Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should tell members of the House that my colleague, the Minister of State, and I visited the elected and traditional leadership of the Mohawk community of Akwesasne until late last night to discuss this kind of issue and related questions.

We, of course, are relying upon the combined leadership of the Mohawk community to provide a list of their requirements and to be fully involved in a process of developing a long-term solution which will bring peace, permanent peace, to this community, and to end and heal all of the wounds of the events of the last several days.

We will be prepared to continue the work of the task force which commenced working last December on developing forms of economic relief for the community. I have just this morning asked my officials to look at ways in which we might help on a short-term basis with some of the immediate material requirements of the community, such as those which the member has listed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that response.

[Translation]

I would like to ask him a supplementary and possibly put a supplementary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare as well.

Although the violence seems to have calmed down in Akwesasne, at least for the time being, the emotional wounds and scars will take a long time to heal. Considering the violence which has divided families and caused fear and all kinds of problems, is the minister prepared to help provide counselling for the families who will have to cope with the situation in the days and weeks to come?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The member raises a very important question which was also discussed last evening. In visiting and meeting many of the residents who have seen families divided, it is obvious that there is going to be a need for social and emotional counselling. We talked about conflict resolution. On request from the community the Government of Canada will assist with some process of conflict resolution, presuming that request comes from the representative leadership of the community. We look forward to being helpful in that way.

• (1130)

It is important, at the same time, to get to the root cause of the difficulty. It is not merely a matter of promising some large economic package. We would all want to see some viable new economic options for the people of Akwesasne, but we also must remove the pressures which have led to the creation of a problem relating to particular types of activities which have not been good for the community.

HEALTH

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadians are growing concerned about food safety. Dr. Ian Munro from the Canadian Centre for Toxicology, a world renowned authority on the subject of food safety, is continually attempting to clarify the facts, such as the fact that synthetic pesticides and food additives are known to account for only one-half of 1 per cent of cancer risk as compared to 40 per cent caused by food preparation and 44 per cent by natural carcinogens.

What is the government doing to deliver the true story on food safety to Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern about this matter. He has expressed this concern before in the House and in committee. It is important to establish a balance between the very natural concern for food safety and the need to use pesticides and other chemicals in the production process.

To that end, the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Agriculture have been meeting on an ongoing basis with the retail associations and with food producer groups. As well, we have established the pesticide review process which is reviewing the registration process for all chemicals that are used for the production of food in Canada.

Recognizing the seriousness of this, I think it is fair to say that the government is taking the necessary action and I appreciate the hon. member's support and co-operation in that regard.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. As I said, Canadians are expressing concern about their food safety and the regulations that are in place to ensure that safety. What is known as organic farming and organic foods are becoming very popular.

What steps are being taken to regulate such food production and products in order to guarantee that Canadians will see full disclosure of the production standards being used? If it is coming, when can we expect legislation to govern such growing practices?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether it would require legislation, although some regulations may be required. The fact of the matter is that we are actively engaged in examining this particular issue.

I can say as well that we are attempting to dispel the myth that is perpetrated in some quarters that food produced using chemicals that are safe is unfit for human consumption. There is a position taken in some quarters that only organic food is safe.

I want to assure consumers and the hon. member that food that is produced with the proper allocation of pesticides and chemicals that are determined to be safe for use by Health and Welfare Canada is certainly safe for consumption. Canada has perhaps the best food safety standards of any country in the world.

We co-operate very closely with our trading partners and, as a matter of fact, as the hon. member knows, this is part and parcel of the ongoing trade negotiations which are registering some very significant progress in terms of co-operation and collaboration in the whole area of food safety on an international basis.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister. As he is aware, on Wednesday in Washington, D.C., at the initiation of the United States Senate, parliamentary delegations from 42 countries gathered to find solutions to the increasingly severe global ecological crisis. Consensus was achieved on seven issues contained in the final legislative strategy.

Since Canada agreed at the Toronto Conference two years ago that global climate change is serious and adopted a target there, and since no serious legislative or policy action has been taken to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in Canada, will the Deputy Prime Minister commit the government today to, at minimum, the 50 per cent greenhouse gas reductions adopted this week by legislators from across the globe at the meeting in Washington?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the Minister of the Environment, both at the White House meeting in Washington a week ago and upon his return to Ottawa, has said on more than one occasion that we as a country cannot afford to wait until all the studies are completed. We are committed to action. We will ensure that there will be specific targets and schedules for those targets in place as soon as the consultations respecting the Green Plan are completed this fall.

I would also remind the hon. member that this government has already done several things with respect to reducing greenhouse gas emissions. We have agreed, Mr. Speaker, as you know, to phase out controlled CFCs by 1999. We put in place fuel efficiency guidelines. We have agreed to reduce automobile emissions of carbon dioxide by 20 per cent per vehicle by 2005 and also to reduce nitrogen oxide by 30 per cent per vehicle by 1994.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of the processes which are now taking place there will be targets, guidelines and schedules in place as of this fall. They will be targets and schedules to which Canadians will be committed. We, in co-operation with business, the private sector, environmental groups and the public at large, will have targets in place and will have a strategy to ensure that those targets, once in place, are met.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Forestry. The member who just answered knows full well that that is not the message that was being delivered at the conference in Washington by people like Jacques Cousteau, Carl Sagan, Robert Watson, Steven Schneider and others. The globe is about to become toast and 42 countries, unanimously through consensus, called for action now.

The 42 nations representing all the continents in the world adopted a policy to reduce levels of deforestation by 50 per cent now in all nations across the world and to actively move to a level of aforestation, or the planting of forests, to a level of 30 million acres per year by the end of the decade. Will the Minister of Forestry this day, prior to National Forest Week, commit Canada to play its full role in this endeavour, pursuant to those two policies adopted by 42 nations in Washington earlier this week?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I can indeed make a commitment to the House today that Canada will play its full role, not only in improving the custodial practices in our own country to make sure that future generations of Canadians will have their needs satisfied from out forest resource but also in recognizing the fact that our forests are, of course, directly linked with the planetary ecological systems.

Canada will plant 1.2 billion seedlings this year. We will begin the process this year of aforestation rather than deforestation. There will be no addition to any NSR lands.

Conferences such as the hon. member has just attended are very useful in drawing attention to the crisis and the imperatives that we are facing. This is important because every individual in our country and throughout the world has to understand that our cumulative activities as individuals have very, very serious dilatory effects. It is not always right to identify one industry or one activity as being the main culprit. Every citizen has to be involved in the initiatives that have to be taken to save our planet.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services I will direct this question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

• (1140)

In June of last year the Department of Supply and Services and CIDA issued a request for a proposal for six lateral trenchers and four collector trenchers for a CIDA-funded project in the delta of the Nile River in Egypt.

Supply and Services and CIDA stipulated that Canadian content premium would apply. A Canadian manufacturing company, Wolfe Equipment Limited of Melbourne, Ontario, tendered and, in fact, was the only tenderer. This company's reputation is above reproach and their equipment is the best in the world. It is world-class.

Why were new tenders called in February, 1990, for this multimillion dollar contract? Why were the rules changed to allow foreign manufacturers to bid on a project funded with Canadian taxpayers' money?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the responsible minister, I will have to take that question as notice. I assure the hon. member that we will get back to him as soon as we possibly can.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his response.

On the current tender call we may have three bids, one Canadian and two foreign, one of which is not designed for drainage work and does not have the quality or the ability to obtain a licence for drainage work in Ontario.

Will the minister tell us that Canadian content is still a priority on this equipment? This will result in a loss of many Canadian jobs. Will the minister do the honest and patriotic thing and stop pandering to foreign interests on Canadian funded projects?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, without checking all the facts it is very difficult to respond to that question in detail. I certainly in no way want to accept the premise and some of the allegations which are implicit in the hon. member's question. Again, I will undertake to provide a full response at the earliest possible opportunity.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to global warming and the key role of energy policies, therefore it is addressed to the Minister of Energy.

Last year, the DPA group in Toronto produced a study which concluded that if the government were to invest $74 billion in energy efficiency, it would get a return on the investment of some $150 billion to the Canadian economy. Furthermore, there would be a significant reduction in carbon dioxide pollution, increased energy efficiency and increased competitiveness on the world markets.

Why has the Minister of Energy rejected such a report?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have rejected that report, and I will give the member the reasons why.

The DPA study was commissioned by the task force that energy ministers established after the 1988 Toronto Conference. I asked for an analysis of every one of the measures that the DPA study said should be taken in order to meet those kinds of goals. It has become public that, for example, they recommended that no more cars be allowed in any city with a population of 250,000 and that no more thermal plants be built. They also recommended that there be heat pumps in every home and dramatic increases in the prices of energy.

That study was rejected by the task force. We then studied the DPA study to see what kind of benefits we could get from it, even if we accepted everything within the DPA study. It fell well short of the 20 per cent target of Toronto and it fell well short, as well, of some of the technical possibilities that they thought could exist.

As I announced earlier, the government will be moving more into energy efficiency conservation as part of the green plan which has been announced for later this year. That is a practical way of going.

But the DPA study was rejected both by the task force and the ministers of energy because, quite bluntly, it did not come up to the numbers that they had put forward.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, from the minister's answer I wonder whether the minister can assure this House that he has the mental capacity to understand the return of $150 billion for an investment of $74 billion.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has distinguished himself before by his inane comments, and I guess this was just another one.

WOMEN'S PROGRAMS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. Earlier today in question period she said that funding had been reinstated to women's centres.

At least 10 women's centres in B.C. have had to close their doors and other women's centres have had a terrible time during this last period of indecision by the government. Will this funding be retroactive to April 1 when the funding was cut?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague that this funding is in place for the current fiscal year. Women's centres, I would hope, in those circumstances will now be able to proceed to reopen and continue to provide their services.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate getting that information from the minister.

A number of women across Canada were charged when they were protesting this government action of cutbacks. Will the government commit to withdrawing those charges against those women?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the federal government, of course, cannot interfere with the course of justice and it would not be within our power or appropriate, of course, to intervene in that particular situation.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA. Last September I released a study which chronicled higher levels of unemployment, lower family incomes and significantly less economic opportunity for residents of the black communities in the Preston and Cherrybrook areas of Nova Scotia. Since that time I have made representations to the minister seeking his assistance to use the resources of ACOA to assist in reversing this very serious problem.

Can the minister inform us whether or not he and his department are pursuing this issue and if he believes that there is some reason for optimism in this particular community?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question and I appreciate my colleague's sincere interest in this problem. We have had discussions about it before. As recently as yesterday I met with the President of ACOA, Mr. Peter Lesaux, and we attempted to focus on the special needs of this community.

My colleague knows it is rather difficult to have a truly affirmative action program within the context of well-defined rules for assistance. But I believe that with some care, and perhaps some co-operation from other colleagues in Employment and Immigration and FBDB, perhaps we can devise something that will focus on the special needs of this community.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I truly appreciated that response.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of State for Employment and it concerns the same issue. The same study indicated that unemployment among blacks in the Preston area was over 28 per cent and that on average a young black male could expect to earn in the vicinity of 42 per cent less than a non-black in the same area.

Can the minister indicate what steps her department is taking to respond to the social and human injustice, not just in economic terms but in terms of attempting to break down the barriers of race which, I think he would agree, have for much too long kept the black community from being full economic partners in our society?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, our government has always shown its concern for workers who have to cope with such difficult circumstances. That is why we have announced and put in place certain measures to help these communities.

We considered both a short term and a long-term plan, and we found that the easiest way to help these workers would be within the framework of our Canadian Jobs Strategy. I am thinking of the Community Futures Program and our training program, and my colleague and I are both working very hard to find the right solutions for the short term, and at the same time develop a durable plan so that these workers can find the ideal solution: a job.

I would like to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues opposite who are so concerned about the unemployment rate in these regions to talk to their colleagues in the other place, so that Bill C-21, which is part of the strategy that allows for regional and sub-regional differences, can be passed as soon as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister responsible for small business or the minister acting in that role today. It concerns TIEM, the so-called Canadian job creation company.

• (1150)

Has the government ordered an investigation of this particular so-called job creation company? Its own evaluation indicated that over a period of three years in five Canadian cities it only produced 31 full-time jobs at an approximate cost in loans and grants of $15 million. Is this investigation going on now?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that such an investigation is going on at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. Why didn't the government react sooner? Besides the fact that only 31 jobs were created over a period of three years, in five centres, at a cost of about $15 million, local people had already said there was a problem almost a year ago. My colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce mentioned this as well. I identified this as a problem on December 15, January 4 and March 5. Why didn't the government react earlier?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there has been an investigation going on for some time and I think we should be careful about what we say at the moment. Let us let that investigation go on and have the results before we make any charges or semi-charges about individuals or organizations.

HOUSING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Housing. The minister will be aware that the high interest rate policy of this government has taken a crisis in housing and turned it into an utter disaster. Home sales are down dramatically, construction in all areas including residential construction in the first quarter is off, and now applications for building permits, which show what is going to happen in the next six months, are dramatically down.

Will the minister indicate to this House whether he has brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance and Mr. Crow the devastating effect of high interest rates? Has he requested them to abandon their high interest rate policy now and reduce interest rates?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is well aware, until very recently all indicators showed that building starts for new homes in this country were increasing quite dramatically. As a matter of fact, current figures show that building starts in the country will be in excess of 200,000 this year, dramatically up from what they were a few years ago.

It is quite true that there appears to be a slowing down in both new home construction and sales of real estate at the moment. We seem to be at a stage where some changes of that sort are taking place in the economy. I can assure you that I, the government and the Minister of Finance are watching the situation very carefully.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the minister reluctantly admits that there are indications of a slowdown. The indications are that the housing industry is coming to a grinding halt, and it is mainly because of the high interest rate policy.

Has the minister or his government got programs in place that will help home owners offset the increased payments that they will have to make because of a continued high interest rate policy?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, housing prices in very overheated markets such as Toronto and Vancouver, and more recently in the Calgary and Edmonton area, were causing very considerable problems. Although there has been a slowdown in sales there has also been a slowdown in escalation of housing prices. I think that is a benefit.

I am sure the hon. member is aware, and I know that all Canadians are aware, that the government has now and has had for some time a mortgage rate protection program whereby Canadians can in fact protect themselves against high interest rates by purchasing insurance against that through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the National Housing Act. The program will pay three-quarters of any increase in monthly payments resulting from a rise of more than 2 percentage points in mortgage interest rates. I hope that all Canadians will take advantage of that.

AUTO INDUSTRY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the auto industry in Canada provides 20 per cent of all Canadian manufacturing and more than 150,000 direct jobs, why is the government not taking more seriously the sizeable drop in sales in April of 34 per cent by the big three automotive manufacturers? After all, April is supposed to be the start of the peak selling season for cars in this country.

Why will the government not listen to people like Jack Clissold, vice-president of sales at Ford who said that the drop in sales again illustrates how "rising interest rates tend to put the brakes on car and truck sales." Why does this government want to put the brakes on car and truck sales in this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the same individual whom the hon. member quoted said the following:

> We know there remains inherently strong demand for new vehicles. With new financing assistance plans—we believe we can offset the interest rate obstacle.

