Mr. Korchinski: In uttering those words at this moment he is expressing a freedom of speech that is unknown in many countries. In fact if he spoke them in some countries he would be taken behind the curtain, and it would be an iron curtain.

I am suggesting that there is nothing to prevent the government from taking action which will provide a solution for this problem. Obviously the opposition is not being foolhardy. We are doing this because of the type of letters we get, and because of the type of reaction across the country. Obviously we are speaking for a minority, if it is such; but it could be a majority, and I am suggesting the longer this debate is prolonged it will become a majority. I am sure most of the government supporters will agree with that—that it will be a majority, if it is not one already.

I know what the reaction was in the press gallery when this debate started. Members of the press gallery said public opinion would solidify itself behind the flag issue and that the Prime Minister would be all right. This is what they thought; but let me point out to the government members and the members of the press gallery, if it is not obvious to them already, that public support has not solidified behind the government, has not backed up the Prime Minister in his bold, foolhardy venture. The man who is Prime Minister today had a bold and imaginative idea. It is all right to be bold and imaginative, but he is going to learn it is over his head and that it is about time he quit.

Why must he pursue this course? It is for the simple reason, as I said before, that he wants to immortalize himself through the flag. Why must the rest of his party be subjected to that type of treatment? I suggest to his party that the mixed caucus it holds stinks. This idea stinks and the Prime Minister should not go through with it. I suggest that his party should not pursue this course because it is foolhardy, because they are going over a cliff. Like lemmings they are heading for the sea. There are a lot of good members on the government side; perhaps some of the finest members are found on the other side, and I would like to see their faces again, but not in shame. If they divide this country it will not be for a day or a year or two; it will be for a long time.

I do not like to see my fellowmen fighting me. I do not like to fight my fellowmen. I see no reason. Because of what—a flag? I am sure a country can exist without a flag.

An hon. Member: We are the only one.

Mr. Korchinski: If we want to preserve our unity, if we have any respect for each other we can exist without a flag. If this is what you say, then we have done it for over 100 years.

Speaking of history, at one stage when Lord Durham was preparing his report he had a sheaf of notes and he jotted down what came to his mind. The thought that entered his mind on one particular occasion was that this was a country without a history. This he jotted down, and later that day the maid entered his study to clean up and she saw these notes. I understand she was a French maid, and when she saw what he had written she thought it was wrong, and she wrote that on his notes.

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Korchinski: Just hold on a minute. When Lord Durham saw his notes in the morning he realized he had been wrong and that this woman knew what she was talking about. He asked her to explain why she had written on his notes, and she told him that Canada was rich in its history, even at that date.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

We are not an emerging nation. We are not a nation that all of a sudden has got its independence. We are going to celebrate our 100th anniversary. We have a history. Are you to deny what has happened in the past? Am I to deny it? Stalin told his people, "Things happen this way." After him Khrushchev came along and said what happened under Stalin did not exist. Are those in Germany today, much as they dislike what happened in Germany, and much as a lot of us dislike it, to deny it happened? They cannot deny that they had a history. They had a history, much as we may dislike it.

Somebody said Wolfe fought Montcalm. Wolfe defeated Montcalm, somebody said; but the other point of view is that Montcalm surrendered to him. It does not matter how you look at it. The point is that this happened, and much as we may like or dislike certain events, they did happen; and much as the government supporters may dislike what is happening here today the fact is that there are those who want to preserve history as we know it, and I want to be associated with those people who want to be proud of our history.

I am amazed that the Prime Minister, a past history professor, should discard our history. What reason is there in this?

An hon. Member: You know something about the Poles and the Ukrainians, don't you?

Mr. Korchinski: I know something about Canada, and that is what I am interested in. The point I am making is this—that the Prime Minister, a former history professor, says that history is to be forgotten and that we are going to start from scratch. And scratch it is. Somebody has suggested to me that if you draw three twigs on one base—a chicken's foot—that is the flag in winter. The Prime Minister is dividing this country today in such a way that I am ashamed. I have a letter here, but before I read it I should like to put on record a comment by Lubor J. Zink which I think sets out the situation very clearly.

> All this sowing of nationalistic mistrust, which cannot but produce a harvest of hatred and strife is done by allegedly rational men motivated by visions of a strong united Canada.

I am sure that at one point the Prime Minister must have thought he was unifying Canada. I am equally sure that at this stage he is bound to realize he has not done so. He has divided us. I do not mind telling the supporters of the government that if there had been a free vote at an early stage of this debate I might have felt as they do. But I have since changed my mind, as I think a great many Canadians have also changed their minds. I do not know whether I speak here for an ethnic group. I know I can speak as one member of an ethnic group. And I say the Prime Minister is wrong and that he had better consider the situation again.

We have offered alternatives. We have suggested a plebiscite. It is true that in a sense this was a negative proposition—

An hon. Member: Your own member voted against it.

Mr. Korchinski: I do not care how he voted. That is the freedom he enjoys. There was no effort in this party to prevent a free vote. But there was no free vote on the government side.

We offered another alternative. It must be remembered that it was the Conservative opposition, and the Conservative opposition alone, which offered this other suggestion and I am proud to stand with it. No one on the government side put forward the suggestion we now offer that this question should now be placed before a committee. If hon. members opposite want to save the face of the Prime Minister they should plead with him to accept this proposal. I do not know how they will go about it. I have tried in a quiet way to suggest to private members that they should make such an approach but, apparently, they were unable to get through to him. For anyone to suggest, as did the leader of the Social Credit party, that this party is not consulted by its leader—I think the blame should be laid on the government side of the house—is absolutely disgusting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Up to this point I have not taken part formally in this flag debate, but at the present time I feel we have reached a stage where there must be some alternative course to the one we are following now. Therefore, I wish to speak briefly in order to put forward a few suggestions which I think are vitally urgent as far as an alternative line of approach is concerned.

Many charges have been made by various members who have taken part in this debate, including the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) who has just spoken. In my opinion, this is not an occasion for further remarks which might arouse emotions or feelings. It is a time when we must realize it is imperative for us to reach some kind of agreement which can bring this spectacle, of which we are all a part, to an end.

I do not care for the way in which the flag issue was introduced into this house. I think the timing was poor. I think the method which was used to bring these resolutions before us can hardly be considered the best. Neither does the three maple leaf design appeal to me as far as its beauty is concerned, or in terms of the type of flag I should like to see this nation have. I must admit however that since the debate began I have learned much more about the history of the three maple leaf emblem and the extent to which it has been tied in with Canada's story from the beginning. But somehow it seems to lack the aesthetic appeal which a flag should have.

On the other hand, I have taken the stand for a number of years that Canada should have a distinctive Canadian flag. I have spent most of my adult years overseas living in foreign countries and it has been my privilege to share part of the general regard which, for the most part, nationals of foreign countries have for Canadians. I do not think this regard arises so much out of what has been done by our successive governments. Rather I think it has risen because of what Canadians have done. It seems that whether they are of English stock, or French stock, or whether they have another ethnic origin, Canadians are able to make friends with and influence effectively the people with whom they come into contact. This is one of the reasons I have for thinking that Canada has a definite role to play in a world whose affairs come closer to us each year.

One of the questions which has been asked of me over and over again in the course of years is: Why don't we have a flag which is distinctively Canadian? People in other countries often ask whether we still belong, as a colony, to Great Britain. They wonder whether or not we are an autonomous nation. They find our position difficult to understand. In June I was part of a delegation which visited Europe, and while there I talked to many of our people, who are doing a wonderful job—in fact, it seems to me they are better liked than they were ten years ago when they first went to Europe. But I did not find a single officer serving in Europe with our Canadian forces who did not voice the wish that we might have some distinctive flag expressive of the distinctive and unique role which Canada is playing at the present time. As to my own convictions with regard to this, I have tried to respect the opinions of others. I do not think this is a matter we should use in order to develop animosity among ourselves. Goodness knows, we have little enough of a national purpose today without trying to break down further what there might be.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that we ought to try to come together in some non-partisan way in order to work out together a design that would be acceptable to all of us, in a way that the majority of Canadian people would agree with, and which would make them proud of the flag decided upon. I do not think it has been helpful to any of us in this house or to the nation to have this debate carry on as it has now for 20 days. I believe it is the responsibility of every one of us in this house to endeavour to make it possible to come to some mutually acceptable agreement, an agreement that is not forced upon one or the other and is not legislated upon one or the other.

I am confident that such an agreement is possible. I am sure that if we were to lay out the vehicle by which this coming together could be made possible, we would even surprise ourselves how quickly we could come to some agreement. I do not think there is anything to be gained by charging the Liberals at this time that they did not do this the right way, or because they did not consult on a non-partisan basis or did not adhere to their original position that there would be a free vote, as was said at the beginning. These things belong to the past. I do not agree with the tactics and the policy the Conservative opposition have used. I do not think this is the time to try to arouse feelings or to condemn them for that. I believe the time has come when we should try to come together in order to reach some agreement.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Thompson: If the hon. member does not mind, Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to answer his questions afterwards. I find that this flag debate has become odorous in the nostrils of our own countrymen, and a spectacle to other countries which must cause them to smile in a tolerant way, as though they were watching children quarrelling at play. We have become akin to high school cheering sections, tearing each other to pieces on the sidelines while the people who paid the price want us to get on with the game for which they paid.

[Mr. Thompson.]

It is time we got down to the serious business of running our country's affairs, which we have been sent here by the people to accomplish. We are in danger of not holding the country together at all so that any flag of any description can have anything to fly over. If we do not behave like responsible, mature people, we will not be doing anything more than reserving a picture of the map of Canada in a page of world history of something that once was—a faded camelot. You can colour it "shattered".

Unless there are ulterior motives on the part of some individuals—and I do not believe this is so in this house—reasonable men should be able to arrive at a reasonable and fair solution to our unnecessary dilemma. At the heart of our democratic process is the basic philosophy of majority rule with flexibility of action to make required concessions to a minority opinion. It has been said that politics is the art of the possible. There is nothing wrong with that. But I believe it is impossible for us to continue as we are going on at the present time. The only result that can come to pass by having the government resort to closure directed at those who are opposing the three maple leaf design, and to have them fail in their objective, would be to have it replaced by a more acceptable design.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is possible for us to come together. That is why I am speaking in this manner at this time. We can come together on this issue so that the House of Commons may proceed with the legislation that is vital to our country. I would suggest, first of all, that the Prime Minister call, immediately after Labour day, another meeting of the leaders. I would urge the Prime Minister to consider this request. Second, I suggest that a committee be set up to which both flag resolutions could be referred. It has been proposed that this committee comprise 15 members; I have no objection to that. But I do not think we should demand of this committee a degree of unanimity that it is impossible to expect if it is there as a requirement. I believe we should accept such a committee being set up; we should accept those who are suggested to represent the different parties on that committee in good faith, in that they will consider the resolutions and be able to come to some mutually acceptable agreement.

I am sure that if this committee were to be set up on that basis there could be achieved just as great a degree of unanimity as there was in the former committee in 1946.

Third, this committee should be given one month to deliberate to seek a mutually acceptable alternative. This would bring us past the date of the Queen's visit. If the committee could come to an agreement in less than 30 days, all to the good; then their report should come back to the house. The fourth point is that when the report comes back to the house, if it received mutual acceptance in the committee the following debate should be limited to the party leaders in connection with the recommendations of the committee. In the event that it was impossible to come to a mutually acceptable agreement in a month, then the matter should be referred again to a meeting of the leaders.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): How long did the previous committee sit? I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member would consider that, in the light of his suggestion that the committee sit for one month.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member has asked how long the previous committee sat.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Yes, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the hon. member's suggestion of one month.

Mr. Thompson: In answer to that question I would say that I do not think that length of time would be required at this point. We have had 20 days of debate up to this time. If we would be honest with each other and would admit our own feelings in regard to this debate, I believe it would be practically unanimous that most of us are fed up with the way this debate has been going on, and would like to see some alternative. As I talk to different members I seem to sense that there is a determination or desire to come together, rather than to let this matter continue as it has been.

If agreement could not be had in a matter of a month's deliberations, then the question could be referred back to the leaders again and if necessary some alternative action could be taken. As a further alternative, this question could again come back to the house. I believe these suggestions are reasonable, Mr. Speaker. I believe these suggestions are necessary because it troubles me to think how we can expect to continue this debate through the next weeks of September and be in any frame of mind ourselves or to have developed within our own country an attitude favourable to the visit of Her Majesty the Queen. Certainly what we are doing now is encouraging those elements within our society that resent her coming and would do violence to her. This is something that is intolerable, and certainly not in keeping with the reputation, dignity and loyalty that Canadians and Canada have portrayed as far as the crown is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, if this suggestion in respect of setting a time for a leaders meeting can be acted upon by the Prime Minister before we go home for the Labour day week end, it would give us all time to reflect seriously on the situation that now exists and to probably sense in a more realistic way the attitude of the people in this country. Then perhaps we can go along with the spirit that should have developed as a result of the first centennial celebrations which have just concluded in Prince Edward Island. If we find it is not possible to do that, then we are left open to the kind of criticism that is mounting from every side, criticism from those Canadians who are loyal to what Canada is and who have ambitions and desires for the continuation and projection of what Canada should be in the future.

Typical of this criticism is that editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday entitled "If the Fathers Came Back". At this recent celebration in Prince Edward Island certain men portrayed the fathers of confederation and acted out the events that took place 100 years ago. If those men, who re-enacted those scenes, had actually been the Fathers of Confederation back in our midst, what would they have thought about what they found here in Canada?

The part of this editorial that impressed me very much reads as follows:

> But saddest of all for the fathers would be their look at what takes place today in the capital city on the shore of the Ottawa river. Here was to be the parliament of the nation—a parliament with wisdom and skill and eloquence, capable of seeing and shaping a broadening destiny. Instead they would find a faded hope, a tawdry spirit, a pitiful wrangle, an exhibition of how little littleness can become.
> The vision they had has departed. The parliament that heard the voice of Thomas D'Arcy McGee, and the good humoured good sense of Macdonald, and the blunt integrity of George Brown, and the fiery statesmanship of Cartier has become a gathering that has lost all faith in itself, that knows not what to do, that lets the sun come down on day after day of drab uselessness.

I do not believe that anyone who is trying to follow the thoughts I am projecting has any purpose or useful intent in interjecting things that would be contrary to how the general public is coming to regard us and this institution. Summarizing my remarks as briefly as possible, I would urge the Prime Minister to reconvene the leaders meetings again on Tuesday after Labour day, and suggest that the leaders, including the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), should seriously consider and display a willingness to let a committee have one month to attempt to work out a solution to this problem. Again I say I am convinced that if 15 men, even if some were those who have expressed themselves very strongly on both sides of this matter, could come together on this basis, before 30 days had passed—and perhaps even before one week—they could come to a decision which would be mutually agreeable to at least the vast majority of the party representatives, if not a unanimous decision. Who knows but what this thing could be resolved even before the Queen came here, by our own free will and by our serious intent to resolve a problem today that has degenerated into a hopeless situation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would repeat this suggestion with the thought and, yes, may I say with the prayer, that we will all seriously consider this or some similar avenue of approach that would end this damaging and futile debate in which we are engaged at this present time. I think it is the responsibility of every one of us, who claim to be loyal Canadian citizens, to use our every effort and influence, on the basis of loyalty to the nation and with a sense of national purpose, to see that this thing does come to some such conclusion, which I am confident can come to pass.

Thank you.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like to draw attention to the fact that nothing the hon. member has said during the last 25 minutes has had any relevancy whatsoever to the subamendment or amendment. I hope the same freedom will be allowed other members who speak during this debate.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? He suggested that it was now open to the Prime Minister to again ask for a conference of the leaders of the different parties. Is he asking the Prime Minister to do this? The Prime Minister has left the door open, as a result of which it has been stated that he has backed up. However he has left the door open in respect of suggestions from members of the opposition. It was suggested by the leader of the official opposition—

Mr. Smallwood: Order. Are you making a speech?

[Mr. Thompson.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Roxburgh: I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Smallwood: You have not got the guts to make a speech about the red ensign.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member resume his seat.

Mr. Roxburgh: I just want to ask a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Smallwood: Get up and make a speech on the red ensign if you are going to make a speech at all.

Mr. Roxburgh: Is the hon. member inviting the Prime Minister to call a meeting?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I would say in answer to the hon. member's question that I am inviting the Prime Minister to again convene the meetings of the leaders of the different parties. We cannot demand that he do so but I would urge that he take such action.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? If when such a meeting is held there is difficulty in agreeing to establish a formal committee, which might require a vote in the house, and might even result in a debate, would the hon. member also consider suggesting to the meeting of leaders that consideration be given to establishing an informal committee, perhaps with the same number of members, which might after several meetings be able to come to a conclusion that would be helpful to us all?

Mr. Thompson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am very willing to agree to such a suggestion and would propose it if necessary. In fact, I think that every member in this house should bring to his individual leader, and discuss it with others, the suggestion that we make this a non-partisan discussion so that we as members of this House of Commons can come to some agreement. I think it is the duty of every member of this house to put forward suggestions, perhaps better than the ones which have been proposed. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has suggested there is nothing new in this proposal. I do not make any claim that it is a new proposal, but actually if the hon. member looks back far enough he will find there is nothing new under the sun in this old world of ours. It does seem to me that what I have suggested is a logical approach. I think we should get together in respect of every possible or plausible suggestion, to accomplish this purpose.

I say this as a Canadian, not as a westerner. I have lived away from Canada too long to take a provincial view. I believe that Quebec is my Canada, as much as Alberta is, and I should like to think that members from Quebec feel that way about other parts of Canada. In that spirit let us see if we can get together on this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, perhaps I should have tried to give a ruling earlier. However, as the hon. member knows, the Chair has tried to interpret the rules of relevancy as leniently as possible in this debate. While the hon. member for Red Deer was speaking it was my opinion that his remarks related to the aspect of unity stressed in the subamendment before the house, and that is why I did not think he should be called to order.

Mr. Thompson: May I make one remark, Mr. Speaker. I forgot even to mention the subamendment. I did not consider that the previous speaker was referring to it at all. What I had in mind saying was this. I have been in favour of a plebiscite but I am not sure whether or not it could serve a useful purpose now. I do not think it should be connected with an election. I am even in favour of the subamendment because I think that is the way a plebiscite could be most effective. On the other hand, at this point I think we should be talking about the situation in which we find ourselves, because I believe that because of that situation we are going to have to find some other solution, even though earlier we would have liked to see a plebiscite held.

Mr. Moreau: Will the hon. member permit another question? I was interested in his remarks that we should not expect unanimous agreement in this committee. In view of the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) that there should be a virtually unanimous view, would he not agree that such a committee would likely be very fruitless, having in mind the veto power granted in that way?

Mr. Thompson: I was very careful to state and I reiterate now that I do not think you can legislate unanimity. It is like trying to bring a boy and girl together and telling them they must love each other. It does not work out that way. But if we could come together with a sense of co-operation and good will, forget about the demand for unanimity, and set up an ordinary committee I believe we could achieve unanimity far more easily than if we attempted to legislate it. Let us forget the veto. Let us forget all of that. Let us not use such words. If we could not reach general agreement the matter could come back to the leaders, but I am confident that we could come to an agreement and even surprise ourselves.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Before the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) speaks, may I ask the hon. member for Red Deer another question?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If I heard him correctly, he said he was in favour of a plebiscite. Yet the other day he voted against it. How does he explain that?

Mr. Thompson: I did not vote against a plebiscite at all. I voted against a subamendment with a set of questions with which I did not agree. That is why I voted the way I did. I have advocated a plebiscite right from the beginning. In fact, I believe it was an hon. member of this party who suggested for the first time that the counting of the vote should not be done on a regional or provincial basis, but on a national basis. I think this would have been an excellent way of arriving at a solution to the problem, but I think that at the present time we have gone beyond that point. I believe the Liberal government would have been far better advised if they had adopted some such proposal at the beginning.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Then I can take it from the hon. member's remarks that he is in favour of the subamendment and the amendment before the house?

Mr. Thompson: I said I was in favour of the subamendment proposed yesterday as it relates to a plebiscite.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): And you are prepared to vote for it?

Mr. Thompson: Don't put words in my mouth.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is why we want you to explain yourself fully.

Mr. Thompson: From the very beginning, long before the flag issue was brought before the house in the form of a resolution, I have talked plebiscite. However, I qualify my statement at the present time because I think that as a result of the way in which the government introduced the matter and the way in which the debate has developed a plebiscite is not the answer to the problem now, although it is an approach that should have been taken before.

Mr. Churchill: Retreat.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You will never vote against the Liberals.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am sure most members of the house were much impressed by the sincerity of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) in what I considered a great speech that he made this afternoon. I am glad there has been a little comedy relief since then, prior to my rising, because I thought his was a pretty tough act to follow.

With regard to the suggestions of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), the leader of the Social Credit party, I can agree with him on one point, that the matter should go to a committee. However, it did seem to me most significant and very peculiar that he should propose a time limit of one month for the committee and a limiting of the debate to the leaders afterward, if the committee should not be unanimous in its recommendation. Neither the hon. member for Red Deer nor anyone on the government side has ever bothered to explain the necessity for the rush. Why does this matter have to be concluded within a specified time or in such a hurry or at a non-stop pace? Surely those members who are so exercised about a new flag regard the matter as serious enough that the problem should be dealt with by the house in its own good time, so that everybody can be heard and every voice from across the country can be heard and considered.

If the hon. member for Red Deer was serious in the platitudinous speech he just made he should have at least explained the necessity for the rush. If he wants the matter to go to a committee, why does there have to be a time limit? Why is there any hurry at all to finish the flag debate? I cannot understand why the committee should be limited to 15 members. I am certain the house is aware that a previous parliamentary committee was able to deal with this matter and bring about a good deal of agreement. On that occasion there was no time limit and the committee finished its work within a reasonable length of time, and made a very reasonable suggestion which I think had general support in the house.

[Mr. Thompson.]

There is only one reason why we are having any trouble with the flag debate. It is the manner in which the government is handling the matter. I would think that anyone who had the temerity to make the suggestion that the hon. member made should deal with the aspect of time and tell us why there is a rush. What is wrong with the government's putting aside a very contentious issue and bringing forward more urgent legislation? What is wrong with putting this matter aside for a while and letting tempers cool and negotiations be conducted? What is the reason we have to have a change in our national flag right now?

I was very concerned this afternoon, when the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) a question, to see the reaction of some of the government supporters. They wanted no compromise line followed with regard to this affair. Surely the government should be aware by now that a majority of the people of Canada are not in favour of the three maple leaf design. I am willing to concede it may be possible that a majority of the people want a change in our present national flag, but since the government is insisting that only one flag be considered and since the opposition is aware that a majority of the people of Canada do not want that flag, we have one simple duty to perform, to make sure that the flag resolution does not pass.

There has been only one difficulty throughout the debate, one factor leading to dissension within the country. I refer to the method of handling the flag issue. After all the speeches that have been made and the numbers of letters and newspaper articles that have been quoted, surely the Prime Minister must be aware it is his method of handling the matter that is dividing the country. Once the error has been pointed out and has become so apparent, what is wrong with a man who will not change what is obviously a very bad plan? This, I think, must puzzle the minds of even the most loyal Liberal backbenchers. I would feel a little better about it if the Prime Minister had explained, or even any of the government supporters had explained, the urgency connected with the matter of the flag.

We have asked the question again and again, why the rush? No one has explained why the government is handling the matter in such a hurry. I am willing to listen to any member, and I hope some member over there will get up and explain why it has to be run through non-stop. There is only one explanation that comes to my mind. It is the Prime Minister's reputation for retreat and somersault, and he is afraid to do anything now. Surely, with the kind of insistence there has been, with the kind of trouble there is in this country today, with the heavy demands that are being made on such a logical basis, this is the one time when the Prime Minister should reverse his stand and receive general credit across the country.

The last time I spoke in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I quoted only small portions from two letters because it distressed me to find this feeling of division in our country. It was distressing to find feelings of resentment against Quebec and therefore I quoted only briefly from these letters. After listening to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) I think perhaps I would have been wiser to have gone into that aspect in more detail. We certainly do not achieve unity in the country by closing our eyes to the feelings that people express. It may well be that a certain amount of the correspondence members receive comes from crackpots, intemperate or violent people, and this would have little or no effect upon a responsible member.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that is not the case here. The volume of mail is too large and the tone of many of the letters indicates such a high degree of intelligence and responsibility that we must take very seriously these symptoms of the illness that affects this country today, since the Prime Minister started this method of trying to change our national flag. The Edmonton Journal is the only daily newspaper in northern Alberta and it covers the entire northern half of the province. I think it is a fairly responsible newspaper. The only time I do not feel it is responsible is when it is against me during election campaigns. Other than that, I am sure the publishers and editors try to do their job. On August 25, page 4, the entire top half of that page of the Edmonton Journal was taken up by an article and included a three-column cut of the Prime Minister. The heading is "The Brink of Disaster?".

Perhaps I will have to put the whole of this article on the record, not because I agree with it but because that feeling is so current that the only daily newspaper in northern Alberta gives it prominence. I feel, therefore, it is my duty to bring it to the attention of this house. This feeling of resentment, of puzzlement, was not evident in my area before this flag debate started. I will say that over the last year there has been an expression of puzzlement as to what exactly the members from Quebec want. What is this new feeling of nationalism in that French Canadian province? This article is headed "Partition for Canada; it may be the only way says Edmonton's H. B. Turner." I do not know who Mr. Turner is. I may have met him some time, but I cannot place him at the moment. I quote:

> I suggest that the blackmail Liberal government of Mr. L. B. Pearson has done more to dissolve confederation than any group could have done had it deliberately set out to accomplish this fact.

Now, that is just the first paragraph. There is the word "blackmail" there. I suggest that if there is this feeling, then part of the reason for it is that there has been no explanation in this house by this government for rushing this flag through. There has been no explanation of the method they are using and why they are using it. There has been silence from the government supporters. There has been a stubborn, steadfast refusal to handle this matter of the flag in the manner in which it was handled before, and there has been apparently a complete blindness and deafness to the situation in Canada today. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) had the effrontery to suggest we are always responsible for this house becoming disreputable; that this flag debate is bringing down the standard of the house. I suggest that when the government starts determinedly on a course to try to foist a flag on the country in this manner, when we know the majority of the people do not want that flag, when there is no alternative action, when they refuse to handle it in any manner other than by force, then we have no alternative but to do what we can to make sure that that course is not successful.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH POSTMASTER, THETFORD MINES, QUE.

On the order:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and letters exchanged between the Postmaster General, his executive assistant, his parliamentary secretary, or the deputy minister of his department and the postmaster at Thetford Mines, from January 1, 1960 to June 30, 1964.

Private Bills

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): With regard to this notice of motion, may I say that I have had a talk with the Postmaster General and ascertained that the information I was seeking was available from the Department of Public Works. I have received this information from the Department of Public Works, so there is no necessity for proceeding with this motion. I should like, with the consent of this house, to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

SECURITY PROCEDURES AND INVESTIGATIONS

On the order:

Resuming debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Orlikow—That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all government statements and directives to government departments during the past year regarding security procedures and investigations.

Mr. Knowles: Would the house give consent to letting this resumed debate stand?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-39, respecting Meota Pipe Lines Ltd.—Mr. Nugent.

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, August 20, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Konantz for the second reading of Bill No. S-6, to incorporate the Bank of Western Canada, and the motion proposed thereto by Mr. Perron.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I fully support the amendment moved the other day by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Perron) to the effect that Bill No. S-6 should not be read a second time but deferred for six months. This would give the mover and all those who support the bill an opportunity to consider carefully the remarks made by the hon. member for Beauce. It would also permit them to study the merits of his statement, as well as the suggestions he made to the house in this connection.

[Mr. Langlois.]

I wish to point out at the outset that if I participate in the killing of this bill, it is not that I want to prevent anyone from earning a living but there is a principle involved.

No matter who had presented this bill in the house, I would still be opposed to its passing, because my constituents elected me to the house precisely to help change the monetary system which we have to put up with since the Bank of Canada relinquished its powers to chartered banks.

I would therefore feel remiss if I let this bill pass today without giving my views on the present banks and monetary system.

I must tell you that I am very surprised to note that those who urge the nationalization of almost everything that belongs to private industry hardly think of nationalizing the most important business, that on which all the others depend as well as the public: the chartered banks.

Nobody talks about nationalizing credit institutions, though individual economic activities in this nation depend on them in a proportion of over 90 per cent.

Everything should be nationalized, according to some, except the gear-wheels, or machinery, so to say, of all the trusts which are to be nationalized. The existing trusts are to be destroyed, except the parent organization.

This reasoning is quite as ridiculous as if, wanting to get rid of all bees, we wasted our time killing them, while continuing to feed the queen bee which is responsible for what we want to eradicate.

And worse still, Mr. Speaker, instead of destroying this plague at its very source, permission is sought to add others and quite as pernicious ones.

This comparison, which some may think silly, is the exact replica of what is happening in our economy.

At this time we have eight chartered banks which distribute and control the economic blood stream of this nation, that is the money. Is there any reason for pride in the achievements of those institutions so far? When looking at the results, can we really say that those banks have played their part?

The country is constantly getting into debt day after day, year after year; every organization or individual must face this problem.

Is the country in need of money? It loses no time in borrowing from chartered banks. When the provinces need money, they hurry to borrow money from chartered banks. The same applies to our municipalities and our school boards.

Is it normal, Mr. Speaker, for a government that could order the Bank of Canada to create the money required, that could borrow directly for that bank, to have to go to chartered banks owned by private individuals? It just does not make sense and yet, it is exactly what the government is doing at the present time.

At this point, I should like to ask the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) what he would think of the suggestion I am about to make. I address myself to him because he is the last one who is willing to understand what we want to rectify, for the simple reason that he does not understand the present system.

What would he think if, at the end of the month, he gets close to $3,000, I were to ask him to hand me that money and then to come and borrow it from me. That is what the Bank of Canada is doing now. It gives its money to the chartered banks and the government borrows it from them with interest.

With all the power those chartered banks now have, is it any wonder that the Canadian government, no matter which party is in office, should be at the mercy of a few hundred people who do as they please with it because they are empowered to restrict or extend credit.

How is it that, in a time of peace, we should be forced to tighten our belts due to a lack of money, when, to produce weapons of destruction, we can immediately find the funds required? Are those people for whom we provide jobs in wartime not there in peacetime? Are the materials we use to build destruction machines not there in peacetime? Are all those natural resources we develop in wartime not there in peacetime also? How is it that we are unable to use all those energies and resources in peacetime to build, improve, enlarge? How is it that we are unable to employ those people to build, etc. in peacetime?

It is because in peacetime the actual credit based on production and consumption capacity is not related to bank credit. That is why it is abnormal that the credit of the country should be controlled by private institutions instead of by a social credit agency which would seek to facilitate credit in the areas where the need for it is the greatest.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that there are now enough parasites living at the expense of the Canadian people.

When one considers that the Canadian government or parliament is ready to allow a new agency to do like the other chartered banks, namely to live at the expense of the people who pay to support them, one realizes that this government merely works for those parasites, as we call the finance people; one is glad to help killing this bill, because there are enough chartered banks now; we do not need more.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Dorchester (Mr. Boutin) said, the question is not whether the bill should be talked out or whether it should be delayed or passed. In my opinion, there is no need at present for another bank which would be known under the "French Canadian" name western bank of Canada. I see on page 5 of the bill that the bank would also be allowed to use the name Banque de l'Ouest canadien. It still remains, however, that it is designated as the bank of western Canada on the first page of the bill. But that is only a minor detail.

Mr. Speaker, the sponsor of the bill claimed that the setting up of another chartered bank would provide more credit in Canada. That is untrue.

Over the past 60 years, there has been a centralization of more than 30 banks; their number has even been reduced to eight under the Bank of Canada Act. That being so, would the addition of two more banks be justified now?

Mr. Speaker, the number of banks is unimportant; it is what banks can do which counts. At present, I think the chartered banks are being called upon to restrict credit. If the government itself controlled its own credit and credit issues, we would not have to put up with the effects such restrictions have on the financial system which is itself inadequate.

I note among the shareholders or those asking that the company be incorporated, the names of the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mrs. Konantz) and that of the former governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Coyne, who, as we all know, experienced certain difficulties in 1954 about his ideas on the Canadian economy and especially on credit restrictions, because he had been pointing out for a few years that Canadians were living beyond their means and that they should tighten their belts.

It is not a question of increasing or not the number of banks. We, Social Crediters, fear that these banks and not the government control the issuance of credit to the nation. We want a change in that regard.

Therefore, if we are restricted to a particular amount when the government claims to control credit, how can we believe that more banks will create more credit. If you have eight pounds to divide between eight persons, everyone will get one pound, but if there are ten persons, each one will not get one pound. According to the government, nine or ten chartered banks will make more credit available, but this is precisely the proof that its monetary policy is unsound. "The more banks, the more credit". That is false. Normally, credit should be proportionate to the total production, to the potential output of the country, of its manpower, of its natural resources.

Private enterprise is not short of credit nowadays.

Mr. Speaker, the chartered banks are private financial institutions which should finance only the private sector in the Canadian economy. As a matter of fact, if I get credit from a bank, it is normal that it should charge interest. By lending me money, the bank does me a service and I must pay it interest, just as the worker is entitled to his salary. That applies in the private sector of the Canadian economy. However, there is no reason to increase the number of chartered banks which already exist because they can do the same thing, that is be of service to the population.

Besides, when you borrow money from a chartered bank, you must pay interest; that interest is included in the final price of the article sold. In that case, the bank's interest is covered. But here is where the present system fails. We lack the public financial institutions which could supply public credit, which is something entirely different. That is another sector of the economy which seems to be forgotten. It seems that no difference is made between private and public credit.

When I talk about a manufacturer, I talk about private credit. The same thing goes when I talk about credit granted to a farmer who harvests potatoes; that is private credit. As a matter of fact, the money he invests in his farm or machinery to grow potatoes is private credit.

But when I talk about bridges, highways, waterworks, viaducts, in short any public utility which serves everyone in general and no one in particular, everything should be financed in the same way the private sector is financed by private credit. Consequently, public utilities should be financed by public credit.

It does not make any more sense to finance public business from private funds than it would to finance private business from public funds. Today, we are taking advantage of the revenue of the private sector to finance sidewalks, waterworks, schools, streets, roads and bridges. The money needed for such public works comes from the private sector, nowhere else. In this connection, I think we could obtain the necessary credit, without interest and without having to go through chartered banks.

Instead of suggesting the establishment of a new chartered bank, which would be adding another one to the eight already existing, why not use the Bank of Canada in the various provinces of the country, with branches to finance public utilities? Then, chartered banks would only have to finance the private sector, which they would do very well.

My opinion as a mathematics professor is that the suggestion of establishing a new bank does not make any sense and is anti-mathematical. We will never swallow that kind of theory.

If it is nonsensical to use public credit to make investments in the private sector, it is even more nonsensical to inject private credit into the public sector to finance public business.

Bridges do not belong to me, roads do not belong to me as a member of parliament or as a private individual; they do not belong to me, even if they belong to everybody. If the Bank of Canada were to finance public business through its branches, we would pay much less interest for the construction of highways or bridges. Construction costs could be refunded at the depreciation rate of the public utility built or the natural resource developed.

If it is a bridge of $3 million, you would have a certain depreciation each year—engineers know what this depreciation would be. The amount is recovered each year. If the construction cost of the bridge were $3 million and the depreciation rate established at 5 per cent per annum, you would only have to recover the construction cost at a rate of 5 per cent per annum. That bridge would then be financed through public credit, without any interest. Thus we would not have to pay the cost of that bridge three times.

We know that as soon as the construction of a bridge is completed, it starts to depreciate. The bridge does not produce anything nor does it increase in value. Why should it be paid for three times? By using public credit, credit would be created and after completion the bridge would be paid for.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) to pay attention to what I am saying. I ask him to listen carefully. He will soon see the ridiculous situation we are in now. He just has to establish the total value of our production to realize that we owe more than we actually have in value. I am referring here to the total debt of the country and to its total assets. We have more debts than accounts receivable. The same thing should be done for the United States, the richest country in the world. The United States, after having collected everything which was due to them, plus everything they owe, are still in debt.

In making these computations we unavoidably find that every country has a debt. How is it that every country has a debt when it has collected all its receivable accounts? To whom is it indebted? I would like the Minister without Portfolio to take the time to figure out where the shortcoming lies. He will then undoubtedly understand that there is something which is wrong in our financial system.

That is the reason why I believe we should make the changes. There is unavoidably hardship when our human laws come in conflict with the logical and natural needs of our citizens. Well then, it is illogical to create another chartered bank when there are already eight which are operating quite well and which can create all the private credit that the private sector needs. What is wrong is that the public sector must be financed by money from the private sector, and that results in a lack of credit in the private sector.

Why must the public sector repay sometimes four times the cost of construction? It is a little like the wheels of an automobile; the wheels of the private sector and those of the public sector are not turning at the same speed.

In fact, with a small wheel and a big wheel, we are apt to turn round in a circle. That is exactly what is being done today. One wheel is turning faster than the other. What we want is to balance the two wheels. At that time we shall go where we want and not where the wheels take us.

Mr. Speaker, as long as I am a member of this house, I shall oppose the setting up of another chartered bank. Perhaps I shall not object to a provincial bank. But, there again, we should know whether this bank would finance the private and the public sectors, because if its only object was to finance the private sector, I would oppose its creation.

Today, it is public financing which is lacking. It should be possible to finance public projects without having to pay the cost four or five times over; in other words, we shall always have credit restrictions, and be unable to balance things, an inacceptable condition in a country like Canada, which should be the richest in the world, but where some people are still literally dying of malnutrition; all that can be attributed to our financial system as it is today.

Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill and I shall continue to do so.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, while reading the bill to incorporate the bank of western Canada and realizing that it comes from the Senate, I cannot but think that the Senate members refused to pass another bill that was requested by all the citizens from a certain province. They bluntly refused, without giving any explanation.

And they expect to bring before the House of Commons an entirely private bill, a bill coming from individuals who request that a bank be added to the eight chartered banks that we already have in Canada.

I do not know whether it is due to the age of the senators, whom I respect, but things have turned topsy-turvy when you begin by refusing what close to two million people ask for and then grant a special favour—because a chartered bank is a special favour—to people like Mr. Coyne and all those whose names are listed here.

Perhaps we will be accused of being against chartered banks. But we are in favour of doing justice to the majority of the people. Now, if the House of Commons were to grant a charter to another bank, I say and I maintain that it should first favour the majority of the population, by complying with a request made by a whole province, before complying with the request of two or three individuals.

We will no doubt be told that several names appear on the list, but we know too well now what a chartered bank is to be fooled by this list of names.

Mr. Speaker, I am not against chartered banks, inasmuch as they remain in their sector. But when they start encroaching on the public sector and especially when this government gives them, by a legal act, the right to accomplish what only a national bank should accomplish, we object.

We are not opposed to the banks themselves, but to the special powers and privileges given to them by former governments. I do not wish to pass judgment on those governments, but they were supposed to administer the business of the country in the interest of the people. Now, I can assure you that serious questions come to our mind concerning chartered banks.

Mr. Speaker, if we were to increase the present number of chartered banks, what would that change, as long as we maintain that monetary principle, that funny credit? Social Crediters are being accused of wanting to print funny money, but nobody realizes that as it is, we have the funniest monetary credit that ever existed.

Whether we have one, two, three, ten, 20 or 50 agencies issuing credit—I say issuing credit because everybody knows exactly now that the real specialty of chartered banks is to issue new credit—if we always maintain the same monetary system we have today, nothing much will be changed. We might get more competition between those who gamble on the taxpayer because I look at what banks are doing today and I consider them much more as economy gambling houses than as serious accounting institutions whose purpose would be to work in the interests of every citizen.

Besides we cannot blame them for it, because they are private institutions acting for private interests.

But the error of the government is to try to have them play a public part. Precisely, that part should be played by the Bank of Canada. Principles were distorted at that stage by not teaching people what is a real monetary system, because after all a real monetary system, sensibly established, is simply a bookkeeping system.

Today, we of the Social Credit say that this bookkeeping system must be kept by the Bank of Canada and must be nationalized.

If there is one thing that should be national, it is the economic life blood of a nation: its monetary system.

Today they talk about nationalizing everything in the province of Quebec as in other provinces; they nationalize power, they want to nationalize paper mills. It is ridiculous. It is like trying to catch a bear by the tail.

Ministers know it; they cannot speak because undoubtedly their hands are tied, but if they were really sincere and if they worked really for the people and the taxpayer, they would come here to parliament, Mr. Speaker, and they would take steps to free our national economy from all those private financiers who have been fully empowered to empty the taxpayer's pockets.

And if there is one thing that ought to be nationalized by the government, it is surely the monetary system. What do they do today? They say: we have monetary control—because they read in bulky papers from famous economists that when a country loses 65 per cent of its monetary control, it is bankrupt.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Well, do you know that we, in Canada, only control 10 per cent of our monetary system? I am wondering if we are not bankrupt three times over because we have lost control of our monetary system at the hands of financiers to whom full powers have been given to control our chartered banks.

We have lost control of over 90 per cent of our credit. In fact, what do we control today? Only the issue of paper money. We control only legal tender, and this control is relatively new, since it dates back to 1934 or thereabouts. Before that—the young people might not remember, but the older people will—each one of the 12 chartered banks in Canada printed its own money. That is why on each bank note appeared the name of the issuing bank—for instance, the provincial bank, the Bank of Montreal, or the names of one of the different banks existing at the time.

On what was the issue of such money based at the time? Each bank had to have in its vaults a gold value equal to the value of the paper money it printed.

You may ask me: What happened that the whole system had to be changed? Well, it happened that they realized that paper money poured from one bank to the other in such quantity that there were monetary surpluses. They realized that there was no more gold in some banks to guarantee the paper money they were issuing.

So the King government, I believe, withdrew from the chartered banks the authorization to print paper money, and ordered that in future only the Bank of Canada would be entitled to issue paper money. And chartered banks were told: if you want paper money, you only have to buy some from the Bank of Canada. And it is still the way it is being done today.

The Bank of Canada has a 100 per cent control over paper money. Should a chartered bank need additional paper money, all it has to do is go to the Bank of Canada and buy the paper money it needs. I am saying this because as far as legal tender is concerned, the chartered bank is playing what is really its part.

The chartered bank is an institution dealing with money; it does not create money. Chartered banks are essential to the over-all economy of this country, but only as far as they play their part, which consists in money dealings. When they use their customers' deposits to make loans, everything is right. If they do not have enough, they buy some from the central bank in order to lend it at low interest rates. Such is the part chartered banks must play.

As long as chartered banks will not resume playing their proper part, Canada will get more and more into debt, because as long as Canada will only control part of its money supply, which is the legal currency, and will allow the monetary credit, that is, the balance of the money supply, to be controlled, as long as chartered banks will be allowed to issue or create this new monetary credit out of nothing, as long as this government will allow private enterprise to create the assets of the country and to lend it again to the country, I say that a tremendous theft is being committed and parliament is responsible for it before the country. In my opinion, this is a wrong that must be righted.

If in order to correct the legal monetary system the government of that time had to resort to drastic measures to gain a 100 per cent control over its legal currency, if it had to temporarily prohibit all banks and impose new conditions on them, I say that the remedy which was good at that time for the legal currency is good today for monetary credit.

Before 1934 we had lost control of legal currency; today we have lost control of monetary credit. Control of our credit must be regained. Such is the remedy; the means used to regain control of legal currency should be used again.

Then any new credit created in Canada will really be for Canada. For instance, if next year Canada has a capital gain, a net revenue, a surplus, or is richer by more than $10 billion, the amount should be credited to the Bank of Canada, which is the people's bank, the bank of each and every citizen. If instead of giving those $10 billion back to chartered banks so that they may circulate it, they were credited to the Bank of Canada to be used for the welfare of Canadian citizens, I can tell you that in four or five years from now, we would no longer hear about the debt system that we have today.

Suppose that next year we have a capital gain of $10 billion. With that amount, I think we could start by "paying our way", cover our budget expenditures and still have a balance of $3 billion.

But what is being done today to help the average citizen who had the heart to work day and night for the further development of the country, even with the help of machines and science?

What do we do in point of fact? We say to international financial organizations: Get hold of this production, get hold of the country's net assets and lend it back to the citizens, school boards, municipalities, provinces and even the federal government, while the next day we are being taxed to fully cover budget expenditures, deductions being made from our cheques, while all the revenues of the country are going directly into the hands of international financiers.

Such is our economic situation; such are the results of those special privileges granted to the chartered banks. Those banks are private establishments which have been given the extensive powers of public enterprise. They have been given all the powers the government has for extending new credit. And today there is but one solution: to get into debt.

As my friend was saying a while ago, there was once a fellow who had won $3,000. Overjoyed, he ran to this neighbour and told him: "Here, take this money. I can't look after it, it's too complicated. Tomorrow, I'll come and borrow it from you, with interest." That is exactly what is happening with the chartered banks. We can get out of this impasse if we stop saying we have to get into debt.

If we have to get into debt, it is because we live under a crazy system. That is the only reason why people get into debt. Do not think for a second that Canada is not rich enough to feed a mere 19 million inhabitants.

I am convinced that if our economy were truly strong, our fellow citizens could get what is rightly theirs. For that to happen, however, Canada would need to have its own bookkeeping system.

In short, the only way to achieve that end would be for the Bank of Canada to have full control over such bookkeeping.

As long as chartered banks are not forced to operate on a 100 per cent liquid basis, all other reforms will be useless. That is what we want and that is what the government must require—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Text]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there could be a better example of putting the cart before the horse than the introduction of this bill into the house at this time. The house is charged with the responsibility of taking action on the report of the royal commission on banking, as well as revising the Bank Act next year. Yet at the same time we find the government bringing forward measures which would allow the establishment of, not one, not two but possibly three new banking institutions in this country. Before any action is taken by the house with regard to the establishment of new banking institutions, surely we should have some appreciation of what the government intends to do about the report of the royal commission on banking, and what it intends to do in respect of the revision of the Bank Act next year.

I do not believe it is fair at this time to ask members to approve or disapprove of the establishment of one, two or three new banking institutions when we are not fully cognizant of what the government intends to do with regard to the Bank Act. At the same time, it is my personal opinion that we have no great need for the establishment of new banking institutions in this country. Indeed in recent years we have witnessed the merging of various substantial banking institutions with other banking institutions. I am not referring to banking institutions that have been in existence for one or two years, but those that have been in existence for a great number of years and have a broadly based business in this country. Yet these institutions felt it was necessary to amalgamate with other institutions in order to get a still broader base so that they could compete in a satisfactory manner for the banking business of this country. With this point of view in mind, I feel we should take a very long look at these bills before we allow further institutions of this nature to be established in this country.

Now, it seems to me that the government did not want to face this issue, that it did not want to make any specific decision as to whether or not there was a need for more banking institutions. The government has allowed a large number of people to spend a great deal of money in endeavouring to establish new institutions of this nature in Canada. The government is now in the unfortunate and unfavourable position of having to make a decision which they would rather not make. It would appear to me that we will meet with no success during this session in attempting to pass any of these bills. For this reason, and for the very obvious reason that the Bank Act has to be revised, I feel it would be much wiser if these bills were withdrawn until such time as we, as members of this house, know exactly what the government's intentions are with regard to the Bank Act.

There is a further problem here and it is a very important one; it is one that will weigh heavily upon the mind of each member as he considers this matter. As I pointed out, we have seen banking institutions amalgamating in this country on numerous occasions in the past few years. It would be a most unfortunate thing if we were to approve the establishment of these banks, then find out within a year or two that their boards of directors decided they should amalgamate with some other bank that is presently in existence and has available a broad base of branches across this nation which are providing a service the people need and like. As a result of this we would find a few people reaping huge benefits in the way of profits because we, as members of parliament, had approved the establishment of these institutions before we were fully cognizant of all the facts related to them.

This is the type of decision that I am sure members would just as soon not be saddled with. Certainly I am in that position. I have not learned that there is any lack of availability of credit through the existing banking institutions. As a matter of fact it has always been my opinion that we probably have the best banking system in the world. We have a system which provides service through branches to communities which, under any other type of system, could not look forward to having a branch bank in their community. This has resulted, in the main, from the fact that we have had a small number of banks with a large number of branches which have been in a position to build up this type of support right across the nation, and the type of financial backing that allowed them to suffer losses in some areas because of the benefits they were able to derive from other areas.

We have a sound system. I would not like to think we would do anything to damage this banking system in any way. At the same time if it is proven to me that we have no fear from the establishment of a new banking institution in this country, that it will provide benefits that are not available now to the Canadian people, that the competition would be of benefit to everyone concerned, then certainly I would be quite willing to give my approval to the establishment of a new bank. However, I feel there are a lot of questions to be answered and that we should not be establishing new banking institutions on an ad hoc basis. I feel this question should be part of the government's revision of the Bank Act, in association with the royal commission report on banking. Until this is presented to us by the government of the day I do not believe we, as a parliament, should be charged with making a decision on the bill before us, or on the other two bills which I believe are ready to come before us.

Before another private members' hour comes up, Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will give some thought to this problem so that we will not spend another hour on this bill. We should know the long range plans of the government in relation to the Bank Act in general before this bill is considered further.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hour appointed for private members' business has expired.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion by Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Churchill.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I had a few minutes start before private members' hour, but I think it would do no harm to remind the house that the gist of my remarks is simply that the government is going about this flag resolution in the wrong way, that there now seems to be stiffening of attitude, that there does not seem to be any desire to meet half way, and this in face of the fact that there is no explanation why the government should give the matter such haste and urgency, and that no one has been able to explain to the house or to the people of Canada why a flag design must be rammed through.

I do not want to be just negative. It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution, or these resolutions, really, should be turned over to a committee of the house. I do not agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) that 15 members would do; I think it should be a good sized committee. Most of our committees consist of 60 members. Many of them have difficulty getting a quorum, and I can only imagine the difficulty of the task imposed on just 15 trying to be there all the time, especially when some seem to be so desirous of speed, as we have seen evidence to that effect.

It is my purpose this evening to point out to the house, in perhaps a more emphatic manner than I did before, the results already observable in the country because of the Prime Minister's determination to force a choice of a flag down the throats of the people of Canada. I say the situation is getting worse because the government persists, even though there is plenty of evidence to show that aside from having a majority of the people of Canada in favour of the flag there is much evidence to indicate that a majority are against it.

The hon. member for Red Deer mentioned the low repute into which parliament is falling. I can only repeat the words of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), who said it so well, that this is the government's doing. It is the government which has the responsibility of bringing on business. It is the government that wanted to introduce this flag. It is the government which has so many pieces of legislation on the order paper, and it is entirely in the government's hands whether it wants to proceed with those measures which will cure some of the ills of the country or proceed with this one measure which it thinks will be such a political gimmick and palliative to many who are in economic difficulty. The effect on the country is simply that, and I suspect partly it is because the government is so slow in doing anything for the province of Quebec.

The previous government was berated by some of our members from eastern Canada, Ontario and Quebec, because they had felt that the western farmer had been given too much attention, that too much had been done for him and not enough for the other farmers. There is much evidence to show that the small Quebec farmer is in almost desperate straits. He needs the type of action which the former government gave. He is looking to the present government for that type of action. I would think part of the difficulty here is that everybody across Canada, especially in the west of Canada, knows so well that what this government is doing is substituting politics for government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: —asking the people to accept a banner instead of the concrete action that they have waited for so long.

As I think I mentioned previously, a parallel situation would have been the awful plight the western farmers would have met in the last three years by asking them to put a sheaf of wheat on the red ensign, and wave that to show how much the government thought of the farmers. That is what this government is doing to the Quebec farmer.

I suggest that trying to convince the people of Quebec that, because we are holding up this flag debate we are stopping all necessary legislation, is a lie so big it can only be credited to that party which has the greatest success in selling lies to the country, the Liberal party. I want to assure the house that I have had no part in trying to lend any fuel to divisive thought in the country. In my last speech I only mentioned part of a couple of letters, but I do feel my duty to the house is to represent as fully and completely as I can the type of feelings which, as I say, are the result of the way in which the government is now proceeding, and to ask the government again to reconsider.

I had mentioned the first paragraph of an article on page 4 of the Edmonton Journal. Now I am going to read a considerable part of it because I am sure many members of the house will be shocked at its tone, will be surprised at its vehemence. I know through private conversation with some of my Canadian friends of French origin that they found it almost incredible, but they finally had to accept that such is the result of the way in which the government is trying to foist this flag on Canada.

I feel the house should be subjected to the reading of this, in order to give it a little second thought on how we are proceeding. With the permission of the house I shall reread the first paragraph:

> I suggest that the "blackmailed" Liberal government of Mr. L. B. Pearson has done more to dissolve confederation than any group could have done had it deliberately set out to accomplish this fact.
> In their bid to buy the 75 Quebec seats, the Liberals dropped Canadian politics to a new low by appealing to the nationalistic spirit of the French.
> Irresponsible and unconstitutional promises bought them a Quebec majority at the expense of Canada. Cowering to pressure from Quebec has won the Liberals the support of French speaking M.P.'s regardless of political affiliation.
> Liberal strategists who formulate policy might well have provided their minions with calling cards with the legend "Have tails, will grovel."

[Mr. Nugent.]

I think the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) mentioned that paragraph the other night. While I believe I should put this on the record because I think it is so scandalous, I hasten to assure the house that these are not my feelings, but the only way in which I am sure the Edmonton Journal could be persuaded to print this kind of article at all is because that newspaper is aware that this sort of feeling is being expressed more and more in the country.

I would remind the house of the Prime Minister's words when he said that what a flag should do is unify the country, and that it should be a unifying banner. I wish the Prime Minister had explained to the house how his unifying banner is going to patch up all this. To continue this article:

> The Liberal government has opened a Canadian Pandora's box which it cannot close. We have the spectacle of a federal government that is controlled by Quebec.

Certainly, that reflects a feeling in this country as a result of the actions of a government which, without explanation and contrary to all common sense, contrary to the feeling of parliament and in place of other methods such as trying to get co-operation from other parties, has attempted to ram this decision through. This is bound to give rise to some suspicion, when one considers the predominant number of Quebec ministers in the cabinet, that the Prime Minister has his hands tied—that this resolution must go through, no matter what happens.

French Canadians to a great extent feel strongly that we should have a new flag. This feeling is common knowledge. In the absence of any explanation from the government these circumstances are bound to lead to a feeling that the Prime Minister has had his nose twisted by the Quebec ministers. I suggest that whether this be true or false, and no matter how anxious these people are to have their flag design go through, no responsible prime minister could see such a feeling grow, or observe the divisive effects of this feeling across the country and not realize that its actions are doing more to divide Canada than any flag could unify it.

I am paying particular attention to this article in the Edmonton Journal because it appeared in a paper which has usually supported the Liberals at election time and which has not been too kind to Conservatives in connection with the flag debate. I suggest, again, that it must have some meaning or this newspaper would not have given it such prominence. It continues:

> We have a federal government that intends to force the rest of Canada to accept changes in the B.N.A. Act that will make Canada a bilingual country and accordingly perpetuate the life of the Liberal government.
> There are those who would have us believe that Canada is a bilingual nation.
> We are not, nor was it the intention of the authors of the B.N.A. Act to make French a second language for Canadians.

The use of French in Canada has caused us all concern from time to time. We have seen its use greatly expanding. No parliament can compare with this one for the manner in which French speaking Canadians have insisted at every opportunity that French be given an equal place in this house. I would say, too, that there has been no resistance to this trend, except on occasions such as when a committee has been unable to provide a simultaneous translation system, when we felt that the French Canadians could all understand English, though the reverse was not true, and that in the interest of co-operation they might have shown a little less insistence. I can understand the feeling of our French Canadian members that any slackening of their demands would be taken as an indication of bad faith by their constituents. However, I feel they have a responsibility in this house now and then to lead public opinion and not be driven by it to unreasonable lengths. I suggest that more friends are won by reasonableness and compromise, by pointing out an unfairness, than by taking up the club and saying: We will have this, or else.

I know that despite what is said in this article and despite the expressions of opinion in some of the letters I get from my constituents, the ordinary Canadian in Alberta, in my area, would feel nothing but a sense of outrage if he felt that French speaking Canadians were being discriminated against. I would remind the house of something which took place not too long ago. When the railway committee made a fuss about the manner in which promotions were handled by the Canadian National Railways, the president of the railway said he would have an investigation conducted and the situation would be corrected. And he did. He brought in some new rules, and in the following year there was no trouble with the committee whatsoever. The lesson, therefore, is that there are certain areas in which there may be legitimate grievances, and when these grievances are brought forward reasonable men will listen to them and give effect to changes which will correct the position and do away with any feeling that people are not being treated fairly. People in western Canada can understand the desire of French Canadians for justice where they think it is being denied. This is in accordance with a theme I have often pursued in this house—the people must be heard; their voice must be listened to. It is in this light that I ask the house to consider the feelings of those who live in my area respecting the manner in which this flag question is being handled and the attempt which is made to ram it through without sufficient consideration for their point of view.

I have referred before in this house to the tendency in western Canada in depression days to blame the "Bay street boys". The flag is only a symbol of our country, after all. It is the health of the nation, the position of each citizen, no matter what his ethnic origin, that really matters. It is the duty of the government to pay heed to the economic well-being of the nation rather than to political propaganda associated with this issue.

Now I should like to continue reading a little further from this article. The heading is "Bilingual?"

> Section 133 of the B.N.A. Act clearly states that French is an official language in Canada only for the purpose of debates in parliament, the provincial legislature of Quebec, the official records of these governments, proceedings in the Supreme Court of Canada, Quebec provincial courts and the Exchequer Court of Canada.
> I say that the French language has no official or legal status in any other area of Canada.

May I say that my constituency contains only a small percentage of French speaking Canadians. Despite the fact that I get very few votes from these particular electors, I have some close friends among them. I have been here in parliament for six and a half years and I have never heard any voice raised by these people telling me they were afraid they would lose their language or their religion. I never heard any expression of opinion from any of them that they were being treated as inferior Canadians. I know they use the French language in their homes, and that their children speak it. I know they are brought up to be Catholics and I know they get along very well with their English speaking neighbours across the road. My fear is that it will be very much more difficult for them to do so, should the government persist in the kind of action it is now taking.

Why does the government try to divide Canada at this time? What is wrong with doing the normal business of parliament in this house? Why cannot we treat the flag resolution as any other resolution and debate it in this house in the same manner, with all members having the guts to stand up and speak their piece?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: Then send it to a committee, which can do its work in a worth-while and efficient manner and report back to the house in due course? Where are all those of so little faith in this house? I suggest that if the parliament of Canada is falling into disrepute with the people of this country, it is because of the calculated campaign in that regard by the Liberal government, which always feels that the way to perpetuate a Liberal government in power is to downgrade parliament so that legitimate criticism will receive little attention from the nation.

Where are those voices in the Liberal back benches that go home and make such a great pretence to their constituents that they are looking after their affairs? They have not the nerve to stand up in this house and refute those arguments which we say are legitimate criticisms of the manner in which this issue is being handled by the government. Why cannot members who feel strongly about the flag get up and tell us why? Why is there no voice from the province of Quebec that will interpret the feeling in that province to the rest of Canada, so there might be understanding? Where are these pseudo spokesmen from Quebec? Why are they afraid to get up and explain their stand?

The hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) had the effrontery the last time I was speaking to ask whether I have explained to my constituents what Quebeckers want. I pointed out to him that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) and other Quebec members in this house have not yet told us or explained what the people in that province want. Is it not time, Mr. Speaker, for those who want a symbol that is not wanted by most of Canada to explain to us the meaning of that symbol; to explain to us exactly what new type of Canadianism they think a new type of flag will signify? My constituents are reasonable people. If you have a reasonable argument, they have the right to hear it; and I want them to hear it. You show us some reason, and they will buy it. I say to the government they are not going to shove this flag down the throats of the people of Canada when the majority of the people do not want it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Nugent.]

Mr. Nugent: We are not going to abandon our duty to fight that kind of tactic and that particular flag. I would suggest that instead of just standing here talking, from now on there should be no estimates passed, no supply passed, no money granted this government until it decides that the voice of the people of this country shall be heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nugent: I am challenging my friends opposite to bring forward the reason; to get up in this house and debate this issue. I ask them to point out the fault in my reasoning, to explain to us and to the people of Canada the Prime Minister's method of handling this matter. Let those members from the province of Quebec who are most vehement and most concerned about it explain to the rest of Canada the injustice that must be corrected and how this new symbol will do it. The people of Canada are entitled to at least that much. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that I for one am getting just a little fed up with just delaying this matter. If the government does not want to get on with essential business, I for one want to grant that government no more money. It is not fit to carry on as a government of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nugent: You may all think I am on the wrong side in this matter and that if this were to result in an election I might be defeated. But I will tell you something. I will have been defeated as an honest man; and I wonder how many of those silent members over there could go home with the same feeling of honesty and patriotism.

I am not going to read the rest of this article, Mr. Speaker, but I want to remind the house that it is something I have read. This appears in the only daily newspaper in the northern part of Alberta. I say it was printed because a great deal more of that feeling has appeared—and that feeling has only come about in the last little while. I ask the government backbenchers over there, is that what you want to do to Canada? I am reporting to my constituents that this is a deliberate plot on the part of the Liberals to do just that to Canada. I hope there is an election soon and that I will get a Liberal opponent like one of those hon. gentlemen opposite to run against me, because on every public platform I would love to tell this story to my constituents.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, like previous speakers in this rather prolonged debate, I plan to place before the house a proposal with regard to which I hope all members will take an opportunity to express themselves. Before I do so I would like to express some views, a few of them personal and some of them partisan in the sense that I speak for my colleagues in the debate. The personal remarks really deal with my regrets over some of the overtones that have been brought in by some of my Conservative colleagues relating, for example, to French Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You are one to talk.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member from Alberta says, "You are one to talk". He is quite aware that I am not the most popular political figure in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Ormiston: Or anywhere else.

Mr. Monteith: Trying to make it up, eh?

Mr. Fisher: But the point is that I happen to be one of those who were prepared to vote for the new flag, and I am not one of those who consider it is any concession to Quebec or French Canada. I am sure I have the right as much as anyone else to say that. The second point I wanted to make is also a reaction to what I think has been an unnecessary wrapping of patriotism and chauvinism around the support of the red ensign. I have nothing against the flag, but I have heard so much about the red ensign waving in shot and shell and our soldiers dying and fighting for it. Maybe symbolically there is something in this; but I had a fair measure of experience in one war and I was certainly around the front a great deal, and I only remember seeing the red ensign in view in two places—one was on General Simonds' Staghound that he used to trundle his way around in, and the other was on a Canadian corps headquarters tent. I never saw it any other place.

I wanted to make this point because there seems to be an attempt to generate the opinion that our soldiers were in action with the red ensign fluttering, in a sense, as their national symbol. It seems that people who try to accentuate that point of view make a mistake about what was the character of recent wars. I would also like them to consider what the character of future wars may be, if they are thinking of a flag solely in terms of a military symbol around which to rally.

The other personal point I wanted to make has to do with the tendency of our Conservative colleagues who have dominated the debate in the sense of the number of contributions. This is very much a personal reaction and has nothing to do with the issue before us. I could have forgiven them a lot easier if in their speeches they had been less ready to pat themselves on the back for the quality of those speeches. It is a minor point but I wanted to put it to you.

Mr. Speaker, I should like now to turn to the more general points. We are now going to have a free vote.

Mr. Monteith: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to point out to my hon. friends that the Prime Minister made that clear in the form of a statement, which I think was a concession in this house, which we certainly took in our group as meaning there would be a free vote which would depend on our individual consciences. I think everyone here is aware that the sum of the consciences of our particular parliamentary group does not add up to the total of promised support. There are a number of our members who are prepared to support the red ensign while a number are prepared to support the new flag.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: No, I will not permit a question, Mr. Speaker. This willingness to compromise is not something in which we have any special righteousness. I do not believe, however, that the proposals which were put forward by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), in connection with the design, and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in connection with parliamentary procedure, or by my leader in connection with arrangements for a house leaders' meeting, have been mere ploys in a partisan game, or represent anything underhanded or opportunistic from our own point of view in this particular issue.

Throughout the development of this issue from the fateful evening reception of the press—specially selected—by the Prime Minister, through his Winnipeg appearance, which I much regret, before the Legion; through the introduction of the resolutions; the early debate; its temporary hoisting; through the long summer; through the long and continuing interim supply debate, which prefaced this present debate, until we got into the four days a week continuity of debate, and throughout this whole business, until we are now debating very broadly a rather narrow subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill)—through all this we have been somewhat unwilling watchers of the confrontation between the government's determination to have a flag and the official opposition's determination to block it. I think a substantial majority of the official opposition is obdurate and wants or intends to block it.

We have heard the stories about 14 more amendments to follow. I do not know whether there is any substance in them or not, but I assume that my hon. friends in the opposition are determined, as evidenced by the remarks of the last speaker. Just today during the question period we were told that there was no change in the government's position. Just today the Prime Minister told us he knew nothing about any private negotiations between the major parties' representatives for a way out of this dilemma.

I am chary of saying I speak for the Canadian people or any portion of them in this debate, after hearing from my hon. friends, with a repetition which makes me despair, that they speak for thousands, and even millions. I am hesitant to talk about history, even though I have been a history teacher, after listening to some of the historical interpretations of my hon. friends, some of which have given me a different and unusual light on events back to and including the Norman conquest.

I am not anxious to dwell on the issues of parliamentary efficiency or filibuster, or whether this is just a noble sense of duty that is being displayed. I do not feel that I should go into that in any great detail; but I believe that one substantial body of opinion in this country has not been well represented by spokesmen in this debate. This opinion, at its most radical, is that we in parliament in this debate are making fools of the electors. This opinion, at its mildest, is querulous and confused over what is going on. Or, putting it simply, it demands: When are you going to get down to business; when are you going to tackle laws and spending items which mean something to me?

Get down to business; get on with it. Let me put a plea to the government and the official opposition. Your confrontation is not helping parliament. Your stubbornness is not helping the cause of the federal government at this particular time when we have burgeoning provincialism. This may not be so dramatic as saying, a plague on both your houses; but I certainly feel in respect of this particular issue, each side of this confrontation has egg on its face.

While we sit and listen and listen, and some talk, ostensibly to this subamendment on the voting procedure of a plebiscite, a lot of things are not being considered which we believe should be considered. Look at the order paper. Even the measure we most want, the Canada pension legislation outline, is not on it. There is only an expression of the intention of the government.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman will permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: No, Mr. Speaker, I will not permit a question.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on a point of order. What has the hon. member's remarks at this moment to do with the subamendment, or is he playing the Liberal game?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEwan: He is one of the kissing cousins and has finally come around.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked a very pertinent question on the point of order, but I point out to him that all hon. members have been allowed a great deal of leeway in their opening remarks. We are discussing the subamendment which refers to the conducting of a plebiscite, and whether or not certain methods should be used in announcing the result. However, in the subamendment you will notice the words "inter alia, in the interests of national unity". Aside from that, hon. members were invited as of last night to express their personal opinion. It does seem to me that during this type of debate an hon. member is entitled to honestly give his own opinions in this house, which is a forum and not a courtroom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to press the point of order at all. I understand Your Honour has made a ruling, but I wonder whether the hon. gentleman can tell us when this fine act of co-operation was developed, because I have noticed the Liberal members opposite seem ready for what the hon. member is about to announce.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the hon. gentleman is in for one big surprise.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We know what is coming.

Mr. MacEwan: We know what is going on.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say to you that we have a subamendment before us which in effect would put the suggested plebiscite on a national scale in such a way that there would be no local counting of votes. This may be very important, but I would prefer to see a consideration of legislation in respect of redistribution, a consideration of railway legislation, about which we have been talking for days, and consideration of crop insurance. I think we should be considering the Department of Forestry rather than this item.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that people who want to search for principles under which to stand should look at redistribution legislation, which in itself is a principle that we are denying by our inattention. When the prospect is before us that we will possibly be fighting an election on the basis of 1951, what greater sacrilege could be committed? What greater sacrilegious move could one make in the parliamentary process than by putting off or postponing legislation of the type I mentioned?

With all the talk we have heard, the time of parliament is fleeting and this session is moving toward an end. I suppose this parliament is moving toward an end. We are at an impasse. We are in a state of legislative paralysis. I do not want to overwork this word "sincerity", which people have been throwing around, but with some sincerity we have debated this whole question in respect of that which this country wishes us to do. We believe the country wants us to get about our business. If the opposition will not let us move the flag issue along to a vote; if it will not accept a compromise in the form of a committee and then a limited debate; if the government insists, as it does, that it cannot go any further in the way of concessions, then there is nothing much we can do to register our opinion that we should be looking after the business of this country that is before us on the order paper, or has been promised for the order paper, than to make the move I now make.

If we did this, at the very least it would put the spotlight on who among us want to tackle more substantial and I think less deflated matters. I want to make the point to you, Mr. Speaker, that the flag design put forward by the Prime Minister has generated no tremendous enthusiasm. I suppose that is a responsibility he bears, but in essence we have a force supporting something that goes back to hereditary emotions, and against it we have something that seems to be supported in a quite lukewarm fashion both by the government and to a degree by many people in this country.

I want to make it clear that we are prepared to vote and we would like to vote—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): For something lukewarm?

Mr. Fisher: —but obviously we are not going to get the opportunity to vote for some time. It seems that we have almost a negation of the parliamentary process. In this particular situation we have mulled over the problem and we have decided that there is at least one thing that we can do, and we are not doing it frivolously. If it does not work or have effect now we intend to repeat it and perhaps add further substance to it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), that this debate be now adjourned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I knew it. Nice co-operation. Heads were together over there.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the subamendment I think my first remarks should be directed through you to the hon. members across the way who tonight have shown that they have discernment and good taste, and that they really appreciate the remarks that have been made by members of the official opposition and others on this side of the house who have taken part in this debate so far. One of the remarkable things about what has happened tonight relates to the entrance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to take part in the vote, accompanied by many members of the cabinet who, as soon as the vote had taken place—a vote in which they indicated they wanted a continuation of this debate—immediately left the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member for Rosthern would not have wanted to make that remark had he realized that the Prime Minister was presiding as host at a dinner for the delegates to the commonwealth educational conference and that the ministers who came back for the division interrupted their dinner to come here to vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen feel that is the kind of exhibition they want to put on for our guests from other countries, I cannot share that view.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of Transport for the remarks he has made. Of course I agree that the Prime Minister has a responsibility to be where he is tonight, if the minister's remarks are according to the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to cast any reflection on the Minister of Transport—

An hon. Member: Oh, no?

Mr. Nasserden: —and I sincerely want to make that perfectly plain. If what he has said is so, I wonder why the members of the Prime Minister's party voted the way they did tonight. To me it indicates they have no legislation to bring before the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do hope the hon. member will not continue along that line, because his last few remarks were really out of order.

An hon. Member: They are true but they are out of order.

Mr. Nasserden: We have had a vote tonight that will be remembered in the history of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: Those who cry filibuster, those who cry obstruction, what was their cry tonight? They wanted more of the same. Speaking in the debate tonight the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) referred to those pieces of legislation for which the country is crying. What was the answer from members across the way? They want a continuation of a debate they have called futile, a debate they have called damaging to the image of parliament and to the welfare of the country. I do not want to say anything more along that line, except to note that they had some notable allies in the vote that took place tonight.

An hon. Member: Where were your Quebec members?

Mr. Nasserden: This debate has been one of the most dynamic in the six years that I have been a member of the House of Commons. I was never prouder to be a member of this party and to be associated with those on this side of the house than I was yesterday when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) placed upon the record some of the history of this country. He spoke as one who appreciates those things that are built into the traditions of a people, those things that went into the building not only of the part of the country with which he has been associated but also every part of this nation, as he put forward the case for the flag that throughout the world today is known as the Canadian flag.

Every morning when I have come to the parliament buildings while the commonwealth educational conference has been in session and have passed the front of the west block I have seen the flags of the commonwealth there, and I know in my heart as every Canadian knows that the Canadian red ensign is a distinctive flag not to be—

An hon. Member: Not to be.

Mr. Nasserden: —not to be mistaken for any other flag. Mr. Speaker, there are some across the way whom I would like to see on their feet giving the reasons why they believe Canadians should accept the three maple leaf flag. After all, we have not heard any arguments from the other side of the house indicating why the three maple leaf flag should be the flag of this country.

The other day the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) placed upon the record some proposals that he thought might be a solution to the impasse that now faces parliament, and to an even greater extent the Canadian people. I believe he spoke as one who had made a reasonable and forthright appraisal of the situation that exists in this nation today. I think he also showed he had an appreciation of the history involved in the building of this nation from the very earliest times. All of these things have contributed and are contributing to a developing situation in Canada from which I believe those who support the Prime Minister and his personal flag can take very little comfort.

I remember the words of the Prime Minister when he put the resolution before the House of Commons. If I understood his remarks correctly, he thought that this measure was necessary if we were to have an increased degree of unity in the country. I also recall the early days of the debate on the measure and remember those who said that perhaps it was already too late to bring forward such a measure. We have seen the transformation that has taken place across the nation. Many were prepared to support the new flag, many thought that perhaps there was some good in this measure, but every day we see the opposition to it increasing from one end of the nation to the other. That is one of the reasons we have the subamendment before the house at the present time.

Hon. members will recall that prior to the last general election campaign there were those who said they had the answers to the problems that confronted the nation. There were those who said that the prime minister of that day, now Leader of the Opposition, was unable to meet the challenge of the problems that faced the nation. An election was held and a minority government was elected. I want to place on the record at this point what they said when they were elected, as found in the Ottawa Citizen for April 18, 1963:

> Lester Pearson and his ministers will come to power equipped with sheaves of policy papers, priority lists and agendas which they expect will enable the quickest take-off of any new government in Canadian history. One Liberal backroom boy, flipping through a neatly bound and confidential Pearson program guide, commented, "No party ever came into office as well prepared to draft legislation and take executive action". The business of fining down broad party policy into programs which should be put into effect has been going on for years.

This was the situation when this government came into office. You will recall the legislation that was brought forward after 60 days of decision. You will recall the time that was wasted. Again tonight we have had an example of a government that is not prepared to meet parliament with legislation. I maintain, sir, that this is no longer a matter of simple determination when you take into consideration the question that this parliament is being asked to consider at the moment. It is no longer a matter of those things of which the Prime Minister spoke when he introduced this legislation. It is a matter of trying to salvage something out of national unity. This is the challenge that faces the Prime Minister and the government. I say this to the Prime Minister and to those around him: He never faced a greater challenge. He will never face a greater challenge in his career. The people of this country are watching and waiting to see if he is equal to that challenge. None of us is so faultless that he has never made a mistake. None of us is so faultless that he has not something in the past of which he is not altogether proud. On this occasion, although there may be an element of that kind facing the Prime Minister, surely in the name of national unity, for the welfare of this nation and the generations that will follow, this Prime Minister has the courage, the decisiveness necessary to make a decision that will bring this parliament back to active consideration of a legislative program that will give the people of this country the instruments of unity through the economic use of the resources this nation has.

There are those who say that a plebiscite is not the answer. I remember the plebiscite of those other days. I remember the way it was brought about. I remember too what followed that plebiscite. I remember the animosities and those other intangible questions that were left in the mind of one Canadian as he faced another Canadian. This is one of the reasons we have the subamendment before this house moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). We are trying to prevent that kind of thing from happening in Canada again. There is no one on the other side of the house who, in his heart, does not know that this is the course which should be followed in connection with a matter as important as the one before us now.

There are other aspects of this problem with which I should like to deal as well. In thinking of the whole problem of national unity, thinking of the problem of trying to decide what shall be the flag of this nation, I find myself confused by the action that has been taken by the government in proposing a two pronged resolution which promises the people of this nation two flags. Every one of us in this house knows that the union jack is the flag of Great Britain. There is no need to pass a resolution in this parliament to recognize Great Britain as the head of the commonwealth. I am a little shocked, and I am a little sad too, to think that he who is the Prime Minister of this country would try to introduce a measure of such shallow consequences before this parliament and before the Canadian people in an effort to try to justify one section of the proposal he has made.

The other day the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) brought up the matter of the amenities that should exist as between one province and another in deciding on a distinctive Canadian flag. I think he brought forcibly to our attention the fact that confederation means more than the simple terms embodied in that act. After all, there will always be an argumentative situation in this connection, but there are some things that belong to the provinces, while other fields belong to the federal government. In a matter of such importance as the flag, surely there should have been consultations with the provinces to secure their views before any design was placed before parliament.

I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) smiling. I do not believe that a minister representing the province of Quebec—

Mr. Deschatelets: No, no, on a point of order—

Mr. Nasserden: —should be smiling at this reference.

Mr. Deschatelets: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was not smiling; I was laughing.

Mr. Nasserden: Then, the greater is the shame that a minister representing a province containing a third of the population of this country, a province that has fought for provincial rights down through the years, a province that has held out for those things distinctive in its own life, should smile at a reference such as I made in regard to the amenities that should exist as between the provinces and the federal government.

Of course, when I think of the resolution now before us, the amendment and the sub-amendment, I think of my own riding which is one of the historic ridings of this country. It is a riding composed of people of many origins. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) upon the speech he made this afternoon. I must confess that it would be a poor Canadian, it would be a poor member of parliament indeed, who did not approach this subject with some measure of hesitation. After all, we all know that in a matter such as this there is a variety of opinion. There is a widespread division in this country. There is a widespread division between some of the ethnic groups. As I look at my one constituency, as I think of the correspondence I have received and as I recall the visit I made to my riding, I am moved to reinforce some of those things that have been said in this debate.

Five years ago, four years ago, three years ago, perhaps even two years ago, you did not find in western Canada what you find there today. You did not find any animosity toward the province of Quebec. I want to remind hon. members that during the period when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister some actions were taken that were not altogether of a non-controversial nature. I remember one of those—the adoption of bilingual cheques. There was not a murmur from any place in Canada when that action was taken, but what would have been the situation had there been the manoeuvring at that particular time of a government like the one we have opposite? They would have fed the fires of isolation, as they have always fed the fires of isolation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Moreau: Explain.

Mr. Nasserden: Somebody says "explain". I could talk here all night and explain, and you would not know any more than you know now. Some people have a closed mind when it comes to taking a look at the aspirations of Canadians in all parts of the nation.

I recall that when I first came to the House of Commons I was very conscious of the fact that the people from whom I descended had not been in Canada very long. My father came to Canada from Lebanon. My mother was born in Canada of Swedish parents, and I remember the community in which we lived and in which we were a minority—I would say a very minor minority. I can recall first going to school, and I think many other hon. members who were in the same situation can remember some of those experiences too. I believe I know something about what minorities in this country have faced over the years.

Later on, as the years rolled by, I became interested in politics. One could not help but become interested in politics in western Canada when we had a government here in Ottawa that for so many years neglected the problems of western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: You know, Mr. Speaker, they were so negligent that a socialist government was elected in our province for the first time and in the first place anywhere on the North American continent.

An hon. Member: In what year?

Mr. Nasserden: 1944. As I recall, the first campaign in which I took part, in 1953, was the first time I had a chance to become acquainted with some of the French speaking people in my riding, and I have 1,500 of them. I want to say they are among the best farmers and businessmen to be found in that riding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: When I go back to my riding, as I did a week ago, and find people of other origins pointing their fingers at them because of the actions taken by this government, I know someone has not been working for national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: That situation did not exist five, four, three, even two years ago.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Six months ago.

Mr. Nasserden: Well, I think that we could go a little further back than that because, after all, there have been other actions that have been the most divisive in the entire history of this country.

I recall the remarks made in this debate by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), and it was he who referred to a troublesome minority. It was he who referred to appeasement—and these are not words for a minister of the crown. But what do concern me at the moment are the actions of some of those on the treasury benches opposite. I wish they were here tonight so that they might hear what I have to say, although I know that they know all about these things, having been responsible for the clippings I want to refer to very briefly.

I do so, sir, not to try to stray away from this subject but to try to keep to the theme of national unity, the influence that a flag can have, the necessity today of taking the action proposed by this party of having a plebiscite because the actions taken by the Prime Minister have ruled out any other possibility, unless he still has in the back of his mind the sending of this measure to a committee of the house for consideration.

Here in Canada we expect leadership from those who are given responsibility. There are no officers of the house who are given more responsibility than those who sit behind the Prime Minister on the cabinet benches. Now I want to refer to a quotation from the Winnipeg Tribune of April 4. This is what one cabinet minister has been going around the country saying:

If Quebec leaves confederation western Canada will be forced to its knees, begging for help and aid from Washington—

This is a quotation from a cabinet minister, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet).

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Nasserden: Then he went on to say this:

He warned his audience if the present situation between Quebec and the rest of Canada is allowed to continue, confederation will be dissolved.

Where did this talk of separation start? It started right in the cabinet opposite. Then he went on to say this:

If Quebec secedes, confederation as we know it will be gone. Western Canada will be on its knees, begging at Washington's doors.

He went on to say this:

We may wake up and find ourselves too late.

I want to direct these remarks to the attention of hon. members opposite, through you, sir, and particularly to those from the province of Quebec:

Mr. Teillet said the crisis Canada now finds itself in has been caused by a complete lack of understanding and communication between French and English speaking Canadians.

Sir, what party in Canadian history has always said that it was the only party that could communicate the hopes and aspirations of French Canada to the rest of the nation? There they sit, and they have their members from the province of Quebec, but in the words of one of their own ministers they have failed to communicate the hopes and aspirations of their people to this parliament and to Canadians from other parts of this nation. I ask you, sir, is this the kind of representation that the people of any area have to expect from those they send to parliament? For more than half a century, with the exception of a few years, la belle province has sent to the parliament of this nation those majorities that should have been compelling in persuasion, in understanding, in the translation of those problems dear to the hearts of their people, and yet only a few short weeks ago 16,000 farmers from the province of Quebec had to register their disgust with the agricultural policies of this country. Due to lack of action from hon. members opposite, they marched on the capital of their own province. Somebody said they do not get $10 an acre. We never got $10 an acre in western Canada. I remember a prime minister who told the people of Quebec: Elect us, and we will do for you what John Diefenbaker did for western Canada.

An hon. Member: Out of order.

Mr. Nasserden: If I am out of order it is because of the interruptions from across the way.

I recall that a delegation came down from western Canada. We did not give them all they asked but we tried to place legislation on the statute books the benefits of which they could share together with the rest of the farmers of this nation, and I am proud to see sitting in this place one who was responsible for this achievement to a greater degree than any other Canadian in recent history—the minister of agriculture of that day, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton).

National unity means not only symbols but the tangible things that touch the every day living of Canadians. There never was a government which came to office with so many answers, or a government which took so little action, as the present administration. Once again tonight hon. members opposite have shown by the way they have voted that they would prefer to listen to this debate than admit they have no legislation ready to bring before parliament.

Earlier, I quoted some observations by members of the cabinet. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) is not here tonight; I understand he has a reason for not being present. I believe he told us that he did not know what the people of Quebec wanted.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: That is what he said. Behind him he has supporters galore. Apparently they have not been able to reach the cabinet, either. I see the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Turner) in his place.

This is what he had to say on one occasion. He condemned what he termed—> —the "monopoly of information" and charged that the bureaucracy—"that mandarin class of faceless experts, protected by the cloak of anonymity of a government department, operating beyond the range of the people's control"—is fighting a running battle with members of parliament.

> "The M.P.", he said, "is losing that battle with the civil service."

I do not hear him denying he ever said that.

Mr. Turner: I did not realize the hon. member was so well read.

Mr. Nasserden: You do now.

An hon. Member: That was your contribution to this flag debate.

Mr. Nasserden: That quotation tells a tremendous story. It is the story of what is happening in this parliament today. Backbenchers are not doing their job, or else the Prime Minister would never have placed before us the measure which the country does not want and which many of his own supporters do not want. They say that we on this side are engaged in a filibuster. We are said to be obstructing. But you, Mr. Speaker, know that debate is the life of parliament. You know, too—

Mr. Choquette: Not debate—legislation.

An hon. Member: Bring it in then.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member had an opportunity tonight but he would not grasp it. His leader would not grasp it either. What I wanted to say was this—those interruptions almost got me off the track.

Mr. Turner: They almost got you on to it.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George revealed something which has been reiterated by backbenchers across the way on more than one occasion. In debate, when one is faced with a proposition which is not only threatening the unity of this nation but destroying it, what else can an opposition do but take a course such as we are following tonight? No one would say that a plebiscite is the first answer to this question. But no one would say, either, that the Canadian people should not be consulted now, in view of the division which has appeared in almost every part of this country. This is why I feel so strongly that we should give consideration to the subject matter of the subamendment and of the amendment.

Before I pass on to deal with other matters, I have some clippings here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: I know I have a few here tonight, but they do not amount to 132,000, the number received by the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) in regard to this proposition, as he told us in answer to a question. I have a telegram here from a zone rally of the Royal Canadian Legion as follows:

> Recent Legion zone rally respectfully urges continued support red ensign.

Here is another:

> The Royal Canadian Legion at its 20th biennial convention in Winnipeg overwhelmingly endorses the Canadian red ensign and asks your unqualified support of its stand.

I have another here from the Royal Canadian Legion, Saskatoon. This was sent to me during the period when Saskatoon was without a member:

> In view of the fact that at present there is no sitting member for the Saskatoon constituency the members of our branch request that you give your consideration to the following resolution—

Perhaps I should read the resolution. This is the way they put it:

> Resolved that we urge delay in the proposed legislation for the adoption of the new flag and propose retention of the red ensign as Canada's flag until more assurance is obtained that this legislation has the concern of the nation.

Is there a single member on the other side of the house who would argue that they have the consent of the nation when they put forward this resolution? They are a minority in a house of minorities. They received a minority of the votes in the last general election. They have completely reversed the stand taken by the order in council put forward by one of their own former prime ministers. When I read the debates of those days I find tremendous arguments which could be used against the adoption of a resolution such as they are now trying to put through the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I had not intended to take part in the debate at this point. However, we have passed a great many days on this single issue, and tonight we had a vote. For my part I voted against the motion that the debate be adjourned. Why did I do that?

An hon. Member: Tell us.

Mr. Langlois: I will tell you why. I do not know whether the Conservatives are getting a little fed up. I would just as soon see them with their tongues sticking out, if they expect to bring into the house a series of amendments. Let them bring in one amendment, with one flag proposition, and let us have the vote. I am willing to have a vote on it and we in this corner of the house have been taking this stand since the beginning.

Mr. Alkenbrack: You have been sitting on your hind end.

Mr. Langlois: I may have been, as one hon. member has said, sitting on my hind end. That may be perfectly true, but I still think that is more useful than what he is trying to do. This country and this house wants a flag; there is no doubt about that. We have now spent 20 days on the flag debate. If we did not want a flag, we would look pretty silly at the moment all across the country in every province. People are wondering what is wrong with this parliament. They ask "What are they trying to do? What are they trying to prove? They look like a bunch of school kids that has lost its teacher". You just cannot go around blaming the people, blaming this guy or that guy.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We will blame you now.

Mr. Langlois: But you can blame some Liberals and their past administration, and some Conservatives and their past administration. We have had these two parties sitting in this house as the government for practically a century. The mess we are now in has been built up by nobody else but them. We have heard a great deal about this flag debate, Mr. Speaker. People have been waiting a long time for this flag. But they do not want the flag brought in through disunity and misery; they do not want a flag that will tear this country apart. Right now this issue is tearing the country apart. Perhaps the leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is as much to blame for this as anybody else because he has been too much of a fancy skater; he has tried too much to save the goat and the cabbage at the same time. But perhaps the greatest separatist we have in this country right now sits on the front bench as Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in this house. When I hear the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Skoreyko: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Langlois: —say in this house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Edmonton East on a point of order.

[Mr. Langlois.]

Mr. Skoreyko: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the last remark of the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) should be withdrawn. That is a complete falsehood and should not be accepted by this house. I insist that it be withdrawn because it is an irresponsible statement.

Mr. Speaker: I understand perfectly the feelings of the hon. member for Edmonton East, but all hon. members have an opportunity to give an explanation or an answer, in subsequent debate, to a statement like that.

Mr. Smallwood: Nobody will pay any attention when they know where it came from.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, is the word used by the hon. member for Mégantic in reference to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) parliamentary?

Mr. Davis: Sure.

Mr. Speaker: These questions are, of course, not easy to answer. I would say that the word used was rude; but in my opinion it was not unparliamentary.

Mr. Skoreyko: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker. It was indeed very rude and shows the ignorance of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langlois: I know perfectly well that the word was rude, but the truth is often difficult to accept.

Mr. Bigg: It is a scurrilous lie.

Mr. Langlois: Just to prove my point, Mr. Speaker, when we hear a man such as the Leader of the Opposition, who is before the eyes of the people of this country just as much as the Prime Minister himself, go out in this country and say that the three maple leaf flag is a major concession to Quebec, I will not accept that statement; Quebec will not accept it, and Canada will not accept it, from the Leader of the Opposition or anybody else.

Mr. Skoreyko: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a statement to the effect that the Leader of the Opposition has said that the three maple leaf flag is a massive concession, or a concession, to Quebec. That is also a falsehood. Those words were never used by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: But they were used by his supporters.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A little earlier today I counselled one hon. member to stop referring to another hon. member in the house in his general argument. It is a matter of courtesy and custom that, while you may attack a political party, its politics, its activities and all the rest of it, one does not launch an attack on the leaders of particular parties. We are here to discuss general principles, and not personalities.

Mr. Langlois: I agree with you in that respect, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw the remark.

Mr. Langlois: It is not the personality or his integrity that I want to attack. I attack the man, as leader of a party and representing a philosophy, if they have one—

Mr. Smallwood: It isn't funny money, that's for sure.

Mr. Langlois: I am not attacking the man as a man, as the hon. member for Prince Albert in his personal life, or anything like that; that is certainly not my intention. I am attacking the man as the representative of the party and the spokesman for that party, normally.

Mr. Smallwood: Well, stay with the facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is now 10.30.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the order of business for tomorrow holds as announced?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 4, 1964

The house met at 10.30 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHOQUETTE—ACTION AGAINST C.B.C. BY MEMBER FOR YORK-HUMBER

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the duty I am about to perform is not altogether a pleasant one but, having heard on the air that the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) has actually brought an action against the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for having authorized the operation of a French speaking station in the city of Toronto, I feel compelled to rise on a question of privilege to say that action is due to narrow-mindedness and fanaticism.

Mr. Speaker, if such an antiquated mentality is allowed to persist in Canada—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of privilege?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: My point of privilege is that, as a Liberal, I am humiliated by such an action and that, as a French speaking member, I am shocked and disgusted by such an attitude.

That is why I want to protest.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

CONTINUATION OF PROGRAM OF SMALL POST OFFICE CONSTRUCTION

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on June 10, 1963 and again on October 14, 1963, the Minister of Labour informed the house that it was the government's intention to supplement the federal government winter construction program in order to create greater employment opportunities during the winter in designated areas. The supplementary construction program included a number of small post office buildings.

On April 15 of this year, in reply to a question, the Minister of Public Works stated that all the buildings originally scheduled under this special program had not been undertaken because of site problems and cost and staff limitations.

I should now like to inform the house that it is the intention of the government to continue the special program consisting of those locations in certain designated areas and areas of high winter unemployment that, while included in the original listings, it was not possible to complete during the last winter season. Approximately 185 locations will be involved as compared with 103 last year.

It must be appreciated, however, that although yesterday I passed the names on to my colleague the Minister of Public Works for construction, it will be subject to his being able to make satisfactory arrangements with respect to the acquisition of suitable sites and to obtain tenders reasonable in cost. One reason names are being forwarded at this time is to afford ample opportunity to acquire suitable sites well in advance of the winter season.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING POSITION TAKEN BY QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and has to do with the discussions that took place at the Charlottetown conference and certain questions which I asked yesterday and he answered. Has his attention been drawn to the fact that Hon. Ross Thatcher, the Liberal premier of the province of Saskatchewan, said in an interview:

> The premier of Quebec was certainly a long way off from the rest of us. If Quebec persists in its present course it will cause real trouble when the attorneys general meet to discuss the formula.

The report added:

> Mr. Thatcher said Premier Lesage apparently wanted to secure for Quebec additional fields which are currently federal responsibilities before the constitution was brought home. The Saskatchewan premier gave jurisdiction over Indians as one example.

Is there any foundation for these words of the premier of Saskatchewan, whose affinity to the Prime Minister, politically and otherwise, is so well known? I trust that the Prime Minister will be able to state categorically that there is no foundation for Mr. Thatcher's fears.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to comment on a press report of what the premier of a province is alleged to have said. So far as the report itself is concerned, it would not reflect my interpretation of what happened at Charlottetown.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there any foundation whatever for the statement that the province of Quebec is asking for the right to take over certain fields of federal jurisdiction as a basis upon which agreement will be made for repatriation of the constitution?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, there is no foundation for that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, in this connection, whether his attention has been called to the statement by Professor Bora Laskin, the well known constitutional expert, on the C.B.C. last night, when he described the Fulton formula as an unmitigated disaster. I wonder if the Prime Minister can assure the house that Professor Laskin and other constitutional experts will be consulted before any constitutional straitjacket is imposed on the people of Canada under the guise of repatriation?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I saw and listened to Professor Laskin on television last evening. I have also in the past had the advantage of reading articles by him on this subject and I know his views, as indeed, I think, many members of the house do. Without necessarily subscribing to those views, I think they are to be respected. If the attorneys general when they are meeting—they will also be familiar with his views—feel it will help them to have discussions with him, I am sure that will be quite in order.

POWER

NEW BRUNSWICK—POSSIBLE DELAY IN GRANT FOR MACTAQUAC DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister plan to request the Atlantic development board to withhold final approval of the $20 million grant to the province of New Brunswick toward the Mactaquac development, in view of the request by the premier of Newfoundland that no final action be taken on power in the Atlantic area until they are made fully aware of the final feasibility report on Hamilton falls, as reported in the September 3 edition of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would have to look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—OFFER OF ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING CROP FAILURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I have a follow-up question to that which the Prime Minister answered yesterday in connection with the request for food for India. I would like to ask the Prime Minister the same question that I put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs about a month ago, namely, has the Canadian government made any direct contact with the Indian high commissioner here in Ottawa to offer help?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are already offering help to India and, as I mentioned yesterday, ships with Canadian grain will be leaving for India during the current month. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is in contact with the Indian authorities on this and other matters.

Mr. Hamilton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the Prime Minister quite understands what I am getting at here. About a month ago, when the monsoons were late, the Americans stepped up their assistance, under public law 480, in shipments of wheat to India. Since that time a strike has occurred. These shipments to which the Prime Minister referred yesterday are the ordinary shipments under the extension of the Colombo plan. My question is, has there been a direct government to government approach to India, as distinct from the routine type of thing we are doing, to help in this particular emergency?

Mr. Pearson: We have discussed the current situation with the Indian authorities, and no request has been made by the Indian government for any special assistance in this situation.

CYPRUS—EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the term during which Canadian troops are to serve in Cyprus will soon expire, has there been any request for a further extension? If not, in the event of it being asked for, would the Canadian government be prepared to extend that term and also to finance the Canadian operation there in the event that the United Nations still faces financial difficulties?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been, to my knowledge, no such actual request made. The whole situation with regard to a possible extension of the period of service of the force in Cyprus, and the financing of the force if such an extension takes place, is now under consideration in New York by the secretary general. As soon as there is something to report on this matter I will be glad to make a statement to the house.

RECOGNITION OF CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY OVER ARCTIC ISLANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can the minister assure the house that the government of the United States recognizes Canada's title to all islands north of the mainland up to the north pole?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member thinks he is asking a rhetorical question. For some years now the present government and the previous governments have asserted our sovereignty over the islands extending northward from the meridians appropriate to Canada: on the west from the meridian which divides Alaska from the Yukon and on the east from the appropriate eastern meridian, with a sinuosity devised to provide for the existence of Greenland and thence extending to the north pole. Canada has not only asserted its sovereignty there but we are implementing our sovereignty in many places. I have never heard or seen that assertion called in question by any nation, let alone the United States of America.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a supplementary question. The minister did not quite answer my question. Can he assure the house that the government of the United States has formally recognized these Canadian claims?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROLE OF NAVY IN OVER-ALL DEFENCE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister proceeding with any policy decision on the role of the navy within an over-all Canadian defence plan? If so, will he withhold his decision until a report on the navy's role is received from the House of Commons special committee on defence policy?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the role of the navy in the over-all Canadian defence plan was set out in the white paper which was tabled in March. What we are considering at the present time is the method by which this role can best be implemented. I am sure the report of the committee will be received before most of the important decisions are reached.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask, what is the position of the House of Commons special committee, if decisions have already been reached?

Mr. Hellyer: Its terms of reference were set out in the resolution which set up the committee, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN FLAG

SUGGESTED MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS TO CONSIDER PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he inform the house whether he intends to accept yesterday's request to convene a meeting of party leaders immediately following Labour day, in order that further discussions may take place in regard to an alternative way of dealing with the flag issue, which has now become an urgent and critical national problem of concern to all Canadians?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already stated that if further meetings of this kind can be useful I would be very glad indeed to participate in them, but unless there is some change from the position adopted at the last meeting it is difficult to see what progress can be made. Nevertheless, I will be very glad to give consideration to the matter.

Mr. Thompson: A supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister not think it might be well to call such a meeting in order to find out whether such positions have reached the point where we could come to some agreement?

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ascertain, Mr. Speaker, whether there has in fact been any change in the attitude of any of those who attended the last meeting to ensure that a further meeting would be positive in character.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STEPS TO MEET PROPOSED ACTION BY MEMBER FOR YORK-HUMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Could he tell the house what steps are being taken by the C.B.C. to meet the legal action taken against the corporation by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) and if that legal action will cause the corporation to change its plans for the establishment of the proposed station in Toronto?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will try to obtain this information from the C.B.C.

[Text]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STUDY OF ECONOMIC INTERDEPENDENCE OF PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. Can the Prime Minister tell the house whether the committee which he announced in the early summer was investigating the economic interdependence of the provinces has completed its work and, if so, can he tell us when we might expect its report?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, it certainly has not completed its work. There is a starred question on the order paper which I will be answering the next time starred questions come up, and that will give some information as to what has been done.

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE LOCATION OF NEW AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry. Can he tell the house at this time where Peugeot and Renault industries coming from France will be situated in Canada? In which province?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Langlois: A supplementary question. Have negotiations gone far enough for the minister to give us the approximate locality in which either one will be situated?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Speaker. The choice of location will be made by the General Investment Corporation of the province of Quebec in the event that it is practicable to go ahead with the proposal.

Mr. Langlois: A further supplementary question. Did the federal government make any recommendations as to where they would prefer to have such companies situated?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, negotiations are still in progress, so I do not think it would be helpful either to the parties or to the country to discuss the matter any further.

Mr. Langlois: One last supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house approximately when he expects these negotiations to be completed?

Mr. Drury: Soon, I hope, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

FORT WILLIAM, ONT.—PROTEST RESPECTING SURVEILLANCE OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a protest from the postal employees in Fort William on the ground that his department has ordered construction of peepholes in washroom facilities in the new building in the city through which postal employees can be spied on?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received such a communication, and I think it has been replied to.

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder whether the minister can tell the house what was the nature of his reply.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will put his question on the order paper I will give the reply.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

LEVELS OF RADIOACTIVITY AMONG CANADIAN ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that Canada has the highest rate of radioactive fall-out in the world, and in view of the dangerously high levels of radioactive caesium 137 recently found in Alaskan Eskimos, has the government considered testing Canadian Eskimos for similar danger?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the radiation protection division of our department has been making a special study of the problem in Canadian Eskimos in co-operation with the northern health services of the department and with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. We published preliminary reports in the October, 1963 and April, 1964 issues of our monthly publication "Data From Radiation Protection Programs". These reports include data on caesium 137 content of samples of caribou and reindeer meat and of urine samples obtained from residents in the north whose diet contains appreciable quantities of caribou meat.

This data indicates that ceasium 137 levels are higher for persons who eat caribou meat than for the general population. However, preliminary estimates of the total amount of caesium 137 in the bodies of these people, based on the amounts measured in the urine specimens, lead to the conclusion that in general the maximum permissible body burden of caesium 137 has not been reached. The highest levels noted are slightly below the amount recognized as permissible for continuous lifetime exposure. Levels are expected, I am very pleased to be able to say, to show a gradual decrease provided, of course, that nuclear testing is not resumed.

BROADCASTING

APPROVAL OF TRANSFER OF WINDSOR RADIO STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest expressed in the house by the Leader of the Opposition and other members I want to ask the Secretary of State whether he has any information on the application that Mr. Frith has made to unload the radio station for which he was granted a licence last year.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reasons given by Mr. Frith I want to ask the Prime Minister whether Mr. Frith approached him to be relieved of his duties as one of the commissioners on the biculturalism and bilingualism probe?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

PORT STANLEY, ONT.—OPERATION OF COASTGUARD VESSEL "SPUME"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence and the absence of his parliamentary secretary perhaps the acting minister can take it as notice.

My question is based on information just received by letter this morning concerning the operation of the coastguard vessel Spume, at present moored at Port Stanley, Ontario, to serve the lake Erie district. Before this coastguard vessel can take part in any search or rescue work orders have to be received from the Trenton headquarters, which slows up rescue operations. Will the minister intercede to ascertain why Captain McLain cannot use his own good judgment as to the necessity of the Spume engaging in search and rescue operations, thereby speeding up the service with the possibility of saving lives?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLIDAYS FOR STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this question is supplementary to one asked yesterday by the hon. member for Royal addressed to the President of the Privy Council. The question yesterday inquired as to what arrangements were being made for members of the House of Commons staff to have holidays. The President of the Privy Council replied that this did not come directly under his responsibility. In view of the fact that the President of the Privy Council is an important member of the internal economy commission and also is chairman of treasury board, does he not at least share some responsibility for this matter, and does he not feel that something should be done about it at an early date?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hesitated to give any information yesterday because the responsibility does come under Your Honour, and for that reason I did not deal with the matter fully. I have no responsibility in this regard as a member of treasury board, but in my capacity as one of the commissioners of internal economy I do have knowledge of what is happening.

The whole matter of holidays for the house staff has been receiving very thorough consideration and I expect will be receiving more consideration in the immediate future. The matter has been receiving quite active consideration and will be up for decision as soon as a meeting can be arranged.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that this matter is receiving consideration by the body of which the minister is a member, will he take note of the fact that both in Ontario and in Canada there are laws requiring that there be annual holidays; and in view of the fact that many members of our staff have been working for over a year without holidays should not one or the other of these laws be observed?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I think the desire is to have better laws for our staff than are ordinarily applicable in either of the jurisdictions to which the hon. member has referred. However, the problem is not just as simple as the hon. member has stated it. It is a little more complicated. Parts of the staff have been receiving regular holidays in the usual way. There is no question so far as they are concerned. With regard to other parts of the staff, the nature of their duties is such that they are very closely related to the actual sessions of the House of Commons, and a problem arises since these employees were all hired on the basis that they would not have holidays while the house was in session.

The difficulty has arisen because of the fact that due to the situation this year the normal policy or practice no longer was practicable. The problem is to find a method that will fully and adequately provide for the situation bearing in mind the former practice and which will not result, of course, in a cutting off of the services necessary for the functioning of the house while it is in session. It is a rather complicated matter, but it is receiving very close attention.

Mr. Knowles: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the commissioners of internal economy not take note of the fact that sessions have become more or less year round and that in the view of hon. members our staff should not suffer from that fact?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, that is the whole reason why this question has arisen at all. It would never have arisen except for the sharp increase in the continuity and length of sessions. This is the whole point that requires attention.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister understand that we are referring to holidays with pay, not holidays at the employees' expense?

Mr. McIlraith: Quite. There is no confusion in that regard at all.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STEPS TO DEAL WITH F.L.Q.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice but in his understandable absence I will do so to the Prime Minister. Has he received a communication from the F.L.Q. regarding the homicide of Mr. Leslie McWilliams committed by that organization, according to this document? In view of the fact that this organization is openly threatening the law officers of our country and boastfully describes itself as an instrument for the attainment of freedom in Canada, as well as its claim that the alleged wrongdoers in the homicide are entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Geneva convention, would the Prime Minister consider making a full statement as to what action is being taken by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in association with other police officers to round up and stamp out once and for all a group which is placing in disrepute the administration of justice in our country by a course of violence and terror repugnant to the instincts, traditions and feelings of the people of Quebec, within which province this organization is operating?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not agree that the administration of justice in this country is being placed in disrepute by, to use the right hon. gentleman's phrase, "a course of violence" in the sense that there is any general violence of that kind which has brought the administration of justice into disrepute. So far as the specific question is concerned, I will be glad to take it into consideration and if it seems desirable for the Minister of Justice or myself to make a full statement it will be done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the Prime Minister received a letter containing the communiqué?

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry; I do not recall having received that letter, but I will be glad to look into the matter as soon as I get back to my office.

TRADE

COAL—POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN EXPORTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. I do this because of the statement made last night on television by a representative of the western Canadian coal industry to the effect that the industry was losing markets in Japan because of government red tape. I ask him if the industry has requested the assistance of his department in maintaining and expanding their portion of the coal market in Japan.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I imagine such an inquiry would more properly be directed to the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I shall be glad to inquire into it.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I have had complaints from my constituents regarding slow wheat deliveries to country elevators because of the lack of delivery quotas. When will the Minister of Trade and Commerce return to parliament so that he can be asked to take action on this pressing farm problem?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The Minister of Trade and Commerce, as my hon. friend no doubt knows, is out of the country on very important government business. He is attending a meeting of the commonwealth finance and economic ministers at Kuala Lumpur and the Japanese-Canadian ministerial meeting in Tokyo. As soon as the latter meeting is over, and I think it finishes today, he will be back in his place in the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

1. General administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates; the expenses of the International Labour Conferences; the promotion of labour-management co-operation; the promotion of a program for the employment of the older worker; the promotion of a program for combatting seasonal unemployment; the organization and use of workers for farming and related industries; and the manpower consultative service, $4,243,000.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, in introducing the estimates of the Department of Labour I do so against the background of the fact that about a month ago the committee of supply spent a full day discussing the activities of the Department of Labour, and in the following week I made a rather lengthy statement on the activities of the department, especially relating to those points that had been brought up by hon. members in the course of the discussion.

However, I should like to highlight in this statement a number of the activities in the Department of Labour which I trust will anticipate some of the questions that might be asked by hon. members of the committee, and contribute to a better understanding of the numerous and indeed increasing activities of the Department of Labour.

I should like to begin, Mr. Chairman, by saying a few things about the current employment situation. During the past year hon. members will be glad to learn that employment has shown a marked increase while unemployment has registered a noticeable deciine. Improvement in the employment situation was particularly marked during the first half of 1964. Manufacturing employment showed great strength, a larger than seasonal increase being recorded during recent months. Construction employment held up better than usual last winter, but more recently it has shown less buoyancy than last year. Government measures to stimulate house building activity during winter months have helped to reduce the incidents of seasonal unemployment.

Between September, 1963 and February, 1964, the seasonal high and low points for the year, the unemployment total increased by some 217,000. The average seasonal swing over this period during the past five years was 322,000, so we conclude that the seasonal impact of our special winter employment program has been in the vicinity of 100,000 jobs. While construction employment is currently at somewhat lower levels than last year, the prospects for the coming months are very good. Housing starts are once again running above last year after registering a decline in May following an unusually strong first quarter. Non-residential construction can be expected to show more buoyancy during the second half of this year.

Total employment in the second quarter of 1964 averaged 261,000 higher than in the corresponding period last year. This represents a gain of 4.1 per cent, which was a substantially greater rate of advance than in any recent year. Unemployment has remained at a relatively high level even though more new jobs were created during the past year than in any previous year, with the labour force increasing by some 217,000 between the second quarter of 1963 and the second quarter of 1964. The net decrease in unemployment over the year was about 45,000.

The rate of labour force growth was well above the long term average. A little over one third of the increase in the labour force over the past year was made up by the addition to the labour force of younger workers under the age of 25 years, while almost all the remainder of the increase in the growth of the labour force was made up of women between the ages of 25 and 44 years. The comparatively large number of young workers added to the labour force was the result in part of the population increase, but there were also changes, and significant changes, in the pattern of labour force participation amongst young people in the community.

Among the more encouraging developments of the past year was the improvement in manufacturing. In the second quarter of 1964 manufacturing employment averaged approximately 90,000 higher than the corresponding period in 1963, and almost all parts of manufacturing contributed to the advance in output and in employment during the past year. Thus far in 1964 the most marked improvement in employment has been in durable goods. The service producing industries have been expanding at an accelerated rate during the past year. During 1962 and the early part of 1963 they experienced a relatively slow rate of growth. Since the beginning of this year service employment has been running well above 100,000 higher than last year. The increase in numbers has been constantly in excess of 40,000.

Despite the impressive decrease in unemployment during the past year, Mr. Chairman, in many parts of the country it is still relatively high. In July the unemployment rates varied from 2.2 per cent on the prairies to 5.1 per cent in Quebec. The disparity was somewhat less marked than a year ago. In July, 1963 unemployment rates varied from 2.4 per cent on the prairies to 5.7 per cent in Quebec. Hon. members will be interested in noting the duration of the unemployment of those currently unemployed. Of the 265,000 unemployed in July, three quarters of the total were unemployed for three months or less. The remaining 60,000 had been seeking work for four months or more. This group accounted for a smaller proportion of the total than a year ago. The shortages of certain skilled and semi-skilled workers were becoming fairly widespread in Ontario and Quebec. During the second quarter tool and diemakers, machinists, welders, electricians and loggers were in very short supply in a number of areas. Engineers, draftsmen and miners were also reported to be in short supply in certain parts of Canada.

Turning now, Mr. Chairman, to our specific activities for the current fiscal year, the committee will be asked to provide $228,079,800 in the main estimates and $263,004 in supplementary estimates (A). Of this total of $228,342,804, and amount of $114,491,504 is required by the Department of Labour proper and $113,851,300 for the unemployment insurance commission. This represents a reduction of $105,786,850 from moneys totalling $334 million made available in the fiscal year 1963-64.

To account for this substantial decrease I should explain that in the main estimates for 1964-65 no provision has been made for the continuation during the coming winter of incentive programs to reduce seasonal employment, for which over $55 million was provided in the 1963-64 estimates. There is also a substantial reduction, approximately $62 million, in our anticipated need this year in meeting our commitments for training facilities under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act. This is offset somewhat by increased provision for the operating aspects of the training program. There is also an increase of over $8 million for the operations of the unemployment insurance commission.

At this point I should like to assure the committee that although no provision is being made in these main estimates for our winter works incentive program, it is the government's intention, as already announced, to continue it during the coming winter, and money provisions will be made in supplementary estimates at a later date.

As hon. members will have observed, one of the items in the supplementary estimates provides authority for the transfer of payments connected with the operation of the national employment service insurance commission to the Department of Labour, and for the transfer of the duties, powers and functions related to this service. This transfer, which was recommended by the Gill committee, has been widely endorsed by national employer and labour organizations, as well as by others.

Hon. members will note that provision of funds for the economics and research branch of the department is also included under the principal vote in the estimates, and I would like to say a word or two about the activities of this important branch of the Department of Labour. As the central federal agency for economic and social analyses and research in the labour field, this branch conducts on a continuing basis studies of employment and unemployment, skilled and professional manpower resources, wages and working conditions, union organization and collective bargaining. The results of these studies are made available not only to the federal government but also to labour and management, to international agencies and to the general public through the Labour Gazette and various regular and special reports issued by the branch.

I would like to mention a few of the branch's specific activities over the past year. Studies on seasonal unemployment were given further attention during the year. An important part of this work was concerned with assessing the effectiveness of the winter house building incentive program as a means of reducing seasonal unemployment.

The development of special manpower information continues to be an important aspect of the work of the economics and research branch. In co-operation with the dominion bureau of statistics, a study of multiple jobholding was completed during the year. The report sheds light on the magnitude of multiple jobholding or moonlighting, as it is frequently referred to, its regional concentration, the characteristics of multiple jobholders and their work patterns.

The continuing work of the branch in reviewing local labour market situations in all parts of Canada was helpful in designating the 35 development areas. The Department of Labour has the responsibility of designating areas that might qualify for special federal assistance under the area development program. The economics and research branch at present is engaged in a study which is aimed at evaluating the appropriateness of the present system of selecting areas.

The branch is continuing its studies of the manpower effects of technological change. Consideration is being given to concentrating research on major new technologies in the early stage of use in industry. Particular emphasis will continue to be given to occupational trends studies. In addition to the report published early this year which deals with occupational trends on a national basis, work is now proceeding on the changing occupational structure of specific industries.

May I now say a word on a subject which has been discussed frequently and at some length by hon. members during the current session of this parliament. I have myself referred at some length, during recent statements in the house, to the work of the board of trustees, and it may be that hon. members will wish to raise points that I can deal with later today. Hon. members will recall that the trustees submitted their first report, as required under the legislation passed last October, on March 9, 1964. Since this report was submitted the trustees have taken action with respect to the president of the S.I.U. Mr. H. C. Banks was removed from office and replaced by one of the members of the staff of the board of trustees.

The trustees have been able to develop a joint approach in bargaining which is now taking place between the employers representing the companies and each of the individual unions coming under the trusteeship.

The principal accomplishment of the trustees, to date, however, has been the removal of the harassment on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway which has plagued this water highway for many years. It is still too soon, of course, to say that all the problems besetting the maritime unions in Canada have been solved or removed, but I do feel the trustees have made a substantial beginning in this important task. The Department of Labour and other government agencies have endeavoured to co-operate with them fully in carrying out the difficult task they have been asked to undertake.

Hon. members know there has not been an opportunity for the full exercise of democratic rights on the part of many Canadian seamen in their union activities for some years. This was one of the main reasons for establishing the trusteeship, and is one of the basic objectives which the trustees have in mind. The trustees have initiated steps to ensure that proper procedures are developed for the election of officers in the S.I.U., which will be taking place over the next few months.

Steps are also being taken to encourage separate union organizations for officer personnel including engineers and other seamen as recommended in the Norris report. These proposed steps I understand have the support of the unions concerned and of the Canadian Labour Congress. Proposals have been made to reduce initiation and assessment fees in the S.I.U.

These are all important steps which the trustees have taken and which should help them to accomplish the over-all task which parliament has assigned to them. Later this session members of the House of Commons will have an opportunity to meet with the chairman of the board of trustees, and I am sure will be able to secure more detailed information which will be helpful to them in assessing the work of the board of trustees and in restoring democratic practices and democratic attitudes in the seafarers union. It is obvious that the development of democracy, after the kind of regime that has existed in this union for a long period of time, will not be an easy task and will not be undertaken overnight.

Later on today I would like to make a statement on the larger question of automation, if this would meet with the approval of the committee, but at this stage I wish to refer briefly to the new manpower consultative service which is also provided for in the first vote of the department. This service was set up this year to assess the implications of industrial change on manpower in industry, and develop measures to alleviate manpower dislocation attributable to technological change. It will administer the program of research incentives for investigations at the plant level into the manpower effects of technological change and will also administer the program of financial assistance for relocation of employees displaced by technological change. The director and three officers have been appointed, after cross-country competition. Two additional officers will be appointed as soon as suitable candidates are found.

The special services branch's main functions relate to the stimulation of winter employment. It is charged at the present time with the administration and the development of the municipal winter works incentive program; the winter house building incentive program; the supplementary federal government winter construction program. This branch also administers the federal-provincial farm labour program.

Some changes were introduced into the municipal winter works incentive program last year which were designed to further increase the program's effectiveness. The maximum federal incentive payment on municipal buildings was increased from $50,000 to $100,000 to encourage the inclusion of larger buildings under the program.

In respect of projects carried out in designated development areas and areas of high winter unemployment, the federal incentive payment was increased from 50 per cent to 60 per cent of direct payroll costs. The period of the program for 1963-64 was reduced from seven and one half months to the six month period November 1 to April 30, so as to concentrate more work in the actual winter months.

