhaps a little more embarrassing for the Liberal party: "All across this country, Mr. Pearson has promised a distinctive national flag, without a union jack." The Liberal chief backed quickly away from that issue, contenting himself with saying in his address that he favoured "a distinctive flag for Canada which could not be confused with that of any other country." Further than that Mr. Pearson would not go, and he refused to make any comment at all on Mr. Brassard's statement after the meeting.

In referring to these statements with regard to the red ensign, I have shown you that it was not discussed at all in vast sections of the country. I make the statement to the house that this country has not given a mandate to anybody to alter the red ensign, our beloved symbol of loyalty and faith in the future. The Globe and Mail of last Saturday reports the hon. member for Villeneuve in this way:

> Mr. Caouette regretted that statements had been made mostly by representatives of the Canadian west, that the proposed flag was nothing more than an attempt to please Quebec.

Of course the hon. member for Villeneuve does not know much about Ontario. He has not got a member from that area. No doubt he paid attention to the loyal speakers from the Canadian west, but I can assure him that on this score the feeling is just as strong in the province of Ontario as it is in the Canadian west. He is reported as having also said:

> We want Canadian symbols on our national emblem—not the symbols of France or the symbols of England.

What a sacrifice he would be making. The union jack is there, if he wishes to call it a symbol of England. Any symbol of France is not as prominent as the English symbol, as he prefers to call it, but he is willing to make the great sacrifice of ditching two things in order to get rid of one.

I would point out that when we are asked to vote on two flags we have this statement to bear in mind which was made by the Prime Minister on May 26, 1964 appearing in Hansard at page 3581, to a question by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon):

> Mr. Speaker, there can be only one national flag—

We who like the red ensign and who are willing to scrap for the red ensign agree that there can be only one national flag. A second flag simply muddies the water. My time is running short, but I hope to be able to speak again on this matter when the subamendment has been disposed of. On May 19 the Globe and Mail made this comment with regard to the action of the Prime Minister:

> He has chosen to press the divisive issue of a national flag at a time when emotions are already deeply stirred by the question of national unity—or rather, by the lack of unity. . . .It will be a long job, and in the course of it, Mr. Pearson may well find himself persuaded by the people that he made the wrong choice at the wrong time.

I am a convinced Liberal, a man who has always worked for the Liberal party except that I would not vote for Hepburn Liberalism in the provincial field. That is one time I voted Conservative; I voted for Dr. Minerva Reid. She was a prohibitionist Conservative, and they are very few and far between. I voted for Dr. Minerva Reid in Toronto High Park and I make no apologies for having supported her, even though she did not win the election. I say to the house as a convinced Liberal that the red ensign is Canada's national flag, that it should remain as Canada's national flag, and that if any changes are made in it it will lead to a division such as this country has never seen.

The Liberal government won a Pyrrhic victory in 1956 in the pipe line debate. We have not secured an over-all majority in the country since in four successive general elections. The problem is, who won what victory in 1956? Are we going to be like the Bourbons who "never remember and never forget?" Are we going to try to force this divisive issue at this time and have to watch four general elections or more go by without an over-all majority for the Liberal party?

I would ask all members of the house to support the red ensign, which is Canada's national emblem and is known as such from coast to coast. We have not got here in this country a roofless ruin. We are a nation that was built with the support of Great Britain and the support of France.

Some speakers talk about now being the time to cut the umbilical cord that they say is tying us to Great Britain, but even if they cut the umbilical cord they will still want British investment. Canada is the biggest field for British investment. All they want to do is change the family name. I am proud of the family and nation into which I was born. I want to see the jack continue on the red ensign and I believe that to do otherwise will create a division in this country that generations yet unborn will be unable to heal.

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, for several weeks now the house has been debating the flag issue, a debate which should have taken place more than 100 years ago when the Fathers of Confederation gathered to prepare, study and draw the confederation act, as they were anxious to build a great country which would become Canada, an international power. Indeed, by the active part played by its people in the making of a world still faced with the problems of peace, but a world which will finally find the peace promised to men of good will by the Infant in the manger.

In the darkest times in its history, Canada found amidst its people the strength, energy, courage, and generous men who did everything in order to save the Canadian democracy.

Since the beginning of the twentieth century, two terrible conflicts threatened with complete destruction the whole world as well as democracy, pre-eminent source of freedom; political, religious, social and individual freedom, freedom of the press, of speech, of action.