The hon. member did not quote him quite fully.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, why does this government want to force the industry to take steps which could cause difficulties for it, in view of the fact that the industry itself says that this government's high interest rate policy is an obstacle? Why does this government insist on creating an obstacle for the key manufacturing industry in this country? This government is not supposed to be creating obstacles, it is supposed to be providing a basis for growth and jobs. It is doing the opposite.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I find that interesting because when I take a look at the statistics today I see that domestic sales are down and foreign sales are up. That is because our auto dealers in this country are placed at an unfair competitive position because of the federal sales tax. We are removing the federal sales tax. We are bringing in a GST which will lower domestic car prices by as much as $800 on a $20,000 unit. We are working for that industry. Why do you not get behind the GST?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. minister thinks that the manufacturer's sales tax is so bad for the car industry in this country, why did his government raise it more than four times since it has been in office? The government's words are one thing, its actions are another. Its action has been to raise this tax. Why did it do that?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, that tax was raised because the government needed the revenue to pay the interest on the debt that the Liberals left us. That is why it was raised. That is exactly why it was raised. And also to pay the bills for health care, to pay the bills for post-secondary education and to pay for the social safety nets that we have in this country. There are a myriad of reasons why it was raised.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I would like to follow up on the question which I raised yesterday about meat imports into this country which were found to be defective despite the fact that they were approved by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Could the minister now confirm that the tests which have been carried out on these products show high levels of staphylococcus bacteria which are involved in the spoilage of this meat?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that the test results on the product indicated that no bacteria harmful to humans were present.

• (1200)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister has avoided the question. The question was: were staphylococcus bacteria found in this meat which led to spoilage of the product? That is the report which I have received directly from the Department of Agriculture labs which did the testing.

I would suggest to the minister it is best to respond positively to that and to suggest to this House what is going to be done by this government to take into account incidents like this in trying to sort out the future of our relationship with the United States on meat imports.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had responded positively. It is unfortunate that the hon. member does not like the answer that I gave him. I am informed, as I indicated yesterday with regard to the question, that the reason it was inspected was the fact that there was defective meat product packaging.

Yesterday I indicated that I did not have the results of the test. Today I am informed that the results of the products indicated that no bacteria harmful to humans were present. There was spoilage however, presumably because of the defective packages and the fact that they were exposed.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is in relation to remarks made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources during Question Period.

The analysis that has been done by his department in relation to the DPA report is extremely important. The report points out that for a $74 billion investment there is $150 billion in net benefits to Canadians. Even if the figures were out by 50 per cent there is still $75 billion net—

Mr. Speaker: I am having trouble finding the point of order.

Mr. Fulton: My point of order to the minister of energy is due to the importance of the report he referred to. Will he table it so that all members of this House and the Canadian public can have a look at it?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I find the point that the hon. member makes interesting because the study was analysed by the task force. The task force report to the energy minister was in Kananaskis on April 2 and we made that public.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would let the Chair look carefully at exactly what the exchange was. If it was a document that was read or referred to in any kind of detail, it may well have to be tabled. I will go back and check it. I am not entirely sure if the minister did read from it, although he did mention it. I will look at it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I think if you test the House you will find there is an understanding among the parties that once the House has dispensed with Bill C-59, Bill C-60 and Bill C-61 this afternoon, there will be no other business called. I wonder if the government House leader or his parliamentary assistant would confirm that.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to confirm that. If that were to occur, we would be prepared to adjourn the House at that point in time without any further business being called.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to 98 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, as you know, this is Education Week. I would like to table several petitions signed by students of Ottawa University and other area residents of the riding of Ottawa—Vanier concerning the quality and accessibility of our universities, colleges and post-secondary education.

These petitions were gathered by the Canadian Federation of Students and support the contention that over-crowded classrooms, obsolete laboratory equipment, poor library resources, high student-professor ratios, elimination of programs of study, deteriorating buildings and physical plants are now a fact of Canadian higher education.

The petition is quite lengthy, but I think it makes a good case for a joint effort of all levels of government, especially the provincial and federal governments, to commit to arrange a federal-provincial conference of the highest political representatives to establish obligation to the two levels of government in the financing of Canadian post-secondary education and to ensure an end to the shameful neglect of higher education in Canada.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of my constituents with respect to their deep felt concerns on abortion.

The petitioners would like human life to be protected from conception to natural death.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have received hundreds of signatures on petitions from my riding with respect to the Conservative federal government's imposition of the goods and services tax on many health care services, such as occupational therapy, physiotherapy, social services, speech language pathology and audiology which are performed outside of public institutions.

The undersigned call upon Parliament not to impose the goods and services tax on any health care services whether delivered in public institutions or in the community.

I hope this will be taken under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by students from Alberta, British Columbia, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan.

The petitioners call upon the government to respond to over-crowded classrooms, problems of poor library resources, increasingly high student-professor ratios, the elimination of programs at universities, the deterioration of buildings and physical plants at universities and other institutions of higher education across Canada, and call upon the government to commit itself to arrange a federal-provincial conference of the highest political representatives to establish obligations of the two levels of government to adequately finance Canadian post-secondary education and to ensure an end to the shameful neglect of higher education in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by over 6,000 people residing in Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, which represents almost 20 per cent of the people who voted in the last election. The petitioners criticize the government's goods and services tax and call upon the government to make sure it is rejected as, of course, 80 per cent of Canadians would ask.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to table some petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36. There are not a great number of names, only 55 to be exact. They are particularly noteworthy because just about every person on Hocking, Raymond, Farwell, Terrace and Connaught Avenues in Sault Ste. Marie, and rather than 80 per cent of the population being against the GST, I think 100 per cent of the people on those four streets are against the GST and they encourage the government to listen to the people of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 245 and 257.

[Text]

FUNDING TO ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH CADRE PARENTS AND THE FEDERATION OF FRANCO COLUMBIANS

Question No. 245—Mr. Wilbee:

1. Is government funding being made available to the Association of French Cadre Parents and the Federation of Franco-Columbians or to parents involved in legal action against the Minister of Education of British Columbia, the Vancouver School Board and the Delta School Board, to assist in a request for a francophone school facility with management of program and facility to be held by francophone parents?

2. Has there, in the past, been any funding provided to the Association of French Cadre Parents and the Federation of Franco-Columbians, through any government department or agency?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Secretary of State of Canada and the Department of Employment and Immigration as follows:

1. The Court Challenges Program which is administered by an independent organization, the Canadian Council on Social Development, has approved an amount of $75,000 for litigation, at the first level of court, involving the Association of French Cadre Parents and the Federation of Franco Columbians.

2. Funding has been provided to the Association of French Cadre Parents and the Federation of Franco Columbians under the Official Languages Promotion Program of the Secretary of State:

Association of French Cadre Parents

FOREIGN AND CANADIAN CONTROL OF MINES EXTRACTING INDUSTRIAL METALS IN CANADA

Question No. 257—Mr. Rodriguez:

Is the government aware of the percentage of (a) foreign ownership (b) Canadian ownership of mines extracting industrial metals (other than gold) in Canada, from 1975 to 1987 and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

(a) & (b) The requested information is not readily available. However, Statistics Canada has provided the following data:

	FOREIGN CONTROL	CANADIAN CONTROL
	Industrial Metals (other than gold)
1975	44.9 %	55.1 %
1977	47.0 %	53.0 %
1978	44.4 %	55.6 %
1980	41.5 %	58.5 %
1981	39.0 %	61.0 %
1982	35.3 %	64.7 %
1983	33.7 %	66.3 %

The data show a continuing decrease in foreign control for industrial metals during the period 1975 to 1986; the level of foreign participation dropped by 28 per cent. The concomitant increase in Canadian control is particularly evident between 1979 and 1985 as the degree of Canadian participation increased by 25 per cent.

In determining the level of foreign/Canadian participation in a sector, Statistics Canada does not measure ownership per se, but instead measures control. This is done by identifying the country of residence of the shareholder(s) exercising effective control over each company included in the sample. Companies are included in the sample if their annual revenues exceed $15 million. In measuring control levels within a sector, individual companies are weighed according to their annual revenues. For more details on methodology, please refer to Statistics Canada's Annual Report pursuant to the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, Part I—Corporations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, because of one of the anomalies in our rules that we have not yet corrected, we have problems on Mondays if we do not have the regularly scheduled business for Private Members' Business.

I have not had a chance to consult with my other colleagues on this motion, but I think there may be unanimous consent for it. Therefore, I move:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, May 7, 1990, the House meet at 1 o'clock p.m. and proceed to the consideration of Government Orders from 1 o'clock p.m. to 2 o'clock p.m.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I regret to tell the parliamentary secretary that I cannot concur in that proposal. I think we have to come to grips with the solution to the problem which is to have this House pass that motion. It is on the Order Paper, giving private members of this House a chance to get their motions and bills before the House. I regret to give notice that until I have satisfactory knowledge that the motion will be adopted, I am going to have to resist giving the government extra time.

In the interests of getting movement on the motion to settle this problem of the draw that gives all of us a chance to have motions and private bills before the House, I cannot concur in this proposal.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, for slightly different reasons I am not prepared to concur either.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not believe there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious we do not have unanimous consent. I think I have no choice but to put the other motion which is that the House would then meet at two o'clock. I move:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order on Monday, May 7, 1990, the House meet at 2 o'clock p.m. for Statements by Members, followed by Oral Questions and the remaining order of business as provided for Mondays.

Mr. Speaker, of course the point of that is that we simply do not meet at one o'clock and have to suspend and come back at two o'clock. This just makes provision to come back at two.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So ordered.

BRITISH COLUMBIA COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-59, an act to amend various acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in British Columbia, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ONTARIO COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-60, an act to amend various acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Ontario and to provide for other related matters, as reported (with an amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-60 is similar in concept to Bill C-59 which governed the B.C. courts. I did not speak on behalf of my party in connection with Bill C-59 and deferred my remarks to Bill C-60.

Although it is technical in nature, this federal statute governing the Ontario courts like the B.C. courts permits unification of the courts at the Supreme Court level in the province and at the District Court level. In our view, it is fair to say that these courts are now finally entering the 20th century—just in time; we have another 10 years to go.

Previously our provincial courts were divided into separate jurisdictions, usually based on monetary jurisdiction, with disputes involving larger dollar amounts being decided by the Superior Court and with lower dollar amounts being decided by the County or District Courts. It is a little bit like being a referee in the NHL and being a referee in the AHL. You are dealing with the same rules of the hockey game, but you have a slightly different environment and different players. I recall, as a lawyer, having to gown for one court but not for another. It was a little artificial.

The concept was based on life as it was in the last century. It has become counterproductive and inefficient. We have two sets of courts, two sets of judges, two sets of staff and two sets of courtrooms. With a united court in our provinces, we will be better able to manage and maximize the resources that we have in the court system on behalf of the taxpayers.

Although it is very easy for us at the federal level to pass this statute, we could not fail to acknowledge the work of many judges, court administrators and lawyers in the court systems in Ontario and in British Columbia in bringing these reforms into being. This will definitely benefit the taxpayer and improve the administration of justice. My party supports this bill.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to Bills C-59 and C-60, I would like to express my appreciation to the government, to members of the legislative committee and to witnesses who have done such an excellent job. I would like also to thank the opposition parties for their co-operation in assisting the passage of this legislation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

DIVORCE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-61, an act to amend the Divorce Act (barriers to religious remarriage), as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly delighted to speak to the third reading of this bill. I hope it has quick passage through this House.

I would like to look at the process, something that is extremely exciting and dynamic. It comes at a particularly important time in the history of this House. If one looks at it in terms of time, this is Volunteer Week, or just a couple of days after.

This kind of bill demonstrates in the most forceful, practical and important ways the role that volunteers play in society. When there is a group of like-minded people—in this instance, women—who have a serious concern about what an inequality or a gender biased situation within the laws of Canada, it prevents the forward movement of women to make enlightened choices and then to move forward with their lives.

I recall that in 1984-85 and early in 1986—I see a nod from a brand new colleague from across the floor, along with my colleagues from York Centre and Burnaby. In particular, I remember the member for Saint John—that we sat and pondered what to do about this new dilemma, the Jewish get, as we were in the process of amending the divorce bill. It required a new look, and certainly an update. I was particularly appreciative of the sensitivity shown by the Minister of Justice of the day, followed by the new Minister of Justice of the day at that time, who is now the Governor General of this country, and followed by the third Minister of Justice of the day, who is now the Minister of Transport, and now we have our first woman in this very important role. You can see how key it was from 1985-86 to today, to have understanding on the part of all members of the House, as they looked at the application of fairness, justice and equality, under the law.

As a member of the small task force, section 15, on equality for all, I can remember even looking at it as far back as that time, in the history of my place in this House. The measure means a very great deal to me as a Jewish woman, to the Jewish community and, in particular to those who have had to have a sense of discomfort, discrimination and bias, and also that very unpleasant sense that you are placed in a position of extortion in order to receive what is your due and what is your right under Canadian law. That is the key, it is under Canadian law. We are facilitating a divorce procedure which, in the Jewish traditional law, can only be undertaken as an act between the man and woman themselves in the presence of a rabbinical court of three members.

In a sense this traditional Jewish law, this Halachahic law, allowed for goodwill and the exchange of a document between a man and a woman, a man offers and the woman accepts this document. Where there was malicious intent or wilful desire to make life very difficult and to use this as a means of getting ends other than the right to proceed with one's life either as a man or a woman, more often than not it was a woman, this instrument or document was used in a manner that was not foreseen and there was no rabbinical court to which this could be taken.

I would like to say that in the interest of these women who got together, and in the interest of Volunteer Week, they forced an enlightened view to bring about the passage of a bill eliminating the unfairness which sometimes prevents Jewish persons from remarrying within their faith. We now have, thanks to the coalition of Jewish women for the get, Norma Joseph who was their driving force and John Surtash who was legal counsel, the first steps in the province of Ontario. I would like to bring to the attention of the minister, although she may may be well aware of it, that passage of this bill which is a landmark act internationally, never mind nationally, will certainly be used effectively by the women volunteers and the rabbis. In the province of Quebec rabbis found some very creative ways to enable this Jewish get or Jewish divorce, the rabbinical kind of approach which was outside of the civil process, to take place. They will use this bill to enable other governments in other countries to bring about justice for women in our society. In that light, as well, I want to express the very deepest appreciation of all of us, and particularly Jewish women, at this time.

On behalf of the Liberal Party, I take great pleasure in supporting this bill at third reading. I want to make very sure that the minister understands that her help ensures the integrity of this act which prevents in any way a bargaining tool based on a monetary support problem, a pension rights problem or a child access or child custody case because it is much more important that the best interests of the child be served. The minister and her parliamentary secretary may well remember how hard we tried to look at the mandatory conditions for access to and support for children who are the main concerns in a divorce issue of this kind.

I appreciate that we have now a tool whereby no one would be able to to use the get in order to obtain concessions in a civil divorce proceeding in this land.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because certainly we in the New Democratic Party have strongly supported this legislation and, indeed, have urged the government to move expeditiously for its passage.

I just wanted to join on this important occasion of third reading of the bill in commending all of those groups across this land who have worked so very hard with such tremendous dedication and energy to right an historical wrong. I am not going to name all of the groups because inevitably some would be left out, but I do want to take this opportunity to pay tribute particularly to those women who have been responsible for pushing to the point where now this bill will be a reality.