During the course of the 1963-64 program 7,320 applications for projects were accepted. These were submitted by 2,755 local authorities, including Indian bands. The total estimated expenditure on projects undertaken in 1963-64 is $282,000,000. The program this year provided an estimated 165,000 men with approximately 6,875,000 man days of work. The figures in 1962-63 were 146,000 men for 6,200,000 man days. The federal government's contribution to direct payroll costs for 1963-64 has been estimated at better than $52 million, while in the previous year the amount expended was approximately $31 million.

The winter house building incentive program was introduced during the winter of 1963-64 to increase winter employment in the house building industry. It provides, as hon. members know, for the direct payment of a $500 incentive to the first purchaser or owner-builder of a house substantially built during the period December 1, 1963 through March 31, 1964. As evidence of the success of the program, representations were made by the industry for an extension of the inspection date because of shortages which occurred due to the heavy demand on materials and skilled labour. The extension was granted to April 15, 1964.

Under the program 32,647 applications for the incentive payment were received. Of these approximately 3,400 were cancelled and 4,700 were rejected at first or final inspection because they did not meet the conditions of the program. This leaves approximately 24,529 active applications which covered 28,213 dwelling units. The total amount of incentive payments will be approximately $4 million.

This program was successful in creating additional employment for construction workers last winter. The program also created additional employment for workers in the manufacture, transportation and sale of building materials.

As announced in the house on June 23, both the municipal winter works incentive program will be continued next year. It may be possible for me later in the day to tell hon. members of certain changes we are contemplating with a view to increasing the effectiveness of both the municipal winter works program and the winter house building program for next season.

May I report to the committee on the experimental program for the employment of older workers. The older worker employment and training incentive program was initiated by the federal government on an experimental basis last winter. Under its provisions the Department of Labour pays 50 per cent of monthly wages or $75 per month, whichever is less, to employers hiring workers aged 45 and over who met certain conditions for new jobs in insurable employment. Payments are made for a total period not exceeding 12 months. It was recognized that breaking in a new employee, particularly one who had been unemployed for six months or more, could be costly to an employer. Therefore it appeared reasonable to share these costs with an employer until such time as the worker had become fully productive. Twelve months was considered to be an adequate period for this purpose.

The program resulted in some 1,948 older workers obtaining employment, all of whom had been unemployed for at least six of the previous nine months. The program has, in my judgment, been reasonably successful. It has led to the employment of approximately 2,000 older workers, and it will provide the Department of Labour with better insight into the whole problem of the employment of older workers. At the present time the department is continuing an evaluation of this particular program and I hope this evaluation, which we expect to be completed very soon, will allow us to plan future action on behalf of older workers. This obviously was an experimental program, and I hope it will continue to be possible in the department to take the risk of experimenting in providing opportunities for the employment of older Canadians.

May I say a word about federal assistance for technical and vocational training, which is having a substantial impact on the development of a skilled labour force. Since April 1, 1961, when the new technical and vocational training agreements with the provinces came into effect, Federal approval has been given to sharing in provincial expenditures for 572 projects to build and equip new schools and to make additions and alterations and provide equipment for existing schools. The estimated total cost of these projects was $583.4 million; the estimated federal contribution was $352.5 million; the projects will provide 159,417 new student places. Enrolments in all programs have increased. There has been a dramatic increase in the number of vocational high schools; technician training programs have enrolments to capacity, apprenticeship continues to increase, and training classes of unemployed have continued to increase in the face of much improved employment conditions.

Under agreements which provided for sharing at the rate of 75 per cent in capital expenditures incurred by the provinces before April 1, 1963 there was an initial year largely devoted to the planning of new facilities. The following year, 1962-63, was a period of incentive construction. By year's end the accumulated total of federal contributions toward buildings completed and equipment installed had reached $197.5 million. In 1963-64, as previously approved projects reached completion, the amount of capital assistance claimed by the provinces fell to about $102 million for the year. The December, 1963 amendments to the Technical and Vocation Training Assistance Act extended the period for sharing at the rate of 75 per cent in capital expenditures for most of the provinces, and the planning of additional facilities has been resumed.

In the current planning of training facilities and programs, considerably more attention is being paid to the training of adults. The new legislation provides increased incentives for the development of training programs, in co-operation with industry, for employed workers. These programs will provide the worker with the basic knowledge of mathematics, science and communications necessary for him to enter training for a skilled occupation. It is a fact that one of the obstacles facing certain classes of workers in acquiring needed skills is their lack of a basic knowledge of mathematics and science which would enable them to acquire the skills which would allow them to take on gainful employment. This training program covers industrial apprenticeships and programs for the retraining of employees who without such training would be displaced because of technological or other industrial changes.

Another program for adults which is receiving increased attention is the program for retraining the unemployed. Experience has demonstrated that the most effective way to permanently remove many of these workers from the ranks of the unemployed is to upgrade their basic education to the point where they can proceed to training for occupational skills, either in school classes or in industrial courses while employed. Though the severity of unemployment has lessened, the long run advantages of this type of training warrant the additional expenditures incurred to support it. Certainly the training programs that have been developed, and the capital expenditure program with which the hon. member for Ontario was associated, have had a very marked impact in upgrading the labour force in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, this concludes my remarks in introducing the estimates of my department. I do apologize to the committee for taking up some time in outlining the activities of the Department of Labour. Before I conclude I should like to anticipate a question that might be asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre especially, having to do with the matter of labour standards.

Mr. Knowles: It had better be good.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: As I indicated when the estimates of my department were discussed last year, the development of a comprehensive piece of legislation in the field of labour standards was a prime target or objective of the Department of Labour. In the speech from the throne this year we indicated that it is our intention at this session to introduce this legislation for the consideration of the house.

Mr. Orlikow: Where is the resolution?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been pressing for further information with respect to the precise date when this particular legislation will appear on the order paper. I am looking at the date today, Mr. Chairman, and I feel reasonably confident that this legislation will be on the order paper before the calendar turns to the month of October. Perhaps I will exceed my own expectations by having it on the order paper well before the calendar turns to October.

Mr. Knowles: What year?

Mr. MacEachen: Oh, 1964.

The Chairman: Order. I have to bring to the attention of the committee that the minister's time has expired. Is it agreed that the minister may go beyond his allotted time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: If he has any more promises to make, let him go on.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I wish to conclude my remarks by referring to the fact that this is a very appropriate occasion on which to discuss the estimates of the Department of Labour, because on Monday next all Canada will pause to pay tribute to the great contribution that the labouring people of Canada have made to the development of this country, and to the great role that organized labour has played in the development of ever increasing participation by the working people of Canada in the wealth and welfare of our country.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, in his opening remarks the Minister of Labour mentioned the fact that we have already devoted one day to the estimates of the Department of Labour, and he is quite right; one day was devoted to this subject when we discussed interim supply. However, one day may not be sufficient, in view of past experience with the estimates of this department and the fact that the Department of Labour has played such an important part in the economy of our country in recent years. Bearing in mind previous discussions of the estimates of this department, many more days have been taken up in dealing with these estimates than perhaps those of any other department which have been brought before the committee for their approval.

It seems rather strange, Mr. Chairman, that this appears to be a new approach by this government, namely that ministers warn the House of Commons and its members that they are prepared to bring in legislation provided the promise is made that there will be no debate or that there will be debate for only one or two days. This is a condition that always seems to be placed on any needed legislation being put before the house. Then, of course, the Minister of Labour, in a mild way, reminded us of the fact that we had already spent one day on the estimates of his department when we considered interim supply. In view of the fact that we have spent only one day dealing with this matter, I believe some hon. members will wish to express their opinions with respect to the many matters that are involved in these estimates, but I hope we may be able to pass them during today's discussion.

The Minister of Labour has repeated statements he has made on previous occasions, and has pointed out with some satisfaction that employment is up, unemployment is down and there is a marked improvement in this respect. I remember very well that beginning with the year 1961 that condition began to show itself, namely that employment was rising and unemployment was showing a marked decline. When I pointed this out with some satisfaction on a number of occasions in the House of Commons, those who now claim there is a marked improvement in this connection were very critical and spent many hours pointing up the fact that unemployment was a very serious problem. Of course it still is, Mr. Chairman; because how can anyone say with a straight face that there is a marked improvement in the employment situation in this country when there were only 28,000 fewer unemployed in July of this year than there were last year?

However, as I pointed out during the discussion on interim supply, this points up a very important aspect of the employment picture in this country, in that not sufficient jobs are being created to take care of the teen agers who are entering the labour force; because in this respect the figures show an increase—I might say a marked increase, to use the same words as the minister—over the same period last year. The Minister of Labour has not treated this as a serious matter, nor has he told us what is being done to create jobs for these teen agers who are entering our labour market.

The minister made reference to what he termed the special programs this government has introduced to deal with seasonal unemployment. Are they new programs he is talking about, Mr. Chairman? I ask this question because at the moment I can think of only one program that has met with success, and that is the winter-built homes program. Even here it remains to be seen whether success will be achieved this coming winter in the same way that the programs introduced by the previous administration in 1958, 1959 and 1961 met with success.

The other program mentioned by the Minister of Labour was the employment of older workers. It seems to me that if a program is not successful it is termed experimental. There seems to be a tendency to make statements that sound as though something is actually being done. I take as an example the Postmaster General's statement in a press release today. He said it is his intention, in co-operation with the Minister of Public Works, to help the winter unemployment situation by building a number of small post office buildings throughout Canada in designated areas. This is a program that was started back in the time this party was in office, and it met with a great deal of success. However, Mr. Chairman, an excuse is being offered in this release by saying that many of those buildings under the Post Office Department were not proceeded with because of site problems, cost and staff limitations. We also had the announcement today that some 185 locations were involved in the post office building program, subject to satisfactory arrangements being made with respect to the acquisition of suitable sites and to obtaining tenders reasonable in cost.

All this is very fine, but I would ask, in view of the failure during the past year to undertake any part of this program, whether this is only a fine sounding statement which is being put out, or will any actual developments take place as a result of the announcement. We must take things as they are presented to us and hope that some steps will be taken.

Mention has been made of the municipal winter works program, in which I realize the Minister of Labour takes great pride, as well he should. The municipal winter works program was not looked upon, when it was first introduced in 1958-59, as something which would be of a permanent character. As a matter of fact it was looked upon as something that would fail, as a puny effort. Yet it has been a successful program in that year after year there has been a marked increase in activity and a greater participation in the program on the part of the municipalities. It is a program that is here for many years to come.

We should like to know, with regard to the experimental program for the employment of older workers, what was the total cost of this experiment. I am not critical of this program in this respect, because we are all interested in the welfare of the older workers; certainly I have been interested in them in the past. I should like to know whether the cost is so great that the experiment is not worth while. I realize that the policing of the program must be a terrible headache, and whether it can be carried out successfully in view of the stringent regulations which are applied to it is something the Minister of Labour should tell us today during the discussion of his estimates.

The minister did not touch upon a number of matters about which I think we are entitled to know, particularly matters on which action has continually been promised. We would like to know what is the state of the unemployment insurance fund and whether this fund will be sufficiently strong to carry itself in the coming winter months, or whether more loans have to be made to bolster it. What has happened to the report of the Gill commission on which the government has been sitting for over a year and a half? The only action which has been taken is the announcement that the national employment service will be transferred to the jurisdiction of the labour department; and I understand that change is now in the process of being brought about. But what has happened to the rest of the report of the Gill commission? It is a report on which the present government said they would act immediately on assuming office. Where is the labour code? The Minister says he will have a resolution on the order paper before the calendar changes to October. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre queried that and wanted to know in what year. Time has dragged on and no action has been taken in this regard.

What about the promised legislation on hours of work? What about the promised legislation on minimum wages? What has been done about these matters? Nothing has been done to our knowledge. Certainly nothing has appeared on the order paper to show that the government wish to carry out the promises they have made. What about this most important subject now being discussed and which has been discussed for a number of years—a matter which has been looked at with some apprehension by those who may be affected—automation and technological change? We endeavoured to do something about it through the introduction of a bill in the House of Commons. We planned to call a conference between industry and labour to work out regulations and details respecting such a co-operative plan with the provinces. Today we hear that all that is being done is some research and study on the subject. Although that may be necessary, I venture the guess that research and study of this problem has been carried to the point where some action could now be taken by the department to see whether an alleviation of this problem could be brought about.

We made a start on labour-management co-operation with the setting up of the productivity council, and I think one of its most important achievements was in being able to bring about better understanding between management and labour for the first time in the history of this country. But with the elimination of the productivity council by the government nothing further has been heard about labour-management co-operation. The meetings which used to be held under the jurisdiction of the productivity council now seem to have been discontinued altogether, and we hear no more about the worth-while effort which was made at that time.

As far as the trusteeship on the great lakes is concerned I might say that no one—at least not I—has any intention of trying to upset or interfere in the affairs of those who work on the great lakes, because I think it is necessary to bring about some peace on the great lakes in order not to jeopardize our economy. However, I am not satisfied with the manner in which trustees have proceeded, and I am far from satisfied that they have brought about a solution, in the long run, to the problems on the great lakes. It seems to me that the trustees, who were appointed as a result of the recommendations made in the Norris report, have ignored the report completely. As a matter of fact, on reading the summary of the whole situation we find that Mr. Millard never even read the Norris report; he felt he could proceed on his own.

In my opinion the trusteeship was set up because of the Norris report; indeed, one of its main recommendations was the setting up of the trusteeship. It seems to me as though the trustees are trying during their term of office to create an atmosphere on the great lakes in which there will be no disturbance of Canadian ships in United States ports. That seems to me to be their main objective. And that they have done, by whatever methods they have used to arrive at an agreement with Mr. Paul Hall, the head of the S.I.U. in the United States. It seems obvious to me that some satisfactory arrangement was made to him, because we have had no harassment of Canadian ships in United States ports during this present season.

What is going to happen when the trustees, who seem to be anxious to get rid of the undertaking that parliament gave them, move out of the picture? Is the whole situation going to revert to what it was originally? I cannot see how the problem has been solved by the trustees in any way so far as the days ahead are concerned. We read that a democratic vote is to be held, but we also read with some apprehension that those who would oppose the present incumbent in office are being shifted around to get them out of the way so they cannot participate. The trustees only act when public opinion brings these matters to their attention. Then they endeavour to rectify the situation and do so, but some doubt is left in my mind with regard to whether the trustees are really on the job and actually know what is happening.

It is fine for the trustees to say that many of the people who were associated with the former president have now atoned for their sins, have gone through purgatory and are prepared to lead a new life.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have gone through a whitewash.

Mr. Starr: That is all to their credit, but certainly their actions with regard to the holding of a democratic vote on the great lakes would lead me to believe they have not spent enough time in purgatory. I am worried that the trustees are too anxious to finish the job and leave the situation in the same position it was when they came into the picture. I see no reason why this will not be so, because I can see no great changes in the situation. There has been a temporary lull only, and when the trustees move out I think the situation will revert to what it was previously.

With Labour day coming on Monday, when all of us pay tribute to those who have left their mark on the Canadian labour movement, I wish to add my words to those of the Minister of Labour and say how much we appreciate those men and women in the labour force who have dedicated their lives and energy to the betterment of conditions for those people engaged in the building of our country, those engaged in the labour movement and the protection of our democratic way of life.

It is with a great deal of regret that I refer to the passing of William Jenoves who was called "Mr. Labour" in the Toronto area and who played such a tremendous part in the labour movement in Canada. He passed away recently, and I understand his funeral will be held in Toronto on Tuesday. It is men such as Billy Jenoves who have worked unselfishly in the interests of the men and women of our labour force in years gone by and who have laid a firm foundation and created a truly good reputation for the labour people of this country. To such men we are thankful, because it is through their participation and co-operation that we are now able to enjoy the Canada that we have today.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, it would be easy for me to make a speech of the labour estimates simply by referring to last year's Hansard and looking at the speeches which members made then, because really nothing of any importance has been accomplished since the minister made his introductory remarks last year and members commented upon them in discussing the labour estimates.

It was good to hear the minister say today in his concluding remarks that he expected to bring in a resolution or bill dealing with a national labour code before the end of the month. It is good to hear this, but we in this group have been hearing such statements by other Liberal cabinet ministers ever since Mackenzie King made such a statement in a speech in 1919. It is probably just as well that the hon. member for Hamilton East is not here at the moment, in that I expect he would be on his feet interrupting me as he interrupted the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre last year, because he would construe my approach as a partisan one.

In recent years members of various parties including our own have presented private members' bills calling for the provision of fair wages, a maximum work week and holidays with pay. When the Liberal party were in opposition they supported us, of course, but now they say we do not need such legislation because the government is going to introduce a national labour code which will provide for all these things. I was glad to hear the minister say that it would at least be on the order paper before the end of the month. When the government will proceed with it is, of course, a very good question. I hope the minister will not be too surprised if I say I am from Missouri and am even a little sceptical about his promise it will be on the order paper this month.

So far as fair wages are concerned, I hope the code will provide a minimum of $1.25 an hour for all federal employees. In case the minister and other members of the house do not know it, I direct their attention to the fact that there are people working for the federal government who still do not receive that much an hour. The charwomen who clean the offices in this building are prevailing rate employees, and they are paid the munificient sum of 95 cents an hour. I wish the minister would not only bring in the new code but would also use his influence on his colleague, the President of the Privy Council, who apparently is in charge of this matter, to get him to undo the zipper on his heart and take some action for the benefit of these people. It is long overdue.

Surely it is also time something was done about establishing a maximum work week. Surely we do not have to wait for the new labour code to be introduced. The same applies to the provision of holidays with pay. Certainly we need a national labour code which will provide that everyone is entitled to holidays with pay after working for the greater part of the year, but do we need that kind of law before the government lives up to the spirit contained in such a law? Surely it is time every person working for the federal government should be protected in this way.

This includes the secretaries who work for members of parliament. They are human beings like everybody else, and are entitled to the same rights as everybody else. Since they have now been working for well over a year without holidays, surely they are entitled to holidays with pay now. I hope the rumours we have heard that treasury board has turned this down are false. If they are true, I hope treasury board will reconsider its recommendation and come forward with a favourable decision very quickly. I am sorry; I am wrong. It is the internal economy commission, and I hope they will reconsider this matter and come in with a favourable recommendation very quickly.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the matter of collective bargaining for government employees does not come directly or exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. However, I want to say that personally I am very disappointed that the Liberal party, having announced several years ago that it favoured the extension of collective bargaining to federal employees, has failed to implement that promise. I recognize some of the difficulties in implementing this kind of principle. I recognize that the organizations which represent the employees overlap, and that there are large problems of detail in implementing this promise. It would seem to me, however, that the difficulties could have been and should have been overcome by now. I hope it will not be too long before the promise made by the Liberal party that federal government employees would have the right to bargain collectively with regard to wages, salaries and working conditions, will be implemented.

If this promise had been implemented, as I think it should have been by now, we would not be faced with the present hassle with regard to the salary increases recently granted to group B employees. Here we have 65,000 employees working for the government and I am told that 10,000 of those, even after the latest increases have been approved, will still make less than $3,000 annually after they reach the maximum of the salary classification to which they belong. If you take into account all those who have not reached their maximum the figure of 10,000 would probably be doubled. This means that we have clerks, typists, office equipment operators, messengers and clerical assistants who are still making less than $60 per week. I wonder how those of us who are interested in the welfare of the ordinary citizen can believe these people are able to live on any decent standard. It seems to me obvious that something ought to be done now.

I do not know whether the rumours are true to the effect that the civil service commission recommended a substantially greater increase than the government finally approved. Nor do I know whether it is true that the President of the Privy Council was one of those who opposed the increase which the civil service commission recommended. I do know that if the government had implemented its promise that civil servants would have the right to bargain collectively, this kind of difficulty which we are now facing would have been overcome; because it would have been settled in the normal and proper way in which all employee problems should be settled, that is by collective bargaining.

I should like to say something very briefly Mr. Chairman, about the comments of the minister with regard to the unemployment situation, with regard to the programs which the federal government implemented for retraining and to deal with such problems as automation. I am not at all satisfied that we have licked the problem of unemployment. It is standard procedure for the old parties, when they are in opposition, to say that the rate of unemployment is too high; but when those parties become the government they say the situation is much better, that the number of unemployed is less than it was. Of course the number of unemployed is less than it was this time last year. However, the rate is still one which is of great concern, and it should be of great concern to all of us The rate at which unemployment is dropping has decreased very sharply in each month recently.

I should like to point out to the members of this committee that as respected and as conservative an economist as Dr. Firestone has predicted that unemployment will increase rather sharply in the next couple of years. I have heard nothing from the minister or from any other government spokesman which would indicate the government really has any plans for dealing with this basic problem. I think to a large extent the reduction in unemployment is an accident for which this government should not take any credit. The minister shakes his head. This is my opinion, and I feel that if we have a chance to discuss the problem in detail we can demonstrate this very clearly.

The minister referred in some detail to the programs the government has introduced to take care of retraining. Certainly we are doing more than we have done in other years, but I suggest to the minister and the government that the programs really only go a small way toward meeting the problem. It is not my intention to deal with this aspect in any detail today, but there have been some very disquieting reports in newspapers like the Toronto Star, which is not noted for its hostility to this government. These reports have referred to the large number of people who begin the training program but who drop out before their training period has been completed. They drop out because the amount of money they are given to help them maintain themselves and their families while they are taking this training is woefully inadequate. I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to arranging for the industrial relations committee to meet so we could discuss in detail these training programs which the government has begun or is planning. We could also hear representatives from the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and other organizations interested in labour problems.

I want to deal with a question which has concerned this house for the last couple of years, Mr. Chairman, and with which the minister dealt very briefly today. I refer to the situation on the great lakes. I want to try to do this is a non-partisan way. What I say will to some extent be my own personal opinion. It is no secret that there were and are differences of opinion in all parties about what happened in the past on the great lakes, about what was done when we passed the legislation establishing the board of trustees, and about how well the trustees have succeeded in accomplishing the job entrusted to them.

I begin by saying I view with a great deal of scepticism the criticisms, comments and questions which have been raised on this issue by members of the official opposition. Listening to them one would think all the fault lies with the government, but the fact is that Mr. Banks was head of the S.I.U. of Canada for a long period of time, including the six years during which the present official opposition was the government. That government was acquainted with some of the things Mr. Banks was doing.

I remind members of the committee that on one occasion the president of one of the large shipping companies wrote to an official of the Department of Labour, Mr. Wilson, enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Banks in which he asked the company to ignore the provisions of Canadian labour legislation, to ignore decisions of the Canada labour relations board, and to recognize certain members of the S.I.U. as being entitled to employment even though the Canadian labour relations board had ruled these people were covered by an agreement with another union. In his letter Mr. Banks promised to indemnify the shipping company if it were sued for damages.

That was an obvious breach of the Canada Labour Relations Act but the former minister of labour, who is now sitting on the opposition benches, did nothing about it. When the opposition talks about Mr. Banks it must accept part of the responsibility for not having taken any action while it was in power. I have noted members of the opposition patting themselves on the back because they appointed Mr. Justice Norris to inquire into the situation, but the fact is that they did not establish the Norris commission until the Canadian Labour Congress and the unions affiliated with it tied up the St. Lawrence seaway.

In discussing this matter of the great lakes I wish to say I was amazed and shocked that a member of the House of Commons, in the year 1964, would make the kind of speech which was made by the hon. member for Athabasca in the house on July 25 last. I wish to quote a couple of lines from his speech on that occasion, and members can find his words recorded on Hansard at pages 6044 to 6048. This is one of the things he said:

> "I do not believe we need labour unions at all, if we do our job in this House of Commons."

There is not a democratic country in the world which does not have labour unions, which is not proud of the labour unions it has, and which does not encourage their growth; but I have not heard a single member of the hon. member's party repudiate his statement. Further on he said:

> This is still a jungle and the labour bosses are the biggest apes in the jungle....We should put these labour bosses with criminal records out of business for five years at least.

There have been very few labour officials, let alone labour leaders, convicted of any crime in this country. Further on the hon. member enumerated some of the things of which he accused labour leaders of being guilty:

> —sedition, violence upon the person, organized murder, conspiracy to maim—

I am sure hon. members in all parties who are interested in labour will agree with me when I reject completely the allegation that labour leaders in this country have been guilty of these kinds of crimes. The hon. member ought to list the number of labour leaders who have been convicted or even charged with such crimes. I say this is false and has no truth at all in it. I also say I am surprised that the former minister of labour in the Conservative government did not make mention of this when he talked about Labour day and the importance of labour.

Returning to the question of the S.I.U., I am one who voted for the legislation which established the board of trustees for the maritime unions. I recognized then, and I recognize now, that the trustees would not have an easy job. After all, the United States government has indicated its support for as few changes as possible. The United States labour movement has supported Mr. Paul Hall and the S.I.U. of North America.

During the years Mr. Banks was in power the Canadian shipping companies, especially Canada Steamship Lines, were happy to go along with Mr. Banks to the mutual advantage of both. I recognized the fact that the legislation was a new departure and that the job of the trustees would not be easy. I was quite happy with the members who were appointed to the board. I had great respect for the contribution which Mr. Millard had made to the labour movement. I knew of Judge Lippe's activities as a successful arbiter of labour disputes, and we had heard good things about Mr. Justice Dryer.

I have not discussed this with other members of my party or members of other parties; I speak for myself alone, and I must say that I am disappointed with the progress which has been made. It is true that harassment of Canadian ships in United States ports has stopped, but I wonder how much credit the trustees can take for that. After all, there was no harassment of Canadian ships so long as Mr. Banks was in power. Harassment of Canadian ships did not start until steps were taken by the Canadian labour movement and by the government, through this legislation, to clip the wings of Mr. Banks. If all we wanted to do was stop the harassment of Canadian ships we would not have got involved in the legislation; therefore I do not give the trustees very much credit for this situation.

What else have the trustees done? Well, Mr. Banks is out. I do not know why they finally removed him from the presidency of the S.I.U. Stories in Canadian newspapers which continued until a day or two before he was removed indicated that on the whole the trustees were not unhappy with him. I do not know whether the fact that Mr. Banks apparently arranged for the tapping of the telephones of the trustees was responsible for the decision.

The point I wish to make is this. The officials who worked with Mr. Banks, the officials who were part of the conspiracy in the gangster empire he built up, are still in power. A good public relations job has been done—I do not want now to discuss who has done it—to try to convince the Canadian people that the S.I.U. was not so bad, that Mr. Justice Norris was prejudiced, that he had exaggerated, and so on. I do not wish to repeat what Mr. Justice Norris said about Mr. McLaughlin, Mr. Heinekey and Mr. Swait, because members of this committee who are interested will have read the Norris report. I wish to quote just a couple of paragraphs from the Globe and Mail of May 2, 1964 under the heading "Court found It Impossible to Believe Testimony of Banks". This is a summary of the judgment by Judge Wagner, now attorney general of the province of Quebec, the judge who sentenced Mr. Banks to five years in prison. I want to read a couple of paragraphs to make clear what Judge Wagner had to say about Mr. McLaughlin.

Leonard (Red) McLaughlin, SIU vice president and heir apparent to the union presidency under the federal trusteeship—Judge Wagner described him as Banks' trusted adviser and the man who endeavoured to come to Bank's rescue during the trial. He referred to Richard Greaves' evidence that McLaughlin in August, 1957, "has appeared with the daily report referring to the doings of Capt. Walsh" and said this was the signal of an explosion.

"The court wishes to state that it entertains very little regard for the conduct in this respect of Mr. McLaughlin who more than any other member of the union was familiar with the sentiments of the man at the top," the Judge said.

"This Mr. McLaughlin in his testimony before the court gave us the definite impression that he was bent on favouring the accused by attempting to minimize the motives which had prompted the beating of Capt. Walsh."

I could go on, but I think this indicates clearly that Judge Wagner at least shared the sentiments of Mr. Justice Norris with regard to Mr. McLaughlin. Yet the trustees have obviously decided that despite the voluminous testimony relating to Mr. McLaughlin and other top officials of the S.I.U. of Canada they should be permitted—indeed, I would go further and say that in my opinion they are being encouraged—to continue as leaders of the union. Speaking for myself—and I wish to make it clear I am speaking only for myself—may I say that if the total accomplishment by the passage of the legislation establishing the board of trustees will be the removal of Mr. Banks as president of the S.I.U.; if this is to be the total accomplishment which we shall see from the trustees, then I for one shall be sorry I voted for the legislation setting up this board.

I know the trustees have been faced with a difficult task. It may be that I am wrong. It may be they have done a great deal more than we know about. I hope the minister can prevail on the trustees to come to Ottawa and appear before the industrial relations committee, not next November or December or in January of 1965, but now. They should appear now, because if they are doing a job as claimed this is the place where they can tell us what they are doing.

I wish to mention some of the questions I should like—

The Chairman: I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Just five minutes. I should like to know from the trustees why union elections are being held now. I have carefully examined the constitution of the S.I.U. of Canada, and I suggest the Minister of Labour should do the same. I read it in the presence of one of the most eminent labour lawyers in Canada.

An hon. Member: Mr. Lewis?

Mr. Orlikow: Not Mr. Lewis. As I read the constitution, the election should not have been held until 1965. I suggest to the Minister of Labour and to the trustees that if they wish to develop the democratic forces of the S.I.U. the constitutional provisions calling for elections in 1965 should have been adhered to, so there might have been another year for the rank and file democratic, clean forces to develop and organize. It seems to me that what you have now is an election as between two slates of officers each intimately connected with the Banks machine.

I should like to know why the do not ship list is in fact still being enforced at the present time, despite all the protestations of the trustees that the list was destroyed and no longer exists. A number of people have applied for readmission to the S.I.U., people who were placed on the do not ship list. They applied to the board of trustees, and my information is that they were referred to Commodore Robertson who heads the appeal committee set up by Mr. Banks and continued by the trustees.

A number of people, 25 or more, have applied for readmission. In the last issue of the Canadian Sailor published by the S.I.U. under the supervision of the board of trustees there appears a report by Commodore Robertson on his work. He lists the people who have applied for readmission and the disposition of their cases. One of those who applied for readmission was a Mr. Carmel Deguire. Mr. Deguire was turned down by Commodore Robertson on the ground that he could not prove his membership in the S.I.U. and that the S.I.U. of Canada has no record of his membership. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Deguire's name appeared on a do not ship list which was filed with the Norris commission as exhibit 0-269 and attested to by Mr. Banks on the witness stand as being a correct extract from the do not ship list.

Similarly, Mr. Chairman, a Mr. Ken Lewis was turned down on the ground that there was no record that he had been a member of the S.I.U. Mr. Lewis' name also appears on the do not ship list in exhibit 0-269. The transcript of the evidence which Mr. Justice Norris heard and all the material which was filed with Mr. Justice Norris is under the supervision and control of Mr. Justice Dryer and the trustees. Aren't they interested? Don't they care? Aren't they going to take the trouble to look at what those exhibits show?

Here is another man, Mr. Donald Swan. He appealed to Commodore Robertson for readmission to the S.I.U. Commodore Robertson turned him down, and I quote from his report which is published in The Canadian Sailor, which says that the applicant was unable to produce evidence of membership and, further, that the S.I.U. could not trace membership.

If the Minister of Labour will take the trouble to look at the report of Mr. Justice Norris, the second part entitled "Schedule", at page 569, in a section of about 20 pages which lists people whose names appeared on the do not ship list, he will find the name of Donald Swan. How much more, I ask, do the board of trustees need?

Then there is David Bath, who applied for readmission and was turned down on the same ground by Commodore Robertson. His name appears at page 537 of the Norris report. Here is a really difficult one. A Mr. Henry Ranta appealed for readmission to the S.I.U. and was turned down on the ground that the applicant was unable to produce evidence of membership in the S.I.U. Well, Mr. Chairman, his name appears on page 564 of the Norris report. It may be that Commodore Robertson and the trustees have difficulty in this instance because instead of his name being spelled "Ranta" it is spelled "Ranto". I realize there is a tremendous difference between "Ranta" and "Ranto" and intelligent people who read might have difficulty in making that connection.

I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman; I think I have indicated enough to show that there is a great deal which the trustees need to look at and which in my opinion and in the opinion of many others they have not yet looked at.

I wish to close by referring to just one other case. This concerns a Mr. John Wood, a former official—I think a vice president—of the S.I.U. of Canada. He was expelled—he was not on the do not ship list—after one of the kangaroo court trials which the S.I.U. was so prone to hold under Mr. Banks. Mr. John Wood tried to get back to work. After all, like the rest of us, he has to eat. After he failed in various other ways he wrote to the president pro tem, Mr. Charles Turner, asking for permission to go back to work. Mr. Turner wrote a letter to Mr. Wood, and in this connection I might say I am personally ashamed that any official of a trade union would write such a letter. The Minister of Labour knows about this letter because I sent him a copy. He said to Mr. Wood, in effect, "Yes, we will let you go back to work under certain conditions".

What were those conditions, Mr. Chairman? I wish to just read a couple of them. One was that Mr. Wood would tender to the union, in a form suitable to S.I.U. counsel, an agreement not to participate in union affairs, and another was that he would not engage in activities hostile or harmful to the status of the union and its international in any areas of union interest. In other words "You can come back to work if you keep your mouth shut and never do anything to disturb the status quo; never say anything that will get members of the S.I.U. to vote for somebody other than Mr. McLaughlin" and the rest of the thugs who are still in control of the S.I.U.

I wrote a letter to Mr. Justice Dryer asking him if this was not a violation of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I had no answer except an acknowledgment. There may be a legal question as to whether this action comes within the provisions of that act. But, Mr. Chairman, how can any reasonable person, how can the board of trustees justify this action in any way on the basis of equity or justice?

I hope the board of trustees will appear before the industrial relations committee next week and give us information which will indicate that the things I have said and which other members have said are wrong. I want to say now that if they do; if they can show they have done the work which was entrusted to them in accordance with the provisions of the act, and have done the things which I think they have not done, I will be the first to commend them and to apologize for making the kind of speech I have made today. However, I say that until they do that —and the sooner they do it the better, and I would again urge on the Minister of Labour that he appeal to them to come before the industrial relations committee quickly—I for one am, to say the least, disappointed with the job they have done. I do not believe they have moved quickly enough or that they have dealt with the basic problems that were with us when we discussed the legislation which the minister proposed and voted for the establishment of the board of maritime trustees.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Labour are rather interesting, because they enable us to deal with extremely sensitive points of our economy, especially with one which is now giving rise to most of the problems and requires most of our attention, unemployment.

When the minister introduced his estimates, he pointed out the progress made during the past year in that particular field.

Of course, we can only be delighted with him at the progress generally accomplished by our economy and as a result of which unemployment has been considerably reduced throughout the country.

However, Mr. Chairman, we must recognize that even though the situation has improved in certain parts of the country, it remains that in the province of Quebec and in the maritime provinces, unemployment is still a nightmare. Indeed, hundreds of thousands of workers are unemployed and have to rely only on unemployment insurance and social assistance benefits to provide for their needs.

For a few years, we have noticed on many occasions that in certain areas, unemployment seems to be a more serious problem than elsewhere in the country.

Last year, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen), together with the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), decided to designate in our country areas which would receive special attention from the government, we witnessed the recognition by the government of a regional problem. In fact, the government recognized implicitly that our unemployment was regional in character and that the solutions which had to be applied had to be based on the fact that it was a regional situation. Solutions could no longer be applied from coast to coast. A solution taking into account regional characteristics was needed.

Of course, when those areas were designated, like several others I was a little disappointed to see the yardstick which had been followed to designate them.

We therefore have made representations to the effect that other criteria be used when the list of those designated areas is revised.

I hope that the Minister of Labour, in cooperation with the Minister of Industry, will be able to say, when a decision is announced in this regard, that he has taken into account the representations and remarks we have made, and I hope the decision will be to everyone's satisfaction.

However, we must admit that the designation of those areas has not solved the problem entirely. Even if the Minister of Industry did state that in 23 out of 35 areas, new industries had been established, we are nevertheless deploring the fact that it has been many years now since a new industry has settled in the Saguenay area. I can only draw the attention of the minister on this very special situation in my area.

I believe that the activities of the area development agency, which I admit, is under the Department of Industry, but in which the Minister of Labour is surely interested, should be enlarged. It should be given more definite work to do because, in my opinion, this area development agency offers real possibilities for bringing solutions to the problems.

At this time, I should like to strongly urge the Minister of Labour to put pressure on his colleague the Minister of Industry, and stress the point with him so that this agency might be given more latitude and a very definite policy, in short a certain authority in that field which apparently is going to be given to it.

A while ago, the minister mentioned the large technical training program, the vocational training schools, as they are called. That program was introduced in 1960 and 1961 by the previous government.

Of course, we must be all satisfied with that favourable development. But I sometimes wonder whether we really consider the problem as a whole, since as late as last week, I had an opportunity to read the report of an American sociologist who had carried a detailed investigation on the future implications of general automation and mechanization in industry.

That same sociologist claims that in the next 50 years, workers will have to change trade or profession at least four times. I think that is a phenomenon which will certainly cause a great upheaval in the general labour situation and in the economy, and which will create tremendous social problems.

It will not be easy for a man who worked in a precise field for ten years and who made all the necessary sacrifices in order to get the technical know-how required in his trade, to qualify in a new field, since the work for which he had qualifications no longer exists.

I feel that if we contemplate the development of manpower in this light, we will have to prepare today the education of future workers, and to prepare it at school, in order to give them a sufficient basis to enable them to acquire very quickly the varied knowledge they will need to cope with the economic development of their future work.

Of course, all that illustrates the need for labour in order to achieve production.

I cannot help thinking of some of the ideas advocated by Social Credit supporters on this question of labour requirement versus production. I must say that, in time, it will be proved that this first idea was good and justified. I think that some of the solutions which have been advocated will have to be applied.

We produce for consumption. Man does not work merely for the pleasure of working; he works in order to obtain the things he needs. If, in future, automation allows us to produce without resorting to labour, I think that we will have to reconsider all our economic, financial, monetary and social philosophy, which will have to undergo far reaching changes.

I would now like, Mr. Chairman, to refer to the winter works program. The minister mentioned earlier today the thousands of man days made possible by this program. Obviously, when I refer to the discussions which took place in 1957 and 1958, when the project was launched by the former government, I can only laugh to myself when recalling the objections from the Liberal benches with regard to that project, when they were still in the opposition. And now that they are in office, they seem to find this formula a successful one, which makes me smile. When in opposition, people have not the same ideas than when they sit on the treasury benches with regard to the same legislative program.

That concept was a happy one under the circumstances, but considering that the great majority of Canadians want to be sincere in this field, it remains that this is only a porary measure, a poultice, so to speak, and that, in the end, the unemployment problem has not been solved. Indeed, I believe that this formula to encourage winter employment should be entirely reconsidered, because it has become a permanent measure.

If this program designed to alleviate winter unemployment is to be made a permanent fixture, I think it should be established in such a way as to be applicable only to works considered useful, since fantastic amounts are paid to carry them out. In my opinion, it would be logical that this program be reconsidered so that instead of being a winter works program only, it will be a program of year-round municipal works, so that the country and its people can draw the maximum benefits possible, considering the sums invested.

We must all recognize the geographical situation of our country.

The climate in which we live, the millions of dollars we spend during December, January and February to carry out certain municipal works, must be considered. Since these are all municipal works requiring social capital, I believe that 50 per cent of this money is at present being spent unwisely. Moreover, the municipalities cannot do otherwise because of the public pressure they have to bear. In my opinion, the government has given up one of its greatest responsibilities, shifting it upon public managers, our small municipalities. It merely said to the municipalities: You will solve the unemployment problem.

Of course, the municipalities can contribute, but I believe that at this time the full responsibility is put on their shoulders in that field, We put them in a kind of strait-jacket, in the sense that they must complete such works during the period provided for winter works. We make their task doubly difficult, on top of the fact that they are unable to carry out works they feel necessarily useful, sound and suitable. Unfortunately, they are compelled by public opinion, due to pressures brought to bear by citizens, to undertake works that are not always justified.

I believe that, at present, our municipalities are piling up debts while we are squandering public funds by carrying out projects which do not serve, in any way, the general interest of the country.

I suggest that Canada, if it wishes to achieve a reasonable economic status, cannot—in view of its population, its economic position and the burden of its present debt—afford to invest one single dollar of its future credit in an uneconomic project. This is implying a lot, as I believe we are obviously making an uneconomic investment, and we have practically had to make it for five years. I would even say that, for more than five years, we have invested hundreds of millions in uneconomic municipal works.

I maintain that Canada cannot afford this luxury any more.

We must use all our past, present and future savings, as well as all our credit, for investments in productive fields. We must produce.

Services are not the most desirable thing, at the present time, in the country. We certainly need services, but what we need most, is to develop the field of production, and unless we make such change in our philosophy, we shall continue to face the same economic problem, for that problem is linked with unemployment. The present rate of unemployment may well decrease in a given year, but it will inevitably rise acutely subsequently. An economist forecast recently a forthcoming and quite marked increase in unemployment in this country. This is very encouraging.

I wonder whether we are not in the process of hiding our heads in the sand by encouraging the winter works program in fields which do not create any jobs or production, in fields where investments cannot be recovered.

In saying this, I am thinking of something in particular. In carrying out works under the winter works legislation, productive municipal investments in such fields should be authorized. Obviously the government is unable to create jobs everywhere, to build plants in all sections of the country to create production, but if the government allowed municipalities, within the framework of the winter works formula, to build plants or buildings that could be sublet to small organizations able to undertake some production, I believe this would be a step forward. There are many people with imaginative ideas, who could undertake the production of some articles we presently import; unfortunately, they cannot afford to tie down large sums in a building at the present time. If such a formula were adopted, and if municipalities were allowed to erect buildings they could sublet at so much per square foot to such organizations, I believe that part of our investments could be recovered. We could thus hope to offset the steady increase in our imports.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I would like, within the framework of the winter works program, to make a remark on another small problem our municipalities are facing. This small problem, in the end, becomes a major one. When our municipalities undertake winter works, they start by borrowing. Why? In order to finance those works until both federal and provincial subsidies are paid. Since the works start in November and are completed in April, municipalities have to bear this rather heavy burden for six months. I am told that the federal and provincial governments have not yet paid all the money to municipalities for works completed last year. As a result, municipalities must finance the entire cost of winter works for a whole year, and in the long run, after six or seven years, this burden is beginning to be heavily felt in the budgets of our municipalities and to such an extent that I think the saturation point has been reached. Our municipalities will soon be unable to continue to operate under the winter works program.

Last year, Quebec had a remarkable year, but I think that next year there will be a tremendous reduction. Such a reduction or a decrease would neither reflect a lack of needs nor full employment, but the impossibility for administrators to find the necessary financial means for those projects. The only solution would be an increase of municipal taxes which are already excessively high. It is generally known in Quebec as in other provinces that municipal and federal taxes have considerably increased. We are bound to draw the following conclusion: If municipal and school taxes had to be boosted, it was in direct proportion to the increase in municipal expenses under the winter works program. That formula was good up to a certain point but it was only a temporary solution, and I think its best years are over. I feel it will have to be replaced by a more adequate formula. Otherwise, Mr. Chairman, we will find ourselves in the same situation as in 1957-58 when we had three quarters of a million unemployed, if not more, in Canada.

I should like to deal with another point, the $500 bonus for wintertime house construction. The minister seemed quite happy with the apparent results. I say "apparent" because I cannot do otherwise than think that the houses built in winter will reduce summer construction. That is self-evident. Therefore, it means that in the course of a whole year there will not be one house built in excess of those which would have normally been built. I wonder on what evidence the minister has based his statement that the $500 winter house construction incentive has increased the number of houses built.

I think the increase is entirely due to normal growth and had nothing to do with this $500 incentive; the only reason is that there was a need for so many family units. Unless you want to build houses which will remain unoccupied, there is no logical reason to state that that grant contributed to the increase in the number of houses built. Statistics will show that the number of family units built in a year will decrease within a certain period of time.

Now, still about the bonus, I wonder just how fair it is. I have a brother who built himself a house last year. He could not benefit from this $500 subsidy, but if I were to build myself a home this winter, I could get it. How can the minister maintain that this is fair and just? After all, that amount of $500 was taken from the pockets of Canadian taxpayers through the levy of taxes in general. Is this really fair? It may have encouraged housing construction over a longer period and a spread over a 12 month rather than an eight month period, but that program does not change the problem at all and in no way increases the number of days or hours of work in the building industry. I had a look at the results it was able to achieve in the Saguenay area, and I could prove to you that those houses built during the winter were merely projects which would have been carried out in summer and were undertaken a few months ahead of time.

Therefore, not a single additional hour of work was provided by this formula in the area. I believe the same thing goes for many other regions.

Another matter I should like to deal with is unemployment insurance. In our capacity as members of parliament, we are in some way the father-confessors of people who come to us with their problems. In regard to unemployment insurance, I must in all fairness pay tribute to the majority of the employees of that department, especially to those of the local office in my riding, for the manner in which they discuss things over with those who consult them.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, there is a rather sensitive point I would like to deal with. Workers are not lawyers in general. It would be uncommon to find lawyers among them. Therefore, they do not know how the act is applied. They cannot interpret all the regulations of an act and I would even say that the great majority of workers know nothing about the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Obviously, the government should not be blamed for that, and I do not intend to blame them. Nevertheless, I wonder whether it could not be possible to undertake some program to educate the working class through unions, the employment office or unemployment insurance offices. I wonder also whether or not a way could be found to publish a pamphlet summing up in language workers would easily understand, how the act is applied, what are their actual rights and how they can assert them. The procedure to be followed in connection with the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act could then be explained to them in a simplified manner. For my part, I have read two or three times the Unemployment Insurance Act and I must admit that it is not easy to understand its clauses. Therefore, as is the case with any other act, it is hard to interpret.

It refers us from one section to another and finally we have to read three sections at the same time to try to understand part of a section.

In short, it is extremely complicated, and that is why the worker does not understand the act and does not try to understand it in many cases. Consequently, I wonder if the government could not undertake an advertising campaign along the lines I suggested.

What happens, Mr. Chairman, is that the worker who applies for unemployment insurance benefits is unaware of the basic conditions required and fills his application in a way that disqualifies him completely. Two or three weeks later, he receives a letter telling him that he is not eligible for such and such a reason. Of course, he goes to the unemployment office and says: That is not what I meant. And he is answered: But that is what you said.

Thus, because he did not understand the law and was unable to interpret it, the worker is disqualified, sometimes after having paid his unemployment insurance contributions during quite a long period of time.

A case has even come to my knowledge where a man who had paid his contributions to the unemployment insurance fund since its creation was disqualified the first time he applied for benefits. He had paid his contributions through the years, ever since the operation of unemployment insurance, but he was unable to get insurance benefits because, in his application, he made a statement which simply disqualified him.

In short, Mr. Chairman, it seems that one has to be either a lawyer, to know the legislation and use it, or a liar and be able to get away with giving a more or less honest answer to the questions that the officials of unemployment insurance offices ask, as they have to—I do not blame the officials for asking those question; they have a job to do and that is their responsibility—because of the drafting of those questions and because of the situation in which the worker who is not used to report to offices finds himself. That is how it happens that the worker gives answers which disqualify him.

That is why I ask the Minister of Labour whether it would not be possible to undertake an education program concerning the applications for unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Chairman, that was about all the remarks I had to make on the estimates of the Department of Labour.

To sum it up, I should like to point out to the minister that there is still much to be done in that field to meet general requirements.

I think that improvements have been made. The minister indicated that there is a labour code being prepared and that very soon, we will have to discuss a revision of the whole labour legislation.

This is of course a very complex field. We must take into consideration quite a large number of economic or psychological factors. But I think it would be a good thing if the government, as soon as possible and with the co-operation of all organizations involved, were to see to it that this code which will govern the administration of labour legislation within the framework of federal jurisdiction is drafted in clearer terms.

Mr. Perron: Mr. Chairman, my remarks on the estimates of the Department of Labour will be brief.

First I want to congratulate the minister for the huge task he has achieved.

I know that he endeavours with all his might to solve problems which today are facing the whole country, and other nations as well. Indeed, the labour problem is one which requires a more and more serious and thorough study, so that definite solutions might be found, which seems impossible within the present structure of our economic and political system.

I know that various programs have been developed, especially in the last ten years, to solve the problem of winter unemployment. By various publicity campaigns and the application of some legislation, there have been endeavours to remedy as far as possible the plague of winter unemployment.

There were agreements made with the provinces to promote winter works at the municipal level. This experience has been going on for a few years.

Several municipalities experienced this method and they have come to the conclusion that this was certainly not the most efficient formula, because it created rather complicated financial problems for them. Some municipalities no longer dare resort to this method to help their people, because they encounter too many complications and the burden in the final analysis falls on the shoulders of taxpayers, and property owners, in turn, complain that this situation is not for the best.

Of course, they tried another formula, last year, in order to encourage home building.

They maintain, according to the report that was issued, that out of 32,000 applications, more than 24,000 were accepted, whereby the owners building during the December-March period qualified for the $500 bonus. I am wondering whether they can really boast about the efficiency of the $500 bonus. I am sure that out of the 32,000 applications, thousands of homes would have been built during the winter, even without this legislation. Employment possibilities may have been increased or facilitated, but I do not believe it was really a performance to boast about as regards the solving of the winter employment problem.

On the other hand, in the field of home building, it must be admitted that, during the summer, according to builders and suppliers of building materials, there has been a decline in the building of private homes compared to the increases of the past years, because the demand is being held down not by the lack of a real need for new homes, but by the financing capabilities of various institutions established in order to assist in the building of homes, such as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and of the prospective owners themselves.

Therefore, it cannot be said that those palliatives are a solution to the problem we have to face, and which will become more and more difficult, if we go on, in the context of today's economy, linking the rights of the consumers, and of human beings to obtain the essentials of life—like food, clothing, housing and even those things that are considered a luxury in certain cases—to the sole criteria of work. Those days are gone forever.

Automation was briefly mentioned by the Minister of Labour, when he said that he will make another statement later today on the subject. As regards this problem which baffles us today, economists serving the presidents or economic organizations in the United States alleged, a few months ago, in a statement to the press, as well as in recommendations to the American congress, that automation should be studied in a concrete and precise manner, because the American economy will have to meet problems still more serious than the post-war ones.

We are going through a century of rapid development, where production techniques are forced upon us to such an extent that we sometimes hardly know where to turn to find a solution. In order to do this, we try enacting legislation, for instance with regard to the rehabilitation of the unemployed by technical training, but people do not seem to realize that, in the twentieth century, it becomes increasingly possible to produce essential goods, services and even modern comfort while liberating more and more people from manual labour.

The tendency is rather to multiply the positions, to try and create new jobs by all possible means, while more and more efforts should be made to free human beings, in this technical age which can produce faster and better, with the quick production we experienced in the twentieth century, besides meeting human needs.

It is mostly along those lines that the remarks I intend to make must be considered.

Our universities now graduate experts in the fields of space development, technical methods and applications, in all production fields. Even large corporations, the powerful economic interests, under the leadership of private enterprise, hire experts, pay bonuses to their own employees in order to find solutions likely to improve the means of production in their own plants. This will necessarily bring about after a few years, when those suggestions are implemented, the dismissal of their own fellow workers.

Under the pressure of labour unions, working hours have been reduced. As recently as 25 or 30 years ago, the labour class had still to work 60 or 65 hours a week, while today the burden of factory workers has been reduced by approximately 50 per cent, as far as working hours are concerned.

The same thing happens in the field of farm production. Through commercial farms, the setting up of larger and larger farms, new production techniques are continually developed. In that same field, production techniques were also developed by all kinds of technical, scientific and progressive procedures in order to free human beings from work.

Therefore, I wonder whether the time has not come for the Minister of Labour to ask the government to set up a commission especially instructed, in co-operation with other departments, to seek the development of programs that would provide, not full employment, but especially security for all, a well thought-out security, consistent with the tremendous production capacity of this country.

We are fortunate in having as neighbour a country where science and modern techniques are developed to the highest possible level. We, in Canada, have access to the scientific know-how of that country. Our young nation, Canada, with a population of barely 20 million people, with almost infinitely diversified resources, in the ground and underground, with an industrious population, as we proved it during the last war, had no unemployment problem during the years 1939-45. All those who were able to fill some kind of a job, civilian or military, were given work. There was no problem. There was no need to set up a Senate committee made up of members of parliament to study the ill effects of unemployment in Canada during those years.

So now, in peacetime, is it not abnormal to find such a large number of people deprived of the necessaries of life for lack of a job, while warehouses throughout the country are overflowing with consumer goods?

I suggest, therefore, that we must turn to solutions other than devices such as winter works as applied to housing or post office construction throughout Canada.

I do not think this can really provide us with a worth-while solution to deal with the problem now facing the Canadian parliament and hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

Time and time again, during those last ten years when the two governments have been in office, we have been given statistical data on unemployment.

Let us examine the unemployment figures for Canada. Quebec still leads the rest of the country with over 100,000 unemployed, and this in a province claiming to be in full development, supposedly going through a quiet revolution, in short, in a province where some ministers are paying lip service to co-operative federalism.

No solution has really been found to the problem of poverty amid plenty, to the problem of workers who are unemployed today.

Whether it be through lack of technical training, the trained or untrained unemployed is nevertheless a human being who, in many cases, is head of a family, with three, four, five mouths to feed; he does not believe in those far fetched formulas causing him to be idle over the last ten or 15 years, from the end of the war until now.

Is it not time a social security program were considered, conceived and implemented, in order to meet the needs of the Canadian people, in accordance with the opportunities provided by the economic potential of Canada?

Mr. Chairman, there is not a single minister or hon. member here who sincerely wonders whether, in six or 12 months from now, we will have enough consumer goods to meet the needs of a population of 18 or 19 million. Nobody worries about that because we are all convinced of our tremendous production potential and, at the same time, of our possibilities in the field of foreign trade. In fact, we can easily sell to other countries the consumer goods we produce, but nobody worries about our surpluses in various fields.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the efforts made by all of us here to find solutions to our present problems, thousands of Canadians are wary about the future and wonder if we will be able to meet our obligations, considering the lack of employment opportunities in our industries. In fact, it must be remembered that numerous Canadian workers are being laid off on account of new production techniques.

In the province of Quebec, certain plants which formerly employed 800 to 1,000 people can now double their output with a staff of 300 only.

Of the 600 or 700 people who were laid off, there are maybe 300 or 400 who have been able to get new jobs because of new needs but the 200 or 300 others remain unemployed. The latter may get temporary employment for four or five months in the year. In fact, many of Quebec's unemployed work four or five months a year because they are unable to find jobs which would keep them busy all year round.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard), all possible efforts are being made, in certain quarters, to find answers to those problems through very complex laws, and it is thought that the needs of the unemployed are thus being met. Perhaps those efforts would be successful if it were not necessary in this field, to cope with reserve funds that are always depleted and have to be bolstered by yearly $50 million grants by the Canadian government. It seems that we try, as far as possible, to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, as the party in office is wont to do.

Attempts are made to save money and to prevent abuses by those who are not entitled or who would be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, by passing complicated laws, and by creating situations whereby the applicants practically disqualify themselves from unemployment insurance benefits.

Formalities are getting more complicated than ever and investigations upon investigations are being made. At first attempts are made to obtain and even to suggest to some extent an answer from the person being investigated.

The unemployed is asked whether he would like to work in his own locality to which he answers "yes", which is quite normal. So, it is jotted down on his card that he wishes to work in his own locality.

Subsequently, a suggestion is made to him, and the answer to the following question is practically put in his mouth: "What salary would you accept? About $40 or $50 a week?" The applicant of course will not reply: "I am prepared to work for $18 or $20 a week". He will say: "Yes, $45 or $50 a week would be fine".

And then, after two or three weeks, he receives a notice to the effect that his application was rejected under section 52 of the Unemployment Insurance Act because he has stated that he would work only in his own locality. Of course he can appeal to the court of referees; he is even entitled to secure counsel, but at his own expense. More often than not, the poor labourer does not know anything about the numerous regulations which today are no longer a summary of the act as it was passed and which has been consolidated in 10, 12 and even 15 volumes. In fact, the act is so complicated that unemployment officers have to get legal advice in order to interpret every section of the act or its regulations which today are consolidated in a certain number of volumes and which baffle the layman.

Then the poor unemployed gets a notice of suspension because his eligibility to unemployment insurance benefits is limited since he stated that he wanted to work in his own locality.

Four weeks go by and then another reason is found to refuse him benefits. It is claimed that he limited his employment opportunities by requesting a higher salary than the average salary paid in his locality or region, since he stated that he wanted $45, $50 or $60 a week. A way is found to stop his benefits again for another period. And when that is not done, he is offered a low paid job so that, in most cases, after paying some essential expenses out of the weekly salary he could earn in a given locality in his region or county, he would not even be left with $18 or $20 a week.

He is offered a job which, because of the cost or the lack of transportation will require him to keep two homes, that is his home in his locality and room and board which will cost him $25, $30 or even $40; in the end, that job will bring him much less than the unemployment insurance benefits he is entitled to and would normally get. And we are satisfied with increasing the complexity of the various existing acts or to pass new ones.

Much was made of the winter works program and the great number of jobs it would create but we seem to forget today that there are between 250,000 and 300,000 summer unemployed in Canada. As I said many times, summer unemployment, just like winter unemployment, is a serious problem which creates hardship within the family.

Those unemployed people are unable to provide for their family's essential needs. Therefore, is it not about time for us to face the unemployment problem from another angle and to consider employment as a means to cope with abundance, to solve the private or public charity problem or the distress problem, at a time when want and insecurity which are prevailing in many Canadian homes are not due to the lack of production of consumers' goods or of services meant for Canadian citizens?

Mr. Chairman, it is often said that "one must live by the sweat of one's brow". But when the bread is on the table, when it is delivered to our homes, I am wondering whether enough sweat was not accumulated already to enable the human being to eat this bread at least with a little dignity.

Is not the real purpose of production to meet human needs? Also, is not the real function of industry, that of creating employment or producing adequate quantities of goods to satisfy human needs?

Let us stop requiring private enterprise and crown corporations to create employment, since the real function of any human activity should be to allow human beings to live in dignity within society.

We could even make a comparison on this subject. If a man who owned five dogs gave them only one bone to chew on, we can well imagine the most tremendous dog-fight ever seen. The same situation applies to human beings. Why attempt to create jobs, why centre upon the finding of jobs all our efforts to solve the problem of insecurity in Canada, when work should not necessarily be considered nowadays as essential to ensure adequate production.

If the human mind succeeded in developing methods of producing more easily and more quickly the goods necessary, not only to meet our essential needs, but also to provide comfort to the Canadian people in this twentieth century, those goods should serve a useful purpose.

Our universities have found a way to produce scientists who have not only conquered space but who also know a lot of other things. But the same universities failed to form economists able to set up a system of social security which would meet the needs of human beings.

The field of economics includes also financial and monetary matters, and it is said: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread". In this regard, economists have become theologians and, for 35 or 40 years, those theologians have tormented us with this sentence: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread".

Yesterday, I read in the newspapers of the province of Quebec a letter from the Canadian bishops warning legislators and those who look after the problem of labour management relations to prepare for tomorrow a social security program for the Canadian people and not merely create jobs, because automation is here and we must face it seriously in order to improve the situation for the years to come.

If to manage one must anticipate, I feel that it is time more than ever for the minister to urge his colleagues, especially the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), to set up a commission which would prepare plans for the uplifting of human beings, by enabling them to benefit more widely from our wealth, instead of being offered a stopgap. It is imperative to set up a commission which will plan for the years to come the distribution of wealth to each and every Canadian citizen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to go into detail respecting the estimates of this department; the hon. member for Ontario, a former minister of labour and a successful one, dealt and has already given a general outline. However, there are one or two observations that I would make with respect to the general position of unemployment. I recall, when hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting over here, how often the very walls of this chamber shook with the condemnation that was heaped on us because there was unemployment.

They promised an end of unemployment. They promised a new heaven and a new earth in the field of human relations. The minister now gives a statement to the committee in which he has to admit grudgingly that the problem of unemployment has been little improved in the last year and a half; and in that year and a half there has been an expansion, as there was during the days we were in office from 1961 on, when our policies started to work. Those policies which were condemned by the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite, now having been adopted by them, become the cornerstones of the economic development of this country.

They have brought into effect one or two measures—one of which I shall refer to—to meet the unemployment problem; but generally speaking they have taken no action whatsoever in this connection. The legislation placed on the statute books between 1957 and 1963, including the vocational training schools act, has been carried on. Despite an economic improvement in North America, we still have a very large measure of unemployment. We were told they had the solution. No longer does it appear in the press as being a serious problem, despite the fact that hundreds of thousands are still unemployed.

Those who sit in the front benches today had the answers during the period 1957 to 1963. It was folly, they said, on our part to compare unemployment in Canada with that in the United States, where the same situation prevailed, where unemployment ran very high, and where, despite all the efforts of economists and leaders in government, unemployment mounted and was approximately on the same level as Canada's, with the exception of course that we have peculiar and serious climatic conditions in the winter.

They were unable to place before you, Mr. Chairman, anything which they had done; they merely adopted the policies of the former government which they had condemned. I am not going to go into the pegging of the dollar, but I can never forget the counterfeit currency which was distributed across Canada to indicate a serious economic condition in Canada and to draw attention to the claim that what we had done was detrimental to the country. Today it is the cornerstone. The heresy of yesterday is the Liberal orthodoxy of today in this connection.

Now, what has the government done? True enough, there has been economic change for the better in North America. One has only to read the United States press. There has been a very considerable economic development in the last year and a half. But we have problems which this government refuses to face. They are problems which must be faced if the question of employment is to be met and assured and Canada's national growth is to continue. These problems face us and we find our trade position with imports exceeding exports. With bankruptcies greater than they have been for many years, with agriculture, at least in the central and maritime provinces, suffering very severely and thereby detrimentally affecting not only our economy but also the employment situation, the government spends its time trying to secure passage of a resolution to provide for a flag. Last night they had the opportunity to bring in legislation, which is not ready and has not been prepared, but they chose to vote against being given that opportunity.

One matter which was boasted about was the $500 bonus for winter building. We are told that was a success. We are told that it brought unusual development, and therefore jobs. We have said it was not a success. We have said that what it actually did was to transfer building construction from one part of the year to another, to the detriment of the consumer or householder. I should like to quote as a supporting witness in this connection the hon. member for York East. He is an experienced builder. He was of those, along with the hon. member for Essex South, who in a recent television program revealed their thinking, exposed their hearts and spoke with frankness. I should like to refer to what the experienced builder had to say. He deals with the fact that a number of private members of parliament are not being considered by the present government. Both of these hon. members to whom I have referred said that. Then he said something to this effect: "We are all considered as privates and they think they are colonels". Mr. Chairman, I have never seen that relationship but apparently it exists. Then the hon. member for York East spoke of the difficulties under which these hon. members operate. Take, for example this question of the $500 winter bonus. He said:

> —let us suppose that I had something to do with national housing and that I was on the committee to advise.

He has not and he was not. but he said "suppose". He went on:

I would have advised them—

I think that must be the Minister of Labour.

—immediately that the $500 winter bonus is absolutely useless—

When the evidence is given by an experienced member supporting the government, Mr. Chairman, its importance cannot be overemphasized.

—because having been in the business and knowing what the cost of winter construction is, knowing that most builders would rather give you $500 than to build a house in the wintertime. I could have told them that and saved embarrassment, because with the great boom of construction, $500 purports to be the reason. It is not the reason at all.

I think the Minister of Labour, when he is looking around for experts, might just have a whispered conversation with the hon. member for York East, who is experienced in such matters. He goes on:

It is not the reason at all. The reason is that there is a feeling of expansion.

I need go no further, Mr. Chairman, to answer the minister and any other ministers who speak so fulsomely of this $500 winter bonus scheme, than to quote the words of the hon. member for York East, who tells us on the basis of experience that he knows what he is talking about, but that the minister does not.

It is an amazing revelation, Mr. Chairman. Those two hon. members were away from the whip on that day and spoke with great authority. I was amazed to hear one hon. member say that so difficult is it for these ministers to carry on that the minister of defence, when he produced the white paper, wrote it in longhand.

Then he said:

He did not even trust it to be typed by the establishment.

These are not the revelations of members of the opposition, Mr. Chairman. These are the considered opinions of members supporting the government, men who have had experience. The hon. member for Essex South said that he has had long experience, but that he is no good down in Ottawa because that government there would not listen to experience.

Mr. Whelan: Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question? Is he aware of the fact that most congratulations which I received on how accurate I was came from members of his party?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member ever got commendation for anything I do not mind his boasting about it, because I have never seen any reason why he should. I say that in the kindness of spirit to one who at all times is the essence of affability.

Mr. Nicholson: You have not heard him in caucus.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman has a question, I do not mind.

Mr. Nicholson: No, I am sorry; I should not have interrupted. The right hon. gentleman said that the hon. member is always the essence of affability, and I could not resist the temptation to say: "You should hear him in caucus".

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I did not get the interruption, but I know it was a semi-judicial pronouncement and one with which I am sure I would not agree.

I am simply pointing out that the $500 bonus scheme was no good, and the only member on the other side of the house who knows anything about building, according to what was said on this broadcast, says that it was worthless and he would not have established it if he had had anything to do with the matter.

What has the government done to meet the unemployment situation? Simply continued the policies of the past, with one or two stunts such as the $500 bonus; but I am not going to deal with that any more because it was dealt with so well and effectively by the hon. member. How are we going to meet this problem? When we said that automation made greater unemployment inevitable and that it would take time in order to produce the necessary skills and training for men and women to be able to operate modern machinery, we were ridiculed. The plan that was brought into effect by the hon. member for Ontario when he was minister of labour will be a monument throughout the years to the wisdom and the capacity of that hon. member. He brought into being a plan that provides for the training of over 100,000 Canadians a year to enable them to carry out the responsibilities of operating difficult machinery.

That brings me to another phase in connection with this department. Mention has already been made of the Norris report. I was amazed that one of the trustees admitted he had never read the report in full. One of the maritime trustees, whose responsibility it is to carry out the principles inherent in that report, had not read the report in question. The rest of us have read that report and it is a report that will be a must for all who would understand the developments in the S.I.U.

What has the government done about it? They appointed a board of trustees. That board of trustees has not yet been brought before a committee of parliament. Questions are asked and we are told the committee is to meet at some time in the future. I want to get the assurance from the minister that these trustees are going to appear before a committee now, not next fall, not next winter, but now. Many questions have related to the administration of the maritime board of trustees. Answers have not been given. The attitude of the minister has simply been that ultimately the members of the board or a member will come before a committee of parliament.

One of the recommendations had to do with Hal Banks and also with McLaughlin who today occupies the top position in the S.I.U. Read that report. Imagine Mr. Millard saying he had not read it. Is that the reason that McLaughlin, who was condemned in almost as strong terms as Banks, still occupies the number one position, the controlling position, in the S.I.U.? Is it because a member of the board has not read the report that the same old list still exists, with the result that from time to time decent, respectable seamen come to members of parliament and point out that they cannot break through the wall, that they are on the no ship list? What is the reason for this? Why does the board of maritime trustees permit these conditions to continue? Why cannot we have any information about the arrangements that were made between Mr. Hall of the S.I.U. and the Canadian government or the board of trustees?

What about Banks? One cannot speak of him without referring to his absence from the demands of justice. Recently much was made by the minister of the fact that the government had prosecuted Banks pursuant to the report to the Department of Labour by the Norris commission. They prosecuted him. Yes, they prosecuted him for conspiracy.

An hon. Member: And kissed him goodbye.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Over the years he had been one of the pally boys of the Liberal party. Whenever he was in difficulty somehow or other an order in council could be passed to relieve him from being removed from our country. When he was prosecuted and convicted he then disappeared. He supplied a bail bond.

Sir, the record of the government in connection with Banks is one of the highest negligence, and worse. They prosecuted him. He was let out on bail. Your Honour knows that one of the first principles of a bail bond, as set forth in all bail bonds, except on an appeal in which case it may be inserted, is that the person involved does not depart the said court without leave. If he was awaiting trial he could not depart from the jurisdiction of Quebec or Canada without leave. We wondered about that. We asked whether provision was made for that. As far back as May 11 the hon. member for Bow River asked this question, as found on page 3115 of Hansard:

> According to newspaper reports an order was made by the chief justice of Quebec granting bail to Mr. Banks. I wonder whether the terms of that recognizance include a condition which would prevent Mr. Banks from leaving Canada?

The member for Bow River wondered whether this would be the course followed. If there was no solicitude for Banks, Mr. Chairman, there was certainly negligence in dealing with Banks. When an ordinary man is arrested, charged with an offence and enters into a bond he has to undertake not to leave the jurisdiction. But Banks, with a five year sentence hanging over him, could sign a bond for $25,000 which, to use a vulgarism, is just peanuts in that league, without a provision that he must not leave Canada, he being a United States citizen.

We followed this matter throughout and asked questions. On July 27 and succeeding days we asked the government over and over again what they were going to do about the matter. The government did nothing. Banks disappeared. We have been trying to get information for weeks with regard to what is being done to find Banks. I believe that the reason the government does not give us any information is that the government knows that Banks cannot be extradited on the charge of conspiracy, with regard to which he was out on bail, and he certainly cannot be extradited on the other charges, one of contempt of court and the other a further charge of conspiracy yet to be tried.

Here is the interesting part. The law officers of the crown and special counsel allowed this man out on bail when they must have known that if he walked over into the United States he could stay clear of any danger of being apprehended. This is, to me, the most ridiculous thing that has ever happened in connection with Canadian justice.

Ordinarily I would not use the expression, but one of the great supporters of the Liberal party, the Toronto Daily Star said, on August 19, "Mr. Banks thumbs his nose".

Hal Banks seems to be thumbing his nose successfully at Canadian justice.

He is. Any one of the law officers must have known that you could not extradite him if he got across the line. What a commentary upon the administration of justice upon which we in this country pride ourselves. Here is a man who comes into the country, disregards our laws in connection with immigration status as no one else could do, is prosecuted and let out on a bail bond that will not be effective because it does not prevent him from leaving the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member a question because I am interested in this? I should like to ask the hon. member if he can say, from his legal knowledge and as a former prime minister, whether or not it is possible for a person in Canada, under indictment and on bail, to leave Canada without there being a record with immigration or other authorities?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never tried to leave Canada that way, and neither has the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Knowles: Have you ever been out on bail?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; but the bail bond did not prevent his doing what he did. This is a very good question.

Mr. Winch: This is a very serious question. Is it possible for a person to cross the line under these circumstances without the Canadian or United States authorities having a record of his doing so?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only say that the hon. gentleman's question indicates that it could not be. I cannot disagree with the apparent conclusion that he has in mind, having regard to the nature of his question, that Mr. Banks crossed the line into the United States. When he did so, they would say, "Canadian or American?" They would not require an answer, perhaps, but when the name Banks was given they would know him. Even if the name was not given as Hal Banks, if you had seen him once you would never forget him.

Is this man in the United States? Here is an interesting thing, Mr. Chairman. Weeks after the event I asked the minister if he had ascertained from the immigration officers of the United States whether or not he entered there. He said, I will make inquiries. One newspaper reported that a minister had said within the last few days Banks was in New York. He does not need to conceal himself. In my opinion, he cannot be extradited. Having first read the Extradition Act, I then made inquiries from other counsel and they told me they cannot believe it possible that he could be brought back to Canada. Is that the reason we get the kind of supercilious answer we receive when we ask this question?—"We have spoken to the F.B.I. in the United States." Imagine a criminal who flouted every law he could flout according to the Norris report, convicted and given five years—how he must laugh at the administration of Canadian justice. Already there is evidence in the United States that people are asking why it is that Canadian justice, which has always had the highest reputation, should have allowed itself to be circumvented in this way. Why can we not get any answers?

Sir, here is a man with a record of violence who, after conviction in September, I believe, came to Ottawa. The law officers did not pick him up then, they charged him with that offence later for which he will face trial. Why would a government that was anxious to get its hands on Banks fail for five long weeks to ascertain from United States immigration authorities whether or not he had gone into the United States? This is not only a frightful commentary, but one for which responsibility rests on the government. I say that without any fear of successful contradiction. They do not seem to want him. They go through the motions. They let him out on bail. I am not arguing that; the court did that. They let him out on a bail bond to which they could have objected.

An ordinary man suspected of crime cannot leave the jurisdiction of a court. Banks, convicted of a crime, could and apparently did. This is one of the great mysteries of our times. He never had anything to worry about. The trials meant nothing to him because he must have known when those trials started that so long as he was able to get back to his own country, whatever the penalties might be in Canada, they would not be imposed if a bail bond were provided. He had nothing to worry about, nothing whatever.

Sir, we want to get to the bottom of this. I asked for an investigation and the answer given by the government was, you do not need an investigation. I am beginning to think that is right. It is as obvious as the nose on one's face that if he were not extraditable, if he were convicted of conspiracy and allowed to go out on bail under a bond that did not prevent leaving the jurisdiction, this would provide him with an opportunity of which he was not slow to take advantage. I warned about that in May and in July. The answer I received from the Minister of Justice in July, I believe it was, was that we have a sufficient guarantee he will be in court on September 14 to take his trial. Well, it is a great mystery. The boss of the S.I.U. in the past can still exercise that authority through his vice president. The boss, convicted of a serious crime, subject to what the Supreme Court of Canada may do on appeal, is able to walk out of this country, drive out or leave in any other way, fly from any responsibility and simply vanish, and I say he vanished without there being any apparent concern on the part of the government.

The Minister of Justice, in a very suave way, indicates that we have got hopes that we will get him. You do not bring honour to the administration of Canadian justice by allowing a wrongdoer, a gangster, to act as he will, to dominate as he feels, and then when he faces the law, when he loses, to escape entirely.

I come back to the question of investigation. The government of Canada, despite the very lucid circumstances connected with this matter, owes it to the people of Canada to give an opportunity for examination into the looseness with which this man played with the law of Canada. At the same time the other, who is to face a charge of conspiracy with Banks, I think on September 14, is still in the seats of the mighty—McLaughlin.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg asked a very simple question as to whether anybody had inquired from the S.I.U. where Banks was as he received his salary cheque from the S.I.U. Mr. Chairman, I believe that they never thought of that across the way. Do you? They would have had an awful shock if they had thought of asking that question. This is one of the most serious things the government has permitted to take place, to make a laughingstock of justice, to place a foreign gangster in a position where he can well boast in the United States how he achieved his objectives, broke the law, was convicted, and served outside of jail in another country, the land of his birth.

This Banks' record has left a legacy to the S.I.U. that must be discharged, and we want to know whether it is being discharged. We find these seamen who state that they are being denied jobs because of a do not ship list. The minister says there is none that he knows of. This is something that requires to be looked into.

There are many things that separate us that often are of no great consequence but, sir, when you find the law of the land trampled on and made ridiculous, the mystery of Hal Banks deserves to be looked into. I am not going over what I said before, but for years he was the anointed of Liberalism. When he could have been deported for smuggling—any other person would have been—an order in council was passed by the St. Laurent government to give him landed status, and it omitted his conviction.

When he came into Canada he had a record. Sometimes I have felt that some portions of the imprisonment imposed on him were not just—14 years for the issuing of bouncing cheques seems to me to be beyond what is within the realm of reason, but that was his sentence and, lo and behold, when he came to Canada the immigration officers forgot to enter that he had a record, or he could not have gotten in. Then when he established another record in Canada, when the order in council was made the Liberal government of that day forgot to include the conviction. In 1964 they forgot to get a forwarding address.

Mr. Winch: In view of the emphasis the Leader of the Opposition has placed on this matter of Hal Banks and the S.I.U. and the points he has brought to the attention of the committee, I would like to ask if in his opinion there should be a request made for a complete and an exhaustive examination as to how a man having a criminal record in the United States was allowed into Canada, how a man having broken the law of Canada on smuggling and being convicted, and having broken that law again, has now escaped from Canada—how all this could occur from beginning to end unless there is a suspicion of conspiracy? Is the right hon. member prepared to state in view of his own remarks that this is a matter into which members of the House of Commons have a right to demand a complete and exhaustive examination?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is, exactly. I am not accepting the principle of conspiracy—I am not dealing with that; but I would like to see an investigation all through the past—

Mr. MacEachen: From 1957?

Mr. Diefenbaker: From three or four months before he came to Canada, and the correspondence from then on with the officials.

We tried to get rid of him when we were in office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Look at the record. But he had landed rights and an order in council that gave him those rights and we could not deport him. Otherwise we would have.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the right hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Nicholson: I ask the question because I am quite sure the right hon. gentleman would not wish to be misunderstood. Did I understand him correctly when he said that the Minister of Justice had stated that there was no list?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that he knew of no list. Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. Nicholson: Does the right hon. gentleman not recall that the statement of the Minister of Labour was that he had been assured by the chairman of the maritime commission, a distinguished member of the supreme court of my province—that he had the assurance of this eminent justice, the chairman of the commission, that there was no list?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not doubt you had an assurance. But you can have an assurance, and the man who is out of a job and who cannot get one because he was on the black list knows whether there was a list or not.

Mr. Macdonald: We have just heard the Leader of the Opposition making certain references to what he calls the mystery of Hal Banks. But perhaps the greatest mystery, when we remember that this occurred in 1957, and that the facts were known to the former government, is why he was not brought to justice earlier. Why did they do nothing about Hal Banks until 1961, when the seaway had been physically blocked by the contending parties? That is the great mystery about this. I should like an answer to that question, and I am sure the country would like one as well.

The Leader of the Opposition also made certain assertions about the legal process and the practice of the courts. I am sure he would not want to mislead the house with regard to what I think are principles generally accepted by lawyers. First, he asserted that there had been negligence on the part of the law officers of the crown in permitting Banks to go free on bail.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. I never said that. I said in letting him go free on bail without the inclusion of the words "shall not depart the court without leave".

Mr. Macdonald: I appreciate the right hon. gentleman's intervention and I would refer him specifically to form 28 of the Canadian Criminal Code and the subsection contained in that form which specifically excepts from the provisions with regard to bail on appeal the words which he has used. Some months ago in this house the hon. member for Bow River made an assertion that this was a customary and standard inclusion in any form of bail bond. I point out now, as I did then, that that is entirely false. It is not a provision of the Criminal Code and I am advised by the senior counsel acting for the crown in this case that it is not the practice of the courts in Quebec to insert that provision in bail bonds, and that such a provision could not have been expected in this case. I emphasize again that the request of the law officers of the crown to the court was that Mr. Banks should not be allowed out on bail at all but that he should be kept in custody. But I would also remind hon. members that it is, after all, up to the judge to decide in what circumstances a man should be allowed bail, and it was the judgment of Mr. Justice Tremblay, the chief justice of Quebec that he should be granted this privilege. It is a damaging and misleading statement to suggest that the law officers of the crown were responsible for letting Banks out on bail. Decisions as to bail are, after all, the duty of the court. Moreover, it is the duty of the Minister of Justice, as well as the rest of us, to respect the decisions of the courts, and that is what we are doing.

The decision in accordance with the Criminal Code was that this man should be set at liberty. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman's concept of liberty is, but one would gather from him that he believes it means keeping a man under 24 hour surveillance and taking him into custody if he makes one move outside his house. That is not the law of this country, and I hope it will never be. I am surprised that the Leader of the Opposition should suggest, in any way, that it should be. All appropriate steps had been taken by the law officers of the crown to lay all possible charges against Hal Banks. The prosecution was pressed as soon as possible, and a conviction was secured. Proceedings were taken to make certain that Banks would be available for the hearing—

Some hon. Members: Where is he?

Mr. Macdonald: Let me point out again to hon. members who would like to muddy the record that it was a decision of the Quebec courts exercising their jurisdiction that he should be allowed liberty. We have heard too often in this house the suggestion that in some way or other the decision of the court should have been disregarded and that this prisoner, or any prisoner, if let out on bail should be subjected to surveillance. It would be a mockery of justice if the law officers of the crown were to disregard orders of the court, specifically that a man should be allowed out at liberty.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to reply to two questions—

The Chairman: Perhaps before the right hon. gentleman replies to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice I should bring to his attention and to the attention of all hon. members that our debate in committee this afternoon seems to have strayed away from the labour aspect of this situation. I realize it is not easy to determine what part of this matter involves justice and what part involves labour. But I would remind hon. members who will take part in the debate from now on that they should try to address their remarks to the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was trying so hard to do just what Your Honour has suggested. But you, yourself, have made apparent the difficulty of deciding where the Department of Justice ends and the Department of Labour begins. That is one of the great difficulties in this case. There are two departments involved. If I tried to bring this matter up on the estimates of the Department of Justice, the answer would be—the Norris commission.

But to answer the hon. gentleman, there was no suggestion that the person convicted should not be let out on bail so long as it was assured he would be there to take his punishment. No one suggested there should be any onus on the part of the crown to watch a person as he went from place to place while he was free. What I did suggest was this—that it is a strange commentary on the administration of justice that a gangster who has a sentence of five years should be free to go as he will to the United States or any other place, yet if a man who has a good record in the past is charged with an offence and let out on bail, the provision made in respect of him is as follows—I will read the form:

Whereas by order dated the—day of—reciting that A.B., hereinafter called the accused, was charged before me for a certain offence herein mentioned, and that—I am sorry. I have been reading from the wrong form.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They both appear on the same page. This is the one. This is form 28.

The condition of the written recognizance is such that whereas the accused was this day charged before the justices within mentioned for that—

And here appear details of the charge

—if, therefore, the accused appears at the next superior court of criminal jurisdiction (or court of general or quarter sessions of the peace) to be holden in and for the said county and there surrenders himself into the custody of the keeper of the common gaol (or lock-up house), and pleads to such indictment as may be found against him by the grand jury, for and in respect to the charge aforesaid, and takes his trial upon the same, and does not depart the said court without leave, then the said recognizance to be void, otherwise to stand in full force and virtue.

Talk about travesties. A man who had committed no known offence, but a prima facie case of the crown has been made out against him, cannot leave the jurisdiction of the courts. But if he had about him the halo of Banks, he can. I have nothing to say about the decision of the court to grant bail. The crown asked for high bail. The judge fixed it at $25,000. But what I do say is that it had the appearance of being more than coincidence that the solicitude for Banks shown during the years still continues, when the bail bond was made out.

The hon. gentleman asked: why did we not prosecute him? As a matter of fact, we set up the Norris commission. That commission found the evidence, and then this government prosecuted on the basis of the evidence the Norris commission brought out.

An hon. Member: With reluctance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not like to say that; I would say, after undue delay. Indeed, I do not forget that the former minister of justice, the predecessor of the present minister, withheld action on the warrant for Banks' arrest when he was available to be arrested.

Mr. MacEachen: This is a very important point, Mr. Chairman, and I think it ought to be underlined. The incident for which Mr. Banks was convicted occurred in 1957. It occurred after the right hon. gentleman became prime minister of Canada. No new facts were uncovered subsequent to the Norris commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacEachen: These facts were investigated at the time and were made known to the government of the day. It was open to that government for all those years to prosecute Mr. Banks for an incident that took place in August, 1957. That is one mystery that I would like to have cleared up by the Leader of the Opposition. Why did he annoint and coddle Mr. Banks and refuse to prosecute him on facts that were known in August, 1957 and widely publicized at that time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the statement that we refused to prosecute is as completely without foundation as is possible.

Mr. MacEachen: It is a fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is unjustified, and untrue.

Mr. MacEachen: It is a fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it is untrue, if a fact can be untrue.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, will the Leader of the Opposition deny that this case was investigated by the R.C.M. Police at that time? Will he deny that? He cannot deny it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can understand the heated feelings that are aroused in the minister by the revelation of these facts. The way in which this government uses smokescreens such as this to cover up their negligence in connection with Banks is equal only to the solicitude shown throughout the years to him.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The evidence was forthcoming—

Mr. MacEachen: Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in the Norris report. Mr. Chairman, I have never known two to speak at once, and one intelligently; and I am speaking intelligently. I can understand the feeling in this regard. While we argue and the government defends what took place, Banks enjoys his liberty at the expense of the reputation of Canadian justice.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, there are two things with which I should like the Leader of the Opposition to deal. Will he deny that the incident which took place in 1957 was investigated at that time by the police? Will he deny that? Second, will he deny that these facts were made known to the government of the day?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I immediately deny the second question, and as far as the first is concerned, my recollection is that we did everything we could to be sure that if we prosecuted, we would have a case. It was not until Mr. Justice Norris investigated this matter for months and months that sufficient evidence became available—because these employees of the S.I.U. would not talk; they dare not talk; they had hanging over them the tyranny of Banks, and McLaughlin too, and they were afraid to talk and bring out the necessary corroborative evidence.

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition has now made it quite clear that this case was investigated in 1957. He has made it quite clear that at that time the government of the day must have concluded that there were not sufficient grounds for prosecution. The evidence upon which Mr. Banks was convicted was not drawn in any way from the Norris report, not at all; it was drawn from evidence collected by the special counsel who were appointed subsequently on the recommendation of Mr. Justice Norris. Mr. Justice Norris asked that special counsel be appointed to investigate all the activities of Mr. Banks. This government appointed those special counsel; they undertook the investigation, with the assistance of the police, and sufficient evidence was accumulated to secure a conviction. It was open to the Leader of the Opposition in 1957, as head of the government, to instruct that special counsel be appointed to secure the evidence with regard to an event that took place when he was prime minister. But the fact is that the government of that day failed to take action, and it is as a result of action taken by this government that Mr. Banks was convicted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And he is free.

Mr. Rhéaume: Where is he now?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I can understand the heated argument the Minister of Labour is putting up in respect of this matter. But if we look at the Norris commission report we will see it was recommended there that special counsel be appointed by the government to look into the evidence submitted to the Norris commission.

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Starr: That was in order to ascertain whether a charge could be laid as a result of the evidence submitted to the Norris commission and to see whether proper evidence could be brought out in order to prosecute. It was only after the Norris commission report came out and that recommendation was made that we pressed the government to appoint these counsel. It was months afterwards that counsel made a report, and it was months afterwards that the revelations of the report were made and action, based on the prodding of the opposition, was taken to prosecute. This was based on the recommendation that there was enough evidence in the Norris commission report to justify proceeding with the laying of charges.

Mr. Rhéaume: Then they helped him across the line, too.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, first I would confirm what the Minister of Labour said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonald: —that the previous minister of justice, the minister of justice of the former government, had before him substantially the evidence upon which Banks was convicted in 1963.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Substantially.

Mr. Macdonald: That government failed to take action on it. Therefore it does not lie with them to accuse anyone of being dilatory or a friend of Banks. They failed to follow up the evidence that was before their noses. Second, Mr. Chairman, there was another misrepresentation from the other side of the house. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition very solemnly read to the committee a part of the Criminal Code. He started by reading the wrong page, but he got on to the right page.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; the right page, but the wrong form.

Mr. Macdonald: He read to the committee the form of bail bond where an accused is being committed for trial. He was very careful not to read the form used in appeal proceedings such as these, which is subparagraph (g) and which contains nothing like the provisions he read to the committee. There is no provision in that appeal bail bond form set out in the Criminal Code preventing the accused from leaving the jurisdiction or requiring him to remain continuously within the jurisdiction of the court before the day set for the appeal.

Mr. Rhéaume: Where is Banks? Where is your buddy?

Mr. Gelber: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about automation and manpower consultative services.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gelber: I would like to comment on the words of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition when he referred to Hal Banks and said he was anointed of Liberalism. I wonder what protection the anointed of Liberalism had under Conservatism, because it took some years before he was brought to court. Certainly the evidence upon which Mr. Banks was convicted is only one aspect of the Norris commission report. There are other matters that were certainly brought to the attention of the government. There was the agreement between a shipping company of Sarnia and the S.I.U. which Mr. Justice Norris considered was in defiance of the law. This matter was discussed at the highest echelons of the government at the time of the previous administration, and nothing was done.

Another matter the right hon. gentleman mentioned was the $500 bonus for winter home building. He quoted the hon. member for York East as a builder. I think if he moved around the construction workers of York South and ascertained that for the first time in many years there was a higher rate of employment during those dour months, he would understand why there is wide support for the very successful enterprise carried on by this government in order to encourage winter employment.

I was very much impressed with the report of the American council on education with regard to the state of employment in the United States. They pointed out that while there were five million unemployed in the United States, there were four million unfilled job opportunities. We are moving into a period when more and more the employment demand will be for skilled personnel. Unskilled people without training, people with deficiencies in education, will find it more and more difficult to gain employment.

In a speech at Queen's University last May the Minister of Labour pointed out that 90 per cent of the light bulbs and tubes manufactured in the United States, with the exception of picture tubes, are produced by 14 machine operators. This is one aspect of the development of automation which does require skilled personnel and yet displaces a lot of workers. The automobile industry in the United States in 1963 produced seven million cars. The automobile industry in the United States in 1955 also produced seven million cars. But in 1963 the industry produced seven million cars with 17 per cent less labour force. This is an important problem which sets up a challenge that this government must meet. It sets up a challenge in terms of the means of production and distribution, a means which will completely revolutionize our social and economic system. This is based largely on the development of automation and a highly sophisticated production system.

Automation is based on three main components. First of all, there is the self-regulating system. For example, the simple thermostat which one has in one's house is a self-regulating system. Second, there is the electronic computer which stores information and is capable of logical decision making. This has made possible the development of our economy and the use of the many services which otherwise would not be available to us. Yet this highly sophisticated and mature machine, the electronic computer, represents a threat to our society and threatens the jobs of hundreds of thousands of workers. The third component is the highly organized assembly system of laying out work. These three components when placed together are the basis of automation.

Automation requires certain types of materials. The hard substances which we use in our economy today are not easily absorbed in a highly automated assembly. Therefore, automation requires new substances, and science is busily engaged in producing these new substances to feed a highly automated system. Someone pointed out that whereas formerly the consumer would set up demand and would set in motion the process of production by his requirements, today it is the scientist and the engineer who are skilfully engaged in determining what such a system can produce and who are putting into reverse the well known saying and showing, as one wag put it, that invention is becoming the mother of necessity.

What are we in this country doing in order to meet the need for skills, and what are we doing in terms of planning? We have a system of joint training projects to which the Minister of Labour has referred. We have engaged in these systems of training, which are joint programs between the provinces and the federal government, in the 12-month period ending March 31, 287,187 Canadians. Of these, 164,420 were people who were being trained in vocational schools and high schools. That means that out of a labour force of 6,600,000 or more there are only 123,000 people receiving training through the joint programs. Of the 164,000 people who are at school more than half are taking business courses. Although these are important it means that only a small number of people in vocational and high schools are getting the skills necessary to absorb them in the productive mechanism which is so important.

It is my contention that we will never be able to build the schools and engage the people to provide the training which is required, unless more is done. The steps already taken by the government help, and the programs started by the previous government are also of assistance. But in the conception of the total problem it seems to me that we are not sufficiently imaginative and must do more. The greatest school for providing industrial skills is industry itself. Industry has the equipment, the knowhow and the leadership. It seems to me that we must conceive of industry not only as producing commodities but also as producing skills which will upgrade the labour force in this country and make it possible in this twentieth century to meet the challenge of automation. We must do more to give inducements to industry, and we must provide the opportunities to develop skilled tradesmen and craftsmen who are so much demanded by our society.

The program announced by the Minister of Labour some months ago, and which he mentioned again today—the manpower consultative service—is one step toward mobilizing our resources toward meeting this objective. We must look to industry as the most important school for retraining our labour force and as the most important school for giving that capability to our workers to meet the challenge of 1964.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, now that we are back on the estimates of the Department of Labour, I should like to say that I was pleased that the hon. member for Ontario made the reference that he did to William Jenoves, who passed away yesterday. I agree with the hon. member for Ontario that in paying tribute to this man who spent six decades working in the trade union movement we are paying tribute to all those who over the years have helped to build this very important and living aspect of our democratic way of life.

We have a Minister of Labour at the present time who is not only an honourable gentleman; he is also a gentleman. That is our trouble. He is a very fine man and is very charming. In fact, with all his charm and his capacity for making promises it mystifies me that he is still a bachelor. And I am saying that in 1964, a leap year at that. As everyone knows he seems in the labour field to be the epitome of the capacity of the Liberals over the years to make promises, and to make them in such a charming way that we are lulled into believing that they are going to be kept. He did it again today, and this time I hope he not only meant it but that it will come true. He went just as far as he could in saying that before the end of the month of September—and when I questioned him he said he meant 1964—legislation for a national labour code would be on the order paper. I hope I do not sound cynical if I refer to the fact that this is the kind of promise that has been made over and over again. True, this minister has never become quite so specific in terms of time. Thus far he has told us it would come "soon" or "as soon as possible" or "very soon" or "just as soon as we can make it", and so on. I hope that this time he has pinned himself down.

I remind him that, as he well knows, when we were dealing with his estimates last year we were able to pin him down fairly well on November 8, 1963. On that day we were dealing with the estimates of the Department of Labour for last year and we got out of the Minister of Labour what seemed like a promise to bring in a national labour code at this session. I was anxious to pin him down on that, and on a couple of other matters as well, and so on page 4605 of Hansard for November 8, 1963, I referred in particular to three matters, amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, a labour code, and doing something about the Unemployment Insurance Act. I asked the minister if he would not summon up his courage and assure us that action would be taken on those three matters during the following session of parliament, namely the session now with us. On page 4605 of Hansard for November 8, 1963, I read this paragraph:

> Mr. MacEachen: Subject to the approval of a number of other persons directly involved, I have no hesitation in saying that we will want to take action on the Unemployment Insurance Act and the labour code within the time mentioned by my hon. friend.

I interject to say that I thought that was a pretty clear promise that at this session we would get action on those two things, the Unemployment Insurance Act and a national labour code. I continue the quotation:

> I would be very rash indeed to give the same kind of assurance with respect to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, because, as at the present time, I have not, nor has my department given the kind of consideration in depth—

That is a great phrase.

> —to the proposals put forward to justify my giving an assurance of that kind. However, we will consider these proposals and perhaps at a later date I will be glad to add this particular suggestion to the rather optimistic prospect I have given in connection with the other two.

I found the Minister of Labour so charming and such a gentleman last year that I thought it was a certainty that at this session we would get action on the Unemployment Insurance Act and on a national labour code, and that there was a possibility that we would get action on amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It is now clear that the only one of these three with regard to which there is any hope so far as this session is concerned is the national labour code. I hope it will be on the order paper shortly and I hope the Minister of Labour will make the strongest representations he can to the Prime Minister, the house leader and those who are responsible for things around here to see to it that we get at that item as soon as possible after it gets on the order paper. I need not take any time discussing what is happening to the business of the house at this session, but it still seems to me that some of our time, no matter what else we may have to deal with, should be spent on other legislation and that this is one of the items that should be got through at this session, no matter what happens.

I hope that the labour code will be a substantial document. I hope that at least it will deal with the ingredients that we discussed last year, the first being a minimum wage. I hope that the provision for a minimum wage in the labour code will not be a pious hope. I trust it will not be something that is flexible, permitting different rates in different parts of the country. I hope the minister is aware of the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress, which for a few years was proposing $1.25 an hour as a minimum wage, decided at its last convention that under today's conditions the minimum should be $1.50 an hour.

I also trust there will be provision in the code for maximum number of hours of work per day, a maximum work week and certain other matters. In particular, I hope the labour code will improve the vacations with pay legislation, which is the only ingredient of a national labour code that we now have on the statute books. As the minister knows, this was not put on the statute books by the Liberals, but by the Conservatives when they were in power a few years ago. In my view the provisions with respect to that matter should be improved along the lines of certain private members' public bills that I have introduced. There should also be provision for statutory holidays with pay.

As I say, I hope that these five ingredients at least will be in the national labour code. It may be that a national labour code is also the place to make certain provisions regarding safety and other matters to protect workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction. As the minister said when he was making his remarks earlier, this is a subject about which some of us have been having a good deal to say for a good many years, but I will not today do as I so often do, pull out the 1919 program of the Liberal party. That is a long way back now, but at any rate let us have implementation at this session of the promises that the present generation of Liberals have made to us.

I also hope the minister will pay some attention to what he said on November 8, 1963, regarding the Unemployment Insurance Act. He led us to believe then that action on that matter at this session was on a parallel with the intended action on the national labour code, but there has been no indication at this session that anything of that nature is in store for us. Likewise, even though his commitment last year was not very strong, we feel that improvements are needed in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. If the minister wonders what the details are, he can find them in the record of the debate on these estimates a year ago.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, said, when we started to prepare for this day's debate we wondered what there was to say that we did not say a year ago. We said it all then and virtually nothing has happened in the meantime, except that the minister has given us the benefit of his charm and has made these promises. A year ago we felt that at least he was coping with some very difficult problems involving a number of disputes and so on that were on his doorstep, and we gave him full marks for the courageous and active way he was coping with them. He earned quite a reputation. Even my hon. friend, the columnist who sits in front of me was rating him very high in the cabinet of that day; but in the meantime we have to settle for his charm. They are wonderful—

Mr. MacEachen: Just for a month.

Mr. Knowles: Just for a month?

Mr. MacEachen: You should have more by the end of the month.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the minister is not going to turn his charm off at the end of the month—

Mr. MacEachen: Charm, plus.

Mr. Knowles: —but that we will have something solid in terms of legislation.

Mr. Fisher: No LaMarshian stuff.

Mr. Knowles: But even now he is asking me to settle for the one piece of legislation which he promised earlier today, namely a national labour code. It is going to be good to get that, but I suggest that these other items should also be proceeded with at the earliest possible date.

We welcome the fact that there is on the order paper government order No. 39 calling for parliament to approve of the I.L.O. convention regarding discrimination in employment. We hope there will be an early opportunity for parliament to deal with that and we hope that the government will bring other I.L.O. conventions before parliament for its approval.

Because, as I say, most of what we might say we said last year, and because those things we asked for last year have not yet been implemented, and because other members wish to speak I intend to keep my remarks very brief.

There is just this other point to which I should like to give expression and it was mentioned last year after other members had spoken by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. It has been mentioned from time to time by other hon. members. I have the feeling that during the time it has taken the Liberals to implement their 1919 promises, time has moved on. Those things that would have been of tremendous advantage to the working people of Canada in the twenties, thirties, forties, and fifties, such as the national labour code that we are now perhaps going to get, are not enough to meet the conditions of our time. Automation, to which the last speaker referred, technological changes and all the changes in our economic and social structure, will make necessary far more sweeping changes than are involved even in things like a good national labour code.

People are recognizing the fact, and economists of various schools have been speaking in this direction, that the day may soon come when we may have to provide people with an income, even though they are not engaged in what is sometimes called productive work. The whole process of automation by which we are able to produce things to make up the affluent society can change our society tremendously, and some brand new, imaginative thinking has to be done in this field. This involves more than the Department of Labour. It certainly involves the Department of Finance, it involves the whole of government policy, but the Minister of Labour is the person who should be the spokesman in the government for the great mass of our people, and in our view he should be taking the lead in any government to which he belongs to try to get some new thinking in this field. The day is going to come when, entirely apart from any productive work there may be for people to do, we are going to have to do things to expand our educational horizons; we are going to have to make it possible for people to make a contribution to our life and to our times in other ways than just trying to run machines or even pushing the buttons of an automated plant.

This is a tremendous field. I know that the minister with his academic background, is interested in it. I call upon him to bring to bear those academic thoughts that he has on the practical problem of improving the situation for the labouring people, and indeed for all the people of this country. We welcome, as I say, the improvements that are at long last in prospect, improvements promised by the Liberals 45 years ago. I suggest to the minister that if we are going to make life in Canada in the affluent sixties and seventies what it ought to be, not just for a privileged few at the top but for all the working people of the country, he still has a great deal to do. I trust he will add this as an additional supplement to the promises he has already made.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on the matter of the S.I.U. trustees and some of the other aspects of the estimates that have been dealt with earlier this afternoon. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat taken aback by the exchange between the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and members on the government side with regard to the matter of Hal Banks. Much was said about it this afternoon and it perhaps is not necessary for me to add to it, but I cannot help but think that if we were to accept that which was stated by the Leader of the Opposition in his final submission this afternoon, when he said that the administration of justice under his government in 1957 was unable to get people in this country to talk and give evidence on the crimes that had been committed and the only way that the administration some six years later could get evidence of these same crimes was through a royal commission, certainly it would be a sad commentary on the efficiency of the administration of justice under the former regime. I would be extremely surprised if the minister of justice of that time would agree with the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon.

Actually of course it was a very clever effort on the part of the Leader of the Opposition to escape what must be the decision of history that the Conservative government between 1957 and 1962 did absolutely nothing. These were the years when Hal Banks was only beginning to stretch his octopus-like tentacles across the Canadian labour movement. During those years between 1957 and 1962—

Mr. Fisher: Oh, oh.

Mr. Regan: Has the hon. member got a pain? During those years between 1957 and 1962—

Mr. Fisher: I sure have.

Mr. Regan: —he extended and expanded his grasp of the labour movement. During those years, the troubles on the great lakes grew. I cannot help but admire the sheer audacity of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I am somewhat reminded of the statement that all "gall" is divided into three parts, and he has all three parts. He has the unmitigated gall to come in here and, despite the fact no action was taken against Hal Banks and the S.I.U. gangsters during his regime because the administration of justice was inefficient, say that we should have done something about Hal Banks.

Mr. Herridge: Members of the opposition had been urging the Liberal government for years to take action.

Mr. Regan: It finally came to the point where only a royal commission could get the evidence needed. Yet, in spite of this the Leader of the Opposition does not avoid the point. He has the gall to come in here, change the facts around and try to say that it has been the Liberals who have protected Banks over the years. I am sure that if the government finds Mr. Banks they will make every effort to extradite him, bring him back to Canada and face a trial. So far as I am concerned, personally, I am not sure I am in favour of that. So far as I am concerned, far more important than Hal Banks or all the Hal Bankses, is the re-establishment of peace on the great lakes. This has been accomplished through the efficiency of our present Minister of Labour. Then, I should like to see a democratic system established in the S.I.U. so that that union could be brought back into the main stream of the Canadian trade union movement.

There has been some criticism here today, somewhat disturbing criticism, of the actions of the trustees. I hope that criticism is not accurate. I hope that some time this fall the Minister of Labour will be able to prevail upon the trustees to appear before the industrial relations committee so that we may have an opportunity of discussing with the trustees what their actions have been. Until the contrary is shown to me, I am inclined to believe the trustees have been doing an effective job and that they are making progress towards the objectives that we set for them. Let us remember that hon. members who sit in the group directly opposite my very back bench—

Mr. Skoreyko: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Regan: —were the ones who urged the setting up of this board of trustees.

The Chairman: Order please. Would the hon. member who has the floor permit a question?

Mr. Regan: It would be an exquisite pleasure.

Mr. Skoreyko: Will the hon. member agree with the Minister of Labour that Mr. Millard is doing an effective job when he claims he has not even read the Norris report?

Mr. Regan: I am not aware whether Mr. Millard has read the Norris report or not, but I am not at all convinced that is essential to doing an effective job in his position. I believe that the trustees were set up to run the union, to return it to a democratic type of system, and to see to it we had peace on the great lakes.

I was starting out to say, and I think this pertains to the question asked by the hon. member, that members of the group directly opposite me were among those who urged at the time that the trustees be given a free hand once the board was established to run the union, so that parliament would not be attempting to be the board of trustees itself. Actually Mr. Millard, who I presume is quite acceptable to that group because he was once an N.D.P. candidate, and the other trustees, have shown successful results. We have seen the fact that we do have peace, that commerce is moving between Canada and the United States across the great lakes.

Mr. Herridge: At any price.

Mr. Regan: I am not going into the subject of how much I as a Haligonian am in favour of great lakes commerce, particularly in wintertime; but coming back to the point, the trustees should not be subjected to slighting remarks because of little differences between what they have done and what individual hon. members, 265 of them, feel that they should do. Obviously every step they take is not going to meet with the approval of everyone in this chamber; but what they have done is (a) brought peace on the lakes and (b) have brought about the position that elections are coming up in the S.I.U. in which, for the first time in many years, there will be the opportunity for the rank and file members of the S.I.U. to campaign effectively for office. We can take note of the fact that there is going to be a three cornered contest for the presidency, and contests for other positions, and I do not know what more the trustees could do than what they have done towards moving to return the S.I.U. to the rank and file of the workers and to the mainstream of Canadian democratic unionism.

I certainly deplore the fact that in some corners of this chamber every effort is made to suggest that either the trustees or the government are anxious to defend Harold Banks. Such has not been the case and I hope when the trustees do appear before a committee of the house there will be ample opportunity for this to be displayed.

Before taking my seat I wish to mention one or two other matters. I noted with interest the minister's report on the older workers' program, and I have to agree with him that it has at least reasonable success, judging from the number of older workers who had been unemployed for six to eight months prior to their applications and who have received benefits and employment. However, I think the minister and the committee would be quick to agree in this era of automation that this is only a beginning exercise in assisting older workers, but it is a good beginning. The department should and must examine other ways by which the older worker, who becomes redundant or whose job disappears because of automation or technological changes, can make a worthwhile contribution to our economic processes and support himself and his family.

We look forward with interest to the forthcoming introduction of the national labour code, but beyond the introduction of that I would remind the minister that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act itself is badly in need of overhaul because many of its sections are out of date with conditions as they exist in industry today, and I trust the time is rapidly approaching when it will be possible to give that act a complete overhaul.

Mr. More: I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) who mentioned that he hoped the trustees would be appearing soon before a committee of the house. I think hon. members on all sides have expressed strong enough feelings to justify the trustees or the board chairman appearing before a committee, so that members may understand the facts. We want to know what price has been paid for the achievements of the board, as recited by the hon. member.

We know the price we paid under a Liberal administration for ridding the lakes of so-called communists. They involved us with gangsters and we are not out of that yet. We still have McLaughlin in the seats of the mighty, and therefore it is imperative that the trustees appear as soon as possible before a committee of the house. Will the minister tell the committee very definitely when arrangements are going to be made for the trustees, or the chairman, to appear before a committee of the house to give the facts about the S.I.U., Banks and the situation on the great lakes?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. More: Is the minister not going to give an answer to that very direct question?

The Chairman: Order. May I suggest for the sake of good order in the work of the committee that we have contributions from hon. members, and the minister may answer questions later.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, other speakers have referred to the winter works program, but not quite along the lines on which I want to discuss it briefly. I think it important to bring certain points to the direct attention of the minister before he formulates his winter works program for this year.

I believe the minister has received a brief from the Regina housebuilders association, which has a membership of 96 firms. I represent part of Regina and I am associated with the hon. member for Regina City in outlining the main points in the brief, and the points which I shall bring out also apply to my home city of Moose Jaw, and other Saskatchewan and prairie cities.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition referred to the defects in last winter's $500 house bonus program, and these defects are certainly apparent on the prairies. To support that assertion I will quote portions of the brief from the Regina housebuilders association. I believe the minister has received it and I imagine he has answered it, but I would like to put a few points on record. It says:

> This brief from the Regina housebuilders association with a membership of 96 firms, is requesting certain changes in the $500 house bonus program of the federal government's winter works scheme.

Before proceeding to discuss the brief from the Regina housebuilders association I should like to point out that they are not opposed to a winter works incentive program but merely to the federal government's house bonus program in its present form. Members of the association feel the success or failure of this year's winter works program in their region is dependant upon certain necessary changes being made in the regulations. The brief stresses two points. One is the short period of winter employment support offered in 1963-64, namely, from December 1 to March 31. This would compare with the winter works program of the former government which started on October 15 and ended April 30. The second point they bring out is that winter building costs on the prairies greatly affect the success or failure of a winter works program. In this regard I should like to quote from the brief as follows:

> Members of the Regina housebuilders association maintain that winter building costs greatly affect the success or failure of a winter works program. A national housebuilders survey of winter building costs across Canada established extra cost for winter building at from $300 to $1,100 depending on the region in Canada in which the house is built. This means builders in areas that have an average extra winter building cost of $300 have a $200 incentive to offer their purchasers if they buy a winter built house...but builders in areas where climatic conditions are very severe, such as those in the prairie region, have nothing to offer except costs in excess of the bonus amount.

A further point made in the brief is this:

In addition, winter works houses this year will have to bear the increase of most of the cost of the 3 per cent sales tax increase to go into effect January 1, 1965.

They are referring to the fact that on January 1 there will be a federal sales tax of 11 per cent on building materials. The recommendation in the brief on this particular point is:

The Regina housebuilders association, therefore, respectfully requests the Department of Labour to increase the amount of the winter works bonus paid the purchaser by an amount equal to the difference between winter costs in the most favourable region of Canada and those found in the region in which the house is being built.

I think this is a reasonable recommendation to place before the minister and I hope it will be given consideration. The brief goes on:

Regina housebuilders realize the federal government's winter works bonus plan has been designed to stimulate construction and create employment during the winter months when unemployment is usually at a peak. They also acknowledge that the 1963-64 winter works program was designed to alleviate this condition by promoting employment between December 1 and March 31 each winter.

However, unemployment in the prairie region occurs earlier in the fall and remains later in the spring than in other areas of Canada.

The recommendation made to the minister is as follows:

We therefore respectfully request the federal Department of Labour to consider the merits of extending the winter works $500 house bonus program to include the spring and fall periods of unemployment in the prairie regions...especially November and April.

As I mentioned before, the program of the last government began on October 15 and ended on April 30.

Another point brought out in the brief is this:

Regina housebuilders wish to point out that during the 1963-64 winter works bonus program, the Department of Labour refused to recognize an irrevocable assignment or power of attorney from the purchaser, thus enabling the builder to collect the $500 bonus amount from the government as part of the purchaser's house payment. Builders maintained they were entitled to payment for a completed product before occupancy and refused occupancy until payment was forthcoming. Consequently, many purchasers, and especially those in the lower income groups, were unable to raise the required amount and were forced by this requirement to find other accommodation at additional expense until their bonus application was processed by the government.

The recommendation in this respect is as follows:

[Mr. Pascoe.]

The association therefore, respectfully requests the Department of Labour to recognize a standard irrevocable assignment by the purchaser of the $500 bonus amount.

Again I would point out that though this is a brief presented by the Regina housebuilders association, in bringing it forward I am speaking also for other builders in Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and the prairies generally. The brief, at its conclusion, makes the following request:

Members of the Regina housebuilders association would strongly urge the federal Department of Labour to give immediate consideration to the recommendations for change as outlined in this brief so that they may be implemented before the 1964-65 winter works house bonus program goes into effect this fall.

I trust the minister will carefully consider these recommendations and incorporate them in the winter works program.

Mr. Fisher: I am inclined to agree, if I may say this on entering the discussion, with the comments made by my colleague about the minister's charm. It would appear to me that after the first flush of success which the minister enjoyed he has, in the last year, somewhat faded away. The only thing I have discovered about him in the last six or seven months is that he does not know much about baseball, compared with the Prime Minister. I do not suppose that is a serious handicap.

Some of us regret that he did not accept the position offered him as leader of the house. In view of the fact that he has been able to bring forward little of his legislative program and that he has not been embroiled in any great labour difficulty such as arises from time to time in connection with the railroads, I might comment that the hon. gentleman might well have accepted that position. If he had done so, maybe, with his charm, we would have been further along with our work this session.

I have one concrete proposal to put to the minister. It is at least current in that it ties in with the discussion going on in the country with regard to the appointment of an ombudsman fired by the visit of Sir Guy Powles of New Zealand. In my experience in labour matters, and because of my work in relation to railway unions in particular, between six and a dozen cases are brought to my notice every year of grievances felt by workers, sometimes with their own unions but more often with the way their complaints have been processed and the difficulties which arise in dealing with an international union whose final decisions are taken in the United States.

I had a case brought to my attention the other day, a case from Cornwall involving a man by the name of Kuntz who was in difficulty with the hospital employees union. It was taken up through the Canadian vice president and then it went before the Ontario labour relations board. The grievance was not upheld but in my judgment, having reviewed all the files—this is not a federal matter and I am mentioning it only as an example—this man still needs assistance. This case still needs review. I myself can see, implicit in the case in which he is involved, a tremendous tendency for the agents of the union and of the employers to co-operate in snuffing out this man's complaint, because of the trouble it would cause in terms of both the unit in which the case is involved and the membership of the union.

I have another case in connection with a railway trainman on the west coast, a man by the name of Woods, who for three years has been trying to get a grievance settled. He has lost out partly by default, it seems to me, within the union processes. I have taken it up with management and they always come back to me and say there are the proper arrangements within the contract for the man to settle his grievance.

I would like to suggest that in the United States at least one union, the steelworkers, has set up an outside court. Even the S.I.U., in the last gesture, I believe, that Mr. Banks made of any substance to indicate that the S.I.U. was a good union, created this appeal board with Commander Robertson in charge. I think there is a spirit in the labour movement, particularly in some of the more progressive unions, in the United States to say that it is a great advantage to labour if, when a particular worker has a grievance and suspects collusion between the union leadership and management, he can go to someone who is above and beyond management, government or labour—someone, in a sense, in the judicial field who has almost a judicial status and the kind of freedom to move that an ombudsman has—to settle his grievance.

Obviously, Mr. Chairman, if we are to get this kind of an officer in Canada it is going to take a great deal of co-operation in developing the idea of the office; because it needs a co-operative program perhaps on the part of 11 different departments of labour and it needs the substantial support of an organization such as the Canadian Labour Congress, and even the unions that are sometimes referred to as maverick unions that are outside the Canadian Labour Congress. I think this is a very, very worth-while idea. Partly it is a good defensive move for the labour movement itself, and partly it appeals to me because I have become more and more concerned, in my time in politics, with the poor individual citizen who gets caught up within a bureaucracy, whether it is of management, labour or government. This is something that is of increasing difficulty. I think it is a feather in the cap of the trade union movement as I know it that so few cases do come forward; that their grievance procedure does settle so many things.

I do not think there would be a welter of these complaints. I do not think it would have any effect on the normal working of the grievance procedure. But I do suggest that the minister should consider giving the lead in trying to obtain co-operation from the provincial departments of labour and from the labour movement as a whole in setting up in Canada the kind of organization and system based upon a labour ombudsman, and having some similarity in its terms of reference to what has been created in the United States by the united steelworkers. It seems to me that if the terms of reference for such an office were properly worked out, for example so that the office did not get involved in any jurisdictional disputes, and if there was a question of jurisdictional difference that would be wiped out, this would benefit those in the labour field.

One of the most important reasons for our needing this office is that judicial recourse is so rarely useful or so rarely open to a worker with this kind of grievance. This gentleman who came to see me from Cornwall has been out of work for two years. He had difficulty getting the bus fare to come to Ottawa, let alone the money necessary to hire a lawyer. I have just enough of these cases, four or five a year, to indicate to me —and I assume that other members have had similar cases brought to their attention—that this would be a very worth-while move to consider. Perhaps we should expect the unions to develop this idea in the way that Commander Robertson has developed it within the S.I.U. But I suggest it would be an imaginative step if we had such an office for the whole country. I would like the minister to give this suggestion serious consideration. I think it would be a real contribution.

One of the points where government and bureaucracy madden me is, for example, with the little gandy dance that has gone on between the minister and the hon. member for Danforth in connection with the unemployment insurance commission, the Toronto newspaper strike and the question as to whether the strikers, or the people who have been locked out, as they claim, should be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. We have this whole question of 85 per cent production. Why in the name of heavens in a case like this cannot there be a bit more dispatch? I have connections with one newspaper, and to a degree with another newspaper, at both the management and union level. It has been apparent for more than two weeks that those newspapers are in practically full production. When we hear this talk about a production of 85 per cent, we realize it is nonsense when we read the editions of the Telegram and Star. They have been putting out 76-page and 72-page editions. When you look at the amount of classified advertising, this point is brought home, because you do not get a paper of 76 pages in the city of Toronto unless you have a very large output. Having talked to the management of at least one of the papers, who say they are as efficient, if not more efficient, than they were before the strike started, I do not know how the minister can be satisfied with this kind of delay. Maybe to the bureaucrat's mind a delay of one, two or three weeks is not much; but it sure means a great deal to those strikers and the income they have, in comparison with what they seem to me to be entitled to from the unemployment insurance commission.