In those stormy periods, many Canadians, both French and English speaking, took refuge under the same flag, the flag of freedom, and there are many who sleep in a soil they loved to the point of martyrdom, smiling in their supreme sacrifice and repeating these words: "We die, but freedom and democracy do not".

I want to pay tribute to all those who gave their lives for the triumph of freedom and democracy. I salute with respect those many veterans; we have the honour of having in this house a few of them who bear the scars of their courage and heroism.

Those veterans looked up to the red ensign to find the courage necessary to face the enemy. In the thick of the battle, when enemy bullets were whizzing on all sides and their comrades in arms were falling like ripe fruits, those valiant soldiers looked up to that flag which inspired them to charge the enemy with even greater courage and determination. They fought blindly for us, our children, our political institutions, our freedom and the survival of democracy.

Who could blame those veterans for being attached to the red ensign which for them is the very symbol of their present existence? Veterans, I respect you, I admire your courage and I understand you. You have the right to protest because some people would take away from you the red ensign you have coloured with your own blood and which, unfortunately, was too often used to bury a comrade in arms who had gallantly died on the battlefield.

My English speaking compatriots rightly love this flag which reminds them of their mother country. For them, the red ensign symbolizes the history of England, the triumph of the strong over the weak; it represents British institutions and the extension into the North American continent of the English civilization and the British culture which largely contributed to the greatness and prosperity of Canada.

For a great many new Canadians the red ensign means freedom; it is the flag under which they were welcomed in Canada, land of hospitality. They are rightly attached to the flag which meant the promised land of hope and, in some cases, deliverance.

That English flag, the French Canadians cherished it, too. Who, if not the French Canadians, made it possible for England to keep Canada in 1813, at the time of the American aggression? My compatriots cherished this red ensign at the battles of Verdun and Vimy, and just a few weeks ago we were proud to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the landing in France, and the road to victory was paved by a French-Canadian unit, the Chaudière regiment.

As a citizen from the province of Quebec I could remain indifferent to this matter of a national flag inasmuch as, since 1948, Quebec has had its own flag which the then premier of the province, Hon. Maurice Duplessis, took from the Crémazie monument, in the Canadian metropolis, where it stood motionless. He gave it a new historical meaning and raised it on the Quebec parliament building in February 1948. The fleur-de-lis banner, which the French had abandoned in the mud of the plains of Abraham battlefields, after having been defeated by Wolfe and his men, and which was hiding in its folds the shame of defeat, that banner flies proudly today in the province of Quebec, where everybody salutes it with respect, pride and dignity.

My French ancestors became attached to the fleur-de-lis flag which, for them, was the symbol of freedom as well as the expression of French culture and civilization, and when they abandoned that flag on the smoky battlefield of the plains of Abraham, the French were defeated but not vanquished.

The Roman Catholic clergy instilled into my French speaking compatriots respect for the strongest, love for the new Canadian country and courage in defeat. The French Canadians gathered around the parish church, and faithful to their mother tongue, their culture and their faith, they worked to rebuild the Canadian nation. The French and English cultures found today in Canada are the basis of the moral wealth which our country offers to the rest of the world.

For almost a century, English and French Canadians have lived together under the confederation pact, and they sometimes worked hard to build up this country; like our forefathers, we have laboured to attain national unity. This national unity is deeply rooted in the confederation pact itself, and when every Canadian citizen lives up to the letter and the spirit of the confederation pact, then Canada will know the true national unity which, as far back as 1864, was the proud and sincere hope of Macdonald and Cartier, as well as of all the fathers of the Canadian confederation.

This national unity is going through a real crisis today, because of the flag debate, which may have disastrous results, by arousing nine provinces against the province of Quebec. I protest against the allegations of my English speaking fellow members when they say that this idea of a distinctive flag is one more concession to the province of Quebec. French Canadians never wanted any special privilege. They merely claimed, as they still do today—though somewhat more noisily—recognition of their rights, and they do not want to be considered all the time the cause of everything that happens in this country.

Why try to create the impression in this house and throughout the country that the government, by introducing the flag resolution, only wanted to satisfy French Canadians.

Personally, I have never been as Canadian as I am today, but if this discussion on the flag goes on in the same vein, I shall understand even better why so many of my French speaking compatriots are Quebeckers rather than Canadians.

If I were convinced that the government, in introducing its proposal, wanted to curry favour with French Canadians, I would vote against the choice of a distinctive flag because I consider that national unity must be founded on understanding, co-operation, harmony, good will and justice.

In order to favour national unity, the government has no right to grant one or several privileges to a particular ethnic group, even if this group is French Canadian. The government has a duty to treat all citizens on an equal footing, by allowing each and every one to use its rights in order to make possible the complete development of the Canadian personality.