Too many women have in particular suffered the pain and injustice of the current provisions in this area. I would hope that this legislation could serve as a model to provinces which have not yet moved in this important area. I know that some have, but there are others which have not yet taken this step. I would hope that they would move forward in this important area.

Finally, I want to urge the government to proclaim this legislation in the very near future. I had some concern because in questioning government representatives it was suggested that there would be a series of prolonged consultations with provincial jurisdictions. I hope the minister in responding to this might make it very clear that she intends to proclaim this legislation in the very near future.

Injustice has been done and every day that this legislation is delayed, further injustice will continue to be done. I commend those involved.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, we welcome this legislation and we urge the minister to proclaim it as quickly as possible.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the member for Mount Royal who has been intimately involved with this bill and all of its stages, has spoken for the Liberal Party for the Opposition.

I am very happy to have the opportunity to come to the House from the Meech Lake committee which has adjourned for lunch and put on the record my own satisfaction about the achievement of this very important piece of legislation.

It was the present Minister of Transport who finally decided for the government that this was a worthwhile measure, a measure which advances Canada's sympathetic understanding of the pluralistic nature of our society, showing a willingness to accommodate, within the laws of Canada, the legitimate interests of multicultural groups.

I hope that this law will not only be of value, as I know it will, to the community concerned, but that it will be the model for ways in which Parliament can respond across Canadian society to various groups when it is possible to do so; to assist them not in the establishment, as there is in some countries, of systems of laws that apply to minorities that live separately within the country but to the kind of pluralistic, proud and integrated society which we are in which this type of legislation permits the accommodation of the particular interests of one minority group.

I have had the pleasure and honour of being supported in all of this, as have other members, by a great many individuals and organizations across the country who have been committed to this cause and who have seen it come forward.

I think it is important to pay tribute on a particular historic day, for the reason I will mention in a moment, to the Attorney General of the province of Ontario, Ian Scott, whose legislature was the first to provide a legislative framework for recognizing the situation of the get, the problem of the traditional Jewish divorce against the Canadian laws and provincial laws that relate to divorce, family law, and child custody. That was the first province to accommodate this problem. As it happens, the Attorney General is in Ottawa today, along with the Premier of Ontario, to testify on the Meech Lake Accord. We are very happy, on a day that they are here, to be able to see legislative follow-up to an initiative which began in their chamber.

In closing, I express again my deep satisfaction with the work of the now Minister of Transport and with the early commitment made by his successor, the present Minister of Justice, whom I thank as well and to her parliamentary secretary for his own efforts and support of the work of the committee. I would like to see the law proclaimed as soon as possible. No law has been better understood in advance than this one and I hope that we will soon see the good effects of it when following consideration of it by the Senate.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise on the occasion of third reading of Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Divorce Act (barriers to religious remarriage), which I have the honour of tabling.

I would like to echo the comments that have been made about the fine work of my predecessor, the now Minister of Transport. I did have the pleasure of sitting on the cabinet committee to which this proposal came and was interested at that time to see the extent of the consultations which had taken place on the bill and more importantly, the extent of consensus, not only among Jewish leaders in Canada but among all religious leaders in Canada. This was a very important measure to bring forward.

I would like to say a few words for the record about the nature of the bill. The amendment to the Divorce Act, which is inherent in Bill C-61, would provide a court with discretionary power to preclude a spouse from obtaining relief or proceeding under the Divorce Act: first, where that spouse refuses to remove a barrier to religious remarriage; and second, where the power to remove the barrier to religious remarriage is within the control of that person.

The purpose of this bill is to assist Jewish citizens whose spouses are withholding a religious divorce, which is called a get, in order to obtain concessions in a civil divorce. The government did consult every other known religious group in Canada and satisfied itself that they would not be affected by this amendment.

[Translation]

During the past 15 years, the divorce rate in the Jewish community has reached the same level as in the rest of the population. Cases of abusing the get have increased at the same rate.

In 1987, the B'Nai Brith Association in Canada did a study of 311 cases that occurred during the four previous years.

According to the study, Jewish women were twice as likely to suffer negative repercussions, and those repercussions were worse than those to which men were exposed in the same situation.

[English]

A 1987 study conducted by B'nai B'rith Canada documented 311 cases within the previous four-year period. In the same study, as I said in French, women were found to be twice as likely to be the victims of discrimination and when victimized, they faced greater adverse consequences than men.

The consequences to women deprived of a get and loyal to their faith are severe. They may not remarry within their faith, even though civilly divorced. If they do remarry, children from a second civil marriage are considered illegitimate and restricted from practising their religion. Such consequences to a religious person leave them open to blackmail from the spouse withholding the get. For example, the spouse could say, "Give up your claim for support or custody of the children and I will offer the get." Even those not contemplating a second marriage find it uncomfortable to be considered married within their religion to someone they have divorced civilly.

The vast majority of adherents to the Jewish faith condemn as unfair this practice of bargaining with the get. Yet they are powerless to amend the situation. Persuasion by rabbis has often proved ineffective. Since the dispersion of the Jews there is no central Jewish authority to amend the Jewish legal code, the Halachahic, which governs the get. Nor is there any modern-day authority within rabbinical courts to enforce the offer and receipt of gets. Full support for Bill C-61 was expressed by major Jewish organizations who attended the hearings before the legislative committee. Representatives of the three Parties praised the bill and quickly passed two minor technical amendments.

The first amendment dealt with an inconsistency between the English and French versions.

The second amendment removed the word "exclusive" from the term "religious barriers within the exclusive control" of a person in order to more accurately reflect that the get procedure requires the co-operation of a three or five man rabbinical court.

Presidents of both major Jewish organizations, B'Nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Jewish Congress, spoke on behalf of the bill.

As well, the Toronto Board of Orthodox Rabbis and the Coalition of Women on the get endorsed the legislation and the two amendments.

All four organizations view Bill C-61 as an example of the government's commitment to multiculturalism.

[Translation]

Bill C-61 will enable Canada's Jewish community to preserve its traditions without destabilizing models of family life. It also ensures that the principles of the Divorce Act with respect to alimony and custody are applied equally to all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express appreciation to the other parties for their support and their desire to see the bill passed expeditiously. I believe there will be no delays to the proclamation of this bill.

This bill represents the finest traditions of Parliament in dealing with a sensitive situation in the very, very best interest of all Canadians. Since it is a Friday, I would like to say to all of those who will gain from the bill, Shabbot Shalom.

Mrs. Finestone: Mazel Tov, Madam Minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope that this will not be a precedent. The hon. minister should really speak on second reading or on the concurrence motion, because there is no place for a reply in regard to third reading.

I thought the minister rose on a point of order and an acknowledgement. I will allow the minister that this time, but it is not a precedent, please.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 12.37 the House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock pursuant to order made earlier this day.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF FORESTRY ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to an important international event that will take place this summer in Montreal, and I am referring to the 19th World Congress of the International Union of Forestry Organizations.

From August 5 to 11, scientists from 105 countries, representing nearly 700 affiliated organizations, will be meeting in Montreal. Since the 19th Congress will conclude IUFRO's first 100 years, this will be an opportunity for delegates to examine where forestry science is heading on the eve of IUFRO's next century.

The Congress will also be our chance to show others the abundance and variety of our forests as well as the technology that has made Canada one of the foremost countries in this field.

Canada is a full-fledged member of the world forestry community, and Canadians involved in forestry are very much aware of the need for international exchanges. The Canadian forestry industry, recognizing its responsibility for managing an invaluable resource, has therefore joined forces to organize this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, we extend a cordial welcome to all participants.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, May 6 to 12 marks this year's celebration of National Forest Week. The 1990 theme will be "Living Forest —Giving Forest ".

We are all becoming more conscious of the rich resources that we have at our disposal. At the present time approximately one million Canadian workers depend on the forest industry.

National Forest Week gives all Canadians a chance to reflect on how the forest touches our lives. Wouldn't it be great if in the next few months the Federal-provincial Resource Development Agreements were renewed. These agreements are essential to the viability of our forests if we are to achieve some of our environmental objectives as well as maintain forestry's economic contribution regionally and nationally.

[Translation]

All Canadians are environmentally conscious and want to help save the environment, including our forests. Forests have much to offer us, and it is therefore our duty to protect this resource.

WESTERN PREMIERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must know he is on a sinking ship when his political friends run for the lifeboats. When the four western premiers arrived in Portage la Prairie yesterday for their annual conference they made it very clear that they are together on at least one thing. None of them are very happy with the federal government these days.

Whatever the topic—the GST, farm aid, the cut in funding for health and post-secondary education, high interest rates or the failure to re-negotiate federal-provincial agreements on tourism, forestry or northern developments—the message is the same. The Conservatives in Ottawa are putting the screws to the west, and the west will not take it much longer.

Never mind that three of the four premiers are Conservatives themselves and the fourth is a closet Tory. Never mind that they all supported the Conservative platform in the last election. The federal Conservatives are now at a record low in the polls and it seems that these days the four western premiers cannot backpeddle fast enough to get away from their federal counterparts.

All the same, Mr. Speaker, I caution the voters in western Canada to remember that provincial Conservatives are Conservatives too, no matter what they complain about with regard to federal Conservatives. They are all the same, they do the same, they act the same, they just speak with different mouths.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, five years ago, the government proposed a plan for sound economic management and better management of government operations.

I rise in the House today to pay tribute to the work done by employees of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pronovost: At a time of budgetary restrictions when sound and efficient management is needed, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been able to meet the government's objectives.

Mr. Speaker, for the first time in ten years, the CMHC's mortgage insurance fund has succeeded in meeting its obligations without government assistance.

In 1989 alone, the CMHC deposited more than $62 million in the Treasury, in addition to providing Canadians with 627,000 housing units.

Mr. Speaker, in many respects the CMHC is indeed the efficient performer referred to by the Auditor General of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

FORESTRY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, forestry employs 8 per cent of all Canadians and generates over $40 billion annually. Forestry is the lifeblood of many single industry towns in our country.

Despite these facts, this government neglects Canada's chief industry. The 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber coupled with the strong Canadian dollar and high interest rates are crippling this industry in Canada and for small-town Canada. To date seven provincial forest agreements have been allowed to lapse.

• (1410)

But most important, the government fails to recognize that the key element to any environmental plan is our forests. In fact, its new framework for discussion on the environment devotes only one half page to the protection of forests in Canada.

As Dr. James Kayll, the renowned forester from Lakehead University in Thunder Bay says: "You can't discuss the environment without discussing trees and you can't discuss trees without discussing the environment". It is time we started to do both.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, restraint in government expenditures will reduce the burden on monetary policy in fighting inflation and create greater scope for lower interest rates and a lower dollar.

To date considerable progress has been made. Spending restraint has provided the largest share of our deficit reduction efforts. It has involved a number of necessary decisions, which are always difficult and sometimes unpopular.

We, as a government, must have continuing action to control expenditures. In our fiscal situation the government can ill afford examples to the contrary, such as the reported expenses at Ports Canada.

Indeed, we bear a responsibility to search out and eliminate wasteful spending, improve our efficiency and ensure the best value for the taxpayers' dollars.

Our government must continue to evaluate all government expenditures in this context. The end result is much-needed latitude for our monetary policy in curbing inflation.

Only at this time can Canadians, and in particular our exports, have the opportunity to benefit from lower interest rates and a lower Canadian dollar.

THE FISHERY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the spring lobster season is now one week old. Prices during the week were $1.75 for market lobsters and $1.25 for canner lobsters. These are the lowest season opening prices in years, but the fishermen's expenses have never stopped increasing.

People in the industry are not optimistic about the chances of the situation improving, mainly because of the large inventory currently being held by the processors. These prices are so low that many fishermen will actually lose money if they put to sea. This is the third consecutive poor season for the lobster fishermen of Prince Edward Island.

I realize that extensive new marketing schemes are being developed and that some have already been put in place, but these are plans which are expected to resolve the situation down the road. They will not solve the immediate problem.

I am asking the government to use the Fisheries Prices Support Board as an interim measure to establish prices which will allow fishermen to continue to fish in an economically viable situation.

This board is already in existence, so I ask the government to act quickly so that our fishermen will have a chance to salvage their season and the processors will continue to have a viable operation.

NATIONAL BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, since 1980, Quebecers have had the benefit of consumer protection legislation. When they use a credit card to make a payment, interest is calculated only on the balance payable. Unfortunately, it has come to our attention that the National Bank of Canada, which agreed to observe the legislation, has decided, as a result of pressure by other banks, to charge Quebec consumers $1.5 million more because it will be applying the same policy as the rest of the federally-chartered banks.

Today I want the federal government to order the National Bank of Canada, first of all, to appear before the Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Public Administration, to find out whether it is, in fact, proceeding in this matter; and second, to find out whether it would not be preferable for the federal government to monitor the way the chartered banks are calculating and charging interest.

MENTAL HEALTH WEEK

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, Canadians from all parts of the country took time during the recent national Mental Health Week to acknowledge the contribution of all those who serve in that field. I would like to endorse those statements, albeit belatedly.

Although these remarks have been prompted, at least in part, by the extremely thoughtful, attentive care which all members of the staff at Fairview Home in Brandon have been providing to a member of my own family who has been extremely ill for several weeks, I would like, as a member of Parliament, to express what I believe is our collective appreciation to the unknown legions of Canadians who provide health care, regardless of their area of specialization, each hour of each day of each week and who all too frequently receive little or no thanks for doing so.

Canada has perhaps the best health care system in the world thanks largely to the thousands of professional and dedicated people who serve the public so faithfully.

LATVIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 4, Latvia adopted a declaration to restore the republic's independence from the Soviet Union. The declaration states the Soviet annexation of 1940 as illegal, re-establishing portions of the 1922 constitution declaring Latvia an independent democratic republic.

The declaration also pledges an unspecified transition period to restore the republic's actual independence from the U.S.S.R., during which period it promises to abide by Soviet laws as long as those laws do not infringe on Latvian sovereignty.

All three Baltic states have now declared their independence. As a member of Parliament in a country that has never recognized the annexation of the Baltic states, it is my hope that this time it does not take as long for the two sides to come to the table.

Having just returned from the Soviet Union, it is also my hope that negotiations in peace and good faith will take precedence over economic sanctions. This is an opportunity, in the spirit of co-operation and confidence that is sweeping all of Europe, to rectify a situation that was a result of, at best, a dubious and questionable agreement.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FISHERIES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Today, after holding their breath for more than a year, the people of Atlantic Canada were finally given a package for the fishery that is totally inadequate, judging by the magnitude of the problem. Yet, on December 13, 1989, the Prime Minister said:

> —the Government of Canada will act in respect of the Atlantic fishery with exactly the same kind of generosity and enthusiasm that we brought to resolving the problems of the prairie farmer a few years ago.

Mr. Speaker, that was a billion dollar program for only one year. The government announced today a program of $587 million over five years and one-third of that, the government has already announced, is not even new money.

Why has the government not come forward with a truly meaningful program to maintain the fishing communities of Atlantic Canada until the fish stocks recover? Why will the government not recognize that we are dealing with a truly important, valuable and renewable resource?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada announced today, in addition to a significant contribution announced some months ago, the dedication of another $426 million to deal with the crisis that has been caused in Atlantic Canada by developments in the fishing industry, particularly with regard to northern cod but also with regard to other species.