I certainly think the minister could, in co-operation with the head of the unemployment insurance commission, settle this matter with about three phone calls to Toronto. Maybe this is not the way you should do things; maybe you should send registered letters—I don't know. But I think three phone calls would confirm to the minister's satisfaction that there is a lot more than 85 per cent production in those newspapers.

One of the points I wanted to make in connection with the S.I.U., as I have heard the kettle addressing the pot here this afternoon in this connection as to who is responsible, is that it is very apparent from the correspondence that is filed in connection with the Norris report that the question of how the S.I.U. was behaving was brought to the attention of the former minister of labour and the previous government quite early on in its administration. I know it was brought to their attention right in this house, because I brought it to their attention, and so did the hon. member for Kootenay West. As a matter of fact, I received a number of virulent phone calls and letters over it. I also hope that the minister has read the speech, Hal Banks' speech, made last year at the S.I.U. international convention in the United States. I think this speech is worthy of his perusal. Hal was delighted with the Canadian situation because his buddies were back; the Liberals were back in power and all the noisiness of those silly New Democrats and the stubbornness, bullheadedness and the unfairness of the Diefenbaker government had disappeared, because his pals were back.

Mr. Benidickson: Oh, you don't believe that.

Mr. Fisher: That is what Hal Banks said.

Mr. Benidickson: But you don't believe it.

Mr. Fisher: He was convinced of it. I know there is an element of guilt amongst the Liberals in a Liberal administration over the relationship the party has had with the S.I.U. and Mr. Banks. I could get worked up about this personally, since the S.I.U. moved right into my own area to work with the Liberal organization in order to try and defeat me in two election campaigns. They were welcome; it was great to have them. But, Mr. Chairman, there has been an identity in the minds of a great many people between the Liberal party and Hal Banks. However, I do not want to go digging up again the whole business of how Mr. Banks and Mr. McLaughlin used to refer to Walter Harris as their Ottawa office.

I am not going to get into what I think is the kind of corn introduced by the former prime minister in connection with the recognition of red China, when he suggested that red China had to expiate its sins before Canada could give recognition. I am not suggesting that the minister or the government have to expiate any sin, but I do hope that their guilt makes them uncomfortable enough to feel that it will not be satisfactory just to do a little surface tidying up of the situation.

A few weeks ago I had the pleasure of going through the Welland canal on a freighter, calling at a United States port and then going on to the lakehead. I talked to the sailors and several of the men who were witnesses before the Norris commission. They all welcomed the fact that there is peace on the lakes. But not even the simplest among them is under any illusion that the situation has been cleared up or that it is permanently remedied. They do not expect the bombs to start bursting this year but they do expect it next year. They say it is useless to think that the tactics of the S.I.U. which have been built up over a generation in the United States are suddenly going to disappear. There will probably be peace as long as we have a trusteeship, and then the battle will develop again.

It seems to me that the only alternative is for the trusteeship really to develop a democratic approach. I took a gentleman in to see the minister a week ago. This man had been fired off a ship at the lakehead. This was despite the fact that he had an excellent record and had been with that ship for a couple of years. He also had a letter from the vice president of the C.S.L. recommending him for further training for a master's ticket. He had been fired off his ship without warning by an officer of the ship, who actually was not responsible for him, and on a phony excuse —at least, according to Mr. Mallett. But the interesting thing is Mr. Mallett's position in the union. He was against the march to Ottawa last year. He had stood, with a certain amount of bravery in my mind, against the size of the union fee membership and against any special levies. He had also been told by two officials of the S.I.U.: "You just wait, mister". Well, they got him and he now is involved in a court case, which comes under the Canada Shipping Act and which I will not comment on. I think they have got him, but many difficulties have since ensued. Now, here is a man fired off a ship. There is a grievance procedure, but has it worked well? I would say it has not, because to my mind there has been collusion to a degree between management and union officials in order to get rid of an objectionable character. That is my personal opinion.

My point is that this kind of situation does not occur in a good union. You are not going to get an arbitrary firing of a man who has an excellent record just overnight for a very minor excuse. I am just dismayed at the prospect of peace so long as the trustees are there, with the trustees not carrying out a thorough enough reform to make sure that it becomes a democratic organization. I realize we have to suspend judgment for a little longer, but I have a hunch that despite the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) the minister and his officials are no more enamoured with some of the things which have developed in this situation than I am. I would hope that the minister has a breaking point, and that that breaking point will be when he becomes convinced that real reform is not taking place. I trust that he will then let us know, and that any guilt complex which may exist will reinforce my contention that he should let us know. We will look forward to hearing the trustees before the committee.

I want to switch now to a matter which has been a very great disappointment both to myself and to a number of other members of the house, particularly to a number of Conservative members who represent railway points. I think of the late Sherwood Rideout and of all the work he did for the railway workers. It is a fact that last year the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines had before it the subject matter of a bill which I brought in. That committee almost unanimously—there was one exception—after long hearings listening to the vice presidents of both railways and hearing labour representatives, led off by the senior citizen of Canadian railway labour, Frank Hall, brought in recommendations in connection with the Railway Act. But we have in the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—that Manitoba carpetbagger who got into Newfoundland and took charge of the department—a very skilful person at sitting on something so that all you get is inaction, inertia, and finally disappearance.

I put it to the minister that amongst the railway workers this issue has not disappeared, despite the fact that contracts have been signed. I also put it to the minister that the Minister of Transport promised when Donald Gordon was before the committee some time ago that as these recommendations which we made in connection with dislocation costs and the effects of automation and technical changes on the railways was so large an issue it should properly fall within the scope of the Department of Labour. That is what he said and I think there is a certain amount of reasonableness to it. Then he was prodded about this and said yes, he thought the Minister of Labour would be interested and that it should be within that framework. But we have not heard a damned thing about it since. It seems to me that it is almost typical of the slowness with which this administration works.

The minister knows, despite the big glossy title of Minister of Labour for Canada, that the main group of workers who come under his jurisdiction are the railway workers of Canada. I think he would acknowledge that the great bulk of his routine work in labour relations matters is connected with the railroad. I am surprised that the minister and his officials have had so little interest in the recommendations of that committee. Those recommendations were made by a committee of this parliament on which members of the party to which he belongs took quite an active part. I would suggest to him that one of the answers we would like at this time in discussing his estimates is what he is going to do about this matter. I can be quite specific about it. If he wants to check the evidence given by the Minister of Transport before the special committee which heard Donald Gordon, he will find it all in the report, and in several places the Minister of Transport made statements which I had certainly assumed would lead to some kind of communication with the government, so that the minister would have some answer.

Another question I want to put to the minister is this. I, and I think a lot of other hon. members, would like an assessment of the vocational and technical school building program into which the federal government has poured so many millions of dollars. I was staggered when I saw that the Ontario minister of education is going to throw up another $4 million structure for retraining purposes somewhere soon. Wherever I go across the province I run into these big piles of schools which have come out of recent programs. For example, in the lakehead we have a number of them. We have some very good programs going on, but a great many people—educators, teachers, even the unemployed and the people in the unemployment insurance commission and national employment service—are not convinced that we are providing the right kind of facilities or offering the right kind of courses.

We have had an excellent crop of buildings, but in view of the fact that the federal government has put hundreds of millions of dollars into this program I think it is about time that we had some kind of assessment from the government of what has followed from all this building. I want to repeat one of my suspicions in connection with this matter. I think many of the provinces have got good, new secondary school plants out of the program but I am not so sure we have really created enough space of the right kind for a real retraining program. I think we need an assessment.

One of the reasons why I ask the minister for this is that I have great respect for the work of Mr. Ford of his department, although I do not know him personally. I have read enough of the contributions to the written record that Mr. Ford has made at various times to sense that he has been concerned and somewhat disturbed about this huge program which is moving along on an ad hoc basis. I think we should have an appreciation as to how successful this big spending program has been in terms of concrete results leading to work.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The last point I want to make to the minister relates to the publications of his department dealing with automation. I have just seen the first occasional paper by a Mr. McDonald in connection with office automation. I thought it standard was much higher than most I have seen from the department. It was much higher in the sense that it was both readable and yet had enough substance to it that you had something more than just the big bulky mimeographed reports that we used to get from the department in connection with matters like this and which always seemed to be a welter of statistics. I should like to suggest that the department should be encouraged to produce more papers like this and to give them wide distribution and as much publicity as possible. I certainly know that out of that one paper I can get a great deal of material to answer workers in offices in all kinds of industries. I should like to compliment the department on this particular publication and I hope there will be more of them. There are all kinds of things one can raise on this issue.

I suppose I should pay a compliment to the minister on two things, since they deal with his officials. In the last few months I have noticed a remarkable dropping off in individual complaints about the unemployment insurance commission and its officials. Part of that may be due to good times but I think a part of it is the result of the fact that things have finally settled down to an even keel after the adjustment that took place as a result of the tightening of the regulations a year or two ago. From my experience I think the commission should be complimented on this.

The other point on which I should like to compliment the minister also relates to the work of the unemployment insurance commission. If I can judge by my own area and by what I see in the newspapers of other areas the unemployment insurance commission is having much more success in the last while in moving in a public relations way to lead people to see that the commission is more than just a routine organization and that they tie in closely with the national employment service and with educational institutions and job opportunities. I may be wrong in sensing this improvement, but I certainly see it in my own area.

There are other matters in relation to the Department of Labour that I might mention to the minister. Really he has the same challenge as the Minister of Forestry in trying to develop joint programs. His department is really enmeshed in joint programs, particularly with regard to anything concerning education. I think that some day some educator in this country who has political responsibility, and the minister is an educator, is going to have the courage to get up and say: Joint programs are all very well but they are massive, they are slow and they are complicated. This minister is going to ask for more federal authority in this field, particularly with regard to retraining. He is going to ask for the surrender by the provinces of some of their privileges in this particular educational area. I should like to think that the present minister would be the one who would consider doing that.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in the discussion this afternoon but after listening to the remarks of the last speaker with regard to the strike in Toronto involving the three daily newspapers I feel I must rise. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for being truthful and honest in calling the episode now in progress in Toronto a strike. It is a strike. There was an endeavour to call it a lockout, but an injunction was secured in the supreme court of Ontario prohibiting the use of that term because it is a strike and not a lockout.

I should like to congratulate the Department of Labour and the minister for the manner in which they are handling the unemployment insurance fund in this specific case. We would all be howling to high heaven if the federal government in any manner, shape or form should appear to be acting as a strikebreaker in a strike, and I am sure we would also complain if the federal government should in any way appear to be financing a strike. I have no quarrel with the manner in which the Department of Labour is handling the unemployment insurance fund with regard to this situation in Toronto. These men all had good positions and were well paid, and paid regularly. They chose to strike of their own volition. It is no function of the unemployment insurance fund to finance them if they now find the going a little tough, after having made this decision themselves.

I should almost like to ask the question whether the last speaker was showing some self-interest in this matter. The strikers were somewhat riled over his crossing the picket lines, and any request to the Minister of Labour to release money to these strikers may be with the idea that this money will assuage their feelings toward a man who crossed the picket lines. I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour on the way in which he is handling this matter and to tell him not to be in too much of a hurry to meet the request of the last speaker on this point.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I shall be just as brief as the hon. member who spoke before me.

As one who represents an essentially rural constituency, I should just like to say that I would be most happy if farm labourers came under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Our farmers are looking for cheap labour. They are often accused of mechanizing their farms, but if relatively cheap labour were available, they would undoubtedly take advantage of it.

Most often, such labour is not available because farm hands are not covered by unemployment insurance. I have taken every opportunity to bring this discrepancy to the attention of the authorities and once again I should like to advocate that farm labourers be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Chairman, I want to take only a few moments to make certain remarks to the minister. I know he is anxious to conclude the debate. I know he has promised the committee to give them certain specific pieces of information and I am sure he is anxious to get his estimates through. I want to bring to his attention a situation I have mentioned before in the house. My experience of the twenty sixth parliament is that sometimes you have to say something many, many times before it even registers either with the ministers or with their officials.

I am particularly pleased to see the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the house at this time because the suggestion I want to make to the Minister of Labour is a constructive one and almost involves a joint endeavour. The house is probably aware that there is absolutely no labour legislation whatsoever in the Northwest Territories. I think it is unfortunate that in 1964, when we are approaching the celebration of our 100th birthday, there should be a part of Canada where there is no protection whatsoever for the working man.

There are no laws guaranteeing minimum wages. There are no laws concerning hours of work, paid holidays, overtime pay or any of these things. I know, before the minister or anyone else tells me, that it is essentially a matter for the territorial council to provide legislation on these subjects. This is really where the minister of northern affairs comes in. At this particular juncture the minister of northern affairs has the peculiar responsibility of giving leadership to the council to see that this kind of legisation is prepared, in co-operation with the Minister of Labour, and presented to the territorial council. The fact of the matter is that the bulk of the councillors on that council are appointed by the cabinet, so there is an extra measure of federal control.

I say it is a serious problem because when we are talking about unemployment in Canada and the efforts the various administrations have made and are making to combat it, I think it is worth observing that in some of the more northerly areas of Canada at certain times of the year the unemployment rate is in fact 100 per cent. Now, this may not involve very many people in terms of the Canadian population. However, I suggest to you that it involves parts of the country that have a total population of approximately 100,000. I am thinking of the northerly parts of the provinces and, in particular, of the two northern territories. At times, the people who live in those parts of the country have absolutely no means of obtaining employment. These people are nearly all Indian or Eskimo people who have, over the course of the past few years, lost not only their initiative in connection with trapping, hunting and fishing, but in many cases have lost the skills necessary to conduct those activities properly.

I was pleased at the statement issued yesterday by the minister of northern affairs as a result of another northern tour which he has just completed, and a most successful one. This statement referred to the educational programs which are so desperately needed and which will have a long term effect on the life of the northern people. All that we have succeeded in doing so far is taking the Indian and Eskimo children and moving them out of their own way of life into a no man's land. I know of several communities in the Northwest Territories and the northern parts of the provinces where at times of the year when hunting, fishing and fur trapping are not profitable, the entire community may be out of work. When the minister is giving a statement on unemployment in Canada, it must be a source of irritation to him that there are still these pockets in our country where unemployment may reach as high as 90 per cent for a few months in the year.

I want to make a suggestion to the minister. I was interested in his opening remarks about the economic research branch and the kind of analyses the branch is doing or is planning to do. I want to suggest to him that it would be worth while if he asked this branch to conduct a survey of the unemployment situation in Canada's northerly regions. I mean a real survey and not something that is done in a week or ten days. The minister should give this branch the task of finding out what the situation really is; what skills there are in the groups of people who are, as I suggested earlier, Indian and Eskimo people. He should ascertain methods by which they can be brought back into the employment stream. I suggest the Department of Labour do this, rather than the department of northern affairs, because the federal department of northern affairs is already involved in providing an ameliorating program, if you can call it that. I refer to the educational facilities, and so on.

Quite often when a federal department like northern affairs is so intimately involved in the administration of an area their survey would tend to be an apology for what they have been doing or have not been doing. Quite often the officials of a department, particularly northern affairs, will say that everything is fine and the programs they have been conducting are wonderful; there are no other methods that could be followed. I ask the Minister of Labour to conduct this survey through the economic research branch. This is a specific task and it may take some months. Certainly, from his description of the branch it would be the ideal organization to undertake this work. They would be really rendering a service to northern Canadians wherever they may be found, not only in the territories but also in the provinces.

I want to make a suggestion to him. I should like the department to look into the possibility of the government of Canada, which is the largest single employer in the Canadian north, making more use of local labour. The record of the government of Canada over the years in employing local people has not been good. Quite often, and I speak on the basis of experience in the Canadian north as a federal employee, we were pressuring private enterprise, construction companies that came in to work on projects and so on, to give work to the Indian and Eskimo people. We said, you should not be importing thousands of labourers from the south when we have all these people here. However the record of the government itself has not been good. For this reason I suggest the Department of Labour, because it represents the only federal department that is not in the Northwest Territories in a major way. They have nothing to protect, not even any empire to preserve. I use those words advisedly. I think they would have to take action with objectivity, with a special perspective that would allow the officials of this department to do the work. I urgently request the minister to consider this.

There is just one other thing I want to request the minister to do, and that is to establish at least one office for the unemployment insurance commission and the national employment service in the northern territories. At the present time if a person wishes to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits or even attempt to find work in other parts of the country, the nearest office is Edmonton which is some 500 miles south of our southerly border. If you live over in the eastern part of the territories you have to contact Montreal. I have placed a question on the order paper before about this and received an answer from the minister's officials that there is no need for the Department of Labour to establish either an employment office or an unemployment insurance office in the Northwest Territories; everything is fine; the officials are watching things and it is under constant survey.

The bitter truth in relation to this situation was revealed when one of the producing gold mines in Yellowknife shut down last winter and some 150 men were put out of work for a few months. The unemployment insurance office did not even have enough forms in Edmonton to handle the situation. I suggest to the minister that the volume of business in the Canadian Northwest Territories justifies a full scale office and it would be advisable to have one set up. I can guarantee him that business will be booming, if he does in fact provide facilities. Right now people just have to depend on neighbours or friends to do this. It is not as good as the service that is being provided by the unemployment insurance commission in many, many regions. Many residents who are eligible for benefits simply do not know about it and consequently use other facilities offered through the department of northern affairs, such as the public welfare program and relief, when in fact they could be benefiting from the placement service.

Before taking my seat to allow the minister to make his concluding comments, I want to bring his attention to the situation on the distant early warning line. He promised me previously that he would look into it. The situation is one which has been going on for some years and I would like him to indicate now, or later to me privately, whether his department is looking into the complaint that American employees of the Federal Electric Corporation receive substantially more pay than Canadian employees doing the same work. I have had this complaint for some months now. I was dimly aware of it when I worked along the distant early warning line, but more recently it has been brought forcibly to my attention.

Mr. Laing: My intervention in this debate will be short and is caused only by the fact the previous speaker referred to labour conditions in the territories. I want to assure him we have been aware of the complaints that have been registered in respect of the letting of contracts in Edmonton, with no requirement in the territories covering the normal rates of pay that exist in Edmonton. There has also been a complaint in respect to the workmen's compensation in the territories, on the basis of inadequacy.

We are not unaware of this, and I would hope the hon. member would give us some marks for the fact that we have forthrightly attempted to take care of these matters in the appointment within our power of at least one member of the Northwest Territories council. We have appointed to that council Mr. Stuart Hodgson, who is an extremely well known and highly regarded member of the international woodworkers of America.

I have asked him to act in respect of these matters as a labour man might be expected to act, and nothing more. I know he called the labour council in the city of Edmonton to meet them. They gave him an entire day and I have reports from them that they were exceedingly well pleased for what they described as the first time a government had attempted to meet them in respect of these matters.

My hon. friend is aware of the difficulties in respect of using and incorporating the indigenous people in the work force there. I think we have made pretty fair progress and I believe he thinks so too. At one time we had 100 Eskimos working in a mine in the territories and they turned out to be extremely adept in using machinery, and competent of adopting new techniques. Unfortunately the mine ran out of ore, but we transferred a number of them to other mines. There are now 10 Eskimo families working at Yellowknife, respected and accepted by the white community, and doing a very splendid job for the firms employing them. These are conditions towards which we are moving, and we will do our best in co-operation with the Northwest Territories council to take care of these matters brought before the committee.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I think I hear the Secretary of State murmur a bit because he sees me rise, but I can tell him right away I am going to have my say because I promised a number of people in B.C. that I would make a few remarks on the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Lamontagne: Excuse me, I did not.

Mr. Herridge: Then I apologize. I must have had a poor ear. This is a most inspiring atmosphere in which to deal with labour matters; I can see the committee is in a very cheerful and agreeable mood. I wish to say I listened to the minister's opening statement with interest and appreciation, as he outlined certain policies and programs of the department. I am not going to deal with those, except to say that I for one am very pleased to see willingness to experiment. I am not one who would criticize if an experiment fails. In this field the idea of experimenting is well worth while. We are entering into a new era so far as labour relations, automation and so on are concerned, and I am sure the only way to find sound solutions is as a result of experimentation from time to time. I am very glad to see these experiments being carried on with respect to legislation programs, and administration.

I have a few remarks to make on other matters which concern a number of workers. I am one of those persons who keep in touch with the rank and file of the workers organizations and unions because I have always found that if I keep close to the rank and file of labour, the farmers, and people in general, I have nothing to fear regardless of what anybody else says.

I have a few comments to make in respect to the maritime trustees and the famous Hal Banks binge, as I was possibly the first member to raise the question in the house of his activities, his past record and so on. As a result of that I aroused his ire, and he sent one of his colleagues around my constituency circulating literature wherever he could find an opportunity to distribute it, in stores, Legion branches, clubs and trade union offices, condemning me as a proper bounder. Anyway I was very pleased because once people read his opinion of me their regard for me was higher than it was previously. That was before the 1957 election.

I support the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur in respect to this question. We in this group have some concern as to the ultimate conclusion of the operations of the maritime union trustees. I am not underestimating their difficulties. Some members have been critical of the former government with respect to this situation, but at least a royal commission was appointed by that government, a commission that finally brought out the facts and caused some action to be taken. On numerous occasions during 1956 and the early part of 1957 hon. members of the opposition rose in the house and urged the Liberal government to take some action with respect to this man. I repeatedly urged that he be deported and, regardless of the situation now, let us not forget that this man was brought to Canada as a result of action of the Liberal government in which I consider there was monkey-work with the immigration papers when he arrived, which concealed his former criminal record.

There should be an early appearance of the maritime trustees before the industrial relations committee because I remember that on April 4, Mr. Charles Millard, one of the trustees, issued a joint statement with Mr. Paul Hall, president of the S.I.U. of North America, announcing they had reached agreement. Their peace formula included the following, and I quote:

> The vice president of the S.I.U., Leonard McLaughlin, would take over as president of the S.I.U.
> Active management of the S.I.U. would be turned back to S.I.U. leaders.
> The Canadian S.I.U. will continue as part of the S.I.U. of North America.
> Maritime unions on the great lakes will be integrated.
> Later it was stated that integration meant that the two Canadian unions on the great lakes—the Canadian maritime union and the seamen's section of the Canadian brotherhood of railway and transport workers—would be taken over by the S.I.U.

That peace formula has not developed, but it indicates Mr. Millard's line of thought and I for one object very strongly to any action to permit the S.I.U. to take over these unions which fought the good fight against Hal Banks and his S.I.U. associates when the going was very difficult. These Canadian unions did a great deal to bring the matter to a head, focus public attention upon it and, ultimately, bring about action by the government.

I think the trustees should appear before a committee of this house and give us some idea of their objectives and their methods, as well as some understanding of what they have achieved to date. I am not understimating the difficulties. I think everyone wants to see this question resolved satisfactorily and for all time. I hope the committee members will have the opportunity to question the trustees—not just the chairman, but all of the trustees. Some of us would like to put certain questions to them individually, and I hope the minister will make this possible at an early date.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I have mentioned it before in the house and I repeat it at the request of union members concerned with the British Columbia hydro power authority legislation. Members of the unions directly concerned are anxious about this, as is the trade union movement generally in British Columbia. In 1954, Premier Duplessis had an amendment made to the Quebec labour legislation making it illegal for all unions connected with public services to strike. That law was in effect until recent times. Owing to the strong position taken by Quebec trade unions—and I give them full credit for it—Premier Lesage has agreed to amend this act and delete those vicious clauses so that employees of public services will have the right to strike; they will have this freedom returned to them. Only the firefighters and the police are excepted.

Just the reverse is happening in British Columbia. At the last session of the legislature, amendments were made to the hydro and power authority act making it illegal for employees of the hydro authority to strike. In case the minister has not noticed this, I refer to subsection (2) of section 56 of the act which passed third reading in the legislature of British Columbia on March 10, 1964. It reads as follows:

> No person shall declare or authorize a strike, and no employee of the authority shall strike, and the authority shall not lock out any employee or employees.

I have mentioned this before and brought it to the attention of the Minister of Justice. I mentioned it again at the request of many of the employees concerned. They are disturbed about it and I cannot understand the authority supporting this legislation. This is a type of organization within which strikes are most infrequent and I cannot understand them damaging public relations with their employees by having this provision included in the hydro and power authority act. I urge the minister to discuss this matter with the Minister of Justice because, like a good many other people, I think there are sound grounds for the disallowance of this legislation as a transgression of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The federal government has the right to disallow legislation if there is sound reason for doing so. I bring this to the attention of the minister because I know that at heart he is a small "l" liberal who is very conscious of this aspect of our social fabric. I know many trade unions in British Columbia would welcome an assurance that this legislation will be disallowed.

Now I wish to deal with another question for a few minutes. I do so at the request of trade unionists because of the coming developments on the Columbia in the course of which large contracts will be let. Undoubtedly a good many of these contracts will go to corporations controlled in the United States, because many of these companies have the type of equipment required and are able to underbid Canadian firms. I mention this because we had one experience during the construction of the pipe line in British Columbia which brings it to mind. I speak particularly of southeastern British Columbia where I know what happened from personal experience. Hundreds of United States workers crossed the line into Canada as landed immigrants. I am not blaming them for seeking employment. Of course they had to indicate that they intended to settle in Canada. On the whole, these were completely false declarations. They came to Canada and worked on these pipe line jobs for periods of between three months and six months to my knowledge. In order to find out whether or not these people were landed immigrants, the R.C.M.P. checked their cards, and practically all of them had visitors' permits saying they intended to return to the United States within a few months. These men obtained employment from United States controlled construction companies while Canadian workers in the area were unemployed. Students at the university of British Columbia who were looking forward to making a little extra money in the summer months were denied the opportunity to do so because of the number of United States citizens who had come in as landed immigrants to take employment in connection with the construction of the pipe line and who then, with very few exceptions, returned to the United States.

The second thing I wish to complain of is this. These companies completely ignored the national employment service. I talked to the manager of the employment service at Nelson at that time and he told me that the manager of one of these companies had said: We are not going to be bothered with your petty national employment service; we shall employ whom we wish and in the way we wish. I thought this was a high handed way to treat our national employment service. The office there had a list of local people for 200 miles around who were anxious to get employment on these projects. I bring this up because, as I said before, numerous United States controlled companies will undoubtedly get contracts in connection with the Columbia development project and I suggest to the minister that some consideration be given to amending the Immigration Act or to tightening up the regulations or to checking more closely so as to make certain that those who apply to come to Canada as landed immigrants really intend to settle in Canada. I fully agree there must be reciprocity on this question. We have Canadians who wish to enter the United States to take up employment, not so much from western Canada as from the eastern areas. But I do think something could be done to amend the act or the regulations and strengthen the hands of the officials at the ports of entry so that they can check this practice. The British Columbia hydro and power authority has indicated that it would employ persons who have been in Canada for 60 days. Well, it is easy to come to Canada for a couple of months to await the commencement of a four or five year program. I suggest the department should do something to see that the services of the national employment service are used by these organizations. I think it is highly improper that the national facilities should be ignored to the disadvantage of Canadian citizens. I would also suggest that it would be a good idea for the Department of Labour to have occasional observers at these large construction projects to find out how the law and the regulations are being complied with, to see how the national employment service is being used, and for the government to get well informed, from a national angle, as to the application of labour law and regulations to the advantage of Canadian citizens.

I had intended to speak for another ten or 15 minutes, Mr. Chairman; but I will leave my further remarks to another occasion in order to give the minister an opportunity to reply at this time if he wishes to do so.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member who has just resumed his seat for his consideration in shortening his remarks so I might have a chance to make some comments on a number of points that have been raised by hon. gentlemen in the discussion this afternoon. I certainly thank hon. members for the searching examination they have given the work of the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance commission. I especially wish to thank them for the well merited commendations they have paid to members of my department and the unemployment insurance commission. I have already stated that it is the intention of the government to introduce comprehensive labour standards legislation at this session, and it is my firm expectation that it will be placed on the order paper in the month of September. I believe that once we have enacted this legislation the federal Department of Labour will be in a stronger position to undertake some of the activities suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

A number of hon. members have discussed, and understandably so, the operation of the board of maritime trustees. I have always maintained that the board of trustees should be accountable to parliament, and it is for this reason that I joined my request to the request made by other hon. members that the board of trustees appear before a parliamentary committee. I have received an assurance from the chairman of the board of trustees that such an appearance will be made at this session of parliament. It is the suggestion of the chairman of the board that this appearance be later in the fall. I have concurred in that suggestion, or at least I have expressed my appreciation of the reasons that may be in the mind of the chairman of the board. I undertake, of course, to arrange such a meeting with the board of trustees at this session of parliament. On that occasion members of parliament will have an opportunity to receive more detailed information on the matters that are causing them the concern which they have expressed today.

On August 4 I made in the House of Commons a rather long statement on the operation of the board of trustees. My views expressed at that time with respect to the operation of the board still stand. I do not intend to repeat them today, except to say that I do appreciate the concern expressed by hon. members with respect to human rights affecting seamen. The board of trustees have already taken action to add members to the maritime appeals board in order to permit additional panels to deal where necessary with these outstanding cases. I understand the board of trustees will be making an announcement in this regard shortly, and I trust this will have the effect of adding further to the confidence that has already been expressed in the integrity and competence of Commander Robertson who has been operating as a one-man appeal board in hearing these cases.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North dealt extensively with the question of the "do not ship" list. He raised a number of important questions concerning which the officials of the Department of Labour have undertaken discussions with the board of trustees. These discussions will continue in an effort to remove any concern that may exist with respect to these cases.

I have no intention of continuing the discussion with respect to the employment programs of the Department of Labour, except to state that in my view the winter-built housing program has been an undoubted success. I believe this success is demonstrated beyond all debate by the considerable increase in housing starts in January and February of this year in comparison with the same months in 1963. The percentage increase in housing starts as a result of this program has been estimated at well over 70 per cent in these two crucial months when seasonal unemployment is at its highest.

May I just say in connection with the operation of the winter-built housing program that all the terms and conditions of that program will continue this winter. We have, of course, examined the proposals made by the Regina housebuilders which were later supplemented by proposals made by the national housebuilders. In considering proposals from the builders and representations from areas of the country experiencing severe climate we have decided that the commencement of the program this winter will be on November 15 rather than on December 1. The program will be in effect, in other words, from November 15, 1964, to March 31, 1965.

A number of hon. members have referred to the municipal winter works incentive program. May I just say that the terms and conditions of this program will continue as they did last year, except that we intend to make provision to assist certain municipalities where there is high winter unemployment and municipalities located in designated areas. Provision will be made for certain projects to be continued during the month of May, to compensate for periods during the winter when it is clearly demonstrated that work could not continue due to severe weather conditions. Work on such projects in these areas will continue, provided they had been started during November and are projects of at least five months duration.

The hon. member for Port Arthur made a suggestion, among quite a number of others, that particularly impressed me. I refer to the hon. member's suggestion with respect to the desirability of considering ways and means of strengthening the appeal procedures in cases affecting human rights of union members. He suggested that discussions ought to be undertaken with provincial departments of labour, and possibly the Canadian Labour Congress, with regard to methods by which this could be done. I certainly undertake to place this item on the agenda of the next conference of labour ministers, which would include all provincial ministers and the federal Minister of Labour. A number of questions have been asked with respect to the cost of the older worker program. Incentive payments to July 31 on behalf of older workers under this program amounted to $413,000. This was disbursed on behalf of 941 older workers and amounts to $440 per person. I suggest this cannot be considered excessive when you consider the retraining aspect of this expenditure and the possible savings to the unemployment insurance fund.

The hon. member for Ontario asked me about the state of the unemployment insurance fund. The unemployment insurance fund stood at $559,000 on July 31. During the period April 1, 1964 to May 29, 1964 the sum of $26.5 million was borrowed. All of this has been repaid, and in addition $21 million invested in non-marketable securities redeemable at par practically on demand.

The hon. member for the Northwest Territories raised a number of questions with respect to the administration of labour relations in the Northwest Territories and the operations of the Federal Electric Company. I am sure he knows that at present there is an outstanding conciliation board case affecting the workers and the employer in this case. The conciliation board report has not yet reached me, but when it does it may contain the solution to a number of the problems raised by my hon. friend. He can be assured that this point which he has raised will be fully considered, and if possible his suggestions will be implemented by the department.

If there are any other questions which hon. members would like me to answer I would be very glad to try and do so.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the minister about his remarks in connection with the appearance of the trustees before a committee of this house. His remarks were pretty general. I could hazard a guess as to the reason he agreed that the meeting of this committee should be later, but what has he in mind? September, October? Could he pin it down to a definite area of time, say within a month?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not want to be pinned down to a definite date because this is a matter which involves the house leader; but it is certainly my intention to advocate the setting up of this committee this fall. That ought to satisfy my hon. friend because this fall is not very far away.

Item agreed to.

Annuities Act—

20. Administration and government's contribution to annuities agents pension account in accordance with regulations made pursuant to vote 181, Appropriation Act No. 5, 1961, $1,229,500.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would make a statement with regard to the annuities act. In particular, could the minister tell us whether the government has any plans for enlarging the provisions of the Government Annuities Act or for extending the promotion of this legislation. As the minister may know from his reading of history—because I believe I am now referring to something which took place before he became a member of this house—it is the fact that about 14 years or so ago the Liberal government of that day brought in a measure to raise the ceiling on the amount of government annuities and to make certain other changes. It is also a matter of record that although that legislation was given second reading in the house and approval by the industrial relations committee of that day, the government allowed it to die on the order paper. I should like to know whether any thought has been given by the present minister or by his department since he became minister to make improvements of that kind in the Government Annuities Act.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I have two things to say, if I may, in reply to my hon. friend. The hon. member may recall that this spring we did increase the interest rates on government annuities. The interest rates used in the calculation of premiums for immediate annuities for persons aged 55 and over and for group annuities have been increased from 4 per cent to 5¼ and 5 per cent respectively. These changes in government annuity interest rates were necessary to bring the rates more in line with the yield on other good investments. It was apparent that the lower yield on government annuities certainly put the act at a disadvantage in the market, and we took this action in order to remove this disability.

The second thing I should like to say is that we are actively discussing and considering in the Department of Labour the relationship between the government annuities program and the Canada pension plan.

Mr. Knowles: First of all, may I welcome the first of the two statements the minister has just made. This of course is something that the government can do by order in council under the terms of the Government Annuities Act, namely change the applicable rate of interest from time to time. The minister will recall that I referred to the proposal the government made some years ago to raise the maximum amount of annuity obtainable under the act from $100 a month to $200 a month. Is the government now giving consideration to picking up that proposal, which as I say it made and then dropped in about 1950 or 1951?

While I am on my feet perhaps I might ask the minister whether he could be a little more specific as to what he has in mind about the relationship between the Government Annuities Act and the Canada pension plan.

Mr. MacEachen: The answer to the first question, Mr. Chairman, is no. There is no current consideration being given to the proposal which was considered some years ago. The specific answer I can give to the second question is that the annuities program is being considered especially in relation to industrial pensions. However, we have not made any decisions; it is purely in the consideration stage.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to do anything to delay the passage of these estimates but at the same time you did go rather quickly and I suppose it is my fault for not getting to my feet fast enough. We passed item 15, the one just before this, and a number of questions were asked on this item. I asked about the newspaper reports to the effect that there were a large number of people dropping out of the training courses because the allowances they are given are not large enough to live on while taking training. Then the hon. member for Port Arthur asked whether very careful assessment has been made, is being made or will be made of the number of technical schools which are being and will be built; and he also asked whether the types of courses being offered are designed to meet the needs of 1964, and so on. I wonder whether the minister could deal with these questions at some point.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, so far as the adequacy of training allowances for the unemployed is concerned, we presently pay 90 per cent of these allowances to persons under program 5. The Department of Labour have agreed to pay 90 per cent of an allowance of $55 a week for a married person. That is the present maximum training allowance which we have authorized. We are also quite interested in the usefulness of our training facilities and the expansion of capital facilities. There is a provision in these estimates that will authorize the Department of Labour to enter into agreements with provincial governments to undertake the kind of research that will enable us to evaluate the efficacy of the training programs and establish the relationship of the courses offered to the requirements of industry. Certainly each one of us ought to be concerned that the courses offered are the right kind of courses and meet the requirements of industry. We have under consideration at present meetings with officials of the labour and education departments of the provincial governments to consider how best these courses can be related to the requirements of industry.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, we have exceeded the clock at this point and may I say that to my mind it is proper that we should exceed it. I suggest that we will be quite willing to ask for unanimous consent. The hon. member for Winnipeg North posed a question to which he received an answer and we did not object when the time limit was exceeded. As his bill is to be dealt with under private members' business, perhaps he would agree to the committee taking an extra 20 minutes or so at this time to complete these estimates.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I have no personal objection. At the same time I do not think I can agree because there are a number of members not here at this time who are interested in matters which come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour and who I think will want to speak. Some of them have left town because it is a Friday afternoon with a long week end coming up. I do not think it would be fair to those members who are not here to pass all these estimates at this time. I think we have had a good discussion with no disposition on the part of any member or party to hold up the estimates unnecessarily, and I am sure that when we return to them they will be passed expeditiously. I do not think any real purpose would be served by passing them all now.

The Chairman: May I bring to the attention of hon. members that the last question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North related to a previous item and since that item had already been passed I wonder whether it is the disposition of the committee to pass the item now before us before we report?

Item agreed to.

26a. To authorize payment of compensation in the current and subsequent fiscal years to Edgar Simms under the Government Employees Compensation Act in respect of the injury sustained by him while a seaman on board the customs cutter M.V. Shulamite in June, 1936, as if he incurred the injury by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment while an employee within the meaning of the Government Employees Compensation Act, $1.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think it was suggested that perhaps we have gone far enough, although personally I would not mind items 26a and 27a carrying. This would bring us to more or less of a clean break and leave the unemployment insurance item for another time.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMPANY HOUSING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-50, to amend the Criminal Code (company-censored housing).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is a very simple one. Most people in Canada, particularly people who are interested in labour-management relations, have assumed for some considerable time that the law of the country provided for the right of workers who wished to join unions of their choice to do so without discrimination against them and without difficulties being put in their way. The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act makes this position very clear. Section 3, subsection 1 reads as follows:

> Every employee has the right to be a member of a trade union and to participate in the activities thereof.

This right has not been challenged too often in Canada. Certainly it has not been challenged in most of the cities of Canada. It has not been too difficult for trade union organizers and rank and file members of trade unions interested in getting workers in their industry to join their union, to visit people in their homes or in public places in order to make clear to them the reasons why they should join and to give them the legitimate right to join.

Difficulties have arisen in recent years as resources of Canada in previously inaccessible areas have been developed. Problems have arisen in the mining industry, in the building of hydroelectric plants and in the lumbering industry, to mention just a few. What employers who have desired to get around the provision in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which I have just quoted, have done is to use a provision in the Criminal Code, which in my opinion was never meant to be used when it was drafted for the purpose of preventing union organizers from having the opportunity to speak to people on the job. Section 41, subsection 1, of the Criminal Code, which deals with defence of house or real property, reads as follows:

> Every one who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property and every one lawfully assisting him or acting under his authority is justified in using force to prevent any person from trespassing on the dwelling house or real property, or to remove a trespasser therefrom, if he uses no more force than is necessary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the inaccessible areas of Canada when mining operations or lumber operations are opened up the companies have to build bunkhouses for the workers, since there is no other place for them to live. In my opinion the workers who live there have the same rights to have visitors as any other people living in a city or town in a house or an apartment building. This is the place where they live. In my opinion they have a right, and they ought to have a right, to have the same kind of visitors as freely and as easily as people living in the cities or towns of Canada. That has not happened. It is for this reason I have proposed in this bill to add subsection 3 to section 41 of the Criminal Code, which would read as follows:

> Except where a landlord would be therein justified under a covenant with a tenant for quiet enjoyment, nothing in this section shall be deemed to justify an employer in using force to prevent any person from having ingress to, regress over, or egress from a dwelling house or real property in or upon which the employer houses an employee or to remove any person therefrom.

I took the trouble to write some of the unions which have had difficulties in this connection and have secured some details of some of the problems with which they have had to deal. I wrote to the president of the confederation of national trade unions and I received a letter from the president, Mr. Jean Marchand who, as some members of the house will know, is now a member of the biculturalism commission. I want to read from the letter which he wrote me on March 23, 1964, and I quote:

> We are in perfect agreement with this bill which aims to amend the Criminal Code so that the companies could not arbitrarily prevent their employees from joining a union. In the past, it was an accepted policy of the companies to forbid union organizers from visiting workers. Last year, we reached an agreement with the Quebec department of forestry so that passes are issued which entitle our organizers to travel freely on the companies' properties. But the system adopted is one based on privileges. We would prefer to have the Criminal Code amended and eventually the provincial laws.
> We support your bill and we hope that it will get through.

I wrote to the international woodworkers of America and I received a letter from the vice president who wrote on behalf of their president on March 17, 1964. He cited a few examples of the difficulty which they had experienced, and I should like to read them into the record so members of the house will realize the type of problem which the union has had to face. I quote:

> At Hystad Bros., Valemount, B.C., Canoe river camp, in March 1962, organizers Mike Sekora, R. E. Larson, and Ed Timmath were threatened by superintendent Jack Woods with R.C.M.P. action for trespassing. The superintendent told the employees in the bunkhouse that they had no right to invite a union man in to see them.
> Industrial Lumber Ltd., Celeste, B.C., owned by Federated Co-operatives, organizers R. E. Larson and Clifford Michael were ordered out of the bunkhouse by Art Lloyd, manager of Federated Co-operatives, on the grounds of trespass.

All Fir Lumber Co. Ltd., McLeese Lake, B.C., organizer Ron Tweedie escorted out of bunkhouse by R.C.M.P. on the grounds of trespass.

North Western Pulp & Power Ltd., camp No. 2, Hinton, Alberta. In 1956, Frank Howard, M.P., and Michael Sekora, organizing for the I.W.A. were ordered out of the bunkhouse while signing up the crew. The superintendent, Stuart Allen, called local police to escort them from the property—the police did not respond because the local policeman happened to be an old I.W.A. member and a friend of Sekora.

I should like to cite some of the problems of the united steelworkers of America as they are set out in the "Miners' Voice" dated March, 1964. I quote:

Esterhazy, Sask.—Employees of International Minerals and Chemical Corporation (Canada) Limited who live in the trailer campsite here are being fenced in behind barbed wire and the camp has been declared by the company to be off bounds for visitors.

This latest move is another in a number of anti-union acts taken by I.M.C. to prevent union organization of its employees, charged representatives of the united steelworkers of America. That union is currently engaged in a membership drive at I.M.C. operations in nearby Yarbo.

Mr. Speaker, I am not proposing for a moment that anything be done to force workers to join a union. I believe workers have a right, under our law, to either join a union or not join a union. The point I am raising is that this provision in the Criminal Code dealing with trespass was never designed to be used to interfere with the rights of workers to join a union as it is being used now. This section of the Criminal Code, therefore, ought to be amended along the lines I have proposed. I want to cite some more cases which occurred in the province of Ontario. I shall quote from a letter which I received from the northern Ontario district council of lumber and saw mill workers unions. Here are some of the cases:

Henry Selin Forest Products—Hearst, Ontario.

Numerous attempts were made between 1946 and 1961 to get into the camp area which is seven miles off highway 11, 35 miles west of Hearst. All of these attempts failed. In the early part of 1961, the union repaired 14 miles of old winter haul road and went around the gate and into the camps with 35 organizers. At 3 a.m. a union organizer had to walk out to call the O.P.P. as Selin had blocked the road in many places with bulldozers, graders, trucks and trees. The union had over 90 per cent of the employees in the union when they came out. This shows the men wanted the union, and the union was subsequently certified by the labour relations board and had to pull a strike for a first agreement in October, 1961. Selin immediately blocked the road leaving 42 families isolated without food, medical care, etc. He barred these people from using the road. The union, at great expense, flew all the necessary supplies in to these people, and finally secured an injunction to open the road.

Numerous small operators operate in the area of Chapleau, Ontario. All operate on crown land and all have so-called private roads. Some have gates, others have not.

In the year of 1963, the union had an invitation from the employers in Chapleau Lumber to organize them. This is partly a jackpot family camp and partly bunk-houses. There is no gate on the road. The union secured permission from management to visit the camp (subsequently, this was withdrawn), when the organizers (five in number) went in, the operator called the O.P.P. and attempted to have them arrested for trespass. Charges of trespass were laid against the five and on a later occasion, on another visit, three more were charged wtih the same offence.

In my own province, Mr. Speaker, we have had the development of one of the largest industrial complexes at Thompson, Manitoba. Preparatory to building that plant it was necessary to build a power plant, which was built at Kelsey, some miles from Thompson; but despite the fact that it took two years to complete the building the trade unions were never able to get into that power plant project to discuss with the workers the advisability of their joining a union.

The only way to get into the area was by a spur line railway which was controlled by International Nickel, who instructed the C.N.R. not to sell tickets and not to permit anybody on a train except people with passes from the company. I have in my file sworn affidavits to prove that men worked on that project for as long as six months at a time, seven days a week, working as much as 100 hours a week, not because they wanted to but because they were told that unless they were prepared to work those hours they would be fired immediately.

Those men wanted to join unions, but during the entire time this project was being constructed they were unable to contact union people because the company used the provisions of the Criminal Code, which in my opinion were never meant to be used in this way to get around the very clear intent of the parliament of Canada which passed the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and of the provincial governments which passed labour relations acts.

In the same way, when the actual project was begun at Thompson, for two years or more it was impossible for any union organizer to get into Thompson. I know about this because as a member of the legislature I finally got them in, although I must say it took me close to three or four months to get through all the red tape and go from minister to minister, and from deputy minister to deputy minister, to try to get permission to meet the rules and the regulations.

After I had done all this and had been turned down I went on. I told the company I would go in there whether the law permitted or not. I advised the company when I would go and suggested to them that they arrange with the R.C.M.P. to arrest me. I told them I was prepared to appear in court, that I would refuse to pay the fine, which was the only penalty that could be imposed, that I would then probably be adjudged to be in contempt of court, and if the company was prepared to stand the publicity of sending a member of the legislature to jail I was prepared to go to jail for whatever period the magistrate would assess.

But this is not a way which we can get good labour management relations. What we ought to do is amend this section of the code which has been used, is being used and will be used by some unscrupulous employers to get around the very clear intent of the labour relations act.

I hope hon. members of the house will not laud this bill to death, in other words that they will not talk it out. It may be that the government has not had enough time to consider all its implications, and I know it is not very often that a bill proposed by a private member is passed by the house. But if the government is not ready to permit passage of the bill today I would urge that it agree to send the bill to the industrial relations committee where representations could be made by the people concerned, by the unions which have had the difficulties I have mentioned—and there are other unions I have not mentioned which have had difficulties—and by employers who, if they have really good reasons which I have not mentioned for carrying on the kind of activities which I have outlined, could appear and give their reasons so that the committee could consider this matter thoroughly in all its aspects, and bring back a recommendation to the house.

Mr. Macdonald: Before the hon. member takes his seat would he permit a question? Could he give the house the advantage of his understanding of the meaning and effect of the first clause of his amendment, that is, the first 17 words leading up to the comma?

Mr. Orlikow: Could the hon. member be a little more explicit in what he wants me to explain?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt this exchange because the hon. member's time has expired, unless the house wants to give him unanimous agreement to continue so that he may answer the question. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Having looked at it, it is not very difficult to explain. The purpose of this bill is to permit legitimate action. The first 17 words permit a landlord to eject from his premises anybody who is, for example, having a wild party, creating a disturbance which bothers the other tenants, and so on. I think it is quite simple.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I listened with much interest to the remarks made by the hon. member who spoke before me and even if he did labour his point, I doubt very much that the amendment he is submitting to the house would come under the administration of the Criminal Code.

It is clear and obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the provision he would add to section 41 of the Criminal Code is a provision essentially related to the labour code.

The Criminal Code in sections 40, 41 and 42, deals with the protection of movable property. There is first a provision for the protection of a dwelling house against breaking in or forcible entry.

There is also a provision for the defence not only of a dwelling house but also of real property against a trespasser.

There is also a provision for the assertion of right to real property by the person who is lawfully entitled, whether or not the owner claims a right.

Mr. Speaker, it is a question of establishing the right of the occupant. Is he an occupant by sufferance? Is he a tenant? Is he a landlord? It is advisable to set boundaries to know up to which point it is possible to resist the intrusion of another person. It is difficult to pass an amendment such as the one introduced because it contains many ambiguities.

It reads as follows:

(3) Except where a landlord would be therein justified under a covenant with a tenant for quiet enjoyment—

As pointed out a little earlier by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), that is when he asked a question to get more information, the beginning of this amendment leaves us wondering and makes it rather hard to understand its meaning.

The question is to find out if the landlord is ready to require his tenant to occupy the rented premises according to the conditions set out in a lease. If such or such a condition is set out in a lease, the tenant has to comply with it, nothing more. There is no need to amend the Criminal Code to determine how the person who occupies the premises—that is whether the landlord is an employer or an employee, whatever his trade or profession—must behave; the lessee must comply with the conditions set out in the lease.

If there is no lease, reference will be made to the civil code of the province where the lease is granted, in order to know, when it is a tacit lease, in which way it must be executed, under what conditions the tenant must occupy the leased premises. The Criminal Code is concerned when the question is to determine in which way someone must face an aggression, an attack or a trespass. If someone is attacked, he has the right, under the provisions of the Criminal Code, to defend himself. The conditions for admission of self-defence are set out in sections 34 to 37 inclusive of the Criminal Code.

The conditions required to act in self-defence are the following:

A person must be illegally assaulted, must not have provoked his attacker, must not have intended to kill or seriously injure him and must not have resorted to anything else but the necessary force.

When serious injuries have been inflicted or death occurred following the quarrel created, as it were, by resisting the aggression, then, the person alleging self-defence must have had reasons to fear either death or serious injuries, or fear, for reasonable motives, that he could not himself escape death or serious injuries.

That is the theory of legitimate defence.

The case mentioned by the hon. member could occur if, after allowing his employee to occupy a property he owns, an employer sought to prevent a third party from visiting his employee on the premises in question.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to the point which interests the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). All those things had to be explained to my hon. friend because he does not understand anything about the Criminal Code. He may be conversant with matters pertaining to labour conditions but the Criminal Code has a very distinct character, in that it contains provisions for the maintenance of public order and, in this case, for the protection, first, of the person and then of the individual's property, both real and movable.

As I said a moment ago, the amendment now before us cannot be inserted in any way in the Criminal Code, because it is in no way related to the spirit which characterizes the Criminal Code.

As I have already pointed out, if a third party comes to meet or visit someone occupying his employer's property, the question is then to determine the right of the occupant, and that only in the light of the civil code. There is no question here of applying the Criminal Code. It is a matter of finding out what rights has the occupant of those premises, in what manner he is entitled to occupy those premises as provided in a written lease or one that is merely implied.

If the employer wishes to prevent the visitor or third party from going to the place occupied by the employee, everything depends on how he will go about it. If the employer assaults the visitor or the third party, then, the Criminal Code will provide protection for the employee or the visitor if the employer illegally commits an assault.

Therefore, there is no reason to amend the Criminal Code. We only have to establish the right of a tenant and to see to what extent, under the labour legislation, union organizations can authorize such relationship with union leaders and company employees.

Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member introduces an amendment to the Criminal Code in order to determine the nature of relations between employer and employee, then, I say he goes the wrong way about it and he should merely see to it that labour legislation be amended accordingly.

[Text]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): I am very sympathetic to the objectives of the hon. member who introduced this bill to the house. We have gone a long way in our democratic society in providing access for the ordinary man, the worker, to organizations to protect himself against the overwhelming power of his employer within the framework of trade unions. Everyone in this house is sympathetic to the need for legislation to protect the rights of Canadian workers.

One wonders however in looking at this bill whether the hon. member has approached the question from the right side. Is he approaching something which belongs essentially to the realm of property law? Should he have brought this provision in by means of an amendment to the labour laws or by way of a resolution? I wish to comment on one or two points which came to my mind—and it is not a legal mind—as I read this bill and as I listened to the hon. member discussing it in the chamber today. I wonder how this measure would affect military property or, let us say, the army, where the army is the employer and where the employee is a soldier in a bunkhouse or a married soldier with a family living in married quarters on a national defence establishment. Would not the same law which he is proposing here essentially to deal with a labour matter apply in an area in which he had not anticipated it would apply?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Deachman: I would be very glad to answer a question.

Mr. Orlikow: I am very sympathetic to labour organizations but I wonder whether the hon. member is suggesting that we should extend the rights of people to belong to a union so that the ordinary private in the army could belong to a union which would deal with his officers? Is that what the hon. member is suggesting?

Mr. Deachman: I am afraid I was not suggesting that for a moment. I was suggesting that the hon. member has brought into the house a bill which deals with the relationship between landlord and tenant, and the landlord's rights in respect of that property. If this bill were passed by the house its provisions would apply equally in the case of national defence properties, and the relationship of members of the armed forces, as it would to the landlord and tenant relationship which he has explained may exist in mill towns, and for which he really wishes this bill passed by the house.

I suggest to the hon. member that there is a great deal of difference in the relationship of a landlord or an employer with regard to bunkhouses. This was raised in letters which the hon. member quoted. I believe that in a lumber camp, a fishing cannery, or whatever it may be, where temporary quarters are constructed some discipline must apply with regard to such temporary living quarters, and there really is no tenant and no lease in respect of these bunkhouses that applies to the particular case the hon. member has in mind.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is really not the avenue through which to approach this problem, but that adequate avenues are open to the hon. member and he would indeed be advancing the cause of labour were he to seek these avenues and bring his suggestion on to the floor of the house either through the labour laws or by way of a resolution for discussion by the house.

I have one further small point to raise after listening to my hon. friend. Under the legislation he proposes, a stranger would now have more right than a tenant in the very property in which the tenant lives. I say this because the tenant is bound by the terms of his lease, by the terms of the agreement with his landlord in regard to staying there; but the stranger who comes upon the property, under the bill of my hon. friend, could not be ejected and would indeed enjoy more freedom upon the property than the tenant himself. I do not think it was the aim of my hon. friend to bring about such a relationship when he introduced this bill.

In the early part of his discussion, in reply to a question which the hon. member answered I was not certain that the wording of this bill would prevent the committing of a nuisance on the property. I wonder whether the landlord would be able, under the wording the hon. member has given, to eject, let us say a bagpipes player who insisted on tucking the bag of his bagpipes under his arm and spanking out into action at twelve o'clock at night.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: I will be glad to answer a question.

Mr. Regan: Would the hon. member tell us what he has against bagpipes, which produce perhaps one of the finest types of music to be heard?

Mr. More: Is this a filibuster?

Mr. Deachman: I have no objection to bagpipes, to pipe organs or to instruments of any kind, provided they are played quietly and at the proper time. But I think in a closely packed community there are limits in this regard and sometimes the landlord might have to take the necessary action to restrict the exuberance of even a bagpipes player.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: I am honoured, Mr. Speaker; I have never been asked so many questions. I must be doing very well today.

Mr. Walker: Does the hon. member not agree that the definition of bagpipes is an ill wind that nobody blows good?

Mr. Deachman: No; that is the definition of an oboe.

Mr. Knowles: Did you say "hobo" or "oboe"?

Mr. Deachman: That is an oboe.

I think, Mr. Speaker, some of the examples I have given are enough to indicate that there are difficulties, and very obvious difficulties, in this bill. I suggest to my hon. friend that he would find a sympathetic audience everywhere in this house if he could find the means to achieve what he wants by way of legislation with which the house can deal.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up the remarks of previous speakers by pointing out that this is really a more appropriate provision for labour relations legislation under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act or, in the case of Thompson, Manitoba, to which the hon. member referred, the Manitoba labour relations act. I think the weakness of the hon. member's bill was perhaps best disclosed by the hon. member himself in reply to my question as to the meaning of the starting phrase of the bill:

> Except where a landlord would be therein justified under a covenant with a tenant for quiet enjoyment—

The reply of the hon. member indicated that it was his impression that the covenant for quiet enjoyment was an obligation which required a tenant to use the property quietly. I would point out that the obligation of a covenant for quiet enjoyment is quite the reverse; it falls on the landlord and is not at all related to the purposes which to a layman like my hon. friend might appear to be most obvious. Perhaps I may refer my hon. friend to the work of a very distinguished Manitoban, the former chief justice of the court of Queen's bench, Hon. E. K. Williams. This work is entitled "Canadian Law of Landlord and Tenant", and I would refer my hon. friend to page 339 of that work, where he points out as follows:

> The covenant for quiet enjoyment is an assurance against the consequences of a defective title and of any disturbance thereupon and of any substantial interference by the covenantor or those lawfully claiming under him with the enjoyment of the premises for all usual purposes.

To restate it in perhaps less technical language, it is an undertaking either implied by law in the lease or included expressly in the lease to make it incumbent upon a landlord to ensure to his tenant, first that he is in fact the owner of the property he is purporting to lease, and the tenant will not be disturbed in it by adverse claims of ownership; and second, that the landlord will not by any act disturb the tenant in his enjoyment of the property. It is also pointed out by the learned author in the same edition of this work, at page 343:

> In order to constitute a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, it is sufficient that the lessee's ordinary and lawful enjoyment of the demised land be substantially interfered with by the acts of the lessor, or those lawfully claiming under him, although neither the title to the land nor the possession thereof be otherwise affected.

I would point out that this gives to the tenant in question an obvious civil right which he can pursue in the civil courts of the province to protect him against the kind of harassment to which the hon. member has been referring. Specifically Mr. Speaker, it has been held in various cases that the tenant, the tenant's invitees, those coming in to engage in business relations with him, or the tenant's licencees—that is, those coming in for non-commercial reasons—are entitled to have access to the property, and actions of the landlord which would prevent such persons or the tenant from having the normal use of the property may be the subject of an injunction under the landlord and tenant act. It would appear—

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder whether I could ask the hon. member a question. How long does he think a worker in a camp who went to his employer and said "I should like Mr. Smith, the union organizer, to come and visit me" would be able to continue before he was fired?

Mr. Macdonald: I am suggesting, and the hon. member merely underlines my argument again, that the proper course of action for him to take is not by producing garbled amendments to the Criminal Code but by producing amendments to the appropriate labour legislation, which essentially would—

Mr. Orlikow: Which you would talk out.

Mr. Macdonald: Let the hon. member bring forward an amendment to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and we will see.

Mr. Orlikow: Do you think we have not tried?

Mr. Knowles: We have seen, and we know.

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. member has no such legislation on the order paper and is in fact proceeding on a misunderstanding of the law applicable in these circumstances. What has to be borne in mind, as the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) pointed out so effectively, is that the effect of this particular provision would go far beyond the provisions relating to labour disputes which so much concern my hon. friend—and I do not for a moment question the legitimacy of his concern. First of all, the effect would be to prevent a landlord from taking action to expel a squatter, which is not connected with a labour dispute—someone with no colour of right to be on the land in question. Yet as my hon. friend pointed out, the amendment could apply in such a way as to protect someone who was a mere trespasser on the land with no rights whatever. It could apply far beyond the labour union situation. It could apply to the hon. member's own residence or the residence of any hon. member of this house.

I would also point out that the effect of the provision would also prevent a landlord or the person responsible for property on behalf of other occupants, such as a bunkhouse, a rooming house, an apartment or otherwise, from taking action to expel undesirable persons, persons undesirable in the view of other occupants of the premises. For example, such person as the loudmouth, the lunatic, or the drunk who might be in a particular rooming house and causing concern and disturbance to others. Under the provisions of the hon. member's amendment such person could not in any legitimate way be removed from the premises.

I would also point out to the hon. member that there is a substantial protection for persons in the form of jeopardy to which he referred. Once again while the hon. member read a great many hortatory statements into the record, he did not give any indication whether he had taken any expert advice or whether there had been any legal proceedings to determine the assertion which he made.

In this connection I refer him to section 42 (3) of the Criminal Code, and for the benefit of the house I might be permitted to read it into the record:

> Where a person
> (a) having peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property under a claim of right, or
> (b) acting under the authority of a person who has peaceable possession of a dwelling house or real property under a claim of right, assaults any person who is lawfully entitled to possession of it and who is entering it peaceably by day to take possession of it, for the purpose of preventing him from entering, the assault shall be deemed to be provoked by the person who is entering.

The effect of the provision, therefore, is to extend the justification provisions which are already provided by section 41 and the earlier provisions of section 42 of the Criminal Code to the person who has a colour of right to be on the property, to tenants, to tenants' licensees, to tenants' invitees, permitting them to resist efforts by the landlord or the person acting on the authority of the landlord to exclude them from the premises, or otherwise be forced to prevent them from remaining on the premises. I suggest that substantially the provisions provided by the Criminal Code already give this right.

The hon. member referred at length to the practices of the International Nickel Company at Thompson, Manitoba. I have discussed these matters with the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau), for example, who has himself, as has the hon. member, had experience with that particular situation. Perhaps I am out of order in referring to these but I think they bring into question other federal legislation and other lines of possible legal action which, had the hon. member for Winnipeg North and his associates done slightly more resourceful thinking, could have been followed up. For example, the hon. member referred to the actions of the C.N.R. in refusing to ticket people who did not have a pass issued by the company. The C.N.R. is, after all, a common carrier and the provisions of the Railway Act should be considered from the standpoint of taking action to prevent such misconduct. I do not condone for a moment the suggestion that union organizers should not be entitled to go on the property but I do suggest that this is not the proper type of legislation—this kind of garbled, ill-conceived and badly drawn legislation founded on a misunderstanding of the law—to best protect the rights either of the organizer or of the people who most desire the protection of the law so that they can carry on this very legitimate objective.

In closing, I might make reference to the fact that perhaps this is one of the most obscure provisions that has been introduced into this house for some time. Not only is obscurity created because of a misunderstanding of the law on the part of the hon. member, to which I have already referred, but up until the time the hon. member rose to his feet this house had not had the courtesy of an explanation of the situation which the hon. member is trying to remedy, or an explanation of what was the purpose of the bill. I can understand that he did not have an opportunity to give this explanation when he introduced the bill, because it was introduced along with many others at the start of the session; but I do deplore the fact that the hon. member did not have the courtesy to put on the bill any explanatory note so that hon. members, and not just hon. members who may have some knowledge of the law of landlord or tenant or some knowledge of the law concerning labour relations, would know the specific problem to which the hon. member was directing himself and the effect of the provisions he is setting out. I would make these words applicable to all bills of this highly technical nature which are brought before the house. There is an obligation on hon. members to make a brief and lucid statement by way of explanatory note which is attached to the bill and serves to explain the purposes and objectives of it.

So, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the bill is founded on a mistaken knowledge of the law; that it would have application far beyond the field of labour relations to which the hon. member has sought to carry it; would have an adverse effect, as hon. members have pointed out, beyond the field of labour relations; and because there are many incidental effects which the hon. member has apparently not foreseen, I would certainly oppose passage of this measure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the acting house leader whether there will be a change of program next week due to the revolt of the government's political allies which occurred yesterday?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, in asking such a question the hon. gentleman should not have added a gratuitous allegation, or misallegation, at the end of his statement. I think by way of reply I should equally take advantage of the rules for a moment to express to each hon. member in the chamber the wish for a very pleasant and refreshing week end holiday and I would advise them that the business on Tuesday will be a continuation of the business that has been occupying our attention for all of this week, except today.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON MEETING OF CANADA-JAPAN MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to report on the recent meeting of the Canada-Japan ministerial committee from which my colleagues and I returned last evening, and to table the final communiqué of the meeting.

The establishment of this ministerial committee was agreed upon in 1961 at the time of Prime Minister Ikeda's visit to Ottawa. This third meeting took place in the foreign ministry in Tokyo on September 4 and 5.

Japan was represented by the ministers of foreign affairs, finance, agriculture and forestry, and international trade and industry; by the director of the economic planning agency, and by Mr. Hisanaga Shimazu, the new ambassador to Canada. The ministers of finance, trade and commerce, fisheries, myself and the Canadian ambassador to Japan, Mr. Bower, formed the Canadian delegation.

This was a useful meeting. We made progress, I believe, in mutual understanding. The ministerial committee is not a negotiating body. It provides a forum in which ministers from the two countries can exchange views on relations between Canada and Japan and on international problems. We now understand better the Japanese point of view on many questions, and I think they better understand ours.

We found that Canada and Japan have to almost all situations a common approach based on common beliefs in freedom, justice and the desirability of measures to promote world prosperity. We noted the numerous occasions on which our delegations have worked together at the United Nations, particularly in the promotion of the treaty to suspend nuclear testing. Japan shares with Canada the belief that the United Nations remains the main hope for the promotion of peace in the world, and the determination that the organization should be strengthened and its finances assured. We engaged as well in discussions on the role of the United Nations in peace keeping operations.

The committee had an interesting exchange of views on the various political situations in Asia. The Japanese, like us, are concerned over the Indonesian conflict with Malaysia and share our hope that the dispute will be settled by peaceful means in accordance with the charter of the United Nations. The committee agreed as well on the urgent necessity of restoring stability and of improving the well being of the Vietnamese and the other Indochinese peoples. We found that, like ourselves, the Japanese were giving careful thought to the problem of communist China. In this and many other fields we are resolved to continue to work together in close consultation, convinced that Canada and Japan as neighbouring countries across the Pacific have a consequential role to play in the promotion of stability and in the economic development of the Asian and Pacific regions.

We reviewed the current economic position and prospects for the two economies. Canadian ministers were much impressed by the determination and purpose with which the government and people of Japan are pursuing their policies of modernization and economic growth. There is every reason to believe that Canadian exports to Japan, which have risen so rapidly in recent years, will continue to expand at a good rate as a result both of expansion of the Japanese economy and further trade liberalization.

We discussed in some detail the various quantitative restrictions and other Japanese obstacles to trade which still limit sales of Canadian goods to Japan. We expressed our expectation of early progress in liberalizing remaining Japanese restrictions and of important and meaningful negotiations between Japan and Canada in the course of the current Kennedy round of trade and tariff negotiations.

The Japanese ministers drew attention to the imbalance of trade with Canada and to the inhibition of their sales to Canada represented by the restraints they observe on exports of certain of their products to this country to avoid disruption of our market. Canadian ministers noted that nearly all Canadian exports to Japan are essential foodstuffs or necessary industrial material, which provide the sinews of Japanese economic strength. On the other hand, most Japanese exports are manufactures and directly competitive with Canadian production. In the circumstances a trade imbalance is not unnatural.

Both sides were agreed on the desirability of an expansion of trade in both directions. It was noted that there was a variety of opportunities for the further diversification of Japanese sales to Canada. In this regard a high level Japanese economic mission will be visiting Canada in October.

Our discussions led to an improved understanding of the problem of voluntary restraints as seen from the two sides. Canadian ministers noted in this regard that no other highly industrialized country extends more liberal treatment than does Canada to Japanese imports. The communiqué records our agreement that recourse to such restraints should be kept to a minimum and that necessary consultations in this regard should be expeditious and based on mutual understanding.

We had an excellent exchange of views about international economic matters, including the status of the Kennedy round, international liquidity, the trade and development problems of the less advanced countries and east-west trade. In all these important matters there was a remarkable and gratifying similarity of interest and outlook. We found ourselves in full agreement on the objectives of trade liberalization to be pursued through the Kennedy round and expressed determination to do our respective parts to make the negotiations a success. Ministers specifically agreed to maintain close co-operation between their respective delegations throughout these important negotiations.

There was useful discussion of fisheries matters. We considered the problems facing the meeting of the parties to the north Pacific convention which opens here in Ottawa tomorrow. As a result we are hopeful that a formula will be found which will adequately reflect the interests of the three countries and result in the maintenance and development of the vital fisheries resources of the north Pacific. Other fisheries questions were considered, including the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of Canada. I am satisfied that as an outcome of our discussions the extent of fisheries co-operation between Canada and Japan has been enlarged and will be intensified in the years to come.

We renewed our invitation to Japan to participate in Expo '67, and we trust that a decision will soon be taken to permit a worthy representation in Montreal of the traditional culture and modern accomplishments of our Pacific neighbour.

The Minister of Finance took advantage of his visit to Japan to sign on behalf of Canada an agreement for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income. This agreement will be submitted to the house and to the Japanese Diet for approval before ratification.

I signed on behalf of Canada an exchange of notes covering the mutual waiver of certain visa requirements between the two countries.

In a different field we noted the progress made in the development of communication satellites, an area which offers the prospect of extensive future co-operation between our two countries.

I would like to express my gratitude for the conversations I was privileged to have with the Japanese prime minister. Mr. Ikeda added his personal views on many subjects, and I was particularly impressed with his qualities of statesmanship and his understanding of the international scene.

I wish to mention the all too brief visit the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I were able to make to the city of Hiroshima. We were deeply moved. The indelible message of Hiroshima cannot be adequately expressed in words. It must never be forgotten, even though a fine new city all but covers the scars.

Japan, after the United States and Great Britain, is Canada's most important trading partner, and these ministerial meetings have provided a valuable opportunity for developing closer relations with this great Pacific nation as a neighbour and a friend.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the summary given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the ministerial meetings in Japan does reveal one continuing fact, namely the close relationship between the Japanese and the Canadian peoples. The minister mentioned the visit to Hiroshima, a visit that could result only in a greater determination that never again shall there be resort to nuclear arms. It shows the utter devastation that results from the use of an instrument which, while a tremendous power for good, also represents the sword of potential destruction.

As to the references by the minister to the Prime Minister of Japan, may I say that anyone who has met with Mr. Ikeda cannot be other than greatly impressed not only by his knowledge of international affairs, to which the minister alluded, but as well by the wealth of friendship which he shows in everything he says and does in relation to Canada.

As to what took place, I think the house will be disappointed that it has not received some concrete information. Amidst a mass of generalities and grandiloquent prose, all that emerges is that these meetings are beneficial; and they are. But what action was determined upon is left to the imagination.

In our trading relations with Japan the imbalance of trade is a matter that has continued throughout the years. I do not forget that when we were in office the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, on more than one occasion expressed his great concern respecting our trade imbalance with Japan. I recall one time in particular, on February 23, 1962, when he asked whether the Japanese authorities were "becoming embittered by the efforts of the federal government to keep a tight lid on exports from their country to Canada, despite a continuing increase in Canadian sales to Japan". The view of the Liberal party of that day, if that question meant what it apparently did, was that we should not endeavour, by securing mutual quotas, to prevent the dumping or the export to Canada of products in the production which Canadians could not compete. However, since the present government has come into office it has generally followed the course of the previous government despite the protestations to the contrary in the past.

Sir, all of us in this house recognize that Japan, who only a few short years ago was a major enemy, has in the intervening comparatively few years since the end of the war become an exponent of democracy, a country which practises democracy and whose watchwords are freedom and liberty, having a desire to walk side by side with the free nations in maintaining freedom in all parts of the world as well as at all times standing firmly against the onrush of communism.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, members in all parts of the house will welcome the return of the delegation of Canadian ministers from their visit to Tokyo, and we are glad to have the report today from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I think it is encouraging to know that representatives of the Canadian government can sit down with the cabinet ministers of Japan, and that a nation with which a few years ago we were at war should now be willing to agree that the various international differences that affect the world must be worked out within the charter of the United Nations. I think we can now confidently hope that our days of difference with Japan are behind us, and that before us stretches a new vista of peaceful co-operation.

I was particularly impressed with the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the liberalization of trade between Canada and Japan. The minister spoke in most optimistic terms. However, this statement is hardly in accord with that made by the Minister of Finance according to a Tokyo report, which says:

> Finance Minister Walter Gordon of Canada said yesterday his government will not tolerate damage to well established Canadian industries by unrestrained imports on low cost Japanese goods.

The minister went on to say:

> This year these restraints apply mostly to textiles, footwear and tableware and make up only one quarter of Japan's total exports to Canada of $150 million.

Then the report goes on to say that no agreement was reached on the issue of Japanese worsteds, and it points out that the Japanese government are not satisfied that Canadian industry is being hurt by the import of Japanese worsteds into this country.

I think we must recognize, Mr. Speaker, that Japan offers a great market for Canada, particularly for western Canada, and it is very important to our future economic development. We must also recognize that Japan buys from us a great deal more than we buy from her, and that if this trade is to continue we must open up avenues by which Japan can sell her goods in Canada. This might have to be a gradual adjustment of present voluntary restrictions, but it must be definite and must not merely consist of platitudes. I hope before long we will have some definitive statement from the government as to how much this liberalization of trade is to be a reality and how much of it is to be a myth.

There is one other thing I should like to say, that the minister's statement with reference to Hiroshima I am sure impressed all of us. I think it is not only important that we say it will never be forgotten; I think we must also resolve that it will never be repeated.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we join in welcoming the Secretary of State for External Affairs and other members of the delegation who have returned from their journey to Japan. I believe we have a mutual feeling of appreciation for the abbreviated but still comprehensive report the minister has made to us in respect of the negotiations and actions taken in Japan at this ministerial conference.

It is significant that this particular conference should have taken place as it did, just prior to the Olympic games which will shortly begin in Japan. I think both serve to remind us of that ever-narrowing world which brings us all, nation and nation, citizen and citizen, closer together.

References to Hiroshima that have already been made, are something that strike close to the hearts of all peace-loving people and reminds us all of the awfulness of the age in which we live, should those scientific inventions that have been brought to reality be used for purposes other than peaceful development.

It is discouraging that in his remarks the minister had to mention the problem that exists today between our fellow commonwealth nations, Malaysia and Indonesia, and that the threat of war still hangs heavy in many parts of the world.

Obviously the bulk of the discussions that took place had to do with trade. The minister's remarks reminded us very clearly that trade is a two-way street, and that we cannot expect to sell unless we are likewise willing to buy. We in the west are particularly interested in the potential of trade with Japan. Within these few days while this conference has been taking place a group of Japanese industrialists have been investigating the potentials with respect to the coal necessary to feed the furnaces of Japan, in my own constituency. It is true that we have a tremendous potential in trade with Japan, but this will not come to pass unless the talks which have just taken place are extended so they become mutually satisfactory arrangements.

Certainly there is something most commendable in the fact that two countries such as Japan and Canada can sit down at the level which these talks took place and discuss these problems, and then arrive at voluntary restraints upon each other's policies, in an effort to assist each other, as they at the same time seek to ease those burdens that each nation has relating to this problem of trade. It is noted also that the minister mentioned the fisheries problems, and we know these are urgent. We are pleased that this subject has been discussed as well.

It is not necessary to go into great detail at this time, Mr. Speaker, except to say again that I think it is encouraging to find negotiations of this type taking place at this level which can also bring about such courtesies and convenient arrangements regarding visas and taxation which are to the mutual advantage of the citizens of both nations.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, we welcome this report and look forward to more details of the discussions, and the opportunity for debate at a later date in the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was certainly most interesting. The members of this house and the Canadian people will readily appreciate that, besides being one of the largest markets for Canadian products, Japan can also supply us with items that are not produced here.

We export goods and industrial equipment to Japan and, in so doing, we find that in addition to assisting that country, we are also helping Canadian producers. The minister is convinced that Japan represents one of the best foreign outlets in the world for our export products.

One point on which I quite agree with the minister is this. I much prefer seeing him do business with Japan than with the communist countries of the world. I doubt that Japan will use Canadian products to try through economic means to win the world over to a communist ideology. The Japanese respect the human being, just as we do here in Canada, and I feel that we must do everything that is humanly possible to improve relations between our country and Japan.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat that ahead of the Japanese market or any other market throughout the world, there is a domestic market which is not satisfied and I am anxious to see the day when the members of the cabinet, led by the Prime Minister, will propose to us solutions or means to satisfy the domestic market first, that is the Canadian consumers, the Canadian unemployed, in short the Canadian families which also need food and perhaps industrial machinery on the eastern farms.

For instance, we are told that Japan is improving greatly, that Hiroshima was built following its destruction, and so on. However, we are not being told about the number of unemployed in Japan. Perhaps there are not any? If so, why are we not given the reasons for it, so that we could adopt the same methods in Canada and improve the living conditions of Canadians?

It seems to me that it is high time for the ministers, who travel throughout the world, to submit to us concrete and objective solutions which would set our own house in order. We could then bring this to bear on our relations with neighbouring countries.

REPORT ON MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH ECONOMIC CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I ask permission of the house to table a copy of the communiqué issued following the meeting of the commonwealth economic consultative council held in Kuala Lumpur on September 1 and 2, which the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance and I attended as representatives of the Canadian government.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister permission to table the communiqué?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: On the way to Kuala Lumpur we paid short visits to Hong Kong and Singapore, meeting local government officials and businessmen interested in trade with Canada. While in Hong Kong we had the opportunity of discussions with representatives of the China Resources Company which, as hon. members are aware, has been buying substantial quantities of wheat from the Canadian wheat board on behalf of mainland China.

In Hong Kong, in Singapore, in Kuala Lumpur and later in Tokyo we were enormously impressed by the high rate of economic activity. Everywhere one looked factories were being erected, roads were being built, apartment houses were rising. There can be no doubt that these Pacific countries are on the march and have great potential as markets for Canadian products.

The commonwealth economic consultative council met in Kuala Lumpur on the first anniversary of the founding of Malaysia. We were happy to join in the celebrations. I regret to say that the celebrations were marred by less happy events, and I draw attention to the text of the communiqué in which the ministers from all the 18 independent commonwealth countries joined in recalling the assurance given by the commonwealth prime ministers of their sympathy and support of Malaysia's efforts to preserve its sovereign independence and integrity and to achieve a peaceful and honourable settlement of its current differences with its neighbours.

The discussions at Kuala Lumpur were notable for their emphasis upon the problems of the developing countries, both within and without the commonwealth. We were happy to be able to say that Canada is stepping up the level and quality of our external aid, particularly in the field of education, and that the government of Canada supports strongly the international efforts that are being made to improve the trading position of the developing countries.

ROYAL VISIT

REPORTED DANGER TO QUEEN IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister if he has had brought to his attention a broadcast over the C.B.C. by Brigadier Michael Wardell regarding the prospective visit of Her Majesty the Queen. Has he, in the last few days, had any occasion to receive the views of Canadians in various parts of Canada who have suggested, as did Mr. Wardell, that in view of the continuing threats consideration should be given by the Prime Minister to recommending that the visit of Her Majesty should not take place as scheduled? Has the government given the fullest consideration to this matter, a problem that is really a difficult one and which will certainly exercise the mind of the Prime Minister, who is her adviser?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of listening to the broadcast to which my hon. friend referred. I thought the language used in portraying the situation in Canada which would confront Her Majesty when she visits this country was extravagant and indeed extreme. I do not agree that Her Majesty in coming to Canada, to use the words of Brigadier Wardell, is being subjected to a very awful risk. I have had no correspondence, Mr. Speaker, immediately before or since that broadcast along the lines of the views of Brigadier Wardell. The government is confident that the Queen will receive a warm welcome when she comes to Canada. I think it unfortunate that this visit should be interpreted in the terms used by the gentleman who made the broadcast to which my hon. friend referred.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION ON ADMISSION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding a press dispatch which says that external affairs minister Paul Martin expressed Canada's hope that an advance would be made during the forthcoming United Nations general assembly toward a solution of the problem of whether to admit communist China to the world organization. I should like to ask the minister if his statement in Tokyo indicates that the Canadian government, first, is going to promote the seating of mainland China in the United Nations or, second, will vote to seat mainland China in the event that this question comes before the United Nations at its coming session.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It was natural that in discussions with the government of Japan, that great Asian country, this problem should be raised; and it was discussed very frankly. I stated to the government of Japan what I had already stated to this house on May 22.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister about a further statement which is attributed to him in the same dispatch, and which is in quotation marks.

> We hope such an advance would be acceptable to the United States.

May I ask the minister whether Canadian policy is being held up until the United States indicates its willingness to have Canada take this course of action; and is United States acceptance a sine qua non of Canada adopting a policy for the seating of mainland China in the United Nations?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend will perhaps recall that in the detailed statement I made on May 22 I was discussing a situation which could affect Formosa. I had suggested that consideration be given to preliminary steps for preserving the integrity of that particular country.

With regard to the other part of the question, it is not correct to say that foreign policy is dictated as the result of action taken by another power, no matter how great or friendly; but it is elementary, and I believe desirable, that in the formulation of policy one should take into account a number of considerations. Among those considerations in this instance must be the views of the friends with whom Canada is closely associated. The United States happens to be one of these countries, as is Japan.

Mr. Herridge: The answer is yes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister advise the house whether, as reported, consideration is being given to a meeting between himself and President Johnson at some point on the Pacific coast in the immediate future? If so, what is the purport of such a meeting so close to the United States presidential election? May I ask further, is there any basis for the invitation, which I understand was received from President Johnson, beyond a ceremonial meeting relative to agreements that have some bearing on the Columbia river treaty?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the ratifications in respect of this very important treaty are to be exchanged on September 16. It is considered that it would be appropriate to signify this very important and happy conclusion to such a significant international convention in some way which would result in a meeting between the heads of the governments of the two countries. No final decision has yet been taken but I hope, Mr. Speaker, that such a meeting can be arranged; and I assure my hon. friend if it can be arranged it will not result in any intervention, direct or indirect, in any election in our two countries. I expect to be able to make an announcement on this matter within a day or so, but I repeat that the occasion would be strictly the exchange of ratifications on the happy conclusion of a very important treaty.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As a supplementary question, does President Johnson wish to celebrate the ratification of this treaty because of its coming benefits to the United States, where arrangements have been made by the Tacoma city light and power company to purchase one eighth of the downstream benefits, provided as the result of storage in Canada, for $65 million? On the basis of this, Canadian downstream benefits from the Columbia will be sold in the United States for a total of $520 million.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this government is equally happy to celebrate the conclusion of this international treaty which will confer such great benefits on Canada.

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that for the past 10 days there has been little or no word of negotiations relating to the Cyprus crisis, can the minister give us any idea of recent developments there, particularly as the days are numbered as far as the present arrangements are concerned for peace keeping operations?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the secretary general will be making a report to the security council within the course of the next week, following which there will be a meeting of the security council, when future policy will be decided.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STEPS TO DEAL WITH F.L.Q.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, last Monday a question was asked of the Minister of Justice as to whether those who participated in the attempted arms theft in Montreal, which resulted in the homicide of the store proprietor, were members of the F.L.Q. At that time the minister declined to give any information. Since then the F.L.Q., in a communication that it sent out to various people, admitted its participation in the robbery and homicide in question. Is the minister now in a position to make a statement regarding the involvement of the F.L.Q. and the degree to which the F.L.Q. in recent weeks has strengthened its numbers?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the persons who are alleged to have been connected directly or by way of concert or conspiracy with the matter just referred to by the right hon. gentleman are concerned, since last Monday some development has taken place and there has been the actual laying of charges against them. I believe that until such charges are disposed of, any comment as to the particular activities of any of the individuals concerned or as to the possible motives which may have animated them would be out of order on my part; and I know the right hon. gentleman will agree that so far as I am concerned for the moment, and for the reasons I have just stated, I am barred by both ethics and custom from commenting further.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to argue that. There is a case before the courts and the matter is sub judice, but the minister would not be barred from answering the other important part of the question, which is the material part. What is the potential strength of the F.L.Q. as estimated by the law officers of the crown or the police officers? Can't he make a statement in that connection?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give a statement to the house on that particular aspect of the matter.

Mr. Churchill: Why not?

Mr. Favreau: For two reasons, or at least one. There are police groups other than the R.C.M.P. interested in this matter, and second there is not only the interest of the federal government involved but also of other governments. Third, any disclosure of precise information in this respect would be tantamount to laying out information in the open which it would not be in the public interest to disclose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not making very much progress in the answers I am getting. I ask the minister, in view of the threats that have been made by members of this organization respecting the prospective visit of Her Majesty the Queen, is it not of great importance that the country should know the degree to which the F.L.Q. is merely a small minority and not representative of general thinking?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I have my own personal opinion as to this and it would not be proper for me to state it, but in so far as the actual facts gathered and their disclosure are concerned, I must maintain the same stand as I have just taken and I do not believe that it would be in the public interest—

Mr. Churchill: Why not?

Mr. Favreau: —to refer to this matter further, especially in connection with the very solemn occasion which will be soon taking place and about which I believe questions, like the ones which have been put both to the Prime Minister and myself, are certainly not in the best interests of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I want the assurance that Her Majesty is going to be fully protected and that there is no danger to her.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I won't be brushed off by a supercilious statement by the Minister of Justice in that regard, trying to place responsibility over here for his failure to get after the F.L.Q. as he should.

Mr. Favreau: It would have been much easier to have asked at the beginning whether the government was ready or willing to give that assurance, or desirous of doing so. It has already been given, and it is implied in all the acts of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since inquiries are being made about the F.L.Q. in the province of Quebec and about its membership, and that, according to press reports, a special bullet-proof armoured car will be used in Quebec city, I ask the Minister of Justice whether it would not be possible to give as much malicious publicity to an incident which happened in Toronto last night? Were the necessary steps taken to prevent young people from causing trouble in that city when the Beatles arrived? Therefore, I ask if the Beatles are also controlled these days, in order to prevent the Queen from coming to Canada?

CONFERENCE BETWEEN JUSTICE MINISTER AND QUEBEC ATTORNEY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice?

Can the minister tell us whether he has been invited by the new solicitor general of the province of Quebec to discuss crime prevention with him?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not have that honour.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell us whether certain judges who come under his jurisdiction such as the judges of the superior court have been called to a meeting by the new solicitor general?

Mr. Favreau: I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Has the Minister of Justice discussed with the new solicitor general of the province of Quebec certain future reforms concerning the parole of prisoners now being held at St. Vincent de Paul or in other Quebec penitentiaries?

Mr. Favreau: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

HAL BANKS—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct to the Minister of Justice a question which is likely to clarify a little the situation as regards Mr. Hal Banks and what he has been up to recently. Does the minister intend to establish a royal commission in order to clear up certain questions raised by members of this house as well as by the population?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say that up to now that solution has not been considered.

CANADIAN FLAG

SUGGESTED MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS TO CONSIDER PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Last Friday the right hon. gentleman indicated that he would be willing to call, or at least participate in, a meeting of the leaders of all parties in an attempt to find some solution to the disposition of the flag resolution currently before the house. I should like to ask the Prime Minister now whether he has received any indication from the Leader of the Opposition that such a leaders' meeting could be useful.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Prime Minister given any indication that he will depart from his stubborn attitude—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —respecting the suggestion that a committee be set up of 15 members to decide this matter by a majority, when he would have seven members and no doubt control, by their thinking, the other three members?

Mr. Pearson: I am very glad the hon. member asked me that question. I am also very glad indeed that at the meetings of the leaders which have been held there were four others present. I think it would be accepted by all those present that at these meetings the adjustments of position made by the government were not met in any respect by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it not the Leader of the Opposition who suggested in the first place the setting up of a committee to get this matter out of the House of Commons?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. The suggestion that a committee be set up was made by the leader of the New Democratic party. It was accepted by me as leader of the government and rejected by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege—not that it really matters, because the record speaks—that is completely false in every particular. What the Prime Minister did say was that he would accept a committee on his terms and on no others.

Mr. Pearson: On a question of privilege, and to keep the record straight, I ask the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam whether I did not accept the proposal on his terms, and whether those terms were not rejected by the Leader of the Opposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I attended the meeting of the five party leaders. The head of the government and the leaders of the three minority parties in the house have even been accused of collusion. At every meeting, and I say it before the whole house, there is only one who raised objections and showed deliberate obstinancy, at every one of those meetings between party leaders, and it is the leader of the official opposition.

So, today, since I rose on a question of privilege, let us stop monkeying with the flag question, and if the Leader of the Opposition is capable of showing good will and good faith, let us agree to take a majority vote in the house on the flag issue.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The grand alliance between the Créditistes and the Liberals.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): On the question of privilege which has been raised, I do not wish to get into a discussion of this matter because I intend to speak in the flag debate and may be anticipating what I have to say. But I should like to point out, in order to keep the record clear, that the party leaders, as demonstrated by the statements they made in this house on August 21, were divided. Four party leaders were agreeable to the setting up of a committee with the proviso that the report of such a committee should be debated for a limited period of time. The Leader of the Opposition took the position that he could not agree to any such limitation. This was the only point of difference.

Mr. Olson: Now that we have had a long week end and many members have had an opportunity to visit their constituencies, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider calling a leaders' meeting immediately after the caucuses tomorrow, when perhaps some of the sentiments of those attending will have been passed on to their leaders.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You speak with authority.

Mr. Pearson: I would be glad to consider that. But I hope if we have another meeting we can make some progress and that we shall not reach a deadlock or impasse, reference to which has been made this afternoon, thanks to the attitude taken by the Leader of the Opposition toward this question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister be willing to have a committee set up, the proviso being that in order to bring about a recommendation for a flag, 80 per cent to 90 per cent agreement should be arrived at?

Some hon. Members: Veto.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You see? They know in advance how the committee will go. That is why they are opposed to it.

Would the right hon. gentleman agree to that? If he would agree to that we would be only too pleased to have the matter sent to a committee, as has been made perfectly clear. But we are not going to have a committee in which you start with the majority against us and sit—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in 90 per cent democracy.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): In view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has suggested, and the Prime Minister has opposed, the holding of a plebiscite, that is to say the consulting of the people, does the right hon. gentleman believe in democracy, period?

Mr. Pearson: In the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, a plebiscite is not necessarily democracy.

TRADE

STATEMENT BY FINANCE MINISTER RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What are the well established Canadian industries to which the Minister of Finance referred, as reported from Tokyo, in these words—

> The government will not tolerate damage to well established Canadian industries by unrestrained imports of low-cost Japanese goods.

What are these well established industries to which he refers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think the industries referred to can possibly be found by a consideration of those articles upon which voluntary restraints have been established by the Japanese government.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Later:]

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question supplemental to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary North. Arising out of those trade discussions, is there a possibility or any indication that the Japanese will be buying goods produced by Canadian manufacturers?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, during the discussions with the Japanese government we urged very strongly, as reported by my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the restrictions which now prevent the sale in Japan of Canadian manufactured goods should be relaxed as rapidly as possible.

[Later:]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A few moments ago the hon. member for Wellington South rose to ask a question, but he was not speaking from his own seat and therefore sat down. I believe he is the acting whip for the official opposition, and should be given the privilege of speaking from the whip's seat.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I appreciate the opportunity offered by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, but my question has been asked.

GRAIN

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICES FOR WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have received many complaints from prairie farmers delivering new wheat to the elevators that they cannot get payment for it owing to the delay in having the price set. Could the minister tell the house when the price of wheat will be set, so that farmers can get payment for their wheat on delivery?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I take this question as notice and give a full answer tomorrow?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning a matter I first raised on August 18. In view of the fact that the constituency of Westmorland has now been unrepresented for 103 days or nearly four months, and the constituency of Waterloo South for 73 days; and in view of the fact that even if dates by the by-election were announced now it would be another 44 days before members could be elected, can the right hon. gentleman inform the house whether a decision has been reached as to the dates of these by-elections and if so, what are such dates?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I apologize to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker. I think he asked me this question last week and I said I hoped to be in a position to answer it at the end of the week. I am almost certain I will be in a position to answer it tomorrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—DELAY IN PAYMENT FOR WINTER WORKS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister tell the house whether the contribution of the federal government under the winter works program in the province of Quebec has been fully paid for 1963-64?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter was dealt with in the adjournment period last week. At that time it was my information that all outstanding accounts had been settled, but I will be glad to make inquiries and advise my hon. friend later.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that on July 6, which is more than three months ago, the Minister of Justice told the house that the government was at that time completing—I emphasize the word "completing"—the drafting of the bill respecting the Canada pension plan, can the minister say whether that drafting has now been completed and whether the resolution preceding the new bill will be on the order paper soon?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I make it two months, not three, since July 6. However, I would like to tell the house that I expect to make a statement regarding the Canada pension plan shortly.

Mr. Knowles: I accept the correction, Mr. Speaker. The minister is right; it is only two months since we were told it was almost completed. May I ask whether the bill will be ready in time for debate by this house in case the flag debate is either completed soon or set aside by the house?

COAL

SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, but in his absence may I direct it to the acting minister, or indeed the right hon. Prime Minister may wish to reply. It is prompted by a Canadian Press article emanating from the dominion-provincial coal convention at Lake Louise. My question has reference to subventions, and this is what appeared in the press over the week end:

> William Whittaker, managing director of the coal operators' association of western Canada, Thursday called on coal and transportation industry officials to work to eliminate a federal subvention on coal transportation.

I may say that Mr. Whittaker is a member of the dominion coal board. It could be that he is misquoted or misrepresented, as sometimes happens to members of parliament. However, since Mr. Whittaker is a member of the dominion coal board, is the minister in a position to clarify the statement and assure the house that this is not the view of the federal government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement, but as my hon. friend reports it, it certainly does not reflect government policy. I will be glad to look into the matter at once.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DRUGS

PHARMACEUTICAL ASSOCIATION REPRESENTATION ON BODIES CONSIDERING PROFESSIONAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. My question is based on a resolution contained in a letter from the Canadian pharmaceutical association and directed to the Prime Minister under the date of August 31, 1964. Will the Prime Minister give the Canadian pharmaceutical association the assurance that their profession will be represented on committees, boards and commissions appointed in the future to consider matters directly or indirectly affecting the profession and/or the distribution of drugs to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I believe I have received that letter, Mr. Speaker, and it is under consideration. I would prefer to look at the letter and see whether a reply has gone forward before answering my hon. friend's question.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONSIDERATION OF FEDERAL AID TO NURSING TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of recent United States legislation to provide federal aid to nursing training; and if so, has the government considered the possibility of similar legislation for Canada?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no, and the answer to the second part of the question is no.

FISHERIES

REGULATIONS RESPECTING KILLING OF SEALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. On May 1 he said that a meeting was being convened by him in Moncton on May 20 at which all parties interested in the question of sealing operations would be represented. I would like to ask the minister now whether there has been any success in the matter of preventing the hunting of seals with airplanes in the gulf of St. Lawrence. A great many organizations are interested in this matter, and I am wondering whether the regulations for 1965 will prohibit such action.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the meeting referred to by the hon. member was held in Moncton on May 20 between officials of my department and representatives of the sealing industry. As a result of this meeting amendments to the existing regulations controlling sealing operations are now being drafted. As soon as they are completed another meeting will be held in order to discuss the amendments, and I am hopeful that those amendments will be ready within the next three or four weeks.

Mr. Douglas: Could I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it anticipated that these amendments will prohibit the use of airplanes and some of the other more barbarous practices that were carried on last year with respect to sealing?

Mr. Robichaud: I am not in a position to state at this time that these amendments will entirely prohibit the use of helicopters or airplanes, but I am hopeful that they will control such operations.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—ACTION FOLLOWING RECENT SINKING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is considering any special steps with regard to the recent sinking in the St. Lawrence, in view of the fact that it is almost a repetition of a similar tragedy that occurred last year at the same location?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, immediately the news of this tragic event was conveyed to the department we undertook what is the first step in these matters, namely we instituted an investigation of the facts. I believe this is now under way. As soon as that information can be gathered consideration will be given to what further steps should be taken. It is a singular and very sad coincidence that there should have been such a similarity between these two tragedies.

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the one asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I wonder whether the minister could tell us whether following the inquiry into the tragic sinking of the Tritonica any special change in the routing or the various aid to navigation installations on the St. Lawrence was recommended and, if so, whether such recommendation has been followed by the department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, this is a question the answer to which I have to inform myself about before I would take the risk of giving an answer to the house.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

PORT STANLEY, ONT.—OPERATION OF COASTGUARD VESSEL "SPUME"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps while I am on my feet I could be permitted to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Elgin in connection with the coastguard cutter Spume stationed in the lake Erie district.

I think the person who wrote the hon. gentleman must have been misinformed, because in fact when captains of rescue cutters receive information directly of any vessel in distress they can and are expected to proceed immediately to give any assistance possible without waiting for instructions from Trenton. All that is required of them is that they report to Trenton on their movements as quickly as possible so the people at Trenton will know at all times where they are situated.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Thursday, September 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Churchill.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, if I may resume from where I left off last Thursday evening when 10.30 was called, I was speaking in this debate for the first time since the flag resolution was brought before the house. I mentioned that the Canadian people are actually wondering now what is going on in the parliament of Canada. They are wondering, as I said last Thursday, whether we are a bunch of school kids who have lost our teacher. They do not seem to get any guidance whatever from this parliament at the moment, either on the flag issue or on government business, because the only business we are considering at the moment is the flag. I am under the impression that today we are further away from a Canadian flag than we ever were before. At least before we started this debate there seemed to me a mutual understanding that Canada wanted a flag, but at the stage we have now reached the people are wondering whether they should have a flag; parliament itself has not decided whether they should have a flag or whether the people should vote on it. The people are wondering whether this flag will unite Canada or divide it. At the moment things are moving in such direction that it is dividing Canada instead of uniting us.

We must ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker: What does this flag stand for. If it is going to stand for the ripping of Canada into parts, either regional, provincial or as a nation itself, we may as well not have a flag at all. We want a flag, as do all Canadians, which will not only stand for one group, one religion, one race or one nation, but for Canada; a flag to represent Canada among the other nations of the world as a united and strong nation. The flag should represent all of our historical background and proclaim our unity. It should stand for the social security which we have in Canada. It should stand for individual freedom and for the freedom of any association which exists within its boundaries.

Everyone is proud to look at a flag which stands for something; but what a disgrace it would be if when we looked at our Canadian flag we had to say it is that flag which has destroyed the nation itself. If we do not want that we must play our part as the responsible elected members of this nation, judge the situation as objectively as possible, and take part in this debate using the greatest wisdom we can deploy. If we do not do that it will be the downfall perhaps not only of the government but of confederation and the nation as it stands.

I might have used some very harsh words, Mr. Speaker, last Thursday night when I spoke of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Diefenbaker) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson); but believe me I think they are true. It is up to the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the government to take their responsibility as the two great leaders in this nation. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Opposition is regarded as just as important as the Prime Minister himself in the form of government we have. It is up to the Leader of the Opposition to bring forward any constructive objections which he has as to why why we should have or should not have such a flag. But it is not the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition to create any kind of obstruction in such a situation, whether good or bad. The role of the government as well as the opposition—any opposition—is to judge what is best for the Canadian nation, because we are here to represent Canadian interests, not our own.

We have had all kinds of speeches, Mr. Speaker, and some very good ones. They might not always have related to the subject as we would wish, and I myself sometimes stray in that regard; but we are all trying to have our say. I am wondering however, whether we are all trying to find a solution. It is not only a matter of speaking and then sitting down and saying we have done our job. We should speak in such a way that we might find a solution which will take this parliament out of the mess it is in today, a mess brought on by ourselves and nobody else.

The Canadian people were told in the last election campaign that the Liberal party would take a stand on a Canadian flag. Therefore it is up to us, as the responsible elected representatives of the people, to be their spokesmen. Let us carry out this task wisely and justly, and try to do it in such a way that we will save the nation, not destroy it. The Conservative members have objections to this flag resolution. They have brought in some amendments, but I have seen no reference to the flag on the amendments. It is now or never, Mr. Speaker; we cannot delay any longer. We desire unity but we will not accept unity with uniformity. We do not expect that any member of this house or Canadian citizen would accept unity on that basis. We will accept, however, unity with diversity, because that is the only democratic method to be followed. Every citizen of this country should have the opportunity of expressing an opinion in respect of this flag, and that is the only way we can follow the majority rule principle. Such a selection by majority rule would be acceptable to everyone, provided it did not ignore the basic rights of any minority or individual.

As a young member of parliament looking at the situation which has developed in this house, Mr. Speaker, I am ashamed in public to admit that I am a member of parliament. The situation with which we are now faced is shameful. We have expressed our opinions. We have fought for what we believe is right. We believe that Canada has a history comparable to that of any other country in the world. Canadians can be proud of what has been obtained and attained through sacrifice, valour and hard work. Our ancestors should be commended for what they have accomplished in this regard, and it is up to us in this house to continue the progress of this nation, rather than to destroy it as we are doing through a continuation of this debate. I think everyone now has come to the realization that we have now reached the crossroads and must act quickly. We cannot permit ourselves to continue to be a group of asses listening to ourselves bray. We have done too much of this already. At this time we must find a solution acceptable to all parties in this house. Each member of each party in this House of Commons is an elected representative of the people, and each opinion must be respected.

It is not my intention to raise further objections or points which might rekindle the flame of debate, but we must soon settle on some plausible solution to the problems which now exist. The Liberal government has presented its idea in respect of the flag, that being the three maple leaf design embodied in the main motion. Other suggestions have been made, and we have all seen various proposed designs. I have one before me at the moment, prepared by Jean Dubuc, who is a descendant of the man who wrote the words of "O Canada". I do not know how close a relative he is, but one of his ancestors certainly did write those words.

Whether we accept the design proposed by the government, or another design, we must have a flag which will stand for national unity, and will be looked upon with pride by Canadians. There is nothing which tears my heart more, as well as the heart of anyone else in this house, or any Canadian citizen, than does the suggestion that we will need a special type of vehicle to protect the Queen on her visit to this country. I think we must begin to protect Canadians generally in view of the situation that is now developing. Many people are beginning to tear out their hair because this flag debate continues without any indication of conclusion, and because all the time it continues it divides this country and whatever unity does exist. As long as we continue to beat around the bush here in this house, without coming to any plausible solution to the problem, we are going to further this division. We have now been debating this flag issue for 22 days, and talked about it as early as last spring, without any good result. As a matter of fact, I am now under the impression that we are further away from a solution than we have ever been, and if we continue to follow the course we have followed we will divide this House of Commons into groups, and this country into ethnic associations.

The United Nations, made up of representatives of almost every country in this world, was able to adopt a flag within a very short period of time. Why cannot we decide upon a flag in a similar fashion which will represent the two founding races of this country and those Canadians of other ethnic origin who have come to this country adopting its customs and rules, and who, I am sure, will adopt its flag when and if the Canadian government presents one that is acceptable and representative of unity? Let us put our political feelings aside while dealing with this issue. It is useless to attempt to save our own skins at the expense of national unity because our skins would not be worth much without a country.

A day or two ago I heard an hon. member state that debate is the living right of parliament. I admit that fact, but on this occasion it might well prove to be the death of our Canadian nation. We do desire a Canadian flag, but let us have one that will stand for unity. I am sure the Canadian economy has suffered and will suffer more because of the time lost by this parliament during the debate on this flag issue. This parliament is now behind in its normal work. We did not have a budget presented to the house for several years. We are now losing a great deal of time by discussing the type of flag Canada should adopt, and by the time we do come to some conclusion this nation will be divided and the flag will then be useless because it will stand for little or nothing.

I should like at this time, Mr. Speaker, to present possible solution to our problems, and outline my understanding of the situation. I think it is much easier for a small group of members, perhaps 15, to come to some agreement in respect of a flag design than it would be for the 265 members in this house. Each of the 265 members, in expressing individual and representative points of view, will tend to keep us apart just long enough to destroy whatever unity we now have. I think a small committee could work together discussing the situation objectively, and arrive at some plausible and acceptable solution upon which we could vote to accept or reject.

I do not intend to speak any longer on this flag issue because I feel that the sooner I conclude my remarks the sooner we will find an acceptable solution to our problems. I suggest that this house should adjourn this debate today for a period of 60 days, referring this resolution to a committee comprised of 15 members; seven from the Liberal party, five from the Conservative party, one from the New Democratic party, one from the Social Credit party and one from the Ralliement Creditiste. This 15 member committee could discuss the matter for 60 days starting from today. Then the resolution could be brought back to this house and debated for a period, let us say of six days, somewhat like the throne speech debate or the budget debate. There could be a limit of six days. Then there could be a vote. If it did not pass, nothing would be destroyed; we could go back on the flag debate. However in the meantime the house would have an opportunity of dealing with something else and taking care of the Canadian people. I believe the committee would have a better opportunity of finding a solution to this matter than we would have in this house.

I move therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), that this debate do now adjourn.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Langlois) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, to register the strongest possible protest against the contempt shown to this house by keeping members waiting for 85 minutes—

[Mr. Langlois.]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to suit the convenience of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the government. This is the most contemptuous disregard of the rights of parliament that I have witnessed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and I protest against this arrogance, that was apparent the other night and has been intensified today. This is totally inexcusable conduct on the part of a prime minister and a government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I can understand the right hon. gentleman's feeling of frustration, when only 44 members of his party were here; but I am at a loss to understand his irritation at being delayed from attending what he himself used to refer to ironically as an egghead conference. As a result, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to give a ruling whether there is any question of privilege whatever involved in the point the right hon. gentleman has raised.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I answer the Prime Minister's—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —arrogance by saying I was very glad to stay here to see a government that so contemptibly interferes with the rights of parliament.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I think the vote which has taken place indicates quite clearly the concern of the house regarding prolonging the debate on the flag issue and the imperative need for our trying to find some solution to the stalemate in which parliament finds itself. This debate started on June 15 and it has continued since that time, with an interruption for several pieces of legislation. But it has gone on continuously for the past five weeks, with the exception of the one day each week which is set aside for the discussion of estimates. Now we are embarking on the sixth week of debating this matter.

An hon. Member: Tell us something we don't know.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I hear someone from the Conservative party asking me to tell them something they don't know. I do not know that I can tell them something they don't know, but I can tell them what I think an increasing number of people in this country know, namely that the reason for this prolonged debate is the fact that the Conservative party in this house seems to be determined to keep parliament from reaching a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We don't accept that at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, this is rather significant. For five weeks we have been debating this question, and the major part of the time has been taken up by the Conservative party. They have constantly appealed to other people to participate in the debate, and the moment those other members do so they are heckled and interrupted by the hon. gentlemen who sit on my right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: It seems to me it is a sign of weakness in one's defence when constantly he has to keep someone else from presenting his point of view. I had hoped, sitting through these five weeks of debate without taking any part, that after members had expressed their point of view we would be allowed to reach a decision; but last week it became increasingly apparent that the official opposition were going to keep moving innocuous subamendments in order to prevent not only the house reaching a decision on their amendment but to prevent other parties in this house moving amendments upon which the house could make a decision. I suggest that this is a negation of democratic government.

A great deal has been said by some speakers about the government seeking to ram a flag down their throats. I would point out in the first place that the present government is a minority government. The government has not a clear majority in the house and the French Canadian members have not a clear majority in the house. Therefore no flag can be rammed down people's throats unless the majority of the members are prepared to vote for it. I think the members should be given an opportunity to vote for it at a fairly early stage.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I have listened patiently for five weeks to the opinions expressed by the members of the official opposition against the maple leaf flag design, either that proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) or the single maple leaf design which we have indicated it is our intention to place before the house. I respect the views of those who have put up arguments, and I should like to take the three main lines of argument which have been used as to why some hon. members are against a maple leaf design.

The first is that they say this maple leaf design is a concession to Quebec.

Mr. Monteith: No.

Mr. Douglas: They have either said that themselves or have quoted other people who have said it, and said it in most intemperate and immoderate terms. Someone says no; well I am not going to weary the house, unless I am pressed to, by going over the speeches of hon. members. I have gone over them carefully each day and I can quote for hon. members chapter and verse the speeches which have been made saying specifically that this flag is a concession to Quebec; that this is something which the government is using to get votes in Quebec. The record is clear for anyone who wants to examine it, and if necessary I am prepared to take time, either now or later in the debate, to put all these quotes on Hansard; there are pages of them. Suffice it to say for the moment that I think this kind of argument is hurting national unity and if it is persisted in it will wreck confederation. And, may I say, it will wreck the Conservative party.

I would point out that there are no French symbols on the flag which has been proposed. There are no French symbols in the maple leaf design. French Canada has not asked for them because they are sufficiently mature to recognize that in this situation Canada must be concerned about the present and the future rather than being obsessed with the divisions of the past.

The second line of argument which has been presented is that by not having the union jack on the flag we are removing the Christian symbols. I should like to point out that the crosses in the union jack are not Christian symbols in the true sense of the word.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh yes, they are.

Mr. Douglas: They represent battle banners which were used: St. George's cross was first used in the crusade when the kings, barons and knights of Christendom perpetrated murder, rapine and plunder in the name of Christianity; the flag of St. Andrew was first used by the Picts and the Scots in their wars against the Saxons; the cross of St. Patrick was on the banner of the Fitzpatricks when they conquered Ireland, and very few Irishmen will be crying for the cross of St. Patrick. Certainly it has never been adopted as Ireland's flag.

Let us remember first of all that Christianity is not the only faith in Canada. There are people of Jewish faith, the Mohammedan faith and the Buddhist faith.

Mr. Bigg: And the communist faith.

Mr. Douglas: Well, I will leave that to my hon. friend.

Mr. Bigg: Is that not true?

Mr. Douglas: He can speak for some of his friends; I am speaking for mine at the moment. But I submit that in the flags which have been proposed—either the three maple leaf design, the single maple leaf design which we have been advancing, or the design proposed by A. Y. Jackson more than 50 years ago—you have blue bands which do have a religious significance because they are a constant reminder that our motto "From sea to sea" was based on the eighth verse of the 72nd psalm:

> He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

This design has a religious significance not peculiarly Christian but of general application to the Christian-Judean faiths—that the things of God should have priority in the lives of our people from one coast of Canada to another.

The third objection which has been taken to the maple leaf design is that it is removing the symbols of our British connections. All of us are proud of the fact, especially those of us of British origin, that Britain has played such an important role in Canadian history. We are convinced that this influence will live on in our democratic institutions. It will live most meaningfully if we make those institutions work, and work effectively. I submit that it is a sign of political immaturity to refuse to cut the apron strings and walk out on our own feet. It is still true to say:

> Daughter am I in my mother's house;
> But mistress in my own.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that those who keep talking about the union jack, the battle of Hastings and British history should forget that we cannot go back into the womb of the past. There comes a time when any independent nation must cut the umbilical cord and step out on its own. This debate, which has been going on now for all these weeks, reminds me of the discussions we heard 20 to 25 years ago, when a former member for North Battleford, a man called Cameron R. McIntosh, used to bring in a resolution each year for a national flag for Canada. He proposed the red ensign, and I remember all the speeches which were made in favour of the union jack. In 1946, when the government of Mackenzie King passed an order in council saying that the red ensign should be flown on public buildings—

Mr. Hales: It was 1945.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, that is correct; September 1945—at that time I was associated with a provincial administration, and every year for many years delegations came to wait on the government to protest over the flag we were flying, the red ensign, and saying that by refusing to fly the union jack we were denying our connection with the motherland; that we were being false to the blood in our veins. All of the arguments that were used then against the red ensign are now being used for the red ensign.

I have no disrespect, Mr. Speaker, for the union jack. I would be the last person to be disrespectful to it because I was born under it. It is a great flag with a great tradition. But I did not come to Canada to build another little Britain, or little Scotland, or another little England. I came to this country to help build Canada, in which the British traditions of which I am so proud, along with the contributions and the cultures of other ethnic groups and races, could come together to enrich this new country. Therefore, if we are to have that kind of country, this flag must be a symbol of our hopes and aspirations for the future—namely, a united people who are seeking to establish a Canadian identity on this North American continent. I think I have made it clear that as far as I am concerned I have not been convinced by the arguments against the maple leaf design.

Let me turn now to the other side of the question. The government has manoeuvred itself into a political and parliamentary impasse. When I spoke during this debate on June 16 I made the statement that I thought the government had chosen the wrong time and the wrong method to introduce the flag question. We felt that, with all the legislative program before us, a matter like a flag ought not to be introduced at a time when it was almost certain to block the passage of that legislative program. We also felt there should have been some other method by which we could obtain a consensus about a flag, rather than putting a specific design to the House of Commons where it was almost certain to become a bone of contention.

We in this party, or at least, the great majority of us, are prepared to support a maple leaf design, but I think it is equally apparent that the English speaking section of one of the major political parties is in apparent disagreement and has now embarked upon a policy of obstruction. I think we have to face that fact and have to deal with it. I think we have to begin by remembering that dealing with a flag issue is not the same as dealing with a legislative matter. If this were a matter of some important legislative significance, there are parliamentary means of bringing the matter to a decision. In respect of this question, even if we could force a decision, it would be a Pyrrhic decision. A flag adopted by Canada should represent the consensus, and should be launched with the general support of the vast majority of the Canadian people. It should be an instrument for forging unity rather than creating division, and no flag will accomplish that if it is conceived in controversy and born in bitterness. This would be equally true, in my opinion, if we were trying to force the red ensign through this house. I think therefore that in this situation the government has three courses left open to it. The first course is, it can dissolve this parliament and call an election. I hope members will believe me when I say I am not opposed to an election on this issue because I have any fear from the standpoint of this political party. I think we could do rather well in an election where the bankruptcy of statesmanship on the part of the two old line parties has become so apparent. I am not concerned about an election, I am concerned about Canada. I believe that this country would suffer irreparable damage, irrespective of the outcome of the election. I think any election on the flag issue would divide the country on racial grounds, which would split confederation, and even if confederation survived it would take a quarter of a century to heal the scars that would result.

Therefore, I say I think members in all parts of the house, or some of them at least, will agree that there should be no irresponsible action taken by either side of this house by any political party which would result in such a catastrophe.

The government has a second choice. It could force a decision by closure, or by a war of attrition. To my mind the former is unthinkable, particularly in respect of so emotionally charged a question as the flag issue. To launch a new flag for Canada by means of a closure motion would mean launching a new flag with resentment and bitterness in the hearts of a very considerable section of the Canadian people. The latter course, a war of attrition, would mean that we would neglect a legislative program which ought to be dealt with, and dealt with speedily.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent) made a statement on Thursday evening to the effect that no legislation should be passed, no estimates passed and no money voted to this government until this question was settled by referring it to the people. I do not know whether he was speaking for his party or only for himself, but if that is the course to be followed, then prolonging the debate by a war of attrition will mean that we will do little or nothing by way of constructive legislation at this session. If that attitude is going to be taken, and I have made it clear that I do not condone it, I think we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that we are either going to have no flag at all, or a flag at the price of bitterness and hard feelings, which is not in my opinion a good way to launch an emblem that is to fly proudly over this nation.

Therefore, the third solution, which is the only choice the government has left, is that the government must find some type of compromise out of this difficulty. I readily acknowledge to the Prime Minister that the government has made the major concessions, and almost the only concessions that have been made on this issue. The government has agreed to a free vote, so that an election is not hanging on the outcome.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: There is no point to the laughter of my friends in the Conservative ranks, because they continually asked for a free vote, and if they were doing so seriously they ought to be serious in appreciating the fact that this concession has been made.

The government has agreed that it was not wedded to any one design, and that it is up to this house in the final analysis to choose a design, providing it is a distinctive national flag which cannot be mistaken for the flag of any other country.

The Prime Minister agreed to the establishment of a committee, as did every other political leader except the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), and to send this matter to that committee subject to the proviso that there be a time limit on the debate on the committee's report. The government has made some concessions, and I am suggesting now that in the present situation we must be prepared to explore the situation further. I realize some will argue that if we do this we are knuckling under to blackmail from the official opposition. In the kind of stalemate in which we find ourselves we have to be prepared to make concessions in an attempt to find some common ground. After all, the government must accept responsibility for the fact that this matter is before us. They are the ones who introduced it, and they must have known when they introduced it that it would be a controversial matter, and would not go through the house easily. We really are in the position of trench warfare, in which both sides have dug in and every day which passes during this debate, they are digging in a little deeper. We are faced with a hopeless stalemate. The only hope lies in a major breakthrough so that the house can get some freedom of movement from which some positive decision can be made.

I want to suggest we try a compromise proposal. I suggest that we pick up where we left off in the statements that were made by the leaders of all the political parties in the house on Friday, August 21. I am not speaking of the suggestions that were made by the party leaders in their conferences. I am talking about statements that were made by the party leaders in this house on the order for motions on August 21. I suggest we pick up from there and see where we disagree, see if there is some loophole by which we can find common ground.