I protest against those who claim that the fleur-de-lis reminds French Canadians of the most sad and shameful pages in their history. I will be careful here not to accuse my English speaking compatriots who would perhaps be ashamed also if they looked back on the behaviour of their ancestors. I am not ashamed of my history, I respect it; I also respect the historic past of my English speaking compatriots, I am as proud to be a French Canadian as those who claim with equal emphasis that they are English Canadians. I do not disown the historic past of my ancestors and of all the builders of this country when I contemplate the advisability of giving Canada a distinctive flag. The past must be the source and the inspiration of the present courage to determine the well-being and the future life of Canadians.

The "Pearson flag" proposal may be questioned by many, but personally I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for having the courage to put this question before the house. However, I blame the right hon. Prime Minister for trying to make a political football out of this important matter of a distinctive flag.

Why did the Prime Minister introduce his resolution concerning the choice of a distinctive flag with so much clumsiness? Did the restricted group of newspapermen invited by the head of government and who were the first informed of the choice of the right hon. Prime Minister deserve his confidence to such a degree that he neglected to inform in the first place the hon. members of the exact significance of his flag proposal? Because of his behaviour, the Prime Minister prepared the stalemate with which the House of Commons is now faced.

Last May the Prime Minister stated that during the discussion on the flag everyone would be allowed to vote freely regardless of the party line. Later the Prime Minister indicated that he would consider that matter as a vote of confidence in his government. Last Friday the Prime Minister reverted to his original statement to allow a free vote to his supporters on the flag question.

In my group we are free to vote for or against the choice of a distinctive flag. Although the Prime Minister wanted to consider that question of a distinctive flag as a vote of confidence in his government, I was going to vote for a distinctive flag. But I would not want in any way that my vote be interpreted, in due time, as an unqualified approval of the policies of the Prime Minister and of his government. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, putting all partisanship aside, I shall vote for a distinctive flag and in due course against the adoption of the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the commonwealth. In accepting the explanation given by the Prime Minister on the resolution concerning the union jack, I ask him whether he would not see fit to introduce a third resolution to indicate our allegiance to the great United Nations family and a fourth to proclaim our participation in NATO activities, etc.?

The house has under consideration an amendment submitted by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and a subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More).

I wish to point out first of all that I respect the opinion any hon. member may have on the flag issue. Some are shocked because a distinctive flag is to be substituted for the red ensign. If they feel it is their bounden duty to fight to maintain the red ensign I say to them: follow the dictates of your conscience. Although I do not share their opinion on the matter, I appreciate their feeling and I will not accuse them of fanaticism or racism, unless proof to the contrary is produced. At first sight, the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City seems to offer an interesting solution to put an end to what looks like a marathon debate on the choice of a distinctive flag.

What could be the result of a plebiscite in the form suggested by the hon. member for Regina City? In my opinion, a majority vote on this issue would be the surest way to proclaim the red ensign the most popular flag in Canada. Would that mean that the red ensign would be the choice of the majority of the Canadian people? I suggest that it would not, Mr. Speaker. The rabid supporters of the red ensign would vote solidly in the affirmative on the first question asked: "Are you in favour of the Canadian red ensign?" The vote of those who favour a distinctive flag would be divided according to the preference shown for one or the other of the three choices suggested under the subamendment of the hon. member for Regina City.

To really reflect the feeling of the people, question No. 1 on the plebiscite should be amended to read as follows: "Are you for or against the Canadian red ensign as the Canadian flag? If not, which flag do you prefer? Then, the choice should be made among the three other suggestions contained in the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina City. In its present form, the subamendment is dangerous because, on the one hand, it tends to confirm a principle, that of partisanship in favour of the Canadian red ensign, whereas with the three other questions which would be included in a referendum, those in favour of a distinctive national flag would be divided into three categories and the total results of one or the other of the three other categories or selections could be taken into account to try and upset the results obtained from those who would support the Canadian red ensign.

There is also the danger that a plebiscite would separate the younger generation from that of forty years and over. The younger generation, both French and English-speaking, wants a distinctive flag at any cost. As far as national unity is concerned, there would then be a greater cleavage between French and English Canadians. Such a plebiscite would give rise to controversies with regard to race, language, history and religion. Is there a country in the world which was ever called upon to choose a national flag by means of a plebiscite?