It is designed to help ensure that people who make their livelihood in that industry, who contribute to the growth of Canada in that industry, will either be able to continue in that industry with the benefit of new research and the benefit of new projects being sponsored by this government, or will be able to make adjustments to other kinds of effective economic activity as effectively as possible.

It is a significant major step clearly comparable to the action that this Government of Canada took with regard to western farmers facing an earlier but different crisis.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just admitted that the government today has not announced the kind of program the Prime Minister spoke of when he talked about western farmers last December.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when the minister talks about making adjustments, he really means phasing out. In other words, whole communities will disappear, and families will have to give up their traditional way of life.

I want to ask the minister this: How many families will have to lose their livelihood? How many communities, so far prosperous, must turn into ghost towns until the government realizes that the fisheries are a durable industry that should be promoted and not closed down? How many more Scheffervilles is the government going to give us?

Some hon. members: Yes, how many?

cies or statements may contain, we can count on the Hon. Leader of the Opposition to say it just isn't enough.

• (1420)

[English]

The reality, Mr. Speaker, is very clear. What has been announced today is a major program designed to rebuild the fish stocks at a time when there is a significant environmental threat to the stocks that make viable our east coast fishing communities. It is a major contribution to programs that will allow the communities and the people involved in the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada to adjust constructively to these kinds of realities and, also, a significant new contribution to economic diversification in Atlantic Canada.

Earlier the Leader of the Opposition talked about the comparisons between western Canada and Atlantic Canada. He will know that there are over 165,000 farmers in western Canada. There are 60,000 fishermen in Atlantic Canada. What has been announced today is a new $426 million program to help Atlantic Canada. That amounts, in total, to $584 million being spent by the Government of Canada over this period to help ensure that we maintain a viable fishing industry and viable alternatives for people who have been working in that industry.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks of the need to rebuild the fish stocks, which problem he says is due to an environmental situation.

The Harris report identified foreign overfishing as a major contributor to the depletion of our fish stocks. Yet, all we see in the government's announcement today is that it will continue "intensive, diplomatic and political efforts" to try to resolve the problem.

This means that the Spanish and Portuguese will continue to pillage our stocks and the European community will continue to set quotas far above what these stocks can sustain.

If the government is serious about foreign overfishing, why did it not declare today Canadian jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks? Why did it not stand up for Canadians just once? Why did it not speak for Canadians when it had the chance to do so?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should not be driven by his new responsibilities to abandon the reputation for seriousness that he has won over the years in this House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): He knows far better than to make accusations of that kind.

Let me make a point about conservation. The Leader of the Opposition is suggesting by the tone of that question that the conservation issue is not an important issue in this debate. If, by chance, he is quoted in Europe with regard to those views which are at variance with the facts and at variance with the reports of the Harris committee and others, he will make it far more difficult for us to carry on a campaign that has already found some succès. This is a campaign to persuade the Europeans to respect the environmental reality, to respect the arguments of Canadians, and to begin to play closer attention to the North Atlantic Fishery Organization quotas that have been set and that they have been ignoring to the detriment of Canada.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister said here in the House that the government would act and announce generous wide-ranging programs for the problems we have in the Atlantic fisheries. But what the government announced this morning clearly contradicts the Prime Minister's words. Four hundred and twenty-six million dollars over five years for the Atlantic provinces comes to less than $21 million a year for each province. It is really making fun of us!

Can we then conclude, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister still believes that there is no crisis in the Atlantic fisheries and that everyone seems to be doing fine?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a crisis and there is an answer to this crisis in the Atlantic fishing industry.

Several weeks ago, we announced part of the answer and today some of my colleagues in the Government of Canada announced other measures and programs to help Canadians in this industry so that they can find other ways to earn their living and also to help establish a strong and lasting industry in the Atlantic region.

Of course, other things must be done. My colleague, the fisheries minister, has called a meeting of the fisheries ministers of the five eastern provinces for Friday. The provinces will also have opportunities to participate in the program to help an industry that is important for all of Canada.

Today we took another very big step to assure Canadians that the industry can continue to play a major role in Canada's future.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, they simply want to force us in the Atlantic Provinces to move out.

[English]

In the fisheries package announced this morning we see that $130 million is from existing UI and ACOA funds and that $28 million is to replace the tracker surveillance from Summerside.

Can the minister assure us that the remaining $400 million for all the Atlantic provinces over five years is new money and not money being recycled or reprofiled from existing programs? Is that new money?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a distinction that the hon. member has raised often in the House before and which means nothing at all to the people in Atlantic Canada who, prior to these announcements, were receiving no help and now, because of these announcements, will be receiving in excess of $500 million of help from the Government of Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The proposal this morning for Atlantic Canada talks of rebuilding the stocks in order to provide a more reliable economic base for the fishery.

The question is, for whom is this economic base being developed because, as we have already heard, there are people in many small communities who are going to be forced out of the business.

According to the government's own Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council: "The rebuilt industry—" referring to the fishing industry in the Atlantic, "—should not be dominated by the giants of the industry to the exclusion of the existing participants".

Is this adjustment package not doing just that? In fact, in the long term, is it not simply adjusting the small operators out of the business and saving the field for the larger operators?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is no. Unfortunately, the leader of the New Democratic Party has her own view as to the point she wants to make and she will not in this case, as in others, be dissuaded by the facts.

The facts are that this is a program designed to re-establish the strength of the Canadian fisheries industry, to re-establish our capacity to enlarge the stocks, or at least to understand more successfully the science relating to a very serious environmental problem that has industrial implications on the east coast of Canada. It is also designed to help individuals who are in the industry and communities that are in the industry, including small communities, look for alternatives that will allow them to maintain, in the fishing industry or in other industries in that region, the kind of viability that they and the people who work in them would like to have.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about economic diversification. However, he will have to acknowledge the fact that the people in the Atlantic region have already said that they want to see a system based on some kind of community allocation of the resource, not just enterprise allocation. Perhaps this government should listen to some of the experts in the field.

I would also like to raise a question with the minister about economic diversification. The same advisory council which I previously mentioned has said to the Minister of Employment, with regard to the regional development programs of this government, that "it appears that certain major negative effects will be experienced as a result of the following federal decisions". They included in that cut-backs to regional development funding and changes to the UI program.

How can the minister claim that economic diversification will work when the very policies of this government have crippled the region?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the very policies of this government have contributed—let me check my figures—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I confess, from time to time, to being overwhelmed by the volume of these figures.

This funding announced today, virtually an additional half a billion dollars going into Atlantic Canada, is in addition to the $2.125 billion the Government of Canada will spend through 1994–1995 on regional development in Atlantic Canada. That is a very significant investment in the economic future of that region. I am sure the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party would acknowledge that point.

It is also an investment designed to try to take account of certain realities that cannot be talked away and that have to be dealt with in Atlantic Canada. These are the realities that have to do with the jobs that are being exercised now by individual Canadians, that have to do with the problems of older Canadians who are in those industries and who need some help in adjustment, and the policies that will be designed to help some of the communities which cannot continue in a fishery where there are fewer and fewer fish and to help some of those industries make use of either other stocks or other attributes of Atlantic Canada.

We believe that there is a very strong and diverse future available to Atlantic Canada. We believe that we have a responsibility to face the facts about the threats and about the responses. That is what we are doing in this program. That is what we have been doing for the other programs this government has followed to help the development of Atlantic Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, earlier the minister spoke about conservation and I want to raise another question about the ability of the government to deal with that particular area and particularly the surveillance of our coast.

This morning, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was talking about the need to guard our coastline. Two years ago, his department admitted that the number of surveillance ships was not sufficient. Dr. Harris said the same in his report. How much money, in dollars and cents, is the minister going to spend on marine surveillance?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have already mentioned a number of programs to develop our capacity for airborne surveillance. That announcement has already been made. There have been further proposals, by Dr. Harris and others, for dealing with this part of the problem.

However, there is a point I would like to make, since the hon. member mentioned environmental issues. A question was asked earlier today about the reaction of European countries. We are now trying to convince the Europeans that there is a major environmental problem which affects both Europe and Canada. We hope to convince them that they must change the practices of their fisheries and start observing the standards set by the international organization. It is important that Canada speak with one voice on environmental issues concerning the Atlantic.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of a trade delegation from Argentina led by Dr. Eduardo Angeloz, Governor of the Province of Cordoba, and Dr. Adolfo Rodriguez Saa, Governor of the Province of San Luis.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

He will know that for 500 years the fisheries have been the soul and the life-blood of Newfoundland. Yet, in less than a half hour this morning at a news conference in St. John's, his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, effectively placed in jeopardy five centuries of traditional history, an entire way of life.

Has the government actually taken a decision that dozens of our fishing communities must be wiped off the face of the earth? Is that the hidden agenda behind today's announcement? If so, I say to him, it was not terribly well hidden.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is important that the differences between the parties in the House be understood.

The hon. member has said that the fishery in Atlantic Canada is in jeopardy. That is not our view. He has suggested that an industry that has been of crucial importance to Atlantic Canadians since well before they were Canadians is in jeopardy. That is not our view.

We believe that there is an industry that can be made viable in Atlantic Canada. We believe that some realities have to be faced and the government is on the path to facing those realities by working with the people in the fishing industry, by being prepared to put up hundreds of millions of dollars to help, by being prepared to take a look at ways in which we can help older Canadians working in that industry who do not have many other options look at options that they can pursue, and by helping those communities particularly affected by a problem not caused by any government—it is an environmental problem that has reduced fishstocks—and determining ways in which we can help them meet the future effectively.

Rhetoric will not do it. Misreading 500 years of history will not do it. But preparing Atlantic Canada to be able to deal effectively with the next 10 years and the next 100 years is what the government is doing and that is what needs to be done.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, that was a marvellous speech. But it was caused by the government allowing the foreign overfishing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, it will be in jeopardy as long as he continues to use the wrecking ball against the Atlantic fishery.

There are thousands of fixed gear fishermen along the southwest coast who have had serious disastrous catch failures triggering plant shutdowns and thousands of layoffs. The program today does not mention one solitary word about those people. There is no provision for them at all.

Was that omission an oversight and, if so, will he undertake to have it rectified immediately? Or, was it a deliberate act and part of the government's plans to ensure that these people will be driven out of their communities and put on the welfare rolls in Toronto? If that is what he is up to, he should tell us once and for all.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly tell the House and it is up to the member to decide whether it will be once and for all, or whether we will have to repeat it as we have before.

There is no program by the government to try to depopulate fishing communities in Atlantic Canada. On the contrary, what we are trying to do is to make it possible for those kinds of communities to find an economic future that will last well into the years to come.

The member raises a question as to other issues on the agenda. There certainly are other issues on the agenda, some of which we have to deal with, some of which have to be dealt with by provincial governments, and some by the industry and the people working in it.

My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, will be convening a meeting of the Atlantic Council of Fisheries Ministers on Friday. There will then be an opportunity, not only to look at other elements of the challenge that remain to be met, but also to begin to discuss how we can fill in the details and the funding of some of the proposals announced this morning and, importantly, Mr. Speaker, how we can ensure that provincial governments, which also have a responsibility for this matter, are able to play their full role.

Mr. Simmons: Why won't you talk to them? You walked away from the table.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This meeting of the council on Friday will continue a pattern of consultation which has been undertaken by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, on behalf of Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Five weeks have passed since the government announced its program to assist western farmers facing one of the worst financial crises in history, certainly at seeding time, and yet not one dollar of assistance has gone out to farmers.

Western prairie premiers are meeting today in Portage la Prairie and have formed a common front, demanding that the government provide assistance on its own. In view of the common front adopted by the Prairie premiers in demanding that the federal government act on this issue on its own, how and when can farmers expect financial help from the government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that the federal government has been there for some five weeks putting its money on the table. We have asked, in the spirit of co-operation and in the spirit of a shared responsibility, that the provinces become a party to the package of assistance that is being worked on.

I can only tell the hon. member that discussions are continuing with the respective agriculture ministers. I have had ongoing discussions with the Ministers of Agriculture for the Provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and, indeed, the Province of Alberta. We are now at the stage where we have looked at the inventory of the provincial programs which are eligible for cost-sharing and progress is being made.

I can also tell him that, in the case of Manitoba, for example, we are at the stage that for an $8 million contribution by the Province of Manitoba, the producers could have something in the area of $72 million distributed almost immediately. So, I ask them to get on board, share their portion of the responsibility, and stop copping-out.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, most of the responsibility is with the federal government and the minister knows that.

Every week, from the farmer's point of view, the news gets worse. The Farm Credit Corporation's interest rate goes up, the initial price of wheat goes down—almost by 20 per cent last week—and still there is no money going to the farmers. Canadian farmers are going to be receiving under initial payment almost one-third less than farmers in the United States.

When is the government going to stop jacking farmers around, stop blaming the provincial premiers, and make the payments to the farmers? Seeding is well under way, initial payments are down, and interest rates are up. When is the government going to make the payments?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are not jacking the farmers around. As a matter of fact, we are trying our utmost to ensure that the farmers get as much cash in their hands as soon as they possibly can.

The hon. member knows that the record of the government in terms of support for agriculture has been unprecedented.

Mr. Foster: Now, Don. When are you going to send out the cheques?

Mr. Mazankowski: In 1988-1989, for example, in Saskatchewan, the federal government put in $1.7 billion, compared to the Province of Saskatchewan putting in $176 million. That is ten times more than the province put in.

I can refer to Manitoba where in that same year $740 million was provided by the federal government. That is seven times more than that which was provided by the provincial government.

All we are saying, and I ask the hon. member to say with us, it is time that they paid their fair share. That is all we are asking them to do.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I think it is pretty clear to all Canadians that the government is destroying our basic resources, our farms, our fish, and our forests. During National Forestry Week, it is important that we reflect on the importance of those forests.

At the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association's annual meeting on February 2, the Prime Minister said, in reference to forest agreements, that their importance had not diminished around the Cabinet table and that the government was struggling to find funds for them. Indeed, it has been quite a struggle.

In light of the absence of the Minister of Forestry, I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment if he will give his support to those agreements, fund the required funding requested by the provinces, and ensure that the government does not treat our forests in the same manner by which it has destroyed the Atlantic fisheries.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer my colleague from British Columbia. He should be aware that the federal government has done a great deal for forestry. Since 1984, we increased funding by over 300 per cent; we renegotiated the agreements with some provinces, like New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the negotiations are going well now and that the Minister of Forestry is very conscious of the need to give forestry its fair share, since it is one of the most important sectors of the Canadian economy.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In his question, my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley referred to unrenewed forest agreements. As the minister knows, in western Canada these agreements are only part of 26 agreements worth $671 million that have expired since March 31, 1989, and have not been renewed. Valuable initiatives in forestry, tourism, northern development, infrastructure development and other areas are on hold and key personnel are being lost.

Therefore, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, when will the internal turf wars within the government between regional and sectoral ministries be resolved so that these initiatives can go forward?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that discussions are ongoing. We are very close to reaching conclusions with respect to the agreements to which the hon. member refers. I think I would be fair in saying that these announcements will be made very shortly.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the Minister of Agriculture. He said in response to the question about support for western farmers that he wants the provinces to pay their fair share.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that the province of Manitoba has already lost close to $100 million from federal government transfer payments? Is he aware that to meet the requirements of the federal cost-sharing plan, the province will have to double its agricultural budget over last year? Is he aware that over 30 per cent of Manitoba farms went up for auction over the past year, while this government is playing financial chicken with the provinces?