I am proposing briefly three things. One is, as was suggested, that a parliamentary committee composed of 15 members be established, seven from the government, five from the official opposition and one from each of the other political parties. I think such a committee ought to have the help of heraldic experts. This is my first suggestion.

The second suggestion is that the committee should report back to the house within 60 days. This time limit could be negotiated. If the Prime Minister would like it shorter or the Leader of the Opposition would like it longer, I think that matter could be negotiated and could be discussed in the party leaders' meeting. I think that in a matter as important as this, 15 days one way or the other is not going to make any difference. We have been able to get along for 100 years without a flag, so if by waiting 20 days more we can find an answer, let us not bother about that. I am suggesting, for negotiating purposes, 60 days.

The third suggestion is that when the committee's report is ready there should be another meeting of the party leaders to determine the length of time that should be devoted in the house to a discussion of the committee's report. While I personally believe that there should be a time limit agreed upon in advance, I would be willing to defer this decision until after the committee's report is ready in order to reach agreement and set up the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know all the advantages and disadvantages of the proposal. I know it would be much better if we could agree in advance as to how long this debate would take when the committee reported back. It has been suggested that if there were a certain percentage, it would be so long; for other percentages, it would be longer. I do not believe you are going to get agreement on that in advance. It seems to me there is much to be said for sending this matter to the committee, having the committee report back in 60 days and just before they report the party leaders could meet. If there were 12 members out of 15 in agreement on the report, then we should be able to arrange for a very short debate. If there were a severe difference of opinion, then it might not be so easy to get agreement about a time limit. Why not let us leave that question until we see how the committee gets along?

Now, let me try to anticipate the reactions to this proposal. I think the Leader of the Opposition should be willing to endorse the suggestion I am making because it falls in line, to some extent, with the proposals which he made in the house on August 21 as recorded at page 7112 of Hansard. Now, the Prime Minister would be more justified in having some reservations about accepting this proposal because he, like myself and the leader of the other political parties, has argued for a time limit to be set in advance, that is a time limit on the debate on the committee's report. Those of us who took that position on August 21 did so because we felt that if we did not have a time limit on the debate on the committee's report we could find ourselves, 60 days from now, just where we are today. This is the argument I put up in the house on August 21.

I want to argue now that by deferring the decision as to limiting the time of the debate, we would still be making some gains. We would not be as badly off as we are today. First of all, in the meantime, we would have been able to spend eight weeks on legislative work in the house. We would have been able to get some legislation passed. We would have been able to get on with the country's business. I hear somebody say, "We might get holidays". I think the holiday time has gone; we are here to work. I thank my friends to the right for the only holidays we are likely to get. I think now we should get on with the country's business; that is what the people of Canada are demanding, get on with the business. Eight weeks from now, therefore, we would at least be this far ahead. We would have some legislation on the statute books. If this included the Canada pension plan, we would be very happy.

The second thing is that my proposals have this advantage. We have at least a reasonable prospect—I think a 50-50 prospect—that the committee might come up with a solution. The Leader of the Opposition has said publicly that he would be prepared to co-operate by selecting representatives from his party who have not taken an inflexible position on the flag issue. If he follows that course and the other parties follow a similar course of action, we might get a committee that would work out a solution. It would be worth a try. I know this, there is a better chance of 15 members trying to find a solution behind closed doors than there is for 265 members trying to find it in the glare of publicity. It might not work, but it is worth a chance. We have nothing to lose.

The third advantage of this proposal is that it would have demonstrated to the Canadian people that parliament is sufficiently flexible to meet a situation that calls for statesmanship. Make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker, the real casualty in a cold war of attrition will be parliament itself. The responsibility for this lies with the two major political parties. It is often said, a little contemptuously sometimes, that the smaller parties are the reason we cannot get on with the business of this parliament; the smaller parties are the reason there is no efficiency in parliament. You cannot blame the three smaller parties in this instance. We did not initiate this issue and we have not prolonged this issue. We have been ready at all times to take a vote and bring this matter to a decision. It has been the two old line parties who have been like two old bulls in a pasture butting their heads together. They must accept the responsibility for the stalemate in which we find ourselves. We think that the time has come to end this cold war of attrition and seek a solution before we do irreparable damage to parliament and to confederation.

If I may just in closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the Prime Minister may feel he will be accused of beating a retreat if he accepts this proposal. I can understand that fear because of some of the jibes that have been hurled at him from time to time. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that it takes a man of stature to make a concession in the interests of national unity; any pipsqueak can stubbornly cling to a position long after it is untenable. I think the Prime Minister of this country can, and I think he will demonstrate the kind of stature that is necessary to give this country the leadership it needs in this difficult time.

If a compromise is reached by all parties along the lines I have suggested, it will not be a decision taken solely by the Prime Minister. On August 21 I, and the leaders of other groups, except the Leader of the Opposition, argued for having a time limit on the debate of the committee's report. I am prepared to defer the decision about a time limit until after the committee's report is ready. If anyone wants to say I am retreating, he may do so. I am not afraid of being accused of backing down. I am concerned not so much with chalking up debating points as I am concerned with finding a solution without sacrifice of principle, and I do not believe it is beyond the ingenuity of this house to work out a compromise and an accommodation.

Therefore I am urging the Prime Minister to consider calling a meeting of the party leaders if there is any indication that the proposal I have outlined is acceptable to the other parties as a starting point for negotiations. The reason I did not get up the other day when the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) urged the Prime Minister to call another meeting is that unless there is some change of attitude, unless there is some new proposal to be considered I do not see any value in such a meeting. But if the various leaders feel the suggestion I have made about a committee, with a 60 day limitation, with the question of the limit of debate on its report to be left until the report is ready—if they feel this offers some basis for discussion, then I would urge the Prime Minister to call such a meeting.

After all, Mr. Speaker, the leaders of this house are the Prime Minister of Canada and a former prime minister of Canada. In the final analysis the solution depends on their willingness to co-operate. When we are selecting a national symbol, a flag that is to be the emblem of Canada, it must have the support of at least the major part of the two largest parties in the house, and it seems to me that the answer lies in finding some common ground between these two gentlemen.

One hundred years ago Sir John A. Macdonald and George Brown laid aside their differences in order to bring Canadian confederation into birth. I am appealing to the two leaders of this house to follow the same course now in order to strengthen the bonds of confederation at a time when they are sorely strained. If they fail to respond then Canada will be the poorer, but if they succeed future generations will applaud them.

I say to both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and indeed to every member of parliament, we have a great opportunity to put posterity in our debt and to so conduct ourselves that future generations will be able to say we matched the challenge of the troubled times in which we lived.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask the hon. member a question. In the event that substantial agreement could be reached in less time than 60 days, say in one week, two weeks or three weeks, does he mean that the committee could bring in its report prior to the time limit placed on it, in order that agreement be brought about more quickly?

Mr. Douglas: I think the term I used was within 60 days. Maybe I should have used the term not later than 60 days. If the committee could reach a decision within two or three weeks, then certainly let it bring in its report, but if it cannot reach a decision within 60 days any further discussion by the committee would serve no useful purpose.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong the debate unduly because I think that the sorry spectacle the house is now giving to the Canadian people is not to the credit of our parliamentary system, far from it.

I support wholeheartedly what the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) has just said. That does not mean that I support all his political ideas, because I am at the very opposite of state socialism, and will be for a long time. However, I think it should be said that the spirit which permeates the speech the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has just made is truly Canadian. The hon. member was not speaking as an English speaking or a French speaking Canadian but as a Canadian. We hope that the day will come when each member of parliament will speak as a Canadian instead of trying, as the Conservatives have been doing for two months, to create division, a division which increases day after day throughout Canada.

We saw the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) go to Winnipeg two months ago, to meet the Canadian Legion and face, I would not say animosity, but feelings which were really difficult and hard for a government and for a Prime Minister who had stated at that time that we ought to have a distinctive national flag.

I said then that the Prime Minister had acted like a head of state by meeting those people who, on a particular point, were strongly hostile. But when the Prime Minister came back to the house, he acted not like a head of state but like a diplomat. There is a difference between a diplomat and a head of state. I see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) is paying attention to what I am saying, because he does know the difference. A head of state must make decisions, while the diplomat endeavours to smooth things over and acts as a conciliator between the various groups.

The Prime Minister acted or tried to act like a diplomat by moving a resolution including two flags. That is the reason for the debate which has been going on.

If the Prime Minister had put before the house a resolution involving only one Canadian flag—not a French flag, or an English flag or the flag of the province of Quebec or the flag of British Columbia, but one flag for all Canada, with a Canadian symbol—I am positive that the flag would have been passed within five or six days. But the resolution gave rise to this debate which, at the very outset, led us to splitting the resolution. You made a ruling yourself, Mr. Speaker, saying that the resolution would be divided into A and B, that part A would concern the distinctive national flag, while part B would concern the union jack.

Here again, that is the point on which the Conservatives take their stand to boycott and filibuster from the beginning of the debate on this matter of a distinctive national flag. That is the basis of the Conservative arguments, which is unfortunate.

As I said before, and as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam just stated, the impression has been created in Canada that the distinctive national flag is intended to please Quebec whereas the union jack is intented to please English speaking Canadians. Now, there is no question of a distinctive national flag being only designed to please the province of Quebec because, if that was the case, I would ask the Prime Minister not to introduce it, because we already have one and we do not need a second one. One is enough. But we Quebeckers are ready, not as French Canadians but as Canadians, to approve any distinctive flag project for Canada, something which would belong to the ten Canadian provinces and not to one alone.

The Conservative filibuster has been reported in the press and been abundantly used on television and all mass media.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is still accusing us today of hatching a plot with the Liberal party in order to ram a flag down the throat of the Canadian people.

At the time the leaders of the five parties met and the fact was mentioned that the Prime Minister was accepting a free vote in the house—and at this stage I may say that the Prime Minister made concession upon concession so as to reach an understanding and to give Canadians a distinctive national flag—the Leader of the Opposition stuck to his guns and refused to accept the concession and to agree to a settlement. We had gathered together and the free vote question was mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, nobody can make me believe that I am a member of the Liberal party. I am not; neither is the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Thompson) nor the leader of the New Democratic party. However, in the interest of national unity and for the good of Canadians in general, we were ready to end those fights which serve no purpose and to stop calling forth phantoms to scare the people or to divide even further the various groups which constitute the Canadian nation. We felt that a free vote would enable a majority of hon. members to express their opinion, that such a majority would naturally represent the majority of Canadian electors who have sent us to parliament to take decisions not to talk through our hats or filibuster as the Conservatives have been doing for the past two or three weeks.

At the time, we spoke of a majority decision but the Leader of the Opposition objected on the grounds that a majority of members would be imposing a distinctive national flag on a minority. On the other hand, the Leader of the Opposition was proposing the red ensign with a fleur-de-lis in the bottom and a union jack at the top; he was ready to force his design on six million French Canadians in the province of Quebec. That was democracy, but a majority vote in the house is not democracy according to the Leader of the Opposition, who is an experienced lawyer.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether he was honest and sincere when he proposed that compromise or that procedure on the flag issue.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the official opposition was persistent in his ideas and refused to accept the proposals made by the Prime Minister or the other party leaders during these meetings. Mention was made of the establishment of a committee. The principle of such a committee has been recognized. However, a stipulation was immediately laid down: 15 members were to constitute this committee and an absolute majority was a requisite. The question was raised then as to what was considered an absolute majority. The reply was that 13 of the 15 members would have to have voted in favour of the distinctive national flag to be presented to the house, and then the debate could be limited to a few days only.

As my colleague from Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) pointed out this afternoon, the 15 member committee was to include seven Liberals, five Conservatives one New Democrat, one Social Crediter and one member of the Ralliement Créditistes.

If the Leader of the Opposition decided to designate five members who were opposed to the distinctive national flag, without any tie with other nations or other countries, we would start again an endless debate.

That is why the right hon. Prime Minister could not accept such an offer and we could not accept it ourselves. It meant that there had to be unanimity or else the flag would not be accepted.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition will bear the responsibility for this attitude and he will suffer the consequences, not only in one province, but throughout Canada.

As a matter of fact, we can see how the Canadian people react. I receive letters not only from the province of Quebec, but also from English speaking provinces such as Ontario and British Columbia. I have here a letter from 57 Milton street, Toronto:

> Canadians are surely entitled to the best possible design, a simple, majestic, beautiful, striking and original flag, which will proudly take its place with other fine flags of the world, those of Switzerland, Norway, Hungary, France, England and other countries.

This person, Mr. Hughes, suggests—

[Text]

> One large, simple maple leaf on white with blue borders; one leaf—outlined in white—on a light blue field; these are excellent. Or consider the enclosed—it won an honourable mention in the Weekend magazine national contest for professional artists. It is majestic: bleu, blanc, rouge.

—"Blue, white, red." This comes from an English person who wants a distinctive national flag.

I am writing you about your proposal for a Canadian flag, other than the red ensign. I am in agreement with the flag your party is in favour of.

[Translation]

It concerns the little flags we had been talking about in this house. He is in favour of a distinctive national flag. It is not only the French Canadians of the province of Quebec who are in favour of a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Text]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess, I spoke of the reaction of people everywhere in Canada, not only in one area or in one province, but everywhere in the country.

Before the dinner recess, I quoted letters sent to me from western Canada, that is from Lethbridge and Vancouver.

Tonight I would like to read into the record some other letters sent to me from the province of Ontario; one is dated August 26, 1964, and it comes from Kingston, in the province of Ontario:

[Text]

Dear Mr. Caouette:

I wish to commend your remarks in the House of Commons with reference to the flag vote issue and I quote: "Whether it carries three maple leaves or one maple leaf, a beaver or a sheaf of wheat, as long as it is a distinctive Canadian flag, we shall support the government...we want Canadian symbols on our national emblem—not the symbols of France or the symbols of England..."

The statements made by other representatives that the proposed flag was nothing more than an attempt to please Quebec is far from the truth. Many of us in Ontario have been forced to live underground, so to speak, because Canada has no national flag and no national symbols. It would be interesting indeed to breathe the air of Canadian freedom, if that is possible, under the protection of a Canadian national flag.

Yours sincerely,
Edna A. Kemp, B.A.

For my Conservative friends, if they want the address it is 162 Mack street, Kingston, Ontario.

Mr. Caouette: That lady even had the courtesy of sending me a copy, in good French, of her letter written in English.

Mr. Dupuis: Did she also enclose her picture?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have another letter here, from Bolton, Ontario.

[Text]

This letter is from Cedar Mills side road, rural route No. 4, Bolton, Ontario:

Dear Sir:

I gather from newspaper reports that you have introduced the above design for our new flag. I wholeheartedly support your efforts in this direction. While I think Mr. Pearson's design is very pretty, it has no historical significance for Canadians. I believe there would be much less outcry about replacing the red ensign if the flag that was to replace it had some tradition of its own. The above design has three centuries of Canadian history in its design.

The white half, next the pole, indicates the first century, when the French ruled Canada. The red half, on top, indicates that the British took over from the French and ruled Canada for the second century. The large maple leaf, superimposed on the two halves, indicates the last century, when Canada took control of its own territory. It is green, because green is the colour of growth, the growth we owe to all the other peoples, both original inhabitants and immigrants, that have helped to build this great country. It straddles the white and red halves because our hope is that it will weld the two language groups together into one truly united whole.

While the design has been put forward, I have not heard anyone explain the heraldic significance of it, and I think you would be doing a great service for your country if you could put this point across to the house. Even Mr. Diefenbaker could hardly fight with this flag.

In any event, I wish you luck and success in your efforts to replace the British flags that have been flown in the past. Incidentally, I am British born, respect and admire them, but am Canadian all the way.

Sincerely,
Leslie J. Baird

Mr. Speaker, others appreciate it.

Here is another letter from Scarborough, Ontario.

[Text]

Dear Mr. Caouette:

It is indeed a pleasure to read with much interest your views regarding the present situation concerning one distinctive flag for all Canada. While the design as chosen by Mr. Pearson is not my preference I do feel that it should contain only one maple leaf and also that there should only be one official national flag as there is no other symbol of unity than one.

I have on many previous occasions intended writing to you but somehow did not take the time to do so. Although I live in another area of Canada than you do and though my official representative to the House of Commons is a member of the N.D.P. I have always been able to agree with your views on the multitude of problems that have confronted our country in the past few years, and therefore look upon you as my personal representative in the government of our great land.

That letter is from L. Harris, 21 Silvio avenue, Scarborough, Ontario.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not know this Mr. L. Harris, living at 21 Sylvio avenue, Scarborough, Ontario.

Here is another letter, and this is the last one from which I will quote tonight. It comes from Toronto.

[Text]

The three leaf design has a 90 year history in Canada. The maple leaf is now regarded as a Canadian symbol, so other nations would have no difficulty in recognizing the emblem as distinctively Canadian and "O Canada" as our official national anthem.

Yours faithfully,
George Bals.

He is from Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, those are testimonies received not from the province of Quebec, but from other areas of the country and which undoubtedly prove that there are unity, understanding and agreement among the Canadian people, that there are ties which unite us. There is disunity only among people who attempt to play petty politics, instead of putting their country above their political party.

I hear Conservatives such as the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent), the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul), the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau), the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) especially, who keep on saying: "Why does such a member not rise, why does such a minister not rise? Why does not so-and-so rise to answer the questions we ask him?" Well, tonight I will ask those Conservative members a question. Why is not the hon. member for Three Rivers on his feet to say exactly what is happening, not only in his riding of Three Rivers, in the province of Quebec, but also to tell us about the action of his own leader, the Leader of the Opposition in the house (Mr. Diefenbaker)?

Mr. Speaker, we tried and we are still trying to rise above political partisanship on the choice of a distinctive national flag. As I said this afternoon, the Prime Minister made some concessions, and I am convinced that he is ready to make some more, not on behalf of the Liberal party, but on behalf of Canada, of national unity and understanding between Canadians of all ethnic origins.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition is not interested in widening the gap between English and French Canadians and whether he is not trying to do so. When I hear him asking questions on orders of the day to know whether the Queen will be welcome or whether members of the F.L.Q. will be jailed, I wonder whether he is not interested in promoting bad publicity against the province of Quebec.

Yet last night, as I mentioned before the dinner recess, I saw a monstrous spectacle in Toronto, which was the arrival of the Beatles. For the information of the Leader of the Opposition, the Beatles are from England and they were none the less not well received in Toronto, or probably too well received. There, we saw things which should not happen anywhere in Canada.

We too regret what takes place in the province of Quebec from time to time, when some fanatic or hot-head raises an outcry against the coming visit of Her Majesty the Queen to Quebec or to Canada. But when the leader of the official opposition spends his time adding insult to injury, then he is hurting the cause of Canadian unity.

Mr. Speaker, you and I are both from the province of Quebec. You are not a French Canadian and I am one. But you have noticed how well, in the province of Quebec, English and French Canadians get along together and how much they respect each other, much more than the leader of the official opposition has ever respected the province of Quebec since the day he was born and since he has been a member of our nation's parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Conservative members disagree with what I am now saying. Nevertheless, I must add that during the past two months the leader of the official opposition has been undermining Canadian unity and mutual understanding between the two ethnic groups in Canada.

An hon. Member: He is a liberal, now.

Mr. Caouette: I hear the Conservatives accusing me of being a Liberal, of supporting the Liberals. It is well known that nobody in the province of Quebec has fought the Liberals as I did and that nobody in Quebec has fought the Conservatives as well as the Liberals as I did. No Conservative members will prevent me in this house from saying to the leader of the official opposition that his attitude has been prejudicial to Canadian unity and mutual understanding between French and English Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I am not the only one to deplore that lamentable attitude and the unfortunate situation which is entirely due to the obstinacy of the Conservatives, who are trying to force an election because they think they would be returned to office thanks to the existing dissensions between French speaking and English speaking Canadians which they created themselves.

They come to the house to boast that English Canadians who were in favour of a distinctive flag are now changing their minds and would accept the red ensign, because they maintain that the distinctive national flag is only a way to please French Canadians of the province of Quebec. When Conservative members, wherever they come from, create such a state of mind, I say that they are playing their last trump card, because judging from what we hear throughout Canada, the Conservatives will lose many seats.

Mr. Speaker, this is what I read in Le Devoir of September 4, 1964—three days ago, in an item by Paul Sauriol:

> The amendment to the government resolution calls for a referendum on the flag issue; and this is unacceptable to French Canadians, because such a method implies that the decision of the majority would prevail without consideration of French Canadians' views.
> The second subamendment is still more openly directed against our group. It proposes—

It is to be noted that Paul Sauriol is neither a Creditiste nor a Liberal; he is an independent newspaperman, with objective views.

> It proposes that in the referendum which is still the object of the amendment the results be compiled on a national basis and not by areas or provinces. This is undemocratic and contrary to our federal system and, in addition, this subamendment would have the effect of swamping the Quebec vote in the total vote.
> At the 1942 plebiscite, the King government paid no attention to the opinion of our group, to which the promise in question had been made, but at least it was known that Quebec had solidly answered "no", even if the majority of Canadians had voted "yes".
> This time, not only does Mr. Diefenbaker want to see the Quebec vote cancelled out in a referendum, he wants it made invisible. Then that is a real insult to Quebec. Now, last Tuesday, Mr. Diefenbaker asserted that, never in his life, had he uttered a single word which could be interpreted as against Quebec and that he had always worked for the French Canadians. Yet, that statement and the next day's subamendment are not easily reconciled. The explanation lies in one of two things: cynicism or irresponsibility. That is something which French Canadian members of the House of Commons will find hard to swallow.

Mr. Speaker, there we see the little understanding that exists between the leader of the official opposition and his Conservative colleagues from the province of Quebec.

A few minutes ago I asked why the hon. member for Three Rivers was not present in the house to voice accurately the views of Quebec.

Why does the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) not do the same thing? Why does the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul) not do the same thing also?

I just heard a member of the Conservative party say—

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Caouette: The Conservative members cannot do anything else but confuse the Canadian people as much as possible and confuse the issue of national unity in Canada. That is all we can expect from them.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to protest against the spurious remarks which the hon. member for Villeneuve just made about me. If he had not stayed away from the house for 12 days, he would have noticed that I did not hesitate in taking position on the flag issue. I shall not allow myself to be labelled a sluggard or a coward in this matter.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I never said that the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière was a sluggard or a coward. But I maintain that, even if he voted against the subamendment of his leader the other day, he is now a follower of his leader in the house.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I want to protest those spurious remarks coming from a rather lame brain, and I would ask the hon. member for Villeneuve to read the speech I made in the house on Monday, August 24, 1964.

An hon. Member: It was hardly worth reading.

Mr. Caouette: I read his speech, Mr. Speaker, and, as one of my fellow members just said, it was hardly worth reading. I shall not say that he is a lame brain, because I have more consideration for the hon. member than he has for me. However, if he wants to measure his brain or his intellectual power against mine, I am ready to meet him anywhere—not in my riding, but in his own, for this is important—and we shall have a public joust on what is happening in the Conservative corner of the house, because in the hon. member's riding, like in other ridings of Quebec members, everybody has had enough of those nonsensical and endless discussions on a distinctive national flag.

When we visit our respective ridings people ask us: "When will you be through discussing this stupid issue that you have been debating for two months?"

Mr. Speaker, the issue has become serious. The more we discuss it here, in the house, the more the electorate is dissatisfied with our conduct. In fact, we have reached the point where youngsters of 10, 12 or 15 and older people of 40, 50 and 60 accuse us of behaving like school children in the house.

Who are the school children? They are the Conservatives who, under the leader of the official opposition, have imposed this interminable debate on hon. members and the whole of Canada.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that every serious consideration be given to the proposals made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and an end be put to the speeches and repetitions we have been hearing here for the past two months, more precisely for 22 days, on the flag issue. Let us stop acting like irresponsible people in the eyes of the Canadian electorate.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the government should take appropriate steps to bring this trivial debate to an end. We have heard over 100 Conservative speeches, endless repetitions by people who are trying to build up a political capital which is getting smaller all the time. Such an attitude will just bring about their own extermination.

I ask the Prime Minister, the government, not as a Liberal, because I am not one and never will be, but as a Canadian, that the government take steps to introduce in the house an amendment, some conciliatory measure or other concessions so that this debate may end and that, at last we may come back to our senses before we lose our intellect, and that we go on with the adoption of real legislation, progressive legislation to give the people the security and liberty they expect from us, under a flag which would be Canada's own.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Do I understand the hon. member for Brantford wishes to ask a question?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask a further question of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam in respect of the speech he made this afternoon?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask that hon. member whether he will make it clear to the house that it is his desire that the committee to deal with the flag issue, and to which he referred, would sit in camera on this matter?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to reply, I would like to state that this would be entirely a matter for the committee itself to decide. My own feeling is that the committee would do much better by sitting in camera, if not all the time, then most of the time. However, that is a matter for the committee itself to decide.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate this evening I cannot help but comment on the fact that today has been very interesting. Unfortunately the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is apparently leaving the house, because I should like to make reference to his speech, and state that it was a speech which lends itself more than any other to the creation of disunity in Canada. He has accused the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) of acting in a manner which will create great disunity in this country, but nothing is further from the truth. There has never been a speech made in this House of Commons which has created more disunity than that made by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

I am surprised that hon. members of that party speak in such terms about the leader of any group, in view of the fact that not one of them rose in defence of this country in its time of need. Today they are all prepared to defend Canada and say they are doing so for righteous causes. These are the same individuals, and particularly the hon. member for Villeneuve, who refer to the work done by that right hon. gentleman as comparable to the efforts of Hitler and Mussolini. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to every member of this house, that we in the Conservative party are not creating anything like the disunity in this house and in this country that has been created by the words uttered by the hon. member for Villeneuve, and I say that only after listening to the remarks—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I say that, Mr. Speaker, only after listening to the remarks made by that hon. member.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to a question of privilege. I should like to say to that hon. member, who suggests that I used Hitler and Mussolini to make a comparison, that I have never known of a man in Canada who acts more like Hitler and Mussolini than his own leader, who is today acting against the national unity of Canada.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, where is the question of privilege in that statement? I ask you to rule on that question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There is no question of privilege in that remark, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I do not think the question of privilege referred to by the hon. member for Villeneuve is well taken. I do suggest that it would be better for hon. members to refrain from entering into personalities and confine their remarks to the debate before us.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Those remarks are nothing more than character assassination.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on a point of order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That assassination is made by an individual who is afraid to stand up and risk being charged with—

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I hate to disagree with the hon. member for Acadia, but he said there was no one in this group who had stood up to defend Canada. It is true I am not of an age which would have permitted me to fight in the last world war, Mr. Speaker. However I have a question of privilege, and I think I should have the opportunity of completing it. I can only defend what I believe. At the moment, I can compare my military experience with that of the hon. member for Acadia. Although he might have had an opportunity of defending his country in the last world war, today we are defending much more: We are defending the unity of Canada. I think he should put up his arms in that way.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We have had two hypothetical questions of privilege. The first one was no question of privilege whatever, and the second might have contained some element of privilege because the hon. member was not of age. However, the statement I made still stands unchallenged, because I looked up the facts in the parliamentary guide. Remember, I am talking about the facts and they are on record. The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is on record as stating in 1940 and 1945 that Canada was not worth defending, was not worth fighting for. Now this hon. member stands as the conscience of the Canadian public. He reads letters from Lethbridge, from Ontario, from Vancouver and all across Canada. He has become the conscience of this parliament and the conscience of Canada, although in 1940 and 1945 he thought Canada was not worth fighting for. Are we supposed to take this man seriously, Mr. Speaker? I think not. This man said he admired Hitler and Mussolini and stated that Canada was not worth fighting for.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Are we supposed to take him seriously? I think not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; the hon. member for Villeneuve, on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette: I think there is a subamendment before this house and the hon. member should discuss it. Now he is discussing whether or not I was in the armed forces, and that is none of his business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: I will go a little further. In the province of Quebec, when the plebiscite took place in 1942 I was one of the many thousands that were fighting the Liberal government at that time. I am just as respectful as the hon. member for Acadia and I have no lesson to take from him. Mr. Speaker, I should like you to ask the hon. member to stay in order and discuss the subamendment that has been presented by his own party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I think the hon. member has made a personal explanation. Perhaps we can hear the hon. member for Acadia now.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have listened to the hon. member very carefully. I only stated what I did because—

Mr. Caouette: You said nothing.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If I said nothing, why did it hurt so much? Why did the hon. member rise twice—thrice? He did so because it hurt; because I said something. The hon. member said in 1940 and 1945 Canada was not worth fighting for. He has said quite a bit about Canada. I am proud he does not come from western Canada. If I have offended any of my fellow members from eastern Canada, I can only say that I am proud that he is not a member of this party. The hon. member is talking a lot and I am sorry I cannot hear him because I am sure those are pearls of wisdom which it would be better if you and I heard, Mr. Speaker.

I only stated what I did because the leader of the social credit rally party referred to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and charged him with creating disunity in Canada by continuing this debate. It pleases me a great deal to rise and speak on this amendment, and in particular on the subamendment before us. The subamendment contains provisions for the taking of a plebiscite, and, in the interests of national unity, indicates that the results of the plebiscite be published on a national basis only rather than a regional or provincial basis. The whole purpose behind this subamendment is to show the government a way out of the present flag crisis in which they find themselves. We are suggesting, by means of the amendment, that a plebiscite or referendum be carried out in a certain way and that the facts be published in such a way that unity will be maintained in this country of ours.

I am pleased to speak at this time to this subamendment. I suggested at the commencement of my remarks that this had been a very interesting day. We sat for 90 minutes, Mr. Speaker, while a party which has continually asked for a vote, which had been sitting over there for 20 days shouting "Question, question", and "Vote, vote"—

An hon. Member: And 50 Tories were away.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —waited to collect its members. The vote came as no surprise. There was a vote last Thursday and after that vote an hon. member stated he would bring this up from time to time. Another vote came today and we waited 90 minutes for the government to produce its members. We were told later on the delay was caused by the fact there were two or three flights from Newfoundland, Toronto and other points in Canada bringing in members so that the Liberals could substantiate their belief that this flag debate should continue. This is their belief, that this flag debate should continue. We wanted this debate to end, but they voted for this flag debate to continue. I repeat that, so that there will be no doubt about it. The response of the government was that this debate shall continue.

It was interesting, Mr. Speaker, to watch the voting of the party of the hon. member who moved the motion. On Thursday night some hon. members of that party voted for the continuance of this debate. Now, we have only had two speakers since Thursday night and yet all members of that party who were present voted to have the debate cease.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It is odd they could not realize this on Thursday night. It is interesting to note this particular change—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —in so far as the various parties in this house are concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Mégantic on a question of privilege.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not believe it is the privilege of the hon. member for Acadia to discuss or comment in any way upon how a member of this house voted. After all, if I voted one way on Thursday and presented a motion today, I took the time to explain why I presented such a motion. It is not up to the hon. member for Acadia to decide whether I should have voted one way or the other. I think he should stick to the matter under discussion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I think there is some merit in the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mégantic. I say to the hon. member for Acadia that I do not believe he is quite in order in making reference to a vote that has already been taken in this house.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a debate on the flag. As I mentioned in my opening remarks, we have had a very interesting day. I could not help but refer back to Thursday night when a vote was taken to sustain this debate. If the hon. member had a change of heart from Thursday to Tuesday that is fine. I have no objection. I am just pointing out the fact that he had.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If hon. members are objecting to this being pointed out, if they are ashamed of the way they voted on Thursday, let them stand up and say so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must point out to the hon. member that he is out of order when he reflects on the way in which a member voted in a vote that has already been taken. I believe the hon. member should continue with his speech on the subamendment.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) seemed to point to me specifically and say I had a change of heart since last Thursday. That is true. I explained my position today, and this is one proof that we have no stupid-headed fools in this party at least.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I don't know what the hon. member meant by that last remark—stupid fools.

An hon. Member: Everybody else does.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): He apparently is ashamed of his Thursday night vote.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member does not have the right to comment on a vote taken in the house, either on my vote or on anybody else's vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I am sure the hon. member for Acadia does not want me to continue to remind him that he is out of order when he persists in reflecting on a vote already taken in the house.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I intended to get right along with my speech, but the slightest reference really seems to dig deep. While I know most members of the house are quite proud of the way they voted, particularly those in this party, many of those on the other side wished they could have voted otherwise, but because they were not allowed a free vote three months ago—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —they could not vote the way they wished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I would remind the hon. member he is out of order by making reference to any vote taken in the house. Maybe the hon. member would consider the incident finished and go on with his speech.

Mr. MacInnis: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: —where nobody can refer to votes which have taken place in the house, is there some quotation with which the Chair can guide the house, because this takes place here day in and day out. Parties are continually referring to the way other parties voted on certain issues in days gone by.

Mr. Knowles: It is standing order 35.

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have had a persistent breach of the rules, and this has been drawn to the attention of the hon. member three times. The applicable rule is standing order 35, the last sentence of which is:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Beauchesne's fourth edition, at page 113, paragraph 125, goes on to elaborate on this standing order, and subparagraph 3 of the citation reads:

> A member may not speak against or reflect upon any determination of the house, unless he intends to conclude with a motion for rescinding it.

Mr. Bigg: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, no later than this afternoon the Prime Minister himself took it upon himself to count the number of Conservatives present and made a very pointed reference to the number present.

Mr. Pickersgill: He only referred to those who did not vote.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): No, he did not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think I have advised the hon. member for Acadia two or three times that he is out of order in reflecting on a vote taken by the house. Perhaps I should read for him that section of standing order 35 which has reference thereto:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

I am sure the hon. member for Acadia recognizes that in continuing with the remarks he is now making he is not obeying the standing orders of the house. Maybe he will continue with his remarks on the subamendment.

Mr. Nugent: May I make a comment on that point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I do not think there is any need to have any further comment on this matter. The point of order has been raised and I have given the ruling that the hon. member is out of order. Maybe we can now allow the hon. member for Acadia to continue.

Mr. Nugent: If I might, on that point of order there is a point that has not been mentioned. The hon. member was talking about the situation at the time that existed before another situation arose in which the question developed as to how the hon. member should vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. This is not the matter upon which I am ruling. I am ruling upon the fact that according to standing order 35 the hon. member for Acadia does not have the right to reflect upon a vote already taken.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to say I regret I may have caused you any inconvenience in ruling on my behalf. I had no intention when I rose to speak of causing you any difficulty in ruling whether I was in order or out of order. I was only rising to the debate offered to me by previous speakers, and I shall refrain from commenting on that party's remarks during the rest of my speech. I might say that they were ashamed of their past actions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —and I would now like to refer to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) and his speech—

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —in which he said a flag must be a symbol of the hopes and aspirations—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Is the hon. member for Mégantic rising to ask a question?

Mr. Langlois: No, I rise on a question of privilege on the statement made by the hon. member for Acadia. I would like the hon. member for Acadia to withdraw his statement that we were ashamed of our past role, our past vote—

Mr. Bigg: He did not say that.

Mr. Langlois: If that was his intention I can assure the hon. member for Acadia I have never regretted any action or vote I have taken, whether on Thursday night or today, and if the situation pops up again I shall do the same thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Mégantic has made his explanation but I doubt that the words used by the hon. member for Acadia are unparliamentary.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the speech of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) in which he stated that a flag once adopted by a country—I jotted these notes down—must be a symbol of the hopes and aspirations for the future of that country. I wholeheartedly agree with these remarks. He also went on to say it must have the support of the vast majority of the people who will accept and worship that flag in the future. Perhaps this is interpreting the words of the hon. member, and if he disagrees with my interpretation maybe he will rise and say so. He went on to say that the flag now before the house has been brought in the wrong way, has been brought in at the wrong time and has been handled very poorly by the government. I wholeheartedly agree with him in that respect.

Mr. Bigg: The understatement of the year.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): And the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggested a way out. His whole speech was as if he were acting as a mediator between the devil and the deep blue sea, or between the two sides.

An hon. Member: Which is which?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I leave it to you to interpret. I know which is the devil. The hon. member suggested a committee of 15 members, a suggestion which has been floating around and which I think was first offered by the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: Are you sure?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Yes I am sure, if you want to know. This whole suggestion of a committee of 15 members was presented by the official opposition. The whole tenor of the hon. member's remarks was that you cannot bring in a flag unless it is accepted by the vast majority, that you cannot bring in a flag or you cannot expect the people to accept a flag unless it meets the wishes of the majority. Then he went on to say we should have this committee of 15 members and limit its sittings to two months. What happens if after two months the committee has not reached a majority decision? The hon. member did not mention that possibility. He did not say its findings would be backed by a majority, or a vast majority, or an overwhelming majority. He simply said that in two months the committee should end its sittings. It does not matter whether it has called in the Legion or other interested parties; in two months its work is to end. Then we should decide how long the debate is to last in this house.

What will happen if the committee having sat for two months and a decision having been made to the effect that there should be a ten days debate in this house there is still strong opposition in the country to the flag proposed by the government or by the committee? The hon. member did not deal with that situation at all.

The hon. member went on to say emphatically that the government should not expect to impose upon the people of Canada a flag they did not want. I am sure that if he disagrees with me he will rise and say so. He said this emphatically. Yet he did not propose any means of dealing with a situation such as I have described—the committee having sat for two months and the House of Commons being at a stalemate after a debate of ten days, or one week, or two weeks on this issue. The hon. member did not suggest any means of dealing with a situation like that. As one hon. member opposite has said, he was just hoping.

Mr. Douglas: Would the hon. member permit a question? I suggested that when the committee had prepared its report the party leaders would then meet to discuss whether or not any limitation on the length of debate would be established in connection with the committee's report. I take it that if the committee was virtually unanimous in its conclusion the leaders would decide that only a short time was necessary. But if the committee was nowhere close to being unanimous it would be a much longer time. The decision would be one entirely for the party leaders themselves. It seems to me that is fairly conclusive.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Fairly conclusive if a conclusion is reached by the committee in two months. But where are we left if a conclusion has not been reached at the end of that time? We would be left exactly where we are today. Does the hon. member agree with me? He agrees with that. He agrees with my interpretation of his remarks. So I say there is no need to put a time limit on the deliberations of the committee. Even though members over there say "oh" and "aye" and whatever else they are told, they too are in favour of a committee. So why put on a time limit? I ask this question: Why do we need a flag this winter, this fall, or next spring? We have gone on for years—

Mr. Douglas: Would the hon. member permit a further question? If he would look at the statement of his leader on August 21 he would be aware of the fact that his leader has already agreed to the suggestion that the committee should report in 60 days.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I realize that my leader is a compromising gentleman and prepared to go more than half way in settling this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam suggests in that all-inclusive manner of his that the issue can be resolved quite simply in a matter of two months. I am pointing out that it may not be as simple as he imagines, even though my leader has said he is prepared to accept a two months limit on the sittings of the committee.

I myself wholeheartedly support the idea of a committee of 15 members, seven from the government side, five from this party and one from each of the others. I am in wholehearted support of there being a time limit on the debate when the issue comes back to this house—

An hon. Member: If.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You are right: If—if the committee has unlimited time and reaches a virtually unanimous decision. Is it impossible that this should happen? The committee of 1945 reached a virtually unanimous decision, 21 to 1, I believe.

An hon. Member: You were not on the committee.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Twenty three to one was the exact figure. Now, we have the same question, the same country, the same people. Why cannot it be resolved in a similar way in this committee? There is no reason whatsoever. I come back to this. Why does the government insist there must be a time limit on the sittings of the committee? We got along from 1945 to 1964, nearly 20 years, without this proposed design. We went along right through the period between 1867 and 1945 without, or with, a flag, depending on the way you want to interpret the situation. What is the hurrry? Where are we rushing to? I say to the leader of the house, whom I see shaking his head: Is this flag now proposed by the government likely to create greater unity? Is it likely to be a uniting force around which all Canadians will gather? Now let him shake his head. No, sir. This proposed new flag, especially having regard to the manner in which it was placed before us, is not a uniting force; it is not a symbol behind which all Canada will unite.

The leader of the New Democratic party pointed this out clearly. He said the government had brought this issue before us at the wrong time, in the wrong way. They had handled it badly, he said. He stated the proposed flag was not a uniting force. Many members have expressed the opinion that this debate has divided the country and will continue to do so. I do not accept that. Perhaps as a young member of the House of Commons I look to the future with greater interest than do some who are here. I see one problem confronting Canada—one which will loom large in the years ahead. It is the problem of unity. Will we stay united, or will we divide? We hear talk of two nations and of a separate state. I wonder whether we will stay united. I know the Prime Minister is concerned about this problem, too. It took him 90 minutes to decide how to vote this afternoon—whether to end this debate or have it continued. It took him 90 minutes to make that decision. I do not begrude him the time, though at the time I might have done so, since I was anxious to make this speech. But it showed me he was concerned about unity in Canada. I hope that when the next similar vote comes up he will have reached the decision which is requisite from the leader of a government responsible for the position confronting parliament today. I hope he will reach a decision to end this debate until such time as the subject will create unity in Canada, not divide the country as it is doing at the present time.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said many Conservatives have stated that this proposal by the government is a concession to Quebec. I do not believe it is, but it is understood and accepted by Canadians across this country as being a concession to Quebec.

An hon. Member: Repeat that.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Someone says: "Repeat that". I do not think this a concession to Quebec. But I do say—and I have seen evidence for this in editorial pages across Canada—that a good many Canadians in various parts of the country believe this is a concession to Quebec.

Mr. Cashin: Does the hon. member not feel, then, that he is under an obligation to go across the country telling the people what he thinks—telling those who believe this to be a concession to Quebec that it is not so? Would he perhaps start on this crusade within the next 24 hours.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, that question really did not make much sense. If the hon. member is prepared to organize the meetings, I am prepared to speak at them. As we look around the world today—and I say this in all seriousness to the government of Canada—we see countries divided. We see Cyprus, for example. Canada is playing a great role in trying to bring unity and peace to that country. We look at the Middle East; we look at the country to the south of us. You can look at any part of the world today and see disunity caused by racial problems. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we should not join with other countries in the world and promote or create greater disunity in this country of ours, a country which until the past year had been united. Let us remain united, above all. This is the whole purpose of the subamendment, namely to keep us united and to foster unity in our country. As I have said, as a young member of parliament I look perhaps to the future and see that the biggest problem facing Canada in the next 10 or 20 years is unity. We must stay united if we expect to grow and if we expect to maintain our stature throughout the world.

The press has written up this debate as a terrible fiasco, as a terrible thing. Some hon. members have emphasized the fact that 20 days have been spent on this debate. These 20 days may go down as the best 20 days this parliament has ever spent. If because of this debate unity is maintained and promoted, the time could not have been better occupied. We hear a great deal of talk about confederation; we hear a great deal of talk today about opting out, about dominion-provincial rights and dominion-provincial cost sharing programs and the splitting up of tax sharing arrangements between the provinces and the federal government. We hear a great deal of talk about maintaining a strong central government, and also about maintaining a strong separate province, a province to which more and more rights should be doled out.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that if we can maintain and promote unity in this country, these 20 days will have been well spent and may well be the best days this parliament or any other parliament has spent since confederation. The press may write any reports they like. I know that the people across Canada are tired of this debate; I know they think parliament should get on to more pressing business. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government is responsible for this debate and it is their responsibility to bring forth legislation that is so necessary.

Mr. Sharp: We have.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Someone over there says "We have"; I think it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). I wonder whether he supports what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) said today to the press, namely that we have to shut out all Japanese trade. I wonder how the western farmers like that. I know they did not like it a few years ago when we made similar statements, although they were not nearly as strong as the statement of the Minister of Finance today.

They talk about legislation. We have said from time to time, "Bring forward your pension legislation; bring forward your agricultural machinery legislation that will revamp and revolutionize agriculture", as stated by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) in Lethbridge back in March. He said the opposition was holding up this legislation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce nods his head as if to agree that we are holding up this legislation. It is not even on the order paper; neither is the pension legislation. Bring it forward; put it on the order paper. It is the government's responsibility to bring it forward.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we voted in favour of the motion so that the government could bring forward this necessary legislation. How did the minister and the rest of the cabinet vote? They voted to continue this debate; they wanted to hear more as to why their flag should or should not be approved by this House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member is again reflecting on a vote which has already been taken by the house.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Trade and Commerce led me astray by nodding his head. He led me to cast reflections upon his action this afternoon, which was contrary to the impression he created when shaking his head while I was speaking earlier.

An hon. Member: Deceitful people.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It is a sorry state in which we find ourselves in this Canadian parliament, stalemated and blocked from proceeding with necessary legislation. The farmers all across Canada are waiting for this legislation to be passed. I do not know whether they want to be called grocery growers or not; I do not think they do. I am a farmer, and I want to be called a farmer and not a grocery grower. If the Minister of Agriculture can dream up any term to apply to me and the farmers of Canada, let him do so; but we are proud to be farmers. It is a sad commentary on this parliament when we find ourselves stalemated by the government. They realize this debate has reached an impasse but they will not, because of their stubborn arrogance, bring in necessary legislation. This is a proud, arrogant government which has presented a flag that has been termed a political flag and which, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) quite properly said, is a flag that will cause Canada to remain divided in the years ahead. This proud, arrogant and dictatorial government is trying to ram down the throats of Canadians a flag of one man's choosing. It is not a flag of two or three men; it is not a flag the cabinet has decided upon; it is not a party or backbenchers' flag, but is a flag of one man's choosing. We have as evidence in this regard the speech of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan).

An hon. Member: Was it good?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It was very good, because the hon. member who has interjected did not challenge it, and neither has any other backbencher or cabinet minister challenged it. I think the hon. member's word is good, because nobody on that side of the house, neither backbencher nor cabinet minister, had the guts to stand up and challenge what was said. Hon. members opposite know whether this design was presented or even talked about in their caucus; they know better than I do. I ask them to stand up and say it was not. They can throw out these red herrings, if they like, but they will not lead me astray this evening.

We have the word of the hon. member for York-Humber, and no one in his party has challenged what he said. It has not been challenged by any backbencher who might have attended the caucuses of that party. No cabinet minister, and not even the leader of that party, has challenged it. This is a one-man flag which will be portrayed as Pearson's pennant as long as Canada exists.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Bigg: No, not from a sticker-licker.

Mr. Dupuis: Does my hon. friend remember having said in this house in 1961:

I think that any attempt to include the union jack or red ensign in the flag would merely degrade two well known and honourable flags.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sure that if my hon. friend reads my whole speech which I made in 1961, rather than picking out a sentence from it, I would be pleased if he would rise in his place and ask me about it. But I have the floor and have only five or six minutes left.

Mr. Dupuis: Answer my question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I said, read my whole speech. Mr. Speaker, I hope you are deducting the appropriate amount of time to allow for these people who are interrupting me in the course of my remarks. While I have not too much time left there are a few things I want to say, and I trust the Chair will give me 40 minutes, which is what all hon. members ask for.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will answer the question, do not worry. Give me time this evening and I will answer it.

We are suggesting that this government has no mandate. In presenting this flag the government has contributed to and is aiding the division of Canada. We have suggested that they made no real promise before the 1963 election that they would present a flag to parliament, and I say that they have not stood on their feet and substantiated any of the points I have just made.

I should like to refer to an interview which took place on November 9, 1961 in which the present Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, was interviewed by Mr. John Andrews of CJCH news bureau. It starts in this way:

Mr. Andrews: Mr. Pearson, how do you feel about a distinctive Canadian flag?

Mr. Pearson: I feel very friendly toward a distinctive Canadian flag. In fact, it's been on our program now for some years...a distinctive Canadian flag...

Mr. Andrews: What particular design do you have in mind?

Mr. Pearson: Well, I haven't any particular design in mind...

So in 1961 he did not have any particular design in mind, yet the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said on a T.V. program in 1960 that he told Canadians that if he was elected prime minister he would bring in a particular design for a Canadian flag. The interview continues:

Mr. Pearson: I would have a distinctive Canadian flag which could not be mistaken for the flag of any other country....that's as far as I've got.

Mr. Andrews: Then you wouldn't have the union jack in it.

Then the Prime Minister replied that he could not make a statement on this at that time. Then Mr. Andrews asked, in deciding what design we should have:

How would you poll the people on this?

Mr. Pearson: We would poll the people when we have a general election. And if they don't like the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag which can't be mistaken for that of any other country, they'll let us know in no uncertain terms.

Hon. members opposite got 42 per cent of the vote. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that in no uncertain terms? Is that a majority government? As the hon. member for York-Humber quite explicitly pointed out in his speech, they did not even present the flag to the electorate in the 1963 election. They did not even point out—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ with you. I was continually interrupted from the commencement of my remarks, and I certainly have not taken 40 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The Clerk at the table has given me the time when the hon. member began his speech and I have made an appropriate allowance for the interruptions the hon. member has had. I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker—well, if the hon. member is going to ask me a question I will answer it.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Dupuis (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, it was not at all my intention to take part in this debate, but as my hon. friend did not answer my question and suggested that I speak after him, may I take a few minutes of the time of the house to recall briefly what took place in the House of Commons on the question of a national plebiscite as the one requested now by our friends in their subamendment.

First of all, as I intend to be brief, I would like to say that I am proud of having been here this afternoon when the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) made a speech which, in my opinion—

[Text]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) rose to his feet the members on this side of the house were under the impression that he was rising for the purpose of asking a question. According to the ruling made last week in the house, all that was necessary, in effect, was for a speaker to yield the floor in order to give an hon. member permission to ask a question. However, it now appears that the hon. minister is making a speech, and in doing so he needs the necessary recognition from the Chair, which was not forthcoming. The hon. member on this side accepted a question from the minister, who is now proceeding to make a speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) could not accept a question without the unanimous consent of the house, his time, plus a very generous allowance given by the Chair, having expired. The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis).

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is this a speech or a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I said at the outset that since the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) stated that he did not have time to answer my question, I would make a speech.

I said I was glad to be in the House of Commons this afternoon when the leader of the New Democratic party made what I consider as a historical speech, above all partisanship, and I take this opportunity to congratulate him sincerely for his contribution to the debate.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention to give the debate a political slant, but I would merely like to remind—

[Text]

Mr. Nugent: Would the minister permit a question? He has just said that the leader of the New Democratic party had made a speech well above partisan politics and he wanted to congratulate him for that. Would he care to explain to the house how he can equate that with his position as chief huckster for the government of the three maple leaf flag?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, evidently, if the hon. member who has just put a question were intelligent, his question would be intelligent, but, one cannot give what one has not got.

Mr. Speaker, a while ago, I asked a question of the hon. member for Acadia. The hon. member should certainly have been most careful before making his speech, for in January 1961, when the Tory government, headed by the man who is today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), was making no decisions, a Conservative member, Mr. Régnier, saw fit to submit to the house, because of his chief's irresolution, a motion for a national referendum or plebiscite.

On this occasion, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just resumed his seat, had something to say.

Evidently, I cannot take all the time I am allowed to read the hon. member's speech, but I wish to quote a few excerpts, which may lead my Conservative friends to do some thinking.

Listen to this. On January 23, 1961, in the House of Commons, when the present Leader of the Opposition was prime minister and reigning supreme, with an overwhelming majority in the house, the hon. member for Acadia said this:

[Text]

> I think that any attempt to include the union jack or red ensign in the flag would merely degrade two well known and honourable flags. Between now and 1967, when Canada will celebrate its centennial, we hope that Canada will continue to grow in stature and as a nation. Right now the provinces are meeting with the federal government in order to work out ways by which Canada can amend the British North America Act without having to go to the British government for final approval of amendments. When this day arrives I think we will have passed another milestone in becoming a truly independent nation, and surely when we pass that milestone and celebrate our centennial we should feel entitled to have a truly distinctive flag.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the man who said that is the Conservative member for Acadia, who just resumed his seat, when he was sitting with the Diefenbaker government. I commend him, I agree with him and it is to congratulate him that I rose to my feet.

The hon. member for Acadia said, as recorded on page 1318 of Hansard for January 23, 1961, year of the reign of "his gracious majesty" the hon. member for Prince Albert:

[Text]

Surely an artist in designing a flag should adhere to simplicity and present a design that is well known and recognizably representative of Canada, one that would be recognized and accepted the world over. I think a flag must be emblematic of the country it represents so that it will not be mistaken for the flag of another country.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member and state that I agree with him. I note that he left the house before I mentioned what he had said, because he realizes what he did say and he is ashamed now.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to a question of privilege. I am sure that the minister, if he reflects upon the reason the hon. member left the house, will realize that even for that hon. minister, this is getting to be pretty low.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nugent: I know why the hon. member for Acadia left the house, and it is certainly not because he is afraid of anything that huckster might say. The minister referred to the statement, that only after we have passed that milestone and repatriated the constitution could that be done.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nugent: I think if the hon. minister reflects further he will conclude that he should qualify at least his remarks in respect of that statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I hope you keep track of the interruptions because, I too, have many things to say.

[Text]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister without Portfolio should withdraw the remark he made about the hon. member for Acadia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nugent: He is not man enough to withdraw.

Mr. MacInnis: I think the Minister without Portfolio should definitely withdraw the statement he made in respect of the reason the hon. member for Acadia left his seat. While the hon. member for Acadia was making his speech a page informed me that there was a long distance call for him. I personally went to the phone for the hon. member who had asked me to find out who was calling and what the individual wanted, and advise them that the hon. member would call them back as soon as he had concluded his remarks. I base this statement on a message I received from one of the page boys. I think the minister should withdraw his statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I presume—and I speak slowly in order that the translators may interpret my speech correctly—that when I began to quote him, the hon. member for Acadia must have been embarrassed because he left his seat, but I think that he was especially embarrassed over his party's stand and not over his, because he frankly said what he had to say in 1961. And I continue the quotation—

[Text]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

An hon. Member: There is no point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: I have explained to the Chair that the hon. member for Acadia left his seat having received a message from the page that there was a long distance call for him. I would not stand here and repeat this explanation if it was not the actual fact. The minister has indicated that the hon. member for Acadia left his seat for an entirely different reason. He must accept my explanation, or call me to order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Perhaps the members of this house will allow me to say that the hon. member for Cape Breton South has explained why the hon. member for Acadia left this chamber, and I am sure the Minister without Portfolio will accept that explanation.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to accept the explanation of the phone call, but that does not change the facts.

I resume quoting what the hon. member for Acadia said when the Conservatives were in office, on January 23, 1961.

[Text]

Mr. Nugent: Quit trying to change the facts.

Canadian Flag

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: I do not understand why my Conservative friends take exception to remarks made by their own colleague. I do not understand it at all. They filibustered long enough, they can at least let me speak. They asked us to speak and when we rise to do so, they try to interrupt us. Are they sincere?

Here is what the hon. member for Acadia said under a Conservative government on January 23, 1961 about the resolution of the Conservative member for St. Boniface who at that time asked for a referendum. Remember that when in office the then leader did not want one, but now that he is in opposition, he does.

Listen to this:

[Text]

The resolution suggests that we should have a referendum. I do not think it is necessary to go to the trouble and expense of doing so when we will be taking a census this year.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Acadia, and he then continued as follows:

I agree with the hon. member who proposed an amendment to the resolution.

[Translation]

Now that he is through with is phone call, I wish to tell the hon. member for Acadia, who is now returning to the house, that I congratulate him.

[Text]

In the census I believe the only question that should be asked is: Are you in favour of a truly distinctive flag? That is the first question that should be answered. If the answer is overwhelmingly in the affirmative then the government in power should have the courage to decide on a truly distinctive flag.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Dupuis: I want to congratulate the hon. member for Acadia in respect of the statements he put on record in 1961. I could not agree more with him. He was a real Canadian in those days.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to a question of privilege. The hon. minister referred to my leaving the house, and I should like to say that I left the house to answer a call which was—

An hon. Member: We heard all this.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I left the house to answer a call that—

An hon. Member: This is the same old story.

[Mr. Nugent.]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, there is so much shouting going on that I cannot hear.

Mr. Nugent: You cannot hear the minister's withdrawal?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Order please. It would appear that the hon. member for Acadia wishes to make an explanation, and I suggest there are two avenues open to him. He may ask the Minister without Portfolio, who is now making a speech, to yield the floor and allow him to make his explanation, or he can wait until the minister has completed his remarks, and then, under certain conditions, make an explanation. I suggest to him, however, that the explanation which he feels he should make does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister without Portfolio has cast aspersions on my conduct as a member of this house. It is on that point that I wish to raise this question of privilege. I left the house because I was called away, and while I was away I looked at what remarks I had made in 1961.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Just to make it clear, I should like to read this one sentence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): In 1961, I said this:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I personally am satisfied with the flag we have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Will the hon. member resume his seat, please?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What I said in 1961, I stand by.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Will the member has given an explanation as to why he left the house. However, he has already made his speech and he cannot now refute any argument that is being made by the Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will refute anything he says, and give him proof.

An hon. Member: You had a telephone call?

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I would appreciate it very much if the hon. member who just made the remark from your right would stand up and identify himself as having made that remark which casts a reflection on the explanation I gave to this house. I wonder if he has the guts to stand up and identify himself? As I said before, the message I received on behalf of the hon. member for Acadia was delivered here during his speech by a page boy.

Mr. Tardif: Since we are talking about "guts", Mr. Speaker, no doubt we are talking about intestinal fortitude, and there is no shortage of that on this side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tardif: Furthermore, it was stated to this house that the hon. member had been called to receive a telephone call. The hon. member came into the house and said he had gone to get his notes or a copy of the speech he made before.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On a point of privilege—

Mr. Tardif: Which one is true?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, the hon. member—

Mr. Knowles: Are we charging admission to the galleries tonight?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Cape Breton South has given an explanation as to why the hon. member for Acadia left the chamber. Under the rules of this house hon. members in this chamber must accept that explanation. Now, perhaps we can get on with the remarks of the Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Nugent: If I may, I should like to speak to this question of privilege. We cannot allow the statement of the hon. member for Russell to stand. He questions the explanation given. The hon. member for Acadia said that he went out to take a phone call and while he was out there took advantage of the opportunity to look at his notes. The hon. member for Russell just twisted that explanation, and I hope he will withdraw that scurrilous remark.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; the Chair has already ruled that the explanation given by the hon. member for Cape Breton South must be accepted by the members in this chamber. There can be no debate on that matter.

Mr. Nugent: I am asking the Chair to rule on the remarks of the hon. member for Russell.

Mr. Tardif: If the hon. member will give me a chance I am very happy to say now that I accept the statements made by both members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, I should like to read to the house citation 145, page 126 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. Perhaps if I read part of it that would be sufficient:

> A statement made by a member in his place, is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

I would expect that the members of this chamber would abide by that rule.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a further question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Your ruling has indicated that my explanation as to why the hon. member for Acadia left the house must be accepted. On the basis of that ruling, I ask the hon. member for Russell to withdraw the insinuation he cast upon my explanation.

Mr. Tardif: It is not necessary for me to withdraw. All I need say is that I accept your explanation, and I do so with great difficulty.

Mr. Nugent: Now, Mr. Speaker, that remark must be withdrawn. The hon. member has abandoned the twist he put on before and is trying to weasel out of it. He made a plain imputation, and this weaseling cannot be allowed in a house of honourable gentlemen. If we are a house of honourable gentlemen, I would ask the hon. member for Russell to prove whether or not we are.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, may I read again the last part of citation 145:

> A statement made by a member in his place, is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

I suggest to the hon. member for Russell that he accept the explanation given.

Mr. Tardif: I rise in my place, Mr. Speaker, and I do so with pleasure.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, those points of order have given our hon. friends opposite a breathing spell.

It is obvious that they are not happy tonight; however, for the last ten days they have been urging the ministers to take part in the debate, but when one of them rises, they are very unhappy because they would have preferred that he had remained silent, as they are not over anxious to listen to us.

Canadian Flag

I quoted the words of the hon. member for Acadia; no need for him to be vexed, because I have great esteem for him and I consider that what he said in this house in January 1961 was nothing but the truth. So much so that at that time, when the hon. member for Acadia stated:

[Text]

I do not think it is necessary to go to the trouble and expense of doing so when we will be taking a census this year.

[Translation]

I was so convinced that he was right on January 23, 1961, that on the day after, January 24 of that same year, I was in this house and I thought I would give the then prime minister the opportunity to support his member for Acadia. The day after the great discovery of the hon. member for Acadia, I moved in the House of Commons, in order to facilitate his task, Bill No. C-60, of which I have a copy here; and in order to comply with the hon. member's wish I entitled the bill: an act to amend the Statistics Act.

Here are the explanations I gave on that occasion:

[Text]

Here is the explanation that was given to the house, in support of the hon. member, who is my greatest friend. I quote:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the governor in council to conduct a public opinion survey on the occasion of the next decennial census in Canada, concerning an entirely distinctive national flag and national anthem.

Mr. Nugent: Have you changed your mind?

Mr. Dupuis: No, I will explain that. We never change our minds, but occasionally the history of our country changes with the government. I will explain everything you want. You want us to tell you the truth, and you will get the truth tonight.

I continue:

Since the census—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Will you allow me to speak or do you prefer to carry out your own filibuster?

And I go on:

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You interrupted me often enough.

Mr. Dupuis: I quote:

Since the census forms have to go back to press shortly—

[Mr. Dupuis.]

This is in support of the hon. member.

—it would be a fine opportunity——for that great man, Mr. Diefenbaker——to include those two questions in order to learn the wishes of the Canadian people on this matter of great current interest.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Are you prepared to do that now?

Mr. Dupuis: This was what the hon. member said in 1961.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Are you prepared to do that now?

Mr. Dupuis: He is asking me a question, and I will answer the question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Are you prepared to do that now? The hon. member wishes me to put a question to him. Are you prepared to do that now?

Mr. Dupuis: Let me answer you. I will answer you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): He does not say yes or no.

Mr. Dupuis: I will say yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The Minister without Portfolio has the floor.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You say yes.

Mr. Dupuis: I want to answer and he does not want me to answer. This is a real Tory tactic.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sitting here listening to you.

Mr. Dupuis: I will answer you.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when does a government call for a referendum to answer the hon. member for Acadia's question?

He asks me: "Are you or are you not in favour of a referendum?" I answer immediately: No, today, I am not in favour, and here are my reasons.

When should a government call for a referendum? Everybody knows that there are two main reasons for a government to call for a referendum.

First, a government may want to ask the people to be released from a commitment, and that was the case of the 1952 referendum—

An hon. Member: 1942.

Mr. Dupuis: Yes, 1942.

Second the opposition or the government may ask for a referendum when it is clear, obvious and unquestionable that the government in power cannot take its responsibilities and wants to leave it to the electors.

Now, today, we have a government that wants to assume its responsibilities and that does assume them. We do not want to be released from any commitment. We want to carry out the pledge we made to the people of Canada.

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): When and where did you make that promise you are talking about?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is it a promise like that clearly set out by the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson)?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I am sure the house would want to accord the ordinary courtesies of the chamber to the Minister without Portfolio who is now making a speech and who has the right to continue without being interrupted.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I rise on a question of privilege. When I was making my speech I was interrupted continually by members opposite and on this side of the floor. I would only ask the minister if he would explain when and where such a promise was made, and was it a promise in accord with the definition of a promise set out more clearly by the Postmaster General?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I can see that my friend from Acadia is nervous tonight. I see it as plainly as if I were in his shoes, but I would advise him to consult his immediate neighbour who is a doctor and who perhaps could feel his pulse, give him some advice and help him to contain himself during my speech.

I have here the text of a promise made by the Liberal party. Do not forget this: the present Leader of the Opposition, who has been prime minister of Canada—I see that my friend the hon. member for Acadia is again going to the telephone. There is no doubt about it, those people use the telephone a lot. They use it quite a lot. I know that if he is leaving the house, it is not because he is ashamed, but because he is wanted on the telephone.

I know now that it was not because he was ashamed, but because he had to answer a telephone call.

Mr. Speaker, I see the former minister of veterans affairs (Mr. Churchill) looking at me. He moved the subamendment. He was a member of the government then. He is one of the old die-hards. Those are the men who were in office for six years, and who had the greatest majority of all times in the House of Commons. Those are the men who, when they were in office, were asked by their own Conservative members to hold a referendum. At that time, they did not choose to do so, they even refused the request of their own members.

When they are at the helm, when they are all powerful, there is no referendum. But today, when they are in the official opposition, they suddenly become the defenders of the people, and ask for one.

Well, Mr. Speaker, at this time, the Canadian people are looking at the official opposition; and they will be strict in their judgment.

It is hardly possible that only the team on the official opposition benches could be right in this country.

I might quote many texts at this point, and I shall quote a few. I did not want to quote so many, but I see that they have a considerable impact on my friends opposite.

This is what another Conservative member said on January 23, 1961, when the Leader of the Opposition was the all-powerful prime minister of Canada:

> Yet, I think that a referendum would not be necessary, and that it is up to the government to give the Canadian people that distinctive national flag they want so much.

That was what a Conservative member told his government.

Mr. Macaluso: Who said that?

Mr. Dupuis: The Conservative member for Richmond-Wolfe, Florent Dubois. When people realized that he had no influence on the prime minister they did not re-elect him, saying: It is useless to send him to the House of Commons because the prime minister will not listen to him.

We have some gems. Of course, up to now, they were ignored by our hon. friends opposite.

Another Conservative member said this when his party was in power in 1961:

> It would certainly not be surprising to see Canada provided shortly with a national flag.

That one still trusted his leader. And he added:

> Our government will then have the opportunity to choose an essentially distinctive emblem in accordance with the legitimate aspirations of the majority of Canadians.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what we are saying. This hon. member was surely defeated because his constituents realized he had no influence on his leader.

That was the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane, Mr. Alfred Belzile, our lamented colleague.

Mr. Speaker, we can of course give other examples. Mr. Nasserden, member for Rosthern, said for instance:

I think it can be said that there is no matter that is of more interest and importance to Canadians than the matter of a distinctive Canadian flag.

I have it in English, I could read the English text but it is good to read the translation once in a while to show them the advantage of being able to speak both languages.

In a few more years we shall be celebrating our centennial here in Canada and at that time it would be well if all Canadians could share that measure of unity that may be enhanced by a distinctive Canadian flag.

Yes it would be a good thing.

The man who said those words is a member who sits on the other side but who will not be there long when his electors find out how he has changed his mind.

[Text]

Mr. Fane: How funny can you get?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: You find that funny? There is nothing funnier than seeing the Conservatives caught in the very trap in which they wanted to catch others.

Mr. Speaker, we have many more historic quotations. For instance, our friends opposite ask: How is it that the Liberals, who are in power, want to decide upon a flag?

We did not change our minds. Our Canadian high commissioner in England, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, had this to say in 1961, and it is exactly what the Liberals who are in office, are saying today, although they were in opposition then:

—in closing I say that, under the existing law of parliament, by virtue of the powers of this government, if we are to have a distinctive national flag, it is up to the government either by the establishment of a committee or by some other means, to give it to us. I believe that those who spent much of their time criticizing the former administration instead of giving us a distinctive natonal flag, had better address their claims and their representations to the government—

—Conservative, at that time.

—that sits to the right of Mr. Speaker.

And Mr. Chevrier added:

If they did that—

[Mr. Dupuis.]

The Conservatives—

—we soon might have a distinctive national flag which, I think, the great majority of the Canadian people wants.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that we have not changed. But they have. When we were in the opposition, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said a week ago, the then leader of the opposition in 1960-61 and 1962 said in the house, in press conferences, on television, in his electoral program which I have now: If you elect the Liberal party, if you give the country a Liberal government, they will give Canada a national distinctive flag which will not be mistaken for the emblem of any other country.

That was the promise made by the leader of the Liberal party when he was sitting on the other side of the house, and during the last election campaign, that if he was elected to office, as prime minister, and as an honest and sincere man, he would submit to the house a distinctive national flag for the Canadian people.

[Text]

Mr. Hales: What about the second flag?

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: You should begin by settling the first problem. You are so mixed up with the first—we will speak about the second later.

What do we see today? The right hon. Leader of the Opposition, the former prime minister, asks us for a referendum, a plebiscite; he is seconded by his lieutenant, his brave lieutenant of the old guard, the former minister of veterans affairs (Mr. Churchill).

[Text]

An hon. Member: We believe in democracy.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: You believe in democracy but you are attempting, as a small opposition group, to thwart all the other parties, to thwart public opinion and you even contradict the statements you made here yourselves when you sat on this side of the house. You pay lipservice to democracy but by your actions you show that you are anti-democratic.

At present, as I said, the Leader of the Opposition is asking for a plebiscite. Why? Because he does not want this government to take its responsibilities.

When he was prime minister he did not want any plebiscite and that was established at the time of the introduction of Bill C-60 on January 24, 1961. We have recalled, after the hon. member for Acadia, that the only opportunity—and this is very important—the only opportunity for the government to hold a referendum without any cost to the country, was on the occasion of the decennial census which happens every decade. Now, the last time we had a decennial census was in 1961 and if the present Leader of the Opposition had been sincere, he would then have called for a plebiscite at the same time as the decennial census. That would not have cost the country anything.

An hon. Member: He is not sincere.

Mr. Dupuis: He could have added to the questions asked from door to door one or two additional questions to ask the Canadian people: Are you for or against a national distinctive flag? Are you for a distinctive national anthem?

But when he was prime minister, while he could have taken that opportunity—which happens only once every ten years—to hold a referendum at no cost to the taxpayers, the Leader of the Opposition said "no" to his supporters, he said "no" to the Canadian people and, today, as an irresponsible man, he is asking other people to do what he was not man enough to do himself when he was prime minister of Canada.

At this time I am not playing politics. I am merely quoting facts as they were put on the record. I am only discussing things that we have seen, that our hon. Conservative friends can check up in Hansard because they have a short memory.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I wish to tell you this.

Today we have the pleasure of realizing that the majority of members of this house are in favour of a distinctive national flag. We have the satisfaction of seeing that, for once in the history of Canada, a man, having become Prime Minister, has kept his promise to propose a distinctive national flag, the one he has proposed to this house before the whole nation, to which he had made that promise.

And today it is our privilege to see, rising above party politics, members of the New Democratic party, Social Credit members and those from the Ralliement Creditiste, and for once I agree with my hon. friend the member for Villeneuve: We are all Canadians above political partisanship.

We want a distinctive national flag which would not hurt anybody. And, as my hon. friend from Acadia said—and I want to remind him of what he said, because he was on the telephone:

[Text]

Surely an artist in designing a flag should adhere to simplicity and present a design that is well known and recognizably representative of Canada, one that would be recognized and accepted the world over. I think a flag must be emblematic of the country it represents so that it will not be mistaken for the flag of another country.

That was said by the hon. member for Acadia who was on the phone a few moments ago.

I think a flag must be emblematic of the country it represents so that it will not be mistaken for the flag of another country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dupuis: I have new things to tell you.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I said one flag, not two, and that is what you are attempting to present to Canada today.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Acadia says: "One flag for Canada". We too want a distinctive national flag. That is what you now have before you, but you refuse to adopt the resolution.

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You present one distinctive flag. Your suggestion is two flags.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: And the hon. member continues as follows:

[Text]

As I mentioned before, the flag should be of simple design. We would not want anything bizarre or complicated which would detract from the flag and create confusion as to what it represents. I think a truly distinctive flag would bring greater unity in Canada and that all Canadians would pay their allegiance to it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): One flag; not two flags.

Mr. Dupuis: I think that instead of shouting "One flag" the hon. member should see his leader and ask for one group in his own party.

[Translation]

And the hon. member continues as follows:

[Text]

I think a truly distinctive flag would bring greater unity in Canada and that all Canadians would pay allegiance to it if a design were brought in and presented by the government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): One design, one flag.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: I notice that the doctor sitting next to the hon. member for Acadia has lost heart and has left the house. He left the hon. member for Acadia to his disease.

And I continue—besides, I do not see why the hon. member for Acadia should be so angry, because I totally agree with him; he was right in 1961.

I continue—

[Text]

Do you understand English?

The idea of a distinctive flag for Canada has been suggested over the years—

Indeed.

—and the question has had the continuing support of the armed forces.

Indeed. I think he should repeat that to his hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill).

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Read the next two sentences.

Mr. Dupuis: You want me to continue? I will speak, then. Listen.

The union jack has been suggested as our flag. A long time ago I learned in school how the union jack originated—

An hon. Member: Don't criticize it. Your friends burned it the other night.

Mr. Dupuis:

Some people accuse Canadians, this government and politicians on both sides of the house of becoming too nationalistic. I think that is an exaggerated accusation. I believe that Canadians should be able to speak their piece without being accused of being anti-American, anti-British, and so on.

Some hon. Members: Who said that?

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Acadia, who was answering the phone a few minutes ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Dupuis: I agree with the hon. member. I like him and support him. He was speaking in this debate as a real Canadian, not as a Tory, and he said this:

We are Canadians, we speak from a Canadian point of view and this fact should be accepted by other countries.

I am certain there would be greater acceptance, particularly in the United States, if we had a truly distinctive flag.

Who said that?

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked, "Who said that?" I would like to say, on a point of order, that I said it. I said that Canada and Canadians generally wanted a truly distinctive flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): But they want one flag—not two, not three flags, as was suggested by the Prime Minister in Hansard when speaking earlier on this question. I say, and I said then, that Canadians and Canada want one flag, not two and not three.

Mr. Pickersgill: Little Jack Horner is in the corner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think we should allow the Minister without Portfolio to continue.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house, the country and the press gallery—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would draw Your Honour's attention to the clock. The minister has now been speaking—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought you wanted us on this side to speak.

Mr. MacEwan: You would all do well in the barnyard, anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: I am not too sure that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) would be in order, even if he rose to his feet. He has a lot to say from that particular seat and I would call his attention to the fact that he is out of order speaking from that seat. We all realize it is a seat he would like to occupy. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Clerk of the House will confirm the fact that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) started his remarks at a quarter after nine.

Mr. Habel: Are you keeping the time?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, I am watching the clock. If I am wrong in the premise I am putting forward, Mr. Speaker, the Chair is at liberty to correct me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It is the custom in this chamber for the Clerk to advise the Speaker when a member begins and to advise him when his time expires. It is the duty of the Chair to allow a few extra minutes, if he considers it proper, to an hon. member who has been interrupted on a number of occasions. I would hope that in this particular case the Chair will be able to be as fair as it was in the previous case.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I trust that the same privilege will be accorded to other hon. members, although it was denied this evening to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner). The Minister without Portfolio has now gone 10 minutes beyond his time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I do not want to enter into any argument with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis); but I should advise him that extra time was not denied the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner). I would advise the hon. member that he began his remarks at 8.28, his time expired at 9.08, and he was advised by the Chair that his time had expired at 9.16. In the opinion of the Chair the hon. member was given a very generous allowance of time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, as I have been mentioned in this discussion. While I do not in any way wish to curtail the remarks of the Minister without Portfolio, I would point out that I was allowed five minutes extra time. I believe, if I accept the word of my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the minister has now gone 10 minutes over time. I think the Clerk should rise and report to you, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister without Portfolio started and when his time expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I understand that my friends may suffer, but what amazes me most is that they suffer from hearing their own words, and that is what is amazing and that the people do not understand.

What does my hon. friend for Acadia think of a truly distinctive national flag? Listen to this:

[Text]

I think that any attempt to include the union jack or red ensign in the flag would merely degrade two well known and honourable flags.

Who said that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dupuis: That was said by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) when his party was in power. He did not say that tonight.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You didn't give me enough time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must advise the Minister without Portfolio that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the remarks that have been made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. I want to make it plain that I do not object to his quoting my remarks of 1961. I still stand by everything I said then. But I do not like to hear those remarks twisted, as they were tonight in the house. I want to read to you—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: —just one paragraph to show—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. If the hon. gentleman feels he has been misquoted, he has the right to make an explanation; but I should point out to the hon. member that under the rules of this house he is only permitted to explain that part which he considers to be misunderstood. He is not permitted to introduce any new matter. Perhaps there is no need for me to read the appropriate citation to the hon. member at this time; but if he goes outside these bounds, I shall be obliged to do so.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is what I said:

Whatever the design finally approved by parliament and the Canadian people, it should be a reminder to us of our beginnings as a nation. It should reflect the part that Great Britain played in the development of our institutions. It should also reflect the personality of Canada as it has developed under the enriching influence of French culture. But more than that, it must also reflect the personality of a nation having that third dimension, that of those who chose Canadian citizenship after the destiny of Canada was decided in the articles of confederation.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw your distortion now.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The hon. member, in spite of your warning, did not say that I had misquoted him. He quoted other excerpts of his speech, and that is out of order.

If you have authorized the hon. member to quote another excerpt of his speech, I do not see why I could not do so myself.

It reads as follows:

—a referendum would only emphasize that division rather than creating unity in the country at the present time.

That is what the hon. member (Mr. Nasserden) said. Do you have enough or do you want more?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the unanimous consent of the house to go on with my speech?

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think the procedure we are now following is quite irregular. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) has made something of an explanation, as he is permitted to do, if one follows citation 142 which is to be found at page 124 of Beauchesne. I shall read that citation:

A member who, during a debate, has spoken to a question may again be heard to offer explanation of some material part of his speech which has been misunderstood; but he must not introduce new matter or endeavour to strengthen by new arguments his former position which he alleges to have been misunderstood, or to reply to other members.

In view of this I would suggest to both hon. members that we let the argument rest there.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I would like to question your ruling.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member has raised the question as to what was my stand with regard to a referendum at that particular time. I say I have not changed my mind in that regard. At that time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I am in some difficulty with regard to knowing what is the position of the hon. member in this debate, whether he has already spoken on this particular subamendment. If he has, then I can only resort to citation 142, and I have given him sufficient privilege there. If he has not already spoken he can reserve his remarks until he does.

Mr. Nasserden: I have made my position very clear, I think, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I was beginning to wonder whether I would ever get the floor tonight. In the remaining moments left to me this evening I should like to begin my remarks with what are my sincere comments on this issue. This evening has been quite interesting and I am sure the gallery must have been regaled with the antics of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis). After seeing and listening to him there is no question in my mind why he remains a minister without a portfolio. He began his remarks with very profuse congratulations to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) for the very high level of his remarks this afternoon. What a pity he does not follow that rule himself. The speeches he delivers in this house—indeed, the type of speech I have heard him deliver on each occasion he speaks in the house—are anything but on a high level. He chose to quote a number of references from Hansard of 1961, which purported to be statements by hon. members in this party in which they had stated that they were in favour of a distinctive national flag. I do not think there is any conflict there, any more than there is now. I am sure that most hon. members in this house are in favour of a distinctive national flag. I say "a distinctive national flag", not two or three flags as proposed by hon. members opposite. It is not a question whether or not we are opposed to or in favour of a distinctive national flag. This is not the point at issue right now. What we are opposed to, and I think what Canadians generally across the country are opposed to, is the anaemic, insipid design which has been proposed by this government. If a flag is to be distinctive and is to be Canadian, then it must be one which meets with the approval of all Canadians.

I was also interested in the new theory of democracy propounded by the Minister without Portfolio when he stated that he thought that because government members and those who support them were in the majority, the opposition should simply quit talking and allow the resolution to come to a vote. What an example of how little he knows about parliamentary government. In my opinion it is a disgrace for a minister of the crown to stand on his feet in this house and put forward such theories and express such thoughts.

This debate, which has gone on for the past few days, has certainly generated a certain amount of heat. Perhaps tonight was the best example of how much heat has been generated. I am not going to make any comments about the light that was shed, but it was at least most entertaining. If the debate has done nothing else I think it is making Canadians across this country aware of our history. It is making Canadians aware of what a flag means to this country. It is making Canadians think about designs for a flag. As a result of this debate I think there will be a greater participation on the part of the Canadian people in the national affairs of the country. I do not suggest that the people who have spoken in this debate are accurately reflecting the views of all Canadians, but most certainly those who have spoken have made statements and expressed feelings which I am sure are expressed by somebody. Even the comments made by the Minister without Portfolio will be received, I dare say, by somebody in this country. I think it is the responsibility of members of parliament to express these feelings, because if we are to be a true reflection of the attitudes and thoughts of Canadians across the country, then those attitudes and thoughts must be expressed in this house.

It has been suggested that Canadians generally are getting tired of this debate. I am sure most hon. members discussed this issue over the Labour day week end with their constituents. I am sure that most of our constituents feel that the debate has gone on far longer than it needed to go on. But at the same time those of my constituents who have said to me that they think the debate has gone on too long have followed that remark up very quickly by saying: "But you simply must not allow this insipid design to be passed". So what other method is there open to the opposition? What other method is there open to a member of parliament to prevent the government's foisting this folly upon the Canadian people, other than debating the matter in the house, and debating it to the point where the government realize that the people of this country are not going to be happy with this design?

Another thing which has contributed to this feeling among Canadians is the fact that from the time the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made his first statement to the Canadian Legion convention in Winnipeg, this issue has been played up by the newspapers across the country. Every question asked in the house about this matter, even a simple question which perhaps took up two minutes of the time of the house, received front page headlines day after day after day. I do not criticize the newspapers for this because their job is to sell newspapers and they do that the best way they can. But none the less the feeling has got abroad that nothing has been done in this house since early April, when the Prime Minister spoke to the Legion convention in Winnipeg. That is not the case. The flag resolution was introduced considerably later than that, and I find it rather strange, now that the resolution is before the house and is being debated, that all of a sudden the newspapers find there is no copy in it; that it sells no newspapers and they do not want to discuss it at all. These sensational headlines with which we have been greeted day after day since before the resolution was introduced have certainly created in the minds of the people across the country the impression that this issue was on the floor of the House of Commons long before it was in fact presented to the house.

I think that if Canadians are tired of the debate on this issue they are even more tired of this government—this dismal, abject failure of a government. To quote the words of Peter Newman it is a quiet, grey failure of a government which has fumbled and failed to bring to a conclusion every policy it has introduced in this house. It has failed to come to grips with the economic problems of this country, and it is really the economic problems which are paramount. In fact, the government is trying to cover up the real difficulties with this issue. I remember, when we were the government, how they ridiculed almost every measure we brought forward, but it is strange today that those measures which we introduced have now become law in this country without change. Indeed, they have been carried on very proudly by some members of the present government.

When the present government's minister of finance presented the three budgets, which met with some considerable agitation, certainly the image of decisiveness disappeared and, I might add, never returned. I am sure members will recall how the present government boasted that it would improve our relations with the United States. I recall reading a comment in a New York newspaper to the effect that if the Pearson government is a friend of the United States, who needs enemies. I recall how the government said it would improve relations with the provinces. We only have to think back to the measures that have been introduced respecting dominion-provincial relations to realize that—

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to a point of order. I wonder whether you would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to the resolution now before us.

Mr. Jorgenson: Of course I am happy to do so. The subamendment deals with the question of national unity, and all the things

I have mentioned are part and parcel of that subject. Can you deny that relations with provinces, including the province of Quebec, constitute a question of national unity?

I am sure that the majority of hon. members in this house are aware of the so-called quiet revolution taking place in Quebec. I do not think we need fear it. I think perhaps it is a good thing for this country, because these people are attempting to find their place in confederation and do the things necessary for them to be a part and remain a part of this country. The problems that beset the province of Quebec are largely economical and must be dealt with by economic measures. This government has failed miserably to introduce anything that could possibly be of benefit to the province of Quebec, other than by continuing the policies initiated by the former government, particularly as they relate to ARDA.

I wonder what happened to the policy in respect to two ministers of agriculture. I suggest everything that this government has done has tended to create division, including the establishment of the bilingualism and biculturalism probe. This government seems bound to aggravate and destroy the unity that existed when it came into office, and in order to cover up its failure to deal with these problems it has attempted to divert attention by proposing the two flag resolution. This government has attempted to confuse the issue, and to convince the citizens of the province of Quebec that it is doing great things for them, when in reality it is doing nothing to solve the economic problems that beset that province.

Very frequently during this debate we have heard hon. members opposite ask for cessation of the debate. They have often said, bring this to a vote and let us end it all; let the members of the House of Commons decide this issue. They make these statements as though such a decision would really solve anything. surely those members are not so naïve as to think that if a vote was taken in this house it would end the problem. Certainly they should know, and would know if they had gone home over the last week end, that a vote would not solve the problem or end the debate. It would end the debate in the House of Commons, but not the debate that is taking place across this country.

Mr. Speaker, one of the best editorials I have read on this particular subject appeared in the Ottawa Journal of August 31, 1964, and I should like to put it on record. The editorial, headed "Not Speed but a Flag", reads as follows:

> The Commons is confusing the challenge the flag debate presents.
> The real task is to produce a flag that will unite a nation.
> Whether that takes a month or four months is relatively unimportant.
> An error is not less so if it is done quickly.
> Mr. Pearson speaks of a month's debate over-all; Mr. Diefenbaker speaks of three months in committee plus a final Commons debate on approval.
> We must be wary now lest we think the goal is simply to narrow that time gap. The goal is a flag that will please most Canadians.
> Mr. Diefenbaker is not resisting a short limited debate just to keep the Liberal government from doing the country's business. Last Thursday (Hansard, page 7343) he promptly supported Mr. Knowles' urging that the government devote two days a week to other business while the flag debate lasts. Mr. Favreau, for Mr. Pearson, would not accept this.
> Mr. Diefenbaker refuses to limit debate for it is the one weapon that might oblige Mr. Pearson to produce a more acceptable flag. (We've met mighty few people of any political persuasion who really like the present suggestion.)
> If Mr. Pearson came forward with a design more adequately representing the nation's wishes the opposition would vote it through to happy fulfilment in weeks, not months.
>
> The obstacle to peaceful solution is the present design, not the debate schedule.
> Whatever flag parliament eventually passes should be honoured by us all. The country's impatience is not for any new flag but a new flag it wants. Reasonable debate and the devotion of compromise can produce such a flag.
> We've had enough of Liberals saying Tories are anti-French, and Tories saying Liberals are selling out to the French.
> Let's go on with the business of the country, and finding an acceptable flag, at one and the same time—for the two can't be separated now.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 10.30?

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 9, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF BY-ELECTIONS ON NOVEMBER 9

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to inform the house that by order in council P.C. 1964-1409 of September 9, by-elections will be held to fill the vacancies in the two federal constituencies of Waterloo South, Ontario, and Westmorland, New Brunswick, on November 9, 1964.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING APPLICATION TO MENTALLY RETARDED PERSONS

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-118, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act (application to mentally retarded).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): The passage of the Juvenile Delinquents Act marked our recognition that a juvenile charged with an offence against our criminal laws should not, as well for the good of the community as for his own good, be exposed to the usual public and trial process of the criminal courts; and, if adjudged an offender, cannot comprehend and benefit by, and therefore should not undergo, the penal punishment of an adult offender.

Since the passage of the act, scientific technologies enable us to define the mental age of a person in terms of an equivalent chronological age. The purpose of this bill is simply to update the law in accord with these scientific advances and so apply the act to those mentally retarded persons who have a mental age within the age limits protected by the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

*PROSECUTIONS FOR WATER POLLUTION

Question No. 1,702—Mr. Fisher:

1. What is the chronology and what are the details, in so far as D.O.T. knows them, regarding the water pollution charge laid against captain Kurt Steinick, of a Norwegian freighter which was apparently settled when he forfeited bail by failing to appear in a Port Arthur court?
2. What authority, if any, under the Criminal Code, or under any other statutes of the federal government can be used to prosecute those who pollute navigable waters and harbours?

On June 26, 1964, at 11:45 a.m. the M.S. Katia Banck, of Helsingborg, Norway, was reported by the lakehead harbour police to have discharged oil into the waters of Port Arthur harbour. Following an investigation by a steamship inspector, an information was laid against the master, Kurt Steinick. The case came to court on June 29 but the vessel having sailed meantime, bail of $50 was forfeited.

2. Section 4 of the oil pollution prevention regulations, P.C. 1960-166, made under authority of section 495 of the Canada Shipping Act, makes it an offence for any person to discharge or allow to escape from a ship into the inland, minor or other waters of Canada any oil or oily mixture which fouls the surface of the water.

3. Yes.

4. The commissioners have the authority to establish the necessary facilities. Establishment of such facilities would however be a substantial financial undertaking. The commissioners have not yet reached the point where such expenditures are considered justifiable and within their means.

5. A number of convictions for offences have been registered under the present regulations. A proposal is now before parliament to raise the maximum fine from $500 to $5,000.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO CANADIAN WORKERS IN U.S.

Question No. 1,731—Mr. Dionne:

1. What reasons were given by the representatives of the employment security commissions of Maine and New Hampshire, which prevent an agreement being reached whereby Canadian workers in the United States might be considered eligible for benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act?
2. In the years 1962 and 1963, how many Canadians were employed on American soil in the states of Maine, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont?
3. On what basis were agreements reached with the other American states and on what dates were the various agreements signed?
4. What proposals were submitted by the Canadian government to American authorities with a view to reaching an understanding?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1. The reasons given by the employment security commission of Maine for being unwilling to enter the reciprocal arrangement were the present condition of their reserve fund, the present economy of the state, and the unevenly balanced flow of workers across the border As almost all the traffic is one way, i.e. persons returning to Canada after working in Maine, the employment security commission thought that there would be too great an increase in the cost to their unemployment insurance fund. The New Hampshire department of employment security stated that New Hampshire was not prepared to make the amendment in its law required to provide for participation in an agreement with Canada.

2. The national employment service does not have information concerning the number of Canadians that were employed on American soil in the states of Maine, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont.

3. Agreements with the other American states were reached on the basis that, so far as possible, the provisions of the reciprocal arrangement already in effect among the states themselves should be extended and applied to Canada provided, however, that it should be optional for each state whether or not to participate in the arrangement with Canada. In the United States each state operates its own unemployment insurance plan. In 1942 the government of Canada and the government of the United States entered into a master agreement in substantially the same terms as that existing among the states. The government of the United States agreed to recommend to each of the states that it carry out the provisions of that agreement with respect to Canada, but no state can be compelled to participate in the agreement if it prefers not to do so. Under this arrangement a person who is working in one of the subscribing states and who subsequently becomes unemployed in Canada may claim benefit from the state in question, through an office of the unemployment insurance commission in Canada. If he is entitled to benefit under the law of that state, the benefit payments are made to him by that state. The local office of the unemployment insurance commission in Canada where he has filed his claim certifies the facts regarding his being unemployed and available for work and forwards such certification to the liable state.

Decision of a state to participate in the agreement is notified by letter to the unemployment insurance commission of Canada either through the bureau of employment security at Washington or directly to the commission. Notices of participation by the states were received as follows: In 1943 from 29 states; between 1943 and 1952 from 14 states; and between 1952 and 1958 from 3 states; leaving four non-participating states, namely Alabama, Iowa, Maine and New Hampshire.

4. The proposals submitted to the American authorities were that the non-participating states should enter the reciprocal arrangement under the same conditions as the other 46 states which are participating in the arrangement. Such proposals were submitted for consideration on several occasions by letter, by informal discussions between Canadian and American officials, and by discussions at several formal conferences, including meetings in 1959, in 1962 and in 1963.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): A resolution from local 1231, United Steelworkers of America, Trenton, Nova Scotia, has been received by the Department of Transport. The contents of the resolution have been studied by the department but this study failed to establish a clear operational requirement for the improvements included. Questions

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): 1, 2 and 3.

When would-be licencees first approach the Department of Transport, either informally or formally, it is not always possible to determine to what extent technical requirements can be satisfied so that a formal application can be passed on for consideration by the board of broadcast governors. Considerable technical examination and study is often necessary at this preliminary stage. For this reason it has been customary to release information on applications only at the stage when these are passed to the board of broadcast governors for consideration.

At the present time the following applications for new radio and television licences have been transmitted by the department to the board of broadcast governors but have not yet been the subject of a recommendation from that board.

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING DUCK AND GEESE CONSERVATION

Question No. 1,761—Mr. Fisher:

Has the Canadian wildlife service received a copy of the representation of Thomas O. Nelson of Fergus Falls, Minn. dated August 1, 1964 in which a plea is made for a new or extended policy on ducks and geese conservation and, if so, what analysis does the service make of Mr. Nelson's arguments and what is its judgment on their value?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yes, on August 10, 1964. Mr. Nelson's statement of the components of a migratory bird conservation policy is essentially the same as that which has been prepared by the Canadian wildlife service. Studies which are under way at the present time are expected to point to the means of putting such a policy into effect.

INSTALLATION OF PIPE ORGAN, PERFORMING ARTS CENTRE, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,765—Mr. MacEwan:

Has a brief been received by G. H. Southam, co-ordinator of the advisory committees for the proposed national centre for the performing arts from the Royal Canadian College of Organists asking that a pipe organ be installed in the new centre and, if so, has a decision been reached on the matter and, if not, when can a decision be expected?

Questions

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): A brief from the Royal Canadian College of Organists asking that a pipe organ be installed in the proposed Canadian centre for the performing arts was received by the co-ordinator for the centre on June 10. The complicated artistic and technical aspects of the matter are being studied, in co-operation with R.C.C.O. representatives, by the co-ordinator's advisory committee on music, opera and ballet, by his advisory committee on the theatre, and by the consulting architects. A decision is expected within the next two months.

CANADA-U.S. CO-OPERATION IN WILDLIFE PROTECTION

Question No. 1,778—Mr. Scott:

1. Has the Canadian government received a communication from Mr. Thomas O. Nelson, 406 South Cascade street, Fergus Falls, Minnesota relating to the need for joint action between the various Canadian governments in the fields of conservation and protection for the continent's wild fowl and, if so, what action has the government taken to deal with the particular problems raised in the said communication?

2. What action has the government taken to promote joint co-operation among the various provincial and government agencies to the end that is set out in the said letter?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. Yes, on August 10, 1964. The first step in the dealing with the particular problems raised in Mr. Nelson's letter had already been taken in 1961 when an international migratory bird committee was formed to examine these problems. The committee's first recommendations, tabled in the House of Commons on March 7, 1962, are being implemented. The work on a more comprehensive program for maintenance of waterfowl habitat management, based on further studies by this committee and the Canadian wildlife service is making a good progress.

2. There has been continuing and close co-operation between the Canadian wildlife service and the provincial game agencies with a view to solving the basic problems set out in Mr. Nelson's letter.

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the federal Minister of Agriculture and the minister of agriculture for the province of Quebec, since April, 1964, concerning the request for financial assistance for producers of maple sugar and maple syrup in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS DETAINED

Motion No. 162—Mr. Orlikow:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of a list of the names of any illegal entrants to Canada since July 1, 1963 who were detained for more than one month before being deported or charged in court and the reason for the length of this detention?

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MALAYSIA—INQUIRY AS TO COMMONWEALTH ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will give a report to the house concerning the situation in Malaysia due to the unprovoked attack on that country by Indonesia; whether the minister will let us know what request has been made by the Malaysian government for assistance from Canada and what response Canada has made to that request; and third, what aid is being given to Malaysia by other commonwealth countries.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Malaysia has taken a more serious turn within the last few days. The full consequences of the increased intervention by Indonesia are not yet clear. When the prime minister of Malaysia was here the Prime Minister and I conferred with him, with the result that, as the Prime Minister announced on the 29th of July, it was decided that a Canadian military survey group would proceed to Malaysia to determine the kind of assistance which could be provided, bearing in mind particularly the contributions which would be made by other countries. The British government itself is engaged in a similar assessment, and, as my hon. friend knows, the government of Malaysia has recently discussed with the government of the United States what assistance that country might give.

At the present time there is a Malaysian mission in Washington looking over certain possible kinds of purchases, and we anticipate that this group will be in Canada within the course of a very few days. This visit may concern a particular type of aircraft. The decision in that regard will have to be made subject to our own assessment of the situation and the wishes of the government of Malaysia. Consideration will then be given as to the means of financing these operations. The survey group which the Prime Minister announced on July 29 is expected to leave for Malaysia very shortly.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, regard being had to the naked aggression practised by Indonesia against Malaysia, has the government given reconsideration to the question of terminating once and for all assistance to Indonesia?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration. I may say that, in consultation with other countries such as Australia, we have considered the matter, but no country has decided to withdraw such assistance to Indonesia, on the theory that assistance of a non-military kind given by western countries has not traditionally borne any political motivation. However, the matter is being reviewed. In the case of Canada, part of our assistance is in respect of aid to students, some of whom are now on their way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to student exchanges; I am referring to food and other such supplies which can have the effect of indirectly rendering available, as the hon. member for Oxford has said, additional foreign exchange, which seems a form of help to Indonesia not justified regardless of the fact that restrictions are not attached to such assistance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly aware that the right hon. gentleman was not referring to technical assistance, but I am also aware that other countries have pursued the course I have indicated, and no country has yet cancelled its program. The other form of assistance provided for by Canada in the estimates for 1964-65 is wheat flour in the amount of $350,000. There has been no shipment of flour under this allocation. As I indicated a moment ago, this whole question is under consideration. I would not wish at this time, as external affairs minister, to subscribe summarily to the statement made by the right hon. gentleman a few moments ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of summarily subscribing to my suggestion. This matter has been before the minister for several weeks, and the situation has become worse and worse in relation to Malaysia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I just want to suggest to the right hon. gentleman that there ought to be occasions on orders of the day when the right hon. gentleman should consider that he has responsibilities, which I do not think he fully discharges.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I do not discharge my duties on orders of the day I can say to the minister, having regard to the way he is playing around with this problem, that he follows that course throughout.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to Malaysia. Are the press reports correct which state that the government of Malaysia is understood to have made an urgent request to Canada for military and economic aid in its struggle against Indonesia? The minister seemed to indicate that there was a time lag involved here, with some party coming up from Washington. Has there been an urgent request, and what has been Canada's response?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there is no time lag. My hon. friend is referring to a story which appeared in one of the leading Canadian newspapers this morning. There has been no request made beyond the request made by the Tunku when he was here three weeks ago. I may say that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he was in Kuala Lumpur the other day at the commonwealth economic conference, had further consultations with the government of Malaysia along the lines which were discussed between the prime minister of that country and the representatives of the government of Canada a few weeks ago.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I then direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did he at that conference give as prompt a reply in respect of aid from Canada as was apparently given by other nations of the commonwealth to Malaysia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the ministers of the government of Malaysia along exactly the lines indicated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

AGREEMENT WITH SPAIN RESPECTING PEACEFUL USE OF ATOMIC ENERGY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the agreement which has recently been signed between the governments of Canada and Spain for co-operation in the peaceful use of atomic energy. I should like to ask the minister what precautions and what iron-bound guarantees are there to ensure that the information and materials involved cannot be used for other than peaceful purposes.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This agreement, as the other eight or nine, Mr. Speaker, is subject to safeguards similar to those laid down by the international atomic energy agency, with headquarters in Vienna. Canada subscribes to such safeguards which are obligatory on both countries. In the case of this agreement Spain is obliged to maintain certain standards, and subject itself to inspections to guarantee that these safeguards are observed. The result is that such atomic installations and materials are used only for peaceful purposes.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In addition to the exchange of information, does the agreement provide for the supplying by Canada to Spain of any uranium concentrate, heavy water or other materials?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give further consideration to that question, and I will take it as notice.

CONGO—REQUEST FOR RECOGNITION OF REBEL REGIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government of Canada received any request for diplomatic recognition from the rebel regime of the eastern Congo?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker. I will take notice of that question.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

REPORTED REQUEST THAT CANADA ASSUME DEFENCE OF BRITISH CARIBBEAN POSSESSIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister?

Has the Prime Minister been consulted or is he aware of a report to the effect that Great Britain will ask Canada to undertake the defence of the British possessions in the Caribbean area? If so, what has been the reaction of the Prime Minister or of the government?

[Mr. Douglas.]

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report to which my hon. friend has referred, but to my knowledge there has certainly been no consultation between the two governments on this matter recently.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Prime Minister tell us whether this matter has been discussed during the commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference in London?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, it was not discussed then.

FINANCE

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the government received either from the United States government or the international monetary fund any representations, or has any pressure been brought to bear, to have the Canadian government revalue the Canadian dollar at a higher rate?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Finance will deal with that question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I answer as Acting Minister of Finance. The government sees no reason to change the official par value of the Canadian dollar, which it is committed and well able to maintain.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for the information, but will he say whether he has received any such representations from the United States government or other sources?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLICATIONS

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. The speech from the throne on February 18 stated:

You will be asked to consider measures to strengthen the position of periodicals published in Canada.

In view of the fact that Liberty magazine has been forced to suspend after 32 years of continuous publication in Canada, will the Prime Minister tell the house when he proposes to do something to help Canadian periodicals survive in the battle for the market with United States publications?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to think we would be able to deal with this matter during the current session.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATION OF INSANITY LAW TO CRIMINAL OFFENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice which is prompted by a speech made by the deputy attorney general of Ontario, as reported in the press. Is the government giving any consideration to introducing the principle of diminishing responsibility in the law on insanity as applied to criminal offences?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is one matter which the Department of Justice under my jurisdiction has under study at present.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING PAYMENT FOR PROPERTY PURCHASED OR EXPROPRIATED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Public Works a question which has application from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In view of complaints from property owners whose properties are purchased or expropriated in connection with building or rebuilding certain sections of the trans-Canada highway, does the federal government accept any responsibility for making certain that these property holders are treated fairly and justly, by the withholding of federal grants or through any other procedures?

Mr. G. Roy McWilliam (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the minister will be here later today and I will bring the question to his notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CIVIL DEFENCE

OTTAWA—PUBLIC REACTION TO SOUNDING OF SIRENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence but in his absence possibly I could ask it of the Prime Minister. In view of the generally indifferent reaction to the sounding of air raid sirens in Ottawa on Saturday last, has the Prime Minister considered action to make the public more fully aware of the proper response to such an alarm?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think I should remind the hon. member that the siren system that is now in effect was authorized by the previous government and was completed and became operational on November 6, 1961. Perhaps it might be useful to explain a little of what this system is and what has been done in the recent episode concerning the siren.

As hon. members know, there are 31 sirens in the Ottawa-Hull metropolitan area, and these are controlled centrally at the federal warning centre at Carp. There is one main circuit from Carp to the Bell Telephone exchange in Ottawa, and from the exchange there are circuits to individual sirens. These circuits are all leased from the Bell Telephone Company, and the federal warning officer is responsible for activating the sirens in an emergency. There are visible and audible means in the warning centre to show when the sirens have been activated.

All sirens in the metropolitan area started sounding at 14.29 hours on Saturday, September 5, 1964. They were not activated by the federal warning officer, and Bell Telephone informed the department that the sirens were activated by a short circuit in the circuit between Carp and the Bell Telephone exchange, which was caused by a cable being damaged by shotgun pellets. There was no time lost in advising the Department of National Defence and the Bell Telephone Company of what happened, and the subsequent delay in deactivating the circuits was caused by the complexity of the circuits within the Bell Telephone system, so it was not until 15.01 hours that the sirens stopped sounding.

I may also inform the house that the directorate of signals is undertaking a comprehensive investigation of the procedures to be adopted in the case of accidental soundings, with a view to reducing the time lag in deactivating the circuits. Further, I may add that in the pamphlet, "Eleven Steps to Survival" it is set out that if the sirens are sounded the first thing the public should do is turn on their radios, and if the air waves are carrying no special announcement then they can conclude it is a false alarm.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is the public going to be made fully aware of the steps that should be taken, because obviously last Saturday there were not proper steps taken by people with knowledge of what should be done.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I understand the pamphlet "Eleven Steps to Survival" was very widely circulated throughout the country, and in that particular pamphlet all the information and instructions are included.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): As a supplementary question, in view of the whole uproar caused by one shotgun blast would the minister and the government not consider some new system, as on another occasion it may not be a shotgun blast but another kind of blast that would be more dangerous to everybody and would cause more commotion. Is that going to be repaired and seen to?

Mr. Cardin: In my answer, Mr. Speaker, I stated the department was investigating the procedures to be followed, and was also investigating the whole system.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): In view of newspaper reports that at the time of the sounding of the warning sirens in Ottawa no answer could be obtained from the three telephones in the E.M.O. office because no one was on shift duty, could the minister give us any authoritative information as to how much warning the government expects to receive in the event of an invasion, in order to have a staff on duty in the emergency measures office?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that to which the hon. member refers, but I do know there was no delay from the time the people at the Carp centre became aware that the sirens were sounding until they advised both the Department of National Defence and the Bell Telephone Company. I think the time lag was something like four minutes.

Mr. Winch: There must be some misunderstanding, Mr. Speaker. My question was about the emergency measures organization office. According to the newspapers it has three phones, but no answer could be obtained from the office when the sirens went off, because apparently there was nobody on duty. If it is an emergency measures organization how come there is not 24 hour personnel on duty?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to look into that.

[Translation]

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question concerning the emergency measures organization. It seems that an attempt was made to contact radio and T.V. stations but that telephone lines were busy during several minutes. Now, if an emergency really occurred, would there not be a line available to inform all radio and television stations since they have to broadcast messages?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that I would look into that and get the information.

CANADIAN FLAG

SUGGESTED MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS TO CONSIDER PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the various parties held a caucus this morning, and following the suggestion by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), is it the intention of the Prime Minister to convene another meeting of the party leaders soon, in order to facilitate the conclusion of the flag debate?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, steps are being taken to invite the party leaders to a meeting without delay.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DESTROYER CONVERSION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. I would like to ask the minister whether current reports are correct, to the effect that 11 Royal Canadian Navy destroyers will be modernized. I believe the amount involved was stated as some $21 million and, if so, will this program commence at an early date? The reports refer to the conversion of 11 ships, four of the Mackenzie class and seven of the Restigouche class. Finally, could the minister inform the house whether this means that the recently initiated program covering the H.S.S. 2 helicopters, at very substantial cost, will not be carried out?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be useful if I gave the status of the destroyer conversion program. As hon. members know, in the approved program seven St. Laurent class vessels have been approved for conversion, with the installation of variable depth sonar and helicopter facilities. Three of these have been converted, two in 1963 and one in 1964. Two are currently undergoing conversion, the Saguenay and the Skeena, and two have yet to be converted, the Margaree and the Fraser. Also two ships, the Nipigon and the Annapolis, were approved for construction to the standard of the 205 class conversion. The Nipigon was completed in May, 1964 and the Annapolis is due to be completed by the end of 1964.

There are plans which have not yet been approved—and I think this more directly concerns the hon. member's question—for the remaining 11 D.D.E.'s, four Mackenzie class and seven Restigouche class. It is planned to commence conversion of them in mid-1965, with completion about mid-1969. However, I want to point out to the hon. member that departmental and treasury board approval has not yet been given.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): As a supplementary question, can the minister say whether the government will continue the policy that ships operating on the Pacific coast will be maintained and converted there?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Defence Production is not here I shall be happy to take that question as notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF FARM LOAN LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman give consideration to setting aside Thursday, or Monday at the latest, for government legislation in order to present for debate the resolution to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act, to increase the maximum amount from $7,500 to $15,000? This resolution has been on the order paper since July 13, and the increase is required by farmers at the present time so they may be able to engage in major improvements and construction works before the cold weather sets in.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposals of the government for setting aside certain days in the middle of the week for other legislative measures have already been laid before the house but they did not meet, I gather, with general acceptance.

Mr. McBain: As a supplementary question, is this another piece of legislation that is not ready for debate by parliament?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement the hon. gentleman made in Toronto over the week end I wonder if he is planning to change the regulations under all the statutes pertaining to the Department of Agriculture so that for the word "farmer" there may be substituted the words "grocery grower".

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Maybe a better title would be "minister of food".

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR INDICATION OF COUNTRIES OF ORIGIN OF LAMB IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Due to the fact that lamb prices have dropped 8 cents in the last few days, coinciding with the suspension of shipments to the United States by normal suppliers, can the minister give us some real assurance that the Canadian market will receive consideration, at least to the extent of listing the countries of origin as set out by the dominion bureau of statistics in its livestock reports?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Lamb prices are supported under the stabilization act to the extent of almost 100 per cent and, of course, when a significant decline in lamb prices occurs the government does support this commodity.

Some time ago the hon. member asked about lamb prices and suggested they were not being quoted in the usual manner. This is not the case. They are quoted as they have always been in the market reports.

Mr. Gundlock: These prices are not quoted in relation to the country of origin, and the chief suppliers to the United States market are listed in that country. If I might quote just a few words—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would ask his question; then we will dispose of it. What is the question?

Mr. Gundlock: The suppliers to the United States voluntarily reduced their exports in the face of a reluctance on the part of that market. The question I am asking is this. Can we not have these imports listed according to the countries of origin?

Mr. Hays: It is evident that the hon. member is confused. If he will come to my office I will explain the whole thing to him.

Mr. Gundlock: On a question of privilege, may I say I am not confused at all. I should like some answer to my question concerning this lamb problem. This is a facet of the Canadian economy which is being neglected.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put his question on the order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLIDAYS FOR STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. I wonder whether the minister is in a position to tell the house anything further with respect to the question of holidays for the staff of the House of Commons, in view of the fact that our operation is becoming an all year round proposition.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker, other than to reiterate that this question is receiving active consideration at the moment, and that I hope there will be some information available shortly.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ALBERTA—PROVISION OF HOSPITAL FOR DOMICILIARY CARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. When does the government expect to reach a decision regarding the former Government House and the Wells pavilion property in Edmonton in relation to the centenary project for a provincial museum?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I was able to announce today that an agreement has been reached with the province of Alberta with respect to Government House. In effect, the federal government is returning Government House to the province, also the Wells pavilion near the university hospital, in exchange for a 150 bed domiciliary care hospital beside the Aberhart sanatorium, the cost to be shared by the federal government. This institution will be leased and operated by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Will admission to this new proposed building be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Teillet: Yes. While the province will own the building, it will be leased to the department and we shall operate it in the same way as we now operate Government House and the Wells pavilion.

HALIFAX, N.S.—TRANSFER OF HOSPITAL FROM FEDERAL CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he is in a position to advise the house whether any discussions have taken place recently with regard to the possible transfer of the Camp Hill veterans hospital at Halifax to other authorities?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICES FOR WHEAT AND COARSE GRAINS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister prepared to answer the question put to him yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar respecting payment for deliveries of grain?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. On August 31 a similar question was addressed to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce in my absence, and at that time my colleague said the wheat board had released the information to the elevator agents. I have now confirmed this. On August 27 the wheat board provided information as to prices of wheat and coarse grains to the elevator companies, and by this time all elevator agents have received the information. Accordingly, as far as I am aware, farmers can receive payment for the grain immediately they deliver it.

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): In the light of that answer may I point out that I have a letter here dated September 3 from a farmer who was unable to obtain payment. In addition I received a telephone call from Rosetown yesterday morning asking why farmers could not get payment for their wheat, and last evening I received another telephone call from a party in my constituency inquiring when he would be paid for wheat in storage in the elevator.

Mr. Sharp: These prices were approved some time ago by the government, and as far as I know the wheat board has been distributing the information as quickly as it can. I hope there will be no further delay.

Mr. Olson: I wonder whether the minister would inquire into these delays, because according to the statement he made the information was given out by the wheat board on August 27. I know that what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said is true and that at many delivery points authorization to make out the grain tickets has not been received.

Mr. Sharp: I will do so.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed from Tuesday, September 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

And the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Churchill.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): When the house rose at 10.30 last night we were dealing with the attitude of the government toward this particular legislation, and I was expressing some concern over the fact that from numerous sources we have heard the theory advanced that because they know they are faced with a majority of votes the opposition should simply offer token resistance to the motion which is now before the house and permit the issue to come to a vote. I expressed the view that though this might end the debate here in the House of Commons it would certainly not amount to a satisfactory solution as far as the Canadian people are concerned.

The Minister without Portfolio had some interesting observations to make last night on this aspect. The Prime Minister himself offered a suggestion, and it was contained as well in part of the speech made by the leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

It seems to me that with an issue of this nature, an issue that contains as much emotion as this does, there is a great deal more involved than simply allowing the question to come to a vote and letting the vote decide. What is involved here in something far deeper, namely the question of producing a flag that will be satisfactory to people all across Canada. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, there appeared on Saturday, July 11 of this year an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune which I think deals very fully with this subject, and I should like to place it on the record. It is entitled "Parliament and people" and says:

How political are Canadians?

A foreigner visiting this country must find this a perplexing question. Although the newspapers and air waves provide political news and views in abundance there is a negative undercurrent.

There is a repetitive theme that another election must be avoided at any cost.

Parliament is constantly hectored as a "do nothing" body by the commentators.

Various issues are regarded as being tiresome because they haven't been resolved.

It is difficult to determine whether such views represent the citizen at large or merely are expressions of frustration by the professional political pundits who weary of their task. One thing is certain.

If parliament approved legislation in slap-dash fashion, it would be thoroughly roasted as having abandoned its fundamental responsibility. And undoubtedly the MP's would be reminded again that their $18,000 stipends required them to be more than rubber stamps.

I wholeheartedly agree with that sentiment. The article continues:

It is one of the assets of our parliamentary system that elections can or must be called once a government has lost control or the confidence of the commons. This places a minority government in a delicate position which can only be maintained by introducing legislation deemed necessary and desirable by the other factions.

No matter what party a citizen may endorse, his first political allegiance should be given to parliament. The present government's uncertain grasp of this basic political philosophy unfortunately has obscured this for many in the conduct of the flag debates. Pushing the flag bill to an extremity and with indecent haste, the government attempts to cover its own ineptitude by charging its opponents with obstructionism.

This charge appeals to those who like quick uncomplicated decisions. The assumption, however, that parliament is supposed to present only token resistance to a government has no validity in our political system.

Then it goes on to say:

Even though the flag bill couldn't rate any better than priority No. 10,000 in matters that require attention—apart from Mr. Pearson's curious obsession—it certainly has become a stumbling block. The government lost its one chance of having this dealt with in relatively dispassionate terms when it renounced the free vote. Despite this gross error, compounded by the desperate two-flag and two-anthem amendments, we still must hope that parliament somehow will untangle the government without resorting to an election.

The elements of the flag dispute are too vague for articulation on the hustings. If Canadians truly are tired of it as a topic while it is in parliament, it isn't likely to strike a higher or nobler chord on the campaign trail. But despite this, those in parliament who oppose either the proposed new flag or the dragooning tactics employed by the government must, in all conscience, employ whatever restraint they can against arbitrary legislation in the interest of the public.

The people of Canada did not demand that this matter should be resolved at this time. And even most of those who approved Mr. Pearson's design hoped for something more conciliatory than his "stand or fall" ultimatum. At the present stage of this contretemps, the government and not parliament is the obstructionist.

Canadians may get tired of any government but God help us when we get tired of parliament.

I think this sums up very concisely the point of view I was attempting to express last evening. This raises the question of why all this haste has been employed in attempting to ram this legislation through the House of Commons. In the first place the Prime Minister and a number of his colleagues on the other side of the house have stated that this was a solemn commitment made to the Canadian people. I can think of a good many other commitments that were a great deal more solemn than this one. I will not go into detail or try to enumerate them, because hon. members opposite have been reminded of them on several occasions.

It is said that this solemn commitment was given, in effect, in reply to a question asked by a reporter at a press conference in Winnipeg. I rather think it was more of an afterthought, or perhaps the Prime Minister at that time seized upon the opportunity to please somebody. But certainly, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to imagine that this represents a solemn commitment when it did not even appear in most of the campaign literature distributed by the Liberal party during the last election campaign.

The Minister of Transport the other day attempted to shed some light on this situation when he quoted an excerpt from a television broadcast by the present Prime Minister in 1960. He attempted to use this as an example of a solemn commitment the Prime Minister had made at that time. It might have been the statement that was made, but I wonder how it stands up in the face of the theory advanced in this house the other day by the Postmaster General, since at that time the present Prime Minister was in the opposition.

This whole affair, right from the time it was introduced at the Legion convention early in April until today, has been a story of bumbling and mismanagement on the part of this government. As a result national unity in this country has reached the lowest ebb in our history. At the present time we have this situation. We have one group of people ardently supporting the retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag, and we have another group that supports the maple leaf flag. But I think within these two extremes we have a large majority of Canadians who are sincerely hoping this parliament can produce a distinctive Canadian flag.

I think it is the responsibility of this parliament to do so. It cannot be done by simply calling for a vote on this issue, because we know what will be the result of a vote. To allow it to come to a vote would in my opinion simply be an abdication of our responsibility as an opposition. The problem of national unity would not be resolved; in fact it is my opinion that it would be complicated even further. We would have dissension from one end of this country to the other if this matter were permitted to come to a vote.