I feel that this is the responsibility of members of parliament, who were elected in a democratic way to look after the interests of their constituents, to consider and solve problems, and to adopt or reject administrative matters brought before the house. If the Canadian people were to settle every contentious, serious and important matter by means of a plebiscite, what would be the use of having members of parliament?

Personally, I am not afraid to assume here in the House of Commons my responsibilities in that connection, and if my constituents feel that I was mistaken in taking the stand I intend to take, they will be free to dispense with my services in due course.

Next October, we will celebrate the centennial of the Charlottetown conference, which laid the foundations of the Canadian confederation. Is it not time more than ever for Canada to have its own distinctive flag on the eve of these centennial celebrations?

When I talk of a distinctive flag, I do not necessarily mean the flag with the three maple leaves, but if it is the only distinctive flag proposed to us, I will vote for it. Occasions of discord, dispute, discussion and flagrant injustice are too numerous and too often undermine national unity, for me to support the idea of choosing a flag by means of a national plebiscite.

I have always faithfully voiced in this house the needs, aspirations and feelings of my constituents of Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière who wish, with a few exceptions, that Canada be granted a distinctive flag, without publicly discussing the matter as it would be done if a referendum were held because, in my opinion, this would be disastrous.

It is quite difficult to deal with details without stating my views on the main subject. Mr. Speaker, I am conscious of the bearing of the statement which I want to make on the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. I am perhaps risking my political career, but in politics and as a practising lawyer, I have never accepted any half-measure, any compromise with my conscience, and that is why I regret to disagree with my leader on the flag issue, and I must add that I will also vote against his amendment.

In taking such a stand, I am renewing my approval of the political platform of the Progressive Conservative party, which also advocated the choice of a distinctive Canadian flag. As early as 1958, I promised the men and women of my constituency that I would strive to give Canada a distinctive flag, and if such opportunity is afforded to me by the Liberal party, I will lay aside partisanship and honour my pledge to my electors; I shall then have the satisfaction which stems from the fulfilment of one's duty.

On January 23, 1961, the hon. member for St. Boniface, Mr. Laurier Régnier, submitted a resolution which was discussed by the House of Commons and which read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to provide for a referendum concerning the adoption of a Canadian flag.

Canadian Flag

That the questions submitted in said referendum be as follows—Are you in favour of a flag consisting of (a) a green maple leaf on a red and white field, or (b) the red ensign?

At the time, my party should have followed up the Régnier resolution; if it had we would not experience today such troubled circumstances, which may jeopardize not only national unity but also the confederation pact, should the gist of some speeches remain the same. What was bad in 1961 cannot, in my opinion, be better today.

I am critical of my party for worshipping today what it rejected yesterday. This discussion on the choice of a Canadian flag, as it is being carried on, is blameworthy, and I hope that before long we will stop being ridiculous and have enough courage to assume our responsibilities and put an end to this deadlock.

Let us put the interests of Canada above those of our respective parties. Let us put an end to those speeches which contribute more and more to racial prejudice. The people of Canada expect their elected representatives to take definite action on the flag issue. Let us try to find a compromise so that finally Canada may show to the world that is has a distinctive national flag, a flag which will strengthen national unity and enable our country to play the role the world expects it to play.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I will vote against the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Regina City, against the amendment of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and in favour of a distinctive national flag. The statement I have just made binds only myself; in no way does it bind my Conservative colleagues. They may vote, as I am sure they will, according to the dictates of their conscience. I will have no bitterness against anyone who does not share my views because I am sure even if we resort to different means that everyone here seeks to make Canada stronger and united in spite of the diversity of its ethnical composition. The people of Canada hope for the day when their country will be strong and great and when wheat will grow taller over our graves.

Mrs. Jean Wadds (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with mixed feelings, as many members of this house have done. First of all, I feel no apology is needed for the length of this debate. This is a subject with regard to which members quite rightly wish to clarify their positions.

[Mr. Paul.]

Since it is a highly emotional subject it cannot be dealt with in a hurried way and no one should be expected to avoid expressing his or her deep personal convictions in relation to it. We have already seen various changes in opinion—changes in the tone and temperature of the debate as it has continued —and it would indeed be foolish of any government to expect so serious a matter as this to be dealt with in haste or in a peremptory fashion.