In other words, Mr. Speaker, is not the minister putting forward a formula that discriminates against smaller provinces that do not have the financial resources to meet that kind of formula? Will the minister not change the formula to give smaller provinces the chance to help their farmers because they need the help now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. With regard to the reduction in the rate of increase in transfer payments, we are applying the same discipline to the provinces as we are applying to ourselves in the federal government. We think that that is fair.

With regard to doubling the budget, Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the hon. member. There have been ongoing discussions with the minister of agriculture. They have some programs that would be eligible. What we are discussing are new programs that would help in overcoming the income deficiency for 1990. They have brought on a number of programs that will qualify.

I can assure the hon. member that we are within $8 million of coming up with a matching program. We are at the stage now that for $8 million provided by the province of Manitoba, the farmers would have $72 million in their hands. That money can be distributed in a program that would be designed by the provincial government in close co-operation with the federal government. We think it is fair. I think we are very close and hopefully we will be able to strike a deal very quickly.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to put this question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it not the height of quibbling to put in jeopardy the farms of hundreds of Manitobans for the sake of $8 million? Why does not the federal government simply change its formula rather than pressuring and forcing the smaller provinces to meet its criteria?

The Premier of Saskatchewan has already offered a new eight to one cost-sharing formula. Is it not time for this government to show some flexibility, tolerance and a sense of compromise by responding to the real plight of western farmers at this time? Will the minister not begin to show some compassion for western farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the generosity of this government towards farmers in comparison to the government of which he was a member, is as large as the difference between night and day.

We have provided close to $22 billion in income support to agriculture in the last five and a half years, almost $12 billion going to the western region.

The hon. member knows very well the difficult financial constraints the federal government is in. All we are asking is for the provinces to become a part of the solution.

There are programs that qualify. We said that we would be very flexible. We are being flexible. In fact, we have been able to negotiate with the province of Manitoba to the point where we can get as much money as we possibly can into the hands of the farmers. That is the bottom line. It is not a matter of quibbling over $8 million. It is a matter of getting the greatest amount of money in the hands of the farmers as quickly as we possibly can. That is our goal and that is our objective.

WOMEN'S PROGRAM

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and it concerns the temporary restoration of funding for the women's program.

Provinces such as Newfoundland and Nova Scotia will be in no position next year or in the foreseeable future to fund women's centres.

Will the minister undertake to maintain core funding in the women's program permanently and thus relieve the feelings of insecurity of those women depending upon those moneys?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government has agreed to provide transitional funding for a one-year period to ensure that the services provided by women's centres across this country can continue. Beyond that, we will be entering into a review process involving various federal government departments, provincial governments, the women's centres and I would hope other partners to develop new partnerships to ensure the ongoing work of women's centres to assist women throughout this country.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): It was a nice answer but it was not perhaps what I had asked. My supplementary is for the same minister, the Secretary of State.

The government did not restore research funds for the major women's groups.

Since these research groups are largely responsible for shedding light on the difficult situation of women in Canada, is the minister not prepared to go back on his decision and to restore these funds for research?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we must live with reality. The budget left us less than $1.6 million for our program. We must not go back. We are in very difficult times. In our program, we have certainly set up a transitional process that will help find other solutions and give a little time to do so. We will try to build partnerships with the provinces and the private sector. But as I said, our program has less money and we have managed the program with the means at our disposal.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Amnesty International, with many other Canadians, has urged the minister not to deport Mohamed Ahmet Said to Kenya today, as is scheduled, because two other rejected refugee claimants deported by Canada to Kenya in recent months were imprisoned, beaten, and interrogated about other Kenyans in Canada by the Kenyan government. Mr. Said has offered to pay his own passage to any other country than Kenya, if Canada will assist him to go there and settle in safety.

Will the minister assure this House that Said will not be deported to Kenya but will be allowed to make other arrangements.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his interest in this case, which I know is a very sensitive one. I have looked into the case, as have others, and I am not prepared at this point to provide the guarantee that the hon. member has asked for.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Said who, as the minister will know, has desperately resisted forcible removal, has also told the detention centre psychiatrist on the record, that he would rather die than return to Kenya.

He has also signed a statement, which I sent to the minister, saying that an immigration officer warned him that if he makes a noise during removal, and I quote, "the police and doctor will know what to do". He is evidently referring to a practice of administering drugs without consent to make deportation easier.

Will the minister confirm that it is the government's policy to administer drugs without consent to make deportation easier?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is another very sensitive issue that I know both the hon. member and myself have some interest in. It is a very difficult one. From time to time, a medical attendant is required when people are being deported. This is not simply a practice of our people. It is a practice that has to do with the safety of the person involved and the safety of other passengers.

We certainly expect any decisions to be taken with sensitivity and that they are taken as a result of what the medical attendant views as what is required.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which involves the Ministry of National Revenue. First, I would like to commend the government for its acknowledgement of the hardships experienced by the community of Summerside resulting from the closure of CFB Summerside and taking this opportunity to restore some economic balance to the community and to the region.

Given last Thursday's announcement that a GST data processing centre will be located in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, I would like to ask if a similar facility will be required in western Canada and, if so, will regional development factors be taken into consideration once this decision is made?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to point out that regional development factors are always taken into consideration in a decision making process of this nature.

The processing centre is only one very small element of the total GST package. That is the processing element. The administrative factor, which includes such things as service, compliance, assistance and information, both to the public and the business community, will be spread equitably across Canada in every region, province and territory.

Not only will Canadian consumers and businesses benefit as a result of the change from the very bad federal sales tax, which is now going to be replaced with a much fairer GST, value added form of a tax, but all regions, provinces and territories will benefit equally.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who chaired a special cabinet committee on the east coast fisheries.

Since the needs of the Atlantic Canadian lobster fishermen were not addressed in the fisheries package, will the minister specify whether or not there will be a separate support package for the lobster fishermen?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. member knows, that question is under active consideration by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who will be in the House tomorrow and the rest of the week.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Given that the fishermen will lose $30 million this year alone because of the American size restrictions and that the Prime Minister failed to keep his promise that he would protect the lobster fishermen, can the minister assure us that there will be meaningful and adequate assistance for the lobster fishermen in the Atlantic regions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with great respect, I think I responded to that question. The member added a new element to it when he talked about an undertaking by the Prime Minister. I take it that was the undertaking by the Prime Minister to raise the question of lobster size with the President of the United States.

The Prime Minister raised that question. We then followed with other trade actions. It was not a trade action that we won. There has been a preliminary decision that is causing concern throughout the industry.

I know the hon. member would not want to leave upon the record the false impression that unfortunately his question left that the Prime Minister had undertaken to do something which he had not done. The Prime Minister gave an undertaking and acted on.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is again for the Minister of Energy. Last week, the minister told this House that he would discuss Petro-Canada's dealings with the dictatorship of Myanmar, commonly known as Burma, with his colleagues.

Has the minister had an opportunity for this discussion, and does he have any decision to report to the House?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the position of Petro-Canada in Myanmar would be looked at. There was a review done by the officials of Petro-Canada. Mr. Folkes, who spoke on behalf of Petro-Canada, indicated that Petro-Canada was going to remain in Myanmar and fulfil the contract terms that they had signed.

Mr. Speaker: A single question from the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns Environment Canada's wimpish record in the province of Ontario. Last year, not a single prosecution against polluters was pursued in Ontario. The government has now allowed new transport of dangerous goods across the Detroit River, starting today, despite objections from every single Canadian municipality affected.

• (1500)

I want to ask the Minister of the Environment why this government has refused to act against Ontario polluters and why it has rejected public environmental assessment hearings on this Windsor barge which threatens so many people in my community.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to a report in today's newspaper about this question. The report mentioned that not more than one charge had been laid against the polluter involved with dioxins being discharged in the water.

The hon. member should know that there exists no regulations to control dioxins and furans. These toxins have been discovered quite recently. We are acting very quickly. The new regulations will be in force next month to virtually eliminate dioxins and furans from Canada.

As far as the fishery is concerned enforcement of regulations in Ontario is the responsibility of the provincial government, so the hon. member should put this question to the provincial government.

Mr. Speaker: I express my apologies to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who had a supplemental question.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the same question.

Because of the seriousness of the human rights violations in Myanmar, a Special Committee of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights has chosen to examine this country through a confidential procedure. Considering the seriousness under which the United Nations views the abuses, and given what the minister of energy just told us, what is the position of Canada on this UN procedure?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position of Canada on UN procedures with respect to human rights has been to co-operate with them fully, even when they had to do with investigations into Canadian practices.

I would expect that we would participate fully in any UN investigation of the situation in Myanmar which, as my colleague and I have indicated in the House on earlier occasions, concerns Canada very much. It concerns Canada not simply with regard to the specific matter he has raised here respecting the commercial activities of a Canadian company but also the practice of that government of jailing the Leader of the Opposition and of making it virtually impossible for persons from outside to come in to observe the so-called election.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

POINT OF ORDER

MINISTER'S STATEMENT—NATIONAL FORESTRY WEEK

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, concerning Ministers' Statements on Friday last the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, our deputy House leader, asked the government House leader whether we would have a ministerial statement from the Minister of Forestry in light of the importance of National Forestry Week.

I was not in the House on Friday. I have checked the record but I stand to be corrected. I am wondering, given the importance of forestry to the country and it being National Forestry Week, if we can expect a statement from the minister on National Forestry Week.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated on Friday, you can expect the minister to be in touch with the person who originally raised the matter when the minister is back in Ottawa. He is away on government business at the moment.

COMPETITION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-299, an act to amend the Competition Act (class action).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for class actions. This would allow consumers to get together to bring a class action where they have received a collective injustice in the market-place.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-300, an act to amend the Criminal Code (obscenity).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, subsequent to my statement in the House on February 8, I would like to introduce a private member's bill which amends the Criminal Code with regard to obscene mailings.

Late last year three Canadian forces bases in Ontario were the target of a catalogue mailing from a lingerie company. The catalogue was unwrapped and contained pictures that bordered on being pornographic. People on these bases were outraged and offended by this mailing.

This private member's bill introduces amendments that would render the practice of delivering unsolicited visually obscene materials through the mail illegal.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I think this petition on the forest resource development agreement between British Columbia and Canada is appropriate. I know Your Honour understands the importance of it. I wish the Minister of Forestry who has made five commitments to sign this agreement would get on with the job and help replant our forests.

This agreement is critical to the province of British Columbia and the other provinces which have forest agreements that have expired.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present petitions signed by thousands of Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax. I am submitting today over 3,000 petitions from Canadians who are angered at the callous indifference of this government to hear their plea to reverse such a regressive tax.

These Canadians are also calling on taxpayers to join them Saturday, May 12, at noon on Parliament Hill to show that Canadians everywhere are strongly opposed to the goods and services tax.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour and duty to present a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

It contains the signatures of members of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario Incorporated who say in this petition that the Government of Canada has introduced charges that will reduce home keeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care.

Whereas our veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targetted by these measures, they call upon Parliament, therefore, to reject those budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

• (1510)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

While looking at the tulip beds on the weekend I went around and talked to people asking if they would be interested in signing the petition against the GST. Everyone that I approached wanted to sign the petition, and some actually wanted to take copies home with them and get their family and friends to sign it.

This points out that obviously a lot of people oppose the GST and they have listed their names here.

I have another petition to present from Kamloops where the petitioners are curious that the government is taxing reading. I think it makes us the only country in the world that will tax reading by imposing the GST on reading material. They are obviously opposing this initiative by the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my privilege to present several hundred signatures from Canadians across this country. Your petitioners ask the government to withdraw the goods and services tax because it is a regressive tax that will increase inflation, cause interest rates to rise and have a negative impact on all Canadians. They therefore call upon Parliament and this government to withdraw a measure that is totally regressive and unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 today to present petitions signed by Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitions have been circulated by citizens who are calling on taxpayers to join them at the rally on Parliament Hill on Saturday, May 12, at noon, to show that Canadians are opposed to the government's goods and services tax.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition, signed by Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax, calling on Parliament to reject the tax.

These petitions have been circulated by citizens who are calling on taxpayers to join them at a rally on Parliament Hill on Saturday, May 12, at noon, to show the government that Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of veterans in the constituency of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. It asks Parliament to reject those measures in the budget which reduce home keeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care for veterans.

The petition goes on to say our veterans have already given great service to this country and should not be targeted by these cruel measures.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to deposit for the government's attention hundreds of petitioners who have written and urged this government to go back to the drawing-board with reference to the GST. Not only is it going to hurt average Canadians and their families coast to coast. It is also going to prove to be a hardship for the small business sector across this country.

We urge all Canadians, once again on May 12, at noon in front of Parliament Hill, to come and demonstrate some solidarity so that finally this government can listen and hear the voices and messages coming from average day Canadians right across this country.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table pursuant to Standing Order 36 a petition signed by thousands of Canadians living in and around the community of Halfmoon Bay, British Columbia. These Canadians are upset with the Canada Post decision to shut down their post office.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to instruct the government not to shut down the post office at Halfmoon Bay, British Columbia.

I would like to thank Gordon Wilson, leader of the Liberal Party of British Columbia, for circulating this petition which was so successful in obtaining so many names.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition signed by 430 people from the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who petition Parliament and call upon the government not to proceed with the GST, the grief and suffering tax.

These people also want to join all of us this Saturday, May 12, on Parliament Hill at noon, to oppose the goods and services tax. I would like to call upon all Canadians to join them in protesting this unfair measure on May 12, at noon, right here on Parliament Hill.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add yet another approximately 3,000 names of individuals in the national capital region who have signed petitions asking the government to rethink, reconsider and withdraw its regressive goods and services tax.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the beat goes on, and I would like once again, enthusiastically, to rise and present petitions signed by a total of 4,263 people—mostly in Edmonton and area—against the goods and services tax.

The people of Edmonton are just going to keep signing these petitions, and I am just going to keep presenting them in this House until the government withdraws that tax.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a total of close to 3,000 signatures of people from the constituency of Essex—Windsor, all protesting against the goods and services tax.

These constituents see this tax, very clearly, as a tax which will strongly hurt their communities, and unfairly discriminate against many people such as themselves.

I have a second petition, which is signed by approximately 300 people.

This petition points specifically to the GST being levied on skating expenses. The petitioners are especially concerned about the significant financial burden on the families of young athletes, which will be the consequence of this.

Mr. Speaker, I know you would be especially interested in seeing a petition such as this presented to the House of Commons.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by people from several communities in Quebec, Ontario and Saskatchewan.

The petitioners call on the government to show some respect for aboriginal peoples, the traditional use of their lands and for Canada to seek new initiatives for peace through common security.

In order to give some substance to this, the petitioners are calling on the government to end all NATO and NORAD low-level flights in Canada. In particular, they oppose the establishment of a tactical fighter and weapons training centre in Goose Bay, Labrador.

Instead, the petitioners are asking that these funds be directed toward enabling Canada's aboriginal people to regain control of their lands and livelihood, and by promoting sustainable development.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Edmonton indicated just a moment ago, the beat goes on with the goods and services tax.

I would like, also, to stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present yet another petition against the government's goods and services tax legislation.