As I see it, the only solution is to follow the suggestion that was made originally by the hon. member for Edmonton West, then yesterday by the leader of the New Democratic party, and by others in this house, and refer this question to a committee for decision. Once the committee had brought in its recommendation in a spirit of compromise, the spirit with which they would begin their hearings in a sincere effort to produce a flag, I believe a flag could be produced that would be acceptable to Canadians across this country. I do not think it is possible to produce a flag that would be acceptable to everybody, but I do believe that if this procedure were followed we could produce a flag that will not carry with it all the recriminations, bitterness and hatred that has characterized this debate. I sincerely hope that the parties in this house can get together and produce that kind of flag. In my opinion it can be done.

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I must confess it is with some hesitation that I rise to take part in this debate which has been going on for quite some time, because most of the points one could dwell on have already been made very successfully by previous speakers. However, since I have been invited to voice my opinion, I shall do so this afternoon in all sincerity and I do hope that, in so doing I shall not offend anybody.

The present debate seems to be causing a great deal of confusion and concern in the minds of people, and I do not think any issue has raised such heated discussions throughout the country in the past several years. One has but to read the editorials in Canadian newspapers to realize just how strong a feeling of frustration seems to have come over public opinion as a result of this parliament's inability to reach a decision and give our country a national emblem, something which the great majority of Canadians have been asking for quite a number of years already.

Personally, when I go back to my riding for the week end, like most hon. members I am asked these questions. What is happening in Ottawa? When will we have a flag? Will you settle that question? How will you get out of that deadlock? As a member from Quebec, I must say that this debate is giving rise to strong apprehensions among the moderate element in my province and what worries our people most is the damage that some stands and some speeches can really do to Canadian unity.

I know that national unity has become a rather trite expression and that a lot of people are tired of that old cliché but just the same, whether we want it or not, national unity remains the backbone of our development and an absolute necessity in a country like ours.

Mr. Speaker, I know that during this debate, in speeches from all sides of the house, appeals have been made for national unity, many professions of faith have been made in favour of national unity, so much so that I wonder if those professions of faith and statements of love are not in fact stifling national unity.

This reminds me of a historical incident which happened in 1862. While Paris was besieged and the city was in dire poverty, famine drove people to eat dogs, cats and other animals of that kind. Now, there was a poor man of Paris named Chavette who had a dog called Médor, his only faithful friend. The time came when Chavette had to eat his friend Médor. While eating his dog, he would place each bone in Médor's plate and when he was finished, looking at the dog's plate, he said: It is too bad that Médor is not here; it would have such a good meal.

The same attitude is taken with respect to national unity. While paying lip service to national unity we let it crumble, and the day may come if the situation deteriorates, when all that will be left will be the skeleton of national unity, and then we shall say: Poor national unity; we would have been so pleased to re-examine it.

Mr. Speaker, where are we going with the situation which prevails now? Are we not running the risk of deepening a division which certainly should not exist in our country? As members of the Canadian parliament, we have a responsibility to this country which extends from sea to sea and it is our duty not to let this difficult situation get any worse.

I will not say the situation is serious because I do not want to be pessimistic. However, I must certainly acknowledge that it is complicated. If, in the province of Quebec, French Canadians are taking a stand which speaks well for the future not only of the province but of the whole of Canada, it must be said that such a reawakening is often spoiled by extremists. In fact, the efforts of the moderate elements in my province are often misunderstood by my friends from the other provinces. There have been heated exchanges between the two groups these past few years, but our politicians, our faculty members, our businessmen, our great newspapermen, etc. have also made fine efforts to bring the two elements closer together.

This debate and, especially, the present stalemate should not be allowed to place parliament and the whole country in an untenable position.

Both parties seem to have taken irreversible stands and the division is becoming more pronounced every day.

I think that both parties delude themselves.

At any rate, the supporters of the three maple leaf flag are deluding themselves with the thought that their design will be adopted without closure. In my opinion, it is a delusion. It is also a delusion for the supporters of the red ensign to believe that it can be maintained without resorting to an endless filibuster.

For my part I was ready to accept the three maple leaf design, as were thousands of Canadians. However, I must admit that the right hon. Prime Minister could not have acted more clumsily than he did in the circumstances, first of all by requesting a confidence vote on the flag issue and afterwards, in conjunction with his supporters, by making this emblem a party symbol, and, finally, by endeavouring to impose the union jack when nobody had requested it.

The supporters of the red ensign are certainly justified to express their opinion, but I do not think that exaggerated outbursts of emotions will settle anything.

Hon. members have so often used the words "great principle"; they have appealed to principle so much that I wondered whether they were not parodying that sally of Aristide Briand: "Rest on your principles, rest on them the most you can; if you rest on them long enough, they will eventually yield".

Mr. Speaker, there has been undoubtedly excesses of language, but I believe that they have gone beyond the thought of the speaker. However, this has made us realize that such a debate could carry us on delicate grounds.

Both delusions—closure and filibuster—nurtured by both parties must be dispelled in both cases: otherwise parliament as an institution will certainly be affected. A compromise must be reached by all means. Besides, compromise is the whole history of Canada. The very existence of this country is due to a compromise, and its future rests also on compromise, understanding and sacrifices accepted on both sides.

Several compromises have been put forward, but I feel that there is a very simple one which is actually recognized by almost all members. When a measure is at the same time wholeheartedly supported by the Toronto Star, Montreal's Le Devoir, the Montreal Gazette and the former premier of Ontario, Mr. Frost, it can be concluded that it is a compromise acceptable throughout the country.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of a flag with only one maple leaf, instead of the flag bearing three maple leaves which is now proposed. In my opinion, a flag with a single maple leaf would be supported by the majority of Canadians.

[Mr. Balcer.]

I do not want to propose any particular design, because I know that my friend the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) has put forward a flag designed, I must admit, by my brother-in-law.

I feel that I would put myself in a somewhat awkward situation if I were to propose the flag designed by my brother-in-law; nevertheless, I wish him good luck.

Personally, I am ready to accept a flag with a single maple leaf as the symbol of Canada.

I should like to point out that if I support the design with a single maple leaf it is not because the symbol is exclusive to Quebec but because it is a symbol of Canada as a whole. I would even go so far as saying that it is more a symbol of English Canada than it is of French Canada.

As a second flag, signifying our membership in the commonwealth, I suggest that the red ensign be substituted for the union jack. I appreciate that to suddenly abandon the red ensign would be a much too quick transition for some hon. members and that the shock would perhaps be too sudden. But why could we not adopt the red ensign instead of the union jack, since the acceptance of the union jack as a second flag is so ridiculous that the matter is not even worth discussing.

It would be tragic if, after such a long debate, we could not have a truly distinctive Canadian flag, and that is why a compromise is so essential. We should bear in mind that it is the young people of today who want a distinctive and essentially Canadian flag, the youth in every province of Canada.

I should like to point out to hon. members that they need have no fear, this is not a concession to Quebec, but a concession to the Canada of 1964.

When I go back in my riding and meet young French Canadians expressing separatist feelings, I tell them, as all hon. members do, to be a little more Canadian, in short, true Canadians.

A few weeks ago, one of them told me: "The rest of Canada is asking us to be Canadians and nothing more, to think only in terms of one Canada. Well, why do they still want to keep the union jack which is the emblem of another country?" I think it is worth while to work together in 1964 and do something that is fundamentally Canadian.

I know that it will undoubtedly call for a measure of sacrifice from some older members and that it will be with a degree of nostalgia that they will see another flag replace the red ensign. Unfortunately those are the facts of life.

As a matter of fact, it must be remembered that one day Sir Winston Churchill said: I will never preside over the dismemberment of the British empire. At that time he was wildly applauded, but times have changed. Today if those same Englishmen who applauded Churchill's patriotic speech were asked to take back India, Pakistan or Ceylon, I feel that they would be quite reluctant to do so.

In the course of the debate, several members have stressed the fact that the red ensign was the flag under which our Canadian forces fought in the last war. They were right, and their respect for it is still perfectly justified; our children and our grandchildren will also have every reason to respect it.

Mr. Speaker, I served in the Canadian navy, and let me tell you that if there was anything at that time that burned up Canadian sailors more than anything else it was to be mistaken for British sailors. What they wanted at all costs was to be recognized everywhere as Canadians, purely and simply. That is why one day, as we entered the ports of the royal navy in England, some ordinary Canadian seamen went up and painted a big red maple leaf on their ship's funnel. Those men were not French Canadians any more than they were English Canadians. They were just plain Canadian sailors who were proud to be Canadians and for whom the maple leaf was a distinctive Canadian emblem.

One of the greatest thrills we felt when Canadian ships entered an English port or joined a convoy was to hear the sailors aboard the other ships welcome us with those words: Hello Canada, because of the maple leaf on our funnels.

Mr. Speaker, this tradition, which was established in the navy during the war was maintained and was never criticized by anybody.

As far as I am concerned, at the time I was minister of transport, when colour had to be given to our coastguard, I insisted that a large red maple leaf be painted on the white funnels. Up to now, I have received no criticism at all.

Mr. Speaker, when the three maple leaf flag was introduced, I supported it without any reservation. I saw in it a factor of Canadian unity. I must say that, like many Canadians, I was disappointed by the partisanship which accompanied its introduction. Unfortunately, it has become somewhat too much the emblem of one party.

On the other hand, like many Conservatives, in the province of Quebec in particular, I must recognize that the stand of the majority of my party also disappointed me, and I need not insist further on this matter.

I am, therefore, suggesting the immediate appointment of a committee in order to determine the choice of a flag.

Personally, as I was saying a while ago, I think that a single maple leaf on that flag would be acceptable. And I suggest that we keep the red ensign as a flag commemorating our membership in the commonwealth.

However, I must say that if such a committee is appointed, I personally believe we should insist on the majority rule, provided it represents two thirds of the members of that committee. I suggest two thirds, because if one studies all the new constitutions set up over the past century, one realizes that when decisions of importance for modern and contemporary history have to be made in any of those countries, a two thirds majority is the maximum required.

It seems, therefore, that this would be reasonable in the circumstances and would provide a flag chosen by the majority.

Mr. Speaker, what I fear most about this debate is that it will result in racial strife.

Sincere Canadians want parliament to maintain its prestige, and I feel we should co-operate in building a fine Canada where it is good to live.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the compromise idea will prevail and that the house will take a decision without further delay.

As for me, I am opposed to a referendum, as I am against a general election on this kind of issue. I believe that both could result in a division within the country and could cause wrongs that would last much too long.

Undoubtedly, the flag debate has had interesting aspects, but I think that in the interest of national unity, it is time to stop paying lip service to that unity and start working towards it; let us give the country an essentially Canadian flag which will be respected from coast to coast.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I was not supposed to speak this afternoon, but following the speeches which have just been delivered I feel that we will reach an agreement. If everyone cooperates and refrains from playing on emotions, I think that we will reach the agreement so ardently desired by the Canadian people.

I do not wish to extend the debate further, but I simply want to add a few words, so that we may bring to an end that marathon debate which we have been patiently following for more than 20 days.

During the past week especially, our party has been trying by every possible means to work out an agreement. Even yesterday, we came within a hair's breadth of succeeding. However, if that has led to the suggestions made today or the agreement which we hope will soon be reached, our efforts will not have been in vain.

Mr. Speaker, we are confronted today with a contest that I would not qualify as national, but as a clash between two parties, perhaps well intended, but which are certainly too much taken by the ambition to win in turn some honours.

First of all the government presented us with a three maple leaf flag design. Everyone admits even today, even the hon. members on the government side, that if the government had handled the matter differently, if it had moved a motion to set up a committee for consideration of a flag design which would have received the approval of this parliament as a whole, the design presented then would have been undoubtedly more national in character than the one we now have before us.

Therefore, I blame a little the Liberal government which probably thought it was doing the right thing but certainly blundered in introducing a flag design the way it did. Later the government went back on its decision and rectified a little its mistake by making concessions.

Here I must commend the government for its broadmindedness when it was willing to recognize its past mistakes and to suggest to the house the establishment of a committee and a free vote on this flag business; I think those were the two stumbling blocks in the presentation of its flag.

I say that it was really accused, these days, of having introduced a Liberal flag. After all, it has almost become the general idea in the opposition in this parliament that the way of introducing it reflects too much the partisan spirit and not enough the national spirit. That is why we wish with all our hearts the national spirit to prevail in this parliament, and it is only then that we can reach a reasonable agreement.

On the other hand we note that the conservative party has reversed its policy, as was proper. Nor am I ready to blame completely the Tory party for its change of policy as a political party, two parties facing one another, one introducing its flag and the other changing its policy with another flag.

We must not forget that today, if the Conservative party just reversed their stand on the red ensign, they would not have unanimous agreement of their members any more, by the way, than the Liberals had 100 per cent agreement of their own members.

Mr. Habel: 99 per cent.

Mr. Gauthier: We saw members of both parties speak in this house against their own leader.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrbonne): Only one, and and that is why we say 99 per cent.

Mr. Gauthier: They say there was only one, but that is without counting those who will not speak up. It is for that reason that if both old line parties had held the necessary caucus in the first place, they would have reached an agreement on some design or on some criticism and we would have probably avoided this marathon. This means that this marathon was certainly brought about by failures on both sides.

From red ensign supporters, we heard pathetic speeches. I would not call them historic speeches because for us, the red ensign has no historical character, since it is only temporary.

An hon. Member: And besides, it is not patriotic.

Mr. Gauthier: The red ensign was accepted by parliament only conditionally and temporarily until there would be a really distinctive flag which would be our national flag.

Mr. Dupuis: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: When I hear the Conservatives say "We fought under that flag", I admit that they fought under the colours of that flag. But then, they must recognize that they only fought under a temporary flag.

I heard another Conservative member say: We taught our children that the red ensign is our national flag. Well, Mr. Speaker, if they did, they taught their children a lie because we in the province of Quebec taught our children the truth, namely that the red ensign, which we respect just the same, is only the temporary flag of Canada until we have our distinctive national flag. That is the truth, Mr. Speaker.

We always made it a point to teach the new generations the true meaning of our national policy. Even if it is said in this parliament that our children were taught that the red ensign is the national flag, I say and will always say that it is false, that it is a flag that was chosen to be used by our troops on the battlefields, but it is not a national flag, only a temporary one.

I heard someone else say that the three-leaved flag was commercial in design. Since the red ensign is the flag of the British merchant marine, I wonder which of the two is more commercial. How can anyone say that one is less commercial than the other?

Mr. Speaker, I refer to those few statements made by the hon. members on both sides of the house only to show that they could not have been serious when they made such claims. I fail to understand how a Conservative, regardless of whether he is a French Canadian, an English speaking Canadian or an immigrant, could seriously seek to prove to the house that the red ensign is our national flag. No one could seriously do so.

I cannot imagine either that the Conservatives are serious when they ask for a referendum on the proposed flag. Last night, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) gave us a proof that was lacking up to now. As a matter of fact, some present Conservative members have actually disavowed in 1961 what they advocate today. It means therefore that someone is playing the fool, that there are some jokers in the house. We want to put an end to this sort of thing, because I do not think any responsible member wishes to make of this house a stage for make-believe. Every Canadian feels that this monumental farce should be stopped.

It is said that the right of free speech must be respected. I agree, Mr. Speaker, but when someone has expressed his views once, even twice or three times, I feel that when he speaks for the fourth time he is abusing the right of free speech. The farmers in our ridings call that sheer foolishness and say that those who are responsible for such abuses deserve to be sent to hospital.

I think that it is time for the Liberal government to face up to its responsibilities. If we could assume the government's responsibility, we would readily do so.

It appears that the motion we intend to introduce was irregular. Now, we have to amend it before introducing it. On the other hand after consulting experienced politicians, I learned that a motion to set up a committee of the house can be introduced only by a minister, and not by a private member.

Such a motion has to be introduced by a minister and that is why I rise today to demand that the Liberal government assume its responsibilities and introduce that motion concerning the setting up of the kind of committee which was suggested yesterday, a time limit being specified for the presentation of the committee's report and for the discussion of that report.

The government may rest assured that for the sake of peace and unity in this country we will wholeheartedly support such a motion. I would even go so far as to say that if, one day, it is obliged to impose closure, we will support it in order to safeguard Canadian unity, because the more we go along the present way, the more we deepen the chasm which is dividing Canadians. We must end this division and I am sure that we shall never reach any agreement by carrying on with this marathon. As a matter of fact the events of the last few days have proved that we could go on discussing this matter for another three months without attaining any results; instead of going forward we are going backward.

We must absolutely settle this matter and the only solution, in my opinion, is the one suggested by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), speaking once more on behalf of his party, to the effect that a committee be set up to select a flag that would be approved by the majority of members. I say that the house is responsible for the choice of a distinctive national flag for Canada, and it should be done through a committee that would sit for 60 days, whose report could be discussed later for four, five or six days, that is for a determined period, when the majority could vote at last, once and for all on the distinctive national flag issue. I say a distinctive national flag, not two and not the red ensign, because I do not see why Canada, like all the other countries of the commonwealth, would not have her own distinctive national flag in the British commonwealth of nations. Can you find any other country of the commonwealth who needs two flags to indicate its participation in the commonwealth? If we are unable to fly our distinctive national flag, then we are not worthy of a flag, we do not deserve the name of Canadian nation.

We support the idea of a flag being chosen by a vote taken after six days of discussion on the report made to the house by a committee established for that purpose. I ask the ministers to introduce this motion this afternoon if possible or tomorrow at the latest so that we can put an end to this stupid marathon.

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I did not really intend to take part in the debate, as I wanted, if possible, to avoid delaying the enactment of legislation on the national flag. But, 25 years ago this year, under circumstances similar to those we have here today and just a month before the arrival of Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth at the Toronto legislature, I had the opportunity, as a French Canadian representative to rise on a motion to present Their Majesties with an address engraved on metal. At that time, after having heard various members who preceded me speak of the importance of making our Canadian children realize the significance of the British empire, and of our attachment to the commonwealth, I could not but remark that I very much deplored the fact that, in our Canadian schools we did not try to teach our children the true history of Canada, but rather the history of the British empire and that the true history of Canada should be based on the achievement of our forefathers, and the work accomplished by our fathers and grandfathers.

I added that one of the most important deficiencies on the occasion of the visit of Their Majesties was due to the fact that they would be welcomed in this country under various flags, as Canada did not have a distinctive national one. I mentioned that in the maritime provinces, the Scottish flag would be flown and in Quebec the tricolour as there was no provincial flag at the time, while the union jack would be hoisted in Ontario and, in the western provinces, probably the red ensign. I, incidentally, deplored the fact that, just the year before the Canadian scouts attending a jamboree in England were the only troops without a flag, some of them having adopted the union jack, while others were flying the red ensign. And, I defy the Conservatives to deny this statement.

I deplored those facts, adding that I was not making a speech on the flag with a view to the immediate adoption of a national flag, but that I wanted to express my views and launch the idea, so that I might, if the Lord does grant me a few more years, see a really distinctive flag being chosen for Canada.

Following that speech in the house, I received hundreds of letters from The Native Sons of Canada, an organization that is probably known to all members of the house. In these letters, coming from everywhere, from Halifax to Vancouver, I was asked to give a series of lectures on a national flag. I gave to all those letters the same answer, that is that I had not raised the question in view of the immediate adoption of a flag, but mainly to give rise to an idea in the public mind so that some day, we could have a really distinctive national flag.

This afternoon, the hon. member for Three Rivers was extraordinarily outspoken, in my opinion. I gather that for a member of parliament who has occupied several positions in his party it must be quite a performance to have to state in the house that he deplores the stand taken by the majority of his party's members. Therefore, I congratulate him for the courage he has shown.

I congratulate also the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul) for the speech he made a while ago and more particularly for his remarks on the position of his leader with regard to the flag issue.

Mr. Speaker, I wish with heart and hand the right hon. Leader of the Opposition would study seriously the situation in which he puts his party at the present time.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Would you congratulate the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan)?

Mr. Habel: In answer to that question I would say that even in the best of families there are black sheep.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Habel: He has a right to his opinion and he is just as stubborn as you are.

[Translation]

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition should realize that there is a limit to compromise. If, on the one hand, the Prime Minister has shown some good will in already accepting a compromise, the Leader of the Opposition ought to understand that he too is under some obligation to this country and that he is duty bound to promote national unity.

As the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) so aptly put it, let us stop referring to national unity while undermining it with fiery speeches.

Let us proceed with a serious examination of the flag issue and allow the elected representatives of the people to vote, so that this question, like the other matters concerning the Canadian people, can be settled by a majority vote in this house.

[Text]

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): A great deal has been said about this flag issue. I am one of those who have said a few words. I could point out to you, Mr. Speaker, as I did earlier in this debate, that we need only look under our desks to see the amount of literature, the number of words, the number of pages of words spoken on this subject.

As members of the official opposition we have been criticized both here in the house, and, I will admit it frankly, in other places for the attitude we have taken. We have sat in our seats and listened to the debate. We have listened to speeches made in other quarters of the house—speeches made by members opposite, by the leaders of other parties, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and by other members of the government.

Only yesterday we listened to certain arguments put forward by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), who is very seldom in his seat. Today as usual he is not in his seat. The hon. member took up a great deal of the time of this house in speaking in particular about absenteeism in reference to this debate. An hon. member who speaks about other members being absent should certainly have something to back up what he says. The hon. member for Villeneuve put this forward in the form of a challenge, and in return I would like to challenge him: If he wants to rise in his place as a member of this house and criticize other members for not being here, certainly he should be present himself at times. I could be a little more personal in this regard, Mr. Speaker, but I realize that members of this house should not adopt that attitude.

The hon. member to whom I have referred yesterday said something to the effect that French Canadians will not swallow this sort of thing. He also mentioned that a person in a particular firm in my constituency of Lethbridge indicated his preference for a certain design of flag. This person also had something to say on whether or not there should be a plebiscite, but I will not go into that matter because I realize the question has yet to be settled.

I would remind the hon. member for Villeneuve that much earlier in this debate, on one of the days when he was not present, I reminded the house that in my constituency there were many more than just 1 per cent in favour of the particular design that is before the house in the resolution put forward by the government. As a matter of fact, I pointed out that according to my information, correspondence I have received, and the newspaper polls, 8 per cent of the people in my constituency were in favour of the particular design the government has brought forth in their resolution. I would repeat, not just 1 per cent but 8 per cent of a great number of people. I also pointed out that there were more people in favour of a design containing a single maple leaf. I even mentioned the percentage, which was 16 per cent. That is twice as many people as are in favour of the design proposed by the government. Mr. Speaker, we have listened to an hon. member of this house emphasizing the absenteeism of members. I would like to repeat, by way of emphasis, that those people who speak about absenteeism should be here more often. As I mentioned earlier, we have also listened to the leaders of and spokesmen for the different parties in this house. They have spoken with complete sincerity with regard to flag designs, and so on. I heard an hon. member the other day—I think it was the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), who is not in his seat at the moment either—

Mr. Douglas: He is at the thinkers conference.

Mr. Gundlock: Well, wherever and however, he is not in his seat at the moment. If my memory is correct, that hon. member said the Canadian ensign only flew at headquarters level. According to the information I have, the Canadian ensign flew at every victory on the field, as well as at defeats; it was not just flown at headquarters. I could be wrong, Mr. Speaker, but this is the fact according to my information.

Mr. Byrne: Hon. George Hees could not then have been at any battles.

Mr. Gundlock: I hear an hon. member opposite interjecting. I would be glad to resume my seat if he would get on his feet and repeat his interjection.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I simply said that Hon. George Hees could not have been at any battles, because he said he did not see the red ensign during all his years overseas.

Mr. Gundlock: I am very glad that the hon. member has made this interjection, or asked this question, or whatever it is. According to my information, what I have said is correct. If you delve a little more deeply into history, and in particular the history of Hon. George Hees, you will find that although he may not have seen the ensign, it was there. And he does not have to apologize for his actions. I could produce many people, affidavits and letters with regard to the actions of Hon. George Hees overseas. Many, many of them were very happy to have that kind of man to lead them back when they were pinned down without an officer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gundlock: And it was on a voluntary basis. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, if you want to look through history you will find that the ensign was flying at that battle, on the field.

A great deal has been said about the recognition of Canada's flag, whether it is appropriate, whether it is legal, and all sorts of things. In this connection I should like to relate a personal experience. I was walking in front of the west block a week ago, and beside me was an American tourist. We saw the flags of the commonwealth flying in front of that building. The American tourist had no trouble recognizing Canada's flag; he was proud of it and said, "We recognize it readily and easily, and we are proud to have you as a neighbour".

I have spoken previously in this debate but I do not apologize at all for that, Mr. Speaker. I am quite proud to be a member of the Conservative party, the official opposition in this house, that is responsible for this issue being debated at the moment. We have been criticized a great deal in this connection, particularly in the house; nevertheless the attitude and the approach of this party in the debate has been to discuss certain designs and ways and means of bringing about a distinctive Canadian flag. As I said earlier, I am proud to be a member of the party which is really responsible for bringing this debate before the house and to this point today.

I should like to put on record, if I may, some words which were uttered on January 23, 1961, page 1318 of Hansard, by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner). Much has been said about this, and indeed said only yesterday by a minister of the crown, a member of the government who, I am sorry to say, is not in his place at the moment. On this occasion the hon. member for Acadia referred to this question:

> Are you in favour of a truly distinctive Canadian flag? That is the first question that should be answered. If the answer is overwhelmingly in the affirmative then the government in power should have the courage to decide on a truly distinctive flag. It could establish a committee such as the one that met in 1945-46, if it wishes. I am convinced that those who expressed themselves in the census as wanting a flag would accept the design on which the government of the day decided.

That brings up another point, Mr. Speaker, although I think the house is already aware of it. Hon. members are realizing, and have done over the last few days, that the flag design proposed by the government was not considered by the government. I am beginning to wonder whether the government had an opportunity even to discuss this particular design. I am beginning to wonder whether the government—and by the government I mean the cabinet—did have such an opportunity. I am also wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether this design was presented to the government, or if you wish the cabinet, in the same way as it might have been presented to the caucus of the government party and in the same way as it was presented to this House of Commons—"This is it; take it or leave it".

Mr. Byrne: It was not, for one thing.

Mr. Winkler: No, it was not presented; that is correct. That is what the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) said.

Mr. Byrne: Well, he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Gundlock: I did not say that it was or that it was not. I only said I was beginning to wonder. As I said earlier, I am very proud to speak today as a member of the party which has brought the debate to this point, but all I said was that I was beginning to wonder.

Mr. Byrne: Then stop wondering, because it had been discussed in caucus many times.

Mr. Gundlock: I would be glad to have any information which is available, and I will gladly give up part of my time if the hon. member wants to get up and explain—

Mr. Byrne: You might as well; you are not saying anything.

Mr. Gundlock: —and to put his remarks on record.

Mr. Byrne: They are on record.

Mr. Gundlock: Would the hon. member like to do that?

Mr. Winkler: He is afraid to.

Mr. Byrne: My remarks are on record.

Mr. Gundlock: Well, I hope your remarks are on record. I am not trying to promote any sort of controversy; I am merely saying what is sincerely and honestly in my mind, and I have said that I am wondering about certain matters. Furthermore I am wondering whether there was not a deal between the Prime Minister of Canada and the prime minister of Quebec.

Mr. Moreau: Shame.

Mr. Gundlock: If the hon. member has the information I would be glad to have it. I am saying that I am beginning to wonder, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Moreau: You are insinuating.

Mr. Gundlock: There is no insinuation whatever. I am beginning to wonder about this, and if anyone wants to put me straight I would be glad to yield the floor and have him put the facts on record.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) has just said from his seat that the hon. member is lying. The remarks previously made by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) are in direct contradiction to what the hon. member for Kootenay East is now saying. The members on this side of the house would very much appreciate it if that hon. member would get up on his feet and put on the record the remarks he has just made from his seat.

Mr. Winkler: Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis), he stated that I had inferred that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) was lying. I did not use such a term, and I have never used such a term in the house. When the hon. member was wandering, or wondering—I do not know which was the word he used—whether this matter had been discussed in caucus, I cannot say what happened in cabinet because that is beyond my province but I can certainly tell him that this matter was discussed on several occasions in caucus before presentation.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. member's explanation that he did not say that the hon. member was lying, but if the hon. member has any contribution to make, I would appreciate it if he would get to his feet before making it, so that it can be understood by members on this side. While I am on my feet I would also ask him to consider whether or not he is now saying that he is calling the hon. member for York-Humber a liar.

Mr. Byrne: Well, that does not trouble me too much. I have made a statement which is a correct statement. If it differs from the views of others then that is a matter for determination.

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe the actions of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) during the last few minutes have been clearly out of order. Citation 143 of Beauchesne states:

> Whilst a member is addressing the house, no one has a right to interrupt him by putting a question to him, or by making or demanding an explanation.

During the last few minutes the hon. member for Kootenay East has been trying to interrupt the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) by asking him questions, making explanations, and so on. Under the rules of the house and under the citation to which I have just referred no member has the right to do this except with the express consent of the member who has the floor. The citation goes on:

> A member will, at times, allow such interruptions through a sense of courtesy to another, but it is entirely at the option of the member in possession of the floor to give way or not to an immediate explanation.

The hon. member for Lethbridge did offer to give way to the hon. member for Kootenay East if he wanted to get on his feet and make a speech giving his views on some of the matters the hon. member for Lethbridge was discussing. I noticed very clearly that the member for Kootenay East did not accept that offer, and therefore I think he ought to abide by these rules and allow the hon. member for Lethbridge, who I think has the right to make his own speech, to continue his speech uninterrupted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think there is some merit in the point of order raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. One of the rules of this house is that an hon. member who is speaking has the right to make his remarks without interruption. Perhaps I should point out to the hon. member for Lethbridge that some of the interruptions which were made from the opposite side of the house may have been provoked by his insistance, or invitation, that someone should stand up and make a speech, and that he would then yield the floor. If the hon. member did yield the floor I would have some doubt as to whether he would again have leave to continue his speech.

Perhaps that hon. member will now continue.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much and hope that you will appreciate that I am a new member and probably overstep the rules. I should like to congratulate you for your forbearance, and will make a sincere attempt to comply with your ruling. What I said earlier was said sincerely and with the serious hope that I will be corrected when I need correction.

I should like to read into the record at this time a letter I received only today from an individual who I am sure is not particularly a supporter of mine. This is a very sincere letter written by a Canadian citizen who happens to be one of my constituents. With your permission I shall read this letter into the record and then make some comment in respect of one or two points contained therein. The letter is addressed to me and commences as follows:

Dear Friend and M.P.

I appreciate your letters and information you have mailed at different times. I am willing to give you my opinion on this flag business, which is being very wrongly dealt with by both parties—

I am pleased that this individual did not identify the parties to which he referred, and on that basis perhaps I could excuse my own party, although I will not attempt to do so. The letter then continues:

—and is a disgrace to have spent this whole session the way it been. But I hope this Pearson flag will not be accepted if you have to stay there till next year. The best thing that could be done now is drop the whole flag business till some future and find out if any amount of people... approve...

Then some government that thought more of the country than they did of their policies, could appoint a committee of members from all the parties to choose a new flag. A vote on this flag business will only make more trouble. The side who loses will want to spit on the flag every time they see it. If Pearson forces his three maple leaves on this country he will not get all the blame, you who allow it to happen will get your share of it. A vote on the question will be as bad as—

And the next word is not quite clear. That letter was written by a Canadian citizen in an honest attempt to criticize this house as a whole, and I think it sets out some of the thoughts of many Canadians.

In this house we have all heard a great deal of reference to this flag issue. Only a moment ago a member to my left suggested that Canadians were not doing anything about the situation. As I have said on several previous occasions—one in particular—I think Canadians are doing something about the situation. They are trying very hard to accomplish an understanding throughout this country which will lead to a distinctive Canadian flag. On an earlier occasion I put on record what I thought a distinctive Canadian flag should be. Perhaps I should repeat what I said at that time.

For a variety of worth-while reasons I think we should use the Canadian ensign as a basic design for a new distinctive flag. Perhaps we could replace the union jack, as it appears on the present ensign, with a complete ensign of reduced size. We would then have approximately three quarters of the entire flag on which could appear a three maple leaf design, or a single maple leaf design which could be red, green or any other desirable colour. Perhaps it would be well to place a sheaf of wheat emblem, or a peace pipe emblem, on the fly of the flag, as I suggested earlier. I have repeated this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, for emphasis.

Over a period of days, weeks, months and even years I have thought about the flag, and it is utterly inconceivable to consider completely abandoning the use of what I refer to as our heritage, as exemplified by our present and legal flag—and it is our legal flag in spite of what some people suggest. Those individuals need only refer to certain orders in council, or to certain portions of Hansard to realize that fact.

Many flag designs have been proposed, Mr. Speaker. I should like to quote from an editorial in the Toronto Telegram of Saturday, August 22 last which I must say, in all fairness and honesty, is not at all complimentary to one party or another. It reads as follows:

The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.

I realize it may be a little late for this sort of talk, but perhaps not.

No decision of the House of Commons, by free vote or otherwise, to strike our historic ensign and replace it with a pennant of the Prime Minister's choosing can be construed as expressing the consensus of the nation.

This brings me back to what I was saying earlier. Some members opposite took exception when I said I wondered whether the design contained in the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister was really discussed and considered by cabinet and by caucus. With all deference, I really wonder whether this took place. I have innumerable letters here—

Mr. Byrne: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gundlock: —that point out the fact—

Mr. Byrne: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton South made the assertion that I had called the hon. member for Lethbridge a liar because I said that this matter had been discussed in caucus. I have made the statement while standing in my place, that this matter was discussed in caucus. There is no longer any reason for the hon. member for Lethbridge to say that he wonders whether it was discussed in the Liberal caucus. I have stated that to be the fact and he must accept my word.

Mr. Gundlock: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, probably I should have made myself clearer. Again I have to apologize, because as a new member of the house I sometimes forget certain rules. I should have made it clear earlier that what I was wondering about was whether this matter was discussed by the cabinet and in caucus prior to the House of Commons being presented with the resolution. This is what I was trying to point out but possibly I did not make myself clear. The point I was trying to make was whether members of all parties in the house were confronted with this resolution in the same way as the cabinet and the Liberal caucus were. That is the only point I was trying to make, and I hope the hon. member appreciates that. I neglected to refer to the time. I was reading from an editorial in the Toronto Telegram which goes on to state:

> The voice of the people can be heard, on this issue, only through a national plebiscite. None would seriously suggest that all controversial issues before parliament should be resolved by plebiscite or referendum. That is not the way our system works. A government having received its mandate pushes ahead with its legislative program and stakes its life on its success or failure. But the flag issue is different.

If I may deviate for a moment, Mr. Speaker, I agree with this kind of thinking. The government did not have a mandate to bring this particular design before parliament. I challenge the members of the government or any private member opposite to point out to me where the government had a clear mandate, let alone even an implied mandate, from the people of Canada to bring in this particular flag design.

I said earlier that I have a multitude of letters. They are not only from supporters of the party to which I belong but in many cases are from supporters of the government party and in some cases from supporters of the parties to the left. I should like to compliment them at this moment, if I may. Members of the other parties in the house as well as members of the official opposition have contributed a great deal to this debate.

Mr. Byrne: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Gundlock: Certainly it is a matter of opinion; it is my opinion. I was only trying to be somewhat gracious in saying that members of every party in the house have contributed a great deal to this debate. I said earlier and I repeat by way of emphasis that I am proud to be speaking today as a member of the party that has brought the debate to this point. If it is not possible to pay a slight tribute to other parties in the house on occasion, Mr. Speaker, I will refrain from doing so in the future.

Earlier I took some exception to the remarks of a previous speaker from the party to my far left who said that nothing was being done in the country to try to solve the problem. I said earlier in the house and at great length that I thought something was being done. In particular, I referred to the fact that something was being done in the city of Lethbridge in my constituency. I asked the question whether any other city in Canada was doing the same thing. I also pointed out what the consensus was in my constituency with regard to a flag design. I referred to percentage figures. I should like to repeat what I said earlier in the house. Every two weeks during the past school summer holidays the city of Lethbridge has sent 20 high school students to Montreal and has arranged to have 20 Montreal students brought to the homes of the Lethbridge students. This exchange has been going on every two weeks all summer. My constituents have delegated me to say that they are overwhelmingly in favour of the red ensign. I would also express my opinion on certain designs that might be a compromise, but I want to challenge those who say that nothing is being done. I am particularly proud of the fact that my own city is doing something, and I doubt if there is any other city in Canada doing the same thing. This is the kind of thing that will really resolve this question, and there is more involved in this than just the flag design.

This is a question of people living together, a problem we have had since the early days of confederation. I am very proud of our confederation arrangement. It is something which is unique and something we should guard very jealously. My people in my constituency, if I have to put it that way, are working with your people and, as I have said previously, I hope when we use adjectives denoting racial origin in this house it is only in a geographical sense.

We have our differences, the same as members of any Canadian family have their differences. We have our arguments, but I have no doubt that we can work out our differences. I have always tried to defer to your rulings, Mr. Speaker. Quite frankly on this occasion I have tried to attract the attention of hon. members opposite, but I have sincerely and honestly brought these points before the house and in the summary of my speech, if it can be called that, I pointed out that I am quite sure we as Canadians will resolve the issue of a distinctive Canadian flag design.

Mr. Macaluso: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gundlock: Yes.

Mr. Macaluso: During the course of his speech the hon. member said he was wondering whether or not there had been some deal arranged between the Prime Minister and Premier Lesage of Quebec. Has he also been wondering whether a deal was arranged between the Prime Minister and Premier Stanfield of Nova Scotia and the former prime minister of Ontario, Hon. Leslie Frost, who have both said they are in favour of a distinctive flag for Canada?

Mr. Starr: That is too tricky.

Mr. Macaluso: No prompting over there.

Mr. Gundlock: I said I was wondering if there had been a deal between the Prime Minister of Canada and the prime minister of Quebec. I only wonder this because there are some things which are becoming very obvious.

Mr. Lachance: How about the question?

Mr. Macaluso: I asked the hon. member if he had been wondering whether these other two gentlemen ever made a deal with the Prime Minister?

Mr. Gundlock: The simple answer is no, I have not been wondering about that.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I usually try to make my remarks positive, but before I start the main body of my talk I have to make some small criticism of the critics. In this flag debate hon. members, with the exception of those in the Conservative party, whenever they have intervened or interjected have made personal remarks designed to destroy the character of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). I take exception to this, and I also object to interjections from hon. members opposite. I prefer that they stand and make their speeches.

This character assassination has gone on too long, and if you look behind it you can see the reason for it is very plain. To be old fashioned about it, in other words there are forces of evil at work in the world today. I am old fashioned enough to believe there is right and wrong in the world today and I am ready to take my stand on what I think is right.

We hear complaints on all sides that we do not have leadership in our country today. I am not going to say whether or not we do have, but I am inclined to believe that we do. I think the standard of public service in Canada today is as high as or higher than it has ever been. I for one am not satisfied to run down parliament, or run down the kind of men who come here. It is a dirty bird that dirties its own nest. I think there are in this house men of courage, men of vision and men of leadership. I am sorry if at any time they appear to be bound by party ties, and if this is so I am sure it is equally true on either side of the house, and in the smaller groups in the corner; but I say with all sincerity that there are dedicated men in all corners of the house.

Sometimes they are misled. Sometimes their theories of government and theories of political need are clouded, and I think that some intellectuals of our country are often responsible for this. I have just read a very meaningful essay by Mr. Scott Symons in Executive magazine. He is a man who is out of politics; he is in charge of the Canadian exhibition at the Toronto museum, and I commend his article to hon. members. He refers to English Canadians, and at the outset I would like to say I do not like using hyphenated words, but there are English Canadians the same as there are French Canadians. One would have hoped that over a period of 97 years we would have learned better, that we would have become simply Canadians, and as an English speaking Canadian and as one of Anglo-Saxon origin I bemoan this.

The other day I asked for co-operation and consent for our side of the picture. I begged that we do not take a revered symbol from our war memorials. Is this a rabid thing to ask on behalf of the widows and mothers of those who died voluntarily to keep our country free, those who died in the second world war which many of us have already forgotten? But when one refers to this some of our egghead gossips say, "You are trotting out the flag, trying to make yourself a war hero." Mr. Speaker, I was not a war hero. I was an observer most of the time. I spent five and a half years overseas away from my family, and most of the time I was not fighting. I was one of those Milton spoke about when he said, "They also serve who only stand and wait." I waited, but I was there. I also had a spot of fighting in Belgium, Holland and Germany.

I want to talk about what happened in 1940. There is something to be learned from history. In case I bore you—

An hon. Member: You do.

Mr. Bigg: —let me say there is something to be learned from history. I am not going back to the middle ages, but to 1940. What happened in 1940? Western civilization was scared to death. The Germans had 350 divisions of well armed and well trained men. What were they addicted to?—a narrow nationalism. I hope nobody in this house is devoted to narrow nationalism, either English speaking or French. All right. In 1940 we had a pitiful little army sitting at one end of the Maginot line. The Maginot line was full of people who did not believe in France, and so France fell. Around the right end of that wall, which was only half a wall, came the panzer divisions. And what happened? The pitifully small English speaking army had to run for it. And there they were on the beaches of Dunkirk. What happened then? Yes, I am speaking about the unity of Canada, and if the hon. member does not understand that I am speaking about the unity of Canada I advise him to listen for the next 35 minutes because he may learn some small thing. I believe in the unity of Canada and volunteered, myself, to help preserve that unity; and I would do it again. I am talking about the subamendment, don't you worry. All right; I am talking about leadership, which means unity. Without leadership you have no unity. They had leadership in England in those days. They had a man, King George VI. He was not only a king; he was a real man. He was not afraid to put his Christian faith above everything else. What did he do? He called a national day of prayer; and on May 26, 1940, 365,000 men without arms or anything with which to fight back were gathered on the beaches of Dunkirk. King George put his Christian faith ahead of his royalty and begged the people of England to get down on their knees and pray. And they did; and so did I.

An hon. Member: Were you scared?

Mr. Bigg: Yes, I was scared. But I was not so scared that I was not over there. Where was the hon. member who made that interruption from his seat?

An hon. Member: I was there.

Mr. Bigg: Then you do not have to ask me that question; you were scared, too. I was there. We prayed; and five days later 330,000 fighting men were safe home in England.

This I call a miracle—the miracle of Dunkirk. It came about because we had leadership in England in those days and we had faith in the three Christian crosses which are embodied in our Christian flag. And when France fell, because she did not have faith in herself, where did de Gaulle go? He went to seek the protection of the British flag. Four years later he was able to mass the forces of the free world and return to help deliver France and the rest of Europe from the terror of the nazi regime. Do not call the men who went there fools and cowards. Scared, we may have been, but not cowards—

Mr. Francis: No one has done that.

Mr. Bigg: I am telling you right now. You say you are as willing to meet me as I am to meet you. Would you like to look at Hansard. It is in Hansard. When I begged you to leave these symbols of our faith on our war memorials to the boys who cannot fight for themselves, what did you say? Only one replied, I admit. Is there anybody else who agrees with him? "We shall rub you off". Is this the way to answer an appeal for unity? "We shall rub you off"—would the gentleman like to get up and explain what he meant? I know who he is, and so do you, Mr. Speaker. The writers of Hansard had the decency to leave his name off the record and I will have the decency to leave his name off, now—"We shall rub you off". There is only one way to deal with that kind of talk. But is this not a chamber in which to discuss a subject of this kind like gentlemen? Would the hon. member like to stand on his feet and make his observations now? I am willing to yield the floor.

Mr. Francis: I have listened to a fair amount of this debate and I should like to know when any hon. member suggested that the men who fought and died had, somehow, done something cowardly. I do not think anybody said that.

Mr. Bigg: If you were attending as you should have been, you heard those inferences. You heard the fact that the Conservative party was charged with trying to make its members out as war heroes. If you did not hear that, you were not here. It is in Hansard; you must have read it if you have done your homework. I do mine.

Mr. Francis: Would the hon. member give the citation from Hansard to which he refers?

Mr. Bigg: I do not have it at hand. I have been waiting for over six weeks—

An hon. Member: What about the sub-amendment?

Mr. Bigg: I am talking now about unity in Canada, and we must have it, yet there can be no unity as long as one party is pitted against the other on an issue like this. I am asking for a proper hearing and I am complaining that when I get up to make my contribution I am told I will be rubbed off. Do members of this house think for a moment that this man is capable of rubbing me off physically? He takes the protection of this house. We are not supposed to be school boys. I am not supposed to ask him out behind the shed. Thirty years ago I might have been that foolish, but we get nowhere by fighting. I am asking for unity and leadership. I have told a little story about King George VI. Would members opposite deny that this was a proper type of leadership, or that we did not have something to cling to and fight for? Are all symbols useless? If symbols mean nothing, why are we so anxious to change them? Why must we give up our Christian crosses? The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, (Mr. Douglas) a minister of the Christian gospel, said yesterday—

Mr. Scott: What page?

Mr. Bigg: Read it. He said the cross of St. George was nothing more or less than a banner for rapine, murder and piracy. That is what he said as reported at page 7737.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Bigg: I will read it from Hansard. It is at page 7737:

> St. George's cross was first used in the crusade when the kings, barons and knights of Christendom perpetrated murder, rapine and plunder in the name of Christianity—

Mr. Scott: What is inaccurate about that?

Mr. Bigg: Is this really a fair summary of the use of the cross of St. George? Would one say that any country had an unblemished record in history? No. I suppose there have been British ships which fired on people without proper warning. There was the Boston tea party. There have been many crimes perpetrated throughout history. But is it fair to take one or two crimes out of history and say: This is a summary of British history? I was about to tell you, if you would keep your mouths shut for a few minutes and listen, that there are pages in Britain's history which are noble—that there are times when under these Christian crosses Britain lived up to its responsibilities, and lived up to them alone.

There are admirers of the great United States of America, and I am one of them. But it took them a long time to hear the bugle. In the days when England fought alone, she fought under the flag I am speaking of. All I am saying is this: Is it fair to downgrade it?

I have said before, and I say again, that I am willing to accept and will accept any flag design decided upon by a fair vote in the House of Commons, if we can get together on this issue. I beg the government to do this. I beg hon. members on that side of the house to stand up and say those symbols which we have should be torn down, if that is what they believe. You are safe over there; you can threaten to rub me out, with the protection of the house behind you.

Mr. Tardif: It isn't that important.

Mr. Bigg: Then why did you say it?

Mr. Tardif: You said it.

Mr. Bigg: Hon. members opposite know who said it. But who cares, Mr. Speaker? I am not going to name them because this is beneath contempt. But I beg them not to use that kind of talk. They ask for co-operation and unity. Is it not unity we are trying to achieve? Is it not leadership? Are they not seized with the responsibility of showing leadership in their party and in their constituencies?

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, is Sir Wilfrid Laurier a reasonable reference? I think so. The Liberals were a great party in those days, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a statesman; he believed in the unity of Canada and he believed in that unity under the British flag. Isn't that so?

Mr. Tardif: Where did he say that?

Mr. Bigg: In Hansard for 1905 at page 1423, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said haste is no virtue and he begged us to approach all problems connected with Canada, her future and unity, with kindness, forbearance, love and brotherhood. He said nothing about rubbing people out. He said, "Let us get together". This was in 1905 when he was talking about bringing into the union the new provinces being created in the Northwest Territories. They did well in 1905; they created two new provinces in the Northwest Territories. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that Saskatchewan and Alberta know nothing of this division or this talk of two races fighting each other. They know where they are, but in those provinces we have a good many other races as well; and we get along just fine because we practise what we preach.

The criticism that has come principally from the far corner of the house has been that they are the only reasonable people, the only ones who understand the problem. I warn the Liberal party to watch them. They are more clever than you think. They pretend to co-operate with you, but what do they hope to do? They hope to take over everybody in Canada who has been brainwashed with these different forms of socialism. They think the Liberals are the ones who are softened up for this sort of thing. They are getting the help of many so-called intellectuals. They have brainwashed our people. The fact that they are sincere makes no difference; the fact that they are pitifully sincere makes no difference whatsoever, because they are getting into the warp and woof of our thinking, until now it is almost sacrilege to say that socialism is not the only hope. Whom do we get this from? We get it particularly from parsons without a pulpit. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Christian religion is the highest form of ideology that we have; it is even higher than politics. This is a standard we might all remember. That is why I mentioned King George VI. This was his standard, because he thought that to serve God was to rule, and when he did not serve God he was not fit for the throne. As far as I know, he was; and as far as I know, his daughter is.

I say to those who wish to make a republic of Canada that they would do well to remember this. Do we not need an arbitrator, a referee, in this game of politics? Do we not need an umpire in this baseball game? The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) ought to know that, because he is a baseball man. You need an umpire. Freedom wears a crown. I say to the members of the Liberal party, if you do not know anything about history, and particularly Canadian history, why not sit in this chamber and listen to the flag debate?

The fourth estate have largely abandoned their stand in this connection. They are fond of calling us Pharisees here in the pit. We also get it sometimes from some members, the defunct parsons. They are good at this sort of thing. The fourth estate include themselves, I suppose, when they say we are a bunch of hypocrites. The press love it; there is nothing they like better than talking about $18,000 a year hypocrites. But this is not true. We may have Pharisees among us, and in the press gallery there may be the odd scribe, in the biblical sense. There may be those who are willing to blacken white and whiten black. Let them preach to themselves. Let them write the truth up there in the press gallery.

We had a speech from the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). To me it sounded like the bare truth. Anyway, Mr. Speaker, it went unchallenged. Was it beneath their contempt to challenge it? I think not. I admire the man who stands up and tells others the truth as he understands it. I say to hon. members opposite, have some party unity; stand behind your man and say, "This is where we stand, too". I know many of you would like to say that but you have not the courage to stand up and say, "We were not consulted". I am looking for leadership, because leadership brings unity. Without leadership we will not have unity. There are those in this house who say we have no leadership. What do you suppose they want, Mr. Speaker? They want nothing more than naked power. One of them would like to be Speaker; he wishes he had taken the job. One of them would like to be prime minister. Perhaps two or three would like to be prime minister. They say they would like to be prime minister and have the responsibility of uniting this country.

Our Prime Minister gave great hopes of this. Many of us who were here when he was chosen leader of the party had hopes of this leadership. We thought he might be another Sir Wilfrid Laurier and might take the reins and make clearcut, manly decisions and explain them to us in this house as though we were equals. The prime minister is supposed to be the first amongst equals, but that has all been changed since 1925. The Prime Minister of Canada has the sole power to dissolve parliament and appoint cabinet ministers. He has taken, in the name of a previous leader of that party, Mr. King, the supreme power in this case.

Some people tell us that what we want is good, strong leadership. This is so, Mr. Speaker; but we need good, strong leadership from a man with a conscience, a man who has courage. I want the Prime Minister to share with us this superior knowledge that he has. I represent 65,000 Canadian people, and it is my right to have questions answered in the house. I do not have my questions answered. They say to me back home, "What is the matter? Why can't you get your questions answered. What is the price of wheat going to be? What is going to be done about hog support prices?" But to this government these are things that do not count. They say we are only farmers. Now they will not even call us farmers, because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) is ready to call us grocery producers, manufacturers of vitamin pills. The attitude is, "We can ignore them; they are not farmers any more". We need the kind of leadership given by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was a great Canadian. He built Canada solidly and soundly. This is the kind of leadership we need from the prime minister of our country, whether he is a Liberal, Conservative, or whether, heaven forbid, he is a socialist, labour leader or whatever they are called. We want a prime minister who will discuss these policies with the rest of us in this house.

When I hear the hon. member for York-Humber say he was not consulted, I believe him. It has never been denied and I believe him. I believe him with all my heart. Here was a one-man truth squad. He had the courage to stand up and say: "Let the rest say what they like but I am going to tell the truth. I will put my political reputation on the line and stand the risk of being called a liar. But I am not a liar; I have told the truth". As I say, I believe him. It is this sort of man whom I would be proud to serve. One might even be tempted to join the Liberal party if there were 100 others like him. I would be proud to let him sit next to me any time, because he tells the truth, which is 90 per cent of being a good member in this house. If people cannot trust your word, then as far as I am concerned it is no use your coming here. A lie is a lie no matter how it is told. But if you tell a lie, whether it be a careless lie or any other kind of lie, at least have the moral decency to admit it. Have the courage to say that you must be wrong, or that you forgot, or that you were not in charge of the facts, and then start again. I believe in reform.

I should like to see the Liberal party as it was in the days of Laurier, when that party gave the country the leadership it needed. I do not like to see the Liberal party relying on the shaky support of the socialists, because the whole socialist philosophy is based on a false premise. They pretend that man needs no spiritual leadership. They believe that man in his own native state is some lovely co-operative creature. But I ask hon. members, what has been their experience of this in life? Is that true, or does a man need training and standards? Does he not need to stick to the rules which his father and mother taught him, to read history and to learn that the path to destruction is the path of hatred and non-co-operation? That is the cause of all misery in the world, of all hunger and of all war. Our unemployed parsons get up and talk about the love of man. But how about honouring thy father and thy mother? How about honouring the standards of our parents?

I do not say to the French speaking people of this country that they should abandon everything they believe in. I say, stand up and be proud of them, and I will be proud of you. I am proud of the great French tradition which we have. I am proud of those who fought with us to hold off the Americans and to keep this country a free country of our own. I am proud of those men who went to western Canada in their canoes and who carved out a new country. I am proud of those who set up the two new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and who told the people there to try and get along together. I remember the positive things which were done, and I say we should forget this empty, petty fighting. If I am doing any empty, petty fighting I ask hon. members to challenge me by standing on their feet. They do not have to do this today; take Hansard tomorrow and read it. If they can find one word in Hansard which can be regarded as intolerance, if there is anything but gratitude for the great co-operation of the province of Quebec, tell me. I should know whether or not French Canadians are good people, because the Van Doos were in our division and I would say that they are the finest troops in the world. And in case hon. members think I am narrow about this matter, let me say that I am proud of our Governor General, Canada's greatest living soldier. I am sincerely interested in their happiness, believe me, and I hope that some day they will have the courage to stand on their feet and offer me the same co-operation and show the same respect for the traditions of my people; the same respect for my small contribution to our country's safety and present welfare. I repeat once more, whenever I speak one word against la belle province, throw it down my throat.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, I am making a pitiful attempt to learn the French language, and I will continue to do so. I do this not as a sop to Quebec but because I admire the French language. Some of the greatest poetry and philosophy has been written in that language. I favour anything which will keep French Canadians in our country. I also favour a democratic method of getting unity, which is this: Do not hold a gun to our heads. Offer us a chance to meet you on equal ground. Let us talk it over. Let us have a parley. There is a story of the great northwest which might help to break some of the ice here. The Idaho Kid came up to Saskatchewan. He crossed over the border and Sergeant Kelly of the mounted police was sitting in a hotel. The Idaho Kid walked up to Sergeant Kelly and said: "Are you Sergeant Kelly?". Sergeant Kelly said yes. So the Idaho Kid said: "I have always wanted to shoot a mounted policeman". Then Kelly said: "Take that .45 out of my face or I'll bite the end off it", and he stood up and arrested him.

I say you will never get anywhere if you hold any kind of gun at the head of a Canadian, whether be he French Canadian, English Canadian, Ukrainian Canadian or just a straight Canadian, which I hope we all are. Do not try to bully him, because he does not bully easily. Treat him like a gentleman. Bring him into the picture. This is the place we are supposed to discuss things and make suggestions—not give ultimatums. No ultimatum ever put on the floor of this house will be received by this party. At this point I will quote Churchill, who said never, never, never give up your principles; if you are right, stick to them. If you believe in parleys instead of the "or else" approach, if you believe in co-operation and collaboration, not force, stick to your belief. He did, and if he had not, I do not know where we would be today. That is leadership. That is the kind of leadership we want.

The Germans believed in force, although I sincerely hope that today they have changed their minds. During the last war they sent out their battleship Deutschland on the north Atlantic, and that vessel came upon a little convoy of merchant ships. The Deutschland thought it was going to have a field day. But there was a captain on board a British merchant ship who thought otherwise. He turned out of the convoy and steered straight at the Deutschland, and the Deutschland spent all her time firing on this boat so that the others were able to get away. This captain did not like the "or else" ultimatum. Then there was the battle of the river Plate. The battleship Graf Spee was discovered there by three little boats; and what happened? With co-operation, skill, guts and bravery these three little boats made her scuttle herself; she could not take it. These are events which I cannot help but admire. I am sorry, but I am not ready to throw up my traditions. I think such events as this are admired by the whole world, certainly by the free world.

I ask these hon. members for co-operation, and I say this: To have unity in Canada they must not be led down the garden path by the people who want to seize their power. The New Democratic party know they cannot beat us, but they know they can beat them because they do not know where they are going.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: We know where we are going, and we are going to go there. We are going ahead toward a bigger and better united Canada, and we appeal to you people to come with us, instead of fooling around with these ideas of socialism and communism fed into you through the back door.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: Look out. I appreciate the groans, because they do not think there is any danger in this at all.

An hon. Member: What about the C.C.F.?

Mr. Bigg: The C.C.F. lacked the courage to make up their minds. But their leader has his mind made up and he will take the support which would normally come to the Liberal party, being that party of the little people. Do you remember the little people, Mr. Speaker? If you are looking after the little people I suggest you consider the wages being paid to some of the people working on this hill, and rectify that situation.

Perhaps you should give some consideration to the situation in which our native people find themselves. How far have they progressed during these 97 years of progress? What do you intend to do to help them? We gave them the right to vote in an attempt to give them self-confidence, and the self-confidence of these people must be attained before they can become good citizens. You are now attempting to take away their flag. What confidence will they have in politicians, or do you think they look at all for spiritual leadership from the British crown? I may be wrong, and you can certainly find out by talking with these people, but my understanding is that they want this treaty with the Queen to last for as long as the sun shines and the waters run. I do not think they will approve of politicians who attempt to change that treaty. What are you going to do after you remove that which is the Queen's flag in the eyes of these people?

Can you honestly suggest that you desire to retain our overseas associations; and if you do not, why are you not honest and say so? If you desire to form a republican party

I am sure some citizens in Canada will support you. If you agree with that idea you should have the courage to stand up for it. We are now experiencing an evolutionary state and indicating our belief in the advancement of political science. Where do you honestly stand in this regard?

I stand behind British tradition under the British crown. Everyone is aware that the British crown has no physical force, that it is a rubber stamp for our government; but there is a principle of fair play and justice involved. Governments quail before these standards if they are well informed, and I suggest that we take a serious look at our problems. We should seriously consider our present symbols of tradition.

I am sure some members at least on this side of the house honour the fatherland of their parents in the same way I expect hon. members opposite honour their parents' fatherland. I have never pretended that there are not basically two origins of Canadian people, and I respect both.

Perhaps if we could turn back the pages of time and start again, a completely new flag would be acceptable. I can envisage one suggestion that might be acceptable if we could go back in time. Perhaps the union jack quartered with the lily banner of France, following the lines of heraldry, would be acceptable as representing racial origin. I do not think we can go back in time and forget tradition. Certainly there is no indication of that in the tenor of this debate to date.

When members on this side of the house speak on this flag issue they do not receive the kind of encouragement I would expect from individuals who are attempting to take part in the debate in a spirit of conciliation. I agree with the principle of equal rights, but one question in this regard has never been answered: Why must we desert that which we believe in; why should there be a one-way deal?

I do not see anything in those traditions I revere which is divisive. I would be the first individual in this house to suggest that Canada is a great sovereign nation, because we are in fact a sovereign nation. The Queen does nothing more than place a legal stamp of approval on that which we wish to do. Whatever we propose she accepts. What more can we ask? We certainly need a referee to rule in respect of problems between our two originating peoples, who have not yet reached a mutual understanding in the way that Laurier envisaged. Sir Wilfrid Laurier admitted, as I think we must, that there are troubles and difficulties between our peoples. If we continue to pretend, as do our socialist friends, that we are loving brothers together, I do not think we will find a way out of our difficulty. The socialists believe that all we have to do to settle the difficulties is dissolve the two old parties. They think everyone would then be happy. I am surprised that the members on the other side of the house are not aware of that fact. Time and time again members of the small parties to my left have castigated our leaders.

I hope you will forgive me for not knowing all the well known quotations of Woodsworth, but he said in the 1930's that the Liberals say terrible things about the Conservatives, the Conservatives say terrible things about the Liberals, and we socialists agree with both sides, that neither of them is any good. Lo and behold, some of the intellectualists in this country have taken up that hue and cry. That cry has been taken up as well by certain members of the press and has become Canada's national amusement, second only to Beatlemania. We criticize your leader in exactly the same terms you use to criticize our leader. I suggest as a warning that we are playing into the hands of those little groups down to my left in the corner who wish to seize power.

Our parliamentary system was set up on the premise that we are all gentlemen and would attempt to settle our disagreements by consultation and negotiation. I suggest that when we rise in our places to curse each other we are playing into the hands of those small groups. If we play the parliamentary game properly, and I use that term in its proper sense, we would have little difficulty solving our problems.

I think there should be a general reformation so that some members of this house have liberal feelings, while others approach things conservatively. The Liberals now suggest that we make haste hastily, while the historic approach of the Conservative party has been, let us make haste slowly. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, let us be careful, because haste in itself is not good. I should like to know why there is a need for haste today in respect of this flag issue. Why must we settle the issue now in view of our past 97 years of existence without a distinctive flag? We have used the British crown as a symbol of tradition. I am not suggesting that it is universally popular or acceptable. Very few people refer to the British crown tradition as a basis of argument. Certainly that argument is not possible when we use it, and I imagine less popular when you use it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must advise the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in taking part today in this debate I should like to make reference to certain statements made in recent days, and call attention particularly to the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), as they appear at page 7643 of Hansard. That hon. member indicated his sincere belief that the government had made some concessions in respect of a free vote. He has apparently been taken in. I did not realize he was the gullible type. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has hoodwinked him by suggesting there would be a free vote and that there would not be an election as a result of the outcome of that vote.

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to refer to the acceptance of the free vote suggestion by the leader of the New Democratic party. His remarks are recorded at page 7739 of Hansard. That hon. gentleman said:

> I readily acknowledge to the Prime Minister that the government has made the major concessions, and almost the only concessions that have been made on this issue. The government has agreed to a free vote, so that an election is not hanging on the outcome.

Those two gentlemen are men of considerable experience in this house, and I should have thought they would be able to interpret the offer made by the Prime Minister with greater acumen. I ask them to qualify their belief in respect of that offer after considering the attitude taken by members on both sides of this house. In support of my feeling in this regard I refer to the whip of the Liberal party, who has concerned himself greatly with pairs. He is concerned about the absence from the house possibly for very good reasons, of members of his own party, and has put forth great efforts to cover them with pairs from this side of the house, whether from the Conservative party or some other group in the house. If the leader of the New Democratic party and the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) really believe that such a thing as a free vote will take place on this matter, why then does the Liberal whip concern himself with pairs? It is very obvious that in a vote considered to be free the necessity for pairs goes out the window. So the idea of a free vote promoted by the Prime Minister has been denied by his own party whip in seeking pairs, and I would hope that the leader of the N.D.P. and the hon. member for Port Arthur would be able to see the situation before us now more clearly.

As found on page 7739 of Hansard, the leader of the New Democratic party made something else quite clear in his speech. My interpretation of his remarks indicates to me, and I am quite sure would indicate to all members of the house upon examination, that the members of that party, since he is speaking for them as their leader, are obviously against the new flag that has been presented to the house. As I understand the situation, they have prepared an amendment embodying a flag that they think will unite Canada. However, I should like to read into the record one very worthwhile contribution that the leader of that party made to the debate yesterday in order to substantiate my argument at this time. As found on the page to which I have referred, he said:

> I think we have to begin by remembering that dealing with a flag issue is not the same as dealing with a legislative matter. If this was a matter of some important legislative significance, there are parliamentary means of bringing the matter to a decision. In respect of this question, even if we could force a decision it would be a Pyrrhic decision. A flag adopted by Canada should represent the consensus and should be launched with the general support of the vast majority of the Canadian people. It should be an instrument for forging unity rather than creating division, and no flag will accomplish that if it is conceived in controversy and born in bitterness.

I heartily endorse this statement of the leader of the New Democratic party and I call the attention of the house to the fact that any further pushing on the part of the government to try to put their flag across is a definite contradiction of these remarks which were referred to yesterday by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) as a very good contribution to the debate. The minister can check his own words. He said he was in full support of what the leader of the New Democratic party had said. Therefore he must be in full support of the idea that for the government to push this matter any further is ridiculous because bitterness is certainly evident and has been evident in the last few days.

I should also like to refer to remarks made by the Prime Minister following the vote yesterday. As found on page 7736 of Hansard, he said:

> Mr. Speaker, I can understand the right hon. gentleman's feeling of frustration, when only 44 members of his party were here; but I am at a loss to understand his irritation at being delayed from attending what he himself used to refer to ironically as an egghead conference. As a result, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to give a ruling whether there is any question of privilege whatever involved in the point the right hon. gentleman has raised.

My objection to these remarks of the Prime Minister is that they are unfair, uncalled for and false. The Prime Minister said that only 44 members of this party were here, and again I come back to the Liberal whip's efforts to find pairs for members of his party. I would also point out that having only 85 members of his party here or, to use the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), 85 members of the group he is leading, does not constitute an attendance record about which he should brag. The Prime Minister's words were uncalled for, unfair and false. There were more than 44 Conservative members here. A considerable number of Conservatives did not vote for the simple reason that they were covering members of the Liberal party who were absent. This is an arrangement made among members. I personally had made such an arrangement. At no time did I rise and announce I was paired with such and such a member because I consider this to be a useless waste of the time of the house. If I am going to co-operate with a member I will pair with him. This is a matter between the two of us and something which we will look after ourselves. The Prime Minister's reference that there were only 44 members of this party present was not in accordance with the facts. I might also say that while I have recognized a pair during the votes that have taken place in the last week or so I have made it quite clear to the member with whom I have had this arrangement that when the house does have the opportunity to vote on the flag resolution itself I have no intention of doing anything other than to vote against it.

I should also like to refer to some other remarks made during the debate and with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I might also refer to certain rulings that have been made. On page 7540 of Hansard we find this remark by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

No one can say I did not listen intently, or with courtesy and politeness, to the right hon. gentleman when he was speaking, as did my hon. friends, and I think I might be permitted to say what I have to say without these noisy interruptions.

He went on to give the house a dressing down because he considered he was being interrupted. I might also say that when I attempted to ask a question that evening the Chair ruled that fair play should be involved in the carrying on of the debate. I took it from that remark that any attempt by me to ask a question of the member speaking at the time was being very unfair. I refer again to the fact that the Speaker himself said that no one had interrupted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I call attention again to these words of the Minister of Transport:

No one can say I did not listen intently, or with courtesy and politeness—

In that regard I would refer to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition where you will find that he was interrupted on 40 occasions, 9 of the interruptions being by the Minister of Transport. I am sorry he is not in his place. He maintains he is the most courteous gentleman in the house but he has the rudest manner of any member of the house. He maintained that he listened with courtesy when the fact is that if hon. members will check the speech of the Leader of the Opposition they will find that that very minister interrupted nine times.

I would also refer to page 7539 of Hansard where certain remarks made by the Minister of Transport are found, which I maintained at that time were in direct contradiction of the contribution made by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). Before the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) leaves the house I should like to thank her for the kind invitation she extended to me a few moments ago. I know this is not in keeping with the tenor of my other remarks but I do wish to express my appreciation to her for the invitation.

To get back to the remarks made by the Minister of Transport, which I say were in direct contradiction to those made by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), I might point out that he maintained the Prime Minister made statements on "The Nation's Business" in respect to a distinctive Canadian flag, and I might also point out that in the second last full paragraph on page 7539 he said this:

When the present Prime Minister said this in 1960, it was accepted, and that position was accepted by the Liberal party, and it was the position we took at the election of 1962. It was in our literature.

Herein lies a direct contradiction, and it is very interesting to point out that each time there seems to be a difference of opinion on the Conservative side of the house the Liberals, in their ability to put across lies and propaganda, will point the finger and say, "Ah, ah, division; another follower leaving your leader." I would call to your attention the remark made by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) this afternoon, when there was a difference of opinion expressed by him with respect to the hon. member for York-Humber. Did he refer to him as a deserter of the party policy, or as deserting the ranks? No. In his opinion he was a black sheep. This is how the Liberal party refers to somebody who does not fall in line with the dictates of their leader.

Mr. Habel: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right when he says I referred to a black sheep. What I said was that in a group there was always a black sheep, but I added that it was the hon. member's privilege to stand by his convictions. That is what I said, and I do not want the hon. member to change my words.

Mr. Cowan: On a question of privilege, I would like to ask the hon. member for Cochrane if he is aware this is a free vote?

Mr. Habel: A free vote, in my opinion, is one where the hon. member has a right to vote in the same way as hon. members opposite will have the right to vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): The hon. member for Cochrane has explained his position, and I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South should now proceed with the rest of his remarks.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I would like your ruling on whether or not the term black sheep is parliamentary?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): For the benefit of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) I personally do not consider it an unparliamentary term, and I so rule.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not quite catch your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): I said I did not consider the reference to a black sheep was an unparliamentary term.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I am in full agreement with that; I was taking no exception to the use of the phrase. I might also say that if the hon. member for Cochrane had a question of privilege, we all realize each and every one of us are here as individuals and we will vote according to our conscience, provided our party dictates will permit; and I point out that very recently with respect to the legislation put forward providing for the trustees I saw fit to go my own way. I am sure all members willingly would do the same, and if such were the case the outcome of a vote on the flag, provided it were a free vote, would be anything other than what the Liberal party is planning today.

Mr. Habel: On another question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has a right to question our consciences. We will certainly vote according to our consciences.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I never—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Order. I was under the impression we were debating an amendment dealing with how the results of a plebiscite, if it were held, should be divulged. It seems to me the hon. member for Cape Breton South is straying a fairly considerable distance from that particular subject. I think the hon. member for Cochrane has a point and that there should be no reflection or imputation as to how hon. members express their opinions in regard to the matter before the house. I am speaking to the hon. member for Cape Breton South in a kindly spirit. I hope he will take it that way and will refrain from making remarks which I feel are entirely uncalled for.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling. I at no time tried to question the conscience of the hon. member for Cochrane. I would only remind him that possibly he should question his own. The ruling in reference to the subamendment is quite accurate. However, I would remind each and every member of the house that if I am going to be curtailed to speak on the subamendment only, I would suggest to the house that possibly starting with the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), and winding up as late as last evening with the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis)—

Mr. Dupuis: I talked about the referendum all the time.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on this matter I would ask the Minister without Portfolio to examine his speech and he will find it was practically all made up of quotations referring to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Dupuis: About the referendum.

Mr. MacInnis: He was quoting continually from speeches made in 1960 or 1961, prior to the flag resolution, or whatever year he chose to look up. Before the hon. member for Cochrane imagined he had a question of privilege I was pointing out that there were several contradictions made here in the house. We have heard a good, detailed explanation by the hon. member for York-Humber as to what was the stand of the Liberal party prior to the last election in reference to a distinctive Canadian flag. This was detailed and backed up by illustrations from pamphlets which he had. I might also say here that the rulings coming from the Chair seem to be awkward to understand in that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) came into the house and he had with him a brochure dealing with different flags, and the ruling was that he was not allowed to have any such thing in the house. But the Minister without Portfolio on occasion has had what he called an authentic example of the three maple leaves on one stem, and of course he has had his bumper stickers to display. At no time did the Chair rule that the hon. member should not have these in on display, while at the same time ruling that the hon. member for Edmonton West should not have with him a pamphlet showing different flags of different nationalities.

When the hon. member for York-Humber was putting forward his argument he did it with detail and with pamphlets to support his argument. Then the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) took exception. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious someone is lying. Of course it is for us to decide, for each and every one of us to decide who was lying. All I can say is that when I am confronted with the written evidence by one member, the hon. member for York-Humber, I therefore have to accept his side of the story. The Minister of Transport was not telling the truth when he said this was carried in their campaign literature. At least he did not in any way support his argument, as did the hon. member for York-Humber. So we can understand from the arguments put forward that the Minister of Transport, representing Bonavista-Twillingate, was entirely wrong in the —if I may use the term—accusation which was pointed towards the hon. member for York-Humber, which was done also this afternoon by the hon. member from Scarborough, and I might also say the yapper from Kootenay East who is no longer in his seat, who very seldom makes a contribution from his feet. He is probably now somewhere about the city saying what he said in the House of Commons, but he never gets on his feet and makes a contribution. He likes to sit there interjecting day after day after day, and when he is on his feet he is only reading something passed to him from the minister's office in order to bring certain information before the house.

As I said, the hon. member for York-Humber substantiated every argument he put forward, and at no time to my knowledge did the Liberal party put before the people of Canada anything in the way of a definite decision to bring forward a distinctive Canadian flag.

Speaking of distinctive Canadian flags, the Minister without Portfolio is here. I would very much like to find out how he can qualify a statement he made last night, and how another hon. member, I think from York North, can qualify a statement he made some time ago in this debate, and how other members of the Liberal party can substantiate their arguments in respect to a distinctive Canadian flag. Should the Minister without Portfolio be wondering just what he did say last night, I call his attention to page 7762 of Hansard where he will find these words recorded in the second column:

> Mr. Hales: What about the second flag?
> Mr. Dupuis: You should begin by settling the first problem. You are so mixed up with the first —we will speak about the second later.

Mr. Dupuis: That is right.

Mr. MacInnis: The Minister without Portfolio and the hon. member for Cochrane say: "That is right". Fine. They are proposing a distinctive Canadian flag, they say. But a distinctive Canadian flag can be distinctive only as one flag; it cannot be distinctive as two. The minister is prepared to get up and talk about a second flag, and the hon. member for Cochrane says "That is right".

Mr. Dupuis: Does the hon. member wish me to answer?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): Is the hon. member yielding the floor to the Minister without Portfolio?

Mr. MacInnis: It is apparent that I am not. I am still on my feet.

Mr. Dupuis: If the hon. member does not want to have an answer he should not ask questions.

Mr. MacInnis: I did not ask a question. I might possibly be prepared to yield the floor to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays). He seems to have something to say, though he says very little about agriculture. If he has something to say about the flag I would consider yielding to him for a few moments. It would only take a few moments for him to get his views across, if he does not know any more about the flag than he does about agriculture.

Members opposite talk about a distinctive flag. But how can anybody qualify that idea by talking about a second flag? I am sorry to see the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) about to leave, because I had a question I wished to put to him. With regard to the opening remarks made on this subject by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Addison)—I do not have the words before me, but they can be checked and if anyone wishes to raise a question of privilege he can do so—I should like to repeat much the same comment. The hon. member said when he spoke on this subject, in his introductory remarks: "The first flag I intend to speak about—". Then there is a second flag. What is distinctive about proposing that there should be two flags?

How did this situation come about? Again I am sorry the Minister of Transport is not here. It is well known that the premier of Newfoundland insisted that the union jack should be included and that it should be written into the bill. Well, there was some cloak and dagger work going on in the background, and I repeat that I think the Minister of Transport had a direct hand in preparing this legislation. I think it took him about two weeks to do it, but finally he came up with the idea that there should be a two flag resolution. Again I ask the question: What can be distinctive about something which is put forward in two parts? Nothing can be distinctive as long as it is brought before the house in a two-part resolution. The second part, in my opinion, is a dubious method of trying to put it across to the premier of Newfoundland that his wishes are being met. They are not being met and the premier stands a good chance of being the victim of a complete double cross down the line.

I hope the hon. member whom I see resuming his seat is not doing so with the intention of telling the house that he hopes to support the maple leaf flag as being one distinctive flag.

Mr. Cashin: I should like to remind the hon. member that I have already spoken on this subject, so he might refer to Hansard if he wishes to know my views.

Mr. MacInnis: If the hon. member is so keen on putting forward the idea of a three maple leaf flag I suggest he should not overlook the opportunity of speaking a second time. It will take him a lot more speeches before he can convince Mr. Smallwood in Newfoundland that he is getting what he asked for. He did not get the union jack written into the legislation as he wanted, but the Minister of Transport, with some help from other quarters, put forward this dubious method of a two part resolution as a means of satisfying him.

I should like to hear from the members representing the maritime provinces. I should like to hear the members from Halifax, Antigonish and Yarmouth stand in their places and give unqualified support to this three maple leaf design. What the Halifax members have done so far is to offer only qualified support, after they had been given prior information with respect to what the resolution would contain. Then they made statements which were, in effect, statements of qualified support for the resolution favouring the three maple leaf flag. Let them speak. After all, they have been invited by their own leader to do so. The Prime Minister wants every member to make a contribution. I ask them now to get up and express unqualified support for this three maple leaf flag. How many of them intend to do so. The hon. member for Cochrane spoke about examining one's conscience. Let them examine their consciences and see whether they can give the Prime Minister's maple leaf design the unqualified support he is trying to infer he has received. The hon. member for York-Humber made it clear that there was division in the Liberal party. I, too, made it clear when I challenged members of the government to get up and say that they, too, gave the Prime Minister's design their unqualified support. The flag proposed by the Prime Minister does not have the unqualified support of his backbenchers. It does not even have the unqualified support of his cabinet ministers.

Mr. Dupuis: Does the hon. member want me to answer him? He was asking me to stand up and answer him. If he wants an answer, let me give it.

Mr. MacInnis: I would very much like—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): The hon. member for Cape Breton South has challenged a number of members of the house to get up and make statements and I think he should probably be prepared to permit them to do so, having made that challenge.

Mr. MacInnis: I hope to be permitted to finish the remarks I was making with respect to this question. I said I challenged any cabinet minister to get up in the house and make a statement of unqualified approval for the proposed new flag. And when we come to the minister whose views were made known directly to me, I will confront him with his remarks and back my statements with witnesses who were present when he made his views known about his feelings with regard to the three maple leaf flag.

Mr. Dupuis: Name him.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not have to name him. He is perfectly capable of coming into the house and speaking for himself. Let this cabinet minister explain his position to the Prime Minister and to the house. To use the dignified expression of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Tardif), let him have the intestinal fortitude to stand up and tell the house and the Prime Minister what he told me in the presence of witnesses, namely that he does not understand the choice of the three maple leaf design and that he is also—

Mr. Dupuis: Name him.

Mr. MacInnis: Why should I?

Mr. Dupuis: Because we should like to know whom you are talking about.

Mr. MacInnis: The Minister without Portfolio wishes to find out who in his party or in his cabinet does not favour the three maple leaf flag. I suggest he should keep his ears open. It has been made quite evident to me and other members of this party that many members on the other side of the house have found themselves in a very embarrassing position, because they freely admit that correspondence they have received from their constituents proves to them without a doubt that the three maple leaf flag does not have the support of their constituents; and with regard to those members to whom I am referring, in most cases their constituents are standing firm on behalf of the red ensign. Why are not these members coming forward and making themselves heard? Why should not the members of the Liberal party stand up, at the invitation of the Prime Minister, and make quite clear to the people of this country and the members of this house just why they support the three maple leaf flag?

Mr. Habel: Then let us have a vote.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member for Cochrane stop his yapping? I have had experience with the hon. member previously, right up in his own constituency. My experience was in sitting down as a guest in his constituency, with a vacant chair that was left for him, and he did not show up. I have been in his riding, Mr. Speaker, and I might say that the reception I got was one the hon. member should have been there to get for himself.

Mr. Habel: They did not elect a new member, though.

Mr. MacInnis: Why should not these members stand up and give their reasons for supporting the three maple leaf flag? They have been invited by the Prime Minister to do so. Why should they not rise and give his design their unqualified support? I should like to hear from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). I should like to hear from the Prime Minister himself. I wonder why these hon. gentlemen permit their speeches to go out in a brochure that is spread across this country and foreign countries, because in those speeches the red ensign is designated as a distinctive Canadian flag. Speeches appear in this brochure by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of National Defence. Part of that brochure contains a card displaying the red ensign as a distinctive Canadian flag. Am I to understand that the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister are going to withdraw their speeches from that particular brochure?

The Minister without Portfolio wants people named; he wants this, he wants that. He spent 50 minutes speaking on this subject last night. I agree that there were many interjections and interruptions, but that is usual here.

Mr. Dupuis: There were 11 interruptions from you.

Mr. MacInnis: Seven?

Mr. Dupuis: Eleven.

Mr. MacInnis: Then I did very well. In view of what the Minister without Portfolio was saying, he deserved 70 interruptions, not seven.

Mr. Dupuis: Eleven.

Mr. MacInnis: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Minister without Portfolio does not stop embarrassing his own government he might not be a minister, even one without portfolio. He spoke on this subject last night for 50 minutes. I agree with him that there were many interruptions. I believe that my interruptions mainly consisted of points of order, and on one occasion I referred to a ruling the Chair made and I was quickly corrected. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, one of the points of order I wanted to raise was this. I was reminded last night by the Chair that the rules do cover this question, and nobody is allowed to refer to votes. But the surprising thing is that when the ruling was put into effect last night it only followed by a few hours the Prime Minister's reference to a vote that had taken place. Nobody saw fit to rise and point out to the Prime Minister that he was breaking the rules. However, the minute somebody on this side of the house did this, it was immediately said it was against the rules. Many rules have been broken on the other side of the house. I say to the Minister without Portfolio that although he spoke for 50 minutes on this subject last night, not one word did he say in support of the three maple leaf flag, the flag of his Prime Minister. It is true that he accepted the Prime Minister's invitation to speak on this matter, but he did not put forward anything in support of the three maple leaf flag—not one word. As was mentioned in the house last night, the chief huckster of the Liberal party in this particular matter has not had one word to say in support of this flag. Having had 50 minutes in which to promote his own little enterprise, I am surprised that he did not see fit to deal with this question. Possibly there was no profit motive to move him.

An hon. Member: You are talking about the sticker-licker.

Mr. MacInnis: That is exactly right. He sells bumper stickers, as I understand it. There was no profit motive—

Mr. Dupuis: There should be one on your mouth.

Mr. MacInnis: As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio is selling bumper stickers at a price—

Mr. Dupuis: Do you want one for your mouth?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Will you speak a little louder, Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot hear you. It is very odd, Mr. Speaker, that when there are interjections from this side of the house, the Chair is quite anxious to rise immediately at times and call us to order, as happened in the case of the Minister of Transport. I see that minister has arrived in the chamber, that man who tries to promote himself as the most polite and gracious member of the house. That is what he claims. He says, "I listened without interrupting". He says he is very gracious, and so on; but since he is here I would remind him that the last time he rose in the house and tried to promote himself as the Emily Post of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: —if he would look back just a few pages of Hansard prior to making that statement he would find out how mannerly he is. He is most rude. What he said in his own defence can be contradicted if one refers to Hansard a few pages earlier, where it will be seen that he interrupted the Leader of the Opposition on nine occasions, although he claimed he did not interrupt him at all.

I now return to the subject of the Minister without Portfolio. There was no profit motive involved, so during those 50 minutes he did not say a word in defence of the three maple leaf flag. Yet he sells bumper stickers, I understand, at a higher price than one would pay elsewhere. Therefore the profit motive moves the Minister without Portfolio. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this profit motive might easily rule him out of the position he now enjoys as Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Dupuis: You said nothing intelligent in your speech.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, assuming that we go on with this debate tomorrow, may I ask the house leader what he intends to call for Friday in the way of estimates?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, with the assumption alluded to by the hon. member, on Friday we would begin by a discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, after which we would deal with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Then if there is time left we will discuss the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 10, 1964

The house met at 2 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

AGREEMENT OF PARTY LEADERS RESPECTING COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house may be interested if I make a brief report on a meeting which was held in my office this morning of the leaders of four parties. There was one party leader missing, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), and he had indicated previously that he would not be at the meeting this morning.

Mr. Speaker, we met this morning, I think I can say for us all, very conscious of our responsibilities and very anxious to reach agreement on a way out of what I think I can call a parliamentary impasse on the flag debate, an agreement which could be conducive to a decision being reached without long delay on this matter, and with a maximum of agreement. To adapt the analogy of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, at the very friendly meeting this morning there were no bulls and no toreadors. There were not even any picadors.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Like all the best witticisms, Mr. Speaker, that one was entirely unintended.

At the meeting we discussed, as I said, a way out of our difficulty. As the house knows, agreement in principle was reached some time ago about the reference of this question to a committee; the difficulty was in reaching agreement on how the committee would operate and what would happen when its report was submitted to the house. These difficulties, Mr. Speaker, were cleared off this morning when we agreed on the following procedure.

The current flag debate should be suspended and the matter referred to a committee by a resolution which in agreed terms should be put on the order paper as soon as possible. The house leader would be willing, indeed anxious, to consult house leaders of the other parties later this afternoon on the terms of a resolution of this kind, and if agreement could be reached on those terms this afternoon and if the house were willing to give unanimous agreement later in the day, then that resolution could be disposed of by unanimous agreement with a minimum of delay and the committee could be set up and put to work at once.

The committee, as we agreed this morning, will consist of 15 members; 7 Liberals, 5 Conservatives, 1 New Democrat, 1 Social Crediter and 1 Creditiste. It was agreed that the committee would report back to the house in the normal way within six weeks.

The committee will meet—and I should emphasize this—after there has already been an exhaustive consideration of all sides of the question in the house. Perhaps it should also be pointed out that this consideration was given by the house during the time when normally there would have been a parliamentary recess. While the committee would, of course, determine its own procedure, we felt—and I think I can speak for the other leaders on this point—that there would be a better chance of reaching an agreed solution, and that is our objective, if those meetings or at least most of them could be confidential. I think that would be conducive to the most constructive kind of consideration and discussion.

When the committee's report was ready there would be another meeting of the party leaders to determine the length of time that should be devoted in the house to a discussion of that report. If the report were unanimous or virtually unanimous, as I sincerely hope it will be, then there would be no problem because the subsequent debate would, I am sure, be a very short one. If there were a strong division of opinion in the committee and a substantial and strongly held minority view, then of course there would be a problem.

So far as the government are concerned, and having regard to the long debate we have already had, we maintain both the view that a reasonable time limit would then be essential and also the hope that it could be obtained by agreement. However, Mr. Speaker, a decision on this matter is to be deferred and perhaps, as I have said, the work of the committee will make that decision not a difficult one.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the proposed committee will be successful in its work. It begins that work, I know, with the good will of all members on all sides of the house. We have had our strong differences of opinion on this flag issue. They have been sincerely held and vigorously expressed, and this is not the first time in Canadian history that differences have been strongly held and vigorously expressed over a considerable period of time. While we may have these differences, and while we may express these differences very strongly, I know, Mr. Speaker, we have no differences in our devotion and loyalty to a strong and united Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: If we are honest in our differences, as I believe we are, we have only one thought in the discussion of these differences; the unity of our country, pride in its progress and faith in its destiny.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister spoke well and effectively when he stated that strong differences of opinion make for the expression of strong opinions in parliament; and strong opinions in parliament, held conscientiously and honestly, should always receive the attention of this chamber and always will.

The Prime Minister mentioned that this is not the first time there have been lengthy debates. I think of the debates of 1910 and 1911, and again in 1912, when for weeks and months on end parliament debated. Indeed, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen received from Sir Wilfrid Laurier the highest tribute that could come from one great parliamentarian to another. Sir Wilfrid on more than one occasion spoke for Liberalism and what it stood for. He held that men should express themselves forcefully and at length. Indeed, he pointed out that the opposition in 1885, in 1896, and again in 1910, 1911 and 1912, on each and every occasion had stood firm for what it believed represented the opinion of many Canadians, and ultimately brought about in the crucible of discussion either an alternative being offered by the government, or on two occasions, election campaigns which entirely supported the opposition and the stand that it took for a long period of time.

We are not here to decide, and I hope we never will have to decide, the question on a national flag for Canada in a grand assize of the people. We took our stand. The Prime Minister has set out the agreement arrived at today. I was one who from the beginning felt—I say this in no partisan sense, having before me at all times, as has the Prime Minister, the need of preserving, maintaining and conserving unity in the country—that this was a matter that might well have come before a committee as was the case in 1945 and 1946.

I think the first hon. member to suggest a committee was the hon. member for London, on July 2. On July 22 in the course of a television appearance on "The Nation's Business" I asked the question why there should not be a committee. At that time I suggested a committee of both houses of parliament such as had been set up by Mr. King, so that in calmness and with no political bias a recommendation for a flag could be made.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle dealt with this matter at length, and I personally brought before the leaders on the 18th day of August, the suggestion of a committee. I am not going to burden the house with my notes in that regard, but on August 20 I made the suggestion of 15 members, representative of the various parties in accordance with the formula placed before the house by the Prime Minister.

But as the Prime Minister has stated, the meetings among the party leaders did not bring a solution to this problem, in that some felt that whatever recommendation was reached by such a committee should be accepted by the house with a mere token debate or, one might say, with a merely formal and controlled discussion. Our view has been consistent that such a committee should be set up. I would hope that what the Prime Minister has said will be achieved, namely that the committee will produce a recommendation for a flag on the basis of a virtually unanimous decision. After all, flags cannot be imposed.

While fighting strongly throughout for what I believe to be right, in the interests of our country my foremost consideration at all times has been to conciliate, and in what we have achieved here there has been a measure of agreement that I am sure will cause members of the house as a whole to congratulate themselves on belonging to a chamber that could bring about so complete an agreement.

I was one who believed that the committee would have to meet for some three months of discussion, because this is not something that can be brought about simply by putting a slug in a slot machine and turning out a flag or, in other words, giving a direction to a committee and achieving an instant flag.

I want to make myself perfectly clear, that so far as the Conservative members are concerned they are going into that committee entirely free to come to that conclusion which in their individual opinion is for the benefit of Canada, our first consideration. I do not like in camera meetings in general. However, in this case I am in agreement. If we have an open meeting no one can change his opinion without receiving honourable mention both in the press and over the radio. In other words, whatever position is taken by a member at the first meeting or the first time he speaks becomes a question of history and the record will speak, while you can sit down and exchange opinions, moved by patriotic purpose. I am sure that sitting together for six weeks an agreement should be reached.

Now, I want to say this. While no limitation will be placed on the committee in advance, we in this party are unchanged in our view that unless 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the committee are in agreement we could not, consistent with our consciences and our responsibilities as members, agree to accept a recommendation from the committee without full and untrammelled debate in this house. The Prime Minister said that after the committee has made its recommendation the leaders will endeavour to determine the length of time to be allotted to the debate following that recommendation. I put in this proviso, and I make this very clear, not for the purpose of holding this up in any way. Our view is that the report of a committee of parliament which does not represent virtual unanimity cannot be accepted by the opposition as the appropriate occasion to bring about a diminution, reduction or curtailment of debate.

Now, sir, the Prime Minister has stated that there was a large amount of agreement. There has been very little between us for some time except on the question of what should take place after the committee reported. We were able to resolve that and agree in principle. Mention was made of the fact that a resolution will be placed on the order paper. I have not consulted with my party in this regard, although I did consult fully in respect of the questions that were discussed at the leaders' meeting this morning, but I think I speak for them when I say that after the resolution has been prepared—and it is not a difficult resolution to prepare—I see no reason why we would not immediately give our consent to the order to set up the committee without waiting for the period set out in the rules, so the committee might be appointed at an early date.

The next question concerns what the committee might do. I feel there are many Canadians, organized groups and interested people, who would like to make representations, and I would hope that the committee, in order to operate effectively, might permit, within a set time, any organization or individual to put forward its or his views. In addition, the committee might consider whatever designs may have a general appeal as an alternative to the one presented by the government. Indeed, I think this committee, though of course it would be for the committee itself to decide, might well build on the committee reports of 1945 and 1946. There is a tremendous volume of material to be found in the records of that committee. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was a member of that committee as was the hon. member for Kootenay West, and they would be able to corroborate what I say, namely that that committee did a great amount of ground work and research which would be available to the committee we are now about to set up if there is general agreement in the house.

Personally I am very pleased at the giant step forward we have made today. I say to the Prime Minister that I was glad to hear his words when he said that a parliament in which arguments are advanced at length should not be subject to the condemnation which, too frequently and without a reading of history, has been heaped on this parliament in recent weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Parliament represents the voice of the people. No one is obstructing parliament who is speaking for a large number of Canadians who would otherwise be voiceless. No political party, however strong it is, can carry on a fight unless what it stands for is straightforward, honest and touches the heartstrings of the people. We have carried on that fight. Now we have come together on a suggestion which we on this side advanced long since. We have had our disagreements on this matter, and they were strongly felt. Now I hope all of us will close ranks and, in that committee, do honour to parliament, do honour to the members composing it, and show those who criticize us that parliament knows what its responsibilities are and that it epitomizes the finest in parliamentary government, and always will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, there will be general relief in Canada that some working agreement has been reached by the party leaders at the meeting held in the Prime Minister's office this morning. I agree with the Prime Minister that there were no bulls present. This was a steering committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Douglas: Six weeks of almost continuous debate has an enervating effect upon even the most vigorous male members of the bovine species.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will give general approval to the compromise arrangement which has been worked out and which has been placed before us by the Prime Minister. I hope it will not be spoiled by anyone trying to take credit for it, because this proposal came from many members in different parts of the house at different times, and that it will not be damaged by accusations that any party has made a retreat. I have never felt that stubbornness was a civic virtue. In any public issue a measure of compromise is necessary. Some have to make more concessions than others, and I think the greater the concession the greater the credit to those who are willing to make those concessions. Therefore I make a special appeal to the press of this country that there shall be no suggestion that any party has caved in or that anyone has beaten a retreat. Rather let it be said that all the political parties in this house have sought to find a solution in a most difficult situation, and that instead of demonstrating timidity a measure of statesmanship has been shown in reaching this agreement.

I hope the house realizes, as I am sure it does, that we are not out of the woods yet. We are in the position of a man who has signed a note for his debts, a note which will become due in six weeks' time. At that time we shall still have to face the problem which is now before us. I hope the committee will be able to find an answer. We are placing a great responsibility upon its members, because if after debating this matter off and on for some two and a half months we have not found a solution, it is evident that the committee has a formidable task ahead of it. Yet I feel confident that if they approach this task in a spirit of co-operation and with a flexibility of mind and attitude, they will find a solution. If they cannot we will still face the problem we face now. I am one of those who has suggested all along that there ought to be a limit on the debate if there is not virtually a unanimous decision, but I do not think there is any value in arguing about that at the present time, as such arguments may be totally unnecessary if the committee produces a virtually unanimous decision.

I think all of us would want to wish the committee and those appointed to it every success in their endeavours, and to assure them that when they bring back their report they will have our grateful thanks for the work they have done. I trust that the committee and the House of Commons will be able to give Canada something no other parliament has been able to give it, a national flag approved by the parliament of Canada; and I trust when that flag has been approved it will fly over a country where the people are united and strong and have a sense of national pride and national purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that not only the members of this house but the people of Canada will be grateful for the decision that was reached at the leaders' meeting this morning and which has now been announced to us. I am sure likewise that this assignment that we are giving to a committee yet to be appointed is a most grave and important responsibility so far as our nation and this parliament are concerned.

I would like to thank the Prime Minister for his concise, non-partisan, honourable statement regarding that which we had agreed upon earlier today. I think it is that spirit which he evidenced in his remarks that assures us this committee is going to be able to meet its responsibility and bring forth, not a compromise—I do not think that is really the word that should be used—but an answer to the problem which we are concerned with and which the nation expects us to solve.

Certainly we have proved today, as it has been proved many times in the history of our country, that our politicians, our men responsible for government, have been able to agree in a responsible way on a responsible decision for the good of the country. It is well that we should remind ourselves that no emblem, no flag whatever it is, will in itself establish the meaning and loyalties which a flag should carry to a nation and its people. It is only as those things which people themselves represent and stand for are known and respected, not only to their friends but to themselves, that the emblems and flag of a nation can be held in the regard and esteem that they should be. In other words it is not a flag that makes a nation; it is a nation that makes a flag, and this likewise applies to parliament. It is actions, not words, that truly prove what a nation is, and likewise this is true of its people.

We have placed a great responsibility on this committee, not only to decide what the future flag of Canada should be but also to redeem some of the public's respect that this institution has lost during the last few weeks of this debate. I do not think at this point it is necessary to remark further upon the decisions or underline our interpretations of what those decisions mean. Suffice it to say that we in this party will co-operate in every way possible to make the work of the committee constructive and responsible. We look forward with optimism to substantial agreement in the committee, and this in such a way that when its report comes back to parliament it will require only a minimum of debate. In that way we will prove that parliament can act and fulfil its responsibilities as those who elected its members expect it to act.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is with real pleasure that I heard the Prime Minister announce, awhile ago, that at last they had been able to agree on certain points this morning. It may be that my absence was beneficial to that meeting but my reason was already known since I stated, following the last meeting of the five party leaders, that I would no longer attend such meetings. It is not that we wanted to block the adoption of a flag; far from it. The stand taken by the Ralliement Creditiste is very well known to the Prime Minister, to the Leader of the Opposition and to the other party leaders. Our position is that we will not oppose the adoption of a distinctive national flag. That is our stand.

Mr. Speaker, day before yesterday my colleague from Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) suggested, in his speech, the setting-up of a 15 member committee, exactly what was proposed, a moment ago, by the leader of the official opposition.

We also asked that this committee consider the question for 60 days. This morning there was agreement on six weeks. It is even better.

This committee will be made up of seven Liberals, five Conservatives, one member of the New Democratic party, one Social Credit member and one member of the Ralliement Creditiste. I trust that each member of this parliamentary committee that we are going to establish will have at heart not the past, but the future of Canada. Consequently I would suggest that all parties avoid appointing old fogies to the committee. Let us choose young men, people who have their whole lives before them and who can contribute to the building of our country in the years to come. Thus it would be possible to get the unanimity that the Leader of the Opposition insists upon; considering all that has been said here during the past six weeks, it is obvious that there are still old-fashioned people in Canada. Unfortunately, there are people who turn their eyes to the past instead of looking toward the future.

That is why I would suggest that as many young people as possible be appointed to the committee: young Liberals, young Conservatives, a young New Democrat, a young Social Crediter and a young member of the Ralliement Creditiste. As far as our party is concerned, there is no problem; it is entirely made up of young people, and that is why we can confidently think of Canada's future.

The Leader of the Opposition said that parliament represented the voice of the people. That is precisely what we have been trying to make clear to the whole house for several weeks: parliament represents the voice of the people.

That is why when the Prime Minister decided on a free vote we stated that a free majority vote would necessarily represent the majority opinion of the Canadian people right here in parliament. Why has a free vote not been accepted? In order to prevent the majority from thrusting its opinion on the minority, but we are told, nevertheless, that parliament represents the voice of the people. Then a retreat is sounded and it is suggested once again in parliament that a committee be established. We are told: We shall see in six weeks; another meeting of party leaders will be held to decide whether the debate will be restricted or not. Then, we might find ourselves at our starting point, but I hope not.

That is why I express, once again, the wish that this committee be made up of young members who look to Canada's future, not in terms of a province or a feeling, but of a sovereign country, able to decide by itself what it must do in order to develop and to fulfil itself.

An hon. Member: That is when you are at your best.

Mr. Caouette: I understand that my hon. friend can say that I am at my best, and it is true.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that this very important issue of the national flag will be solved as soon as possible. I think that we will thus show the people as a whole that we are thinking of them and not only of quarrelling as we have been doing for several weeks in this house.

Mr. Speaker, the Ralliement Creditiste will not object to the choice of a distinctive national flag. We will support the report of the committee which will recommend a distinctive national flag, because as Canadians we want to be recognized throughout the world as Canadians with our own symbols.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to table certain correspondence, but before doing so perhaps I might be permitted to state that the house leader will get in touch with the house leaders of the other parties with a view to holding a meeting this afternoon to work on the resolution. I think I should point out at once, however, that with regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Villeneuve, out of deference to my elderly colleagues our representative will have no authority to discuss an age limit or a time limit.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TABLING OF LETTERS TO PROVINCES RESPECTING CONTRACTING-OUT ARRANGEMENTS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of letters which I wrote to the heads of the governments of the provinces on August 15, 1964 on the subject of contracting-out arrangements for conditional grants and shared cost programs. The letters submit to the provinces for their consideration proposals which emerged as a result of discussions which took place in Ottawa in June of this year pursuant to a decision of the federal-provincial conference held in Quebec city last spring.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would it not be a good idea to have those letters made an appendix to today's Hansard?

Mr. Pearson: I have no objection at all to that, Mr. Speaker. These letters would have been tabled earlier but I was hoping that in tabling them I would be able to table the replies as well. However, I have not received all the replies, so I think only the letters themselves should be tabled. They could be made an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of letters referred to above see Appendix.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. SCOTT—PRESENCE IN HOUSE DURING VOTE ON FLAG DEBATE

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the indulgence of the house on a point of personal privilege. In a story in last night's Toronto Star headed "Nine Toronto M.P.'s miss flag vote" I am listed among the group of Toronto M.P.'s who were absent on Tuesday night for the vote on the motion to adjourn the flag debate. I have in my hand Hansard for Tuesday, September 8 and on page 7736 the record shows that I was present and voted in favour of adjourning the debate.

I am quite prepared to accept responsibility in my constituency for any votes for which I am absent, but I do object to being reported absent when I am in fact in attendance in the chamber. I am satisfied that this was an inadvertent mistake by the reporter. At the same time such mistakes are damaging; and although retractions can never catch up to the original statement, I trust the newspaper in question will take some action to correct the error and the impression it conveyed to its many readers in Danforth riding.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CIRCULATION OF "HATE" LITERATURE AGAINST JEWS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice having to do with some letters I sent him which contained hate literature which is being sent out rather widely to people of the Jewish faith. The letter contains the threat of what would happen to Jewish people and altogether is a most scurrilous form of attempted blackmail.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say that this matter which has been raised by the right hon. gentleman was also raised with me this morning by other members of the house, all of whom I am sure were greatly concerned. I undertake to look into this literature and material which has been referred to me, and I shall give an answer to the house as early as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this question of hate literature and the action to be taken under the Criminal Code has been under consideration by the government for months, would the minister consider setting up a special committee of the house to look into the whole problem, to hear the law officers of the crown, and to ascertain whether action has been taken in other parts of the world without interference with freedom, to the end that the house might favour the recommendation of amendments to the Criminal Code making punishable this kind of activity which apparently is flourishing quite widely? If my information is correct, under the law as it now stands the law officers believe there is no way in which prosecution can be successfully launched against such activity.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, this is a suggestion which I should make it my duty to consider further and to discuss fully with my colleagues.

PUBLIC SERVICE

VANCOUVER—SALARIES OF CUSTOMS OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. May I ask him whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that under the new group B salary increases in the Department of National Revenue, customs appraisers grade 1, collectors grade 2, customs, excise, excise tax officers grade 1, individuals who require some ten or 15 years' training, a recent analysis has shown that in the city of Vancouver these salaries are exactly the same as those paid by the city to its garbage collectors and ditch diggers. I should like to ask the minister whether the treasury board is prepared to make some comparison of these salary ranges with those of other people doing comparable work outside the government, and then review these salaries in light of that investigation.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not been drawn to my attention before. I will look into all the points raised by the hon. member in his statement.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question. Has the minister not received a communication from A. T. Greig, president of the Vancouver branch of the customs and excise officers' association, in this connection; and does he agree with the suggestion therein that as a result of what has been pointed out about low levels of salaries for those in such exalted positions as customs appraiser 1, collector 2, customs, excise, excise tax officer 1, the morale of the civil service has hit a new low and will deteriorate further unless action is taken?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I have received such a letter. However, I will have the records checked to see whether one has been received.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): I have a supplementary question. Will the minister at the same time check into the matter of the increase in salaries for House of Commons staff, and will he also assure us that when these increases are granted they will be commensurate with the increased work that the staff is doing?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, this question was dealt with in an answer I gave some days ago, and if the hon. member will refer to that answer he will find an answer to his question.

UNITED NATIONS

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES RESPECTING PEACE KEEPING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement of the secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. U Thant, that the financial crisis as far as the peace keeping forces of the UN are concerned, is rapidly coming to a critical point, and as this relates also to the peace keeping forces in Cyprus, can the minister give us some information in respect of the first question about the over-all picture, and more specifically about what is happening in relation to the Cyprus peace keeping force?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that the secretary general is to make a report to the security council with his proposals for the United Nations peace force in Cyprus within the course of the next few days. Until that report is made I am not in a position to comment as to future intentions.

With regard to the financial situation, I fully concur in the statement made by the secretary general yesterday, speaking to the 21 member working group set up to deal with the financing of the United Nations. Canada is a member of that committee, and the government has instructed its spokesmen on that committee to take every step they can to bring about a solution. The government believes that article 19 of the charter is automatic, and that the failure of a country to extricate itself from the application of that article means that it would lose its vote at the general assembly.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Last Thursday I asked the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whether any other nations other than the United Kingdom had undertaken to provide any part of the $2 million that the secretary general has indicated is the minimum requirement to maintain the peace keeping force in Cyprus. I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs can tell us now if any other nation has undertaken to provide some of this $2 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There has been no formal announcement, but I believe one other nation is prepared to put up a portion. I am not at liberty at this moment to give the name of the country.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

[Mr. Thompson.]

In view of the fact that the Liberal government of the province of Quebec has just borrowed $100 million from the Social Credit government of British Columbia, would the Prime Minister seriously consider borrowing from Social Credit British Columbia, in order to finance the federal budget deficit?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I had not thought of it up to this moment, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

LIMIT ON DAILY KILL OF POTHEAD WHALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister given any consideration to introducing legislation which would limit the daily kill of pothead whales?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this matter has received the attention of my department. However, no consideration has been given at this time to introducing legislation which would limit the daily kill of pothead whales.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister accepted an invitation from the President of the United States to take part in a joint celebration of the ratification of the Columbia river treaty at Blaine, Washington, in the near future?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, an announcement was made on this matter yesterday evening in Washington and in Ottawa.

Mr. Herridge: Is the answer yes?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Is the answer yes? I did not hear the Prime Minister very clearly.

Mr. Pearson: Oui.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister think it appropriate to attend this joint celebration in view of the fact that this can be considered an indirect participation by the Prime Minister in the United States election, and in view of the fact that a large number of Canadians do not consider the ratification of this treaty as an occasion for celebration?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do indeed consider ratification of this treaty as an occasion for celebration; and as the two governments concerned are those of the United States and Canada I think it highly appropriate that the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the government of Canada should celebrate it jointly.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister which arises from the forthcoming meeting with President Johnson of the United States. May I ask the Prime Minister if it is correct that he is going to offer the services of Mr. Keith Davey to the President for the period of the next two months?

Mr. Pearson: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, we cannot spare him.

MALAYSIA—INQUIRY AS TO COMMONWEALTH ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question with regard to assistance to Malaysia. His answer yesterday lacked his customary clarity and lucidity, and he cast some doubt on an article appearing in the Globe and Mail, normally a reliable paper. Would the minister answer the third part of my question yesterday? What aid is being given to Malaysia by other commonwealth countries? Inadvertently he omitted to answer that question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that the Globe and Mail observes excellent standards of journalism and accuracy in its reporting. I thought I had answered my hon. friend's last question. Perhaps he will allow me to look at it to make sure.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION AND LABOUR LEGISLATION—POSSIBLE RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I direct it to him rather than having to rise two or three times to ask questions of some of the ministers around him. In view of the fact that parliament will now be able to deal with other business, will some of that other business be put on the order paper right away; and I refer specifically to the latest version of the Canada pension plan and to the proposed national labour code?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. There is a good deal of business, and important business, already on the order paper. Now that it seems probable that we will be proceeding very shortly to other items of business I think it would be desirable for me to make a statement in relation to the order of such business in the few weeks ahead, and I will be glad to do that within a day or so.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Prime Minister is yet in a position to advise what his suggestion will be to the house; whether he intends to go ahead with the urgent business that has been referred to as such or, on the other hand, does he intend to suggest a vacation, if I may call it that, for a couple of weeks, after having brought on one or two of the very important matters that we are all anxious to get cleared away?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we ought to see how we get along with our business next week, and in the light of the progress we are able to make we can then decide whether we deserve a holiday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is very clear and would almost do honour to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I ask the Prime Minister whether he has in mind at all moving a motion to provide for a couple of weeks' vacation so we can get back to our constituencies, after this important legislation to which he alludes has received the attention of the house.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this matter certainly is in the back of my mind and has been for some time—

An hon. Member: How far back?

Mr. Pearson: —but before it is moved to the front of my mind I think I ought to have and I will have discussions with my colleagues and with the representatives of the other parties.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If any consideration is given to a recess—and by "if" I mean I do not think we should have one—will the Prime Minister undertake that the Canada pension plan will at least be advanced to the point where it is referred to a committee before there is a break of any kind in our work?

An hon. Member: You have got your halo on again today.

Mr. Pearson: I will certainly give consideration to that matter, and it will be dealt with in the statement I have promised to make.

INQUIRY AS TO BUSINESS FOR TODAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the house leader, in view of the incorrect assumption made by the hon. member for Ontario last night with regard to the work that might be undertaken today, if he would record now for Hansard what we are to do immediately orders of the day are called?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure the hon. member for Ontario is just as happy as I am, and as all members are, over the incorrectness of his assumption last night that we might not be dealing with estimates today. In view of the most commendable arrangement or agreement reached by the leaders of the various parties, we will be calling the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare immediately after this question period, so the house will go into committee of supply right away. The order in which estimates will be discussed will be as announced last night, national health and welfare, mines and technical surveys and citizenship and immigration.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would the minister inform the house how soon the increases and adjustments in veterans allowances will be announced?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question last week. I have nothing further to add at this time.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MAINTAIN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is anything going to be done so far as turkey prices are concerned to prevent prices from going down farther or, better still, is anything going to be done to restore prices to an acceptable level?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, turkey prices are consistent with what they have been in the last four years. As a matter of fact they are a little higher. In the last two weeks there have been no importations of turkeys from the United States, and turkey prices are fairly firm. I will be discussing all the problems of the turkey producers with them at the Fort Garry hotel on Monday next.

NORTHERN ALBERTA—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government taken steps to alleviate the situation in northern Alberta and Saskatchewan resulting from severe rain damage to crops in addition to very low yields?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): This comes under the provincial governments. If and when they make representations to the federal government, we then consider the problem.

Mr. Bigg: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has any overture been made by the province of Alberta in this regard?

Mr. Hays: No, Mr. Speaker.

CIVIL DEFENCE

STEPS TO BE TAKEN IF ALARM SOUNDED

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Associate Minister of National Defence a question, in order to clear up an answer he gave yesterday, when he said that the first thing to do, in case of an air raid warning, was to turn on the radio. Inasmuch as following last Saturday's false alarm no radio station had received any information, and local stations could get no information from any source, can the minister throw some additional light on the question and tell us what exactly should be done in case of an air raid warning?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the pamphlet distributed by the department it is set out that when the sirens are sounded, the first thing to do is to turn on the radio. If there is absolutely nothing abnormal in the programs of the radio station, it can reasonably be concluded that the sirens were activated by a short circuit or something of that nature, and that there is really no attack.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us why this information was not immediately communicated to the radio stations?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge the official who was in charge of the station made representations to the Bell Telephone Company.

[Text]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PAYMENT OF INDEMNITY OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council; I gave him notice of this question. Has the salary increase to members of parliament, passed by parliament in 1963 and referred to by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on September 1, 1964, as reported on page 7538 of Hansard, been held back on the cheque of the Leader of the Opposition?

If so, on what authority can that increase be held back from the salary of the Leader of the Opposition?

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I would advise him that the additional part of the sessional allowance payable to the Leader of the Opposition is not being withheld. Cheques for the full sessional allowance have been sent to him. However, these cheques have not been cashed, nor have they been returned to the department.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have some other hon. members followed the same policy as the Leader of the Opposition?

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: Not so far as I know.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF NEW ANTI-SUBMARINE VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence arising out of the answer he gave yesterday regarding the possible modernization of our present anti-submarine vessels. Can the minister give the house any idea when the government may be expected to make a decision on the matter of new anti-submarine vessels, following the report which was made to the minister a short time ago?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the department has been studying this matter for some time, and has received an anti-submarine warfare report, but I would not care to name the date when a decision can be made.

Mr. MacEwan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I recall the Minister of National Defence stating that he hoped it would be late this fall. Would the minister concur in that statement?

Mr. Cardin: I would agree with the minister's statement, but just what he means by "late this fall" is open to question.

LA MACAZA, QUE.—TREATMENT OF PEACE DEMONSTRATORS BY R.C.A.F. POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to confirm or deny reports of brutal treatment of the peace demonstrators at La Macaza, Quebec, at the hands of the R.C.A.F. police?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): I would prefer to take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DRUGS

PHARMACEUTICAL ASSOCIATION REPRESENTATION ON BODIES CONSIDERING PROFESSIONAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to answer the question I asked him on Tuesday last respecting the appointment of representatives of the Canadian pharmaceutical association on committees, boards or commissions set up to consider matters directly or indirectly affecting the profession and/or the distribution of drugs to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my hon. friend. I had an answer to that question yesterday. I have not got my book with me today, but I promise to bring forward the answer tomorrow morning.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE SALE OF ELEVATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it the policy of the national harbours board to sell their grain handling facilities in Vancouver and, if so, how will this aid in the development of further grain handling facilities in that port?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I heard every word of the hon. gentleman's question except the word that really mattered.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is it the policy of the national harbours board to sell their grain handling facilities in the port of Vancouver, and how will this aid in the development of the port and the stepping up of the development of grain handling facilities there?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of any policy involved. There have been some discussions about the possible sale of one grain elevator, but since the size of the elevator will not be changed by its sale I would not think that would have any effect on the amount of grain handled.

[Mr. Cardin.]

SPEECH BY SECRETARY OF STATE RESPECTING DECENTRALIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State arising out of a news report in this morning's Gazette of a speech the minister made at the Richelieu club in Quebec city, in which he is quoted as saying that co-operative federalism "must be associated with the idea of decentralization," both fiscal and legislative. How far does the minister consider fiscal decentralization can go beyond its present stage without endangering the stability of confederation?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I did not advocate any further decentralization in that field, and I will be very glad indeed to send a copy of my speech to the hon. member.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLOCATION OF FREE TIME TO POLITICAL PARTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he can inform the house about the allocation of free political time by the C.B.C. to the various parties on those programs called "The Nation's Business" or "Les Affaires d'État". A decision has been taken in this respect, and I should like him to give, if he can, information as to how this allocation was made.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I have not been informed that a recent decision has been taken. It may be that it has. I will look into it and have an answer next week.

Mr. Olson: While the minister is looking into this matter, will he also provide the house with a copy of the formula that was used in establishing this allocation?

Mr. Lamontagne: I will be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

UNITED KINGDOM—PROTESTS AGAINST ANTI-DUMPING PRACTICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce which arises out of a speech by Edward Heath in Great Britain, in which he called on Canada to mitigate its anti-dumping laws against imports from the United Kingdom. Has the government given consideration to this suggestion? If it has made a decision, can he indicate that decision to the house?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government has been considering this question for some time, and both the Minister of Finance and I have made brief statements on the question. I would be very happy to obtain these for the hon. member.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF NATIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In view of the fact that for the last 20 years members of this party have been advocating that the government establish a national coal policy, is it the government's intention to announce a national coal policy before the end of this year?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, my estimates will be called either later today or tomorrow, and I believe that would be the appropriate time to reply to the hon. member.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING PAYMENT FOR PROPERTY PURCHASED OR EXPROPRIATED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked whether the government accepted any responsibility arising out of the purchase or expropriation of land under the Trans-Canada Highway Act. The answer is no. May I say that under the trans-Canada highway agreement the title to the right of way is held by the provinces. The costs of acquisition of the right of way are not shared by the federal government; therefore we cannot accept responsibility for the dealings between the provinces and the owners.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Supply—Health and Welfare

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

1. Departmental administration, $2,099,000.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Chairman, the Department of National Health and Welfare is asking parliament to approve expenditures of more than $1¼ billion for the year 1964-65. This represents an increase of 4.9 per cent over our budget for last year, and I think this might be an appropriate time to review some of the department's activities, past, present and future, notwithstanding the fact that for more than two days now hon. members have had an opportunity to go over some of the department's estimates while dealing with interim supply.