Certainly, we have all been able to profit from the eloquent speeches made thus far. I have in mind contributions such as have been made by former ministers—among them the former ministers of national defence, forestry, labour and finance. My hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), was the latest of these hon. gentlemen to speak and his contribution, like those of his colleagues before him, could not fail to be helpful. These are all serious, experienced men with deep-seated convictions. I know, of course, that there have been other contributions of a high calibre, many of which I have heard. They are too numerous to mention individually, but I must refer to one speech, that made by the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton). He too remarked on the sincerity of many of the speeches made on the subject and drew attention to the dignity they had given to this debate. His own speech added to that dignity, supporting as it did the suggestion made by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that a small committee of this house be set up in an attempt to find some way of ending the unfortunate predicament in which we now find ourselves.

I agree with a previous speaker who said it was the responsibility not only of the government but of every member of this house to try to find ways and means of dealing reasonably and wisely with this sensitive subject. I regret very much that this debate is taking place at all at the present time. It has been given priority over other matters which we should be discussing as soon as possible. Despite the well ordered, well worded and conscientious expressions of opinion we have heard, this is a subject on which feelings can easily be aroused; it is a subject upon which misinterpretation can easily be placed and with regard to which misunderstanding can easily arise. The unfortunate incident which occurred this afternoon while one of our members was addressing the house is striking evidence that we are discussing a dangerous and divisive theme.

The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) was speaking honestly and from his heart when he said it makes him bleed, as a Canadian of other than French or English origin, to find the two founding races fighting between themselves and using this contentious subject for political and partisan reasons. I am one of a great many of English origin who feel the same way as the hon. member for Ontario does. And I am sure there are just as many Canadians of French origin who feel sadness and discouragement at the increasing tensions.

We have a serious responsibility here, Mr. Speaker. An elected group of people naturally have a responsibility to deal fairly with, and solve by discussion and debate, problems which less civilized groups formerly solved by force. But particularly in a federal government we meet here with the recognized responsibility of having to deal with an enormous variety in geography, with many races and religions. We must assume that more tolerance and understanding is demanded of us. We in a federal parliament, to paraphrase a great Britisher, "were not sent here to witness the breakup of a federation". This unfortunately is not an extremist fear as exemplified by the many violent comments and actions. We have the best opportunity of any Canadians to get to know other parts of Canada, to hear about them, to learn of their feelings and their problems. We should therefore be in the best position to give leadership in strengthening confederation.

One cannot help but arrive at a dismal frame of mind when one hears on every hand disrespect for and lack of faith in parliament. I believe the general attitude to parliament has never been at such a dangerously low ebb. We all know from the record of other countries what happens under such circumstances. Respect for law and order deteriorates. People refuse to listen to those who have responsible positions and turn to something new and different. We know that criticism is natural, indeed desirable, and should be constant. But cynicism is not desirable. I am seriously concerned that during this past year the general attitude to government seems to me to have grown steadily worse. We in this chamber seem to have done nothing but disappoint and worry and confuse other Canadians.

We find ourselves in this comfortable chamber very much in the same position as students who have had the opportunity to be sent to a very expensive and very much admired boarding school in that, once here, we spend our time debating the merits of our ancestry rather than getting down to work and studying the subjects which would be useful in solving the problems ahead of us. This is why I speak without any enthusiasm for this debate itself. This is not a subject which should have emergency priority; quite the reverse. While the country is divided on problems of health and welfare, on fiscal and monetary and tax problems which affect the daily life and well-being of each citizen, we are delaying facing this division. We are increasing it, because the longer it goes on the worse it gets and the greater is the need. We are daily opening new divisions and lessening the chances of unity.

The symbol of unity, Mr. Speaker, is not unity itself, any more than the skeleton of an elephant is strength. It needs the sinews on it and the blood in it to have any life or spirit. I think a Canadian flag is most important. I think it is so important that it cannot be forced. I think it is so important that it would be a tragedy if it became the symbol of disunity and, as has already been suggested, a political symbol.

Has there ever been a time before, Mr. Speaker, when we have heard such alarming and shocking talk—talk of one part of Canada separating from another? Have we ever before heard talk of the breakup of the commonwealth, talk of republicanism? This is indeed shocking, Mr. Speaker, in such a rich and young country as ours, which has had an excellent upbringing of law and order, where we should be full of enthusiasm, of optimism, of good will and good temper. I do not believe it is good enough to make political excuses. I do not agree that this is the fault of a minority government. Many countries have operated constantly and for many years with minority governments. A minority government does not need to be ineffective. Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, there are people in many parts of this vast and varied country who would like things to be different from what they are at the present time. With time, study and attention I would hope that many of their wishes and hopes will be fulfilled. But this is no reason at all to disrupt our national stability and make another group of people dissatisfied. What kind of future, Mr. Speaker, can we hope to face if we are going to follow a "rob Peter to pay Paul" technique?