These petitioners have asked the government to withdraw this legislation and to come up with some reasonable tax alternatives and reasonable tax reform.

I might add that this is the 312th petition that I have presented, representing a total of almost 15,000 voters in my constituency, which is about 28 per cent of the registered voters in Okanagan—Shuswap. I think you can see from that, Mr. Speaker, that people in the interior region of British Columbia feel very strongly against this GST, and are asking the government to please withdraw the legislation.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to rise today to present a petition signed by Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax.

I think it is time for the government to start listening to Canadians as it relates to legislation that is not acceptable to them, and to not listen to the rhetoric of the Prime Minister who suggests that, no matter whether he is at 15 or 20 per cent, come election time he will be back to form a majority government.

Soon petitions will be presented in the House that say that if the government does not listen, it will stay at the rate it is at now and that it will not be climbing any higher.

Also, these petitioners would like me to inform the House that there will be a rally on Parliament Hill on May 12 at noon to again suggest to the government how much they hate this particular tax, and to ask the government to rescind it.

• (1520)

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition from a number of constituents with reference to the GST, whose battle is not over yet.

These petitioners are concerned, as I am, about the GST taxing a number of things including haircuts, coffins, diapers and so on. They are especially concerned about the tax on reading material, which would make us the first country in the western world to do that.

They have proposed an alternative to the GST; which is fair tax reform, an effective tax on wealthy individuals and corporations so that they pay their fair share. They want the government not to shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through this regressive consumption tax, but to have thorough and real tax reform. I would like to table this petition.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition to this House, signed by a number of residents of Vancouver Quadra.

I note that the persons who signed this petition did so at the behest of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who knows of the strong objections that these constituents have taken to the clawback provisions proposed to the old age pensions in Canada. These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject any legislation that would impose such a clawback.

I know that the legislation has passed this House, but it sits in the other place. Perhaps we will have the privilege of debating it again, if they follow the wishes of these constituents and reject it, as I am sure is urged by the members of the New Democratic Party.

I should add that these constituents are pleased to have a member in this House who will stand up and assert their rights, when so many of the members of Parliament from the province of British Columbia are on the government side and have voted for this pernicious legislation.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Cooper: If Question No. 230 could be made an an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 230 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House proceeded to consideration of the Senate amendments to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to initiate the response from the government to the second message from the other place respecting Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

I must begin by noting that once again,—a bill to provide new unemployment insurance benefits and to provide additional resources for training—a bill which meets the real needs of Canadian workers—has been needlessly delayed.

[English]

The benefits and the imperative to meet the needs of workers in Canada have been lost in the storm of rhetoric which has surrounded this bill. Many of our critics seem to believe that nothing in the world has changed, and that our training and unemployment insurance policies need not change either. Perhaps worse still is that the critics, both in this House and outside, are prepared to accept the argument of the unelected Liberal senators that the Senate has used, and ought to use, a power to change the spending priorities of an elected government.

Even those who, as a matter of principle, have traditionally opposed the exercise of power by an unelected Senate, have now given precedence to expediency because it suits their immediate purposes. We believe that the use of that power by the Senate is unconscionable on moral and democratic grounds, and that it is unacceptable on policy grounds.

If we in this Chamber, not just the government, but all of us, accept the message from the Senate, the situation of working Canadian women and men will deteriorate, and the powers of the House of Commons will be eroded for partisan, political and manipulative purposes. This Chamber, and all of us in it representing our constituents, have the opportunity to rise above such narrow and misguided thinking. It has the chance to help Canadian workers and their employers face the challenges of a world market-place as we head toward another century.

It is my intention today to draw the attention of members to the issues, and what is really at the heart of this government's bill. Members of this House must understand that continued inaction poses a very real threat to Canadian workers from coast to coast. Members of this House must continue to oppose the short-sighted and opportunistic stance taken by the opponents of this bill.

[Translation]

After outlining the benefits that will come from Bill C-21, I will then respond, in detail, to the message from the Senate.

First, however, I feel compelled to comment on the constitutional situation which faces all of us.

Let me remind hon. members that the Hon. Speaker advised that only we in this House can break the impasse over this issue.

This House, and this House alone, can define its rights and privileges and this House and this House alone can defend itself against the actions of those unelected persons in the other place.

This House must defend its historic right to initiate and direct the financial policy of the elected government. This is not simply a theoretical exercise, but a defence of one of the key principles of responsible government. The battle for this right was won generations ago and we must protect its integrity.

The budgetary power is not one that governments take lightly. It is one for which we are accountable to the Canadian people, as is every government which receives its authority from the ballot box.

[English]

Those in the other place do not have the same form of accountability and this House cannot let them take that authority from us. This government is simply not prepared to abandon its responsibilities by acceding to the demands of a group of Liberal senators who are caught in some historical time warp. This is not a time for anachronism, it is a time for action.

Let me remind members of the point raised in the ruling of the Hon. Speaker last Thursday, when he cited experts in the field.

> The Senate has— accepted as binding on itself the proposition that it should not unduly disturb what has come to be called "the balance of ways and means" or, as Hopkins says, "that it would be inadmissible to tamper with the overall financial program submitted by the government in its budgetary proposals in such a way as to effect a material change in the budgetary surplus or deficit".

[English]

Yet, that is precisely what they wish to do with this bill.

Liberal senators claim that they have public support for their actions and their threats. We understand better than most that some people and groups do not support some elements in this bill. Thoughtful analysts all recognize that there is a very real difference between expressing concern about this legislation and supporting unelected Senators as they attack the rights of the elected Chamber. That understanding has been echoed in editorials and columns in newspapers all across this country as recently as this weekend. We have something from The Ottawa Citizen, The Toronto Star, The Gazette in Montreal. We have another column in The Toronto Star and we have something from The Financial Post. This is just in the last few days, Mr. Speaker. We have all these over the last few months.

That is the kind of thoughtful analysis around this kind of issue that is important to all of us on all sides of the House, and they have all called on the Senate to recognize that it is not playing its legitimate role in what it is doing in this debate. There is a large body of well-informed opinion that understands, even if some Liberals in the Senate do not, that what that Chamber claims it can do has no relationship to what it should do.

Perhaps most important, and perhaps what it should not do the most, is to presume to tell this House how many dollars to spend. Dollars, let me remind everyone, that come from the taxpayers who elected us in this Chamber. This House adopted the budget of April 27, 1989, and Bill C-21 is an integral part of that decision. With this message the Liberals in the Senate want us to increase those expenditures under that budget by about $1.75 billion a year.

On what basis, what authority? My colleagues say we cannot afford it. Also, on what basis and what authority can they make this claim? I ask that particularly of the members of the NDP to answer today. As the hon. speaker noted in Britain in the Mother of Parliaments, the Upper House ceded its right to reject or amend money bills like C-21 in 1911. Mr. Speaker, that is even before you and I were born.

Unfortunately we have yet to see such a concession to responsible and representative government in this country—at least officially. However, if one reviews the record of the other place and the decisions during periods of Liberal governments in the past half century, one finds a striking respect for the British tradition.

Our government has a mandate to act and Bill C-21 flows directly from that mandate. This bill is part of our commitment specifically to provide Canadians with the best training and adjustment programs possible and more generally with our policies for economic renewal.

Canadians understand that. While Liberal Senators appeal to special interest groups to make hollow claims about the support of Canadians for their anti-democratic actions, we know differently.

[English]

Recent public opinion polls have shown that a strong majority of Canadians support the idea of using UI funds to train unemployed people so that they can find and keep better jobs. Last year, for example, a Decima poll and a study by Environics each found that about two-thirds of Canadians supported our plans to shift UI funds to job training programs. A more recent Decima poll confirmed that degree of support.

Canadians want to know that the UI system is being used properly and effectively. Bill C-21 offers proper and effective uses and it builds on our experience with employment programs.

When this government took office in 1984, we looked at the range of programs and services in place to train workers and to support the economic development of communities across this country.

We saw that the old style of job creation and training programs simply did not reflect the needs of a changing economy. Obviously, programs which did not reflect genuine economic needs could not meet the needs of workers who looked to the government for assistance.

Our government recognized this problem and it acted. The result was the Canadian Jobs Strategy, which has been a successful response to the requirement for a modern workforce.

CJS has broken the "makework" stigma of previous programs. It has resulted in success stories all across this country—because those programs reflected real requirements for training and upgrading workers.

CJS marked the creation of a partnership between the private and public sectors to meet labour market challenges.

Still, with experience, it became clear that more could be done and more had to be done.

[English]

Something that we concern ourselves about is that worker productivity is one of the basic criteria for competitiveness in the world economy today. I think we would all agree on that in this Chamber. For that reason, it should concern all members of this House that the productivity of Canadian workers has grown much more slowly than that of workers in Japan, Germany and the United Kingdom.

When we recognize that investment in training is a key to increased productivity, we must ask how Canada fares. The sorry fact is that Canadian employers lag behind those in other countries when it comes to training their employees. We have had discussions on what comes from Statistics Canada as to which peoples and numbers are more accurate, the private sector's or ours, but however it is measured, the important point is that Canada is low. That is simply in today's world unacceptable.

The Canadian labour markets needs an active labour market policy, not a passive one, that assists the private sector, workers and employers, to respond to the increasing pace of change in the labour force created by the global economy. An active labour market policy draws on all tools to help workers and employers to adapt to changing situations.

On April 11, 1989, I announced plans for just such a policy, the Labour Force Development Strategy. Bill C-21 will give that policy life.

I would like to bring members up-to-date on some of the steps which have been taken so far with the LFDS, and to underline the important work which remains to be done, work which cannot take place until C-21 has been passed.

The Labour Force Development Strategy is made up of a variety of components which build on our experience with training Canadian workers.

• (1540)

The success of CJS partnerships provided a foundation for more significant changes in labour market policy. These changes will assist the Canadian private sector in developing a training culture—an approach which places a real value on improving the skills which workers bring to their jobs.

Members should recognize that this partnership is at the core of LFDS, but until C-21 has been passed by both Houses, we can only take tentative steps.

Some have already been taken. To ensure the success of LFDS, I wanted advice not only from officials but from the people who depend most on the success of our employment policies. I wanted to hear what business and labour had to say, in concrete terms, about labour market needs.

To that end, we sponsored a series of task forces under the auspices of the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre. They have recently completed reviews of many areas of labour market policies, programs and services. They have provided me with valuable advice. But until this bill passes, it can only stay advice. In fact, if the Liberals in the Senate carry out their threats to defeat this bill, then the entire exercise will have been a waste, not just of time and energy, but a waste of the futures of many working Canadians.

[English]

Here is the report to which I am referring, full of good recommendations for Canadian workers. We urgently need to implement new programs for Canadian workers. We also need to expand existing programs which have proven their value.

First, we must do more in Canada in the area of human resource planning. Employers used to be able to count on an increasing stream of young workers who could learn simple jobs quickly and who, year after year, came out of school into the labour force. Those days are over. Occupations now require more skills and more training and at the same time the number of young people entering the work force is declining. Employers no longer have the luxury of that broad choice of young people.

Effective human resource planning is a partial answer to those programs. Employers and workers need to know what skills are going to be required and how to prepare themselves accordingly. Our labour force development strategy will provide funding to encourage such planning.

We have already had success with groups in industries such as automotive repair and services, electrical and electronic manufacturing, in helping them to identify the skills that are needed in years to come and to take action to meet those needs. Passage of Bill C-21 will allow us to expand those efforts greatly.

Human resource planning also allows us to address another important issue, something I would think that the NDP also would be particularly interested in, and that is employment equity. Aboriginals, women, disabled Canadians, new Canadians and older workers have been shut out of many skilled jobs. That is wrong from the standpoint of fairness and it is also wrong for Canada economically. Human resource planning, making business and the workplace part of the solution can address this problem and it will ensure that all Canadians have a chance for the good jobs of tomorrow. However, the financial resources which we need to carry out this work are inadequate for the task as long as C-21 remains in limbo.

Another aspect of labour force development would be improvements to entry level training. Increased qualifications for jobs have meant that too many of our young people lack the skills to meet even the most basic requirements of employers today.

Some months ago I announced the Stay-in-School program that will encourage young people to finish their high school education. The LFDS will ensure that students have the basic skills needed to help enter a more complicated job market. For instance, LFDS will allow the government to quadruple its support for co-op education. That has proven to be a valuable program for youth.

We will work with the provinces and territories to improve programs like apprenticeship. Again, those programs need funds and, again, we need Bill C-21 to provide those funds.

[Translation]

Third, many members will be aware of the work of Employment and Immigration's Industrial Adjustment Service. Staff from IAS work with employers and workers facing major changes such as large-scale expansions or layoffs.

Through LFDS, we have proposed to double the funds available to this service.

[English]

The fourth item, one that is of particular interest to members on all sides of the House in all regions of Canada, is Community Futures. It is one of our most productive tools to assist small and rural communities. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is one of the most productive tools of any government in the history of Canada. Experience proves that the best economic plans are those that are developed by the people in a community, wherever it may be, and members on all sides of the House have strongly supported and lauded the Community Futures Program. Bill C-21 would provide an additional $50 million for this program for over 200 communities.

I see people in the Chamber today who are looking for assistance for their communities, who have benefited from this program in the past, and, under Bill C-21, who will benefit from it in the future.

In addition to improvements in existing programs, we propose to do much more through the Labour Force Development Strategy to help those who are unemployed. The Unemployment Insurance Program has been in place in Canada for 50 years. But it is no longer enough today just to provide cash to the unemployed. We have to do more. We have to offer these people a way out of unemployment. We have to offer them a better future, more secure and more stable.

So what are we going to do? First, an additional 60,000 people could receive training, in addition to their UI benefits, if Bill C-21 passes. We intend to devote $350 million—are you listening over there?—

An hon. member: Yes.

Mrs. McDougall: —to this training effort. That is $350 million to meet a demand that is evident across the country. Unemployed people have told us through our labour market surveys that they know themselves that they cannot get jobs because they do not have the skills and that they want those skills.

Second, many more Canadians would be able to start their own businesses through the use of UI funds, or to move to areas where jobs are more plentiful. That does not necessarily mean across the country, but maybe within their own region or province. We have proposed to set aside $45 million for those programs. We cannot act until this bill passes.

On another front, one of the most exciting developments that the government has introduced in job training has been the joint federal-provincial efforts to help social assistance recipients escape from the welfare trap. In towns and cities all across Canada, thousands of men and women have received the help they asked for to learn the skills necessary to improve their lives and the lives of their families in the future by getting themselves out of that welfare system.

The LFDS would allocate an additional $50 million to this program for some of the poorest people in our country. With matching contributions from the Canada Assistance Plan, from the provinces and territories, a total of 200 million new dollars could be right there, ready to go into action on behalf of these people. That money could be at work now if we had moved on this bill. It is not at work now and every day of delay impedes the abilities of Canadians in the most difficult circumstances, to build better lives for themselves and their loved ones.

Older workers represent a special case. Most members have been approached by constituents who have lost jobs that they had held for many years. Older workers can face a difficult time finding new jobs for many reasons.

LFDS contains measures which would help these people in addition to the other retraining programs. One hundred million dollars would be available—$100 million—if C-21 were implemented. We could be implementing these programs today. We are not. And every day that we are held back, is another day in which unemployed people are left to live with a situation we all know is unsatisfactory.