Before doing so, however, I should perhaps remind hon. members that as usual the total shown in the estimates does not include an appropriation for payments under the Old Age Security Act. It will be noted that the blue book shows on page 5 anticipated expenditures of another $882 million from the old age security fund. This means that altogether my department expects to spend something more than $2 billion in the current year. It means also, Mr. Chairman, that the department is busier than it has ever been in the 20 years since it was reconstituted from the old pensions and national health department.

The Chairman: Order, please; it is very difficult to hear the minister who has the floor now, particularly in view of the fact that the two ministers in front of her are speaking into the same microphone.

Mr. Favreau: I think we both should make public apologies to the minister.

Miss LaMarsh: In both its main branches, health and welfare, important strides are being taken to ensure to all Canadians the highest standards of health throughout their lives, as well as adequate protection for the years during which, for reasons of age or infirmity, they are no longer able to work.

In all our efforts to date, Mr. Chairman, we have maintained an ever closer liaison with our counterparts in the provincial government, and I am sure this co-operation will continue to grow as time goes on. This co-ordination of effort with the provinces has been aptly called "co-operative federalism" and nowhere has it been more in evidence than in the fields of health and welfare. So far during my term as minister we have had no fewer than seven meetings with provincial ministers holding one or other of these portfolios.

These conferences started with the one which was held on July 25 and July 26, 1963, at which the Canada pension plan proposals and the municipal loans legislation were studied. A further conference on September 9 and 10 of last year was called to deal with the Canada pension plan. From November 26 to November 29 a federal-provincial meeting of premiers was held at which various matters in both the health and welfare fields were discussed. Almost concurrently with these meetings we held our first conference on smoking and health.

Hon. members will also recall the Quebec meetings held at the end of March and beginning of April of this year, at which the various cost sharing programs came under close scrutiny. On May 28 and 29 another fruitful conference of ministers of welfare was held, at which careful study was given to the various public assistance programs. Finally, Mr. Chairman, I met with my provincial counterparts on the health side on July 20 and 21, and I have recently reported to the house on this.

I would not pretend for a minute, sir, that there has always been complete agreement or that the road has not had its bumps. Hon. members are well aware that the federal government has not always been able to do precisely what it originally set out to do or precisely when it intended to do it. We have sought the views of the provinces in areas of mutual concern and jurisdiction, and they have sought ours. But if there have been differences as to approach or method, there has been no difference in the ultimate objective—the highest possible standards of health and welfare for all Canadians. That will continue to be the goal; and if the same spirit of give and take which has marked our endeavours so far continues to prevail as I am sure it will, then we can all look forward to even greater accomplishments in the future.

Mr. Chairman, these 1964-65 estimates do not include provision for expenditures related to the implementation of the Canada pension plan nor to any matter arising from the tabling of the first volume of the report of the royal commission on health services. As hon. members are aware, we expect to have legislation respecting the former before the house during this present session. It remains our intention to have the plan in operation on January 1, 1966.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

A national health plan, of course, is another story. Before any legislative proposals can be made in this respect, long and careful study must be given to the report of the Hall commission. At this moment, in fact, some 14 committees in my department are engaged in a most comprehensive examination of the commission's proposals contained in the first volume.

It is expected that our own analysis should be completed in time to present the general position of the federal government to a federal-provincial conference by early next year. I intend to keep the house informed on this subject, as the proposals provide a comprehensive review of the health field, with a basic objective of providing the best possible health care for all Canadians.

I might mention in passing, sir, that in this matter, as in others involving my department in the past, we have been accused by some of moving too fast; by others, of moving too slowly. I suppose this is to be expected and I would simply like to assure hon. members that the government intends to push ahead with the greatest dispatch consistent with sound planning. Our progress may also depend on other factors, including co-operation from all hon. members on both sides of this house.

There are many other important health matters which I am sure will be raised in the discussion of the estimates of my department. For example, I place a great deal of importance on the forthcoming federal-provincial conference on mental retardation. A steering committee has just about completed arrangements for the conference, and the provinces are all co-operating most enthusiastically. It should provide an opportunity for a thorough discussion and assessment of programs for dealing with mental retardation in Canada, with suitable recommendations for future action. In particular, responsibilities of the various agencies in this field will be considered with a view to the co-ordination and integration of effective arrangements for the retarded.

The meeting will be held October 19 to 22, and it is expected that it will bring together 150 persons very closely identified with services for the retarded. These will include representatives from several agencies of the federal government, provincial departments such as health, welfare, education and labour, and representatives from various professional and voluntary associations with special interests and competence in the field. I would hope the conference would lead to greatly improved provisions for the retarded in Canada, and that future programs would develop on a co-ordinated and planned basis. Our intentions in this area, incidentally, constitute an interesting parallel with similar programs in the United States, so notably stimulated and encouraged by the late President Kennedy.

Another health program which I would like to mention and which is indicative of important developments in the health fields supported by my department is the one concerning the health hazards of cigarette smoking. Hon. members will recall that at the first Canadian conference on smoking and health, last November, interested federal and provincial health departments and professional and voluntary health organizations agreed that a nation-wide program was necessary to discourage the cigarette smoking habit in Canada, particularly among young people. Federal funds were allotted in the amount of $600,000 to be spread over five years, $400,000 for health education and $200,000 for research.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is endeavouring to provide leadership by assisting in the co-ordination of activities of the various government and non-government agencies, by producing basic educational materials for use across the country, and by promoting research into the extent and nature of the smoking habit in Canada and the motivational aspects of smoking.

Two technical advisory committees have been established, one on health education and the other on research. A reference book and an information kit have recently been prepared and distributed. The program of support for research has attracted 19 inquiries from universities in seven provinces, and four projects have already been approved. Also we plan to assist in the distribution of a number of interesting films on the subject. I might add here that the results we have seen so far do not point to any dramatic advance. Our statistics follow rather an erratic pattern, but I am happy to report that the net result is one of slow but steady progress.

The co-operation of the various interested groups has been splendid. An expanded meeting of the technical advisory committee on health education this month will facilitate even wider participation in this program by health workers and educators.

In the field of food and drug control, hon. members will recall that our food and drug regulations have been strengthened during the past year by the promulgation of new control measures. These deal with such matters as the introduction, control and assessment of new drugs; establishment of minimum standards for milk to be used for manufacturing purposes; the addition of several drugs to the list of those which may be sold only on prescription; minimum processing requirements for fish products in hermetically sealed containers to reduce the dangers of botuline poisoning; minimum standards for manufacturing facilities and analytical controls and records required for the manufacture of drugs; standards for live, oral polio virus vaccine; and the distribution of samples of drugs to the medical, dental, veterinary and pharmaceutical professions.

The funds proposed will provide for the inspection, analytical, research and administrative services required to administer this legislation and provide a reasonable degree of protection to Canadian consumers.

This requires that the number of personnel engaged in this work and other facilities be increased to keep pace with the steadily increasing volume and complexity of new processes and new products.

Hon. members will recall that we recently set up an advisory council of consumers which will advise me and my department on subjects related to our food and drug regulations. The committee will hold its first meeting here on October 13 and 14.

If I can turn now, Mr. Chairman, to the activities of our welfare branch, I think this is an opportune time to give members a progress report on the implementation of our new youth allowances program which was passed by the house in July of this year. This particular legislation, which features a somewhat different approach than family allowances, provides for the payment to parents of an allowance of $10 per month for a dependant child aged 16 or 17 who is either in full time attendance at school or university or who is unable to attend school because of a physical or mental infirmity.

The youth allowances act is being administered by the family allowances and old age security division of my department. Since its passage the department has been busy forwarding youth allowances application forms to all parents in Canada who have children aged 16 or 17. It was possible to locate the names of the families concerned from our family allowance records. Some half million application forms were sent out to parents across Canada for September 1. These have already started to flow back into our regional offices in the capital cities of the provinces. As of today I am advised that very few problems are being encountered, so there appears to be every expectation that youth allowances cheques will go forward to eligible parents at the end of this month.

In a situation where a child is unable to attend school because of a mental or physical disability, the parent in question will be sent a certificate which must be completed by a doctor, attesting to the fact that the child is incapable of attending school.

There will be a number of cases where the application form will not reach the parent due to a change of address having taken place since the parent stopped receiving family allowances for the child. Through the use of newspaper advertisements and radio spot announcements, parents who did not receive application forms have been requested to write to their regional director for these forms. All the periodical press of the country, including the ethnic press, has been used for this purpose. Parents whose applications are late because of having to obtain medical certificates, or due to the form not having been received by September 1, will not be penalized by any loss of allowance because of the retroactive provision in the legislation.

Due to the requirement that the youth must be in full time attendance at school, we obviously need the co-operation of the provincial education authorities involved. I am happy to report that I wrote to all the provincial ministers of education, and that the response we have received so far has been most encouraging.

The province of Quebec is continuing its own program, which was initiated in 1960, and will receive from the federal government a fiscal equivalent provided for in the federal-provincial revision act.

It is anticipated that 375,000 children will be registered for the allowance. This will cost some $27 million for the remainder of the current fiscal year. In the full year it is expected the cost will be in the order of $45 million.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about our public assistance programs. The department has been giving close attention to the four federal-provincial public assistance programs; that is, the three so-called categorical programs of old age assistance, blind persons allowances and disabled persons allowances, and general assistance provided under the Unemployment Assistance Act. Together, these four programs involve an annual federal expenditure of nearly $190 million, and provide basic or supplementary assistance for some 800,000 persons. While these programs are of incalculable value in providing the essentials of life to those covered by them, questions have been raised for some time about methods of arriving at a better integrated and more flexible public assistance program.

At the federal-provincial conference of premiers last November there was a unanimous agreement that efforts should be made with this objective in view. Accordingly a working group of federal-provincial officials met in February, and the ministers of welfare met with me in May to discuss means of achieving this goal. A further meeting of ministers is planned for later this fall. This sort of action is slow, since it involves the co-operation of the provinces, territories and the federal government and we are all working at different paces, but we are moving forward as quickly as possible.

Among the points brought out in the discussions with the provinces was the fact that the approach taken in the Unemployment Insurance Act, through which the provinces set the rates and determine the conditions under which assistance is granted, should form the basis of any broader public assistance programs that may be developed. Emphasis was also placed on the development of an assistance program designed to encourage self support and the reduction of dependency. The welfare grants program has a role to play in promoting the development and sharing in the costs of social services needed to give this positive emphasis to the public assistance programs.

While much of the discussion with the provinces was concerned with the development of a broader public assistance program, the need for the retention of the present categorical assistance programs on an optional basis by the provinces was emphasized. Accordingly, improvements in these individual programs must also be considered. In particular the program of allowances for people who are permanently and totally disabled needs to be reviewed in the light of the views expressed by many members of this house, as well as in the light of the provisions for disability benefits which are proposed under the Canada pension plan.

It is to be hoped that the federal and provincial governments can work out a mutually satisfactory approach to public assistance, and that the social insurance provisions of the Canada pension plan will be paralleled by an integrated and improved social assistance program.

I might add here, Mr. Chairman, that the welfare grants program continues its planned expansion as a means of assisting in the development and strengthening of welfare services in Canada. This year $1 million has been allocated to the program, compared with $500,000 in the fiscal year 1963-64. Present plans call for an annual increase of $500,000 until a yearly total of $2½ million is reached.

The program achieves its purpose in a broad and flexible way, partly through directly administered provisions and partly through sharing arrangements with the provinces. Efforts are focused in three main areas; the improvement of the quality and quantity of welfare staff, the expansion of welfare services, and research which holds promise of great improvement in welfare services.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, a word about a program which is small in cost but great in public interest; that is, fitness and amateur sport. The amount made available to us was raised this year to $3 million. Although it is too soon to make any final evaluation of the impact the program is having on fitness and amateur sport in Canada, there is a mounting volume of evidence that considerable progress is being made in a number of the important parts of the program. More than $1 million was allocated in grants to 43 national sports governing bodies and fitness agencies, and 56 per cent of this amount was for training of coaches and participants. About 25 per cent went for assistance to national competition and 15 per cent to international competition.

A sum of $1 million was allocated to the provinces to assist them in developing the services at the local community level which are the lifeblood of the program. Grants are made on a basis whereby the federal government pays 60 per cent and the provinces 40 per cent, except in the case of undergraduate scholarships and bursaries where the federal government pays the full amount. We have been able within the past month or two to offer to the provinces new three year agreements, and we are now negotiating with the provinces on this basis. Up to this time the agreements have been for one year only, and there have been many complaints by the provinces that it was impossible to plan ahead on such a short term basis.

The remaining funds were used for a post-graduate scholarship program through which assistance was given to the training of highly qualified teaching personnel, to fitness research where the co-operation of the universities is being received in the build up of a program that will help to tell us more about the nature of fitness, and to a technical information services program which includes films, manuals of instruction and other techniques for raising sporting skills. The program has not been used to assist capital development because the sums involved are far too great for a $3 million appropriation. However, the department does maintain liaison with the Department of Labour, and through the municipal winter works incentive program the department provides aid for the construction of local sports and recreational facilities.

I have only touched, Mr. Chairman, on some of the highlights of the activities of the Department of National Health and Welfare. There are all told some 29 divisions in the department, and it would take a very long time indeed to give the committee a detailed report on each and every one of them. I have been minister of the department for about 15 months, and daily I encounter a new twist or quirk, a new office or some personnel under my responsibility. I have enjoyed my work. I have enjoyed the people with whom I work.

In concluding I should particularly like to mention the departmental secretary, Miss Olive Waters, who is seated on the floor of the house at the moment, who is the first woman to appear on the floor on the occasion of my estimates to advise me and who, I am sorry to say, is concluding her last year with the department. I should also like to thank the house for the courteous treatment they have given me—except for the first 30 seconds—

Mr. Knowles: Don't blame all of us for that.

Miss LaMarsh: —and have shown my department in the past, and for the expeditious consideration which I hope hon. members will give the present estimates which are outlined in the blue book.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the minister has requested the expeditious passage of her estimates, and I am sure she can count on this. As will be recalled, on July 28 last at the time of our consideration of interim supply we spent a full day discussing the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Many of the members of the party to which I have the honour to belong spoke at that time; and subsequently, under some pressure, the minister did reply on August 5 to some of the questions which were asked. As a consequence we feel that these estimates have been discussed already to some degree. While there will be a few things that my colleagues, and others in other parties, will no doubt wish to comment upon, I do not anticipate any lengthy debate at this stage as far as we are concerned.

The minister, as she put it, touched on the highlights in the department and mentioned that she was meeting new problems every day. I well recall asking a former deputy minister of the department, after having been minister myself for some few weeks, when a person would ever get to feel as though he really might know something about this department. His rather glib reply to me was "Oh, about three years". So I can assure the minister that she has some little time to go, according to this former deputy minister, before she should have everything at her fingertips.

The minister has mentioned the amount which is being spent. I think something over $2 billion has been devoted to the department including old age security. Eight years ago, if I recall correctly, in 1956-57 the total expenditures including old age security were something in the neighbourhood of $880 million. So the expenditure this year represents more than a 100 per cent increase, 110 per cent to 115 per cent. I know it is money well spent in, as the minister said, an endeavour to provide higher standards of health and life for the citizens of Canada.

At some time when the minister is replying I hope she will give us some indication of just what is happening with regard to the cost sharing programs with the provinces. The Prime Minister tabled letters in this respect today. I have not seen them as yet, and perhaps they will set out the proposals in some detail.

The minister mentioned that she has been having a very busy time with seven dominion-provincial meetings. I feel she would probably have to agree that a couple of those meetings were pretty useless when you look back on them. I am thinking of the July, 1963 meeting and the December, 1963 meeting dealing with the Canada pension plan, which has undergone so many changes.

I do want to commend the minister for the steps she has been taking concerning mental retardation. The forthcoming conference cannot help but be of assistance in this respect, as this illness is a serious matter affecting many people in Canada.

The minister also mentioned the food and drug regulations have been strengthened and which is a good thing. With regard to the advisory council of consumers, we will have to wait and see what comes out of it.

The youth allowances program, as she mentioned, while a little late appears to be getting under way at this stage, and I am pleased to note that she suggested there were few problems encountered thus far.

With regard to the public assistance program I wonder whether the minister at some stage would indicate whether she has had any suggestions, particularly from the province of Saskatchewan. It occurs to me there is a move afoot out there to suggest that unemployment assistance only be paid in return for work, or perhaps I should say that work should be done in return for public assistance. I wonder whether the minister has any comments on that point.

I should also like to ask her what is the state of the present welfare council, or the welfare council authorized by the previous government. She mentioned the grants being advanced amounting to $500,000, which I recall was the plan devised and which has been followed. This amount is being increased by $500,000 a year until $2.5 million is reached.

The fitness and amateur sport program, which carries the statutory figure of $5 million, is being increased by actual expenditures from $2 million to $3 million this year. I realize that this program cannot be hurried into because the department must make sure that the expenditures are worthy and meet the requirements intended for them. The expenditures have to be studied very carefully, and as a consequence the department cannot leap into a program like this too hurriedly. In other words it must feel its way.

I do not propose to say anything more at this stage, Mr. Chairman. Possibly there will be further questions when we get into the items. However, if I might be permitted one word of commendation to Miss Waters, I should like to join in the minister's words in this respect and wish her well.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I hope it is a good omen that we are dealing with the estimates of this department sooner than we expected. Granted, this is only a matter of 24 hours, but it is a welcome change from the long delays we are experiencing in respect of some of the important legislative items that the Minister of National Health and Welfare should be bringing before us.

I want to say also that we think it is not inappropriate for the minister to refer to the total amount of money which is provided by parliament for expenditure by or through her department, because this does indicate not only the importance of the work of the department but the tremendous importance of the subjects covered and the efforts that are made under the aegis of this department to cope with the very real needs of the Canadian people. The minister used the round figure of something over $2 billion as the total amount spent by this department. If my arithmetic is a little more accurate than it was the other day, when I asked her a question about a minor point, that is nearly 30 per cent of the total money spent in a year by the federal government. This indicates that Canadians regard the health, social security and general welfare of our people as one of the most important functions of government.

I should like to make one slight correction in the wording used by the minister, and I do so not to quarrel with her over a technicality, but rather to make a point. If I heard her correctly she said that her department was asking parliament to approve of the expenditure of approximately $1,250 million. Then she went on to refer to the $800 million that came out of the old age security fund, making a total of over $2 billion. I am sure she knows what I am referring to. Actually she comes before parliament asking for approval in respect of only $104 million, for something over $1 billion does not have to be approved by parliament from year to year, because this has been made statutory in the various enactments such as the Old Age Security Act, the Family Allowances Act, and other measures. As I have said, I mention this fact not to quarrel over a technicality with the minister, but rather to make the point that parliament is very sure of itself in this field. It has made permanent enactments which make it clear that we regard social security, social welfare and the health of our people as of major importance in the whole scheme of government as we know it in this country.

We were pleased to hear the report of the minister in respect of the wide range of work that is being done by this department. We were pleased to hear of the extent of cooperation that she and her department experience with the governments and corresponding departments of the provinces of Canada. We were also pleased to learn of the work that is going on inside her department, particularly that being conducted by a number of committees.

I suppose, since I am commenting on some of the things the minister has said, I had better not overlook one point or it might be noticed. I do say very genuinely, at any rate, that I should like to join with the minister and the former minister in complimenting the department for having the services of Miss Waters. Perhaps Miss Waters would not mind if the two deputy ministers who are sitting at the table in front of the minister might also be mentioned as contributing very effectively to the work of this department.

Mr. Chairman, it was good to hear the minister say today that it is still the intention of the government that the Canada pension plan will be brought into effect and be operative by January, 1966. I do not want to sound cynical or lacking in faith; I do not want to sound as though I had not paid heed to the advice of the minister that I possess my soul in patience, or whatever the advice has been from the minister. But, I do express concern as a result of all the delays we have experienced as to whether or not we are going to get this important legislation.

In the short period of time I had earlier today, because word did get around that we might have health and welfare estimates before us this afternoon, I looked over some of the debates of the past, earlier this year and last year, and I found it almost embarrassing to read some of the things that I said as long ago as July, 1963. The things I said then in respect of the Canada pension plan would make one think that the millennium was just around the corner. In the meantime we have had so many delays that one wonders whether that millennium is going to be a millennium in coming. I plead with the minister not to feel that she can put us off from day to day with statements such as, "a statement will be made soon" or "everybody is working on this matter as fast as possible".

Earlier today, when we were on orders of the day, I was quite serious when I made the point that the business of this house, now that we have got over the flag impasse for six weeks, should be organized so that we can get on with the Canada pension plan right away. In my view we should be at it not later than next week. One of the reasons I expressed myself earlier today as opposed to the House of Commons taking a recess at this time is because of the importance of the Canada pension plan itself. I favour a recess for our staff, and I think that it can be worked out, indeed, we must work it out; but we have been telling the country for a long time that we have felt there was important business for us to get at, and for that reason we wanted some agreement made about the flag debate. Let us not spoil all that by asking now for a holiday, when there is this important question of the Canada pension plan, as well as other important business to be dealt with at this time.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question on this subject?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: He said he did not think we should ask for a holiday at this time. Has he considered the situation of the staff which has been working here overtime?

The Chairman: Order. May I suggest to the hon. members of this committee that we are getting away from the subject matter of this resolution if we begin to consider matters such as the one raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I do not need to be out of order to answer that question, because I answered it by what I said about 90 seconds ago.

So far as the Canada pension plan is concerned, Mr. Chairman, this is one of the responsibilities of this department, and one of the items to which the minister herself referred in her opening statement. I suggest to her that it is not sufficient for us to be willing to stay here to deal with it, but what has to be done is to have the legislation brought before us. We are glad that we were given the white paper some time ago—on August 10 I believe it was. It is an excellent document which probably tells us more than the members generally will be able to comprehend when they receive the bill itself, because I expect the bill will be so complicated we will all readily agree to give it second reading and refer it to a committee. I do not think we will be able to discuss it here, because of its tremendous complications.

Mr. Chairman, the minister's responsibility is to get that piece of legislation before us. I ask her to consider what is happening to the calendar. We are well into the month of September and if I can count months it is only a little over three months until Christmas. It is not impossible, even with the kind of accord and agreement we have reached in parliament today, for other roadblocks to occur, for other matters to be debated at length and for this important piece of legislation to be put off again and again. It is not impossible for other difficulties to arise in discussions with the provinces. It is not impossible for difficulties to arise when the matter goes before a special joint committee. These various difficulties could add up to the postponing of this legislation into 1965, and if that happens it is quite possible that the intention the minister stated today could fail to be realized.

This is an important matter not just to the Liberal party which campaigned so heavily on it in the last two elections. It is also an important matter to parliament and it is an extremely important matter to the people of Canada. Judging from the white paper and from all we have heard and read about the matter, it strikes me that a great many people have put much thought into this plan. We will probably find some flaws in it, some things that we want to improve, but generally it strikes me as a good piece of social legislation, and what is now needed is that we get it on the statute books. Before we know it other parliamentary crises could arise. There could even be an election next year or the year following. By this sort of thing these benefits could be denied to many people who are waiting for them and who are entitled to them.

So I urge the minister to get the resolution respecting the Canada pension plan on the order paper next week, and I offer her this bit of co-operation. I am one of those persons who attend meetings of the house leaders where we try to organize the business of the house, and I tell her, though she knows it very well, that the minute the resolution preceding the Canada pension plan is on the order paper I will be pleading with her house leader and the other house leaders that we give it the very highest priority. We cannot do that at the meetings of house leaders if the legislation is not on the order paper.

Because we have got the white paper on the Canada pension plan one could go into some of its details, but I will resist that temptation. I will wait hopefully for that debate next week. But there is one thing in the pension field with regard to older people which I feel I must press upon the minister. I asked her a question the other day arising out of a resolution passed by the united senior citizens of Ontario. She took the question seriously and it was a serious question, but a colleague in the party to my right referred to it as though it was a question asked in jest. It certainly was not asked in such a vein.

My question had to do with the request that many people now over 70 and now receiving old age security of $75 a month are asking for an increase in that pension and the figure they are now suggesting is $100 a month, which I support. I know it is very easy to say there was an increase last year and also the year before and that we have done pretty well in the few years since the amount was $40 a month. I know it is easy to say that we are going to be coping with the whole problem of old age security on the broader basis that is involved in the Canada pension plan, but the fact still remains that there are still many Canadians over 70 and many more who will become 70 before the Canada pension plan comes into effect who have no prospect of anything other than old age security as we now know it. We feel it is not good enough just to make provision to take care of needs in the years that lie ahead. We think we have to consider the needs of our people here and now.

There is no question in my mind that when the Canada pension plan comes into effect and we have this two stage program, old age security and the Canada pension plan, the amount paid under old age security will have to be increased in the course of time and that if the kind of pension we envisage is going to be available a decade or two or three from now the amounts paid under both the Canada pension plan and old age security will have to be increased. Since this is coming anyway, I ask the house to get over the notion that we have seen the end of increases in old age security itself. If we are going to make these increases let us have in mind the older people of the present time, who will rejoice in the knowledge that other people are going to do better as they become older, and let us see to it that we increase old age security now and make things better for them as well while they are still with us.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I welcome very strongly the minister's statement today that it is still the government's intention to have the Canada pension plan in operation by January, 1966. I welcomed in July the statement of the Minister of Justice that so far as the government was concerned the Canada pension plan would be enacted at this session of parliament. But we have had promises of this kind before over the years. My plea today is that these promises be kept at this session. We promise our full co-operation to get this done and we ask the minister and the government to do their part so far as this whole matter is concerned.

We welcome also the brief review the minister gave of the various other programs in the social welfare field, the categorical programs and the other forms of assistance and social welfare. We are glad to know these programs are constantly being reviewed by the federal government and the provinces. I know that in speaking to the minister I am speaking to one of the converted. I am sure she is even more converted now than she was a year ago, having got to know more about the work of her department; but I plead that she press on with the idea of integrating these programs and overcoming the patchwork approach to social security which has been inevitable because of the way the whole matter has grown up.

I also ask that the government realize that social security is not just a form of charity for people who are in need. It is a part of our whole approach to our kind of society in which we believe there is a case for the redistribution of wealth so that people will be enabled to live according to their needs and be able to live according to what society is able to produce. Other departments than the minister's, the Department of Labour in particular, are concerned with the problem of automation. I listened to a part of the speech the Minister of Labour made in Toronto the other day on this question and since then he has supplied all of us with copies of this speech. It is not surprising to learn that he is concerned about what automation is doing to the processes of collective bargaining and to the employment picture. We are all concerned. This sort of thing hastens the day when governments will have to be concerned not just with providing social security payments of the order we now envisage, but when governments in the name of society will have to be concerned about the distribution of the mass of income that we produce according to the needs of our people rather than in accordance with the industrial or other work they are able to perform. Many a modern economist and sociologist is recognizing the fact that the day may not be far off when we will have to pay people who do not work at all, not through some form of relief but actually pay them to enable them to live and make it possible for them to engage in creative and constructive pursuits. I suggest that this problem concerns not only the Department of Labour but will concern this minister's department because this is the department where we have laid the groundwork for finding ways in which to distribute the wealth we produce among our people.

A few decades ago social legislation was only for the poor. Not very long ago I heard Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King—I think he was sitting in the very seat in which the minister is sitting now—stand up in this house and talk about the needy poor. Even when he used that phrase 20 years ago there were those in this house who castigated him for it. They said, surely we had moved on from that time. Of course Mr.

King belonged to an earlier generation and that was reflected in his thinking. This was what social welfare was, simply picking up the pieces, helping to provide an ambulance to pick up those who had suffered in the processes of our society and of our economy. We have moved on from that point and we realize that the maintenance of an adequate standard of living, not just keeping people alive, but enabling them to enjoy the benefits of our age, enabling them to live a constructive life, is one of the goals of our society.

We are going to have to move a great deal farther in that direction in the next decade. There is already co-operation between the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Labour on a number of matters. I think there should be a great deal of study of this whole question of how we can expand the pension, social welfare and assistance programs we have so that our people can live and perform as they ought to, and not suffer from the processes of automation.

There is one other main branch of the minister's department with which I shall deal, and some of my colleagues will be speaking about this is greater detail. I want to say just a few words about it at this point. I refer to the whole question of health which has again been brought into sharp focus by a report. I refer, of course, to the report of the Hall royal commission. We have had many reports and documents in this field in the years that have gone by. The minister recalls that when I was speaking on her estimates last year I drew to her attention a draft bill for a national health program which had been tabled in this House of Commons by one of her predecessors, Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie, back in 1944. I found it a matter of some interest that the minister admitted to me, either publicly or privately and I am sure it does not matter which, that she had not heard of that particular draft bill until I drew it to her attention. This was one of a great many documents. There was the Marsh report and several other huge volumes during the years I have been here, and even before that.

The Hall report is another one and it has brought the whole question of the community's responsibility for the health of our people into sharp focus. We agree that it is an excellent report. Like most reports, it contains one or two things with which we do not entirely agree. But the general call for a health charter for Canadians is one that all of us welcome most heartily. When one reads this report even sketchily he gets the impression that the members of the commission, who were not New Democratic appointees to start with and who were not socialistic in their thinking, became convinced as they studied the matter that the only answer to the health problem of Canada was a health charter for Canada somewhat along the lines of that spelled out in the report. We hope however this is not going to be just another massive and valuable document that will decorate the shelves of the library and be referred to for years to come.

I welcome the minister's statement that there are 14 committees in her department studying the various aspects of this report. I welcome her statement that it is hoped that this study will have proceeded sufficiently to enable the government to present a position to a federal-provincial meeting some time in 1965. However I strongly express the hope that is not just for the purpose of entertaining those who attend the meeting, but rather that this will be a step in the direction of urging that this legislation be brought into effect. I know that this government has had a rather rough time of it since it got elected. It promised action in 60 days and that 60 day slogan became almost a millstone around its neck. Then the government had trouble with the first Gordon budget. Then there was the Canada pension plan which we were going to get right away, but which we are still hoping to get. Health care was part of the Liberal party's platform in the last election. I believe the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was faced with a Liberal candidate who put the health program so high on the list it was going to be enacted in a matter of months.

Mr. Pugh: Do not forget the scholarships.

Mr. Knowles: Scholarships was another of the government's promises. I believe there was a promise about a flag, and they have had a bit of trouble with that as well. I urge the government not to be discouraged because it has had this kind of trouble, not to be discouraged to the point of putting the health plan too far down the list. It is perhaps even more important than the Canada pension plan and the minister knows how important we feel that is. If this government or the minister in charge of this department really want to do something for Canada, I suggest they should make a serious effort to get a health charter for Canadians on the statute books during the life of this parliament.

The impression we get, and I am sure the impression the press men have, including those who are friendly to the Liberal party, is that the most the government plans in this field is to get the pension plan on the books, perhaps the national labour code, and then be able to use that in an election campaign. They would say, you have this and we will go on with a health plan if you re-elect us. This is not good enough. This is not acting in a responsible manner. Now that we have the Hall report and this government committeed to act in the health field, I urge that there should be no thought of the health plan being put off for the next parliament, but rather plans should be made to get this legislation before this house during the life of the present parliament. It is a tenuous life this parliament leads. You never know when it is going to fall on some major issue, some minor issue or even some procedural issue. I think the thing for the government to do is to assume it still has life, and while it has that life it should act on these important matters.

There are other things I should like to discuss, but quite frankly I would be repeating what I have said on other occasions about improvements that might be made in the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act, unemployment assistance and some of these other things. Some of the programs to which the minister has referred deserve comment. This comment can be made by other members as the debate proceeds. As the minister expected I would, however, I want at this time to urge that she get moving with something more than a Liberal pace, that she get moving with some real speed on these two important matters, the Canada pension plan and a health charter for the people of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, while I do not want to delay the discussion unnecessarily, I would like to make a few remarks on the National Health and Welfare estimates, to call the attention of the house on the fact that at first sight, no extraordinary changes appear in the departmental estimates. Several items have remained the same, whereas some others show a slight increase like, for instance, the contribution to the provinces, following arrangements made between them and the federal government. We also note an increase in medical services. The largest increase concerns the new estimates for the old age pension plan.

This pension plan will not directly concern the province of Quebec, as Quebec citizens will have their own pension plan, but I may say that even that plan does not inspire much confidence as far as I am concerned, because I consider it simply as a product of capitalism.

When we look at this pension plan, we wonder whether the government really wanted to help old people in need, or come to the rescue of government finance, because under that plan the small wage earner who gets from $1,000 to $6,000 will be taxed again, whereas those in higher brackets will not be affected.

Now, it is precisely the small wage earners who have to raise a family on $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000 a year, who are of concern to us, because they will have to shoulder another tax to be eligible for a pension 25, 30 or 40 years hence.

Mr. Chairman, after having studied every program and every bill which was enacted by the house, I wonder whether there is a true and honest concern for individual welfare. I am asking this question seriously, because since my arrival in this house, it seems to me that all the acts I have studied have been drawn up not in the interest of the individual, but with finance in mind.

I feel that, in setting up the present scheme, the government's chief purpose is to create a tremendous fund where it can dig at will, while luring the people with a pension they could hope to receive when they reach the age of 70.

Mr. Chairman, if the government were really sincere and truly wanted to protect people and our older citizens, it could use a much less complicated means than the pension plan it is now proposing. In fact, we are now paying our old people a pension of $75 a month from the age of 70.

We want our old people to receive a pension of $100 a month, for that is exactly what the new plan proposes, $100 and less—I say "and less", because I find that, under that scheme, the aged person will have to prove that, all his life, he earned a salary of $6,000 a year. Therefore, the person who will establish that he earned only $3,000 a year will receive only $50 per month as stipulated in the proposed plan, and so on. Those who earn only between $3,000 and $4,000 a year will receive a pension in keeping with their salary.

During all that time, the Canadian citizen will have been deprived of the necessities of life in order to have a guaranteed pension of $100. Because the most needy people will not be able to reach the maximum fixed by the government, their pension will be limited to $60, $50 and maybe even to $40 per month. And that is what this government calls equity.

Instead of all that camouflage, the government could have raised the present pension from $75 to $100 per month and pay it out of the surplus income of the wealthy without overtaxing the little people.

Those earning $6,000 and over could have been taxed in order to pay for that additional pension of $25 a month. Thus, I think the government would have been much more logical and would have proven that they were working to improve the situation of small wage earners while securing a $100 pension for everybody, including those who have millions of dollars. I think that is a principle of social distribution which is fair and equitable for everybody.

But we have chosen once more to take billions of dollars out of the pockets of the small wage earner to give him a few crumbs when he reaches 70 years of age.

I say that if today with the pension—I see somebody opposite who laughs at the low income people; he should not laugh at them because the father of ten or 12 children earning less than $5,000 a year will be burdened even more as a result of this famous pension plan. Let us not laugh at our small wage earners; instead let us consider their plight more seriously and let us help them by providing them with a more adequate social pension.

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare wishes to bring about some improvements, we could even today pay without a means test a pension to those who have reached 65 years of age, instead of waiting until they are 70.

We could do away with this army of small inspectors, all these branch offices which cost millions of dollars to this department, and with the savings realized by eliminating these petty inspectors—I was about to say those small patronage dispensers—who study the cases of persons 65 to 70 years of age in order to find a way to get out of paying pensions to them, we could pay, without a means test, part of the statutory pension to persons 65 to 70 years of age.

Mr. Chairman, an item which impressed me especially is that of family allowances.

The government provided family allowances several years ago, and I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare has ever thought of revising them in keeping with the rise in the cost of living.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

There is some talk of increasing family allowances; requests are made, large families especially write to the government. But the government pretends not to hear those requests and remains silent when questions are directed to its members in the house concerning the problem of family allowances.

All salaries are increased nowadays, the administration costs have increased; the only item which is left untouched is that of family allowances.

It is precisely the only way to help large families and set a fairer salary balance.

If two family heads receive the same salary, but one has two or three children while the other has ten or more, the only way to balance their salaries is precisely through family allowances.

Again, I wonder if the Minister of National Health and Welfare thought of this. In the estimates, I see only a small increase, which I gather is merely the result of the population increase. But, in fact, there are no changes whatsoever as far as family allowances are concerned. And no changes are announced either, and sometimes I wonder if the minister does not intend to reduce them instead of increasing them.

Mr. Chairman, there are very interesting items in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the most interesting of them all, even more interesting than old age pensions, is family allowances.

It is really a shame today to see that a country like Canada is unable to make an effort to help large families balance their budgets through proportionate family allowances, so that they might live like other workers who have little or no family.

I feel that this question must be considered, and I ask the minister to consider it seriously and introduce a few amendments so that we might hope for at least a 100 per cent increase in family allowances. The cost of living has actually more than doubled during the last decade. I feel the time has come to be logical.

If the minister acts along those lines, I think that she will make a useful contribution to Canada's future.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Chairman, we were all taken by surprise, this afternoon, when the party leaders' decision to set up a committee to study the flag question left us free to discuss the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. However, since I am sure that those estimates will be approved sometime today and probably early this evening, I should like to say a few words just to show that we have always been highly interested in that department and that we are always glad to offer a few suggestions to the minister.

In my opinion, the Department of National Health and Welfare, as organized at the present time, is surely the one whose activities do the most to prepare a general election.

I always deplored the fact that both health and social welfare come under the same department. In my opinion, the government should seriously consider dividing that department in two so that health, a matter of the utmost importance for the whole country, will be kept completely apart from another one just as important, social welfare.

Social welfare is indeed very important, although the needs in that field are recognized in general at election time only.

That was obvious several times, when family allowances were granted for the first time and later when various adjustments were made. We know that had been done arbitrarily and at the very last minute, just before an election, because it was realized that the results of that election could depend on votes cast by parents.

Also, it was realized that an increase in old age pensions was granted almost at the same time, in order to profit from the vote of Canada's senior citizens.

Therefore, I think that if this department was split in two, the health of the Canadian citizens would not at all be impaired and the question of social welfare would be studied rationally, systematically and progressively, not only in keeping with the cost of living, but also with the social evolution of the population, and not because of the political implications which such an increase in allowances might have among the Canadian population.

It is noteworthy that little by little various pressures, sometimes very subtle, are exerted by followers of certain political doctrines and also by some newspapermen in their editorials. Thus, our democratic system seems to evolve slowly towards a system against which we fought bitterly in wartime.

We should not deceive ourselves nor think that things which were bad before are now better; because more and more people are hoping for the social welfare state and for the government to play an ever increasing role, we should not think that they are right when they were wrong a few years ago.

It is not because the number of thieves in the country is increasing that the legislation against theft should be amended. The government should not come to believe that theft is a good thing simply because more thieves are committed. We should not do like certain political partisans who approve of theft when it is in favour of their party but reject it when it is in favour of other groups.

I believe that while it is in order to greet with some hope the establishment of a pension plan or fund for the Canadian people, while it is in order to rejoice at the fact that individuals who benefit from social assistance will perhaps have their day because there will be an election at a given time, I think that we must be very sparing in praising the government.

It must be realized that we are on very slippery ground, that we are implementing schemes which have been tried out in other countries where it has been shown that those so-called liberating plans always bring us back, sooner or later, to systems that become centralizing, dictatorial and detrimental to the people, although they had supposedly been established to help them.

As an example, I will refer only to Great Britain, where a system was established supposedly to satisfy all the needs of the British people—since it is a step forward as regards the existing hospital insurance legislation—where the health insurance system was to solve all problems; nevertheless, a short time after the implementation of that system, it was realized that the amounts of money invested were getting phenomenal and extravagant, that the operating cost of the system was such that medical care began to decrease, that medical research was practically nonexistent and that hospitalization costs were becoming unbearable to the taxpayer, because, after all, the revenues needed for the maintenance of that whole system are always derived from taxes, in short, the taxpayer has to pay for it.

This means that far from freeing the British people from expenditures incurred through illness, this scheme has made them extraordinarily vulnerable, because the treatments which were supposed to be given at a minimum cost have now reached astronomical figures.

I think that from time to time, committees should be set up, such as the one which will consider the flag issue, in order to ascertain the views of the various parties which, after all, reflect the views of the Canadian people, before launching an ill-considered scheme that we know nothing about. Before being compelled to back down, we might be better advised to consult people and to do more research in this field. Before assuming that exceptionally good results will be achieved, it might be better to follow the example of countries that have used the different systems.

I feel the Canadian people would become more cautious and have second thoughts before insisting on the ill-considered intrusion of the state in the fields of health, welfare and social security.

If I remember correctly certain notions of social science I may have learned, it seems to me that state intervention, no matter how intensive or far reaching should be meant to establish some happy medium among the people and to provide the majority with the basic necessities.

I do not believe that it is by increasing the cost of government services, while decreasing the number of services, that the people can be served.

Therefore, I caution the government, as well as hon. members, not to think that pension plans, health insurance plans and hospital insurance plans will be cure-alls for all our present ills.

It is not because the capitalist system is defective in itself but simply because, in its present application, this system does not take into account hard facts nor its own weaknesses. For fear of having to relinquish some prerogatives, we are unwillingly getting into another plan for which the government is not anxious, against which it once fought, but in which it cannot help but flounder.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to speak at length. In addition to her statement on the Canada pension plan, the minister referred to the research made or co-ordinated by her department with regard to cigarette smoking which is related to metabolic disturbances causing heart trouble and blamed also for its effects on lung cancer.

I feel that the government is to be commended for having accepted its responsibilities in this field. I do not believe, however, that in this respect as in others, the government should give strict orders to all the people, because studies made up to now have failed to show the actual cause or any close relationship between the use of tobacco and lung cancer or cardiovascular diseases.

I also take this opportunity to say a few words on fluoridation. That is another controversial matter which has been considered and discussed without having been unanimously settled.

I do not see how the government could give any directives or definite opinions in this field, when ideas all over the world differ on the matter.

We should keep in mind that, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare places her authority behind a statement, a medical report or an investigation on a given subject, it has great influence on the public.

I believe that the Department of National Health and Welfare, while supporting the national health league and various other organizations which advocate water fluoridation should limit its activities. It should not increase the various subsidies and more particularly take no decision before the government thoroughly and satisfactorily studies the question. Moreover, the government should note the views expressed by the various scientists of our own national research council.

Mr. Chairman, I would have liked to end my remarks immediately, but since I still have a few comments to make, may I call it five o'clock?

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, August 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-27, respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Brown—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Number of directors.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, as sponsor of Bill No. S-27, I should like to take this opportunity of answering one or two questions which were asked by the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Timiskaming and others.

I should like to repeat, Mr. Chairman, what I have already said in the course of this debate, that it is the wish of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, through this bill, to increase the number of its directors in order to deal more effectively with the growth and complexity of the diverse problems that confront it in the operation of its business during these times. The committee and the house have already been made aware of the general growth and development of this company since its charter was issued, and particularly since the year 1927 when it began to make use of its full quota of directors. It is the view of the company that the complexity and diversity of matters and problems coming before its board make it desirable at this time to request parliament to grant it an increase in the permissible size of its board of directors, and there is no other reason. I might say there is no other hidden reason behind the company's request to parliament at this time. Nor is there any change in the policies or plans envisaged which might be facilitated by an increase in the size of its board of directors. I wish to state emphatically that it is not the intention of the company to use any additional directors allowed for the purpose of amalgamation or merger with any other company.

The hon. member for Greenwood referred to an application of Industrial Wire and Cable Company to the board of transport commissioners respecting the relationship between the Bell Telephone Company and the Northern Electric Company, in respect of which a ruling was given that the Bell Telephone Company was legally entitled to own shares in the Northern Electric Company. As hon. members know, the Bell Telephone Company now owns 100 per cent of the shares of the Northern Electric Company.

It was pointed out to the committee that a further question before the board of transport commissioners in this application was never dealt with, namely whether the board was entitled to review the financial affairs of the Northern Electric Company. I believe I have been asked why this question was never considered. I cannot give the answer to that question because this is a matter for the board of transport commissioners. The applicant, namely Industrial Wire and Cable Company, has never asked the board for a hearing on this question. There is nothing to prevent the applicant from asking the board for a hearing at this time, and I am assured that there is no objection from the Bell Telephone Company to its doing so.

With respect to the annual report of the Northern Electric Company, I might state that this annual report is available to any hon. member, at any time, for inspection and can be obtained upon request. It has already been supplied to a number of hon. members who have requested it.

I was further asked whether the Bell Telephone Company would permit some, or one, of the directors to be appointed by the parliament of Canada. It is pointless for me to answer this question. The directors are appointed by the shareholders of the company at the annual meetings of the company. The board of transport commissioners is the institution which has been charged by parliament to protect the public.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavoured to answer the questions which have been raised in regard to these very important matters as carefully as possible.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I think during the consideration of this bill it would be well for us to review the position of this company and its operations over the last number of years so that we may have a clear idea of what sort of a corporate body we are considering.

The company was incorporated in 1880 under special act of the dominion government as a result of the consolidation of a number of smaller companies at that time. From then on it began to absorb a number of other companies. In 1954 it merged the former subsidiaries, Eastern Townships Telephone Company and the Chapleau Telephone System. Also in 1954 it absorbed the Welland County Telephone Company. The following year it absorbed the Saguenay-Quebec Telephone Company, and the Charlevoix Telephone Company. In 1956 it merged the Kamaraska Telephone Company, and in 1957 it acquired the Mount Albert Telephone Company. In 1957 it also acquired 272,000 common shares of Northern Electric Company, increased its holdings in this company in 1962, and my latest information is that it is still holding 99 per cent of the common shares. However, there is very little difference between 99 per cent and 100 per cent. In 1959 it merged the Yamaska Telephone Company and in the following year it acquired the Madawaska Telephone Company. In 1962 it acquired control of the Avalon Telephone Company.

I am reciting these facts, Mr. Chairman, not in criticism of the actions of this company, because I think that is the logical method by which a public utility such as a telephone company must operate, because there is no room for competition in this particular field, but to underline the fact that this company has, since 1880, virtually taken over the whole of the telephone business in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. In fact, Moody's Annual states that this company owns and operates the most important telephone system in Quebec and Ontario over an area of 887,000 square miles, serving a population of 11,700,000.

This is a very large proportion of the total population of Canada. I think it is important we should realize this because we can then realize the vital importance of this company and its operations to the people of central Canada. The operations of the company affect the private lives of all individuals who have to have telephones for their own domestic purposes and every business in central Canada is utterly dependant on this company for the efficient communication system it requires. As I say, I am not complaining for the moment about the monopoly position of this company but I want to underline the fact that it is a monopoly and that by the very nature of its business it has been a monopoly.

There have been questions raised with regard to the transactions that take place between the Bell Telephone Company and its almost wholly owned subsidiary, the Northern Electric Company. These questions have had to do with whether or not this may be one method by which the parent company can salt away a large part of its earnings and come within the terms of the rate structure set by the board of transport commissioners. I have no conclusive evidence in this regard but I do have here the annual report of Northern Electric for 1962 which sets out some rather interesting figures. For instance, it tells us that in 1962 this company's cash on hand and in banks was almost 50 per cent higher than it had been in 1961. In 1961 the amount was just over $2 million and in 1962 it was just over $3½ million.

But here is the real milk in the coconut. In 1961 short term investments of the Northern Electric Company amounted to only $2,624,000 but by the following year they had increased five times to $11,054,000. It is very obvious that Northern Electric Company is doing extremely well out of its manufacturing of telephone equipment, the vast majority of which, according to the vice president of Bell Telephone, is sold to its parent company, Bell Telephone. If one were of a suspicious nature, which I am far from being, one might imagine that the Bell Telephone Company perhaps found it advantageous to pay to its wholly owned subsidiary rather larger prices for telephone equipment than were normally justified.

The Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but it is my duty to remind him that he should in some way relate his remarks to the item before us now.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They will be related.

The Chairman: He knows as well as I do the provisions of the standing order about relevancy and I would invite him to keep that in mind as we proceed.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I will, Mr. Chairman, and you will realize as I go on with what I am saying that my remarks are completely relevant. There are certain matters that I think must be made plain to the committee. The first, and to my mind the most important, is to recognize the monopoly position of this company and the complete dependence of the very large proportion of Canadians who live in central Canada on the operations of the company.

The company has come before us to ask us to authorize the appointment of five new directors. My colleagues in this party have proposed that three of these directors should be appointed by the government or by parliament as public representatives on the board to keep an eye, if you like, on the public interest in the operations of this company. I think you will agree, Mr. Chairman, that if as we contend this is advisable, then there is one thing these public representatives should also keep a very close eye on, namely the operations of this wholly owned subsidiary, because it may well be that an examination of the books of Northern Electric in conjunction with an examination of the books of the parent company may show that the public interest is not being fully protected in the relationships and the transactions between the parent and subsidiary companies.

I have quoted some figures to suggest, ever so gently, that in the balance sheet presented by the Northern Electric Company there may be some grounds for this doubt and suspicion. For instance, the net earnings of this company, most of whose business is with the Bell Telephone Company, amounted to less than $5½ million in 1961 but by the following year its net earnings had reached $8,834,000. That would appear to me to be a matter of very great interest to anyone appointed to the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company to protect the public interest. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is quite relevant to the argument I am presenting for the necessity of having some measure of public control and supervision over companies that are of such vital interest to such a large portion of the population.

My own personal view, of course, which stems quite naturally from my political and economic views, is that this company should be a crown corporation, that it is perfectly ridiculous that something so vital to the welfare of the people of Canada should be left in the hands of private individuals. I think it is nonsensical. I see no particular hope of achieving that end now, but I do think that parliament has a responsibility to consider whether or not it should decide at this point that a company of this size and importance should have some measure of public supervision.

When we discussed this matter with the vice president of the Bell Telephone Company he was rather plaintive. He wanted to know why we were singling out the Bell Telephone Company and why we did not apply the same yardstick to other companies. I said I would be delighted to do so and intended to do so on every occasion that one popped up its head here and rendered itself liable to this sort of treatment, which has been perhaps unfortunate for the Bell Telephone Company in that they were the first to come to parliament with such a request and were obvious targets for this sort of development—which I really think is one that to most thoughtful people would constitute a very moderate and reasonable demand on the part of our party with regard to the control of this company.

In my discussions with the vice president of the Bell Telephone Company I pointed out to him that such provisions were not unheard of in the world and that there were places where the supervision and direction went much farther. I pointed out, for instance, that in France there is a public director on the board of directors of every bank who, incidentally, has the power of veto over directorial decisions. There are a number of public directors appointed to such industrial operations as the French steel industry in which the public has an investment of only 30 per cent. Obviously it was decided in France that corporations that were important to the welfare of the whole country must be subjected to some measure of public control and public supervision. I think we have been very modest in suggesting that out of these five new directors three should be public representatives, and not demanding that the whole five should be.

I was interested in the remarks made by the vice president to me with regard to not only the purpose in seeking this authorization but the sort of people they had in mind to get. He told me they had in mind people from the academic world. Just what they were going to be doing on a telephone company's board I was not quite sure, but possibly the idea was that they would lend a certain air of intellectual responsibility to the company's operations. But it did occur to me at the time, if the company considers it is in its interests and presumably in the interests of the public to have people from the academic world sitting on the board of directors, how much more important it is that directors should be appointed vested with the responsibility of guarding the public interest, and not just academic interest or whatever interest these people were supposed to be concerned with in the operations of this company. I hope the House of Commons will not pass the bill until it is amended to incorporate the provision that members of this party have advanced in earlier discussions of this matter.

Mr. Scott: I wanted to ask the sponsor of the bill a question, as to whether or not he had discussed with the Bell Telephone Company directors the request we made for representation on the board of members of the government, and if so what was the nature of their response to this request? Are they prepared to entertain the idea or are they turning it down flat?

Mr. Brown: I endeavoured to answer that question. As the company is set up, the directors are appointed by the shareholders. Unless the law is changed or varied this matter cannot be the subject of discussion here because appointments to the board have to be approved by the shareholders.

Mr. Scott: That is a technically correct answer. However, it does seem that whoever the board wants to get on the board somehow manages to be elected at the annual meeting. A very small percentage of these shares is being voted under proxies and by some strange process or coincidence, to my knowledge the choice of the administration is always elected to the board. I have not the slightest doubt if your gentleman would give us this assurance, that the nominees of the government would be on the slate, or whatever they call it, we would be happy to have that assurance. I think they can give us the kind of guarantee that would result in these people being elected at a shareholders meeting. I still want to know whether or not they are prepared to consider the idea and give us that assurance.

Mr. Brown: I could not give that assurance at this time. It was discussed, but as I stated no director is competent to state that the parliament of Canada should appoint a director to the company.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on previous Thursdays in connection with this Bill S-37 by which the Bell Telephone Company of Canada seeks to increase the number of directors from 15 to 20, I have pointed out that my interest in this bill stems from the fact that a competing company with Northern Electric is located within the riding of York West. The factory or production centre is in the riding of York West, but many of the employees of that company are residents of the riding of York-Humber.

Now, some time ago the hon. member for Timiskaming asked a rhetorical question as to why the Bell Telephone Company wished to increase its directors from 15 to 20. I might state that, personally, I am in favour of increasing the number from 15 to 20 if we should ever get to a vote. However, in answer to the hon. member for Timiskaming I should like to suggest that the company wants more directors in order to strengthen its hold on Northern Electric. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands stated that the Bell Telephone Company controls 99 per cent of the stock of Northern Electric, which company is not under public supervision.

I have in my hands a Hansard report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. This is the report of a meeting held on Tuesday, July 7, 1964. Mr. Vincent, the president of the Bell Telephone Company answered a question by one of the hon. members for Halifax which is recorded on page 416 of this report, and I quote:

> We own 100 per cent of Northern Electric Company Limited.

There may be some directors with qualifying shares which would not be in the name of the Bell Telephone Company but may be entered in the name of the directors. However, the president of the Bell Telephone Company states that they own 100 per cent of Northern Electric Limited. Then, Mr. Regan, one of the two members for Halifax, questioned the representative of the Bell Telephone Company during this committee meeting. He asked specifically if it was not correct that Bell was entitled to own shares of Northern Electric Company simply because of a certain clause in their charter which states that they can buy any company operating a telephone line. Mr. Venne, who is vice president and general counsel gave the answer which is recorded on page 417 as follows—he is quoting section 4 of the incorporating act:

> The company shall also have power to enter into any arrangement with any person or company possessing, as proprietor, any line of telegraphic or telephonic communication, or any power or right to use communication by means of the telephone upon such terms and in such manner as the board of directors may, from time to time, deem expedient or advisable, or to become a shareholder in any such corporation.

Now, I have read the entire transcript of the evidence in the hearing before the board of transport commissioners some months ago in which the Bell Telephone Company was seeking some adjustment in its rates and capitalization and in which the Industrial Wire and Cable Company—which is located close to my riding—entered objections as intervenor. Many questions were asked during the hearing before the board concerning Bell Telephone Company's control of Northern Electric. The evidence, given under oath and available from the public record, indicates that the president, vice president and general counsel of the Bell Telephone Company pointed out that they were able to buy the shares of Northern Electric Company because Northern Electric owned a telephone company. Thus, section 4 of their charter allowed them to own another telephone company.

Well, further evidence brought out the fact that there is a telephone line of 19,000 feet in length between the Northern Electric plant in Montreal and one building of the Bell Telephone Company. You and I, being laymen in this telephonic communication business, would think the telephone line owned exclusively by Northern Electric would be a telephone line that you could go out and see with the naked eye, a telephone line over which persons such as you and I could talk to one another. Far be it for me to expose the situation, but I should like to quote from the board of transport commissioners. It appears from the evidence that the value of Bell Telephone Company's shareholdings in Northern Electric was $34 million. They said at that time they owned 90 per cent of the stock, and it has since been increased. If they had a $34 million investment in Northern Electric Company when they appeared before the board of transport commissioners a year ago, by adding 10 per cent we are within reason in saying that they must have a $38 million investment in Northern Electric now.

I mentioned that increasing the number of directors from 15 to 20 is probably necessary in order for Bell Telephone to strengthen the bond between Bell and Northern, because some of these directors would be interlocking directors. This investment of $38 million that the Bell Telephone Company has in Northern Electric shows up in their full beauty the two most valuable strands of copper wire in the Dominion of Canada. The evidence before the board of transport commissioners was to the effect that the Bell Telephone Company installed a telephone line for Northern Electric many years ago. After a year or so Northern Electric bought the telephone line from the Bell Telephone and thus become the proprietor of a telephone line.

Now, the charter of the Bell Telephone Company permits the company to buy any company that operates a telephone system. The interesting thing in the evidence was that there were only two strands in the telephone communication system which the Northern Electric Company operates in Montreal. What is further interesting is the fact that these two strands of copper wire are embedded in a major cable.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member was good enough at the outset of his remarks to indicate that he intended to establish a connection or relationship between what he is saying now and the bill presently before the committee. At the beginning of his remarks I thought there was some relevancy in what he was saying, but it seems to me that at this point he is referring to the technical operation of a company and I wonder whether this can properly be considered as relevant to the clause before the committee.

Mr. Cowan: You ask me to show a connection between my remarks and the bill. Mr. Chairman, here is the connection—two strands of copper wire that I am sure the members of the committee cannot even see.

The Chairman: I believe the hon. member is familiar with the rule of the house which requires members to deliver an oral presentation and argument unsupported by exhibits. We know that in courts of law the putting forward of exhibits is acceptable because exhibits can be filed and examined. But there is no such provision in relation to debates in this house and I would ask the hon. member to refrain from using exhibits at this time.

Mr. Cowan: I appreciate your remarks, Mr. Chairman. I would not have thought of bringing in an exhibit were it not for the fact that many flags were introduced a while ago; they appeared on the desks of members for a while and were then voluntarily removed. However, I do not need a material exhibit to make my point—that in the middle of a large cable running from Northern Electric to the Bell Telephone Company building there are two thin strands of copper wire. They are tagged at either end with little tags to say that these two strands belong to Northern Electric. This is in accordance with testimony presented before the board of transport commissioners.

Hon. members may think these are valuable wires—two strands representing an investment worth $38 million. This works out at the rate of $5 million a mile per strand, I believe—I have not figured it out on paper. But the interesting thing is that you cannot talk from one end of the wire to the other in conversation. The wire carries the voice in only one direction—from the Northern Electric plant to the Bell Telephone plant. This appears in the testimony produced before the board of transport commissioners. Of course it may be that Northern Electric only needs to use this line to ask the Bell Telephone Company what it must do next. Then I suppose the Bell Telephone Company either sends a messenger across to tell them what to do next or calls Northern Electric over the Bell Telephone system. But the capital ownership of Northern Electric by Bell is based on section 4 of a statute which gives the Bell Telephone Company the right to own a company which owns a telephone line and, as I have explained, Northern Electric owns a telephone line 19,000 feet long consisting of two strands of copper wire within a larger cable.

A little while ago the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn) gave an illuminating address on the manner in which Canadian taxpaying companies engaged in the production of wires and telephone equipment are in open competition with the Northern Electric Company which does a $150 million a year business with the Bell Telephone Company. I might point out that the Bell Telephone Company, as a consequence of its compensatory advantages, was able to put in a tender to the C.B.C. 25 per cent lower than either the C.P.R. or the C.N.R. were able to offer after 30 years experience of operation. It is obvious that the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. should know what it costs to service 195 radio stations. But when the contract came up for tender two years ago the Bell Telephone Company was able to undercut the tenders submitted by both the railway companies. As the presidents of both of these vast organizations pointed out in a letter to the government of the day, it would be interesting to know if it is fair, in the communication business, that a competitor should be able to undercut tenders on a competitive basis while fattening its profits in unregulated fields.

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction at the present time at this arrangement by which the stock of the Northern Electric Company is 100 per cent held by the Bell Telephone Company. A hearing has been held before the board of transport commissioners and Mr. Venne, solicitor for the company, who appeared before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines mentioned that the board of transport commissioners had decided it was perfectly legal for the company to hold the stock. Mr. Chairman, the board of transport commissioners is not a court of law. Mr. Venne told the committee that the board was "a court of record—a court of law". But it is not; and Mr. P. C. Venne, Q.C., general counsel for the Bell Telephone Company, knows it better than we do. The board of transport commissioners is a regulatory body and, like other great empire builders in the vast reaches of government, it seeks perpetually to increase its empire. Under the terms of the Railway Act which established the board of transport commissioners the board is authorized to make rules, regulations, orders and decisions. But it has come to the point where the board of transport commissioners when it renders a decision or makes an order places on top of it, the word "judgment". Mr. Chairman, they may think they are judges, but they are not judges and these are not legal rulings. The board of transport commissioners makes decisions or determinations.

I should like to suggest in the interest of the voters in my riding, in the interests of Industrial Wire and Cable and in the interests of millions of others in Canada that a request be made to the Supreme Court of Canada for a review to be made of the relationship between these two companies which are so closely knit together, one of them under so-called public regulation and the other under no regulation at all—the Bell Telephone Company and Northern Electric. Is this a combine in restraint of trade? Is this arrangement in violation of the restrictive trade practices act? Many people are asking these questions.

We were told during the sittings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, that the total income of the Bell Telephone Company in 1962 amounted to $471 million. What amazed us was to hear—and I think this information was given to us somewhat unintentionally—that the company paid the American Telephone and Telegraph Corporation of the United States 1 per cent of its income every year for research. I put a specific question to the officers of the Bell Telephone Company. I asked whether they meant 1 per cent of the gross income or of the net income. And they said it was 1 per cent of the gross. Now, on a gross income of $471 million in 1962, 1 per cent comes to $4,710,000 a year. I think it was the hon. member for Villeneuve, speaking some weeks ago on this bill, who asked whether income tax was being paid to the Canadian government on all the moneys earned by Bell Telephone. It would be interesting to know whether any tax is paid on this $4,710,000 which is sent to the United States under the guise of funds for research. We were told there were 15,000 employees in the research department of the A. T. and T. and that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada has the right to draw on all the results of the studies made by these ladies and gentlemen in the United States. I wonder whether the Department of National Revenue checks to find out whether the A. T. and T. in fact spends $4,710,000 on research work for the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. Perhaps they only spend $500,000 for research for the Bell Telephone Company. I would not know, never having been given an opportunity of looking into the books in that way. It is interesting in connection with that $4,710,000, that the Bell Telephone Company has a director representing the A.T.T. from the States, and we are pretty certain where the company is controlled despite all the wide publicity about 207,000 shareholders resident in Canada.

They told us in the committee meeting that maybe 300 people attend the annual meeting, and of course the voting is controlled by proxies; but it would be interesting to know what research the A.T.T. is going to do in the United States in connection with the false siren alarm that went off in Ottawa last Saturday. This siren system is operated by the Bell Telephone Company, and with all this money going to research one would have thought they would have found a way of overcoming shotgun pellets setting a city of 300,000 people on its ear, just because somebody was shooting starlings sitting on a telephone wire.

Are we getting value for the money we allow the Bell Telephone Company to send out of Canada for research in the United States on behalf of a Canadian company? We talk about the brain drain to the United States and about how there are few opportunities for our educated young men and women in Canada to engage in research. Why in the name of heaven can't this money be held back in Canada and research conducted in this dominion, or are they taking Canadians down into the United States to conduct research on money earned in Canada and shipped down to the United States, and no doubt classified as an expense to the company?

I am speaking on behalf of a fine company, Industrial Wire and Cable, which is engaged in a very competitive business. The hon. member for Broadview showed that a couple of weeks ago, and I believe it is entitled to every protection the government and the law can afford it. I do not think it should be forced to compete on an open market with a company subsidized to the extent of $150,000,000 a year in equipment purchases by the Bell Telephone Company, which does not go on the open market and ask for competitive prices.

I would suggest, before I make way for some other valuable contributions on this subject—because I know some are going to be made—the air will not be cleared until there has been an open reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for an investigation into the method of control of the Northern Electric Company by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. When Industrial Wire and Cable tried to appeal the decision of the board of transport commissioners to the Supreme Court of Canada, they got a curt refusal, that as their application involved a mixture of law and fact the supreme court would not be able to review it. If Industrial Wire and Cable are not given the opportunity of paying for an appeal to the supreme court, then I say the government of the day should see that such a reference is made. A final decision must be made on this matter of interest to millions of Canadians, a matter that has interested them for many years and will continue to interest them until a final decision is made by the most competent of authorities, and not such a board as the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I have followed with great interest the speeches made in this debate today, and I am particularly interested in the reasons and the suppositions put forward for an increase in the number of directors of this company. On behalf of several members of my party, as well as for myself I would like to thank the mover of this bill for the courtesy he paid us in introducing us to a vice president of the Bell Telephone Company and discussing with us some of the problems we raised. Following that meeting the vice president of the company wrote me a letter saying that although he could not agree with all the matters raised he was pleased that the conversation remained on a friendly and cordial basis. That is true, but we are not really interested in the cordial and friendly basis. We are interested in the reasons for the increase in number of the board of directors.

The relationship between the Bell Telephone Company and the Northern Electric Company has created a great deal of controversy in the minds of many hon. members, especially the method used in acquiring Northern Electric Company. Many hon. members have asked questions about this, which the board of transport commissioners will have to answer. It is not quite correct, in my opinion, for the mover of the bill to say that the matter about the ownership of Northern Electric and the interalliance between the two companies could be raised by Industrial Wire and Cable whenever that company wished it to be raised. As I remember it, this matter was asked to be deferred by the board itself, and the second part of the inquiry was left in abeyance and remains in abeyance. It would appear that because of this request there will have to be a further request from Industrial Wire and Cable before the matter is brought before the public once more.

I make no apology for saying my interest in this is more on the subscribers' side than the Northern Electric side of the question, but I do endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands who said Bell Telephone Company is a monopoly company, that it operates in a monopolistic field, that this field has to be a monopoly, and that we representing the people of Canada must show some interest in the relation of the Bell Telephone Company to its subscribers and to the interests of the country.

The siren alarm which was mentioned by the hon. member for York-Humber gives rise to one of the problems that the board of transport commissioners will have much difficulty in settling. I believe the Bell Telephone Company is away out of its jurisdiction in many fields in which it operates, and it is for this reason we think part of the board of directors must represent the public of Canada.

I was very pleased to hear the vice president of the company tell us that he expected at least one or two of the proposed new directors would be appointed from the university level, that they would be academic people chosen to give the board a broader public representation than it now has, but I discount his suggestion that this is to allow the vice presidents to take turns in going on the board of directors. I do not believe that is correct; I do not believe that is necessary, and I do not believe it would serve the interests of the company, of the subscribers, and more particularly of the shareholders to have additional directors appointed from the management side of the company.

I am sure the management and the board of directors have discussed this with each other. I am sure they are willing to allow the vice presidents to appear on the board of directors, with voice but without vote, and such nominees would appear in a managerial status.

I am interested in this matter because of the picture that is shown by the financial statements of the various companies held by Bell Telephone, and also because of the high rates charged to subscribers to the Bell Telephone system. An indication of this is the Montreal system where the private rate is $6.46. In Ottawa it is $5.46, and in Halifax the Maritime Telephone Company rate is $5.35. In Saskatchewan the system is operated by a provincial telephone exchange under the government and there the rate is only $3.90. In Regina, under the Saskatchewan provincial government the rate is $3.90. This may double in the next few weeks owing to the change of government, but at the time I obtained these figures it was $3.90. The Alberta government system is $3.50.

I do not want to go into all the ramifications of these figures, Mr. Chairman, but let no hon. member confuse himself into believing that it is cheaper to operate a rural telephone system than an urban telephone system. But the Bell Telephone urban systems are almost double the cost to the subscriber of the rural telephone systems. This is the reason we wish to have some control and why I wish to move an amendment. This amendment, in my mind, will allow you and I and the people of Canada to give the Bell Telephone Company, in an academic sense, the chance to have certain people on their board of directors, so as to give it the allure they wish the board to present. I move:

That clause 1 of the bill be amended by striking out lines 9 to 21 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"8. The business of the company shall be managed by a board of not less than five nor more than twenty directors, as may from time to time be determined by resolution of the shareholders, and three such directors shall be appointed by the governor in council and each other such director, additional to these three, shall be the proprietor of at least ten shares in the capital stock of the company, or such other additional number of shares, not exceeding forty additional shares, as the shareholders shall by any resolution passed at any annual general meeting, or special general meeting, from time to time determine; and the said board of directors, save as in this section provided, shall be elected and hold office as hereinafter provided; and all the directors so appointed shall be Canadians resident in Canada and a majority, where more than two, of the directors so elected shall be residents of Canada".

We have discussed this matter, Mr. Chairman, with the vice president of the company. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has pointed out, this gentleman said: "This is a very interesting idea but why pick on me? Why not pick on the Canadian Pacific Railway?" I suppose he chose the C.P.R. because it is larger than the Bell Telephone Company, is in the public domain and in a monopoly field as well. We believe that if what the sponsor has said is representative of the thinking of the majority of the board of directors who are asking parliament to increase the number of directors, then we can supply what they seem to require and increase the board in a way which will give it the appearance of impartiality which I think the vice president indicated was desirable. This could be accomplished by letting the governor in council appoint three of the directors.

There are a number of ways of doing this. Originally I thought we should buy stock in the company; that perhaps the government should take it over as a crown corporation. However, I think this is a very mild way of exerting some authority which I think the board of transport commissioners has been unable to exert.

I sincerely believe that if we are wrong in our supposition that the Northern Electric Company is being used for ulterior purposes, if we are wrong in our belief that rural telephones are more expensive to operate than urban telephone exchanges, and if we are wrong in assuming that the rate in Ottawa should be lower than the rate in rural parts of Ontario and rural parts of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the maritimes as well, then I believe that these representatives, the ombudsmen, really, of the federal government in this monopoly jurisdiction, will serve the Bell Telephone Company well. We certainly will not appoint low class people, but they will be ordinary people representative of the Canadian government who will act responsibly in representing the Bell Telephone, but who will act also to represent the people of Canada, the subscribers of the Bell Telephone Company and all other interested parties, including the competitors of this company in one of its fields.

The Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Regan: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a rather unusual and unique suggestion which has been made by the hon. member, and I think one which would require a certain amount of consideration on the part of many members who are present before we were in a position even to judge the merits involved. Certainly in this specific case suggested by the hon. member it would set a very sweeping precedent indeed, a precedent which would apply in the case of any privately owned utility which was subject to the jurisdiction of this house. I know the hon. member has given the matter a great deal of thought before moving the amendment today; of that we can be certain; but I am sure he would be ready to agree that he has left the members of this committee in the position that they have not had sufficient time even to examine the proposal. On this basis there can be no question but that before I would want to comment further I would hope that there would be the opportunity to examine in some detail the amendment which he has moved. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Chairman, before I close those brief remarks, I should like to point out to the minister, as I did this afternoon, that the government is often weak enough to yield to repeated requests from pressure groups which pretend to exercise the privileges of democracy, but which often represent but a very slight percentage of their alleged supporters.

By means of blatant publicity, with the help of newspapers, radio and television, and also as a result of polls conducted by people who handle election campaigns, such associations or pressure groups, who often represent only a very low percentage of the mass of private individuals who are supposed to be concerned, influence the government to such an extent that it will finally propose social legislation which, no matter how attractive it might be from a humanitarian viewpoint, proves disastrous from an economic and social point of view. Once again, I shall caution the minister against this excessive enthusiasm which could result from the application of a social measure. I feel that if the government spent more money for medical research on cancer, not only in connection with the use of tobacco but with regard to cancer itself, cardiovascular diseases and mental illness, it would render a much greater service to the people than if it decided to increase its contribution in the field of social security.

I should like to quote from memory the words of Mr. Claude Jourdain, former Liberal member for Gaspé North in the Quebec legislature. Speaking before the economic council of the Gaspé peninsula, he said that the government should reduce, if not abolish, all social security benefits, so that the people of his district—and I think this could be implemented on a national basis—would decide to earn their living by working instead of relying on state assistance. In addition, Mr. Jourdain said that such a measure would not increase the popularity of any political party but that, for the good of the citizens of his region, a political party just had to take a decision to that effect.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the government should rather try to solve the unemployment problem, to abolish salary differentials in various regions, in short to help the Canadian citizens to earn their living by themselves instead of making them dependant on the state, because it is a well-known fact that everything that pertains to the state is much more costly than that which has nothing to do with it.

The minister also talked about a new organization set up by the Department of National Health and Welfare to deal with the marketing of new drugs.

At this stage, I should like to point out that the food and drugs committee did some most interesting work not because I was one of its members but because all the other members were most objective in the serious and precise questions they asked the representatives of various groups. In fact, I am sure that the committee's recommendations will be advantageous not only to the department but to every Canadian.

I should also like to say a word about amateur sport. I suppose the hon. member who will speak after me—the name of his riding has slipped my mind for the moment—will also discuss that point since he has been interested in amateur sport for years.

Once again, I regret that the administration of amateur sports comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare. However, since this division of the department is still at the organization stage we have no choice but to go along with it. I believe that the country, in general, should do even more than it does at present for amateur sports.

There are several good reasons to change such a policy. First of all, we know that amateur sport will go a long way to give a good physical education to our young people, to improve the physical fitness of the whole population and especially, to bolster the reputation of Canada at the international level in the field of sports.

When we see, for instance, that hockey clubs representing Canada at the Olympic games or in world tournaments are generally second class clubs, except last year, when a new system was given a try, it is really humiliating for Canada to realize that while our country has a monopoly, if we may say so, in regard to the quality of hockey at home, it is being defeated by much inferior countries on the international level, merely because the government did not want to take its responsibilities in that regard and did not make a sufficient financial contribution to certain teams that could have been worthy representatives.

Be that as it may, it is a pleasure to note the continuous progress made in the Department of National Health and Welfare. We hope that the department will not fall into the same traps as other countries, which turned out to be economically disastrous.

We hope that from now on and little by little, the Minister of National Health and Welfare will heed the advice of the various groups represented in this house who reflect Canadian public opinion, so that the legislation to be introduced by the Department of National Health and Welfare and by other departments will really promote the welfare of the Canadian people.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I hope hon. members of the committee will permit me to interject something at this time while there are a number of members present in the chamber.

Earlier this afternoon many hon. members joined me in extending felicitations to my departmental secretary. Since that time I have learned that today is a very special day in the life of my senior deputy, the deputy minister of health, who has held that office for nearly 20 years. Since 1926 he has taken over a number of new ministers, three at least, and led them, if not down the garden path, at least up the path through the administration.

Dr. Donald Cameron is a man much beloved by those associated with him, not only by ministers but by very many members of parliament who over the years have had occasion to seek his advice and assistance. Today is his 65th birthday. Normally that would be the signal for his retirement, but he has been good enough to agree to serve Canada for at least one additional year. I am happy that this year saw the opening of the new building and I am happy that I have this opportunity on behalf of the thousands of people who work in the department of health and who have known him over the years to offer my felicitations to him. I am also happy, Mr. Chairman, to provide an opportunity at the close either of today's sitting or of the estimates, whichever first occurs, when many of his friends will be able to come to my office and to give him greetings. In concluding, I should like to offer to him a token of our esteem, even if the Sergeant-at-Arms may have it removed shortly thereafter. I apologize to him because for all I know perhaps it should be a Tory blue cornflower, but I should like him to accept this red rose.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to say a word at this stage of the proceedings. Everything the minister has said is entirely correct. Having practically lived with the gentleman in question for some six years I can vouch for everything the minister has said. I would refer particularly to the steadying influence he has exerted in the Department of National Health and Welfare over the years. I know we will all wish him the very best of everything in the future and we will have to wait and see, of course, what happens after his year's extension.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we too would like to join in the expression of felicitations to Dr. Cameron. We are very pleased that the minister has drawn our attention to the fact that this is his birthday and we feel that in taking this unusual way of paying tribute to this deputy minister we are paying tribute to all members of the very efficient and hardworking staff of this department. Now that Miss Waters has been mentioned and now that Dr. Cameron has had a birthday, I hope that before the evening is over there will be something said about Joe Willard.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, may I associate the members of this group with those who have offered greetings and felicitations on this very interesting occasion.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of our group, I would like to join all the others in offering our most sincere congratulations to Dr. Cameron.

[Text]

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as the one in the chamber tonight who, with the exception perhaps of the President of the Privy Council, has sat longest in the house, may I say that this is a most felicitous occasion and I compliment the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the light touch with which she introduced this tribute to Dr. Cameron. Perhaps there is a ruse involved. The minister is creating such good will that I imagine my estimates will come up faster than I had anticipated.

Mr. Monteith: Too bad.

Mr. Benidickson: May I say that the hon. member for Perth and I have been associated with the deputy minister of health for a great number of years. I also had the honour of working with the new deputy minister of welfare when I was vice chairman of the joint committee that brought in a unanimous report recommending universal old age pensions. So it is a great delight to me to have been associated with these people.

I was also a member of the house when the first lady adviser to a minister of the department sat in the chair in front of the minister, as Miss Waters sits again tonight. Dr. Cameron and I have had a long and close association and I wish to extend birthday greetings to him and the wish that he may long serve the state. Many people have served the state after reaching the age of 65 and I hope he will have the opportunity to do so for some time in the future.

This department more or less developed during the course of my own career. The Hon. Brooke Claxton was its first minister. He was a superb organizer and I can say to the parliamentary secretaries behind me that he developed his concept of the department when he was a parliamentary secretary. He persuaded the prime minister at that time that this department was an important and necessary bailiwick, and we thank those officials who in association with members of parliament have made the development of this department possible.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Chairman, at this time I should like to say a few words about the physical fitness program. As we all know, the physical fitness program of the Department of National Health and Welfare has been the subject of criticism under both governments and I am afraid that I have been one of the main critics, as has the hon. member for Peel. However, in addition to offering a few suggestions at this time which I think are vital to the success of a physical fitness program I should also like to give a few bouquets.

First I want to congratulate the minister on the increase in the funds allocated to Olympic teams. This in itself has automatically caused more interest not only within the different organizations receiving the funds but also among the Canadian people themselves. The very fact of receiving these grants has lent an added incentive to the teams and organizations concerned. We all know there are different groups within any Olympic organization. Some are able to raise funds because they are a group that appeals to the public and they can get people to come out to see them perform. Others cannot. These grants will add to their incentive to work to raise funds to send their representatives to the Olympics.

Our Prime Minister, who we have to admit is a really true sportsman and athlete in every sense of the word, is to be commended highly for taking time out of his very busy schedule to attend athletic functions such as the Canadian Henley at St. Catharines and the Olympic track and field trials at St. Lambert, Quebec. There is little doubt in the minds of all of us, I am sure, that his presence at these functions must have not only added prestige to them but have contributed to the morale of the athletes participating in the events.

It was also rather gratifying to have the Minister of National Health and Welfare attend the Olympic games at Innsbruck, representing the government of Canada. I would not say that I agreed with everything she said after she came back, but the fact is that Canada had a fine representative there. I do not know whether this was the first time that Canada was represented at the Olympic games by such a person. At the Olympic games this fall in Tokyo the hon. member for York West, the one and only Red Kelly, is going to represent the Canadian government. As we all know, he is one of the most respected and outstanding young athletes today and I am sure all members will agree that Canada will be well and truly represented by him.

I would be very remiss indeed if I did not mention the wonderful Father Bauer at this time. Surely Canada must be very proud, not only of his work as a coach of our Olympic team but of the great respect he brought to himself, to his team and to the people of Canada as a result of the true sportsmanship shown by him during the hockey championships. Those were very trying circumstances, and Canada can be proud of the fact we had such a wonderful young gentleman handling our team.

I mentioned previously a little bit about grants. I just want to say this, that as important as grants are to our teams and to our athletic organizations, the most important feature by far—let us get this straight now—of any physical fitness program is the child, our youth in the country. Naturally, any physical fitness program that deals with children has to start in the school itself. I realize that schools mean education and education is a provincial matter. However I sincerely hope that perhaps as a result of the co-operation of the provinces we may be able to put a federal program into the schools right across Canada.

There is one thing however that we can do federally to get this physical fitness program off the ground. This is something that is absolutely necessary if any physical fitness program is to succeed. I refer to the need for facilities. If we have not got facilities, nothing can happen. Today, more than any time in our history, we need these facilities. We are living in an age entirely different from the past. Our boys and girls go to school in buses or drive their own cars. We are living in a different age under different conditions. We do need a physical fitness program more than ever. There are many areas in the different parts of Canada that are practically devoid of facilities, track and field, arenas, swimming pools and so forth.

The reference to swimming pools reminds me of a situation in the minister's constituency. I do not know whether or not she realizes it, but there is only one covered swimming pool in the Niagara district to take care of something like 60,000 people. I am going to say this, that in West Germany, a country that was devastated during the war, they have a program which covers 15 years and is called the "golden plan". This program will provide a billion and a half dollars worth of facilities for the youth of that country. So we can go ahead and take this $5 million grant which, so far as I am concerned, is slowly being used up. This is merely a pittance to a country like Canada that has not felt the ravages of war. We could start off with $15 million or $25 million and it would be money well spent. Let me tell you that money spent on sports will return more than dollars and cents to the people and the communities of this nation. It will make returns in the form of good citizenship, and God only knows we need it these days.

I have just finished reading quite an interesting little book entitled "Soviet and Sport", by Dr. Henry W. Morton a member of the faculty of Queen's University. I have no intention of dealing with these matters because they would take up all my time; however, I should like to point out something. The U.S.S.R. has a seven year plan which will be completed in 1967. Do you know what is going to happen by that time? One out of every four people, a quarter of the population of the U.S.S.R., will belong to a sports organization. Remember, this quarter of the people of Russia will be the vital, youthful sector of that society, and that really means something. The Soviets do not look upon sport as a means for creating only physical fitness, health and stamina. They look upon it also as a means of ensuring the prestige of their country in the world today, in the sport world. Whether we like it or whether we do not, during peacetime we need this and our young people need it. They need sport; they need relaxation to burn up their energies. We are having enough trouble as it is and one reason for that is that we are not properly organized for sport activities in which the young people can take part.

I do not know whether you realize the important part our young athletes really play in bringing respect to Canada and Canadians throughout the world today. I do not know whether you realize it or not but you can be in Canada today and in Europe tomorrow. It was not always this way. Our soldiers were recognized in the first and second world wars; they really let the world know what Canada was. What about the big space between the two world wars? What about the big space following the last war? Tourists were not going over there then because they did not have the money they have today. There were a few members of the government and businessmen going over at that time, but how did Canada become the respected nation she is today? How did that old maple leaf become what it is and how was it kept in front of the people? I will tell you. Mr. Frank Sargent, past president of the Canadian amateur hockey association took a team on tour through Europe at that time. They went over by boat and spent some time in the countries of Europe. This is what the top government men, the top men in the cities and communities in which they played hockey said—just try and get this because I have never forgotten it: Outside of war, the only time we ever hear the name "Canada" mentioned is when your young athletes tour our country with their hockey teams and play their games in our cities.

I am going to say this, that sport is the greatest means for breaking down barriers; it is the common denominator that creates equality. It does not make any difference whether you are red or yellow or black; it does not make any difference whether you are Catholic, Jewish or Protestant, in these sport lanes you are as one. Let us never forget that. It does do something else, it makes you value one another. The value of sport cannot be added up in dollars and cents. I just want to bring one further thought to you about the Soviet union and sport. This is the most important thing so far as the U.S.S.R. is concerned, that sport organizations are used as the means of rallying the working men around the various party government and training organizations, and are automatically drawn into the social and political life of the nation. That is why they are doing it. That is why they have a quarter of their youth tied up in sports organizations. I will not go as far as to say the same should be done in Canada. But I do believe that physical fitness and sport should and could play a far greater role in the life of our nation.

Mr. Willoughby: I should like to add my personal congratulations and felicitations to Dr. Cameron on his sixty fifth anniversary. I should also like to add my personal suggestion to him, that in view of his fitness physically as well as mentally he should continue to offer his services to his country in some way and not allow the fact that he has reached this milestone to persuade him to retire to some position where he could not do anything either for himself or for his country and where his qualities would deteriorate. I feel men of his experience are so valuable to their country that they should not allow such milestones as these to interfere with their future activities for our welfare.

I am happy to have this opportunity to make a few observations with regard to this important and interesting department. The department of health and welfare is probably the most important of all the departments of the federal government. Now that it has reached a wonderful position of being able to spend more than $2 billion annually, I think it is in the top bracket of all the government departments. As far as the estimates before us are concerned, I have no particular objection to the items which are included, or to the remarks which have been made by the minister. My complaint is directed, rather, to the omissions.

I do not wish to delay passage of these estimates unduly. Indeed I think they should be passed without much delay. I spoke in November of last year on the estimates of this department and at that time I stressed the great importance of medical research. This evening I wish to continue in that vein. I feel this is probably the most important field which lies before the department today. Indeed it is probably the most important question facing medical science in Canada today and I believe it offers an opportunity for the government to provide assistance so as not only to save money for the taxpayer but also to improve our scientific status as a nation. There have been suggestions that further grants will be made, and I am grateful for them. But I feel these improvements are only fractional. I believe, and I am sure the vast majority of the medical profession in Canada would agree with me, that as far as the government is concerned medical research is a neglected child in Canada. As I have already mentioned, this is a most vital need if medical science is to advance; it is vital, also, to the educational services of medicine.

I had hoped to speak on this subject when the estimates of the research council were before the committee for consideration, but unfortunately there was no opportunity to do so. I should like to suggest now that the subject of the research council is closely allied with the observations I am making this evening. The council has added to its budget the sum or $1.8 million. There is no question but that we are grateful for this addition. But I would draw this to the attention of the committee: $1.8 million is just the equivalent of the grants received from the United States which are being cancelled. So we are just where we began before this grant was made; there has really been no increase. Canada today needs to double this amount in order to be effective in this great field of medical research. I should like to suggest three pertinent questions to this committee. I should like to ask why Canadians in the upper income bracket frequently find it advisable to go to the United States institutions for medical treatment. I do not endorse this practice; I feel it is unnecessary. But it is a fact that it exists. I would even get down to a more personal question and ask why it is that members of this House of Commons go to the United States for medical care. It is unnecessary. We can do the same things here in Canada. But this is the situation which exists today. What happens when people go to the United States? In many cases they are treated by Canadians, men who trained at Canadian universities, graduated there and went to the United States to work. It reminds one of the well known story of the Scotsman who made his first business trip to London. When he returned to Glasgow they asked him how he got along with Englishmen, and he replied: Englishmen? I didn't see any Englishmen. I only talked with heads of firms.

Let me repeat, there are approximately 350 Canadian medical men who go to take up practice in the United States every year. They are replaced by about 100 who come here from Europe, so we have a deficit of 250 every year. These doctors go to the United States partly because of the climate and partly because of economic reasons. But I am glad to say that medical men in general are not influenced in going to the United States for economic reasons. They go there mostly because of the scientific advantages, and that is why we are experiencing this terrible drain of graduates from Canadian universities. We are spending money on training these people but they go to the United States where they are offered better facilities and very few of them ever return to Canada.

I should like to put on the record a report from New York which was published in the Toronto Globe and Mail on August 4 of this year under the name of Frederick Hodgson, and these are the views of Canadian scientists attending the sixth international congress of biochemistry. I will not detain the committee by putting the whole report on record, but this paragraph is of particular interest because it has a direct bearing on the subject I am dealing with tonight. This is what it says:

Unless Ottawa loosens the federal purse strings and pours more millions into basic scientific research, particularly into the biological and medical fields, there will be a mass migration of Canadian scientists to laboratories and universities in the United States.

I should like to quote now from Dr. John T. Edsall, head of the department of biochemistry at Harvard University, who backed up this prediction by saying:

This is not a brain drain engineered by the United States. It is an insane export of scientific manpower. If I can't get support for my work in my own country then I've got to go where I can get that support.

Canada is rich enough to stand on her own two feet scientifically.

He continued in the same vein:

Grants to research laboratories in Canada have been cut by about 20 per cent this year—

These are the American grants he is speaking of.

—with an additional cut of 40 per cent due in the next fiscal year.

He continued at great length, but I shall only burden you with one more quotation, in which he said he saw no other way to give Canada scientific independence than to get Canada to contribute more to scientific research. That is what we are facing in Canada today.

I also have here the report of the National Research Council of Canada for 1962-63. This year's report is not out yet, but here are a couple of sentences from the report of the vice president, Dr. R. F. Farquharson, who is well known to many hon. members:

Two great shortages currently exist in Canada's medical research program. One of these is the small number of full time appointments in Canadian medical schools, particularly in clinical departments. Because of its heavy teaching load, the small full time staff has inadequate time for research.

Further on he made this statement:

The other great shortage is of research laboratories. In all our universities there is a serious lack of space for the work that must be done. This shortage is becoming a critical factor actively interfering with further progress. It also aggravates the tendency for good people to seek positions outside the country.

This is a serious situation and I do not think we in the House of Commons are aware of the seriousness of it. Economically it is to our advantage to pay some attention to this matter. We have more medical schools than are actually necessary in Canada today, if we could keep our doctors at home. At the present time, without allowing for increased population, if we could keep our medical graduates at home we would not need any more medical schools. We have 12 of them but we lose 30 per cent of their graduates to the United States.

When health insurance is introduced there will be a greater demand than ever for medical graduates, and I know we will need more medical schools because of increased population but, as I say, we have enough now if we could keep the graduates in Canada. We would save ourselves the extra expense of more schools if we could keep our people from migrating, and the unfortunate thing is that in this migration we are losing our scientific leaders and many of our potential teachers. We are losing the individuals with inquiring minds, and they are leaving because of exasperation and frustration. They are leaving because of lack of facilities to carry on the work they want to do in Canada, and they are finding greater opportunities to develop their research tendencies in other countries.

I have another short quotation here, this one from Sir Howard Florey, delivering his David Rivett memorial lecture at the University of Melbourne:

There are, of course, personal rivalries between laboratories, between universities and between countries, but the desire to know, and the desire to know first, explains a great deal of the drive of scientists for ever better facilities and their increasing tendency to go to whatever country is prepared to offer them a satisfactory scientific life.

This is what is happening to Canada. Canada has reached a crisis in regard to its medical education. The time was when Canada led the world but today we are becoming a second or third rate medical country. The teachers with the exploring minds are going elsewhere. They go where they can get the top medical research facilities.

In the amount of money we devote for scientific research in medicine, how do we compare with the sums provided in other countries? Per capita and on a gross national basis for every $1 donated in the United States toward medical research Britain donates 20 cents and Canada 15 cents, and that 15 cents includes what we get from philanthropic sources. We cannot look with any pride on the fact that we donate only 15 cents per head as compared with $1 per head in the United States.

As a country we should realize that if we are to hold our place in the world we must donate what is relatively fair in proportion to our gross national product. The United States donates more than six times as much as we do in Canada, and therefore it is obvious why Canadians will go to the United States for medical care. It is also obvious why our best scientists go to the United States, and it is obvious why our medical schools are tending to deteriorate.

Unfortunately those of our doctors who stay in Canada have to teach yesterday's medicine, and yesterday's medicine is not good enough for today, and it will be worse for tomorrow. We are simply failing to keep pace with world development. As I have said, our medical schools are becoming second and third rate. At one time, not many generations ago, they were the best medical schools in the world but now they are gradually deteriorating. We must do something about it, and we must do it now.

I congratulate the minister upon her announcement the other day of a fine contribution towards the extension of the medical research facilities in the University of British Columbia. I happen to be familiar with that undertaking, as I come from B.C. myself, and I congratulate the minister on the assistance being offered to Dr. J. McCreary, dean of medicine there. He is undertaking a wonderful experiment, and I understand she is also assisting medical education in other provinces. This is something which should be extended across the nation.

The Farquharson report, which was the result of an investigation of the situation not long ago, indicated we required not only grants for the salaries and for the upkeep of these institutions but that $37 million was required to construct proper facilities for research centres in hospitals and universities. That report, as I recall it, came in about two years ago, although I may be out a year or so. But the fact is that what was going to cost $37 million at that time will now cost $60 million, and the longer we put it off the greater will be the cost.

There is also a large amount of expenditure on the part of drug and pharmaceutical firms in Canada as well as their associated organizations in the United States. As a member of the committee of this house on food and drugs it was my privilege to visit some of the research laboratories in Canada, and I feel that we should all be appreciative of the work which these people are doing. They are doing fine work as far as research is concerned, and I think that if it is necessary for us to assist them in some way we should be prepared to do so. But we should under any circumstances be prepared to increase the amount of grants we are presently making to these objects. It is extremely important that we do so.

On a recent trip to Montreal the members of the food and drugs committee were allowed the privilege of visiting several laboratories. In this connection I should like to draw to the attention of this committee an article which happened to be on my desk this dinner recess, having come in in today's mail. I think it is rather interesting. It refers to a Dr. Hans Selye, a man of whom we in Canada should be very proud. He is doing wonderful work and is so engrossed in scientific research that no amount of money would influence him to go anywhere else. Part of this article reads as follows:

> In the face of strong opposition, Selye devoted himself to the task of finding the causes of this stress syndrome and, in moments of doubt, he gained added strength from the fact that one of the most noted Canadian scientists, Sir Frederick Banting, has been interested in his studies from the outset. As an adviser for the national research council, a government body, Banting visited university laboratories throughout the country and, when he came to Montreal, he often dropped into Selye's small, crammed laboratory and listened attentively to the young research worker. Banting was also responsible for Selye's first financial support, a modest grant of $500.
> "But this was not as important to me as the moral support and encouragement I derived from being taken seriously by the discoverer of insulin," Dr. Selye recalls. He continued his investigations and perseverance brought success.

Also while in Montreal we had the opportunity to visit the laboratory of Dr. Genest in the Hôtel Dieu, who is doing probably some of the world's greatest research into cardiovascular disease, particularly in regard to arteriosclerosis and high blood pressure. I am sure that everyone in the house should have the opportunity to visit his laboratory, because I never saw anything so disgraceful in my life. This gentleman is doing national work. His office is so crowded with books and diplomas that he hardly has a place to sit down, and his laboratory is equally overcrowded. He has visitors from all the large institutions in the United States, where they have all the facilities to work with, and who come to him because he is doing wonderful work under these adverse circumstances.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we have to wake up and increase our grants toward medical research or we are not only going to lose our status in the medical world but also our scientists will be lost to the United States and things will get worse. We can save ourselves money if we take an interest in this subject and in those engaged on medical research in our country. In this way we can re-establish ourselves to the position which is ours. I say that today we are in a period of explosive scientific development. Do you realize, Mr. Chairman, that 90 per cent of all the scientists who ever lived in the world are alive today? That is a very striking statement but I have that on very good authority. Scientific developments and knowledge are increasing so rapidly that they are going ahead at lightning speed, and wealthy countries like Canada—and we are a wealthy country—must develop our scientific resources or we are going to lose them. We have everything here to work with. I say let us save our scientists for Canada. Let us save our prestige in the field of medicine. Let us save our medical schools and develop and maintain adequate research facilities. Let us pay adequate salaries to those willing to dedicate their lives to medical research in the interests of the welfare of human beings, and let us wake up to our urgent responsibilities. I ask the government to act now because tomorrow may be too late. In the interests of science and national economy let us extend our medical research facilities so as to preserve not only our scientists but also probably postpone the immediate necessity for building more medical schools.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the minister and others in congratulating the deputy minister. I might say that Welland had an earlier attraction for him as he came often in his earlier days, and won the hand of his better half, who is a very fine lady.

I want to say a few words tonight about the necessity for an increased grant to the health league of Canada. The health league of Canada has served the country for 45 years or more and as far as I know it was the only organization of that type in Canada. Other organizations have been formed since, but they have been segmentations of public spirited individuals who have joined together into associations, groups and the like, and devoted their work to a more specific aspect of health.

There are many things one could say about the health league of Canada. I think it is the only voluntary organization devoted mainly to the prevention of disease rather than to its cure. It is the only voluntary health organization in Canada with a charter which is concerned with an all-embracing interest in personal and community health. It is also the only organization in Canada with experience in established policies and it is prepared to advance, either singly or in co-operation with other health agencies, the promotion of any new and improved health technique, thereby helping to improve the health of our people. I would suggest that the health league of Canada stands as a sentry in our society in respect of anything that may become a challenge to the best health treatment we can give. I can give one example of this fact. In my home town a few years ago the local anti-fluoridationists combined to have fluorine eliminated from our water supply. A vote was held and it was retained. The health league gave a great deal of assistance in this fight by supplying data, material and a great deal of other help. We preserved the practice of adding fluorine to our water, and this has certainly been beneficial to the condition of our children's teeth, and will continue to be so in the future.

Dr. Gordon Bates, head of the health league of Canada was the one man in the forefront promoting pasteurization of milk in Canada, as a result of which I am sure many lives have been saved. Dr. Bates was also in the forefront promoting the immunization of our citizens, although I know that many others were involved. The health league has done a great deal in promoting fluoridation of communal water supplies through the publication of its magazine and in other ways. I read an article about ten days ago in a Toronto newspaper which quoted a dentist as saying that the savings to the people in the city of Toronto alone as a result of fluoridation will in the future be as high as $1,200,000 per annum.

Mr. Chairman, grants from the federal government to the health league of Canada were at one time $25,000, although this has now been cut to $15,000. Since the period of that reduction the expenses of the health league have doubled as a result of increased postage charges on periodicals, which the league distributes, as well as the cost of raw materials and printing.

The voluntary health committee of the Senate and the House of Commons has received a great deal of co-operation from the health league of Canada as a result of the provision of speakers here at luncheon meetings, many of whom a great number of the members of this house have heard. I am sure we have all learned a great deal about the health league. The hon. member for Simcoe East was chairman of that health committee under the previous government, and I have filled that position during the last year or so. Our meetings have been held often and I am sure the members of that committee realize that with the increased need of assistance, the federal government grants to this health league are not sufficient. During successive years this committee has passed resolutions, which have been presented both to the previous minister of national health and welfare, and to the present minister, suggesting that this annual grant should be increased. I appeal to the present minister, who always has a keen sense in respect of the need to increase general health in our country, to give favourable consideration to the requests to increase this annual grant.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Chairman, I should like to rise during what is left of this doctors' night in the House of Commons and make a few remarks. Before I do I should like to explain the exuberance of our party during the last few minutes. In the last few minutes we have learned that Mr. Renwick has just been conceded as the winner in the by-election in the Toronto Riverdale riding.

At this time, if there was no mention of the Hall commission report, I think we would be remiss. With all the medical-social recommendations that it contains, a person in my position is forced to endorse this report and advocate its full acceptance without, I hope, its being torn to shreds when it is produced as legislation in the house. The recommendations, including medical education and research facilities, relate to some of the most important needs of the present day. However, tonight I am not dealing with this subject, but rather I am going to discuss one of Canada's significant minority groups—that of the mentally retarded.

I appreciate the fact that the minister in her opening remarks mentioned the work the government is doing in this regard, but I consider it of sufficient importance to emphasize certain points. In Canada today there are more than 540,000 retarded persons, representing some 3 per cent of the population. Another 6.7 per cent of the population may be described as borderline. Of our retarded people, 116,000 are between the ages of 3 and 19.

Retarded persons may be divided into three classes. The first group comprises the 4 per cent who will never exceed the mental age of 4, and will always be dependant. The next group includes the 13 per cent who may achieve a mental age of 8, and can be trained to be partially self-sustaining. The largest group is the 83 per cent who may reach a mental age of 12, and can be educated to be totally self-supporting. Of the 116,000 mentally retarded children in Canada, 96 per cent, or 111,000, are trainable. Yet only about 10 per cent of them are presently receiving training.

Dr. Donald Zarfas of the children's psychiatric research institute in London has said that prevention of retardation involves "prevention of deterioration in the retardate by helping him to overcome his handicaps as much as possible by good training programs." Education of the retarded is an expensive proposition. The cost of full time schooling is 400 to 600 per cent higher than for normal children, because of the special equipment, facilities and time required. It is estimated that day schools for 95,000 pupils, and boarding schools for another 10,000 are now needed. We must also provide for some 31,000 school-age children from rural areas. The cost of such a program, properly executed, could come to many millions of dollars, but surely we are practising false economy if we fail to spend this money.

Of those retardates who receive training, 83 per cent can be expected to support themselves, and another 13 per cent to support themselves to some extent. Ideally, only 4 per cent of the mentally retarded should be fully dependant.

In failing to provide adequate training, we fail to equip the retarded to support themselves, and thus render them dependant on public or private funds. The cost of supporting a dependant person through his lifetime is far in excess of the cost of the education that could and should be provided for him. Officials of the Canadian association of social workers state that retardation, in children and adults, forms one of their major problems in welfare work.

Beyond education itself, many other services must be provided. Diagnostic services are all important, so that mental retardation can be detected early and proper treatment instituted.

Home visiting services, vocational training, job placement services and recreational facilities are needed. Institutions for those who cannot live in the community are essential. At present some 18,000 persons are accommodated in 13 government supported institutions, all overcrowded. Another 19,000 retarded persons are in mental institutions; a highly unsatisfactory situation.

In order to carry out all these essential steps, more doctors, psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers, nurses, occupational therapists and educationists are needed, and provision must be made for their training. Canada's objectives should be those of the World Health Organization, expressed as follows:

> All children irrespective of whether or not they suffer from mental or physical handicap, should have every access to the best medical diagnosis and treatment, allied therapeutic services, nursing and social services, education, vocational preparation, and employment. They should be able to satisfy fully the needs of their own personalities and become, as far as possible, independent and useful members of the community.

Beyond the problem of care is the problem of research in prevention of retardation. Here again, money spent now will mean a public saving in future years. To quote the World Health Organization again:

> Every child has the right to expect the greatest possible protection against the occurrence of preventable physical or mental handicap before, during and after birth.

To date research has uncovered more than 100 causes of mental retardation. Other projects are under way to determine the early manifestations of retardation so that preventive measures or treatment may begin early. Psychological research is investigating the personality disorders that frequently accompany retardation, and research into the best methods of training and treatment is being conducted. In her maiden speech the hon. member for Saskatoon suggested research into sheltered employment situations for the mentally ill and such research should also be pursued for the retarded. This research is going on under the severe handicap of lack of funds. We must provide for an intensified research program if we expect to diminish the problem of the retarded.

The Hall commission report has included among its first priorities the recommendation that services to retarded children be made available under the mental health services and the health grant programs. I would most strongly urge that the government approach the October federal-provincial conference on retardation with these recommendations in mind. We can no longer afford to ignore the problem of the retarded. I should like to conclude my remarks by reading a short quotation:

> Each of us is made up of the same 98 cents worth of chemistry, give or take a few cents depending upon inflation. The difference lies in abilities, not in feelings. Our retarded children have the same feelings of joy, sorrow, pain and fear as others and a few more of frustration. Comprehension is slower but they still want to be included and treated just as their more fortunate sisters, brothers and friends are treated.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, at this stage of the business of the house, I would be remiss if I did not stand up for the family, for its welfare, its needs and those of every individual.

The right to live is a strictly personal one. Life belongs to a person. The human person alone lives and has needs connected with the reality of life—every day, every month, and throughout the year. All the needs of each human being, whether they be material, spiritual or intellectual, may, in the present order of things, be met by means of one and the same instrument called money, or currency.

The inevitable conclusion is that this vital right is connected with the individual, and must follow the individual, if he is capable to administer his own life, or be paid to the head of the family or the institution responsible for that individual, if he is a dependant. The vital right, even in this case, remains a personal one, connected with the human person.

We also must inevitably conclude that, in a country of 19,200,000 people, there are necessarily 19,200,000 rights to live, ensuring to each human being a certain amount of money or currency to procure the goods or services strictly necessary to enable him to live—whether material, intellectual or spiritual.

And we come to another irrefutable conclusion: that vital right is natural and anterior to, or independent from, the capacity for work of each person, for its urgency applies in the same way to children, old and handicapped people, to the invalids, the sick, the blind, the students, the widows and mothers of families who are unable to work outside to earn their living, because it is their responsibility to work at home, and look after their children—their students or any other adult dependants.

The inevitable conclusion is that vital personal right, which at first sight seems to be of social, personal and family interest, becomes of national interest as soon as it has to be paid for in money, in cash—because only the national government of Canada holds the supreme authority on everything that has to do with money, its administration, its issuing, its circulation, its distribution to 19,200,000 human beings, in 4,700,000 families with children or dependants and to all the legal institutions, private or public, which have received from the governments administration charters. Only human beings exist, have the right to live; only human beings have life and the right to existence before all institutions, even before families.

Families and institutions are groups of men constituted by nature or society to facilitate the material, intellectual and spiritual life of human beings. Only men have the right to live and are entitled to the necessities of life and to the amount of money with which they can each day, each week, each month and each year, purchase the goods and services which are vital for their survival.

In my opinion, all those who hear this simple speech and all those who will read it will have to accept that unavoidable conclusion within the framework of our present system of government. Thus, the right to live is a matter which concerns the individual, the family, society and the nation.

Society is based on the person, and the person is the unit element of society. The family is already an institution, the first institution, the closest to the human being, the most responsible for the human being, from conception, birth, during infancy, adolescence, youth and even during middle age—for the weak, the sick or the cripple. If the family is first responsible for the human being, this responsibility is unavoidably exercised within organized society—and in this organization of the society, everything concerning money and its circulation is under the sole control of the Canadian government at Ottawa.

The inevitable conclusion is that the Canadian government at Ottawa is responsible for the vital rights of the individual within the boundaries of Canada, because only the Canadian government has full control and full authority over the whole monetary, economic and political machinery within the boundaries of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I think a few words should be said here about the importance of family allowances in our national economy, especially as an important part of the purchasing power of families. In keeping with the axiom "equal work, equal pay", it happens that both the single man and the family head get the same salary for the same work, that is, the same purchasing power. Now, inasmuch as he has a wife and children, the expenses of the head of a family are higher and require more purchasing power than those of a bachelor.

Governments have already thought of compensating for that difference by providing for income tax exemptions and certain family allowances, which simply proves that we are merely asking for corrections and adjustments in the figures laid down in the existing legislation, in order to make such legislation more efficient, in keeping with the spirit which prevailed when it was discussed and passed.

The following table will show without the shadow of a doubt that this problem exists and that it must be solved immediately for the greater benefit of the whole national economy.

Today the number of workers has reached seven million people, half of whom are unmarried or married people without children. We see on one side:

3,500,000	fathers
3,500,000	mothers
7,000,000	children
1,000,000	students
15,000,000	consumers

And on the other:

3,500,000	unmarried people
3,500,000	consumers

As the average salary is approximately $4,200 a year, we see on one side 15 million consumers living off the salary of 3,500,000 heads of family, and on the other, 3,500,000 consumers living off the salary of 3,500,000 unmarried or married people without children when the two spouses are in a position to work to earn a salary, such being the case with 80 per cent of young couples and even of couples who have brought up their families.

To show to what extent income tax exemptions and family allowances are inadequate to compare the family budget with that of the single person, one has only to examine the specific case of the head of an average family of five persons including three children earning all together average wages of $80 per week, that is $4,200 per year. How much more money will family allowances and the difference in income tax bring to the head of that family than to the single person who also earns $4,200?

A single person who earns $4,200 pays $458 in income tax after claiming his $1,000 exemption. Net income: $3,742. The head of a family who earns $4,200 pays $117 in income tax, after claiming his $2,000 exemption for himself and his wife and his $1,150 exemption for his three children, a 19 year-old student, a 14 year-old and an eight year-old. The 14 year-old child receives an allowance of $8 per month or $96 per year; the eight year-old child receives an allowance of $6 per month, or $72 per year. When this amount is added to the income we get $4,368 in wages and allowances. $4,368 less $117 income tax leaves a net income of $4,251.

The net income of a father of three children, 19, 14 and eight years old, is $4,251, after he has paid $117 in income tax, whereas a bachelor who also earns $4,200 has a net income of $3,742, after he has paid $458 in income tax.

The difference in income tax and allowances gives to this head of family a net surplus of $509 to support his wife and his three dependant children. He gets $509 more for four more persons. That is $127.25 per annum for each person, or about $10.60 a month.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the naked truth. That is what the Minister of Finance believes to be the expression of economic justice between the people of this country.

Such is, Mr. Chairman and hon. members, what we are tolerating, what is taking place under our responsibility, our supreme monetary, economical and political authority in our parliament as well as in our national life. I would much rather have concealed those details instead of publishing them, so as to avoid the humiliation which is ours for having tolerated such an unfair situation for so long, for having delayed so long the small adjustment that has been necessary in our family allowances since their establishment in 1944, so as to restore a proper balance among the citizens who are assuming greater family responsibilities for the benefit of this country.

What are we going to do, Mr. Chairman, faced with these hard facts, with the sufferings and distress of our courageous heads of families who are never any further advanced after toiling for so many years and continually depriving themselves?

The time has come to clear up a situation which can no longer be tolerated.

I appreciate that we were not sufficiently aware of the situation, just as I know that it was not through ill will that we have put up with such a monstrosity, as the granting of $10 a month for the welfare of the wives and children of our fellow citizens who work year in and year out in prosperous plants, offices, schools, universities and elsewhere for the progress of our country. I know that the pleasure and joy caused by progress in other fields of the national economy have taken the attention away from a still more important factor, that of the human being in his normal environment, his family.

I am quite aware of the fact that the success of companies and institutions is both useful and necessary. Indeed, we have dedicated the last 20 wonderful years, that is since 1944, to them but it is high time that we turn our attention with the same enthusiasm and with the same measure of success to the needs of human beings in our regular and honest families which are always a tribute to life, love and fecundity. Are life, love and fecundity to be encouraged, tolerated or criticized—in our capitalistic yet Christian society? Within the family, must life, love and fecundity be considered as economically important as they are in the production of goods and in the field of material and physical achievements?

So, there is an enormous gap between the purchasing power of the father of a family and that of a bachelor or of a childless married couple. Fifteen million people must get by with an approximate total income of $14,700 million while the other 3,500,000 have an equivalent amount to spend.

As taxes are in a large measure hidden in the purchase price of goods, the taxpayer who is obliged to spend all his salary to support himself, his wife and children, pays his income tax and also the taxes included in the items purchased out of his salary, so that he spends each year 100 per cent of his income on vital expenditures and taxes.

On the other hand, unmarried or married people without children can save and put aside part of their income on which they do not pay taxes at the time of purchase. There lies the fundamental unfairness, unfairness which is not compensated either by tax exemptions or small family allowances which are not high enough and which are not granted to all dependants.

That is what must be especially recognized in the unfairness of burdens people have to bear.

The man who has more children to support has less revenues to put a roof over their heads, to feed them and to pay for their clothes and education. The man who has more children has less money and pays more taxes towards society. That is what should be realized and admitted. That is where, in the final analysis, adjustments should be made. That is the solution we are offering here. And everybody would benefit, because an increased purchasing power, according to the number of children, would promote everywhere a better distribution of goods, production and professional services, and would help business, industry, agriculture and the whole economic activity of the small and medium firms. The large firms themselves would benefit by this increased economic activity in every sphere of the national economy.

After having realized how little compensation tax exemptions and family allowances represent on the income of the family heads, in comparison to the single people, when they earn an average salary of $80 a week, or $4,200 a year, what should we think now of wage earners who earn less than $80 a week; many wage earners earn only $40 a week, or $2,000 a year?

How about the small wage earner who does not earn enough to have his name appear on the roll of income taxpayers?

How about the people who earn less than $1,000 a year, for themselves and their wives, less than $550 a year for their children aged 16 years or over, and less than $300 a year for their children under 16 years old?

Do you think that these are just a few unfortunate people who should be ignored when we consider the population as a whole? There again, we fail to envisage reality if we do not pay attention to this.

Whether or not this surprises you, there are two million taxpayers whose names do not appear on the list of income taxpayers, out of seven million citizens who compose our labour force. Five million only appear on the list of personal income taxpayers, as there are about 80,000 companies appearing on the list of profit-earning corporations.

You may consult your Canada Year Book 1963-64, page 991—and you will have an idea of the distribution of income between Canadian citizens taking part in production and the income derived from their work or their capital. You can take from it the following details which put the situation in a nutshell:

First, 20 per cent, that is, 1.5 million persons, earn $6,000 or more a year, or $120 a week; second, 50 per cent, that is, 3.5 million persons, earn from $1,000 to $6,000 a year, or from $20 to $120 a week; third, nearly 30 per cent, that is, two million Canadians, earn less than the income tax exemption which would apply to them and their families.

Those are statistics given by the government in Ottawa. Now, am I the only one to come to those conclusions? Professor O. J. Firestone, a well-known figure in administrative circles in Ottawa, a member of the royal commission on health services, a professor and vice dean of social sciences at the University of Ottawa, made the following statement during the masterful speech he just made in Manitoba before business and labour leaders:

> Canadians pay a great deal of attention to the 300,000 unemployed, while ignoring almost entirely the 3,800,000 Canadians who live in poverty, whether they are unemployed or not.
> And this, even though Canada ranks second in the world for the highest per capita income and alternates with Sweden between second and third place for the highest standard of living.
> Those 3,800,000 Canadians, one out of five, 20 per cent of the population, have an income lower than the minimum necessary to buy the necessaries of life.

This statement adds nothing new to the reality of economic imbalance, of the iniquitous distribution of income and burdens of society in our prosperous and progressive Canada. This statement adds nothing new, but confirms once again an unfortunate situation which must be corrected as soon as possible.

That statement was made by a university authority acknowledged and appreciated by our Ottawa authorities, by our political leaders, since Mr. O. J. Firestone was a member of the royal commission on health services in Canada, whose report was submitted to the governor general in council in Ottawa in April 1964.

Do those statistics and reports not suggest that we do not live any better in Canada than in underdeveloped countries? Not any better than in South Africa? Not any better than in India, where there are 300 people per square mile, against six people per square mile here in Canada?

I feel it is high time to put an end to this unbearable situation which most members of this house deplore, even if the 26 powerful ministers go on ignoring it and pretending not to admit the real facts.

What did Mr. Mackenzie King, prime minister of Canada, say in 1944, during the debates in the House of Commons which preceded the passing of the Family Allowances Act? Our ministers might still in 1964 hear the words of that former Liberal prime minister, who can reproach them for having misunderstood his lesson and the spirit of the legislation sponsored on that occasion. Here is this statement which has been considered so important that it is reported in a work published by the International Labour Review, Vol. LXXV, No. 3, March 1957:

> Out of the citizens forming the labour force, 48 per cent are bachelors, 39 per cent of those who are married or widowers have no children under 16, and 40 per cent of those who have children under 16 have only one child.

It must be specified that 84 per cent of children under 16 are dependants of a fraction of only 19 per cent of the labour force.

To train the next generation is the responsibility of less than one fifth of the labour force and it is only fair that the expenses incurred be supported by all.

There might be an excuse if the general condition of the national economy required such a strict and faulty distribution of production and wealth. But no, this country of ours, Canada, is considered as the second nation in the world. But no, the following statistics will make it clear that if some people lack the necessaries of life, others enjoy prosperity and the security which it gives, while piling up surpluses, profits and capital that can be envied by the most ambitious capitalists in Canada and even in the world.

Here is, for instance, a few samples of the general prosperity in Canada with regard to great factors of the national economy and their constant progress between 1944 and 1964. Let us take the year 1944 because it coincides with a general survey of finance and banking that year and with the establishment of family allowances which have remained at the 1944 level while all other sectors increased three, four, five, six, eight or nine times.

Let us have a good look in order to see where and how the Canadian economy may be improved.

The principal ministers are responsible for this situation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has control over all the administration of the country and its citizens.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) has to keep watch mainly on economic justice, which concerns all citizens in the most sensitive material and physical areas: money, cash, the vital minimum purchasing power.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) controls all the monetary, economic and political machinery and procedures for levying taxes on incomes and profits. It is incumbent on him, especially, and on others also, to analyse the incomes, expenses and profits among citizens, families and institutions.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) keeps an eye on all the relations between the population and the ministers, and above all, he is an economist and understands professionally the significance of the primary financial needs, of the vital strict minimum for each citizen, as an individual, in the family circle and in the framework of the private and public institutions.

The Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) knows very well that the whole of the production is intended for consumption and not for warehouses or capitalization. He knows also that the total purchasing power distributed among labour and among capital following production, directly affects only 7,000,000 citizens in Canada and leaves without income the 12,200,000 dependant citizens: children, students or adults unable to earn a living on account of age, illness or unemployment.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) knows quite well that trade is going at a slow pace, because there is unemployment and even poverty, even among families where the head is working at a single man's salary. Equal work, equal pay.

Every line of business would be more prosperous and more efficient if each citizen were to receive as a matter of right a minimum living allowance, over and above his wages as head of family which he receives in return for his labour.

Those six ministers must examine this proposal and consider that it is a problem for which they are personally responsible. All 26 ministers would readily approve any decision thus taken. The Minister of National Health and Welfare would only have to distribute $30 instead of $6 and $8.

I understand that to bring up family allowances to the level of the cost of living in all economy sectors, they should be raised to $30 monthly.

The Deputy Chairman: I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I do not need to remind the minister, charming as she always is, and especially at this time of the evening, that her department began in one room in 1944 under the administration of the late Brooke Claxton. I begin what remarks I have to contribute this evening by paying tribute to the late Brooke Claxton, and I want to say, as one of his successors in the riding of St. Lawrence-St. George in Montreal, which he represented for 14 years from 1940 until his retirement from politics in 1954, how pleased I am and how pleased the people of his former constituency, and indeed the population of the metropolis of Canada generally are that the new imposing building of the Department of National Health and Welfare, which is to be dedicated and opened on October 7, is to be named the Brooke Claxton building.

I am sure there is no one in the chamber, no matter what corner he sits in, who would fail to agree with me that Hon. Brooke Claxton was a great, industrious, tireless and dedicated Canadian, and that he left his mark upon our country. Further I want to tell the minister how much his family appreciate her courtesy in inviting John Claxton, his son, to officiate at the opening of the building.

I also rise this evening to make a plea to the minister, also to the Minister of Labour, and indeed to the government, to institute a national survey on the needs of the older people in Canada. As a start I might cite the senator from Toronto Spadina, who is the chairman of the committee of the other place on aging, that the most unorganized, helpless and forgotten section of any age group in Canada comprises the older citizens of 65 years and over.

Ideally the harvest of old age, if health is not impaired, should be freedom from worry, full enjoyment of well earned leisure, and opportunities to derive pleasure from hobbies and other pastimes; but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we in Canada do not know how many of our older citizens are enjoying or sharing this harvest.

In the public mind individuals seem to be relegated to the old age group when they reach the age of 65 because it is the age when most of them retire. The age of retirement, because of the onrush of automation and the need to accelerate the turnover of the work force, is bound to be lowered and more and more of the population will be classified as retired. Today nearly 8 per cent of Canadians are 65 years of age or over, and this figure of approximately 1½ million people includes nearly one million who are recipients of the old age pension.

In an effort to acquire information on our older citizens a special committee of the other place has been sitting for many months. In that period it has received and studied briefs from many organizations, and on reading these briefs, as I am sure many hon. members have done, I have found much useful information. But almost all of the information which has come to light has dealt with the problem from an over-all group and general standpoint. It has not dealt with the specific problems of individuals who fall within the category of those who have left the work force and those who have retired. The report of that committee shows that there have been questions and answers about the possibility of establishing a federal department of aging, which would conceivably take over in this area part of the work now shared by the Department of Labour, the minister's Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Veterans Affairs and to a certain extent other departments.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Turner: Perhaps knowing the—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Just one brief question. I do not want to delay his talk in any way but I do want to understand it. Do I follow him correctly when I understand him to be saying that he agrees with me that the old age pension should be paid to those 65 years of age instead of 70? Is that the point he is getting at in his brief remarks so far?

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I want to be as friendly as I can to the hon. member when I suggest to him that not only has he not listened to what I am attempting to say, but he has not yet quite seized the point. I want to urge upon him—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Maybe I am a slight bit ahead of the hon. member, but that is what I gathered from his remarks and from reading between the lines of what he said.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has the floor.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into an argument with the hon. member whose contribution I listened to the other evening; I only hope that someone again pages him to the telephone this evening. Not only can the hon. member not read between the lines correctly, but at times I am not sure whether he can read the actual lines themselves. I would just ask him to bear with me on this particular problem.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If I might intervene once more, I know—

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): —he does not wish to leave any incorrect impressions with me in his talk this evening.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is out of order. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St George has the floor.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member does not want to leave any incorrect impression with me I am sure that one more brief question would set me clear.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): One brief question.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to impose order on a rather exuberant member here.

I might say that not only were these questions directed to co-ordination by way of a federal department of aging, but provincial governments have been active in this field, as well as welfare agencies. Hundreds of senior citizens across the country have formed clubs and groups in the different provinces to organize recreational activities for older people. From experience in my own riding I would say that churches of various denominations have also done what they can for older citizens. I might mention that the Canadian welfare council is organizing a national conference on aging which is to be held in 1966.

While all of these efforts are most commendable and deserving of the highest praise, has this whole problem, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, been viewed in a proper perspective? Co-ordination of effort seems to be a desirable objective but it cannot be achieved until all parties concerned know what are the problems of the older persons as individuals—and I repeat individuals—and not as a group. There are hundreds and hundreds of reports, I am sure, in the minister's filing cabinets and in cabinets across the country, all of them dealing with some segment of the problems of the older citizens, but they are all written from the group standpoint.

We know, for instance, that it is almost impossible for a person who is 65 years of age or over to get employment. We also know that there are many reports prepared on the prospects of employment for older persons, but who knows how many of these persons need employment? Therefore, I am saying that specific information is needed rather than the generalities which have so far been compiled. This information must be available in Canada, either through governments or agencies, before we can make progressive headway with a solution to this problem. Such information would be invaluable if it were available, not only to the minister's department but to other agencies of government, and certainly for the purpose of the forthcoming national conference on aging; and it is essential if we are to achieve any concrete results.

Now, what are the problems of these older citizens? It is easy to provide or to suggest an all-inclusive or blanket answer, but I submit this would be inadequate because of the numbers, variety and complexity of our older people. If I can refer to the transcript of the Senate committee on aging, the Nuffield survey of old age conducted in Britain stated the position simply as this at page 59 of the report, that "all old people do not like the same things". In our studies in this country so far we have not been able to find factual material assembled on a national basis which collates and evaluates these problems. Therefore I submit that the only way to find out and to get a truly national picture is to ask the older people themselves, and it is for this reason that I suggest to the minister and to this committee that she inaugurate a national survey of the needs of the older people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what am I proposing? I am proposing a nation-wide survey of Canadians who are 65 years of age and over. Why am I proposing this survey? I am proposing this so that the minister can find out what the problems are concerning these men and women in this age group. What are some of the problems? Financial insecurity and housing are two. If I might refer to the transcript again of the Senate committee on aging, it is reported at page 59 that:

> A study of housing for older people which is now in progress under Canadian welfare council auspices may be available in a few months, so I shall not deal further with low rental, self-contained accommodation which may be built, but I must emphasize the importance of suitable location.

Other problems are easy to find, and I am sure hon. members have had them brought to their attention in their capacity as members of parliament. There is for example the cost of illness, cost of drugs, cost of hospitalization, the need to augment income, inability to get employment. Despite the fact that he or she has arrived at the age of 60 or 65 years, a man or woman is still able and willing to work and deserves work. The reduced purchasing power of pensions is another problem. Then there is the domestic problem which arises after retirement. Any wife in such circumstances can testify to the difference in the domestic scene when a man who has been working for 40 or 45 years is suddenly compelled to spend most of his time at home. In addition, because there is a surplus of leisure time there is often an addiction to alcohol.

From what I have been able to learn during my brief experience in my constituency, it is suggested there is a difficulty among older women in readjustment when the retired husband spends all or most of his time at home. There is an interference and dislocation of established normal habits in the home. There is resentment toward the restriction of personal freedom enjoyed before the husband retired. There is difficulty experienced in respect of the cost of accommodation and the inability to obtain employment. There are many problems affecting widows particularly, including the financial, hospitalization and the cost of drugs.

Mr. Chairman, you might ask me, as well might the minister and her advisers who look at me with some interest and perhaps some scepticism, what would be the value of such a survey? It would reveal on a national instead of a local or regional basis, what are the major and common problems among Canadians 65 years old and over. I submit with great sincerity to the minister that such a survey would result in the assembly of valuable and accurate statistical information. Such information could be the foundation on which the federal government could formulate a policy to deal with these problems. Has such a survey been made on a national basis, Mr. Chairman? To the best of my knowledge no such survey has been made.

I should like to quote from the evidence of Mrs. Jean Good, who appeared before the Senate committee on aging. At page 67 of that evidence, in answer to Senator Grosart, who asked the same question I have posed now, she said:

> I really do not know. This, as you mentioned, sir, requires investigation in Canada. We do not know enough about the cost of living.

Then Senator Roebuck said:

> What we should really be doing is searching around for what we can do or what we can recommend to be done, including an increase in the pension and everything else that might help the lot of the older citizen.

Then Senator Grosart again says:

> I think we should get at the facts.

Mr. Chairman, how would a survey be conducted? It could be conducted of course by co-ordinating other government agencies, and it might well be done under private auspices. I can anticipate the arguments of the advisers to the minister who are sitting before her. I know they would say at the moment that there is a committee in the other place in respect of aging; but the honourable senators who have sat on that committee, and the witnesses who have appeared before it, stated that the main problem was in assessing the needs of the aging. Assessing the needs of our so-called older citizens is difficult because of the lack of concrete information and facts. Of course the minister's advisers may well say, we are holding a national conference on aging in 1966, and that will take care of the problem. Surely this national convention will not prove to be of much value, or of as much value as it could have, unless it is able to operate on the basis of concrete information assembled between now and that time. I would therefore in this brief intervention urge the minister and her advisers, in co-operation perhaps with the Department of Labour, to institute on a national basis a survey of the older people of this country, to ascertain from their own mouths what their problems and needs are, and not impose upon them suggestions preconceived by experts, and preconceived by professions which deal, admittedly in a dedicated way, with their problems. We should ascertain in this way from their own mouths the hopes, frustrations and expectations of these citizens.

I am sure the minister has had this quotation of that great prime minister of Great Britain, Mr. Disraeli, drawn to her attention. He said, let us hope that the heritage of old age is not despair. This problem will become more and more direct, and it will be incumbent upon the minister as she proceeds with her duties to solve it. I urge her to give consideration to the suggestions I have made this evening.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member for Huron speaks I wonder whether I may be permitted to ask the hon. member who has just sat down one question? I asked him a question earlier in respect of reducing the pensionable age from 70 to 65, and he replied in the negative. I will put my question in this way. Can I then assume that he is against reducing the eligible age for old age pensions, or security, from 70 to 65? I should like the hon. member to put his position in this respect on record, and stop riding the fence.

Mr. Turner: I should like to thank the hon. member for his usual succinct question, and say to him that my reply to his earlier question was neither in the affirmative nor in the negative.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You are riding the fence, then.

Mr. Turner: I would urge the hon. member to wait for the institution of the Canada pension plan, which I am sure will solve this difficulty to his satisfaction and mine.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): When will it be instituted? I should like to ask one more question,

Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is a good friend of mine, and I know he does not want to contribute in any way to a lengthy sitting or debate here in the house, but can he assure this house that the pension plan will be brought before us next week or sooner, or can he assure us that it will be presented on Monday, as I gather he indicated in his remarks?

Mr. Turner: I can assure the hon. member in answer to that question that the government will introduce this legislation with due haste. I can give no assurance about the treatment it will receive from the other side of this house.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak for a short time in respect of this item because I was a member of the committee which Hon. Waldo Monteith chaired.

Mr. Chairman, I think I am as good an example of health as anyone in the house, taking my age into consideration. I know some of the officials who are sitting before the minister at this moment and would like to make special reference to the lady who several years ago was private secretary to the then minister of defence Hon. T. L. Ralston.

At that time I had the privilege of being one of the junior members of this house and that was, as you will remember, during wartime. I went to Colonel Ralston's office in an attempt to get a boy released from the army. He was a married man, but because he was married after the deadline he was considered by the army to be single, and was drafted. This man had 250 acres of land and stock to look after. There was no one on his farm except his wife and his aged father to do the chores, and this was in February, during the winter. His wife and father asked me to try to get him released from the army so that he could look after his farm. I asked them whether this boy had asked for a postponement of his draft and they informed me that he had not, on the basis of information supplied by a neighbour to the effect that he would not be drafted because he was married. In any event he was drafted into the army and his father was attempting to do the chores on his own farm and on his son's farm.

As I suggested, I approached Colonel Ralston's office and found that he was not in Ottawa. I might say that Colonel Ralston was one of the finest members of parliament I have ever met. Colonel Ralston's secretary, the lady presently sitting before the Minister of National Health and Welfare, informed me that she could not get this young man out of the army, and that he was to be moved from Camp Borden to Red Deer, Alberta. I told her that he might just as well be released now before being moved to Red Deer, because I intended to get him out of the army and there would be the extra cost involved of bringing him back. She said: "What will I do"? I said, "Call the official and try to get him out". She did. They did not believe me. They sent an official down to the farm to see if I was telling the truth, and I was. He was given six months leave and was never back in the army again. That was an example of a good secretary.

I had a letter today from two elderly people between 65 and 70 years of age asking me if there was any chance of the government lowering the age to 65. They do not have much means of support and are not able to work. They were wondering if the age limit could be lowered to 65 and asked me to do all I could to have that done. They also asked whether the pension could not be raised from $75 to $100 a month because they said they have to pay rent and have very little means. I am passing this on the minister without making any comment whether it should or should not be done.

In the first instance however the old age pension was never intended to keep people alive but rather as assistance to them. In this day and age people seem to spend their money as they make it, and when they grow old and are not able to work they fall back on the mercy of the government. I do not know what we are going to do about this situation because it involves circumstances over which we have no control.

I want to speak for a moment about the Canada pension plan. As hon. members know, a Canada pension plan is to be brought forward. We have been trying for some time to have it introduced into the house but up to now we have not been very successful. The other day I was reminiscing in my office and I composed a little poem. I am sure the minister will not object to my reading it because it contains nothing detrimental to her.

Judy tried as best she could
With a pension plan she understood.
But when Pearson and Gordon got through with her script
Poor Judy's plan started to slip.
They mauled it around from pillar to post
'Til there's nothing left but a ghastly ghost.
They're on their fourth translated test
And it seems to me even worse than the rest.
The only hope I see for success
Is let the opposition bring in a test.

They've been a wonderful help in the past
And there isn't a doubt their plan would last.

I am only trying to help the minister. I always like to help ministers because I find that when I am in the opposition it is much better to try to get along with the ministers than to quarrel with them, and you get more satisfaction that way. Having nothing more to say I will be glad to sit down if there is another speaker to take up the time of the house from now until 10.30.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be allowed a moment of jubilation at this time, as was the hon. member for Hamilton South when he informed the house that their party had been conceded victory in Toronto Riverdale, because I understand our party has been conceded victory in Windsor Sandwich, my birthplace.

Mr. Baldwin: That is good for the health of the nation.

Mr. Slogan: The only question at this time, of course, is where is the Liberal party headed, because they are the only ones who seem to have lost out.

The Chairman: Order. May I suggest that the hon. member revert to the business under consideration.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I was referring, of course, to the health of the Liberal party. I should like to congratulate the minister and all members of her staff. I congratulate the minister because I think she did a much better job in presenting her estimates today than she did in presenting her first version of the Canada pension plan. I suppose this only goes to show that one matures in office and that the minister and others on the front benches across the way perhaps realize now that they have no divine right to rule and that probably a bit of diplomacy is better than the tactics they followed in the past.

I should also like to congratulate the minister on the fact that she will be occupying new quarters shortly. I suppose we might refer to her as the penthouse queen because I understand she will be occupying the penthouse in this wonderful new building with a view of both Ontario and Quebec. Added to the fact that she already drives a Thunderbird, this is certainly a sign of affluence.

I do not want to say very much about the many items in these estimates. I associate myself with previous speakers who have spoken on specific subjects such as mental retardation, the aged, and physical fitness and sports. I am sure both the minister and I should lend our support to the physical fitness program because we are good examples of poor physical fitness. I should like to congratulate my confrere, the hon. member for Kamloops, on his speech regarding research grants in medicine.

I should like to say a word about the food and drugs committee of which I have been a member. I think the committee is doing valuable work and in my view Dr. Morrell and his staff are doing a wonderful job under somewhat trying circumstances. I hope the minister will pay heed to the recommendations which the committee will make with regard to increasing his staff and having to do with the conditions under which they work. As a personal observation I would say that although the food and drug directorate is doing a very good job, it seems to me their efforts are not as widespread as they might be and are not reaching those who could have a direct effect on the economics of prescription drugs. I refer to the individual doctor, dentist, veterinarian or druggist. To this end I have suggested in the committee that some improvements in the labelling and grading of drugs be made and I hope these suggestions will be reflected in the committee's report and that the minister will take some action on them.

I was one of those who supported youth allowances. I understand that some parents are under the impression that the cheques will be sent directly to the children. I would ask the minister to make clear to the house exactly what the mechanics of the administration of youth allowances will be and whether the amounts payable will become part of the family allowance cheques or whether separate cheques will be sent to the young people individually. It seems to me that if these cheques are sent to the young people individually the administration of the allowances will cost a great deal more, and I certainly see no reason why they should be handled in this way.

I should also like to congratulate the northern health services officials. In the northern part of my riding we have a number of health clinics which provide health services to the Indians and the local people. We also have two new hospitals in my riding. One is the fine new hospital at the new Whiteshell atomic energy research centre in Manitoba and the other is the new wing of the hospital at Pine Falls, built at a cost of half a million dollars. It is interesting that in this new wing Indian health services are being integrated with the general hospital facilities in the community. I am proud to say that the people in the Pine Falls community have accepted this integration and perhaps this is a good portent for success in the future.

I want to congratulate the minister on her stand against smoking. As a member of the dental profession who has to clean people's teeth I want to wish her every success in this campaign against smoking. I might mention that at the recent convention of the Canadian dental association the minister's stand against smoking was endorsed and, as I say, we wish her every success in this undertaking.

My main purpose in speaking tonight, and I make no apology for it, is to bring to the attention of the house and the government some factors relating to dentistry as they apply to the federal government and the people of Canada. I make no apology for this because I did not hear anything in the minister's introductory remark about this subject, nor have I heard any of the various speakers mention the subject in discussing these estimates. I think the importance of dentistry to the community at large might be better appreciated if people realized that approximately 33 per cent of the amount of money spent on health services in Canada is spent on dental services. The latest figures which I have are for the year 1962 and they indicate that Canadians spent for these services some $395.2 million, and for dental services $132.4 million. This is a very significant sum of money. I mention it, Mr. Chairman, only because I want to relate this sum of money which, as I say, amounts to something like 33 per cent of the amount spent for health care services by the Canadian people to the amount of money allocated by the department to dental health programs and dental research.

I should like to say that only about 1 or 2 per cent of the amount of money allocated by the federal government under national health grants allocated to dental research. It seems to me that this is a negligible amount. In fact, in the last three years this amount has been decreasing. The percentage of money allocated for dental research as related to the expenditures on all health research in 1961-62 amounted to 1.79 per cent; in 1962-63, 1.42 per cent; 1963-64, 1.14 per cent. In the last three years, therefore, it can be seen there has been a steady decline in the relative amount of money that has been allocated by the federal government to dental research. The amount in dollars and cents was, in 1961-62, $67,911; 1962-63, $50,312; 1963-64, $48,009. We might compare this with the amount that was allocated in 1959-60 which was $164,264.

I note that the Canadian Dental Association has made representations to the minister in this matter, and I hope that before we leave the first item the minister will give us some indication of the action her department has taken toward alleviating the scarcity of funds for dental research. As I say, the Canadian dental association has made representations and I am sure the minister will realize it is urgent that this amount of money be increased. I should like to refer to the brief presented to the royal commission on health services by the Canadian dental association. In the introductory portion of the brief the association asserts, with regard to dental disease, that the unnecessary tragedy of dental diseases is one of Canada's greatest health problems. Dental diseases are largely preventive, yet they are virtually universal. Almost everyone needs dental care yet in any given year only one third of the population visits a dentist. At another point the brief states that, by their very nature, dental diseases defy defeat without widespread application of preventive medicine.

This brings me now to the fact that we need to spend a great deal more money on research in developing further preventive measures because we are dealing with a disease which is largely preventable. I am reminded of my second pet subject, that is fluoridation. Fluoridation, as a public health measure, is probably the least expensive that is practised in this country. I think it costs around 12 cents per year per person to fluoridate the water in any fair sized community. This is indeed a very small amount of money when we consider the amount of money I have already mentioned as being spent on dental health services in the country. This is one dental health preventive measure which I think should commend itself to the government. It is a field in which I feel the government should take leadership. As I said, dental diseases are largely preventable. Statistics have shown that among the children of dentists, dental caries are some 40 per cent to 50 per cent less than in the population as a whole. This I believe is attributable to better health knowledge and education. I feel that before the government rushes into medicare or rushes into the socialization of dentistry and medicine, they should assume responsibility in the fields where responsibility lies on their shoulders, that is in the field of dental education and medical education as well as the prevention field.

I feel that the federal government has been very remiss in this field. I believe that there is a great responsibility which they have failed to discharge. Before I conclude my remarks tomorrow I will show the government that it is incumbent upon them to assume a larger responsibility in this field.

May I call it 10.30 o'clock sir?

Mr. Monteith: I was just wondering if it might be agreeable to the house if the hon. member were allowed to continue his remarks this evening? I think we would be pleased to continue with the estimates of this department and try to conclude them this evening if that is agreeable to other members.

Mr. Knowles: We do not mind sitting for a little while, certainly to hear the rest of the hon. member's speech. However, there are some other members who wish to speak on this first item.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the house leader about the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Favreau: Tomorrow we intend to complete the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare after which we will take up the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, to be followed by those of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

At 10.33 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

APPENDIX

LETTERS TO PROVINCES RESPECTING CONTRACTING-OUT ARRANGEMENTS

A copy of letter sent to all provinces except Quebec.

Ottawa, August 15, 1964.

My dear Premier:

I refer to the discussions on contracting-out arrangements for conditional grant and shared cost programs which took place in Ottawa on June 8 and 9. These discussions were, as you know, initiated at the request of the Quebec government, pursuant to the decision of the federal-provincial conference held in Quebec city from March 31 to April 2, 1964.

At the June meeting, our representatives sought to find an approach which would fulfil two conditions: first, it would be equally available to all provinces; and second, it would not interfere with provinces maintaining the existing arrangements for conditional grant and shared cost programs.

I should now like to review with you the conclusions we have reached subsequent to these consultations. I believe that these provide a satisfactory basis for the agreement which it is proposed to make with the Quebec government. We are prepared to make an arrangement on a similar basis with any province which so wishes.

It has been mutually agreed that it would be desirable to provide initially for an interim or transitional arrangement. Under such an interim arrangement, the province would maintain its present obligations in respect of programs which would be eligible for contracting-out. It would, in particular, continue to provide the services envisaged in them and to furnish to the federal government an accounting of the expenditures incurred under the programs. On the other hand, the federal contribution would, depending on the nature and size of each program, take the form either of equalized personal income tax abatements subject to adjustments, or of cash payments. The length of the interim period would vary depending also on the circumstances of each program. More permanent contracting-out arrangements would be the subject of further negotiations at the appropriate time, taking into account, among other factors, the experience acquired during the interim period and such recommendations as the tax structure committee might formulate in the meantime on the subject of conditional grant and shared cost programs. Such arrangements might well prove to be part of a new approach to fiscal arrangements commencing in 1967.

The programs which it is proposed should be eligible for contracting-out fall into two categories. The first includes continuing programs which are concerned primarily with social objectives. Excluded from this category are programs involving non-recurring projects, such as capital, research and demonstration projects. The second category includes a group of programs which are expected to be of limited duration.

It has been recognized from the beginning that the contracting-out arrangements that might be agreed between the federal and Quebec governments should be such as to be readily applicable to any province that might wish to avail itself of them. It was agreed furthermore that a contracting-out province would, during the interim period and subsequently, continue to participate in federal-provincial bodies and meetings established for the purposes of consultation and co-ordination in fields of activity where contracting-out would apply.

As regards the compensation, it was established that it would, normally, take the form of equalized personal income tax abatements in the case of well established programs which could be expected to continue indefinitely, and the form of cash payments in the case of smaller programs which might not be expected to continue indefinitely.

More specifically, it is proposed that:

A. Among the programs to which contracting-out would not apply are the following:

1. Capital programs: (a) Trans-Canada highway; (b) Railway grade crossing; (c) Vocational training, capital assistance; (d) ARDA; (e) Municipal winter works.

2. Current programs: (a) Grants to 4-H clubs; (b) Grants to special fairs; (c) compensation for animal disease losses; (d) crop insurance; (e) Farm labour agreement; (f) Health grants (research and demonstration projects; (g) Public health research grant; (h) Training of unemployed; (i) Training in co-operation with industry; (j) Fisheries industries development.

3. Emergency measures.

4. Centennial of confederation.

B. The following continuing programs, which involve primarily social objectives, would be suitable for contracting-out in return for a total compensation as indicated in the form of abatement of the federal income tax by a specified percentage, together with equalization to equate the yield of each percentage point to the average of the two provinces where it is highest. If programs involving a single abatement point were the only ones to which contracting-out applied, compensation could take the form of a lump sum payment. In all cases the compensation would be subject to adjustments to bring the compensation to equal actual audited expenditures, and on the understanding that all the other conditions of the program would be maintained during the interim period:

(a) Hospital insurance: interim period until December 31, 1970; compensation to amount to 14 points;

(b) Old age assistance, blind persons allowances, disabled persons allowances, unemployment assistance; compensation for the three categorical welfare programs to amount to 2 points; the "base load" or welfare portion of unemployment assistance to be represented by an equalized abatement of 2 points on personal income tax, and remaining or unemployment portion to continue on present basis; length of the interim period for four welfare programs to be governed by the timing of the establishment by the federal government of an integrated program of public assistance and, in any event, not to go beyond March 31, 1970;

(c) Vocational training: Student aid, vocational high school training, technician training, trade and occupational training (except those elements of the program which are agreed to be concerned with members of the labour force receiving further training), training of disabled, correspondence courses, training of technical teachers; interim period until March 31, 1967; compensation to amount to 1 point;

(d) Health grants (excluding research and demonstration projects): general public health, tuberculosis control, mental health, professional training, cancer control, medical rehabilitation and crippled children, child and maternal health, disability advisory services, Blind pensioners treatment; interim period until March 31, 1967; compensation to amount to 1 point.

C. The following programs would be suitable for contracting-out for cash compensation on the understanding that a contracting-out province would agree to continue to carry on a program of this nature during the interim period, and that the federal government would reserve the right to terminate the program in respect of which contracting-out is arranged at the expiration of the interim period:

(a) Agricultural lime assistance (March 31, 1967); (b) Premium on pure bred sires (March 31, 1967); (c) Forestry agreements (March 31, 1967); (d) Hospital construction (March 31, 1968); (e) Campgrounds and picnic areas (March 31, 1967); (f) Roads to resources (Payment of remaining entitlement under the program.

It is the intention of the federal government to introduce legislation to implement the above proposals as early as possible after the resumption of parliament in the autumn of this year. If your government has in mind the conclusion of arrangements along the lines we expect to be entering into with Quebec, I should appreciate it if you could let me know at your earliest convenience.

In developing these proposals, Mr. Premier, my colleagues and I have sought to find a formula which will meet, as far as possible, the various views which were expressed at the federal-provincial conference last March. For a province which wishes, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, to contract-out of all of the continuing programs I have referred to above one alternative is provided. For the province which wishes to receive lump sum payments for certain specific programs another alternative is provided. By means of this approach we hope a formula has been developed, to prevail during the period that our tax structure committee is at work, which is responsive to the necessities of Canadian federalism today and which, at the same time, will give the tax structure committee the maximum scope for its deliberations about longer-term arrangements.

Yours sincerely,
L. B. PEARSON

A copy of letter sent to Quebec.

Ottawa, August 15, 1964.

The Honourable Jean Lesage, P.C., M.L.A., Prime Minister of Quebec,
Quebec, P.Q.

My dear Prime Minister:

I refer to the discussions on contracting-out arrangements for conditional grant and shared cost programs which took place in Ottawa on June 8 and 9, 1964, pursuant to the decision of the federal-provincial conference held in Quebec city from March 31 to April 2, 1964. I should like now to review with you the conclusions which emerged from these discussions in respect of the programs in which Quebec is at present participating. These conclusions are acceptable to me and my colleagues, and I submit them to you for your consideration and concurrence.

Our two governments are agreed, I believe, that it would be desirable to provide initially for an interim or transitional arrangement. Under such an interim arrangement, the province would maintain its present obligations in respect of programs which would be eligible for contracting-out. It would, in particular, continue to provide the services envisaged in them and to furnish to the federal government an accounting of the expenditures incurred under the programs. On the other hand, the federal contribution would, depending on the nature and size of each program, take the form either of equalized personal income tax abatements, subject to adjustments, or of cash payments. More permanent contracting-out arrangements would be the subject of further negotiations at the appropriate time, taking into account, among other factors, the experience acquired during the interim period and such recommendations as the tax structure committee might formulate in the meantime on the subject of conditional grant and shared cost programmes. Such arrangements might well prove to be part of a new approach to fiscal arrangements commencing in 1967.

The programs which the representatives of our two governments agreed would be eligible for contracting-out fall into two categories, it seems to me. The first includes continuing programs which are concerned primarily with social objectives. Excluded from this category are programs involving non-recurring projects, such as capital, research, and demonstration projects. The second category includes a group of programs which are expected to be of limited duration.

It has been recognized from the beginning that the contracting-out arrangements that might be agreed between the federal and Quebec governments should be such as to be readily applicable to any province that might wish to avail itself of them. As regards the compensation, it was established that it would normally take the form of equalized personal income tax abatements in the case of well established programs which could be expected to continue indefinitely, and the form of cash payments in the case of smaller programs which might not be expected to continue indefinitely.

It is the intention of the federal government to introduce legislation to implement the above proposals as early as possible after the resumption of parliament in the autumn of this year. I should therefore be grateful if you would confirm your concurrence in them at your earliest convenience. It would be the intention of the government in the legislation both to authorize the interim agreement and to make the necessary changes in the income tax acts.

May I say, Mr. Prime Minister, that in discussing the above proposals with your representatives, we have sought to find a formula which will meet, as far as possible, the various views which were expressed at the federal-provincial conference last March. As a result of our discussions, it will be possible for a province which wishes, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, to contract-out of all of the continuing programs I have referred to above. For the province which wishes to receive lump sum payments for only a limited number of programs another alternative is provided.

We trust that the formula we have developed, to prevail during the period which our tax structure committee is at work, will be found to be responsive to the necessities of Canadian federalism today and will, at the same time, give the tax structure committee the maximum scope for its deliberations concerning longer-term arrangements.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 11, 1964

The house met at 10.30 a.m.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON CHINESE STATUS ADJUSTMENT AND AMNESTY PROGRAM

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, further to my recent statement in the house regarding Chinese immigration, and because of certain references outside the house to this subject, some questions have arisen as to the detailed application of the points I set forth.

I had spoken of a proposed termination date for status adjustment statements offered by Chinese immigrants who had committed immigration offences. It had been planned to terminate the effective date of such statements as of September 1, 1964, but subsequently I extended the time until further notice. Since my observations in the house on this subject on August 14, more than 2,500 Chinese have come forward to offer status adjustment statements.

My references at that time to the status adjustment statements had led to questions about the Chinese amnesty program, which is related to the status adjustment matter but is by no means the same thing. Status adjustment statements comprise the vehicle or the means by which certain Chinese have been able to avail themselves of the amnesty. To remove any grounds for misunderstanding I wish to explain the precise nature of the Chinese amnesty as it has been applied during the past several years.

On June 9, 1960 the government announced an amnesty effective July 1, 1960, covering illegal Chinese immigrants in Canada and also those who entered posing as Canadian citizens. It was clearly stated that the amnesty did not apply to those who had engaged in illegal immigration for a profit, or to those who helped others than their own relatives to enter Canada illegally.

On November 16, 1962 the minister of citizenship and immigration announced that much simplified procedures were being instituted to enable Chinese to make voluntary statements more readily. He reiterated that only those who entered before July 1, 1960 were eligible to take advantage of the amnesty. He warned that Chinese making false affidavits would be prosecuted and would be debarred from sponsoring relatives or other intending immigrants to Canada.

It will be evident that the amnesty of 1960 applied only to those offences committed before July 1, 1960. However, successive ministers have been relatively lenient with Chinese whose immigration offences occurred since 1960, even if they did not fall within the 1960 amnesty program. This period of tolerance has lasted more than four years, and I am sure all hon. members will agree that it cannot continue unduly long without seriously weakening the application of, and the respect for, our laws.

While the government has not authorized a new amnesty program, as such, beyond that of 1960, I wish to say to those Chinese who have entered Canada illegally or committed immigration offences between July 1, 1960, and September 1, 1964 that I intend to continue to be as understanding as has been the case during the past four years. I invite Chinese affected to continue to come forward to complete voluntary statements. All cases of offenders, whether they become known through these voluntary statements or otherwise, will be sympathetically reviewed. However, the government must reserve the right to prosecute for serious offences committed during this period, such as those involving immigration agents and racketeers.

I have covered the authorized procedures affecting those committing immigration offences before 1960 who may take advantage of the 1960 amnesty. I have gone on to review the situation of those affected by offences committed between July, 1960 and September, 1964 who, with the exceptions noted, will be treated tolerantly and sympathetically. For those Chinese entering illegally or committing immigration offences from September 1, 1964 onward, I must state now that their cases will be treated precisely as would those of any other racial group, and the immigration laws must be fully applicable to them.

Voluntary statements will continue to be received in the meantime from Chinese committing immigration offences prior to September 1, 1964 who wish to regularize their status in Canada, but a date to conclude receipt of such statements must be determined before too long. Appropriate notice will be given when such a termination date is decided upon.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to hear the statement of the minister as it applies to the people concerned. We were surprised, of course, by the announcement that was made by the Postmaster General in Vancouver some time prior to this statement this morning, as reported by the Canadian Press in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. The statement made by the Postmaster General in Vancouver is reported in this dispatch in part as follows:

> This means that even "ship-jumping sailors or those who came in with forged passports or other means" will be granted amnesty if they step forward and declare their status—

I am wondering whether this will apply to other nationalities, particularly in the case of people who have made application for Canadian citizenship and who are in the country on non-permanent visas, against whom orders to return to their native lands have been registered. Will this include that group of people, or how far is this going to extend?

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to commend the minister for the statement he has made with regard to the amnesty being extended beyond September 1. I agree with the minister, and I think the proposal he has outlined is the most satisfactory way to handle the situation. I should like to express the hope, however, that when the minister decides to terminate this arrangement and set a deadline there will be at least a month or six weeks' notice given so we will not have a rush at the last minute, or people claiming they were not informed of the fact that there was a cut-off date. Perhaps if notice were given 30 days ahead of the actual deadline it would be most helpful.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the point just raised I should like to say that in fact there was no announcement or statement made by the Postmaster General in Vancouver. Since I was going to be in Vancouver for our summer vacation over the Labour day week end, and having received a number of telephone calls, telegrams and inquiries as to the significance of the statement made by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on August 19, I agreed to meet while in Vancouver with representatives of the Chinese Canadian community and more particularly with the Chinese language press on Saturday afternoon of last week to answer any questions they might wish to put to me arising out of the minister's statement of August 19. This I did, and the question about ship jumpers came up during the discussion.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I am sure all of us were interested in his statement this morning regarding the granting of a general amnesty to the Chinese. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce posed a direct question to the minister with regard to those of other nationalities who may be in this country under similar circumstances, and the minister has not answered that question. Will a general amnesty be granted to other nationals who are in this country under the same conditions as the Chinese?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the decision of the government was not to extend the amnesty period, since this tolerance policy had been established under the previous government. This amnesty period only applied to people who came to Canada prior to 1960. In any case, the extension of this amnesty period or tolerance, as it is called, had been decided upon by successive ministers under the former government, including Mr. Bell, and was continued under the present Liberal government by Hon. Mr. Favreau and myself, and September 1, 1964, marked the end of that tolerance period. Consequently, this government did not take any step or decision to extend the amnesty period in the case of Chinese, since the amnesty was already in existence prior to 1960 and, in any case, a tolerance existed under the former government as well as under this government. This period of amnesty ended on September 1, 1964.

To give a more direct answer to the hon. member, I will say that the government has no intention to extend to other groups in Canada the policy applied to the Chinese under the former government.

[Later:]

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration which is related somewhat to the questions asked of him earlier. I wonder if his attention has been called to a decision of the United Church of Canada yesterday to request a basic review of Canada's immigration policy. If so, will he say whether he will consider acceding to that request?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that suggestion. I will study it and will then be in a position to give my views to the hon. member.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONTINUATION OF PRESENT PROVISIONS RESPECTING SHARED PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question about the letter to the provinces he tabled yesterday with regard to opting out of federal-provincial programs. I am not so much concerned about the smaller programs, but I am concerned about major programs such as hospital insurance, old age assistance, blind persons allowances and disabled persons allowances. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to these words in his letter to the prime minister of Quebec, as found on page 7875 of Hansard:

> ...and on the understanding that all the other conditions of the programs would be maintained during the interim period.

Does this mean the house can be assured that the reciprocity provision will be continued and that uniformity with respect to eligibility will be continued in all these programs?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is my understanding, but this is a very important matter and I should like to look into it and confirm that understanding Monday.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will there definitely be legislation to deal with this matter this fall; and can the Prime Minister also tell the house later, if not now, what is the total amount of money involved in these transfers and in this opting out provision?

Mr. Pearson: With respect to the first question, we hope there will be legislation dealing with this matter this autumn. In reply to the second part of the question, I do not have the figure here but I will be glad to get it.

GRAIN

MOOSE JAW, SASK.—OPERATION OF GRAIN DRYING FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, who has jurisdiction over the board of grain commissioners. Wheat board quotations indicate a big price spread between dry and tough and damp grain. There will be a large amount of tough and damp grain in the west because of rain and snow on the prairies, also resulting from the new limitations on grain moisture content.

There is a large government elevator at Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, with modern equipment for drying grain. Will the minister take steps to arrange for the operation of the elevator's grain drying facilities at full capacity so the tough and damp grain can be put into condition for marketing or storing?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I will be pleased to bring the hon. member's request to the attention of the board of grain commissioners.

INQUIRY AS TO DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the hon. gentleman tell the house the reason for the delay in having all delivery points in western Canada placed on an initial 1 bushel quota, and can he inform us when the Canadian wheat board expects to have all points in western Canada on a 1 bushel quota or better?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The wheat board is already moving ahead rapidly in the opening up of quotas. I am not in a position to say when a 1 bushel quota will be established everywhere, but I have been in touch with the board—indeed, a member of the board is here today—and I will be discussing the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Will the minister inform the house, after he has talked with officials of the board, when it is expected that a 1 bushel quota will be established?

Mr. Sharp: I will try to make a statement as soon as possible after I have some information to provide to the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRY

NUMBER OF INFORMATION OFFICERS TO BE ENGAGED BY DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Would the minister care to confirm or deny that his department has hired or will be hiring 35 information officers, thereby establishing a ratio of one information officer to 18 officials?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I can deny that the Department of Industry will be hiring 35 information officers. There is no such establishment provided, planned or approved.

Mr. Hales: May I ask a supplementary question. How many information officers does the department propose to hire?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I have not got the exact figures before me this morning. I will be glad to make a statement on this on Monday.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Industry. I understood the minister to say in reply to the first question that there was no establishment for information officers. Then in reply to the supplementary question he said he would be glad to make a statement on this subject. I should like the minister to clear up this point. If there is no establishment how can he make a statement on the subject?

Mr. Drury: I am sorry if I did not make myself clear. I said there was no establishment for 35 information officers.

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry?

The director of Quebec's General Investment Corporation, Mr. Gérard Filion, who is now in Paris to arrange for the Peugeot firm to settle here soon, has stated that such a probable and possible move is hindered by the tariff concessions granted to that firm on parts it would have to import into Canada to assemble automobiles.

Is the minister in a position to tell us if his department or the Department of Finance intend to grant that firm the same tariff concessions that were granted to the Volvo firm when it settled in Halifax?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that the government is willing to grant the company represented by Mr. Filion tariff concessions equivalent to those granted the Volvo company.

Mr. Lessard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister say whether other automobile manufacturers who are against the coming of that French company to Canada and to Quebec especially have brought pressure to bear? Have Chrysler, Ford or General Motors objected to the granting of tariff concessions to that company?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I must explain that the proposed concessions will be of a temporary nature only. Consequently, Chrysler, Ford and General Motors would not be justified in asking for the same concessions since they have been in Canada for a long time.

FINANCE

MISCALCULATION OF FEDERAL REVENUES BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance based on a report as to the present revenue position of the government. Can the minister indicate whether current figures suggest that the Minister of Finance, in his last budget, miscalculated the revenue that would be received by the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Minister of Finance): I have read the articles referred to by the hon. member. I know the house will be happy to learn that the Minister of Finance has miscalculated the revenues, because the country is even more prosperous than he had expected at the time the budget was brought down.

Mr. Crouse: You inherited a very good economy.

Mr. Sharp: May I add, however, that the degree of improvement in the revenue position which is suggested in the articles, particularly the one in the Financial Post, is much exaggerated.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LA MACAZA, QUE.—TREATMENT OF PEACE DEMONSTRATORS BY R.C.A.F. POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to redirect a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is the minister now in a position to answer the question I asked yesterday regarding the actions of the R.C.A.F. police at La Macaza?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the hon. member for having sent me a copy of the newspaper article on which he apparently based his question.

I have had an opportunity to get a report on the allegations contained in the news article, and I can inform the hon. member that the allegations are false. The demonstrators attempted to block the main entrance to R.C.A.F. station La Macaza and, in order to allow vehicles to enter the station, some of these demonstrators, having refused to permit free passage of the vehicles, were removed by R.C.A.F. personnel, with a minimum of force, to the side of the road. I understand the R.C.A.F. personnel involved showed great patience and restraint in carrying out their duty, and under the circumstances I do not feel that an apology is necessary.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REORGANIZATION OF MILITIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Associate Minister of National Defence whether he is prepared to make a statement to the house concerning the proposed reorganization of the Canadian militia. Will the minister indicate to the house what units of the Canadian militia are to be discontinued?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): It was made clear, Mr. Speaker, both to the house and to the committee, that the department is now studying the reorganization of the militia and that early in October a full statement will be made on that subject.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question could I ask the Associate Minister of National Defence to inform the house whether the Winnipeg Rifles will be continued in the militia, or will it be one of the battalions which are to be disbanded?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should start going over the list of the militia units which are to be retained and those which are to be withdrawn. I think the best thing to do is to wait until I can make a complete statement on this matter in October.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED FOOD SHIPMENTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Yesterday the United States department of agriculture announced it will be sending a team of technicians to India to assist in stepping up what they call their food for peace program, to reach delivery of 600,000 tons per month to that country. In view of the fact that on several occasions the minister has announced that Canada intends to increase her foreign aid contribution to something like $40 million a year, is he prepared to make an announcement soon since there is obviously an urgent need for increased food shipments to that part of the world?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government has already announced a very substantial increase in shipments of food under our aid program. I think this announcement was made either by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or myself, or by both of us. We have been in touch with the Indian authorities, and we have made it quite clear that if, for example, some additional shipments of grain from Canada would be helpful in this emergency we would be happy to supply them.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question, if any assistance is given to India would this be in addition to the commitments we have already made under the Colombo plan?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Shipments under the Colombo plan are now proceeding, and what we are talking about is additional shipments if the government of India requests them. I did not want to suggest in anything I said that India would necessarily ask for it. To date the Indian government has made no request. But we are in touch to make sure that if there is any way in which we can be helpful we stand ready to be helpful.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CASTLEGAR, B.C.—INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister, based on a telegram I have just received. I will read the telegram before asking the question.

Since the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States will be viewing the Columbia river basin by air on Wednesday next and since Castlegar has an airport within three miles of the high Arrow which has been the most controversial of these sites, we the council of the village of Castlegar would be pleased through you to extend to them an invitation to land here and view the dam site at first hand and we would be honoured and pleased to make all arrangements.

My question is, will the Prime Minister accept this invitation and opportunity to meet some of the residents of the Arrow lakes on this occasion?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Nothing would give me greater pleasure, but I doubt whether the timetable for next Wednesday would permit it. We would only be in or over British Columbia for a very few hours. Incidentally, I should like to extend a very warm invitation to the hon. gentleman to be with us on this occasion.

MALAYSIA—INQUIRY AS TO COMMONWEALTH ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I am sure does not wish to be neglected during the question period, whether he has an answer to my question of yesterday concerning the aid being given to Malaysia by other commonwealth countries.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure that in asking this question the hon. gentleman was moved only by altruistic motives, and I greatly appreciate this. I have looked at the response I made, and I think it is a complete answer. However, when the commission from Malaysia now touring the United States comes here there may be something further to add.

Mr. Churchill: The minister has not yet answered a question I have now asked for the third time. What aid is being given to Malaysia by commonwealth countries other than Canada? Must I rely for information on articles appearing in the Globe and Mail or in the London Times, on which the hon. gentleman cast some doubt the other day? Could we not have an authoritative statement from him?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think the hon. gentleman need rely on anything other than the reply I gave him, a reply which I think should stand.

POWER

NEW BRUNSWICK—POSSIBLE DELAY IN GRANT FOR MACTAQUAC DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Last Friday I addressed a question to the Prime Minister with regard to a $20 million grant to be made available to the government of New Brunswick for the development of the Mactaquac power project on the Saint John river. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman is now in a position to answer that question.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am afraid I am not. I mentioned this matter to my hon. friend the Minister of Transport, who I understand was to make a reply, but he is not in his place today. I will try to deal with this on Monday.

DRUGS

PHARMACEUTICAL ASSOCIATION REPRESENTATION ON BODIES CONSIDERING PROFESSIONAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): May I take this opportunity to reply to a question asked on Tuesday by the hon. member for Moose Mountain concerning consultation between the Canadian pharmaceutical association and the government. Such consultation will be particularly useful in connection with the consideration of the report of the royal commission on health services, which is presently being studied. In this connection the government has already received an assurance of co-operation from a number of professional associations, including the one referred to. The government will, of course, consult fully with these agencies, and desires to consult fully with them on matters of concern to their members. It is anticipated that this consultation will be on a continuing and periodic basis, but the administrative pattern for such consultation has not yet been finally determined.

HOUSING

SPECULATIVE LOANS UNDER WINTER INCENTIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, who answers in the house with respect to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Will direct loans on speculative housing be made available through the corporation this fall? If they will not, the winter incentive home building program will not be assisted very much.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): I am glad to be able to inform the hon. member and other members of the house that in connection with the winter incentive housing program, arrangements will be made similar to those made last year, for substantially the same period of time, with regard to speculative loans.

EDUCATION

MANITOBA—APPLICATION FORMS FOR STUDENT LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In his absence I would direct it either to the acting minister or to the parliamentary secretary. Is the government aware of the fact that within the province of Manitoba the forms being provided for students wishing to apply for loans under the federal government's student loan plan are those previously used by the Manitoba government itself? And is the hon. gentleman aware that these forms call for information not provided for in the government's own legislation, for example an affidavit by parents stating their financial position, and so on? I wonder whether this matter could be looked into over the week end in the hope that if something is being done which is not in accord with the understanding which was reached, it may be corrected.

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I will be glad to take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister, who will be returning shortly.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): In view of a report in the Toronto Daily Star last night that the student loan program, at least in Ontario, is bogged down by red tape, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance would look into this situation, too, over the week end so these roadblocks, if they do exist, can be cleared out of the way.

Mr. Pennell: I will be pleased to accept the suggestion of the hon. member and to bring this matter also to the attention of the minister.

INCREASED ASSISTANCE TO UNIVERSITY CONSTRUCTION PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Having regard to the extreme crowding of university facilities due to the current soaring enrolment figures, can the right hon. gentleman inform the house when the increased assistance to university construction programs announced during his speech on the Brandon College campus on March 7, 1963 will be implemented?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. As soon as I am able to say something on this important matter I will be glad to do so, but I cannot be specific at the moment.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

TENDERS FOR REPAIRS TO H.M.C.S. "PROVIDER"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister in charge of defence production or the Associate Minister of National Defence if either of them has received protests from the Halifax-Dartmouth and district labour council regarding the fact that H.M.C.S. Provider is not going to be repaired in the Halifax docks, and what action is being taken with regard to these protests?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I did receive such a telegram. While the repairs to Provider had been sought by competitive tenders, the tender of the Halifax shipyard was somewhat higher than that of the Saint John dockyard, and as a consequence the contract has been awarded to the Saint John Drydock Company rather than to Halifax. I should point out that in the telegram, of which I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has a copy, it is stated that the only difference between the two tenders was the sum of $150. In fact this is not quite precise; in addition to the $150 difference there was a further qualification contained in the Halifax shipyard bid which put it out of court.

MAINTENANCE AND CONVERSION OF SHIPS ON PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich asked whether the government would continue the policy that ships operating on the Pacific coast would be maintained and converted there. There is currently a review being made of government needs for the acquisition and conversion of shipping of all sorts, but in the meantime it is safe to say that ships which are based on one or other of the coasts and which will continue to operate on the same coast will be maintained on the coast on which they are based and on which they will continue to operate.

AIRPORTS

HAMILTON, ONT.—AVAILABILITY OF FEDERAL FUNDS FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport but in his absence perhaps the Prime Minister could answer it. Yesterday officials from the Hamilton city council were in Ottawa to meet with the officials of the Department of Transport with regard to Mount Hope airport. Could the minister tell the house what was the outcome of the discussions which were held?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could answer that question, but I am not in a position to do so. I will try to get an answer for Monday.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the result in the Toronto Riverdale election yesterday, which removed one of the candidates for the leadership of the Ontario Liberal party from the race, could the Prime Minister confirm or deny the very prevalent rumour in Ontario that he has given his official blessing to the hon. member for Renfrew South?

[Mr. Drury.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO HOLIDAYS FOR STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the fact that there seems to be general agreement that with the amount of business before us the house must carry on, is it not possible for a quick decision to be made so that members of the House of Commons staff might get their holidays? By "a quick decision" I mean letting some of them, on a staggered basis, start getting holidays this very week end.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this question is getting active consideration. Many members of the staff of the House of Commons are presently on holiday. The problem has to be worked out, bearing in mind that if the house is sitting certain services are required, but I can assure the hon. member that the subject is getting very active consideration.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did I hear the President of the Privy Council say that some of the sessional staff, or those who are regarded as sessional staff, of the House of Commons are presently on holidays?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not use the word "sessional".

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—REPORTED PRESENCE IN LONDON, ENGLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Is it a fact that Mr. Hal Banks is now in London to see the Canadian high commissioner, Mr. Chevrier, a former minister of justice of this country?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STAMP ISSUE COMMEMORATING PRE-CONFEDERATION MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Slogan (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. I wonder whether the Postmaster General could explain to the house the symbolism in the new stamp which is being issued by his department commemorating the 1864 meetings, and specifically could he explain the fact that the three maple leaves on an earlier stamp have been replaced by one maple leaf?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, they have not been replaced. Consequently I am afraid I do not understand the hon. gentleman's question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EXTENSION OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question was meant for the Minister of Labour but, in his absence, I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary.

It has to do with the statement the minister made last Friday in regard to the extension of certain winter works periods. Could the parliamentary secretary ask the minister to give us a more specific statement a little later on, so we may know exactly what conditions are to be met and whether it will be up to the provinces or the federal government to decide whether there will be such extensions?

[Text]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I would be delighted to do so, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

1. Departmental administration, $2,099,000.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Chairman, at the adjournment yesterday I was making some remarks regarding the dental health of Canadians. I think it is significant that about one quarter of the 200 or so recommendations in the Hall report deal with the dental health of Canadians. I think this again points up the importance of the subject. I had pointed out that dental diseases are almost universal, but at the same time they are largely preventable. However, because of the apathy of the public and the complacency of governments we are a nation of dental cripples. I could quote examples of the incidence of dental diseases among children but I hardly think I need do so. The tragedy of the situation is that those preventive measures which could be undertaken by the government at a very nominal cost are not being undertaken. Therefore a great deal of responsibility for the situation must rest on the shoulders of the government.

I must congratulate the minister on answering one of my questions, after many futile attempts, concerning fluoridation; but although the government was willing to put the facts before the people it has consistently refused to recommend this measure to the people, even though the Hall royal commission has recommended that in view of the reduction in dental disease to be expected from the fluoridation program, every community water system in Canada be equipped to provide the proper level of fluoride.

At the last meeting of the Canadian Dental Association a resolution was adopted recommending fluoridation to the people of Canada. The report released at the time of the meeting showed that 92 per cent more Canadians were using fluoridated water in 1963 than in 1962, a total of almost four million, or one in five. I think this number should be substantially increased, and there are three areas in which a great deal could be done. One area, of course, is research, and I dealt with that yesterday to a large extent and showed that the amount of money allocated to dental research in national health grants is approximately 1 per cent to 2 per cent and has been steadily declining over the last three years.

A program to educate the public in this field should also be considered, and, I must congratulate the toothpaste companies for their television advertisements, because they are bringing to the attention of the people the need for oral hygiene; and through improved oral hygiene alone the number of dental cavities can be cut in half. The government should assure responsibility in this regard. The department is putting out some pamphlets which I think are very good, but there should be more of them and they should be more widely distributed.

There is another subject I should like to touch upon, and that is prepaid dental plans. The dental associations across this country are studying the feasibility of prepaid dental health insurance, and are doing this largely on their own. It should be incumbent upon this government to allocate funds for studies in respect of the feasibility of dental health insurance, in so far as it differs from medical health insurance and insurance principles.

There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister and I hope she will provide us with some answers, particularly in respect to questions and recommendations about the administration within her own department. First of all I should like to ask again whether any step is being taken by the department to establish a specific dental health grant under the system of national health grants. When these grants were initially made I know that in the province of Manitoba they had to be taken from the maternal health plan. That was some time ago, but as time has passed every segment receiving these grants has been taxed to the full, and the segments which are receiving the grants are no longer willing to give some of this money to the dental field. Therefore it is absolutely necessary that a specific dental health grant be made. The minister has received specific representations from the Canadian Dental Association in respect of this matter, and I should like her to give an answer before we pass her first item, outlining her plans in this regard.

Another matter which I should like to draw to her attention relates to the various dental branches in other departments of the government, such as the Department of Veterans Affairs, which looks after the dental health of the R.C.M.P. and veterans; the Department of Justice, which looks after the dental health of inmates in penitentiaries, and the northern health services dental branch. It is time all dental services within the government, other than military, should be consolidated under one dental head.

I think that would bring about something that is very badly needed, and I refer to a uniform fee schedule. Each department has a different set of forms to be filled out and a different fee schedule, and many of the forms are extremely complicated. Everytime an R.C.M.P. officer goes to his dentist, the dentist has to fill out a long form listing all the dental work that has ever been done on that officer's teeth. If that officer comes in every six months and only has one or two fillings, this necessitates a great deal of work and a waste of time. Those are some of the things I think the department should look into in an attempt to simplify the procedures and eliminate some of the red tape that imposes such a burden on the practitioner.

I should like to make another recommendation to the minister concerning her department which is in keeping with a recommendation made by the Canadian Dental Association to the Hall commission, that steps be taken to see that the remuneration of professional people in government service is equivalent to that which they would receive in the private sector of the economy. Unless this is done it is hardly possible that we will fill the quotas we have for professional people in government, and certainly the conditions will not attract the best people but more likely the worst.

[Mr. Slogan.]

I think the people of Canada deserve something better. I think those individuals who undertake to dedicate themselves to public health in Canada, and accept government jobs, deserve better remuneration. At the same time I should like to recommend that members of the dental and medical professions should receive the same remuneration, because I see no reason why the dental field should be a step down the ladder.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest the minister should give autonomy to the dental branch so that in the final analysis decisions regarding dentistry will come from the dental division and not have to go through a medical man. Perhaps the lack of autonomy in that field is the reason dentistry has been allocated such a low position in government service.

As I have already said, I should like to know what thought the minister has given to allocating money for the establishment of pilot projects in respect of prepaid dental plans rather than the profession assuming the whole responsibility. The Hall commission report contains almost 50 recommendations in respect of what governments can do in the field of dental health, and in order to facilitate the passage of the minister's estimates I should like some information about what the government is doing in the way of grants for dental education, the establishment of new dental schools and other similar things. Perhaps it is of interest to note that Canada is fourteenth among 19 nations of the world as far as our population-dentist ratio is concerned. The government does have some responsibility in this regard.

Before concluding it might be of interest to hon. members to know that in 1926 the percentage of the consumer health dollar that was allocated to dental services was 11.7 per cent; 1929 it was 12.1 per cent; in 1934 it was 8.7 per cent; in 1945 it was 10.9 per cent and in 1961 it was 7.4 per cent. Relative to the total spent on health services the amount of money that is being spent on dentistry by the people of Canada today is lower than it has been for a great number of years. It might also be of interest to know —and this is one of the brighter sides—that although the ratio of dentists to population is expected to improve slightly over the next ten years and then become worse again, if we take the output productivity of dentists in 1931 as 100 per cent, in 1961 it had reached 281 per cent. At the same time the productivity of physicians and priests reached 175 per cent. Although because of increased technical knowledge and improved facilities in dental offices the productivity is increasing, it is not increasing fast enough to meet the growing needs of Canadians.

I have asked the minister several specific questions, and I am willing to sit down at this time in the hope that some answers will be provided before the first item is passed so I will not have to ask these questions again as the individual items are reached.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take too much of the committee's time, but there is a matter which I should like to place before the minister. It is probably not one which requires immediate attention, but I think it might well be given some consideration leading, I hope, to appropriate action at some time in the future.

May I at this time congratulate the minister on the reasonableness of her presentation. As a member of the legal profession and a very competent counsel, I understand, she has probably learned in the past the distinction between browbeating a witness—although, mind you, sometimes this may be necessary—and persuading, influencing and beguiling a jury. If she and her colleagues continue to regard the opposition as a jury I think we will make better progress.

I have here a press release issued in July by the world health organization dealing with what I consider to be one of the most serious problems to be faced not only by the civilized and free areas of the world but by the communist areas and the developing regions of the globe. I think it is rather interesting to examine the personnel who constituted this committee of the world health organization. It was headed by Dr. John A. Logan of the United States. The vice chairman was a woman, Dr. A. S. Perotskaja of the U.S.S.R. The rapporteur was Mr. P. C. Bose of India. The committee also included one representative each from Chile, the Netherlands, France, the United Kingdom and Tunisia. The release is titled "The Population Implosion". The head note is very simple and reads as follows:

> The sudden unprecedented pouring of rural people into urban areas in the developing countries may reach catastrophic dimensions within the next 10 or 20 years. In the developed countries, the congestion of people, industries, houses, vehicles in tentacular cities is causing alarm. The implosive pressures—to use an engineering term—are growing every day.
> To explore these questions the world health organization recently convened its first expert committee on environmental health aspects of metropolitan planning. This article follows the lines of the experts' discussions—

I am going to put a few of their observations on the record. These are not colourful, glowing, dramatic words. They are dry, even dreary, but they are very meaningful and most important. While I have no doubt much of this material is within the knowledge of the minister and her department, at the same time I think it does no harm to make this information public and to couple with it a suggestion I propose to make at the conclusion of my remarks.

To begin with, the release repeats a fact we well know but too often forget. It points out that before the year 2,000 the world's population is expected to double and to exceed six billion people. Then it goes on to say:

> The rush of people from country to town will continue, for agriculture will become much more efficient than it is now and by the end of the century perhaps only 10 per cent of the population will be working on the farm.

This means that almost all of the additional three billion people who will be populating the globe by that time will be living in cities. This will cause problems, and not the least of them will be health problems.

> Already today the cities of the world present health problems of staggering dimensions. How healthy will they be in future? The tremendous increase in urban population clearly justifies the warning that after the question of keeping world peace metropolitan planning is probably the most serious single problem faced by man in the second half of the 20th century.

If the population of the world does double and if what is set out here is correct—I certainly agree with it—we will find that instead of the population of cities of say two million doubling to four million, their population will triple or quadruple. Cities of six million people will become cities of 24 million. Cities with one and a half or two million people will become cities of seven or eight million people. The problems we now have will increase in direct ratio to the increase in population.

> In the United States two thirds of the population now live in large metropolitan areas and the suburbs of the cities are sprawling six times as fast as the city cores. In the developed parts of the world the housing shortage is not as great as it was immediately after the war but none of the countries can afford to relinquish their intensive efforts. In the developing parts of the world shanty towns, bidonvilles, slums, squatter settlements are mushrooming. In the built areas overcrowding is acute.

The release goes on to say:

Urbanization has two sides: opportunities for higher standards of living, for better education and housing, for more public health and more social satisfactions; on the negative side, however, there is encroachment on the available land, water and air, and amid multiple threats to health there is the general degradation of man's physical and social environment. The downward trend is easily recognized: overcrowding; building congestion; proliferation of slums; water shortage; inadequate waste disposal; pollution of water, land, air; noise, accidents, delinquency, crime, disease.

These are compendious words but these are all matters in respect of which legislative action is going to have to be taken at the municipal, provincial and federal levels, and I think it does no harm to draw these issues to the attention of the committee at this time.

Here, for example, are some very simple figures indicating what the increase in population will mean. For every new 1,000 people in a United States metropolitan area the following additional facilities are needed: 4.8 elementary school rooms and 3.6 high school rooms; 8.8 acres of land for schools, parks and play areas; an additional 100,000 gallons of water per day; 1.8 new policemen and 1.5 new firemen; one new hospital bed—this is something which certainly must concern the future planning of the Department of National Health and Welfare—1,000 new library books and a fraction of a jail cell, as well as more streets, more surfaces for the municipality to keep clean, more solid wastes to clear away, more sewage to treat, more storm water to cope with and so on.

One of the most interesting suggestions contained in the press release has to do with air pollution. We have heard a lot about water pollution and about the open sewers which our rivers are becoming. I now quote from the press release:

The simplest and most dramatic effect of air pollution is the increased number of deaths during periods of smog or other serious pollution. Mortality is greatest among the old and the infirm. But there is no doubt that air pollution plays a part in respiratory and other diseases.

According to the W.H.O. experts on metropolitan planning, one of the main causes of "unbalance" of the modern metropolis is without doubt the motor car.

We are all familiar with the condition brought about by motor car fumes in the city of Los Angeles. We hope it will not spread to our country, but the way to see that it does not is to plan well in advance.

Some suggestions are made with regard to steps to be taken to combat air pollution:

Satellite towns in which no pollution-producing fuels are used; green belts and wide open spaces to dilute and disperse pollution; central plants to provide heat and hot water to whole districts; less traffic flow in metropolitan areas; appropriate devices for automobile engines to minimize pollution.

In the Soviet union some attention has been given to this problem, and it is very interesting to note this comment in the press release:

In the Soviet union, standards in this matter have been adopted for new urban development. All industrial undertakings are divided into five classes according to the harmful substances discharged. For the "most harmful" class, factories must be separated from residential areas by a protective zone of greenery ranging from 1,000 to 3,000 metres depending on local weather conditions, etc. For the class at the other end of the scale, the figures are 50 to 150 metres.

There is this very interesting comment, and it is a statement which has been applied and accepted with regard to water:

Air should be regarded as a world resource to be conserved and utilized forever. The laissez faire policy of treating the sky as an open sewer is doomed to lead to disaster.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take the time to go into this press release any further. I am advised by the officials of the world health organization that a statement will be made available in due course and will be in our parliamentary library.

My experience has been that the period of gestation which leads to reforms and measures to combat problems of this magnitude is very lengthy. It may be 10, 15 or 20 years, but the gathering storm which is going to break upon the world in the form of the increase in population is something which must be dealt with at the legislative level as well as at the planning level. As I say, I assume and I hope this is a matter which the officials of the minister's department do take into consideration.

I make this simple suggestion now, and it is not one I expect to be implemented at this or even the next session. The minister should give consideration to discussing the prospect of establishing a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to deal with the problems of overcrowding, particularly as they relate to the varied and multiple matters over which she presides as minister of this department. A committee of this kind would, I assume, not conclude its deliberations in any great hurry. I would think that a period of years, perhaps two or three, might well elapse before the committee could report. I am sure the publicity achieved as a result of making an inquiry through a parliamentary committee of this kind would be a noticeable advantage that could not be derived in any other way.

I am going to conclude by urging the minister to make a note of this, if she has not already done so, as well as of the statement which will be made available in due course by the world health organization committee which deals with this very serious problem. It is one which will inevitably come upon us. It is my honest opinion that the establishment of an all-party joint committee to look into the problems with which we will be dealing in the near future is something which would be of major benefit to this country, and which would lend distinction to her administration of this department.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to comment on the nursing situation in the hospitals of this country, in view of the fact that we are dealing with item No. 1 of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I make particular reference to the item on page 286 of the estimates, contribution to the provinces under agreements entered into pursuant to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, $420 million. I have no criticism whatever to make of the amount of money involved in this item; in fact I am happy to see that the increase over a year ago is $35 million.

Last night the hon. member for Kamloops very definitely and explicitly put his finger on a great problem in this country of ours; that is, the continuing shortage of doctors. He emphasized that steps must be taken to meet this situation, which is becoming dangerous for the country as a whole. He also, out of his vast knowledge of the subject, dealt with the lack of money for medical research. The hon. member for Springfield was kind enough to speak on some of the problems connected with dentistry. I should like to refer to the nursing situation, which I believe is of more serious import to this nation than the shortage of doctors or the shortage of funds for medical research. However, I wish to congratulate the government upon the fact that this government has implemented the system of shift differential rates of pay for nurses in hospitals under the Department of Veterans Affairs.

This action by the Department of Veterans Affairs means that in every such hospital in the country the federal government is now paying a shift differential to the staff, including nurses. The nurses who work the evening shift are paid more money than those who work the day shift, and those who work the night shift are paid more money than those who work the evening shift. This government, and particularly the Minister of National Health and Welfare, are to be congratulated upon the fact that they have willingly paid, as did the previous administration under the hon. member for Perth, their share of the shift differentials to all hospital employees in the provinces of Quebec and Saskatchewan, and to all hospital employees except nurses in the province of British Columbia.

Now, I should like the hospital staffs of the dominion to realize that the federal government, under both the previous administration and this administration, has shown by its actions that it is not averse to paying shift differentials in all hospitals of the dominion. The federal government is paying approximately one third of the cost of the operation of all hospitals in the nation, and that is a very healthy contribution. I admire the present Secretary of State for External Affairs for many, many things. I first met him in 1922, and I have had a close and intimate contact with him over the intervening 42 years. I sincerely believe that the most outstanding act in his life was the introduction of this hospitalization act on a national basis. I am not suggesting that the Liberal government of 1956 initiated this type of welfare service. I know that two provinces in western Canada had experimented with it and had shown it could be done. However, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs is the man who made it possible to extend this type of hospital care from one end of the country to the other with the first act in 1956.

When the hospital staffs of the nation realize that the federal government, both the previous administration and this administration, is willingly paying one third of the cost of shift differentials, I feel that the staffs of those hospitals in the seven provinces not now paying shift differentials will demand that the provincial authorities institute shift differentials for these employees. I spoke on this subject two years ago when I was in opposition and we were considering the estimates of this department. I spoke on the subject a year ago, and I would go into it in detail once more except that I should like to see the estimates of the government passed as speedily as possible.

I did emphasize on both occasions when I spoke on this matter that I was advocating not only the payment of shift differentials for hospital staffs, but the payment of day premium rates of pay for those who are forced to work on Saturdays, Sundays, or statutory holidays. I produced many figures to show that the payment of day premium rates of pay is in practical operation in the printing trades in Canada, the one business about which I know most. If they can pay day premium rates for working Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, surely the governments of the ten provinces and the dominion can do the same thing.

I hold in my hand a contract between the Canadian union of operating engineers and one of the Toronto hospitals. This contract is up for renegotiation, as it expires next month, but the interesting thing about this contract is that it provides for day premium rates of pay to the engineer staff for holiday work. The particular clause dealing with it reads this way:

> Paid Holidays
> The following holidays are recognized by the employer: New Year's day, Dominion day, Thanksgiving day, Good Friday, Civic holiday, Christmas day, Victoria day, Labour day.
> All employees in this bargaining unit shall be given the above holidays off, with pay at their normal rates. However, should they be required to work on one of the above holidays, they shall be paid a day's pay plus time and one half their normal rate of pay.

I read this one contract between a labour union and a Canadian hospital simply as an example of what prevails in a fair number of hospitals today, that is, a day premium rate of pay for holidays; and the federal government is paying one third of that cost. Of course I believe that when the federal government is willing to pay one third of the cost of the day premium rates of pay for holidays, Sundays and Saturdays, it should pay a day premium rate to employees under its direct control and paid directly by cheques of the government of Canada.

In connection with this contract I have in my hand it is interesting to note that since the engineers are now paid a day premium rate of pay for national holidays, one of the items on which they wish to negotiate is a change in article 10:

> All hours worked on Saturday or Sunday shall be paid at the rate of time and one half.

I am not in a position to state whether this request of the union of operating engineers will be granted by the employing hospital whose contract I hold in my hand at this time, but it is going to be difficult to tell employees of the hospital that they should not be paid time and one half for Saturday and Sunday work when you are already paying them at two and a half times the rate of pay for statutory holidays.

The reason I emphasize day premium rates of pay so seriously is because I believe if they were being paid in all hospitals of the country at the present time we would be able to attract into the nursing stream a tremendous number of married women who are qualified nurses, but who will not leave their homes on week ends for the present rates of pay. It is pretty universal across the country that nurses working on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays draw only the regular rates of pay that people get for working on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or any other day of the week.

While many of these rates of pay today are almost munificent, it is a different matter when you ask a married woman to desert her home on the week end, perhaps for the only three days of the week her husband is there, and when the children are home from school and require a little more attention than when they are at classes. In that case, when a married woman thinks of the regular rate of pay for Saturdays and Sundays she is going to weigh it against the disadvantage of leaving her home. But if married nurses were paid a day premium rate of pay on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays I am certain there would be a great influx of married nurses back to the hospitals.

I have emphasized in the two previous comments I made on this situation—and I wish to say there was not a doctor in the house on either side of the aisle who did not come to me and say I was putting my finger on a matter of paramount importance to the nation—that if we paid day premium rates of pay over week ends and national holidays, I am confident we could increase the care rendered by the hospitals by 25 per cent, and we would not have to lay out any extra capital money in grants.

I stress the figure of 25 per cent on this basis, that many, many hospitals practically close on Friday at noon and do not get back into full operation until Monday morning. Doctors, particularly surgeons, do not want to operate over week ends when they know the staff is going to be considerably reduced. As I said before, and I repeat, somebody will immediately rise and point out that all the beds are occupied over week ends so how would you increase the production of a hospital—if I may use that word—by 25 per cent when all the beds are occupied over the week ends?

I say that many patients lying in hospitals on Fridays could be sent home if there were other patients coming in for necessary surgery; but since the staffs of the hospitals—I refer particularly to nursing staffs—are reduced at the week ends, surgeons do not like to operate on Fridays, and patients who might go home on Friday are told "Well, Sunday afternoon will be a nice time because your family will be free. Your husband can come and look after you," or if it is a man they say his wife can come for him. In this way these patients are convalescent from Friday afternoon to Sunday evening and the hospital collects the normal day's rate from the provincial authority because the bed is being occupied, but it is not being occupied to the greatest possible advantage.

If we were paying day premium rates of pay and the hospitals had full staffs seven days a week, including Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, I am confident the admitting committees of the hospitals would clear out of the hospitals on Fridays many people who remain in them as convalescents; surgeons would be able to operate on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, and you would get 25 per cent more production out of the hospitals without increasing your capital grants or increasing the size of the hospitals.

I have to pay a little tribute here—and I have to say "little" because I am a Liberal—to Hon. Matthew Dymond, the minister of health for the province of Ontario who, since we are both Presbyterians, is a very good friend of mine. Some years ago he told me about a hospital in Ontario wanting a tremendous grant for a great big addition. Its management said it was overcrowded; if it did not get a big addition all hell would break loose, and there would be disease and epidemics in the town. Dr. Dymond, who was a practising physician in the town of Port Perry and the city of Oshawa, listened to their argument for increasing the number of operating suites in the hospital, and he told them "Before I can give any answer to your request I would like you to supply me with a schedule of your operations in the surgical suites."

This hospital had four surgeries, and when he got the timetables of the operations performed in those suites over the previous two or three years he discovered something he had already suspected, that they were operating from seven o'clock in the morning until about one o'clock in the afternoon, and the only operations that went on in the four surgeries in the afternoons and evenings, and on Sundays and holidays, were emergencies.

Dr. Matthew Dymond said to these people who wanted to increase the number of their surgeries and the size of their hospital, "Why don't you operate more in the afternoons?" The doctor who replied said, "You can't operate in the afternoon. You operate in the morning because the patient has been well rested, the diet has been looked after, and his stomach is clear." Dr. Dymond then said, "If you had an automobile collision and eight people required emergency surgery at four o'clock in the afternoon, surely you would not schedule their operations for the next morning? If you can operate on emergency cases no matter at what hour they occur, why can't you operate on ordinary civilian patients in the afternoons?" As a result of his definite stand on this matter the hospital in question rescheduled its surgical suites, and he found that with that rescheduling he could give it a grant of one quarter of what it wanted to increase the number of its beds. But they got no grant to increase the size of their surgical suites.

I tell that story to show that hospital facilities could be used to a greater extent if more thought were given to the conduct of hospital affairs. I say again that if we had day premium rates of pay in hospitals, the effective capacity of our present institutions could be increased by 25 per cent.

No doubt we will hear a lot of talk about the provincial by-election yesterday in Riverdale, Ontario. I hope I am not out of order when I point out that the government of the province is Conservative. It appears from the early returns that the New Democratic party has won the riding, with the Liberal candidate second and the Conservative third. I make this statement as a resident of metropolitan Toronto, that the biggest influence in that by-election was the half empty Riverdale hospital which stands right in the middle of the riding.

Here is a hospital with more than 808 beds. Some 450 of them are empty, and they have been empty for more than a year, due to the lack of nursing staff. Officials in Toronto have gone to Great Britain; they have spent a good deal of money and effort to recruit staff there. But because of the rates of pay now prevailing in Canada they have not been able to attract sufficient nurses from Britain to staff that hospital. The rates of pay offered by the province are not sufficient to attract married nurses to return to hospital work, and many of the nurses who staff our institutions today are married women. As a result this hospital stands half empty, though it is possibly the most modern hospital in the Dominion of Canada today.

This, to me, indicates some weakness in hospital administration by the departments—and when I use the plural I am referring to both the federal and the provincial governments—with regard to the method of payment for nursing services. It seems odd to me this government, of which I am a supporter, is able to pay one third of the cost of day premium rates of pay for such employees as engineering and mechanical workers, and can pay shift differential rates to hospital staffs under the jurisdiction of the Department of Veterans Affairs, while declining to pay such rates to nurses directly under the control of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The Department of Veterans Affairs has hospitals in all ten provinces, in which shift differentials are being paid. This is a wonderful example. Hospital staffs are well aware what is going on in these institutions. They are aware what is going on in Quebec, where these differentials have been paid for 15 years, as well as of the situation in Saskatchewan where they are also being paid. I would strongly urge the minister, who I know takes a great and intelligent interest in the work of her department, to consider seriously in the course of the spending of these estimates, an arrangement to provide for shift differential rates of pay and day premium rates of pay for all hospital personnel under her direct supervision. This would be an example to all those responsible for the administration of hospitals in those seven provinces whose governments do not admit that payment on this basis is the modern, 1964 approach to the labour question of today.

It is fortunate that the minister is a qualified lawyer in her own right. There is a small problem which I have discussed privately with officials of the government and of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I think it is one which should be brought out on the national scene, if the radio and the press will publicize it. It has to do with the fact that government payments, such as old age pensions, cannot be attached by those to whom a recipient may owe money. I would not recommend that any great change should be made in this regard. I believe that people receiving what they call pension cheques, old age assistance cheques, should be protected. If they were not protected as they are at present I am sure many unscrupulous organizations would deprive them of their funds in a hurry.

[Mr. Cowan.]

However, workers in the hospital field come across a ridiculous situation. Among those who enter hospitals as patients are many over 70 years of age who we know are in receipt of old age assistance allowances. They are maintained at government expense because they do not have the benefit of a hospitalization plan and because their children refuse to pay expenses incurred by the hospitals in which their parents are lying.

There are times when I wonder whether I am fortunate to be engaged in hospital work on a voluntary basis, I become so incensed at some of the things which occur. On the other hand, of course, there are rewards; for instance, the kindness you see extended by hospital employees to the patients who come through the doors. But I know nothing which upsets me more than the unwillingness of many children, some of them in high places, to pay for the hospitalization of their parents, particularly when they are over 70 years of age. I know hospitals in Ontario which are caring for patients over 70 years of age who do not have the benefit of hospitalization plans, and when they ask the children if they will get their parents to sign over the old age pension cheques to help pay for the hospitalization costs, those children laugh in their faces. I would point out again that these cheques for $75 a month cannot be attached by legal action, or diverted in any way. The families get the money and spent it as they like.

The minister is, I know, deeply interested in every aspect of the work of her department. As I say, she takes an intelligent interest in its administration. In addition she is a lawyer in her own right. I would ask her now, on behalf of the hospitals of Ontario, to exercise her undoubted talent and ability in seeking to have some change made so as to deal with the situation I have described. When one government department makes a payment to a recipient who is entitled to it, surely another government department should be able to secure that money in order to defray an expense incurred by a recipient lying in a government paid hospital bed.

On the whole I have nothing but commendation for the minister and for the department, but these are thoughts which in my opinion should be brought forward. In conclusion I repeat my suggestion that the minister give serious consideration to instituting a system of shift differential rates of pay and day premium rates of pay in order to ease the shortage of hospital beds, especially by encouraging married nurses to return to the stream of hospital service.

Mr. Rapp: I should like to direct some questions to the minister of health and welfare concerning matters in which many of the towns in my constituency are extremely interested. Strictly speaking they relate more to the estimates of the privy council, because these are matters pertaining to grants by the centennial commission. But many of the people I represent would be interested to know whether hospitals can be built with the assistance of centenary grants. In many cases it would be most beneficial to those concerned, if this could be done, and I wonder if the minister is in a position to tell me whether these grants can be used for the purpose they have in mind so that a lasting monument may exist after these grants have been allocated. The reason they are so interested is that usually these hospital grants are not sufficient to permit some of these towns to build hospitals which are large enough to serve the rural areas. I should like the minister to give me an explanation in reply to my question.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some brief comments on two points. For some nine years I had the privilege of working in the department under the two predecessors of the present minister, the hon. member for Perth, who is in the house, and the hon. member for Essex East. I know that in the development of this department, which development is evidenced every year in the estimates which come before the house, there has been a broad measure of bipartisan agreement on the general objectives and work of the department. Many words of tribute, all of them well deserved, have been paid in the course of this debate to the deputy ministers, especially Dr. Cameron, Dr. Willard, and to Miss Waters, the very conscientious and capable secretary whose services will be very greatly missed.

I feel that at this point there are two matters worthy of consideration. First is the question of social and economic research. A good deal has been said about the need for medical research and the development of research in connection with physical fitness, dentistry and other aspects of the department. The Department of National Health and Welfare has developed a very capable staff over a period of years, who have consistently interested themselves in the general problems of the cost of health services and in investigating in depth the programs developed by the department. The dominion bureau of statistics through the health and welfare division publishes annual statistical reports which are available and distributed as part of its functions. I hope the department will not lose sight of the need for strengthening and developing of this type of staff.

At the time when the previous administration, I think quite properly, attempted to form a general assessment of the health picture and prepare material which would given some general, long term guide lines, it was decided that a royal commission would be the form of investigation and a separate staff, including those qualified in social and economic research, were engaged for this project. The results of the commission's work are very interesting. They have taken a very broad sweep of the spectrum of health services. They have also stated very clearly the aims and objectives for improving the nation's health in a most commendable fashion.

Those who have worked in this field realize the very sensitive problems in relation to the professions concerned, and no objectives in the health field can be secured without the active co-operation of the Canadian medical profession and other responsible groups. I hope the department will continue to follow the policy of retaining key members of its staff who are trained and qualified in this area, and will resort to the policy of hiring outside consultants for outside jobs only on special occasions. There is this continuous field staff available within the department for special assignments in relation to other areas of research, and this must be constantly kept in mind. I hope the proper emphasis on this type of research will also be maintained.

The second comment I want to make, Mr. Chairman, relates to the whole question of shared cost programs. This department is one which has applied the principle of shared cost programs as much as any department of government. There are others which have done so, but in terms of financial magnitude a program like hospital insurance looms very large. The correspondence tabled yesterday in this house by the Prime Minister deals with specific proposals on the subject to the provincial authorities. The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was put on the books in 1956 when the hon. member for Essex East was minister, although the agreements were signed and implemented by the succeeding administration. I might mention that one of the things I have retained and will always regard with affection is a photograph of the hon. member for Perth on the occasion of the signing of the first hospital insurance agreement with the province of Ontario.

Certainly the development of this program has been accompanied by many other events which I think are of fundamental value to the Canadian people. For example, there is the promotion of standard hospital accounting; promotion of standard statistical reporting procedures; the full participation through the dominion council of health at regular meetings of all the provincial authorities. When I hear spokesmen from the province of Quebec, both my colleagues in my own party and hon. members in other parts of the house, saying that Quebec is not a province like the others, nowhere was this more brought home than at these meetings at which spokesmen for this province also spoke up for people who were French speaking, and for institutions in other provinces similar to those in their own.

I would be less than frank, Mr. Chairman, if I did not say to this committee that I would be concerned about the effect of contracting out procedures if this had the result of removing a voice from the conference table. The regular conference table meetings which have taken place, at which the voice of the province of Quebec was frequently more than just a voice for its own province, are of great importance. If the effect of contracting out were to create two Canadas, one of which would be operating under a different set of rules from a federal authority, I think this would be a very serious matter and might have consequences which perhaps have not been fully considered to date for the long term development and implementation of programs.

There are many other aspects of this matter, and when the appropriate legislation is placed before the house dealing with tax abatement procedures and percentages I hope at that time to make further comments. However, I do feel that the department is to be commended for the work it has done in the development of these co-operative federal-provincial programs. In this regard the term we like to use is "nation-wide", not "national" or "uniform" in any centralized sense. But they should be uniform in the sense that every one has certain basic objectives, and that they get together at the conference table once every six or three months to review the administration of the programs, the gaps in the programs, the difficulties in the programs, and make recommendations on necessary amendments to regulations—as they are in most cases—which could be enacted by order in council. This is a flexible procedure which could be maintained and was the very essence of many of the shared cost programs. I would hope there would not be any doctrinaire or rigid approach to the question which would destroy the flexibility, the sensitivity and the truly Canadian spirit which has been built into these federal-provincial co-operative relationships.

I repeat, I should not let this opportunity pass without indicating my concern over the possible destruction of relationships which have been very carefully built up over a long period of time. I have taken as only one example hospital insurance and health grants, which come immediately to mind, although many other programs on the welfare side are also involved in this package. I would think the minister, her officials and the staff of the department have given us a very good example of the way in which, freed from party slogans and the general ideas with which we become so often emotionally concerned, federal-provincial co-operation can be achieved, and I think the staff of her department are to be commended in this regard.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to make a few remarks about these very important estimates. First of all I wish to congratulate the minister for her diligence and the concern she has for her department, and I think all of us in fairness will admit that she has had a very trying and difficult period to go through in connection with the Canada pension plan, with all its complications and ramifications. Regardless of the delays in the past and the changes that have been required because of provincial demands, we all know her heart is in the right place, and we look forward to dealing with this plan in the very near future.

Mr. Chairman, I also thank her for her willingness to listen to the representatives of organizations, whether national or local, who have come to Ottawa. I think this is very fortunate indeed, because even those individuals at the centre of things can learn from those on the fringe of affairs, as it were, particularly with respect to problems concerning this department.

I should also like to pay tribute to her staff. I get along very well with the staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare because, as you know, it is not the responsibility of that department to promote dams on the Arrow lake, and that makes some difference. During the 19 years I have been in this house I have always found the officials of every branch of this department willing to give every consideration to any problem brought to their attention, and to carry out inquiries and give explanations that were necessary.

May I state that I wholeheartedly support the remarks that have been made by previous speakers representing this party in the debate on these estimates, particularly in respect of the Canada pension plan and the report of the royal commission on health services. There is no need for me to repeat what has been so well said by previous speakers, except to emphasize my complete endorsation of their stand on these particular issues.

However, I do wish to bring to the attention of the minister one omission that has been brought to my attention in respect of the report of the royal commission on health services. This omission has been drawn to my attention by representatives of organizations in my constituency as well as by various other individuals. There are apparently no recommendations in that report in relation to continuing care facilities for older persons. I have discussed this question with the minister and with a number of individuals who are very interested in this situation. Women's organizations are particularly interested in this subject, and the problem is of great concern to small communities because of the direct association with the need for satisfactory after-care facilities and nursing homes.

I am not going to take the time of the house to make extended representations, though I had intended to speak at some length on this subject, but I can draw the attention of the minister and hon. members of this house to the general feeling that exists in my constituency, at least, by quoting from an editorial which appeared in the Trail Daily Times of August 14, 1964 under the heading "Aid for Continuing Care". Mr. Chairman, this newspaper strongly supports the Progressive Conservative party and takes a great deal of pleasure in ribbing the hon. member for Kootenay West whenever it has the opportunity. However, I agree with what is said in this editorial on this subject, and I should like to quote it. It states:

> The report of the dominion royal commission on health services, commonly known as the Hall royal commission report, has a deficiency that is of serious local consequence.
> It omits to provide for dominion participation in what are known as "continuing care facilities," in other words, nursing home type establishments.
> This absence has jeopardized Rotary club plans to construct and operate such an institution as a sort of adjunct to the Trail-Tadanac hospital.

This would also apply to other hospitals. The editorial then continues as follows:

> Months ago, health minister Eric Martin rejected a private enterprise proposal to build and operate a nursing home in Glenmerry. He came out strongly in support of the Rotary project because, he said, the Hall royal commission could be expected to recommend dominion participation in such public projects. The availability of dominion operating funds would enable the provincial government to place nursing homes on a per diem basis, similar to that obtaining in hospitals, thus effecting important economies for patients of modest resources.
> This week, Mr. Martin sent the Times a copy of the text of representations the B.C. government has made to Ottawa in connection with the Hall report, and in it he says this:
>
> "British Columbia deplores the fact that the report's recommendations do not encompass the field of continuing care for persons suffering from protracted illness and who require nursing care and periodic medical care over a long period of time.
>
> Just as the provision of facilities and services for the care and treatment of persons who are acutely ill is of vital importance, and the development of convalescent and rehabilitative programs is also of great value, so too is the provision of long term care of major importance and worthy of being an integral part of any universal health services program.
> Therefore...British Columbia urges the government of Canada to include under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act coverage for those persons receiving care in approved continuing care facilities."

I support that article in principle, although I must say that in view of the fact the government of British Columbia is about to loan the province of Quebec $100 million I cannot see how it can be short of funds to do this work in the immediate future.

Over a period of nearly 20 years I have had the pleasure of being either the president or a director of a community hospital, and as a result of that experience I know of the need for these facilities. Certain limited facilities are provided, but they are far too costly for many older persons. Just prior to my return to Ottawa I was speaking with a lady who told me of a friend of hers who had gone into a nursing home which charged $350 to $400 per month. She had stayed there until she had exhausted the $8,000 she had in the bank, which represented her life's savings. Then, of course, she had to leave the nursing home to be cared for by another friend who was willing to look after her on the basis of some assistance from her old age security.

There is a great need in this respect, and I do urge the minister to give some consideration to the situation. I understand consideration is being given by a number of national organizations, as well as by the minister and her officials. I think we should be able to find a solution to this problem, financial and otherwise, as a result of co-operation between federal and provincial governments which are willing to do their share and accept their responsibilities.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring one further matter to the attention of the minister in connection with this report. During my recent visit to my constituency I received a number of representations urging that the art of chiropractic be included on an equal basis with other health professions in any health program to be introduced. When I was a member of the British Columbia provincial legislature there was a discussion in this regard during a proposed amendment to the workmen's compensation act. Prior to this discussion the art of chiropractic was not included under the act. As a result of representations from various organizations in British Columbia the regulations under the workmen's compensation act were amended so that industrial casualties who were recommended by doctors could receive assistance from chiropractors. I will now read a card which was sent to me by a very well known citizen of the Arrow lakes:

> It appears that the near future will see some form of government participation in a health care program. Chiropractic is a separate and distinct health service, not provided by any other profession. It is a health service which is required and used by many citizens of British Columbia. I therefore strongly urge that you, as my elected representative, endeavour to ensure that chiropractic is included on an equal basis with the other healing professions in any health program to be introduced.

I support that proposal from my personal experience and personal knowledge of what has been done with the proper use of the art of chiropractic, and I urge the minister to give consideration to this request.

I wish to support wholeheartedly the remarks made by the hon. member for Hamilton South with respect to the necessity for greater consideration of the needs of the mentally retarded and mentally ill in Canada. We must realize that the member for Hamilton South speaks with knowledge and from experience. Unfortunately I had to be absent from the house when he spoke, but I read his speech this morning. I think it was excellent, and I wish to endorse what he said in this respect. I do so wholeheartedly because I represent a riding in which the people themselves have tried to do something in this regard through the organization of the Kootenay society for handicapped children originated first by Dr. Endicott, a very well known doctor associated with the clinic at Trail, who has given years of service to this organization.

He had occasion recently to come to Ottawa. His colleagues were very anxious, as he himself was, that he should have the opportunity to meet the minister and discuss with her their experience with some of these problems locally. On behalf of the Kootenay society for handicapped children I want to express very sincere appreciation for the time the minister spent discussing this matter with their representative, Dr. Endicott, when we all know that she was particularly busy on the day in question. Dr. Endicott was very pleased, and he returned and made a report. I wish to read now from the minutes of a meeting of the board of governors of the Kootenay society for handicapped children held on June 21, 1964:

> Dr. Endicott reported that he had visited Miss Judy LaMarsh in May. He stated that he had told her that the estimated cost of the complete plans for the Dr. Endicott home would be $500,000 and gave her a copy of the brief, on which he had made some marginal notes. He stated that there would be a dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa in October and that Miss LaMarsh particularly wanted "lay" people to attend, people from local societies and associations. She wanted the experts to be balanced by plain interested people. Dr. Endicott recommended that we send a delegate, which would cost about $400—$500.

They intend to do this, and this is the sort of approach I like in problems of this kind. I think ministers and officials of departments can learn from local people. I have had a few experiences involving one or two departments of the government when on occasion I have met an official who gives the impression that he is sitting on the right hand of the Almighty. I am very glad to say I have not had this experience with the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Dr. Endicott makes some suggestions which I want to bring to the attention of the committee because I think they indicate a lengthy study of the question. In writing to me about this matter he says:

> As you know, we have analysed the problem as offering five possible solutions. The favoured one at present and the one supported by present federal grants is encouragement of retention in the parental home. This is the "experimental legislation" you presented to a meeting of our society in Trail some years ago. The expectation at that time, certainly by provincial officials, was that there would be an exodus from Woodlands of dependants whose parents would want their child and the grant. This did not occur. The second expectation has been disappointing also in so far as the waiting list for admission to Woodlands has not decreased but is now almost three times greater, about 875 to 300.

There are 875 retarded children waiting to get into Woodlands in British Columbia, while at the same time the government of that province lends $100 million to the province of Quebec and tells people generally that they have not got the funds to care for these children.

Mr. Cowan: Quebec's needs may be greater.

Mr. Herridge: Dr. Endicott continues:

A second solution is the large centralized institution of which Woodlands is an example. This solution suffers from a number of difficulties, the most important of which is to maintain public and parental interest and responsibility toward the dependant population of the institution. A degree of improvement has been accomplished locally in New Westminster but for the Kootenays this is a major difficulty. In addition, being a government institution it is too impersonal, too large and afflicted with high costs. This is the solution we have been attemtping to modify or change over the years.

He continues:

A third solution is to find foster homes. This is difficult to start with and lacks continuity to such a degree that servicing by social workers or voluntary personnel becomes well nigh impossible. In addition, rapid changes of home environment are distressing to the dependant individual and contribute to emotional instability which makes the problem of care particularly difficult in the mentally retarded adult.

This is what we have now come to call the Thatcher home solution of problems related to retarded or mentally undeveloped children.

A fourth solution has been tried many times. That is imposition of responsibility, with or without financial reward, onto a sibling, usually in my experience a daughter. I have yet to see it devoid of bitterness no matter how well intentioned the person might be at first. The interference with the personal life, the attitude of the partner in the marriage and the effect on the children in the sibling's family makes this almost inevitable. The eagerness of any person so threatened to find alternatives convinces me that it is not an acceptable solution in general.

Then he goes on to deal with the Kootenay society for handicapped children:

We offer a community based facility governed by a local voluntary organization capable of maintaining community and parental interest and responsibility for the dependant individuals. It would provide a facility for temporary care in case of family crisis such as illness of the mother. The main factor is continuity. This is offered by Woodlands or by siblings but cannot be achieved by any other method except the one our society offers. At some point in history the parental care breaks down, be it late or early. This second home, community based, with parental participation is potentially a reasonably more satisfactory solution. By making parents and community responsible for operative costs it can be made competitively economical.

He goes on to deal with the necessity for co-operation by governments. I am very taken with the attitude of the officers of this society and their approach to the problem. I think it is along these lines that we are going to find a solution and meet this increasingly recognized need.

Before I conclude I wish to bring to the attention of the minister that during the past year, as usual since the Disabled Persons Act has been in force, I have met a number of persons who have made application for the allowance and been refused. I simply cannot understand why these applications have been refused. I have talked to some local doctors in Trail, Castlegar, Nelson, Nakusp and other areas in my constituency. Whenever one of these cases has been brought to their attention they have said also that they could not understand why the application was refused, because the person in question was completely unemployable. I understand the regulations are such that if they can look after themselves to some extent they are not considered eligible for the allowance.

I have discussed this question with doctors. I have discussed it with persons directly concerned. I have discussed it with the chairman of the disabled allowance board in Vancouver, that is the provincial authority. I have read the regulations, and I can see that the interpretation of the act is the main reason for the failure to grant the allowance when it seems obvious to any lay person that it is necessary. I can see before me now a young man in Castlegar who is completely disabled and who will never be able to earn a living at any ordinary occupation, yet he was rejected. I know of a lady in Nelson who is in similar circumstances and whose application was rejected just two or three months ago.

I do urge that there be some reconsideration of this situation and that if necessary amendments to the Disabled Persons Act should be introduced. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree with me that when this act was passed we were all under the impression that the act was going to cover the various types of cases I have been discussing. I am sure other members have had similar experiences. I believe this is a very serious situation. We boast about our production, our wealth, our economic activity and our prosperity. I say this in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that any nation that cannot properly look after its young people, its disabled people and its senior citizens, and provide these essential services, has not yet evolved into what I would consider a Christion civilization.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I am sure you will indulge me for a minute or two. I have no criticism of the minister; I think she has been doing a fine job, but it would be out character for me to praise her too highly. I was much impressed with the speech made by the hon. member for York-Humber, although frankly I do not entirely agree with him that rates of pay are the solution to the nursing problem, nor would I like to think that mothers and wives who want to spend time on the week ends with their families and who would not go back to the hospital for $12 may go back for $20. I should like to say that if anyone in this house wants information about hospital administration, he would do well to spend an hour with the hon. member for York-Humber.

However, since the hon. member for York-Humber is a director of one, he does not want to get tough with hospitals. I should like to say to the minister that since she pays a good portion of the piper's fee, although she may not be able to call the tune I think her department should at least have the right to find out how that tune is being played, especially in so far as hospital administration is concerned. The hon. member for York-Humber mentioned that the hospitals are almost closed on week ends. We know this is true. However, there are other questions the minister might investigate, such as the allocation of beds to doctors; the qualifications that doctors must have in order to be on staff; the fact that a doctor, being on the staff of one hospital, cannot practice in another hospital, in fact cannot even walk in the door, though we presume he is a graduate doctor. These are things that are costing us money. Not only are they costing us money but they contribute to the maladministration of hospitals and the great shortage of beds. In fact, what is the civilian administration of a hospital? I do not even know if the term has any definition. Each hospital seems to be administered by itself. These are the things into which we have a right to inquire.

I should like to ask the minister to consider one other point which perhaps is timely now if the minister is considering the introduction of some sort of medical plan five years hence. She is a member of the legal profession, and I use the word "profession" only loosely because it is a legal business. I have a feeling that the medical profession is no longer a profession but a medical business. I should like to ask her to concentrate on the problem we are going to face about five years from now when we try to introduce a medical plan, namely the shortage of doctors. Since we will be facing a very united group, I ask the treasury benches now if it would not be advisable for the government to consider training doctors at the government's expense. We should train as many doctors as could qualify by giving them scholarships. Then when we do think of introducing a medical plan there will be no shortage of doctors but rather a superfluity of doctors. Under those circumstances I doubt very much whether the medical profession would consider going on strike, as they have done in other places and at other times. We would be able to call upon a much larger group to staff these hospitals and look after the administration of a medical plan.

Miss LaMarsh: Perhaps before the item carries I might attempt to answer a few of the questions which have been asked, at least in a cursory way. If I might start with the last speaker and his most interesting suggestion that if there is any conflict between the government and the medical profession which the government feels it cannot resolve successfully by winning over the doctors we should then circumvent the profession by establishing our own doctors, I would say to the hon. member that the government has not any intention of doing this. The Hall report has recommended that there be a very substantial increase in the federal government's participation in the provision of facilities to teach doctors, and that a great many more doctors should be produced. To this question the department is giving most sympathetic attention.

My honourable and esteemed friend from Kootenay West has dealt with a number of matters. He requested that I forgive him for having to leave for another appointment, and said he would read my remarks in Hansard. He spoke of the program which is being developed, and particularly the conference on retardation that will be held next month. He mentioned the special interest that his constituents have in the construction of new and specialized facilities for retardeds. He mentioned also his interest on behalf of a constituent in the inclusion of chiropractic services at the time any medical health plan is instituted. I should like to say that representatives of the chiropractic profession have frequently waited upon me since I have been in office, and I have listened at length and with sympathy to the representations which they have made. Other interested people, notably the hon. member for Red Deer whose profession this is, have also made recommendations in this regard.

My hon. friend from Kootenay West also raised a problem concerning nursing homes and chronic hospitals, and inquired why it was that the Hall commission apparently did not deal with this particular problem. I would point out that there is a difference between the two types of facilities, and chronic hospitals come within federal government participation if included in the hospitalization scheme by the appropriate province. The differentiation between that type of facility and a nursing home, which is more appropriately a welfare facility, is probably the reason the health commission felt it should not deal with the matter as coming within the scope of its inquiry. It is a difficult area, and one in which there is an increasing interest on behalf of the aged.

My own interest in nursing homes has been increased by a number of representations I have had from hon. members and interested laymen, and this is a subject of study by the department, not only in connection with the type of facility—not strictly a nursing home but a chronic hospital—which is referred to in the Hall report. I can only say to my hon. friend that any announcement regarding support would be a matter of new government policy and cannot be made at this time.

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale rather caught me by surprise in asking whether hospitals may be built with centennial grants. I can only say to the hon. member it is an interesting question the answer to which I do not know, and I shall have to refer him to those who are responsible when their estimates come before us; or perhaps he might direct an inquiry to them.

There was a most interesting contribution by the hon. member for Peace River, who was looking ahead, and perhaps not so far ahead as many may think, into the question of the population explosion and the pollution of air and water. It may be he is not aware of the fact that in my department there is an environmental health branch whose responsibilities encompass very close liaison and collaboration with the provinces on the matter of air and water pollution.

The hon. member suggested the setting up of a joint committee of both houses to deal with the problems which will arise from overcrowding. His suggestion is one of great interest, although the question of overpopulation and overcrowding appears to have less application to this country than to most of the other developed countries of the world. Notwithstanding that, there can be no doubt that Canadians must take an interest in this as a world health problem which in the future, if not at home, from abroad will press upon their consciousness in the matter of food supply and other aspects. A cursory examination of a week's newspaper will find all kinds of groups, religious groups, lay groups, medical groups, showing increased agitation on the question of population explosion. I am very grateful for the comments made by the hon. member for Peace River which I shall take to heart and consider although, as he suggested, it may be some time before he sees any fruition from his suggestion.

The hon. member for Springfield, in his contribution last night and again today, as a dentist reflected his interest in things dental. He asked whether any steps were being taken to establish a specific dental health grant. I must say that at this time it is not in the contemplation of the department, although he knows there is assistance from health grants for particular dental projects. He also mentioned the matter of fluoridation, and suggested the federal government should be giving advice and direction in this regard.

He is aware, since it was elicited in response to a question put to my parliamentary secretary in my absence, of the department's view with respect to fluoridation. Oddly enough, fluoridation is a matter which evokes a tremendous emotional response. However, it is not a matter in which the federal government has any primary responsibilities, although we have undertaken studies on it. This is, as in smoking, a matter in which we can advise and consult with provincial governments, whose primary responsibility it is; and indeed in the matter of fluoridating water supplies this remains a question of local preference. However, the department has made clear its attitude with respect to the benefits to be gained from fluoridating water supplies.

A number of questions were asked last evening by the former minister, dealing with the appointment of a national welfare council for which legislation was provided during his term in office. It is anticipated that this council will be appointed later this fall. He also raised the question of whether the province of Saskatchewan had made any suggestion about a new relief program. I should like to say, as I said earlier, that this was discussed at the dominion-provincial conference of welfare ministers a couple of months ago, and I understand it is likely to be a matter of discussion if not for a future dominion conference of premiers at least for the conference of welfare ministers which will be reconvened later this fall. I think the hon. member for Perth is aware, as I am, from newspaper reports that this was a matter for discussion among the premiers when they met at Banff a month or two ago.

At the conference of welfare ministers which I called and attended a month or so ago, a great variety of views were expressed. I do not know what position will be taken by Saskatchewan or any other province at the time of the next meeting, but I shall undertake to report to the House of Commons if there is any conclusion drawn as a result of those discussions.

Some questions were also asked by the hon. member for Perth about cost sharing arrangements with the provinces and the letters dealing with contracting out, which the Prime Minister tabled yesterday. I am sure the hon. member has now had an opportunity to read those letters in yesterday's Hansard and to hear the Prime Minister's answers earlier today during the question period, when he said this legislation will be forthcoming very soon. At that stage he will be able to question the matter at greater length.

I was grateful for the intervention by the hon. member for Carleton who, in the house, has shown a continuing interest in the department in which he worked for such a long period of time. I note with interest his remarks about the health grants and welfare grants, and his disinclination to see a change effected by contracting out.

Last night an hon. member suggested that family and youth allowances should be paid together. I thought I made this matter clear when the youth allowance legislation was passed in July. However, I should like to point out first that there is a considerable difference in approach as between the two pieces of legislation and there would be a considerable administrative difficulty; for, as is known, family allowance cheques are paid each month. This will not be the case with youth allowance cheques, particularly during the summer months, because July and August amounts will be paid in September when it is ascertained that a student has returned to school. It will be seen that there would be numerous adjustments back and forth if these were coupled in one cheque; therefore it is not anticipated that they will be paid in one cheque. I may say, if anyone is concerned that this would cause an increase in the number of employees in my department, that the family allowances division is responsible for these allowances and their payment. The number of individuals we have had to add to the staff to deal with these allowances is fewer than the number we would have been obliged to add were we paying the allowances in one cheque. This is because of the necessity of making adjustments in September of each year.

Mr. Slogan: What happens when a term begins, say, in the middle of a month? Do they receive $10 for that month, or is a pro rata payment made?

Miss LaMarsh: They get the whole amount.

Mr. Slogan: Are these cheques sent to the parents?

Miss LaMarsh: To the parents. I have forgotten the date. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Springfield was here when this was discussed in committee in the house. There was a lively discussion at that time and many questions were dealt with. I would ask the hon. member to look at Hansard for that day. A great many questions dealing with the regulations were answered at that time, and I believe they will prove more useful in answering questions from correspondents and constituents than is normally the case.

During this discussion there has been a continuing refrain asking the government to spend more money. A number of hon. members have recommended that more money should be spent on family allowances, old age security, research of various kinds including medical research, fitness facilities and so on. As almost every item was dealt with in a general way, requests were made that more money should be spent. I should be happy to meet these requests, but last evening, while I was sitting here, I tried to figure out what sum of money would be required to meet the requests which have been made up to that point and I confess I was not able to come up with anything I would feel justified in placing before the Minister of Finance, particularly in one year. I would point out that there has already been a large increase in the estimates of this department.

Mr. Willoughby: I feel—and I thought I made this clear last night—that to spend money in the direction I indicated would be a form of economy. Increased expenditures on research would encourage more people to enter medical schools and remain in Canada. The situation under the present system is like pouring water into a sieve—the more you pour, the more goes out at the other end. I suggest the economy of our country would be better served if we spent more money on making it worth while, by improving research facilities, for these people to remain in Canada, and I urge the minister to do her best to take up with her colleagues in the government the idea of increasing the amount available for research here.

Miss LaMarsh: I noted with interest the remarks of the hon. member last evening with respect to this matter. As he is aware, this is one of the questions dealt with by the Hall commission and it is consequently one of the subjects under active study by the 14 committees within the department.

Mr. Scott: I should like to know what the government has been doing, or what measures it has under consideration, with regard to the high cost of drugs and medicines, particularly as it affects senior citizens. Most members of this committee have voluminous files of information concerning the tremendous profits the drug companies are making, and are concerned with the exploitation of the public in the prescription field. Action taken in this area would not involve any additional expenditure by the government. For example, if a crown corporation could market some of these drugs a great deal of the profiteering could be eliminated and the moneys now being paid to the drug companies could be put to better use.

Miss LaMarsh: Here again, specific recommendations are made in the Hall report regarding the provision of drugs. The suggestion is that drugs should be included in a comprehensive program, $1 being charged to the individual and the rest of the cost being absorbed by the federal government. The whole question of the cost of drugs is thus within the purview of the studies new being conducted. The fact that so many of these questions have been considered by the commission indicates the complexity of the Hall report and the problems raised in dealing with it. The range of subjects to be considered is extremely wide and hon. members will appreciate that in seeking to establish government policy one has to be concerned about priorities. I feel sure all members would agree that it would not be the proper course to begin to act piecemeal without reference to other actions which might be taken. Perhaps this is an unfortunate time at which to consider the estimates of the department, having regard to the fact that we are now studying the Hall report. I mentioned specifically in my opening remarks that there is nothing in present estimates arising from the first volume of that report. Nevertheless I think every member, or at least every other member, made some reference to it, though these matters might more satisfactorily be discussed later this year, or next year.

Mr. Olson: Would the minister agree with me that the $1 proposed to be charged for drugs could be considered in the same vein as co-insurance?

Miss LaMarsh: I think I could. It should be noted, however, that in the Hall commission report three or four different approaches are made to cost sharing. The one mentioned by the hon. member is one of two or three different techniques which can be used to deter people from using a service, or to make people more aware of their responsibility toward a service, or simply as a means of raising some of the money needed. The mere title "co-insurance" does not indicate what the purpose of the technique is. That is one of the interesting things about the Hall report; there is no consistent line taken that financing should be accomplished in a certain way. A number of techniques are suggested for various parts of the service. This is another field in which a decision will have to be made by the government. Should one charge the person who is well, or the person who is sick in hospital? I know the hon. member is interested in this question. I know he believes there is a disagreement in principle arising from the term itself. It arises, I would say, from his feeling on philosophic grounds that when one is sick he should not be charged, but that prepayment should be made as a kind of insurance so as to carry the cost at a time when one's resources are not depleted by illness. I believe this is a difference in philosophy rather than a difference in terms.

Mr. Slogan: Could I ask the minister whether she could inform me what amount in this year's estimates is allocated to dental research? I mentioned earlier that over each of the past three years, although the national health grants have been increased the amount allocated to dental research has decreased. I was wondering whether the minister could give me an idea whether the amount is being increased this year or whether it is continuing to decrease.

Perhaps at the same time the minister could answer my other question regarding the earmarking of specific dental health grants. This matter has been under consideration in the department for some time and I should like to know if a decision has been reached.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give a specific amount as being allocated to dental research this year because it depends on what projects come in from the provinces and are approved. There is some $15,017,000 this year allocated to health grants, which include dental grants. I am sorry my hon. friend was not here when I began my remarks because his question about the provision of a special dental grant I did answer.

Mr. Slogan: In the negative?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes.

I think I have dealt, Mr. Chairman, with all outstanding questions. I have attempted to make notes of them and to refer to them as they came up. There was also a question asked by the hon. member for York-Humber about nurses' wages. I know he appreciates that wages are a matter which lies between the hospital boards and the nurses they hire. We pay about 50 per cent of the cost of administration of hospitals. If higher wages are involved we still pay that amount. Our only direct responsibility of course for wages is with regard to nurses we employ ourselves. I am not wholly persuaded that the spirit of Florence Nightingale is so distant that $20 will bring a nurse in to work on Sundays whereas $12 will not, but I will look into that matter.

I might also mention that this year, because of the increase in the amount of hospital insurance, we have set up a group to deal directly with the provinces in an attempt to keep the cost under control in all provinces. That was done at their request following the last meeting of provincial ministers of health and the advisory council of health. This group will, among other things, be looking into the cost on a provincial basis of nursing services as well as other services.

If there is something I have forgotten to refer to I would be very happy to attempt to answer it. I hope all hon. members of the committee will feel that no attempt is being made to throttle them or to keep them from speaking either at length or cursorily. Such matters as the survey of the aged to which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George referred last night are most interesting ideas and will give food for much thought within the department. However, the main estimates and supplementary estimates of the department were subjected to two or three days scrutiny previously, and the whole of yesterday as well, and it is hoped that by now I will have satisfied all hon. members of the committee and that we should be able to proceed through the estimates.

Mr. Scott: Could I ask a question? The minister knows that over the last six or nine months we have been discussing in this house the policy of the government on hospital grants. I do not want to go through all the material which is on record but I would ask whether the government is reviewing this policy. The problem, as the minister probably knows, is that the gap between federal and provincial grants and the actual cost of hospital operation is very substantial, one which many municipalities feel they are unable to shoulder. I am wondering what the minister is doing or is thinking in this regard. Is there a reappraisal of the size of the grant structure, and can we look for any upward revision during the next year?

Miss LaMarsh: I think I answered that question previously, Mr. Chairman. This matter was discussed before the meeting of the ministers of health and also before the premiers meeting, and there was far from unanimity on any question of increasing the grants. I must say to my hon. friend that I do not intend to hold out any particular hope to him that there will be any increase in any of the grants. This is not in line with the thinking of the department or of the government at this time because it does tend to create an imbalance. Since the construction of health facilities is one of the first things which will have to be done before any contemplation of a national health scheme, the protection of the department is given to the over-all construction of such projects as medical schools and other facilities to see what if any additional help is required from the federal government.

No consideration is being given to increasing the grant per bed of the ordinary hospital. I think I have told my hon. friend before, but if not I should like to now, that there are really three provinces particularly short of hospital beds—the province of Nova Scotia, and the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. That is rather astonishing when you consider that the two richest provinces are Ontario and Quebec. The amounts which were allocated by the previous government to hospital construction run until 1968. However, some provinces, such as the province of Nova Scotia, have already allocated all their moneys, which means that as new needs arise in individual communities there is no more federal money to allocate. Requests have recently been made for specific sums to be allocated to these three provinces in particular, but it should be appreciated that if this were done it would hardly appear fair to the other provinces.

Toronto is a special problem where, as was pointed out by the hon. member for York-Humber, there are hospitals such as the one in Riverdale; and certainly the hon. member and his party are doubtless very glad, in a sense, that this was not made an issue in the recent election, although perhaps more attention will be directed toward it now. But because metropolitan Toronto, under the chairmanship of Mr. Gardner went out of the hospital construction field and did not give any grant when the grant was increased in 1958, there has been a lag in Toronto. It would hardly seem fair if the rest of the taxpayers across the country were asked to make up for this lag, which was caused by the metropolitan government of that time.

Really it is a pretty sterile exercise to worry about who is responsible for this or for that, and why it is that we do not have these facilities. It really does not matter why we do not have them; the fact is that we do not have them when we need them. There is no question about the provincial department of health of Ontario facing a grave problem at the moment, because it is not. While the provincial minister of health said that there was a surplus of beds in Ontario, the unfortunate thing is that this surplus was not in the same place that there was a surplus of patients who need those beds, and you just cannot move a bed from North Bay down to Toronto when you need it. The difficulty is the possibility of overbuilding, and overbuilding at a time when building costs are very expensive in certain places.

When you are faced with a situation such as that in respect of the Riverdale hospital, which is constructed in a place where the need for beds has been apparent but you cannot staff it, you only increase the difficulty by following that suggested course. I think my hon. friend knows that my department and the Department of Veterans Affairs are as gravely upset as he about the current situation in Toronto, as well as the situation in certain areas of Nova Scotia. As I said earlier, while I cannot indicate at this time what our answer will be, it does not appear to be of the order of increasing the dollars for bed grants.

Mr. Scott: I thank the hon. minister for her explanation and I am glad to hear there is some consideration being given to finding a solution to this problem on a long term basis. I think we are all naïve if we feel the health plan and its provisions are going to be implemented in the near future. What concerns me is what are we going to do today to provide short term relief.

I have in mind the hospitals in the Scarborough area in respect of which my doctor friends tell me there are something like 22 children's beds for a population, under 15 years of age, of 90,000, and that if they had a hospital today with 100 beds for children it would be staffed and filled by midnight with only very urgent cases.

It is certainly logically correct to say that some over-all plan has to be developed and facilities have to be provided prior to the implementation of a health scheme, but is the department not prepared to attempt to do something to give some relief in the intervening years? I have mentioned this problem in respect of children, and we are trying in Scarborough to build additions to the hospitals, but the cost is very high. I regret that we cannot look for any assistance from the federal government. Would the government contemplate matching the provincial grant, which I think in Ontario is now about $5,500 as contrasted with $3,000 on the part of the federal government? After all, without being too political, we have been promised health insurance for 45 years and are still anxiously awaiting it. I am not suggesting that it will be held up for another 45 years, but there are many problems involved and it will be some time yet before it is implemented. I am sorry to hear that we cannot look for any short run assistance at all from the federal government through the minister's department.

Miss LaMarsh: As I pointed out, such assistance will come through co-operation between the veterans affairs department and the authorities in Toronto. I think one should also bear in mind that the provincial government made an announcement after a discussion with us and without any recriminations against the federal government, because it realized this is its own responsibility, rather than a federal responsibility, for long term low cost loans to individual hospital boards.

My hon. friend is a good enough lawyer to realize that one of the difficulties is that of ascertaining when it is fair to make special grants, or pour special money into certain areas and at the same time withhold it from everywhere else, and of ascertaining when such a thing is not justifiable. Certainly taking an area with the highest level of income in the whole country and attempting to justify the necessity of more federal money for that area, while at the same time not giving more to other parts of the country, is a proposition which, if I adopted it, my hon. friend would be the first to attack in this house. I should like to make it very clear that there is no suggestion at the moment for emergency grants of any kind increasing the present grants to that area. We are working with the provincial departments of health in order to help in any way that is fair and possible so they can meet their responsibilities in this regard.