[English]

Members will be well aware that much of our training activity is done in co-operation with other levels of government. Community colleges and training councils across the country have the expertise so necessary for these programs. In the past, we have developed individual agreements with provinces and territories which respect the interests and the contributions of both parties.

In January, we embarked on negotiations for a new generation of training agreements that will represent what the provinces themselves have accurately described as a new partnership. There is general agreement that the prospects for this partnership are excellent.

However, in the absence of Bill C-21, the resources that we bring to this task will be severely limited. That is why the provinces are anxiously awaiting this bill, so that we can get on with that job.

Since our debate today is a result of the action of Liberal senators, it is worth taking a moment to review what we have agreed to previously. I understand the role of the other place, as we all do. When the Senate sent its first message to the House, the government found some issues to which it was prepared to agree. We agreed to affirm explicitly that basic skills and literacy training could be funded. We felt that that was implicit but agreed to put that in for greater clarity.

We agreed to provide greater detail in the annual developmental uses plan which would show how the government intended to use the money provided under the UI Act, and we agreed that any proposed repeal of the system of UI benefits for self-employed fishermen would require parliamentary approval. We agreed.

Despite our sincere attempts to accommodate the concerns expressed, the Liberals in the Senate have simply chosen, virtually to reiterate all of their original demands.

Recommendations 2(a), (b) and (c) in the message would eliminate the government's ability to pay for some types of help to workers from the UI account.

In the bill, this House agreed that it was reasonable to call on the UI fund for certain types of payments—ones which were an investment in people's futures.

We agreed that the cost of training course, the cost of relocating people to areas where their chances of finding work are better, allowing workers to use UI benefits to fund self-employment or for earnings supplements were all appropriate measures.

The Liberals in the Senate disagree. They prefer to see the deficit rise to pay for these improvements.

[English]

As a responsible government, we cannot allow that to happen. We believe it is better to use UI funds for this sort of active assistance to help people stay off UI permanently.

It is not only this government that believes in innovative uses. Let me quote the Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Wells. When we proposed this change, Mr. Wells said: "I must say that I think it indicates that the federal government is going in the right direction—and that is just what I have been asking for."

Members in the House should reflect on Mr. Wells' other comments in which he saw this use of UI as a springboard for economic development. He said: "That is the kind of thing we will be using, what will otherwise be paid out as unemployment insurance to provide meaningful long-term employment."

I do not very often agree with Premier Wells, but I agree with him on this. I would think that people of the same political persuasion might take a look at this. I hope that Premier Wells' province and others will find ways to work with people who want to take advantage of the opportunities that Bill C-21 will provide. But first, we need this bill to become law.

We continue to oppose Recommendations 3(a) and (b). The latter is a minor wording change related to Recommendation 2. The other recommendation, 3(a), seeks to impose a new level of bureaucracy on the process of helping people to take advantage of the new opportunities that Bill C-21 will offer. By creating a complex appeal system on an issue that really does not lend itself to adjudication, precious time and money will be lost.

This recommendation also would prevent the government from designing the special programs needed to help the unemployed which is what this bill is all about. Let me give you an example.

A skilled worker is laid off from the factory where he or she has worked for many years. That worker has never been unemployed before and wants to go back to work. He or she has thought about the possibility of starting a business. The way the law is written right now, if the worker does that, he or she will be cut off from unemployment insurance because the act says that people have to be available for work. Clearly, self-employed people are not available to seek work from other people.

I do not think that my hypothetical worker should have to go through that. I think my worker should have that choice. The government thinks that that is only fair, and we want to have the ability to write special rules for cases like this. If the House accepts Recommendation 3(a), there will be no special rules to help these workers. Bill C-21 will give us that ability.

• (1600)

Recommendations 4 (c) and 4 (d) deal with issues on which we have made some concessions to the Senate during our last debate on this subject. We have agreed to provide greater detail in the annual developmental uses plan.

[English]

However, we cannot accept the degree of detail that the Liberal Senators have demanded. We cannot take a plan that is intended to be responsive and flexible to changing economic needs and force it into a kind of straitjacket that has been fastened by the people in the other place.

Let me explain that a developmental plan is just that. It is a plan that would be developed months before the fiscal year begins and while one could project probable expenditures by a province, it would be nearly impossible to try and estimate how much would be spent in each town or each economic region.

What the Liberals in the Senate want us to say is: "We're sorry, we would really like to help you, but when we developed our plan last year we did not really know that your main employer was going to require skill training to double his work force or was going to move his plant". That would be the impact of that recommendation.

Under our proposal we would have the ability to move funds to the areas where the needs are the greatest during the fiscal year. That is simply good management.

To do what the Liberals want is to force people and communities to fit our programs. We want programs to fit people. Further, we could never give those same Senators the veto over the developmental uses plan that they demand. They point out that there are precedents for Senate veto and they promised to use it judicially. I think that members in this House can only reflect on our current debate to question that promise.

With recommendations 5(a) and 5(b) we come to the question of people who quit their jobs without cause and who expect the UI system to support them. More than $1 billion goes to these people annually. Right now they face a disqualification period of between one and six weeks. We are proposing to increase that to seven to 12 weeks and to restrict the amount of benefits they would get when they do become eligible.

We recognize that certain conditions can force people to quit jobs and that is why in the original bill we talked about "without just cause" because the assumption was that there is of course just cause. However, at report stage I accepted the comments made by many witnesses before the legislative committee regarding the need to identify and strengthen what those causes may be and those who quit for reasons such as, for example, sexual harassment, something to which we are very sensitive.

Once again, that had been our intent and we did it for greater clarity. It will protect claimants who had no reasonable choice but to quit. They will not have to serve a disqualification period.

Claimants who do quit jobs without just cause may find another one before the disqualification has been completely served. In those cases, we have proposed to carry over the unserved part of the disqualification to the next claim that the person makes. If the claimant works for 20 weeks we waive the penalty. But if not, we would propose to carry it over for up to six years.

The Senate had asked us in recommendation 5(b) to reduce this to two years and we agreed to this recommendation. We did not agree to it in the previous message because it will have some impact on our ability to fund the Labour Force Development Strategy. I would remind members that every dollar we take off the one side is not available for the other side. But we do recognize the value of compromise and we are committed to some very fundamental principles, but we are not intransigent. For that reason we are going to accept this recommendation.

However, I would like to underscore for this Chamber that in virtually every other country people who quit their job voluntarily never have access to unemployment insurance. We are one of the very few countries that does that at all, for cause or not for cause.

Recommendation six would inhibit our ability to form effective partnerships with other groups interested in training.

In the Labour Force Development Strategy we envision contracts with outside groups to provide training or other services. These are legitimate costs to program administration, as if they were being carried out in Canada Employment Centres. And we believe they should be treated in a similar manner to other administrative costs. Liberal senators think not. They would rather cut the money available for developmental uses by forcing these costs into that budget.

Every dollar for administration is a dollar not spent on training. For that reason, members will understand why this recommendation cannot be accepted by this House.

Recommendation seven is one which attempts to overturn the right of the elected House to set a budget and to act on it.

In recognition of current fiscal realities, we have decided that the federal government cannot continue to contribute to the UI account. We have determined that the people who benefit, whether they are workers who can count on support from UI when they become unemployed—remember it is employed people who pay the premiums—or employers who know that UI can help them keep good workers, can and must pay for the system which provides those benefits.

The Liberals in the other place have said that they do not agree. They believe that spending an additional $1.75 billion a year from general revenues makes sense. They believe that pushing up the deficit to pay for these benefits also makes sense.

It is exactly that kind of financial thinking that got this country into the mess we are trying to clean up. We cannot accept that kind of short-sighted thinking. I would remind them as well that in a way we are talking about the same pocket. Who pays taxes? Businesses and people who are working pay taxes. Who pays premiums for unemployment insurance? Businesses, employers who pay the higher proportion and workers who are employed. We are talking about the same pocket. We are talking about the same people. That is something that this government understands. There is only one taxpayer out there and he or she pays either way. By doing it this way we do not add to the deficit.

This government was elected in 1984 and again in 1988 largely because Canadians understood which party could be counted on to manage effectively.

I do not have to dwell on the strides this government has made in controlling the growth of public expenditures to bring the deficit in line. However, I should point out to hon. members opposite that they should tell their colleagues in the other place that recommendations like these can only weaken Canada's economy by driving up government spending, or driving up the deficit.

We cannot accept the demand that we spend more, nor can we accept what is a veiled claim to power. As you yourself, Mr. Speaker, stated in your eloquent ruling:

> There are many Canadians—who have no idea whatsoever of the awesome powers which the Senate claims to itself over the elected lower House.

You also noted that the House for many years had defended its rightful role against these claims. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did just that in 1917 and we must do the same today. Some Liberal senators have said the same thing. I quote Senator MacEachen speaking on a borrowing bill in 1985: "I think if we did amend the bill in any serious way, or if we defeated it, I think that would be quite arrogant". Let me quote Senator Frith: "There may be 100 reasons why we should not in the Senate yield to the House and only one reason why we should, and if that one reason is that the Commons is elected and the Senate is not, then that is reason enough to yield". That is what we are talking about here today.

Let me go on to Recommendation eight, which deals with benefits for fishermen. Because of our continued concern about the viability of the fishing industry, our government has taken action on a number of fronts, as we have seen even today. Yet we still see Liberal Senators and other groups spread fear among people for blatantly partisan ends.

Let me state again what I have stated before. Fishermen will not see their benefits disappear. In the interests of conciliation however—and I am a conciliatory person, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you and many others would acknowledge— we have decided to respond to the Senate's continued concerns about the regulations which govern benefits for self-employed fishermen.

The government is determined to respond constructively to the needs of fishermen, and I say that in all seriousness. We recognize that UI plays an important role in the economies of their communities.

For these reasons, we will amend the bill to ensure that the House of Commons has a full opportunity to review and debate any changes to regulations on fishermen's benefits.

For reasons noted earlier, I cannot, in all good conscience, extend the power to review these regulations to the Senate.

Elected members, and remember that is what we have been talking about today, who are directly accountable for their actions to the people of Canada, are the people who should take those important decisions.

Those who owe their office to appointment, capable as they may be, and I would certainly recognize that there are many capable people in the other place, do not have the same accountability and they cannot be given the same powers.

With Recommendation nine, we return to the fiscal issue that I raised while discussing Recommendation seven. Whether Liberal Senators choose to accept it or not, the fact of the matter is that this government has had to make hard decisions regarding where best to use very limited funds.

Previous Liberal governments, including the one in which Senator MacEachen was Minister of Finance, shrank from those decisions when they had an opportunity to act responsibly.

What was the result? It was a veritable mountain of debt. Yet they lecture this House on fiscal responsibility. We do not find that acceptable. Also, we believe that the cost to UI premium payers for fishing benefits are so small, amounting to a little over 2 cents of every UI dollar, so let us keep this in perspective. Those benefits do not place an unreasonable burden on the UI account.

In summary, for all of the reasons I outlined, we cannot accept the bulk of the message which was sent to us by the other place, although we are sending back some agreement with some of the things that they have suggested in a conciliatory mode.

Too many of the recommendations are based on the notion that the unelected Chamber can order the elected Chamber to make expenditures that the country cannot afford. We have rejected that view consistently in the past and we must reject it now.

Too many other recommendations seek to give the Senate powers it does not warrant in a democratic system of government. Having reviewed the contents of the message from the Senate and remembering the many valuable and necessary initiatives that are contained in the Labour Force Development Strategy, what course of action should the House follow?

Virtually everyone who has commented on this bill has supported the need for more training and more support for a training culture in Canadian business among Canadian workers.

They have been less forthcoming on how these initiatives should be financed. Even this report, which comes up with many recommendations that we are finding very useful, does not come up with an alternative way of financing the system that is going to be acceptable to Canadians. Virtually everyone who has commented on this bill is in the same position.

We believe that modifications to the UI system are an appropriate vehicle for this process. As I pointed out, both workers and employers will benefit from the LFDS, and through unemployment insurance we are asking them to pay for the benefits to which they are entitled. We think those should be good benefits.

As well, we have proposed some changes to the existing range of UI benefits. These will require claimants to work somewhat longer in many areas of the country to be eligible. The duration of benefits will be reduced slightly. Penalties for people who quit their jobs without good reason will be increased.

We have designed these changes with great sensitivity to regional differences. The greatest impact will be in places like Toronto and southern Ontario where unemployment remains low. We have been very careful to minimize the effects of these changes in regions where seasonal employment and historic structural problems have resulted in higher levels of unemployment. On the benefit side, that is where many of the benefits will fall.

Despite the exaggerated claims made by many critics of this bill, I firmly believe that the impact of these changes will be very modest. Certainly, compared with changes made in the late 1970s, they are not onerous. However they will be sufficient to generate the funds necessary for the progress that the LFDS will generate.

It is not sufficient merely to favour training. One must have a clear sense of how to pay for it in a way that is not administratively difficult or too costly. While there have been many suggestions, there has been no consensus on an alternative to the one we have proposed.

There is no time to waste in implementing the LFDS. Each day we continue with this discussion is a day in which our competitors on this continent, in Europe, and in Asia surpass us in their abilities to compete.

The real needs of Canadian working men and women will not be addressed by pretending that nothing has changed and that the same old policies must be maintained, that they are written on some kind of stone tablet. The real needs of the Canadian labour force will not be addressed by pretending that the public sector and the private sector have different agendas.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this government introduced Bill C-21 to allow it to make some modest, but needed, changes in its unemployment insurance program and to initiate some major improvements in the development of Canada's labour force. C-21 recognizes that in a world of change, success will go to those countries which adapt best.

[English]

The government is determined that Canada will succeed in that new world. This government is equally determined that the Senate is not going to stand in the way of that success. And this government is determined to protect the rights and privileges of members of this Chamber not just on this side of the House but on that side of the House, all the way down both sides. To make the policy and program decisions that this country needs is what we intend to do.

• (1620)

Therefore, I move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint to Their Honours that this House agrees with amendment 5(b) made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, but continues to disagree with amendments 2(a), (b), and (c), 3(a) and (b), 5(a), 6, 7, and 9, because this House believes that they contradict the principles of the bill and undermine the objectives of the policy;

And that this House considers that some of the aforementioned amendments, by altering the nature of the financial scheme proposed for the Unemployment Insurance system, do infringe the financial initiative of the Crown in a manner at variance with parliamentary practice respecting the Royal Recommendation as it is recognized in citation 596 of Beauchesne's sixth edition, and citation 540 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition;

And considers, moreover, amendments 7 and 9, which would cause an increase to the budgetary deficit in the order of $1.75 billion annually and thus confound the balance of Ways and Means as approved by this House, to be for that reason in violation of the principle embodied in Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and constitutional practice,

And, therefore, conscious in this of fellowship with its predecessors, reaffirms its sole and undoubted democratic right, which will not in this matter be waived, not only to grant aids and supplies to the Sovereign but to direct, limit and appoint for all such grants their ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications, none of which are alterable by the Senate;

[Translation]

And that this House agrees with the principles set out in parts of amendments 4(c), (d) and 8, but would propose the following amendments:

Amendment 4(c) be amended to read as follows:

"Add, immediately after line 6 on page 16, the following:

(2.1) In the estimates of the expenditures referred to in subparagraphs 2(a) (i) and (ii), the plan shall include the estimated expenditures to be made in each province."