Mr. Slogan: I have a question I should like to ask the minister. I have brought this matter to the attention of the department, and I should like to know whether the minister can tell me that it has been solved or, if not, consideration is being given. The question relates to Indian and northern health services. As I understand the situation, when an Indian leaves a reservation and stays away for 12 months he is no longer eligible for medical services. I grew up on the old St. Peters Indian reserve from which the Indians were moved to Hodgson reserve, although a number did not want to go and remained on the old lands. These Indians are still treaty Indians living on their original lands; however, they are not eligible for medical services. Some of them have come to me and, rather than get them involved in a lot of red tape, I have provided services gratis, although I do not think that is a fair situation. The Indians who leave the reservations do so in an attempt to integrate with society, but once they leave the reserve they no longer have the privileges extended to the Indians who stay on the reserves. I think these people are particularly deserving in this respect, and that this practice is grossly discriminatory against them. Is the minister aware of this situation, and can she do something about it?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I should be very pleased if my hon. friend would send me a note in this regard, and I will look into the situation.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, approximately 20 minutes ago, the minister in reply to some comments made by the hon. member for Danforth referred to the shortage of beds in certain areas of the country, and pointed out that there was a woeful shortage in Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario, and that this was a peculiar situation in view of Quebec and Ontario being the two richest provinces in Canada. At that time I looked around this chamber and counted seven hon. members from the province of Quebec, not those who are presently here, and I was surprised that not one of those members took objection. I am wondering now how long equalization payments will continue to be made to Quebec.

Mr. Scott: Answer yes or no.

Item agreed to.

Health services—

15. To authorize hospital construction grants to the provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory upon the terms and in the amounts detailed in the estimates and under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make commitments for the current year not to exceed a total amount of $29,666,575, $20,000,000.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I waited until you called vote No. 15 before speaking because there is a statutory provision of course for contributions to the provinces under agreements entered into pursuant to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, chapter 28. Perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare is becoming a little weary of the representations being made to her about the discriminatory action against the province of Alberta in so far as the formula used for shared programs is concerned. Mr. Chairman, so long as this injustice continues and there is no satisfactory reason given, other than that there is a disagreement in principle, we shall continue to make these representations whether it is trying the patience of the minister or not.

Throughout the past few months we have heard a great deal about something called co-operative federalism, and during July and August when the new fiscal arrangements between the provinces and the federal government were being passed through this house, this term "co-operative federalism" was used a great deal.

On more than one occasion several ministers of the crown, including the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, have said that the provinces have a certain area of jurisdiction and that the federal government has a responsibility to treat citizens of Canada throughout the nation in the same way. Yet we have this discriminatory action with respect to sharing the cost of hospitalization continuing, and apparently a stubborn refusal on the part of the government, particularly the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to recognize that the province of Alberta as well as other provinces ought to have the right to administer these acts in the way they choose.

The premier, minister of finance and minister of health of the province of Alberta have been to Ottawa on a number of occasions to put forward the view that they believe that a so-called deterrent fee of $1.60 to $2 per day is not only a valid and justifiable means of collecting some part of the cost of operating hospitals but also acts as a deterrent in that it leaves some responsibility for this service with the individual. I want to quote from a speech made by the minister of health of the province of Alberta on February 15 of this year in which he said in part:

> In the first place, it certainly discourages abuse of hospital benefits. I don't suggest that many people are going to stay in the hospital when they don't have to be there, just because it doesn't cost them anything to be in the hospital, but certainly the daily charge that is levied against the patient ensures that no one is going to remain in the hospital any longer than they require the hospital care. This is important in order to make beds available for those who need them more. In addition to this, the co-insurance fee is a method of dividing financial responsibility in an equitable manner between the individual who is getting the benefits of the service and the public who are paying the rest of the bill.

A few minutes ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare suggested that this principle might be accepted with regard to the recommendations of the Hall commission report. In other words, when we reach the stage where the federal government is going to set up a national medicare or medical scheme the government will probably accept the recommendation in the Hall report that there be a deterrent fee so that there will be some individual responsibility for the services provided. With regard to the argument that no one who is sick and in a hospital should be obliged to pay any part of the cost, in other words, that it is the wrong time to collect any fee or payment when a person is sick, the minister certainly is not going to try to argue that everyone who tries to enter a hospital is destitute any more than it can be argued that every person requiring drugs is destitute. I would say that over 95 per cent of the people have resources that they can use in order to pay a small deterrent fee when they are in hospital, and to argue that it is not right or fair to collect a small deterrent fee when the person is using the facilities of a $24 a day hospital bed is no more correct than to say that there should not be a deterrent fee for the person requiring drugs. I think it can be argued equally well that no person should be charged for drugs when they need them if you are going to argue there should be no charge for the use of hospital services.

So, Mr. Chairman, the argument breaks down. But the interesting point is whether the province of Alberta is going to have to wait until the federal government accepts the principle of a deterrent fee. Apparently somewhere along the way, whether a few months or a few years from now, consideration is to be given to adopting the same kind of method that the province of Alberta has considered right and proper up until this time.

From 1957 and 1958 when the agreements were first made the province has used a deterrent fee of varying amounts. I think it started out at $1 per day. In relation to the actual cost of operating the hospital beds the amount charged today is no more than the initial amount. We think the present situation is unfair. We have had no satisfactory explanation except that there is some disagreement in principle. But today the minister told the committee that there is some validity to the argument with respect to drugs and perhaps a fee of $1 per prescription ought to be charged. She even went so far as to say this would bring about a certain amount of individual responsibility for these services so that they would not be abused.

I contend that this argument applies equally to the use of hospital beds. At the present time the taxpayers of the province of Alberta are having to pay approximately $1,700,000 over and above what they ought to be paying in relation to the other provinces. Perhaps $1,700,000 a year is not a large amount but it is the result of a discriminatory practice that we think should be changed. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister had something to say about shared programs when he spoke to the federal-provincial conference on November 26, 1963. At that time he said:

> In many areas the federal and provincial governments are responsible for parallel action within their respective jurisdictions. Each must operate in its own sphere of jurisdiction, and respect the other sphere. That is essential to both the letter and the spirit of our constitution.

Then he went on to say:

> Such consultation and co-operation can be effective only if they are mutual, working in both directions. This is essentially what I have had in mind when speaking about the need for a "co-operative federalism".

In so far as resolving this problem is concerned there has been no consideration for the viewpoint expressed by the province of Alberta. For the past six or seven years they have repeatedly made representations to the federal government and so far, as I said, there has been a stubborn refusal on the part of the Department of National Health and Welfare to acknowledge the right of the province of Alberta, which is responsible for the administration of the act, to run its affairs in the way it chooses.

The federal government has not interfered with some of the other provinces which choose to levy an insurance premium. They do not deduct this from the approved costs of operating hospital wards. They do not take any objection to some provinces choosing to collect a part or in some cases all of their share of hospitalization costs through a retail sales tax or something of that nature. Officials of the province of Alberta have objected to the federal department very forcefully. I have here a letter dated November 23, 1962, addressed to the former minister from Hon. J. Donovan Ross, minister of health of Alberta, in which he says in part:

> Co-insurance charges in Alberta are considered by us to be equivalent of premium payments made in certain of the other provinces and should be accorded the same treatment.

I do not want to belabour this point, Mr. Chairman, but I must say to the minister that if some consideration is not going to be given to these very valid representations we are going to have to continue to belabour the point every time an opportunity arises.

I am not going to take the time now to go back into some of the other discriminatory measures contained in the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. However, this discriminatory action is not confined to the Hospitalization and Diagnostic Services Act. There are many other areas. This discrimination has been going on for a very long time. The argument, in so far as the government of Alberta is concerned, is valid and they have a right to administer this measure in the way they see fit without any interpretation of the regulations by the federal government to discriminate against Alberta and thus cause Alberta to pay a proportionately higher share of the cost of hospitalization all over Canada.

In case anyone is interested, Mr. Chairman, the collection of federal taxes in Alberta in the year 1962 was divided as follows: individual income tax, $126 million; corporations, $66 million; non-residents tax, $2 million, for a total of $194,758,000. Then, there was $5 million from the estate tax. On the basis of a population division, there was about $136 million from sales tax, excise tax, customs duties and so on. In total, the residents of Alberta paid $335,815,000 into the federal treasury. There were direct grants of $29 million in one form or another paid back to the province of Alberta. These were for a number of things including hospitalization grants. There was about $57 million paid under the tax agreements, and a share of a public utility amounting to $1 million. In any event, the total repayments to the government of the province amounted to some $90,794,000.

The injustice, Mr. Chairman, is that the residents of Alberta are paying into the federal treasury their share, and then some, on a per capita basis of the funds that go into the federal treasury. Then when it comes to a redistribution of those federal moneys, we find there is a discriminatory action against the province. I hope the minister and the officials of her department will take another look at this action to see if they cannot interpret the regulations in keeping with the spirit that has been expressed by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance on a number of occasions, that all provinces have the right to administer their affairs in the way they choose and that all provinces shall be treated equally.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 15 carry?

Mr. Olson: No answer?

Miss LaMarsh: I shall be glad to answer and tell the hon. member what he already knows. I have said a number of times, as my hon. friend is aware, that perhaps the most persuasive member of his party, the premier of Alberta, came to Ottawa and discussed this matter with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, myself and our officials. The province of Alberta signed an agreement in writing, then knowing what the results would be. It now seeks to persuade the federal government to change this agreement. These representations were urged upon my predecessor as they have been urged upon me. It is simply a fact that we do not agree the deterrent fee is anything comparable to an insurance fee. We do not agree that it is a good principle to require an individual who is seeking a bed to pay a per diem charge. It is that fundamental a disagreement.

My hon. friend has said that I just finished saying I agreed in principle with the user charge of $1 per drug prescription. I protested, Mr. Chairman, that I did not say it. I referred to the fact the royal commission had mentioned this as a way of raising money or as a deterrent charge, and I used this as one example which was given in the health report, certainly without indicating the government would adopt or approve such a proposal. Despite the very vigorous address of my hon. friend, I cannot hold out any hope there will be a change in attitude because the disagreement is fundamental and basic, notwithstanding the very good relationship there is between the Prime Minister and myself, and the premier of Alberta and the minister of health there, with whom I have had many discussions. It is felt that the authorized charge cannot be increased without the necessity then of reducing the federal contribution. There is no question but that Alberta can, if it chooses, increase from $1.50 or $2 to $5 the amount they wish to charge someone who is ill to go into hospital. This would simply mean the federal government would not share, in the same proportion which it presently does, the total cost of hospitalization.

Mr. Olson: If I misinterpreted anything the minister said, I want to apologize for that. Perhaps I did not hear her say that the thoughts she was expressing were some of the recommendations in the Hall report.

I should like to ask her if the premier of Saskatchewan, Premier Thatcher, has made any representations to her department to get the concurrence of the department with regard to the dispensation that would be made of deterrent fees? I understand he is seriously considering this as a valid and proper way of raising some of the funds required for the province's share of hospitalization.

The other point that was made was that the agreement signed some six or seven years ago must stand, notwithstanding the fact that there are changes taking place all the time. One of those changes is the cost of operating hospitals, which has been rising substantially. Will the minister tell us if there have been representations from Saskatchewan recognizing this as a valid way of collecting funds to pay the province's share? Have there been representations from any of the other provinces?

Miss LaMarsh: No, I did discuss with Mr. Steuart, the minister there, on a number of specific items, but not that in particular. I have noticed that the new premier of Saskatchewan has been quoted as talking about a deterrent fee, although no representations in any formal way have been made at this point. I should like to say, without any equivocation, that every province will be dealt with on exactly the same footing and on the basis of the agreement. I do not want my hon. friend to suggest that Saskatchewan, under its present leadership, will receive any more favourable treatment than Alberta. It is not a matter of party politics, it is a matter of the philosophy of the act when it came into being, at which time it was adopted by all the provinces. I do not mean in any way to detract from what I characterized as the very vigorous speech by my hon. friend, but he must realize that when we give consideration to a matter it does not mean that just because a province wants to do it the federal government says O.K. go ahead. Surely we must balance all factors and make up our minds. It must necessarily follow when you are dealing with other groups, particularly those which have an honest political philosophical difference, that you will find points on which you simply cannot agree. This happens to be one of them.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, I have a question dealing with hospital construction grants which will require detailed information that the minister may not be able to supply right now, but she might be good enough to provide me with it by letter. The details of this vote show a little over $2½ million for Saskatchewan. Will it be possible to have a breakdown on where this money went? Further, it shows an item of $9,666,577 for commitments, but points out that it was not necessary to spend this money. Does this indicate that some hospitals which were approved were not constructed?

Miss LaMarsh: No; with respect to the last question it means they were not finished. I would be very happy to reply to my hon. friend by letter, if that would satisfy him.

Item agreed to.

Welfare services—

40. Administration, operation and maintenance, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $4,060,300.

Mr. Knowles: Before vote No. 40 carries there are a few repetitious things I would like to say. I hope that does not rule me out of order, but it has been my experience in the house that with some things on which one feels strongly one has to repeat oneself quite often.

I listened with interest to the minister's remarks summing up the discussion on item 1. She has her own inimitable way of putting people off, but she does not put me off by the suggestion that there is a refrain running through many of our speeches, the refrain of more money being wanted for this or that particular program. This item is a general administrative one covering the various programs that come under the heading of old age assistance and the various other pension benefits.

Despite what the minister said today, and despite the concentration being placed on the benefits that will flow from the Canada pension plan, we have not reached the end of the road with respect to old age security and the other pension programs that come under the responsibility of this department. When I heard the minister say that we should not be asking for these things because they all cost money in terms that she could not calculate, I could not help but recall that that was the kind of answer I got when I first came to the House of Commons some 22 years ago.

At that time the old age pension was $20 a month. I was a very brave new member. I dared to suggest the pension should be increased to $30 a month and was told by the minister of finance—because at that time the old age pension came under the Department of Finance, not under the department of pensions and national health as it was then known—the same thing that the minister said today, that it would cost such a huge sum of money, that it was impossible. Later, when I got really brave and went out on a limb and suggested the abolition of the means test, I almost expected to be certified because of the attitude displayed on the government side.

We have moved a long way since that day, but we are not at the end of the road in terms of providing security and dignity and decency for our older people, and for other members of our society who do have a claim on the affluence and the abundance of our times.

I recognize that the Canada pension plan if we get it, as I hope we will this year, and if it becomes operative in 1966, as I hope it will, is going to make a real contribution to this whole problem of security for people of older years and, in some cases, for people not quite so old in years. But the problems that are coped with by old age security, old age assistance, the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act are still with us, and I urge the minister and her department, busy as they are with the Canada pension plan and studying the Hall report, not to neglect to consider the needs for improvement in these other acts, for the benefit of all those people who will get nothing from the Canada pension plan because they are now 70 or over, or will be over 70 before it becomes operative. For all these people it is not good enough to provide them with just $75 a month. That figure should be increased, as I said yesterday, to $100.

There is also the whole question of reducing the eligible age. I know the Canada pension plan will make it possible, when it becomes fully operative, for people to draw $51 a month at age 65 without a means test. That is good, but it will take several years before that point is reached, and to ask people in this latter part of the twentieth century to settle for $51 a month for the rest of their lives surely is not consistent with what we are capable of doing.

I think I have read everything the minister has put out concerning the Canada pension plan, and I may say she has kept us pretty busy in that respect. I have also read the Liberal party literature with regard to pensions that was published in the last two election campaigns. I read the three white papers —the first one is getting a bit yellow and the second one a bit grey. I hope we can act on the third one while it is still white.

I read with interest the speech the minister was to have made in Toronto in September last, and which was made on her behalf by her parliamentary secretary. I read with interest the speech made some months ago in Kingston by the hon. member who is now the Minister of National Revenue, a speech which seemed to be an authoritative statement on the Canada pension plan. I have also read, though not every line of it, the actuarial report prepared by the government on the Canada pension plan. That was produced last year and in that document there appeared one statement I have not found anywhere else in all this literature, that is, an admission of the fact that even when the Canada pension plan becomes operative the old age security figure will not remain at $75 a month, and that as time goes on it will have to go up even as adjustments are made to the Canada pension plan.

I had hoped that that admission which was contained in the actuarial report would have appeared in the white paper in one or other of its versions. It is not there yet, but so far as I am able to watch the minister's nods up and down and right and left as I speak, I gather she agrees with me that $75 a month is not a figure fixed for all time for old age security.

Even though it would have to devote some time to it, I urge the department to do some re-assessing of the pensions and benefits paid under these various pieces of legislation. It is going to be fine, a quarter of a century from now, when people who retire under the Canada pension plan will have a reasonable amount on which to retire. It is going to be fine, when people who become disabled and people who have dependants will have something reasonable to live on; but what about people in 1964 and 1965, and during the rest of this decade and the early part of the next one? If we are going to be consistent in our desire to improve the social security position, that desire must not only be for the future but also for the present. Therefore I rise to express the hope that some of the time of the department will be spent on reassessing these various statutes, the Old Age Security Act, the Disabled Persons Act, the Blind Persons Act and others that this department administers. It does seem to me the amounts paid under these acts need to be increased and that other changes need to be made.

My hon. friend from Kootenay West referred earlier today to the eligibility conditions in the Disabled Persons Act. All of us hear a great many sad stories in this connection. If I might mention one other matter, there is the requirement with respect to old age security benefits that one last year be spent in Canada before people can receive payments. In the case of people who have lived all their lives in Canada but who, at 65 or 68, have to go to the United Kingdom, or the United States, for reasons of health or for economic or family reasons, it is hard to explain to them that despite all the time they have spent in this country they cannot draw old age security payments unless they return and manage to spend one more year in Canada. This is a detail, as I have said, but it is an awkward detail in the experience of a good many people.

The over-all submission I am making is one which I hope the minister will take seriously. Yes, she is doing a good job in her fight to get the Canada pension plan. I suspect she has to fight a lot harder for it than some of us may realize. Yes, she is doing well to have 14 committees studying the Hall report, and I hope we will get moving soon toward a health charter for Canadians. But in doing all these things I ask that she and her department not forget the improvements needed by those people who have to depend on the pensions, benefits and allowances they get under these various other acts. I urge that these things be attended to as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make a long speech; I will only make a few comments concerning item 40 of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) dealt to some extent with the matter I intended to cover, but I hope I will nevertheless be allowed to make a few suggestions, not only for the good of the Canadian people but also to help the government in its administration of the old age pension and family allowances programs.

It is a well known fact that at present the pensions or the amounts paid by the federal government to assist certain destitute people or certain persons in the provinces, are completely administered by the provinces. By the way, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) referred to those agreements a while ago.

Now, I must congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) for her efficiency and for the courtesy with which she gives us answers and deals with the cases submitted to her. I wish to express special thanks.

It is true that a minister may not always control everything and look after every detail as he would like to, and it is precisely on that point that I wish to make certain observations concerning some administrative officers, who may come under provincial jurisdiction, in respect of amounts paid out by the federal government. In some cases, there is discrimination. It is true that the federal government makes those payments heartily and that the provincial governments try to administer them in the same manner, at least I am quite prepared to believe it. But every general rule has its exceptions.

In this field, unfortunately, exceptions are not rare. I think it may be caused by overzealous persons, and since we are all human, there may be also, in certain cases, personal feelings involved; that is why we, as members of the House of Commons, very often receive complaints in regard to the procedures followed by the officials in the distribution of pensions.

I am thinking here, for instance, of certain cases where the federal minister or department grants an old age pension wholly administered by the federal government but which, afterwards, may be transferred to one of the social welfare administrations of the province.

I can recall two particular cases. The first is not necessarily one of old age pension—and I am quite willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the civil servants, federal or provincial, who conducted the inquiry which showed that the person in question, being mentally deficient, was unable to look after his pension.

As for the second case, with which I am personally familiar, it could very well be that, in some way, there was a certain abuse in the manner in which the pensioner handled his old age pension.

The party in question is 72. It is true that at that age, as at any other age, some people take a little more rope than they should. In this case, the man drinks a little and because there has been family trouble and reports have been made about him, he is deprived of the administration of his pension, even though he is quite lucid and has full control of his faculties. His old age pension is administered by the province.

I should not want to blame the federal or the provincial governments but I feel that, to a certain extent, the man should be allowed to present arguments against the government's contention if the latter withholds his pension because even if he is an alcoholic, I think that he is bright enough to look after his business. I know him personally.

This is just a minor detail, and I want to remind the minister that there are other more or less serious cases of this kind, which are sometimes left to the discretion of generally over zealous officials or of those who yield to sentiment. After all, we are all human.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did a moment ago I would like to urge the minister to raise the old age pension. I would also like to suggest that the old age pension be not increased in the same way as last year when legislation was passed to raise the pension and then a tax was introduced to meet the increase.

At that time Mr. Lesage was paying an additional $10; he, indeed, can do as he likes, but it happens that some pensioners in old people's homes, who were formerly getting $75, had their $10 withdrawn by Mr. Lesage, after the federal government added the same amount under the last amendment to the Old Age Pension Act, because the beneficiaries were in old people's homes. If Mr. Lesage thought that it was logical to award them ten additional dollars before, I do not see why those senior citizens would not need them now.

Therefore, I would suggest to the minister that an agreement be entered into with the provincial governments, so that the minister or the provincial premiers who may have a tendency to act in such a way continue to give what money they were previously giving, because the person previously in need does not see the colour of the $10 given by the provincial government when the federal government decides to give an amount of $10 for the same purpose.

I find it strange that it is the federal government which levies taxes but it is the provincial government which benefits, because it was previously paying $10 to pensioners in homes for old people and the latter should therefore have received $85 but they only get $75.

And I should like to go farther. A few minutes ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that he had gone out on a limb and had the impression that he was going a little too far when as a young member he first came to the house he asked that old age pensions be raised from $20 to $30, while today he is asking for the abolition of the questionnaire which the 65 year old man must answer before he is allowed a pension.

I must congratulate him for the step he took several years ago and for pressing the government again today, because the $75 old age pension is less than the $20 pension of that time, if you consider the increase in the cost of living and what an individual needs today to survive.

It is hard to understand how a person can live on $75 a month especially at that age when people are physically deficient and more prone to illness, the body being less resistant than it was at 20. Doctors and druggists do not reduce their rates just because the customer is 75; on the contrary, some of them may take advantage of the situation because the scheme is administered haphazardly. So, half the pension goes to pay medical expenses and the recipient has only $38 or $40 left to live.

Mr. Chairman, it is certainly not unreasonable to ask for a pension increase; indeed, such a step would be even more fruitful if pensions started at the age of 60.

I understand the situation. In my area, that is in Thetford Mines and the vicinity, some 600 miners have been laid off. Many of them are fathers of families and some of them have 10, 15 and 20 years of experience in the mines. A certain number of those men are 60 and, of course, they are still on the labour market, because they cannot get a pension from the mining company or from the federal government. Those who find work take the place of younger men who could otherwise start a career. Thus, the young people are just as worried as the older workers.

As far as I am concerned, I would be in favour of paying the pension at age 65 without any means test and that the test be compulsory in the case of recipients who have just turned 60. Very often a man of 60 who has worked in a mine for 20 years is ill and can no longer work. Needless to say that a 65-year old individual cannot live on a monthly pension of $75; he can barely exist on that.

I appreciate, as the minister said, that a lowering of the age required for the old age pension would give rise to additional expenditures. Very well, Mr. Chairman, and the same would apply in the case of family allowances; on the other hand, such expenditures would be worth while.

Mr. Chairman, if the intention is to pay an old age pension like the last one when the $10 increase was offset by a new tax, I would not approve of it, because the children would have to support their parents.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been called a demagogue, a few years ago, for asking that the old age pension be increased by $10, I am taking the chance of being called a demagogue for suggesting to the minister to draw the necessary funds from the Bank of Canada in order to finance consumer credit. And, at this point, I would suggest to the minister to kindly pay special attention to my remarks: she must use the Bank of Canada to finance consumer credit and that without interest; as far as credit granted to production, it is all right, because the selling price includes production costs as well as the interest paid to the bank by private enterprise, but consumer credit should not bear any interest.

This is where I ask the minister to look to the Bank of Canada to provide that money without interest, so that old age pensions and family allowances could be raised and that additional money, put in the hands of consumers, could circulate and also cause goods to circulate. Such money, in the long run, would return to its natural source and get back to the Bank of Canada. But, while in circulation, what would it make possible? Everything hinges on the consumption of goods, and do not forget that money merely represents goods, their legal tender. Instead of bartering a quarter of pork for a dozen of eggs, a monetary unit was established which we now use.

Mr. Chairman, it is quite all right for the government to control its own business, but it should finance consumer credit through the Bank of Canada. Whether it is called old age pension or national dividend, it does not matter; but let us face the facts with regard to the existing production and also consider that by meeting the existing natural needs, the national credit will only be improved in relation to the country's requirements. The same situation would prevail regarding family allowances.

I wish to point out to the minister that a survey was conducted in France following an increase in family allowances paid in relation to the number of children—I think the minister could inquire personally about this. It was established in France that family quarrels and divorces were considerably reduced when those various increases came into force. The trouble had been caused by the fact that the head of a family, being out of a job, had been unable to meet his family's needs. It was inevitable that after a certain period, some tension developed within the family, giving rise to quarrels, divorces and forcing public welfare organizations to take charge of the children. Finally, the state had to handle the problem and provide assistance just the same.

If the father and mother do not work, their children need food, clothing and shelter just the same, which means that the state has to provide for them. At one time the state gave a larger share of its revenue to the family itself so that, in turn, the latter would look after its own needs. That is how some kind of order was restored in French homes.

If the father was out of work, he had at least an income that enabled him to feed his children and, consequently, the mother might have had less reason to criticize the father, although he might not have been to blame for not working.

The same situation is found here. As a member of parliament and representative of the families in my riding, I am in a position to know that some of our citizens are faced with the same problem. As a matter of fact, when they come to me with their problems that might disrupt the family, I always discover, if I dig far enough, that financial difficulties are at the root of everything in 99 cases out of 100. Besides, they come to me for financial help. And that is true on a nation-wide basis.

That is why I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to be kind enough to consider the possibility of increasing old age pensions in order to ensure at least sufficient security to those who worked for years towards our country's progress and development in all fields.

I point out to the minister that it would be normal for those older people to stop worrying about the future and enjoy a measure of security. All their life, they were concerned about the future of their country and of their children, because the children represent the future of the nation. Consequently, it seems to me that it rests with us today to take up the challenge and help them a little, so that they can go through the last years of their life in peace, satisfied that they played their part and confident that the present generation will carry on their effort.

I also ask the minister to consider seriously helping large families through higher family allowances, because the welfare and security that can be extended today to those children will precisely promote the prosperity of this country in economic, social and cultural fields.

Indeed, it rests with us today to help those children who perhaps will be in a position to help us tomorrow.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister for the wonderful task she is doing, but at the same time I also want to take a minute to call to her attention a proposal which was submitted to the authorities by the Société des jeux d'hiver de Québec which I understand was set up two years ago.

The president of that organization came to Ottawa and I had the great honour to introduce him to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) so that he could set out the program that his group wanted to undertake.

Mr. Chairman, hon. members probably remember that the national sport council recommended a grant to that organization to make possible the organization of winter sports in Quebec city in 1966. Perhaps now the year 1966 would be too soon, and there would be reason to postpone this undertaking to 1967, which might coincide with the celebration of the confederation centennial.

I would see in this proposal a real factor of unity, since all our Canadian athletes might get together and co-operate in Quebec city on the occasion of sport competitions which would create great interest and make the celebration of the centennial richer and more attractive.

Consequently, I call once more the attention of the minister to this fact, and perhaps she might give some details in informing the house on the negotiations in respect to this undertaking. Perhaps the minister would be kind enough to tell us whether those negotiations can be successful and are likely to result in an agreement, for I sincerely wish that this wonderful undertaking will be possible in Quebec city.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a short question of the minister in regard to this item having to do with family allowances. I wonder whether the minister and her departmental officials are aware of the operation in New Zealand of the family benefits plan and, if so, what do they think of it? I understand under that plan family benefits may be capitalized to the extent of £1,000, paid in lump sum to the recipients of the family allowances. This plan was commenced in 1958 and capitalization of the fund has been used to provide assistance in home building for individuals in medium and low income brackets. I understand that since 1958, when this legislation was put into effect, some 50,000 homes have been built in New Zealand through capitalization of family allowances and state housing loans. I received a letter from the minister of finance of New Zealand this month in which he says the plan has worked very well and has enabled many people in those income brackets to build homes, who would not have otherwise been able to do so. This plan has been of great benefit not only to the recipients of these allowances, but to the home building industry generally. Has the department given any consideration to that plan?

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

1. Departmental administration, including the administration of the Explosives Act and Canada's fee for membership in the pan-American institute of geography and history, $2,191,000.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity, as I appreciated the opportunity given to me last session, to report on the activities of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I speak before this assembly very humbly, because in large part the work of this department is of a technical and professional nature. I found there were some 300 employees who had doctorates from various universities in technical and specialized fields. I want to assure this assembly that it has been a delight to me, representing parliament and the people of Canada, to be the head of this department because I have found the greatest respect for our wishes and desires on the part of the officials. At all times they really wish to follow the wishes of our democratic parliament despite their great skills and technical knowledge.

The department is known as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys but as I have travelled throughout the country since assuming office I have found myself generally referred to as the minister of mines. I want to assure my colleagues I have learned I am not the minister of mines. Indeed only about a quarter of our staff is devoted to the mining industry. If one looks at the government telephone directory, as I did after being appointed to office, he will readily recognize that the mines branch represents approximately only a quarter of the administrative duties and only a quarter of the personnel in this department, engaged on our behalf to serve the people of Canada.

In addition to the mines branch therefore there are many other aspects and branches that deserve the attention of the committee in examining the estimates of the department. So far as the over-all estimates are concerned, I think this department was one of the few that did not come before the house last year with supplementary estimates. I cannot say we will maintain that record in the coming year. We have one or two projects that we think cannot be deferred and we may come forward with supplementary estimates later in the year. If hon. members will examine the estimates for 1964-65, compare them with 1963-64 and keep in mind the necessary increases, particularly in salaries, I think they will find that the changes in our requests to the committee of supply this year are very modest indeed.

I am also responsible for reporting to parliament for the dominion coal board, whose estimates hon. members will find on page 228. There is no change in policy there. It is simply a matter of estimating the amount of tonnage that will move forward under the statutory approval of parliament already given.

Perhaps I might summarize very briefly some of the activities that have gone on since I last reported to the committee of supply. I have said that I inherited from the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue a fairly tidy shop. I think he will agree with me that the department is not a very controversial one at any time, but rather a most worthy department and one that I think has served Canada very well.

I have just returned from a visit to Alberta where I attended the 21st annual conference of mines ministers of the various provinces. For a while they felt they should meet solely at the provincial level, but for the last three days they have allowed federal representatives to attend on an observer basis. My predecessor as minister, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue, was the first federal representative invited to attend. I think progress is evident here. There were 400 representatives in attendance at the conference in Alberta. It has grown from a meeting of provincial mines ministers, their deputies and officials to the extent that representatives of industry and others connected with both provincial and federal governments are now attending in very broad measure, and I think to mutual advantage.

The value of mineral production in Canada is perhaps not always recognized but it is now at the level of about $3 billion a year. Consequently there is a growing demand for scientific investigation covering all steps in the extraction, use and marketing of minerals and their derivatives. Our department contributes very substantially to this end. In some other phases of our work, particularly surveying and field explorations, there have been advances and innovations in work methods and instruments which I think should be reported to the house, because while in the initial stage the apparatus and machinery involved are expensive they have resulted in the end in an efficiency which I think is very much appreciated by those concerned.

Members of the house have not had the opportunity of seeing, as it has been my privilege to see as the new minister, the work being done by the department in the remote Arctic. I give as an example the polar continental shelf project carried on by the department, which is now in its fifth year. It covers land, sea and sea bottom with closely spaced hydrographic, geological, gravimetric, seismic, geomagnetic, glaciological and topographical tests and surveys. This emphasizes the department's special content of scientists and specialists who advise us in these matters.

In presiding over the department I take special pride in the recognition that has been accorded to our Canadian experts in all of the specialized fields. In travelling abroad they have been recognized as being very superior, earnest and knowledgeable, and we can take pride that in my department we have presidents of world wide organizations in practically all of these fields.

The surveys and mapping branch helped to open new vistas in surveying by co-sponsoring a seminar on air photo interpretation and by placing generally more emphasis on air photography in mapping. I think Canada is pre-eminent in this field. Then the aerodist, a recently developed airborne device for electronic distance measurement, was used successfully over land and sea. This device has been used a great deal by our department since we last reported to you and has deserved the reputation it has achieved. It has not only enabled surveyors to shorten work in difficult terrain from years to weeks, but it has provided also the first absolutely accurate measurements beyond the bounds of sight, such as between Sable island and the mainland of Nova Scotia. Within the last year it has been of immeasurable value in 40,000 square miles of terrain in northern Ontario and Quebec above the Canadian National Railway line.

Now, in the marine sciences, oceanographic research continued to expand and strengthen, and new marine investigations were started in the fields of geophysics, sea ice, theoretical studies and predictions. The new Bedford institute of oceanography, which I had the honour of opening last year late in 1963, operated at high pitch and began to attract international interest and acclaim. There was further integration of oceanographic and hydrographic work. Little attention was given in this house to an announcement which I had the pleasure of making after our oceanographic ship got into operation, namely the discovery of some anomalies in the ocean eastward from Nova Scotia. I believe these discoveries might be of some interest eventually to this country in the petroleum field.

Again, in this department we have the geological branch. The geological survey continued to press its mapping of Canada at reconnaissance scale, and 65 per cent of the entire country has now been covered by geological maps at scales no smaller than one inch to eight miles. This might not seem to be impressive, but our country is very big. A notable development in recent years has been special laboratory investigations of fundamental geological processes undertaken by a small but growing staff, along with the development of techniques and equipment.

I come now to the mines branch. Among the outstanding activities of the mines branch since we last reported to you has been pilot plant tests on petroleum refining. There was great interest in this at the Banff ministers conference to which I referred earlier. These tests have been conducted with special attention paid to low grade oils and tar sands, the use of radiotracers, and so on. Every member in this house knows about the potential of the tar sands of Athabasca. We have in Ottawa a test plant that has been doing these studies and which has contributed to the successful development of a method of extracting enough vanadium from petroleum to supply the entire Canadian demand.

Then I should like to refer to the scientists from the geographical branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. They have continued to study land and ice forms and ancient plant remnants in the Arctic, to obtain a better picture of the geographical history of that remote portion of Canada. I want to refer also and pay tribute to the administration, personnel and information branches of the department. These, perhaps, are ancillary activities that do not receive the prominence some of the other branches of our department do. I want to say that I, personally, representing this house, perhaps see them most often and I view them, on your behalf and on behalf of the Canadian people, as interpreters, but I have to use my own sense in connection with the advice and programs that are advanced by these scientists. I thank the committee for their attention.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister for the outline of the activities of his department which he has given to the committee. As a former minister, I join with him in paying a much deserved tribute to the scientists, technical and specialized personnel as well as the officials of his department who constitute a pool of specialized knowledge equal to any and second to none in this country. These gentlemen have not only co-operated with the political figurehead of the department at all times but also with the industries which avail themselves continuously of the facilities and products of the research carried on by the department, as well as of the great reservoir of scientific knowledge available within the department.

I am happy to see that there has been no reduction in the amount of money required by the department. This is important. Last year some question arose as to whether or not some of the activities of the department would have to be curtailed as a result of an economy drive by the government. I think this would have been penny wise and pound foolish. There is no doubt but that the research carried on by the department translates itself into a greater economic activity in this country and, of course, the end result is a greater amount of money pouring into the government coffers.

This year the total amount sought by the minister for his department is $54 million, as compared with $46 million last year, an increase of about $7½ million. I am of course rounding out the figures, but it must be pointed out to the committee that only a small part of this, a little better than $3 million, represents actual increases in the services and costs to the department, the other part being moneys authorized by statutory grants, mainly cost aid, making up $4½ million of the increase.

The minister referred to many of the activities being carried out by his department. I was glad to hear him refer to many of the programs launched with such conspicuous success by the previous administration from 1957 to 1962. Among other things they included accelerated implementation of an integrated program of geodetic, topographic and hydrographic surveys, and such projects as continental shelf research and the upper mantle project, which I think has been discontinued. The minister did not refer to it in his opening remarks, and I would like him to tell us a bit about the upper mantle project. It is of a scientific nature that may not yield immediate concrete results, but it did elicit a great amount of interest at the time it was launched. I feel it is a project that should not be discarded, and any information the minister can give us about it would be appreciated.

Under the previous administration the marine science branch was established, which gave a new impetus to hydrographic and oceanographic research. I believe the minister may have had a slight lapse of memory when he referred to the opening of the Bedford institute of oceanography which he stated he had attended. I know the minister visited the institute, but it was inaugurated under the previous regime.

Mr. Benidickson: In fairness I think I should have said that it was the launching of the C.S.S. Hudson I attended, and this of course is an adjunct to the oceanographic institute.

Mr. Martineau: I thank the minister for the rectification he has just made. The Hudson is indeed an adjunct to the institute of oceanography and it has been described as a floating laboratory. I would point out that its construction took place during the years we were in power, but it was finally inaugurated into service by the minister. This was a most important event in the history of marine science in this country, and I do not believe it was given sufficient prominence either in this chamber or in the press generally, because the facilities afforded by this ship will significantly increase the capabilities of our oceanography and hydrographic services.

The pool of very specialized, competent officials and trained scientific personnel that the department controls should be used in a broader way, and I believe the government should give serious consideration to co-ordinating the many research services carried on by many different departments. Huge sums of money are being spent on research, but to my mind there is not sufficient co-ordination, and the maximum yield is therefore not being extracted from the research done. The minister would be well advised to investigate the possibility of amalgamating all these research sciences and services under his own department, perhaps to form a new department, be it the department of research, or some other suitable name. It will have to come to that if Canada is not to lose the race entirely in the field of industrial and scientific research.

I congratulate the minister on the work he is doing. Being in charge of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is a little different from being in charge of any other department, because the minister is continually dealing with people who possess immensely more technical knowledge than he himself generally has. This may place him under a certain handicap but I do not think it is a real handicap. The minister should draw upon that personnel and ask them to use their imaginative talents to the utmost, in order that the great expansion of the department which was launched in the years of our administration will be carried forward into a new era of real expansion and new projects of great significance. Therefore I urge the minister to consider the establishment of a select committee to consider planning. Probably this is being done, but more emphasis should be given to planning a new program of real expansion, a program that is needed more now than ever before in the history of our country.

As the minister said, the mines branch of his department is the one best known by the public at large, and the minister himself is generally referred to as the minister of mines. It is gratifying to note that mineral production in this country has continued to expand—that it has expanded probably at a rhythm in excess of that enjoyed by most other mineral producing countries since the end of the second world war. Production has now reached a value of around $3 billion. This is a staggering amount of money and, indeed, it represents a significant fraction of our total gross national product. It is obvious therefore that the efforts of the minister and his department should be directed toward sustaining and further increasing the output of this industry.

Although its output is increasing, the mining industry is faced with serious problems. One of these concerns the efficient recovery of minerals from low grade deposits. Most of our great producing mines have been in existence for many years. Some of the largest have been forced to close down within recent years because of the lack of reserves. Instead of mining the high grade stuff, the industry now must spend greater sums of money and exert more ingenious efforts in order to extract sufficient pay dirt to make its activities profitable. This has created a host of problems which must be faced by the industry, and this is where the mines branch has a definite duty to perform by showing the greatest possible degree of imagination in assisting an industry which is of paramount importance to our prosperity.

There is also the problem presented by the increased competition which faces the mining industry in Canada. Though the state of our industry continues to be good, competition at the international level is constantly increasing. The impact of trading conditions is made clear when one remembers that three fifths of the total output of our mines is exported to other countries. It is therefore most necessary that the department, and not only the department but the government as a whole, should make every effort to extend to our mining industry all the assistance possible. I know the pegging of the dollar at 92½ cents two years ago has helped to keep our mining industry alive. I do not think many of our producers would be in business today had it not been for the fixing of the dollar at 92½ cents. There was a dire need for such action in many fields, but nowhere more than in the mining field. Fortunately, this step was taken by the previous administration and I was reassured last week when the Acting Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, told the house that the present exchange rate of the dollar was satisfactory and the government had no intention of changing it. I think this was reassuring news to our export industry, particularly to the mining industry.

[Mr. Martineau.]

But there are other ways in which the government and, in particular, the bureau of mines, could help the mining industry. One suggestion is that teams of experts be sent to the producers to work right in with the miners, the superintendents and the mining captains to help them become more efficient. I was talking not long ago with a mining engineer of very extensive experience in industrial and mining engineering. I was astounded to hear him say that probably not more than 10 per cent of our mines were operating in a really efficient manner. I do not think he meant they were necessarily inefficient. He probably meant that with increased aid they could operate much more efficiently. Such assistance would produce immeasurable benefit, in my opinion, for the industry itself, for the workers and for the mining communities in general. These teams should be organized by the bureau of mines, trained, and sent right out to the centres of production. Let them go where gold and other metals are produced. Let them pay attention to work studies. Let them show the producers how to make the utmost use of human and material resources as well as greater use of the science known as industrial engineering.

Some industries, including some mines, have made intensive use of the new techniques and as a result have achieved savings which in the case of the larger firms have been most substantial. One firm, Stelco, for example, made savings amounting to as much as $5 million in one year. This was the result of greater supervision of production processes. My point is that it is one of the prime duties of the mines branch to encourage the producers to make use of modern methods, and that the branch should go in and train producers in the use of these methods. This would probably be an innovation, though I know there has been some contact between the mines bureau and the producers in the past, especially in the gold mining industry. However, I feel there is room for improvement and that these contacts could be intensified.

I would also urge the minister and, through him, the government to give greater aid to those at the grass roots level, if I may use that expression, of the mining industry. I am thinking of the prospectors. There are still great mineral discoveries to be made in this land as has been shown most vividly in the last few months in the Timmins area, for example. We have seen how prospectors, working very often without assistance and with the most rudimentary means, have been able to find great deposits. The amazing thing is that these deposits are often found close to existing mines. One might imagine that such areas, which are known as mineral producing areas, would have been well explored, prospected and analysed in every way. If there were any mineral veins lurking around the subsoil in that area they would have long ago been discovered, but this has not been the case, as experience shows every day.

The real glamour of the mining industry is vested in the prospector, he is the man who does not fear to face great physical hardship, who goes out into the wild and rugged sectors which abound in our land, and who very often by sheer determination and faith in his lucky star will hit the jackpot, as it is commonly put. As a result a new mine may be established. I think the government should bend itself to consider the needs of such a person who is so important to the over-all saga of mining in Canada. Let the minister be able to provide facilities for loans or subsidies to the prospector to enable him to get the technical and scientific gear and equipment necessary to carry on his trade. He is not helped enough by the government, and special facilities should be provided him. I urge the government to give serious consideration to assistance of this sort which I am sure would mean very little in terms of the fiscal position of the government, but which might result in much increased prospecting activity throughout Canada, and therefore greater discoveries at a time when new discoveries are urgently needed by the mining industry. As I stated a few minutes ago, deposits are getting lower, the grade of ore is getting lower, and more difficulty is being encountered in obtaining deposits than before.

Another way in which the government could help the mining industry would be in considering the elimination of the tax on production and equipment machinery. It is no exaggeration to say that that tax has virtually crippled, in many cases, small marginally producing mines. It has, of course, considerably impaired the competitive position of these mines and it would seem that there is no real fiscal justification for a tax of that nature which attacks, as it does, the very things which lead to increased production in the country. At a time when the Minister of Finance is continually speaking of the need for that type of expansion, why should that tax remain? In addition, the way it has been applied should be closely considered by the minister. The minister was himself the former and very brilliant and able financial critic of his party and I am sure his counsel would have more than just passing influence at the decision making or policy making level. I think he should make urgent representations in this regard to his colleague, the Minister of Finance.

I realize that the minister has received briefs from the metal mining association and others which have in a very lucid way set out the difficulties which the tax has caused, and to my mind caused unfairly. Therefore I am sure that the minister, who really has his heart in the right place, is going to exert every possible effort to see that this situation is corrected. At the same time, he being, as I know he is, an expert on the different financial and taxation statutes on the books, he should look into some of the sections of the Excise Tax Act, because some clarification is needed there. I am told that the way some sections are being interpreted does not permit the mining companies to qualify for the exemption provided on materials which are used directly in the productive processes. These materials are normally exempted, yet by some bureaucratic technique, about the finer subtleties of which I confess I am ignorant, these companies cannot or do not seem to be able to obtain this exemption. Therefore, new mining ventures are often not pursued, which results in a loss to the mining industry and the gross national product, a loss of revenue all round and also of employment opportunities.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have spoken to the officials in front of me and we will make representations to the minister again.

Mr. Martineau: I realize the minister is aware of the problem, but by stressing it probably some action will result. I know this action is much hoped for by the mining industry.

I was happy to see that the cost aid program has been extended with some modifications. This has helped the industry a great deal and has given it the stability it needs. But, of course, it is far from being the answer to many of its problems; it is only a stopgap measure.

Last year I spoke of the necessity for a revision in the world price for gold. Like most people, doubtless the minister himself feels that the present price is not at all realistic. It is artificially held, yet it seems to work against the very people who maintain the price. The gold reserves of the United States government have dropped drastically in recent years and have reached a point that is critical. In fact, the gold reserves of the United States are today not much more than that which is required to guarantee the currency. This situation is the complete reverse of the situation which existed 10 or 15 years ago. The reason for this is that world supplies and resources of gold are dwindling. Gold has also been hoarded, I believe, by other powers. Yet the governments of the western world seem to stand idly by and let the situation go from bad to worse. Canada has a certain voice in the control of the international monetary fund and in world councils, and although I know the United States has at times expressed its disfavour of the idea I think that pressure should be applied, inasmuch as pressure can be applied, to see that there is a revision in that price. If there were, I think a period of great prosperity for our gold industry and our mining industries in general would follow.

These are about the only remarks I have to make at this time, Mr. Chairman. I wish to conclude, and to congratulate once again the minister and all of his officials from the deputy minister down who are performing such a fine job. The department constitutes a very unique and extraordinarily marvellous tool for progress, for research and for greater prosperity not only in the mining industry but in many other industries.

Great imagination should be used in order that this tool can be completely used, resulting in a full yield drawn from that great reservoir of trained scientific personnel. There should be no fear of innovation; indeed innovation should be the new watchword of the department. If that is the attitude adopted, and I think it will be, we can expect great things from the minister and his department, which will benefit us all.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks about these estimates. I am glad to welcome the minister, and in view of the subject I wish to discuss, perhaps I should have addressed him as the minister of telescopes.

There is a radio telescope located on high ground in the Okanagan valley near Penticton and Oliver, fulfilling the role for which it was constructed. I understand plans are in existence for the construction of an optical telescope somewhere in the British Columbia mountains, and I should like the minister to give us the latest information available in this regard. Naturally I favour the location of such a telescope in the Okanagan area, and I do so for a great many reasons. The minister and his departmental officials have travelled through this area and given very thorough consideration to the location of a site for such a contemplated telescope, and I hope that nothing will be done to impede this research. I think this is a very wonderful project, one which could very appropriately be associated with the centennial of confederation.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up too much time dealing with this subject, but I should like to point out that there are many desirable locations in the Okanagan area. Such a telescope could be constructed at almost any desirable altitude in an area having all the necessary elements to the successful operation of such an instrument. There seems to be some good argument for locating this instrument in close proximity to the radio telescope now located in that area. Many advantages would be gained by such a location, particularly on the administrative side. I am sure that following the establishment of such a telescope there would be a number of technical men moving to the area, and I might say that British Columbia would more than welcome those people to this area. The individuals who live there now as a result of the estabishment of the radio telescope I am sure enjoy the effervescence of the climate. I believe the radio telescope operates more efficiently in that area than perhaps it would anywhere else. In that area there is very little interference in the way of noise or pollution from industry, which would spoil the situation.

Perhaps I should also mention the fact that whenever a project of this kind is undertaken it has been a tourist attraction. While I do not suggest the telescope should be located there to give a boost to the tourist industry, there would be an added advantage in this way. Perhaps I should repeat that in the Okanagan area such an instrument could be located at almost any altitude that was desired, in an area isolated but easily accessible. I am sure I speak fairly for the people of the Okanagan area when I say they would welcome the establishment of such a telescope there. I hope the minister will give us some information in this regard before his estimates are passed.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I have received more correspondence from members of this house about any subject within my purview than I have about the construction and location of this large optical telescope of advanced design which, when constructed, will put Canada in a very up to date position in comparison with other countries of the world. We in this department feel that the establishment of such a telescope would be an appropriate project to honour the centennial of our confederation. There are so many members of parliament from that area where the telescope will probably be located, according to advice from my officials, who have communicated with me, that in my remarks I may overlook some of their names and suggestions. However, I should like to point out that certainly the last speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, has discussed with me the desirability of his area as a location, as have the hon. members for Kamloops, Kootenay East, Okanagan-Revelstoke and others. I can assure them all that our plans have not advanced beyond our thinking that nothing more wonderful could be done by our department to celebrate the centennial than the construction of this telescope. The final proposition has not gone to treasury board, let alone to the cabinet, and I can assure hon. members that this is such an important technical project it would probably necessitate the expenditure of something between $9 million and $10 million, and once constructed would be one of the two or three of the greatest existing in the world today. I can assure hon. members of this committee, particularly the seven, eight or ten who have indicated their interest in a location for this telescope, that if I am the minister at the time the site is chosen, it will be chosen on a strictly technical basis as the best possible location, so that Canada can move forward and maintain its longtime position in this scientific field.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to hear the minister say that the final decision as to the location will be made on a technical basis, and I am sure that regardless of where this telescope is located in British Columbia, no one in the interior will point a finger at the government and suggest favouritism, because they are aware of the great number of exceptionally well qualified men in his department.

I do not think the telescope would ever be put in an improper place, and probably this would be the best place in the end. I was pleased with the minister's statement that this would be a rather wonderful centennial project. Of course it would. Compared with all the ideas for smaller projects that have been put forward, I feel it is of such importance and is such a magnificent venture that it should be brought to fulfilment. I hope the minister will press his colleagues strongly in this regard because every dollar spent on a project of this type will mean a return in human interest and keeping our country abreast of the times in this field. I do not think any other project can compare.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that this project has really touched my interest very much since it was presented by the research people of the department. I think a large optical telescope would be something that would make Canada pre-eminent in this field for quite a long time after our centennial in 1967. But I would point out to all members that some of the technical features are elevation, access roads, community settlement and a requirement for a dry and relatively clear climate in an area which has a record of lack of turbulence of any kind in the atmosphere. The scientists are considering these matters. To those who have spoken to me about this project in the knowledge that it would be a unique asset to their particular regions I have pointed out these factors. We have a general idea that the proper place is somewhere in western Alberta or British Columbia, but until we get an indication that this particularly large expenditure will be approved by the government no commitment can be made. However, I have assured everybody who has written me that our technical people certainly will visit each and every area that has been suggested.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief remarks to make on these estimates. I travelled to Sudbury during the past year in a party of 30 members of the House of Commons. For the record may I say that the trip was made at no cost to the taxpayers of Canada. It was organized by the amiable member for Sudbury. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources accompanied us. As a result of the camaraderie which developed on the trip we made a sort of bargain with the minister that we would not be too tough on his estimates, but I think we should have our say at this time.

At that time we visited the Frood-Stobie mine of the International Nickel Company. I come from an area where coal mining is the most important industry, and having worked in coal mines during the summer, having lived in a coal mining town, having associated with coal miners and my people having been coal miners all their lives, my eyes were certainly opened by this visit to a hardrock mine. Electric lighting is something you do not see in a coal mine and the visit certainly was a revelation to me. If such trips can be organized at no cost to the taxpayers I think they would be of great advantage to members of the house in learning what goes on in various Canadian industries.

Mention was made of the Bedford hydrographic institute by the former minister, and also the shipbuilding program which I understand is being carried out. This program was inaugurated by the former government and I congratulate the minister on continuing it. Hydrography and oceanography are of great importance today in the development of our country. We know that many matters of national importance come under this department, and only through the carrying out of surveys and research can we hope to develop our great country. I congratulate the minister on his work in this regard and I hope he will continue. It is most important to our country.

A matter more on the domestic side, shall I say, was raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. It is dealt with in the answer to question No. 1,646 to be found on page 7569 of Hansard. It has to do with the wage scale for employees of the minister's department, and employees on certain ships of the Department of Transport. It is pointed out in the answer that by placing all employees of the Department of Transport on the same wage rates the department has more flexibility in moving crews from one vessel to another which would allow for better career planning. The answer continues:

> The effects of this exception on wage rates applicable to personnel serving on Department of Mines and Technical Surveys vessels operating in the same area as vessels of the Department of Transport are presently under consideration with a view to eliminating any resultant unwarranted differences in rates.

I suggest to the minister that this is good. I have had representations in this regard, as has the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and probably other members as well.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

I hope treasury board will make an exception, as it seems to me the words used with regard to personnel on Department of Transport ships would apply equally to personnel on ships of the minister's department, in that there would be more flexibility in moving crews from one vessel to the other which would allow for better career planning.

I wish to refer to another matter which actually comes under the estimates of the northern affairs department but certainly has a lot to do with coal mining and the minister's department. I refer to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act under which subventions were inaugurated by the former government that are payable to commercial users of power in the Atlantic area using power generated from thermal plants utilizing coal. At the end of the year they receive a cheque by way of subvention which cuts down their power costs and means a great deal to them. Certainly there has been no intimation of any change in this policy, which is most important to the Atlantic area. In my area there is a thermal plant at Trenton which provides power for the region and is also linked by grid with the province of New Brunswick. When New Brunswick has been short of power that thermal plant has supplied power to that province. This has been most beneficial and I hope this policy will be continued.

The heavy water plant in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton South for which tenders have been called will also provide a market for Cape Breton coal. At one point the Minister of Industry said the plant would be there, and then he was not quite sure. B.A. Oil then came forward with a submission allegedly involving a lesser cost for the production of heavy water, but apparently upon investigation this was found not to be the case. The plan is going ahead. Industrial Estates, a Nova Scotia crown corporation, has played and is playing a great part in the financing and establishing of this heavy water plant.

In this regard it should also be noted that the new atomic power plant to be built in Ontario will provide a market for the heavy water produced by the plant in Nova Scotia. The Minister of Industry referred to it in a statement he made in the house not too long ago. During the last few weeks I have had conversations with the engineer from the Nova Scotia power commission who has been assigned to act as liaison officer with Deuterium of Canada Limited, the company which is constructing the heavy water plant. He told me they were very happy to see that this plant was being proceeded with in Ontario because it would provide even more markets for this heavy water plant than had been anticipated originally.

There is a matter which disturbs us a little bit, and it was referred to some time ago by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. It is a statement made at the conference which was attended by the minister. This statement was made by a member of the dominion coal board, Mr. Whittaker. The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria asked the Prime Minister whether or not Mr. Whittaker, the managing director of the coal operators association of Canada, was stating government policy when he called on coal transportation officials to work for the eventual elimination of the federal subvention on coal transportation. This subvention on coal transportation is most important to the maritime provinces, especially in the Cape Breton area where much coal is produced which is marketed here in Ontario. It is sold to the Ontario hydro commission. In fact, as hon. members probably know, one large ship has been constructed, the S.S. Cape Breton I believe, which has been used to transport coal, and another ship is now being constructed to carry on this trade. These subventions are necessary and must be continued in order to assist this area. Any suggestion by a member of the dominion coal board that they be eliminated would, I hope, not be considered by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister did say, in reply to the hon. member's question, that this statement did not reflect government policy but he would be glad to look into the matter at once. Let us hope that this member of the dominion coal board, who has a great deal to say about matters pertaining to coal in Canada, will not prevail upon the government. Of course the coal board has to go to the government before there is any change in policy, so let us hope there will be no change in this regard.

There is a final matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. It has been brought forward annually ever since 1957, when I became a member. As the officials will know, and as succeeding officials have become aware, I refer to the oceanographic ship Acadia. This ship has been put up for a long time in the port of Pictou, in my constituency. Each year about this time a question arises as to whether or not the Acadia will be based there for the winter. I believe this subject bears repetition so I will put on the record the fact that this ship means a great deal to the Pictou area, not only to the town but the whole area. It means much to the shipyards in the way of refitting and repairs, and means much to the local merchants. Many of the crew members, of course, have their houses in this community and their children go to school there. This is a matter of great importance to them.

My final point in this regard is that Pictou is in a designated area. It comes under the New Glasgow employment office. Certainly when an area is designated, that does not mean that the present industries—this ship represents an industry—will be moved out of the area. Certainly the Minister of Industry should be interested in this matter. I remind the minister that the former minister, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue, made provision that the ship should remain there, as did the present minister last year. It has been stated that since the oceanographic institute is at Bedford, the Acadia should remain there. However, it is a small ship and it does not operate in winter. It means a great deal to the Pictou area, so I urge the minister that this ship be retained there.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, may I just point out that we have a Nova Scotian minister, the Minister of Labour. This department, and particularly the branch relating to coal mining, is most important to the Atlantic area. Let us hope that the minister of this department will consult with the minister from Nova Scotia on all matters so important to the Atlantic area, especially those relating to coal mining and subventions on coal transportation. Let us hope that they, in turn, will prevail upon the Minister of Finance, who is from another province, that the Atlantic area is also a part of Canada and is important. Let these ministers be heard in the cabinet, and let them speak on behalf of the economy of the Atlantic area.

Mr. Fisher: I will try to be succinct in my remarks relating to this department. The only question of an over-all nature that I wanted to raise was the suggestion that the government should be considering looking at every department to see whether or not it is necessary for them to have ministerial status any longer. This Department of Mines and Technical Surveys it seems to me is so little in the political centre of things, the partisan centre of things, that I believe it would be feasible to eliminate it. I certainly think we should have a report on this question. It is in the main a scientific and research organization, and since we now have both a Department of Trade and Commerce and a Department of Industry to look after the promotional aspects and trade aspects in this field, I wonder whether it is not time to consider putting the various agencies that come under this department in the Department of Industry, thus enabling us to cut down.

I believe that in political terms it would be much more important to have two departments of transport, one dealing with air and the other with the other means of transport, than to have a Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I say this without casting any reflections upon the gentlemen who have been ministers in recent years. It seems to me it is becoming more and more apparent, despite the growth of the mining industry, that in the main the federal role is very much restricted to science and research. It seems to me that the necessity for the continuation of this as a department of government with ministerial status has just about come to an end. I certainly think that mines, and the various departments which are like it such as the Department of Forestry and perhaps the Department of Fisheries, are such that we might consider abolishing them for ministerial status on the basis that all they are doing is providing a technical service. There is not enough work to occupy a minister. My point is that since it is in the main administrative, and is not very political or partisan, it could quite easily come under a senior civil servant and be set up as a branch of the Department of Industry.

I have examined the publications of the department, its technical services, and looked at the general activities and I am not convinced that they could not be handled by an agency or a branch of another department. I think we should be considering means of reducing the size and numbers in the cabinet, rather than increasing them. One of the reasons I have come to this view stems from the inadequacy of this department when we get into any situation such as the Timmins strike. This is the biggest strike in mining in recent years in Ontario, and we have had a great deal of confusion about just what it has to do with the responsibilities of the department. In effect it appears that if the department has any role in this kind of situation it would be very much at arm's length, in some kind of research activity, and even there it would not appear to be very much.

One of the most controversial questions in northern Ontario in relation to the Timmins strike is whether a smelter or refineries will be built, where they will be located, what will be the situation in terms of economics, where the capital will come from, and what role the federal government or provincial government will play in the location. It is quite evident from the information given to me in the house, and apparent from the questions raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Timmins, that the department really has no major role to play in this whole matter. That is nothing to be ashamed of in connection with this particular case, but it reinforces the reality that this, as a department of government, has passed its time.

I think, just as the geographical survey was the first of the great administrative and investigating agencies developed in this country and has done a marvellous job, so this department is now just coasting on momentum, and it is time to raise the question as to whether we need the department any longer. This is no reflection on the research and other activities carried on in connection with the department. Dealing with the question of agencies, my friends in the maritimes and my friends in Alberta are aware there is a dominion coal board, but I have not been able to see that the minister really has any great role to play in connection with that agency, other than to make reports in the house and be some kind of intermediary.

There is one other point I want to raise with the minister, and again it reflects the lack of initiative and the prospect of modernity, if you want, in an extension of the activities of this department. I have raised with the minister the question of some kind of aid for prospectors. I know he will not mind my saying, I got a nice run-around from him, and an even nicer run-around from the provincial minister, Mr. Wardrope, who shares a constituency with me. Obviously the attitude of the federal government is, "Let us not get into something on which it is probably difficult to work out a good policy"; and so the minister is not prepared to move into this matter. The department has not got any interest in something like this that would open up opportunities for many little men, for people who live on the fringes—I am thinking of the geographical fringes—of our society, to get out and follow their interests.

No schools held in the last decade have had a higher ratio of interest than the prospectors schools held in Ontario. In almost every town that fringes on mineralized areas you find people going out, working, staking, trying to capture their dream of finding something big. Very rarely do they go out with the kind of equipment that will lead to something great. Prospecting has become a function of very large companies that have good equipment. It may be just nostalgia on my part, but I think it would be a good idea to work out an arrangement to support prospectors. However, we get no leadership in this direction from the federal department and again the excuse seems to be put forward—"Why bother? This is really a provincial problem." Then when you take it to the provincial governments, aside from some interest in Saskatchewan and a little bit in B.C., they are prepared to let the thing go.

These examples it seems to me reinforce the question that I raised. Is it not time that we did away with this department, in so far as its having ministerial rating, and transfer the agencies, branches and survey groups within it under some minister who will look after all the scientific and research projects, and thus have real rationalization of government organization; or else it could be brought under the Department of Industry?

I would appreciate a reply in letter form from the minister on the last specific question I want to raise with him, which arises from questions I put previously in connection with prevailing rate employees who work for the department. A number of these employees with whom I have come in contact are unable to appreciate why they cannot be put on a permanent basis. The answer that was given to me—and I assume the information in the main came from the president of treasury board—was to the effect that this matter had been looked into and the government saw no reason to change its policy. I suppose the reason is that if these particular employees were given the kind of status they are seeking it would cause a ripple through the whole civil service. The argument put to me is that there are some unique features about the kind of work these people are doing in this department, that there is permanence in it, and because of this they think they are entitled to the kind of rights and privileges that accrue to a civil servant proper, and that prevailing rate employees do not have.

I would like the minister to write me a letter or memorandum setting out in greater detail the answers to these questions and what the prospects may be for changing this present relationship. I would also like a longer explanation than I have been given as to how the situation relates to prevailing rate employees in other departments.

Mr. MacInnis: Realizing hon. members on both sides are anxious to get these estimates through, I shall be very brief. The questions posed by my colleague from Pictou will no doubt provide me with many of the answers I seek, but he mentioned the heavy water plant, and this brought to mind the sort of dilemma the people of Cape Breton found themselves in when the minister announced the plant would be placed in Nova Scotia, and then claimed no such announcement was ever made. Because of this many people in Glace Bay were referring to it, not as the heavy water plant but as the hot water plant.

In the minister's announcement it is quite evident that the phrase used, that this would provide a substantial market for Nova Scotia coal within Nova Scotia, pinpointed the plant for Nova Scotia, but the later contradictory announcement caused a great deal of concern in the mining areas.

As was referred to by the hon. member for Pictou, and by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria on Tuesday last, Mr. Whittaker, a member of the coal board, made a statement in Banff recently to the effect that subsidies should be done away with. The Prime Minister has assured us that this is not government policy. Nevertheless it is an unhealthy situation when somebody in an influential position, such as Mr. Whittaker, suggests this, because if it were adopted as government policy it would be very detrimental to the welfare of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia as a whole.

This is not the first time such a statement has emanated from persons whose words would give us cause for great concern. I should like the minister, when replying to the original question put by the hon. member for Pictou, to assure the people in the mining areas of Nova Scotia that neither Mr. Whittaker's statement nor the statement made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano have any authority to back them up. I may say that this hon. member, the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, has advocated such a move himself and this, as I say, has caused considerable concern.

We have had an outstanding example of co-operation by the department of northern affairs in helping to provide employment opportunities in my area. I would also ask that the department of mines, in co-operation with the Department of National Defence and the Department of Labour should work to find something in the way of alternative employment for the many miners who are faced with idle times this winter and who have recently been laid off because of the single shift policy in the No. 18 colliery in my area. I think a good deal could be done in this direction, and the greater the number of government departments acting in co-operation to provide alternative employment possibilities, the better the chances will be of finding something concrete which will provide that employment. I have in mind such programs as were introduced by the previous government, in particular the fortress Louisburg project. This was one of the recommendations of the Rand commission. I may say I never did agree with much of what was contained in that report, though I have possibly been proven wrong in connection with the development at Louisburg. This development will mean a great deal to our area in the future. It has been helpful in providing employment, and I hope the program will be accelerated so as possibly to help out some of those men recently displaced at the No. 18 colliery.

I trust the minister, in co-operation with his colleagues in other departments, will do everything he can to assist in the event of light industries coming in to build around the heavy water industry. I have in mind in particular a metal fabrication industry which is showing some interest in locating on Cape Breton. There are rumours it may establish a machine shop at the vacated naval base, and if that is the case I would ask the minister to give a helping hand if it is possible to establish that industry in the area. As I said, the Rand commission report never excited me and I did not agree with very much of what it contained. As for the statements which have been forthcoming from Mr. Whittaker and from the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, the people of Cape Breton and the mining areas of Nova Scotia generally find them most disturbing, particularly since the hon. member for Coast-Capilano is the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, and they want an assurance that such statements carry no weight whatsoever.

In addition to those statements, one other piece of information has come to my attention. It has to do with the recommendations of the Rand commission report. I questioned the minister about this shortly after he had returned from his trip to Cape Breton and I referred to the intention of some people, people in a position to act if the government accepted the policy, to implement the recommendation of the Rand commission referring to the reduction of production to three million tons a year. Such a reduction if it were put into effect would mean, in my estimation, together with the loss of the second shift at one colliery, possibly the elimination of another colliery altogether, and it would be a blow which the area certainly could not take. I ask the minister to give us an assurance that such a recommendation would get no consideration whatsoever and that the government would turn a deaf ear to any such proposal, as it would to the suggestion concerning the subvention. I believe the department could contribute a great deal, in co-operation with other departments, to promoting alternative employment and it is my hope that any industry wishing to develop in the mining areas, whether associated directly with the heavy water plant now under way or not, will be assisted in every way possible by the hon. gentleman and his officials.

Mr. Benidickson: Since the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Pictou have both referred to a statement made by a member of the dominion coal board perhaps I should take this opportunity to reply to the point which has been raised. I will refer to the other matters later, in a general way.

May I say that on Wednesday I was in Alberta where I met the members of the coal board. At that time I had not seen the statement referred to; the board had met a week earlier at Lake Louise. But I did see Mr. Whittaker, and since returning to Ottawa I have seen the Canadian Press report which, I imagine, is the basis for the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I have also noted the question which was raised on Tuesday by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, in reply to which the Prime Minister said that if Mr. Whittaker's remarks had been accurately quoted they were not an indication of government policy.

I completely agree. I do not think the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria was properly reporting what Mr. Whittaker said. It was obvious to me, at least, from Mr. Whittaker's remarks, that he was referring only to the western sales of coal under subvention, which hon. members know are all export items bearing no relation whatever to maritime producers. He was referring to 800,000 tons on which assistance is given by subvention, in the light of the far more substantial subventions applied to the production of eastern coal. Mr. Whittaker simply said that since the purchasers of this 800,000 tons of western coal were in Japan, the subvention itself introduced an element of uncertainty in the minds of the buyers which induced them to prefer another source of coal, such as Australia. His suggestion was that since the factors which called for the subvention were transportation costs and, of course, costs at the mines themselves, efforts should be made to introduce new efficiency in production and to reduce the cost of transport from the coal mines of Alberta and British Columbia to Port Moody to an extent which would eventually, perhaps, eliminate the necessity of a subvention to compete with Australian supplies. He had no reference at all to the maritimes.

Mr. MacInnis: I thank the minister for that reply but it does bring up another question. I might point out here that the Prime Minister did not use the word "if" in the answer he gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. Now that the minister has taken care of Mr. Whittaker's statement, would he give us the assurance that the statement made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano will also receive the same treatment from the government?

Mr. Benidickson: I have not seen the other statement. I felt that the colleague of the hon. member for Cape Breton South had not read the full text, as I have, of the Canadian Press dispatch with respect to Mr. Whittaker's statement so I should like to see the other statement before I comment on it.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak on these estimates until I heard the comments of the hon. member for Port Arthur in which he advocated virtually the elimination of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. It seemed to me he suggested that the activities of this department might be put into some other minor portfolio. I should like to make a few comments about that because I have rather the opposite view to that held by the hon. member for Port Arthur.

I should like to see the role of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys enlarged. Perhaps we are striving toward the same end but are just taking a different road to get there. Maybe the department should be renamed to something like the department of scientific services. I think the department of mines has played a unique role in Canada and perhaps we should take a lesson from the experience we have obtained in the mining field and apply the same principle to other industries in Canada. I refer to the role of government in providing research facilities for industry.

I noted that the hon. member for Port Arthur lauded the role of the geological survey branch, and certainly this is a very important branch of the department which has played a major role in the development of Canadian mining. As the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue pointed out, this role is an increasing one and a very important one to our economy. I feel there is a considerable misunderstanding here—and perhaps the hon. member for Port Arthur was quite accurate when he said also a certain amount of nostalgia—in regard to mining prospecting. The so-called prospector is, in my opinion, very much a thing of the past in the mind of the public. We do have people on the fringes of our northern communities who indeed play an important role in mining, but I suggest that they are not really prospectors any more. They are really brokers in real estate who follow up on larger companies or syndicates which are better financed and which make a discovery somewhere. These people then try to grab real estate near some of these finds. Reference was made earlier to the Timmins strike, and I suggest this is a very good case in point. In my opinion, prospecting has changed very much in Canada. Perhaps we lead the world in our approach to mineral exploration, and in this case scientific methods and a very well financed program resulted in the discovery of a very important mineral resource in Canada.

The view of the prospector, the prospector about whom I understood the hon. member to be speaking, who is sent to a prospectors' school for six weeks and financed in a grubstake sort of way, is that this discovery could never have been made by a prospector, because it was a discovery which was not exposed in any way and could not have been discovered by the old methods used 20 years ago. I am not suggesting for a moment that mines will not be found by the direct visual method ever again, but I do think that in the last 20 years this method has been a diminishing factor in mineral exploration and will continue to become smaller and smaller. The role of a prospector as I see it today—and I include myself in this category—is one of more sophisticated and better technical and scientific support to a program, although I think this sort of program is really beyond the scope of one individual, or even a small group of individuals.

As I have said, I should like to see the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys enlarged so as to include a scientific support role for industry in general. As I was saying earlier, we have had unique experience in the mining industry of how this could be made to work. I disagree very strongly with the hon. member for Port Arthur when he suggests that this department has really ceased to play an important role in this industry. We are increasingly faced with the problem of beneficiating lower and lower grade ores, as the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue pointed out. We are also faced with the problem of doing scientific research in Canada, which has certainly lagged and is a role we must increase. We know very little really about the earth's crust and the larger, broader scientific matters. I feel this is a very important and useful role and perhaps the emphasis of the department has shifted from one of cursory mapping—although this will continue to be an important part of the department's activities—to one of more detailed exploration and scientific examination, as well as developing new techniques in mining exploration through research, all of which is necessary if this country is to maintain the position it has achieved in the world.

I should like to see the department expanded in order to play a similar scientific support role to industry in general. I feel that with this very advanced technology into which we are running now, with the problem of automation and so on, the department could be playing a very important role. I hope the minister will be putting his sights in this direction and that the government will agree to the department's assuming the kind of role which I think it should be playing in industry generally.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, it is encouraging to see the number of members who are taking part in this discussion this afternoon. It has been characteristic of the consideration of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys estimates by the committee of the whole, that the consideration has in days gone by been rather cursory and hasty. I know there are good reasons for this fact, as the hon. member for Port Arthur intimated a moment ago. Perhaps the policy and political functions of this department are not as pressing as those of the other departments which come before this committee. I think there is also another explanation, Mr. Chairman, in the fact that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has operated in a very efficient fashion over the years. I do not think there is another department of government that has established a reputation among the various aspects of the business community in Canada which would exceed the reputation of the department we now have under discussion.

It is customary to extend compliments to the men and women who are responsible for this happy state of affairs, and I join in those courtesies that have been extended by other members during this discussion. The department for many years had an outstanding deputy minister in the person of Dr. Marc Boyer who was succeeded by a man with the same qualities and qualifications, Dr. Van Steenburgh. I think these men have given the leadership to the department which has resulted in that high degree of efficiency that has been established.

Having emphasized the importance of this department I want to make some comments along the lines of those made by the hon. members for Port Arthur and York-Scarborough. It is quite true that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the mining industry occupy a vital place in Canada's economy, inasmuch as they are concerned with resources development and the wise management of both renewable and non-renewable resources are of utmost importance to the continued growth of Canadian economy. I have been looking through the very excellent reports circulated by the department from time to time in respect of various Canadian minerals, and it is interesting to note that the economic upsurge which began some four years ago in Canada was strongly based on the growing strength of the Canadian mineral industry. The improved balance of payments situation that has been noted by economists in Canada in the past few years again derives in great part from this upsurge in the Canadian mineral industry. I do not have the current figures, but in 1961 when I was more intimate with this department than I am at the present time, I think something like 40 per cent of Canada's total exports were derived from the mineral industry, and the order of priority in that balance of payments situation was minerals, wheat and tourism. I understand that order is still holding—minerals out front, wheat second and tourism in a very close third position in the important role of improving Canada's balance of payments situation.

The economic upsurge which began some four years ago was stimulated and encouraged by a deliberate attempt to stabilize the Canadian dollar, beginning in June of 1961 when the stabilization fund was used to lower the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar. This was part of a deliberate program and policy to encourage industries that were already playing a major role in Canadian economic life.

I should pay a compliment as well to the role the officials of this department played in the successful trade crusades which took place during those years, in providing personnel with the necessary technical skills and knowledge needed to take the message to those nations around the world which were contacted during those very useful and successful trade crusades efforts.

All these achievements were brought about in the face of stiffening world competition. It is a well known fact that in respect of a good many basic minerals there is a glut on the world market at present. The fact that Canada was able to improve its position is of great credit to the dedicated men and women who served in this department.

Various members from different parts of Canada have spoken this afternoon in recognition of the importance to the total Canadian economy of the mining industry, not only in respect of mining itself but also in respect of subsidiary benefits. As a westerner from the prairies I am conscious of the impact of the opening of the Thompson nickel mine in northern Manitoba on the total economy of the province of Manitoba. That mine opened in 1961 and is gradually prospering, broadening the economic picture of that province. The development of potash in Saskatchewan is having the same effect, and we are all aware of the petroleum development in Alberta which has enriched the economy of that province beyond all expectations. The development of asbestos in Quebec and Newfoundland are, of course, playing similar roles there. I think I should pay tribute as well to the industry itself, because it is not only the government that has been active in the development of Canada's mineral potential. Industry is contributing something close to $1 billion per year in research and promotional efforts, encouraging this important economic activity.

In reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur and commented upon by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, I do feel that now is the time when the role of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys might well come under reappraisal and re-examination. I say that, from the standpoint of personal experience, because during the period when I was the minister in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, I had the privilege of being acting minister for the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for some months.

It was brought home to me forcibly at that time by virtue of administering the two departments that there was a very close relationship between the functions of the resource aspect and also the northern aspect of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and many of the functions of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Oceanography, glaciology, the aeromagnetometer surveys, the Canadian geological survey, the geodetic surveys—all these scientific surveys so capably carried out by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys have a vital and increasing bearing on the success of Canada's attempt to develop her northern frontier.

It is a well known fact, as many commentators have noted, that the economic development of the huge area north of the 60th parallel is going to depend on the development of its rich mineral potential, that vast storehouse of mineral wealth which up to the present time has been pretty well a frozen locker because we have not devised techniques to make exploitation economically feasible. I have before me a recent article by Mr. Bob Hill who has travelled extensively in the north. The article is headed "Minerals in the Northland" and subheaded "Successful Exploitation Far From Assured". The basis of Mr. Hill's remarks in his recent article of August 21 is that successful exploitation is far from assured because we have not yet applied modern scientific techniques to that area in such a manner as to make it economically feasible to exploit this vast storehouse of mineral potential.

If there is going to be a reappraisal and reassessment of the role of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, it would seem to me that consideration might well be given to a closer co-ordination with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. This point was again brought forcibly home during the period when we were preparing for the resources for tomorrow conference. A decision had to be made initially with regard to how far the conference was going to go in considering resources. Was it to be restricted to renewable resources or should it also take into consideration the non-renewable mineral resources of Canada? Solely because of the restrictions of time the conference discussion was restricted to the field of renewable resources with a strong recommendation that there should be a similar conference to consider our non-renewable and exhaustible mineral resources.

I can recall being reminded from time to time by the minister of resources of the province of Quebec, Hon. René Lévesque, as we proceeded to plan the resources for tomorrow conference that the only reason the federal minister was involved at all in the discussions was that Ottawa did have some responsibility for the resources of northern Canada. It is a well known fact that the provinces have jurisdictional control of their own resources up to the 60th parallel in the prairies and up to the Arctic region, of course, in the province of Quebec.

Here again, emerging out of the circumstance of a thorough discussion of Canada's resources, the thought spontaneously emerged that there was a close co-ordination between the functions of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the services provided by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Therefore, so far as the point raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur is concerned, I do not think we need to think in terms of the Department of Industry or other departments, but what we need rather is closer co-ordination at the federal and provincial levels in all branches of government which are involved in the development of our resources.

This is demonstrated by the major breakthrough that occurred at the resources for tomorrow conference resulting in the establishment of the permanent body, the council of resource ministers and the secretariat attached thereto. This is a major breakthrough in intergovernmental co-operation and co-ordination. The success of the resource ministers council, located in the city of Montreal as it is, to get it away from any Ottawa orientation, will be determined by the success that the provincial governments have in co-ordinating resource activities of the various departments at the provincial level, and the leadership given at the federal government level in co-ordinating the functions of the Department of Fisheries, the Department of Forestry, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys whose activities in basic scientific research affect the whole area of resource development.

I should like to suggest that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is in a position to assume some of these functions because in the past two or three years it has shed itself of certain functions. For example, until four years ago the Department of Forestry came under northern affairs and national resources. In the past two years the Canadian government travel bureau was moved from national resources to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and more recently responsibility for Canada's museums has been assigned to the Secretary of State's department. Here is a change that has been going on without too much detailed planning. It is something that fits into the whole Glassco concept of government reorganization and co-ordination and I would recommend that the minister give attention to this situation.

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Chairman, some observations made during the course of the review of the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys have prompted me to make some remarks on this occasion. First I should like to express unequivocal support of those members from the maritime provinces who consistently assert the need for a continuing active awareness of the needs of the coal mines and fisheries of Nova Scotia. Without equivocation, as I say, I associate myself with those members who would like to see at Ottawa a continuing active awareness of these two great resources of Canada.

You may fiddle and tinker with administrative machinery, but in such tinkering for heaven's sake let us not lose sight of the main objective, which is to provide to enterprising Canadians every possible assistance from the government to discover the way whereby we can make the most extensive use of the God given resources which we have within the boundaries of our great nation. I would think that any move to abolish a ministry such as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and make it a division of the Department of Industry would just be going in the wrong direction.

I think those who subscribe to the view that the free enterprise system contributes to competition would certainly want to see the government perform the role of providing those entrepreneurs who perhaps do not have the resources of the bigger ones, with the fullest possible advantage of the research the government may be able to undertake. I, for one, have always advocated and will always advocate in this house that if there is any role the government should be performing most extensively and actively it is in the field of research in connection with our natural resources. In this way the government can equate, if you like, the opportunity for those who lack the same capital resources as some of the larger companies who are presently encouraged by tax concessions to engage in research work to further their position in the economic cycle of events in Canada. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I heartily endorse the views of the members of this house who advocate the strengthening and expansion of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in the field of research, rather than the restriction of those activities.

I should not like to see these activities weakened, lessened or placed in the hands of possibly already overburdened ministers in some other departments. I would be more concerned about breaking down some of the responsibilities of the ministers in this government of Canada than I would be in adding to the responsibilities of some who may be already overburdened, having regard to the fact that some of these departments are so complex now it is impossible for parliamentarians to really follow what is happening.

For example, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a great thing for a government to be concerned about its dollar expenditures. However it must always reconcile those expenditures with the fact that the economy in all parts of our nation is being assisted whenever government dollar expenditures will assist it. It seems to me that we must be very alert when pursuing tax savings to ensure that we do not put any area of Canada in an economic condition which we all deplore. We do not want to add to the volume or size of the designated areas in our pursuit of one thing which happens to be produced efficiently in a central area of Canada, and which the consumers of Canada want or need. I can see sometimes that various ministers who are desirous of economizing end up being penny wise and pound foolish.

I think it would be most unwise, for example, for us to be too quick to criticize subsidies and subventions to the maritime provinces. Let it always be remembered that the industries in the central part of Canada which are turning out products are producing tax carrying products and the consumer, no matter where he lives in Canada, will be making his contribution to the treasury of Canada. I think sometimes this fact is overlooked.

The opportunities for Nova Scotia in the field of oceanography, Mr. Chairman, and the challenge that it presents to extend our fisheries resources to areas hitherto undreamed of in international markets, deserves the fullest attention of a single minister, rather than being placed as a division in another department of government.

Mr. Southam: I, like other members on this side, do not intend to take too much of the committee's time this afternoon. However, like the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, I feel that the number of participants in this discussion is evidence of the importance of this department of government. I wish to take this opportunity of expressing my congratulations to the minister, and to his very efficient department, for carrying on their work to the gratification of the members of this committee over the past year. The former minister of mines and technical surveys, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue, has expressed on behalf of our party the constructive criticism that should be directed toward this department.

Personally, I rose to say a few words in connection with the coal industry in Saskatchewan. As I have mentioned on several previous occasions, the coal industry in Saskatchewan is a very important part of our economy, particularly in the southeast corner of the province. In looking over the last report of the dominion coal board I noticed some paragraphs that gave me some concern. I quote:

> Production of coal in western Canada during 1962-63 totalled 5,104,000 tons, a decrease of 444,000 tons from production in the previous year.
> The biggest drop in output occurred in the Saskatchewan lignite field which produced 2,069,000 tons, a decrease of 325,000 tons from the tonnage of the year before.

Now, this lignite field, as most hon. members know, is in the riding of Moose Mountain and is a very important part of the economy. I continue to quote from the report:

> Alberta bituminous coal production was 558,000 tons, a decrease of 124,000 tons; and British Columbia and Yukon production was 882,000 tons, a decrease of 120,000 tons. The only production increase in the west was in Alberta sub-bituminous coal. After many years of steady decline, followed by a levelling off last year, sub-bituminous output rose to 1,595,000 tons, an increase of 125,000 tons.

Of course, the significance of this increase stemmed from the fact that it could be ascribed to the first six months of digging coal for the Wabamun thermal electric plant, recently enlarged by the addition of a 150,000 kilowatt coal fired generating unit.

Mr. Benidickson: I very much hesitate to interfere with the hon. member for Moose Mountain, who is himself very courteous to the house, but it has been the practice to deal first with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and then the coal board. I do not know the wish of the committee, but perhaps it would be possible to dispose of the items that are under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and then refer to the dominion coal board.

Mr. Southam: I am sorry if I have transgressed any of the rules laid down, Mr. Chairman. If you wish me to reserve my remarks until some future time—

Mr. Martineau: Perhaps the minister would be agreeable, since the hon. member has already launched into his remarks, to allowing him to continue his discussion of this item.

Mr. Benidickson: I have no serious objection. I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West wants to say something about coal. I was just thinking about the possibility of disposing of certain items of the estimates, not for the convenience of myself but of the officials who are standing by.

The Chairman: Is the suggestion made by the minister agreeable to the committee?

Mr. Martineau: Several members have spoken on the subject and the hon. member who has the floor is quite advanced in his remarks. I think it would be better if he concluded.

Mr. Southam: I appreciate the help of the committee in this respect. I was glad to notice that on the order paper, under date of June 29, the minister has the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Coal Production Assistance Act to extend until the 31st day of October, 1969, the period during which agreements may be made under section 3 of the said act.

The amendment introduced to that act by the former minister in December 1962, proved of great value to the lignite industry in Saskatchewan, and no doubt to other coal producing areas, particularly where it had effect on the consecutive payment of loans. This part of the amendment was very beneficial, because rather than having to pay double indemnity, or 60 cents a ton, where they had two loans they could make their payments consecutively.

Earlier this session I was glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated the government would follow the previous government's policies with respect to a national grid system. If such a system could be developed at the earliest possible opportunity it would be of particular benefit to that part of Saskatchewan, which contains about 20 per cent of total Canadian coal deposits. With the thermal steam generation plants that could be developed, similar to the one developed by the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, that area could put into a grid system many million kilowatts of cheap power, which would enhance the economy of that part of the province. I know it is a question of technological development concerning the economical transmission of power over long distances, but I am sure the engineers will overcome this problem in the not too distant future.

In conclusion I wish to ask a specific question with regard to groundwater surveys in Saskatchewan. A great advance was made on this work under the previous government. It is work that is very important to Saskatchewan, as it is one of the more arid regions of Canada. The development and utilization of water is most important to our economy, something which has been evidenced by the many questions and debates on the water problem affecting eastern Canada this year. The Saskatchewan provincial government has been conducting widespread surveys. There is a lot of subterranean water in Saskatchewan, but the surveying and developing of it places quite a load on the province itself. The federal department should accelerate its program in this respect.

Mr. Benidickson: In answer to the hon. member's last question, this season in cooperation with the provincial government we had eight or ten workers dealing with the matter of sunken rivers and subterranean waters. There will probably be a paper available shortly, but the work is continuing.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I still wonder if it would be possible for some of the mines and technical surveys items to receive the approbation of the committee, and leave other items open if necessary, items like 65, 70 and so on, that relate to the coal board. Would that meet with the approval of the hon. member for Kootenay West, who is always here?

Mr. Herridge: It just so happens that the hon. member for Kootenay West wants to hear the minister talk on the national coal board and the government's policy.

Mr. Benidickson: Having regard to the procedures in the past in dealing with these estimates, I have not with me the officials concerned with the dominion coal board. It has been traditional that we deal with the mines branch before dealing with the coal board, and if that will suit hon. members, on the next occasion I will have the advice of the officials from the dominion coal board.

Mr. Herridge: If I am allowed, I want only a few minutes to say a few things. I have been sitting here all afternoon because I am very interested in this department, which is one of the departments which rather hides its light under a bushel. I am interested because of the geographical, topographical, geological and resource development of the mining industry in the Kootenays. I was interested in the remarks made by various speakers such as the hon. member for Port Arthur and the former minister, with respect to the organization and reorganization of the department.

This is strictly a scientific research and technological department, which is fortunately not subjected to the day to day buffeting of political partisan questions, and I think it is a good idea to keep the department within those confines. I shall not go into questions of reorganization or things of that sort, but I do suggest as a result of the discussion this afternoon that it is obvious a good many members are not aware of the over-all services performed by the department.

Though it is too late this session, I suggest that the estimates of this department should be referred to the committee on mines, forests and waters where the departmental officials would have an opportunity to explain to members of the committee the services they perform, what I consider a sort of socialistic service provided for free enterprise, and where the officials could answer questions.

Mr. Benidickson: I would welcome that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I am delighted to hear the minister say so—where they, with the better knowledge of the functions of the department and the services it is performing, can give consideration to what can be done to increase still further the assistance it is rendering to the Canadian people as a whole and to industry in particular.

These are the few remarks I have to make at this time. I am glad to hear that the minister is agreeable to my suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Mining and metallurgical investigations and research—

35. Administration, operation and maintenance including Canada's share of the cost of the commonweath committee on mineral processing and $50,000 for grants in aid of mining and mineral processing research in Canadian universities, $4,985,000.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the minister in connection with this item what progress has been made in research activities concerning other uses for uranium. There was some activity a few years ago in connection with the discovery of other uses for this metal—using it to strengthen steel, for example. Has this been a successful research operation? I think the department has some connection with the work which was being undertaken.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. gentleman had some responsibilities in this field in the past and he will recognize that this is an interdepartmental affair involving the present Department of Industry and the Department of Trade and Commerce as well as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Some developments have taken place. Some alloys have been developed which look as though they may be useful in conjunction with uranium. Such information obtained from government research has been made available to the steel companies of the land, but that is about as far as I can go.

Item agreed to.

Geographical surveys and research—

45. Administration, operation and maintenance including the expenses of the Canadian permanent committee on geographical names and the national committee for Canada of the international geographical union, Canada's fee for membership in the international geographical union and a grant of $500 to the Canadian association of geographers, $653,000.

Mr. Martineau: Would the minister say a word about the upper mantle project? Is it still being carried on?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, it is continuing. It is a project with which the hon. gentleman was very familiar when he was minister. It has not yet been completed.

Item agreed to.

Research in astronomy and geophysics—

55. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $944,000.

Mr. Rapp: Could the minister explain the increase in payments under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in 1964-65 compared with the previous year?

Mr. Benidickson: The terms of payment came before parliament last year and the only change was a restrictive one which meant that no longer would we make payments under the act except to mines where 50 per cent of the employees were already within an existing community. The reason for the increase in payments is simply that the grade of ore has been lessening and the cost of production has been increasing.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: The dominion coal board.

Mr. Knowles: Five o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: For the convenience of hon. members could I ask the leader of the house to outline the business for Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. Favreau: On Monday, Mr. Speaker, we shall take as the first order, order No. 67 as it appears on today's order paper which is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Then we shall take up order No. 35, a resolution preceding a bill to implement certain recommendations of the royal commission on transportation. After that, we will continue the debate at the committee stage of Bill No. C-72, otherwise known as the redistribution bill.

On Tuesday, if the resolution concerning the Farm Improvement Loans Act has been passed, we shall proceed with the second reading and committee stage of that bill, after which we would take up consideration of a resolution which is being placed on the order paper concerning farm machinery syndicates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being after five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING BIRTH CONTROL METHODS

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-48, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Hon. members will have noted that this bill was seconded, not by a member of my own party but by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Willoughby). I requested the hon. member to do so in order to emphasize the non-partisan nature of this amendment and also because the hon. member for Kamloops is a member of the medical profession and of the Canadian medical association, a body which is interested in the passage of this amendment to the Criminal Code.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

At the outset, I wish to state that this bill which I have presented has nothing to do with the world population problem. It has nothing to do with the total size of the population of Canada; we are still a long way from being overcrowded in this country. It is about an archaic law on our statute books which says it is illegal for competent persons such as physicians, pharmacists, pastors and priests to give information on family planning to married couples who want such information.

Section 150 (2) (c) now reads as follows:

> Every one commits an offence who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse, offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of preventing conception or causing abortion or miscarriage.

It goes on to say:

> (3) No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section if he establishes that the public good was served by the acts that are alleged to constitute the offence and that the acts alleged did not extend beyond what served the public good.
> (4) For the purposes of this section, it is a question of law whether an act served the public good and whether there is evidence that the act alleged went beyond what served the public good, but it is a question of fact whether the acts did or did not extend beyond what served the public good.
> (5) For the purposes of this section the motives of an accused are irrelevant.

Apart from that possible defence, section 150 is very complete and wide in its scope. Again these are the words of the statute which I want to emphasize:

> —offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of preventing conception—

So the bill is very complete because it uses the word "any".

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many means of preventing conception. There are mechanical devices, usually rubber, available for both men and women. There are chemical methods, notably the pills about which we hear so much today. There is the rhythm method which is widely used by members of the Roman Catholic faith. But the way section 150 now reads makes it illegal in Canada to advise, prescribe, sell or supply any method of preventing conception.

The terms of the Criminal Code generally are administered by the Department of Justice. However the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare authorizes for use and sale in Canada certain types of birth control pills. In my opinion it is a bad law because it is so widely disregarded by such a large element of the population, or if you like by such a large and respectable section of the population. Any physician who advises patients on contraceptive methods is breaking the law. Any druggist who sells contraceptive pills or devices breaks the law. Any cleric who advises his parishioners about family planning is breaking the law. Thousands of these people are breaking the law every day because of this archaic statute. More than that, Mr. Speaker, I consider this section of the Criminal Code, which is in that general section of the code dealing with pornography and sexual offences, to be an unwarranted interference by the state in the private lives of married couples. What should be essentially a private and personal affair is in the Criminal Code where it has no place.

We all know that the majority of the Canadian people pay very little attention to this law. Most couples of average income and higher have no difficulty in obtaining the information and devices necessary for family planning. They simply ignore the law. But there are large numbers of people who, because of the circumstances of their lives, depend upon the public health services for their medical care. In most cases the public agencies which serve these people—hospitals and social welfare departments—do not give contraceptive information because it is contrary to the law to do so. So there is this element of the population who may want this information and help but who cannot get it.

There is an exception, Mr. Speaker, and that is the city of Toronto. Recently the council of that city discovered that the city social welfare department was supplying and paying for birth control pills on prescription to recipients of social welfare. The council's committee made an investigation and reported back to the council, and the council and board of control agreed that their social welfare department should continue this practice. I applaud their courage and good sense, but it seems to me that if the law is to be enforced the mayor, controllers and aldermen of the city of Toronto all ought to be taken to court under section 150.

I am sure that all hon. members are aware that there is widespread support in the country for the passage of this bill. Most members have received thousands of letters from their constituents favouring it. Several of our leading newspapers and magazines including the Vancouver Sun, the Edmonton Journal, the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star, and Maclean's magazine have given strong editorial support for this amendment to the Criminal Code.

Many of the religious denominations have declared themselves in favour of this amendment. These include the board of evangelism and social service of the United Church of Canada and many of the presbyteries of that church, the council for social service of the Anglican Church of Canada and quite a number of the synods of that church. The 90th general assembly of the Presbyterian church, meeting in Toronto in June, passed a resolution in favour of this amendment. The Unitarian Church of Canada, of which I am a member favours this reform. The Baptist conventions of Ontario and Quebec have also endorsed approval of this bill. Quite a number of other organizations have gone on record during the past year or two as supporting a change to section 150 of the Criminal Code. These include the children's aid society of Ontario, the Canadian medical association, the Canadian association of obstetrics and gynaecology, the Canadian council of women, and the voice of women. By no means least, and as one would expect, the planned parenthood associations in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa have worked assiduously for this particular reform.

Now, Mr. Speaker, people have said to me many times that the Roman Catholic church would prove a real obstacle to getting this type of bill passed. I am not at all sure that this is the case. The Roman Catholic church is not opposed to family planning as such. It recognizes that there is a case for family limitation. The church distinguishes between what it calls natural and unnatural methods of controlling conception. The present debate within the church has to do with that very subject—what is natural and what is not. Inasmuch as I am not a member of that church I do not want to comment further on the present debate within the church, I only want to say that many prominent clergy and laymen of the Roman Catholic church take the attitude that they do not wish to impose their beliefs upon persons of other faiths.

As an example of that particular viewpoint I want to quote from a news story in the Vancouver Sun in March of this year which reported on a panel discussion in Vancouver. One of the members of the panel was Father James R. Roberts of the Roman Catholic matrimonial tribunal of the archdiocese of Vancouver, who has something to say in the article. The article reads:

Bad laws breed disrespect for the law itself, according to Father James R. Roberts, member of the Roman Catholic matrimonial tribunal.

"For any law to be effective and serve the community it must be backed by the general acceptance of that community, otherwise the mass violations (even in good conscience) of that law, produce disrespect for the law," he explained.

"Prohibition did not have the support of the community and the disastrous results of that puritanical law prove this point," he added.

In his opinion the basic issue is one of civil rights.

"We (Roman Catholics) support the principle of civil rights for Negroes and for Indians but all this would be hogwash if we were not truly sensitive to the current question of civil rights in B.C.

"And the law prohibiting the sale and use of contraceptives here is an infringement on those rights," he said, enlarging on remarks he made at a panel discussion last week on quality or quantity.

Father Roberts said that he "realizes many non-Catholics in Canada hold the Roman Catholic church responsible for the preservation of this archaic legislation".

"But this is not true," he said.

"Although we may hold that certain methods of birth control are immoral, we are not obliged to force our moral code on the civil law," he explained.

I realize that everyone in the church does not hold that view, but there are a very substantial number of the theologians and laymen of the church who do hold that view. It is a matter of civil rights for each person to decide for himself.

Yesterday the general council of the Canadian medical association wired the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) urging passage of this bill. Last night the 21st general council of the United Church of Canada meeting in St. John's, Newfoundland sent a telegram to the Prime Minister asking that there be a free vote on this bill. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker—I do not think I am being naïve about this—that there is any plan to talk this bill out. I understand that there is wide support for it in all parts of the house. I understand that there can be a free vote, but if there is to be such a free vote I would respectfully ask members who want to speak in favour of the bill—and there are quite a few—to keep their remarks quite brief so that we can proceed to a vote, because there is no general plan as far as I know to talk it out. If we can do that and give the necessary reading to the bill today we can correct one part of our law which many thousands of our citizens have asked to be corrected.

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, despite the rather plausible argument of the mover of this resolution I wish to voice my personal opposition to the bill proposed. I do not for a moment suggest that in this matter, or indeed in any other, I am voicing the views of all my constituents. I am confident however, that I reflect the feelings of a great many people, and most certainly my own.

I oppose this bill on principle and not merely as a matter of conscience. Our function in proposing legislation—as I understand that function—is to propose and to enact laws which are in the best interests of the common good. This bill asks us to legalize that which is beyond our jurisdiction. My opinion is that the determination of what is morally good or bad is not within our competence. I suggest we legislate within a determined area of morality. For instance, theft, murder, and other crimes are not morally good or bad simply because we make them so by legislation. They are against the natural law, and not because Canadians, British, United States or other legislators declare that they are.

I oppose this bill in practice. What has been the experience of those countries which have enacted this legislation? Cursory reading indicates that some countries at least are now very much concerned over the consequences of the legalized sale of contraceptives. They have experienced, and are now experiencing depravity, promiscuity and a rampant recklessness among the young—and not only the young.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this government or of any government, is, or certainly should be, to promote the common good and to work diligently for a more equitable distribution of wealth. The government knows full well that, in fact, contraceptives will be purchased especially by unmarried people and by the young, resulting in corruption of public morals. In my opinion this or any government should not permit these gravest of social evils, evils which attack morals, attack married life and attack the family, the very foundation of our society. The family should and must be protected at all costs.

May I quote a word or two here from an address given by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening ceremony of the Canadian conference on the family. His Excellency said:

> To my way of thinking, the best and surest way of developing generous and idealistic hearts, of giving the community men and women who are well balanced and conscious of their responsibilities to their country, is to protect the family, for the family—far from opposing the interests of society—is capable of giving to the universe the human beings who are prepared to put justice and truth before their own personal interests.

Any government, but particularly this government, has to work for the material betterment of the people, and to work for a better distribution of food, of work and of wealth. Let it not be said finally that we are merely legalizing what is being done anyway. This argument is pragmatism at its lowest and its very worst, and unworthy of public mention, unworthy of representatives and unworthy of this house. Such an argument could extend to anything, for instance to a certification of firearms and their indiscriminate use, and we would then witness assassination and mass murder. How pragmatic can we get?

The answer to the problem of poverty, Mr. Speaker, is obvious. We must increase the supply of food and jobs, and certainly not decrease the population. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, not wishing to emphasize the obvious, I oppose this bill in practice, on principle and in all conscience.

Mr. Charles J. M. Willoughby (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in seconding this motion I did so because I support the amendment and consider the act as it now reads as being a serious hypocrisy. The law as the act now stands is not being enforced, which makes the hypocrisy even more obvious. I feel this bill involves a great national issue and affects the enforcement of law and order not only in this regard but in regard to other laws, and leads to a disregard for laws generally.

This bill also has some international implication. The last speaker made a very pertinent remark when he suggested one of our duties in this country involves the distribution of food. I do not intend to go into this subject in detail, but I wonder whether he is aware of the fact that the world population today is almost three billion, that four out of every five deaths in the world today are directly or indirectly the result of lack of proper nourishment, and that empty stomachs know no laws? I am sure he is aware that communism thrives when stomachs are empty. Statistics have been presented which indicate that in 40 years the population of this continent will have doubled, and that in 65 years, at the present rate of growth, the world population will be in the neighbourhood of 50 billion. To support the population expected in the United States within 25 or 30 years that country will have to find 400 million more arable acres of land.

Mr. Habel: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he not now, by the remarks he is making, departing from what the hon. member who sponsored the bill said was not its concern, namely the world population?

Mr. Willoughby: I recognize the fact that this bill does not directly implicate world population, but how can we assist the world population conscientiously while at the same time remaining hypocrites in our own country? We must increase the world food supply. I suggest there are only two ways out of the problem created by world population explosions. One is to create more arable land and grow more agricultural products—growing four blades of grass where only one grows now—or assist in curtailing the increase in the world population. How can we do this with conscience and yet remain hypocrites? Canada has ample space and an ample food supply, but we have an international duty.

I suggest the problem envisaged by the mover of this bill is not a religious one. I have the greatest respect for any religion and would be the last one to criticize, but because of our hypocritical attitude, if the law involved was enforced most medical men and druggists at the present time would be in jail. How ridiculous can a situation become? No one is permitted to accept advice in respect of contraceptives as the law is now, and no one will be compelled to accept that advice if and when the law is changed. Let us put all the cards on the table rather than pushing some of them under it.

I should like to conclude by endorsing the remarks of the proposer of this bill, and by emphasizing at the present time that most religious organizations in Canada are prepared to support the amendment. The Canadian bar association has recommended that this amendment be made. The Canadian medical association has also recommended that this amendment be made. Most religious bodies, if they have not endorsed the amendment, do approve of family planning.

Interestingly enough, Mr. Speaker, on the average family planning has not curtailed the number of children in most families in Canada. It has been done in such a way that it has been for the benefit not only of the parents but also of the children. The result is that on the average Canadian families are larger today than they were before this subject was ever introduced. There is nothing to worry about on that score.

As a medical man, the big factor so far as I am concerned is that this type of proper instruction will overcome the terrible illegal abortions that are performed. I do not think we should overlook that fact for one minute. I endorse the bill because the present provision in the act is hypocritical and a real farce. The amendment is endorsed by all the organizations I have mentioned and I feel that under the circumstances the house should approve it to remove this hypocrisy from the Criminal Code. In doing so I believe we will offer no offence to any person or organization.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest against the passage of this bill. I have seen many happenings in the house but this time things have gone too far. When I hear men speak in favour of such legislation, I wonder where the people of Canada are going.

This is working toward the destruction of the human race.

Not satisfied with having authorized the opening of drinking places on practically every street corner to facilitate the degradation of modern society, not satisfied with having enticed our young girls and our women to taverns and grills to degrade womanhood, we are now seeking to make women sterile. In my opinion, that is a diabolical scheme.

Mr. Speaker, the whole of Canada must speak out against those who support this bill. We have no right to put such a dangerous, indeed, such a diabolical weapon into the hands of the people.

Most of us are Christians, and as such, it is our duty to put up as strong a fight as possible against this legislation.

A few minutes ago, I heard someone say that this is not a religious problem—

[Text]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has just implied that those who support this bill are not Christian. I dissociate myself from that implication, and I ask him to withdraw it because it is not true. I support the bill and I am also a Christian.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: It it well and good to disassociate oneself, Mr. Speaker, but I will prove to you what I am saying.

Someone said a little earlier that this is not a religious problem. Well, if he goes over his religious principles, he will read in the gospel: Thou shall not kill. It is one of the ten commandments.

I wonder if the killing of a barely conceived child is not as much a murder as that of a 40 or 60 year old individual.

I do not understand that the law of man can prevail over the law of God. That is why I say to the hon. member who rose a little earlier—

[Mr. Willoughby.]

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Carleton on a question of privilege.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, the reflections made by the hon. member on the consciences of other members of the house are not in order. I for one support the bill, and I am not endorsing murder or anything like that. The implication that I am is an unwarranted reflection upon the consciences of members of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The Chair recognizes that the argument the hon. member for Roberval is now making is a very delicate one indeed. I am sure he would not wish to make any inferences that would in any way interfere with the thinking of other members of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to attack anyone. I only wanted to put forward Christian principles. If the cap fits someone, it is not my business, and even less my fault.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that we cannot in any way support this bill which reads as follows:

> Offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of causing abortion or miscarriage, or—

I say that this bill is unacceptable and I shall make every effort so that it is not carried for my province. If others want to accept it for their own province, they are free to do so, but I swear that in 15 years there will only be French Canadians left in Canada. That will be the result of this bill.

Today, we are afraid. It is said that in the year 2000, there will be too many people. Well, Mr. Speaker, let us not worry about that; man is stupid enough to destroy himself, you can be sure of that. God is stronger than all that. People should not worry about how many of them there will be in the year 2000. That is not the purpose of the bill. I think that it was determined by people other than members of parliament and that it comes from much higher.

Imagine the result if people could get such drugs at all the little corner stores. Imagine what would happen to our young people, in our homes. Think of what would happen to our people; in ten years from now, with this system, there would be no people left and the Black and Chinese people would come and replace us in Canada.

Those are the consequences the passing of this bill would have, if its application were to be left to individuals who are not prepared to accept those drugs. That is a problem.

First, it is a medical problem, besides being a moral problem. I appreciate that if it takes the advice of higher medical authorities, the government will be able to legislate in such a way as to enable, not all the people but the competent authorities, to use certain drugs in cases of sickness, great weakness and so on, but it should be severely controlled, like all poisons, some drugs and injections which are now reserved exclusively to the medical board.

I suggest that it is not at all the business of the house to study this problem, but we should rather leave it to higher medical authorities from which the government might take advice, as it always does—

[Text]

Mr. Francis: Will the hon. member permit a question? He said that this is no business of the House of Commons. May I ask him why, since this concerns part of the Criminal Code which was enacted by this House of Commons?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, this happens to be prohibited by the Criminal Code, because our fathers were much wiser than some of us are today. They thought that natural law should not take precedence over divine law, and that is why we have today some very judicious clauses in the old Criminal Code.

I realize that the more we seem to become refined, the more stupidly we act. I believe that the old saying: "He who acts the angel, acts the beast" is still true. I also realize that we are heading in that direction today.

I stated that this was a medical problem which should be submitted to the relevant authorities. If our prominent medical authorities were consulted on this point, as are high religious authorities on the moral aspects of the case, I am sure that we would obtain legislation more in keeping with the medical point of view, and that it would not be legal to sell those drugs like a bottle of Pepsi, in the corner store.

Those are our reasons, Mr. Speaker. If, today, vaccines or shots of all kinds, which are only given with a medical prescription, were sold in all the small stores, in short, if all drugs and remedies subject to medical prescription were made available to the general public, I think that the house would commit a grave error. And that is exactly the error we are about to commit, if we pass this bill.

This is a field which should be restricted exclusively to the higher medical authorities. Furthermore, we should bear in mind the serious moral problem which the passing of this bill would create in every province, especially in the province of Quebec where the majority of the people are Roman Catholics.

[Text]

Mr. Willoughby: Will the hon. member permit a question? I understood him to say that this should be left to the medical authorities. I would appreciate the hon. member telling me how this could be left to the medical authorities, when if they give this advice they are breaking the criminal law?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: If I read the bill correctly, I think the medical authorities accept it as an ordinary medical product just as any other patent medicine. That is precisely to what I am objecting. I do not want birth control pills to be sold as freely as Buckley's syrup or any other such medicine. I think most of the hon. members will agree with me that the bill, as it now stands, is simply dreadful. If the bill only provided for a study of the question by the medical board, I would support it. But the purpose is to make this available to the public, and to that I object. I suggest that the people are not ready for such publicity, particularly when we know the meaning of publicity nowadays. It is said that everything is a matter of publicity, that anything worthless can be sold with good publicity.

Mr. Lachance: Social Credit for instance.

Mr. Gauthier: It would be the best thing if Social Credit could make use of that publicity, but the old line parties and financiers prevent it from doing so because it is not a paying proposition.

Publicity has to be curbed, Mr. Speaker. The only means to curb publicity is to refer this question for consideration by higher authorities who are as competent as most of the members of the house, because, for my part, I am speaking as a father putting forward his principles as a Roman catholic. I know that the bill conflicts with ethics and public interests, though some members have involved the Roman Catholic religious authorities when speaking of public interests. Religious authorities favour public interests but let no one try to distort the question for this reason. Roman Catholic authorities are opposed to the bill as drafted.

[Text]

Mrs. Konantz: May I ask a question? Does the hon. member realize that the Canadian medical association have given their endorsation to this bill? If so, does he realize that the drugs to which he is referring would be given under prescription only and that this bill would not change that?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: I am very pleased, Mr. Speaker, to hear that, but, if you read this bill, unless I do not know French anymore, or do not know how to read, it is not that at all. Advertising and publicity are to be allowed. Read the bill carefully and you will admit that it becomes a popular product. Now, it is for this very reason that we will always oppose such a bill as long as the sale of this product will not be subjected to medical prescription.

It is for this reason that we are against this bill. I believe there are others who wish to express their opposition as well, and I shall give them the opportunity to express their opinion to prove that I am not the only one opposing this bill.

[Text]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will not take up too much of the time of this house. I know that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. O'Keefe) has spoken, and much as I respect his views I do not agree with them. I have had a great many communications on this bill, even more than I have had on the flag. I have received something like 800 individual communications with regard to this bill. I have had resolutions from four churches in my riding and communications from a substantial number in addition to those.

I should like to put on the record the official views expressed through the authorities representing the different religious bodies in Canada. The Anglican Church of Canada, on September 2 and 3 of this year, at a general meeting of the executive council of the general synod and its council for social services, passed the following resolution:

Whereas the Lambeth conference of 1958 has, within the concept of the exercise of responsible freedom, given general approval to the practice of family planning and has set forth some of the principles to be considered by Christians in such practice;

And whereas for all people in Canada the exercise of responsible freedom in the area of family planning with due respect for civil law, is made impossible by existing legislation which prohibits the sale or dispensing of instruction, medicine or drug, or articles for use in family planning;

And whereas for certain groups in Canada the exercise of responsible freedom in the area of family planning is not possible either for economic reasons, or because of lack of factual knowledge or understanding, thus making the achievement of a full and rich marriage and family life more difficult than it might otherwise be,

This council for social service meeting in joint session with the executive council of general synod,

Urges that every effort be made to amend present legislation in Canada in such a way as to make legal the dispensing of information and means under competent medical or other professional guidance, so as to enable spouses, irrespective of their economic circumstances, who wish to exercise their freedom in planning and spacing their families in accordance with their physical and economic means, to do so with adequate knowledge and instruction.

And affirms that the dissemination of information about family planning within the context of the principles enunciated by the Lambeth conference of 1958 is a responsible practice within the education and pastoral ministry of the Anglican church.

In June 1964 the Baptist convention of Ontario and Quebec passed a resolution, the text of which I do not have in front of me, but it acknowledged the fact that very many people are violating the law as it now stands, and recommended the deletion of the words from the Criminal Code "preventing contraception or".

The Presbyterian Church of Canada adopted the following resolution at the last meeting of the general assembly:

That the general asembly call upon the federal government to revise section 150, subsection 2c of the Criminal Code of Canada re conception control—

And it gives the wording.

—so that in matters relating to the prevention of conception, the clergy, medical profession, family counsellors of governmental and municipal agencies and druggists be exempted from the section of the law having reference to advertising, instructing or selling to married couples.

Then there is the United Church of Canada:

Report of the board of evangelism and social service, 1964 approved by general council of the United Church of Canada.

And this is a substantial re-endorsement of the 1962 general resolution of the general council:

Whereas section 150 of the Criminal Code of Canada deals with, "offences tending to corrupt morals", and subsection 2c of this section states that "everyone commits an offence who...offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instruction, medicines, drugs or article intended or represented as a method of preventing conception or causing abortion or miscarriage",

Whereas section 150 (2c) offends against the religious beliefs of the majority of Canadians since it makes a criminal offence of something which the churches believe to be a moral necessity in these days;

Whereas the act as it stands tends to inhibit social agencies from offering advice and assistance in family planning;

And whereas legalizing of the advertising, sale and instruction in the use of contraceptives would tend to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies, and would tend to diminish the number of illegal abortions;

And whereas the majority of physicians are prepared to prescribe for their patients appropriate contraceptive measures, i.e. those which are religiously, medically and aesthetically satisfactory;

And whereas section 150 (2c) has never been rigidly enforced by legal authorities;

And whereas section 150 (2c) prevents Canada from taking an effective part in aiding those nations attacked by population explosion, which, if unchecked, must inevitably lead to lower living standards, world instability, and ultimately, to war.

Be it resolved that this board:

1. Recommend that subsection 2c of section 150 of the Criminal Code of Canada be amended by the deletion of the three words—"preventing contraception or".

2. Recommended that the church take responsibility at the local level for the encouragement of planned parenthood associations where medical leadership can be given.

3. Recommend a copy of this action be sent to the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General of Canada and the members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now quote from the Globe and Mail of January 7, 1964, an interview by Mrs. George Cadbury, secretary of the Toronto planned parenthood association:

Though the P.P.A. executive is top-heavy with Anglican and United Church ministers, rabbis, professors and doctors, the association is unable to get a charter from the provincial government, unable to advertise, and severely restricted in its operations.

This is the result of the cloud which has been raised by the present wording of the Criminal Code. An organization, a planned parenthood association, seeks to incorporate and cannot get a charter for the promoting of its activities in which its members believe, according to their own religious counsellors. There is no question of this being anything other than a free vote according to conscience, and members of this house can vote as their consciences dictate.

I listened to a member from the other side who spoke in exaggerated terms of what were religious opinions and what were crimes in moral law, but we have to recognize that there are differences—differences in consciences, differences in religious affiliations and points of view. The official organs representing the opinion of something like 50 per cent of the population, according to the latest census, have gone on record asking this parliament to delete these three words from the Criminal Code of Canada. A substantial majority of the population of my riding, Carleton, are represented by these particular religious bodies whose authorities I have quoted. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this house will recognize that this is a matter of conscience and should not be a matter of the Criminal Code. I hope they will exercise that conscience freely, and allow this bill to go to a committee.

Mr. Choquette: May I ask the hon. member a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as it is clear that such a measure would pave the way for the most damaging abuse and the most awful immorality, is my colleague not of the opinion that, if the purpose of the amendment is really to be achieved, its wording should not be quite so general? It seems to me that its present form is not conducive to the attainment of the objective the sponsor of the bill has in mind. On the contrary, it would open the door to frightening abuses.

[Text]

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy to recognize there may be amendments that should be considered in committee. If the hon. member believes it is possible to improve the bill, then I think that is the appropriate place to do it; but I do believe at this stage the bill should be permitted by the house to go to committee.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I observe that the hour of six o'clock is approaching in a moment or two and that the time available for discussion of this bill is about one minute. In view of that fact, and the further fact that the hour devoted to private members' public bills was encroached upon today to a considerable extent, so that the hon. member did not have a chance to introduce his bill until quite a few minutes after five o'clock, I would like to ask the house to agree that this bill retain its place on the order paper, especially in view of the great interest of hon. members and many members of the Canadian public in it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Does the house agree that Bill No. C-48 shall retain its place on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): There is not unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Bigots.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, maybe I have just time to say two or three words in the few remaining seconds. I am glad to be able to say that I am against the bill now before us. My stand is based on words which are to be found in the book on which we took our oath of office when we came to this house. Those words are: "Go forth, multiply, and fill the earth." I did not find there any words saying that, if at anytime there are too many of you, use the means made available to you by the government.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