Amendment 4(d) be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out line 18 on page 16 and substitute the following:

day.

[English]

(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the plan for 1990 shall be laid before Parliament not later than three months after the coming into force of this section."

Amendment 8 be amended to read as follows:

"Strike out lines 1 and 2 on page 33 and substitute the following:

53. Subsections 130(3) and (4) of the said act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(3) The minister shall table any regulation made under subsection (1) in the House of Commons with three sitting days after the day on which it is made.

[Translation]

(4) A regulation referred to in subsection (3) shall come into force on the tenth sitting day after the day on which it is tabled, or on any later day that is specified in the regulation, unless a motion to revoke it, signed by not fewer than thirty members of the House of Commons, is filed with the Speaker of the House of Commons before the tenth sitting day.

(5) Where a motion to revoke a regulation is filed with the Speaker of the House of Commons pursuant to subsection (4), it shall be taken up and considered by the House of Commons within five sitting days after the day on which it is filed.

[English]

(6) A motion taken up and considered in accordance with subsection (5) shall be taken up after the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, for a period not exceeding four hours and at the end of the debate the Speaker of the House of Commons shall, forthwith, without further debate or amendment, put every question necessary for the disposition of the motion.

(7) Where a motion to revoke a regulation is adopted, the regulation is revoked and where the motion is defeated, the regulation shall come into force on the day after the day on which the motion is defeated or on any later day that is specified in the regulation.

(8) Where Parliament is prorogued or dissolved before a motion to revoke a regulation is disposed of or, if no such motion has been filed, before the end of the period referred to in subsection (4), the regulation is deemed to be revoked.

(9) For the purpose of this section, 'sitting day' means a day on which the House of Commons is sitting."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, once again we are debating Bill C-21, this Conservative government's bill to cut back massively on our unemployment insurance program by $1.3 billion at a time when we still have over one million unemployed in this country and at a time when the Minister of Finance in his recent budget has predicted an unemployment rate of 8.5 per cent in this year.

The government is proposing these cuts at this particular time when we have such a large number of unemployed. The government intends to implement these cuts of $1.3 billion in our unemployment insurance program by first of all making it more difficult for Canadians to qualify for unemployment insurance by requiring a longer period of work in order to be eligible for unemployment insurance. By doing that, of course fewer will qualify and the government will save money.

Second, in this bill the government is shortening the benefit period which will be available to unemployed Canadians under the unemployment insurance program. By doing that the government will save money once again.

Third, the government is withdrawing its contribution to the unemployment insurance fund which last year was $2.5 billion. I should point out that since the very beginning of unemployment insurance the unemployment insurance fund has been financed from three sources. It has been financed by workers who, when they are employed, pay a certain percentage each month to the unemployment insurance fund. It is financed, as well, by employers who pay a certain percentage each month to the fund, but it has also been financed by the government.

As I pointed out, in the last fiscal year the contribution was $2.5 billion, and in this bill the government is terminating that contribution to the fund. This means that from now on, if this bill passes, the fund must be totally supported by workers and employers.

Fourth, the government is cutting back on the program by increasing the penalties for people who voluntarily quit their employment, without, in my opinion and in the opinion of many Canadians, adequately considering the reasons for those voluntary quits.

As the minister points out, the government has bent a bit, has made a few amendments to recognize voluntary quits for sexual harassment and so on, but they do not go far enough and the penalty that the government has in place in still too high. As a result of this bill 155,000 Canadians will totally lose their unemployment insurance benefits, that is 155,000 who would have qualified under the present law will lose under this law, and 775,000 will partially lose their benefits.

The impact on our provinces will be severe. For example, according to the impact study of the Canadian Labour Congress—and the government has not presented an impact study to challenge the Canadian Labour Congress study—as a result of this bill Newfoundland will lose $51 million. In other words, $51 million a year that would go into that province will not now go in because of this bill. Prince Edward Island will lose $32 million. Nova Scotia will lose $29 million. New Brunswick will lose $148 million; Quebec, $224 million, and it goes on.

As you can see, those provinces with the highest rates of unemployment will be hit very hard and will lose a lot of money that otherwise would have helped maintain industry, individuals and families in those provinces.

What will be the result of these cutbacks? Through this bill the government is going to make it more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance. The government is going to shorten the benefit period.

This will mean that there will be people without work who will not have the benefit of unemployment insurance. What will happen to them? Are we going to allow these people to starve? Are we going to force them to soup kitchens? Are we going to force them on bread lines? No, that is not our way.

As a result of this bill and these cutbacks, these people who are unemployed but who will not have unemployment insurance will be forced onto the welfare rolls. Who pays for welfare? In most provinces it is the provincial government. In some provinces, like Ontario and Nova Scotia, I believe, it is the provinces and the municipalities. Somebody will have to take care of these unemployed people but the federal government is shifting the burden from the unemployment insurance system to the welfare system where there are means tests, where the amount of support is lower, and where the province has to pick up the tab.

It is true that provincial welfare systems are financed to approximately 50 per cent by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan, but still, that is a cutback by the federal government with respect to assistance for the unemployed.

Many municipalities that appeared before the parliamentary committee pointed out that their welfare bills, as well as the welfare bills of the provinces, will increase considerably if this bill passes because there will be a larger number of unemployed Canadians who will have to live without the help of unemployment insurance.

The minister admits, although she tries to hide it in her rhetoric—and I just listened to her speech—that the government is cutting $1.3 billion from the unemployment insurance fund. She tries to justify this bill by saying that $800 million of those moneys will be redirected to training.

The minister goes on at great length to argue how important training is. She is wasting her breath on us. We agree that training is important. Training is extremely important. We believe in putting large sums of money into training, but we believe in putting it into training as it was always done in this country, and that is out of general tax revenues, not out of the unemployment insurance fund.

The minister and the government members attempt to pretend that we must make a choice in this country between unemployment insurance and training. In other words, if you want to have training, you must cut back on unemployment insurance. If you want higher unemployment insurance, you will have less training. I just heard her a few minutes ago saying that if this bill is not passed, there will not be this kind of training or that kind of training.

That is a false dilemma. That is not the choice that should be put to Canadians. We have always had in this country a strong program of training, but we have also continued to improve our unemployment insurance program.

The government's commitment to training now, with this Bill C-21, is a phoney commitment, and I will demonstrate that. In 1984, when the Conservatives took over the government of this country, the federal training bill was $2.2 billion. Between 1984 and 1989 the government cut that training program by 32 per cent from $2.2 billion to $1.5 billion. It cut training programs by $700 million. This is a government that today would have us believe that training is a most wonderful thing and that it has always been committed to it. That is a phoney position of the government. The only reason it is now trying to put money into training is that it set up this de Grandpré commission to investigate how the government and the country was to deal with the threat of U.S.—Canada free trade on our Canadian workers. In that report Mr. de Grandpré and his commissioners, in several recommendations, said that more money had to be put into training, otherwise jobs would leave Canada and go to the United States, that industries would shift from Canada to the United States.

So all of a sudden the government said: "Gosh, we have done the wrong thing for the last five years. We have been cutting training by 32 per cent, from $2.2 billion to $1.7 billion, by $700 million, and now we have to find money to put more money back into training". The highest priority of this government is not people, but the deficit. It said: "What will we do?" It looked around and found that the only place it could find the money for that was to take it out of the unemployment insurance fund. In other words, the government decided that in order to pay for training it had to reduce the money available to unemployed Canadians, money they need when they are out of work to pay for their groceries, their rent and to send their children school and so on. The government took that money, from a source that was never touched, to use as a principal means of paying for training. That is why we are opposed to the bill and why many Canadians are opposed to the bill.

When the minister stands up in this House and argues passionately for training, that is a phoney and false argument. None of us are opposed to training. What we are opposed to is taking money out of a fund that is supposed to support people when they are unemployed.

I mentioned previously that the government is also cutting its contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. I said that last year that contribution was $2.5 billion. The minister and other members of the government have alleged that the principal purpose of this bill is to shift money into training, by taking those moneys that were paid in premiums by workers and employers and putting them into a fund for training. Why should training only be paid for by workers and employers? On what principle should only workers and employers pay for training that is very much required if we are to have a modern, progressive economy?

We have never said that education should only be paid for by parents and by students. If we were to say that, that would be using a similar argument to that which the government is using. We say that education should be paid for by all taxpayers because education benefits everybody. Education not only benefits the student who studies and the parents who have children in school, it benefits everybody including parents who have no children, and corporations. By that same principle, training should be paid for by everybody out of general tax revenue and not out of a fund that was contributed to by workers and employers for unemployment insurance benefits.

The unemployment insurance program was established in 1940 following the Great Depression of the 1930s. It was established because it was found to be essential that when the economy went into a slow period there be a means of keeping workers and their families financially soluble so that they could pay for the essentials of life. As I said previously, the purpose of the fund was to make sure that unemployed workers would be able to pay for their food, rent, clothing, transportation to work, their children's schooling and the other essentials of life.

That is what the program has been since the 1940s. In the Great Depression of the 1930s, when we did not have unemployment insurance, workers who were unemployed had to rely on bread lines, soup kitchens and charity. It was thought that never again should we have to rely on that system but that we should have a progressive, substantial and sound unemployment insurance system. Since 1940 we have been improving the system, except now we have a government that is cutting it back.

The government says that this bill is essential because we must develop a better system of training, that we must put more money into training. None of the groups in the country that oppose this bill would oppose more money for training. They all say, as we say, that the money for training should come out of general revenue.

Let me put forward another argument which demonstrates how bad this bill is and why it is wrong to take the money away from unemployed workers to pay for training. In the hearings that we had before the House of Commons parliamentary committee on this bill it was pointed out to us time and again that many of the workers who are unemployed are already trained. They are skilled machinists, skilled electricians, accountants. In other words, they have many skills. The reason for their unemployment is not that they do not have skill, the reasons for their unemployment is that there are no jobs in the place where they live.

Mr. Kempling: You are silly.

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member over there is saying it is silly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kempling: I said you are silly.

Mr. Allmand: That is typical of the attitude of Tories in this country. They would have us believe that all the unemployed in this country have no skills and are not trained and that the solution to their unemployment is simply to give them training and they will have a job. That is total nonsense and anybody who knows this country knows that to be true.

We visited every province of this country and example after example was given to us of the fact that Canada has many resource-based towns. We have many towns and cities that rely on the mining industry, the forest industry, on fishing and farming. When that particular industry goes down, the whole community goes down, and the people who go down in that community for the most part are not untrained. Many of them have very high skills.

The government is suggesting that if we trained all the people in a mining town where there is unemployment, those people will find jobs. That is nonsense, unless they all move away from that community and go to Toronto, Vancouver or Calgary, and even then it is questionable whether they will find jobs. The fact of the matter is that the solution to unemployment in many cases is not more training. Even where the solution is more training, it also requires jobs.

Let us take the example of Canso, Nova Scotia, or Summerside, Prince Edward Island. If we simply retrained the people in those communities and paid no attention to putting jobs into those communities, what good would this new training be to those workers? I suppose the suggestion of Tories would be, again, to move to upper Canada or move away from your own town, your own city, your own province. That is wrong and Canadian after Canadian said it is wrong. That is the message they have been trying to give this government. They are saying that training is a good thing but we should not take the money for training out of the unemployment insurance fund and, in addition, training is not the solution to unemployment. The solution to unemployment is jobs because many of the people who are unemployed already are trained and even those who are not trained should not be forced to move to another community in order to get a job.

I have referred to this example before but I think it is important to repeat it over and over again. When the House of Commons committee on this bill went to Sudbury, Ontario, it was pointed out to us that in 1982 when we had a recession in this country and, as well, the nickel prices went down considerably, 10,000 people lost their jobs in Sudbury.

Mr. Kempling: Due to a Liberal government.

Mr. Allmand: The member over there says: "Due to a Liberal Government". Mr. Speaker, that is the depth of knowledge of Conservatives. They do not realize that nickel prices are set on a world-wide basis and only to a very small extent are determined here in this country. That demonstrates why the Conservatives are at 15 per cent in the polls. They keep on making those stupid, silly comments. The more they make those stupid, silly comments, the more they go down in the polls. I encourage the member for Burlington to keep it up because if he keeps it up we will keep going up in the polls and they will keep going down.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, in Sudbury 10,000 people were laid off in 1982 due to a drop in nickel prices but because we had a solid, substantial unemployment insurance system those people were able to take care of their families, pay their rent and keep their homes during that period of time. When nickel prices went up again, also under a Liberal government, the town was restored to its economic base and many of those people were taken back on their jobs. The unemployment insurance had sustained the community during that period of time, a community which, for the most part, relies on the mining industry.

One could repeat that example in many other parts of this country, whether the community relies on the automobile industry, the forest industry, the fishing industry, the oil industry or whatever it may be. When the prices go down you have a lot of lay-offs and a lot of hardship, but unemployment insurance sees those people through that hard period.

I was also amused today at how the government and the minister, in this case, says that this bill is necessary because we must take care of the deficit and the way we must take care of the deficit is by paying for training out of the unemployment insurance program. I have to remind the government and the House that the unemployment insurance fund was not in a deficit when the government introduced this bill. As a matter of fact, in 1988, the year before the government introduced this bill, the unemployment insurance fund had a surplus of $2.8 billion.

It is true that the total government funds were in deficit, the country was in deficit, but the unemployment insurance fund had a surplus of $2.8 billion. Of course, that is the reason why the government decided to pay for training out of the unemployment insurance fund. It saw a fund with a surplus and decided to take the surplus away from the unemployed and use it to pay for training. That was a very good objective but the wrong method of carrying it out.

The minister spoke a lot about the role of the Senate. In referring to the amendments proposed by the Senate she said: "We cannot accept the views of an unelected body". In saying that she suggests that the amendments put forward by the Senate were in some way conceived on the floor of the Senate. That is not true. The Senate held quite extensive hearings on this bill and the amendments that it put forward are to a great extent based on the views of those who appeared before it at those hearings. In other words, the amendments put forward by the Senate to this bill are amendments which have broad support in this country. They are not amendments that simply reflect the views of the unelected Senators. In this case, the unelected Senators are better expressing the views and public opinion in this country than is the government.

I must point out that in the hearings that were held by the House of Commons legislative committee on this bill, 157 of the 202 groups appearing before the House of Commons committee opposed this bill. That is an extremely high percentage of groups opposing the bill. The same thing happened in the Senate.

The minister this afternoon tried to give the impression that the premier of Newfoundland favoured this bill. I have not checked with the premier of Newfoundland. It may be that he favours more money for training, but I doubt very much if he favours paying for training out of unemployment insurance moneys. I was with the committee when it was in Newfoundland and not one witness group in Newfoundland supported this bill. I believe it was the same with the Senate. I believe it was the same with the Senate. I can assure this House and the minister that Newfoundlanders do not support this bill.

In referring to the Senate and the fact that senators are not elected, and to who really represents the people in this country, I have to repeat again that during the election of 1988 this proposal to cut back on unemployment insurance was not part of the Conservative party platform.

As a matter of fact, when the Minister for International Trade was asked in Newfoundland whether there would be any cuts to the unemployment insurance program, he said absolutely not. He went on to say that he spoke to the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister assured him that there would be no changes or cuts to the unemployment insurance program.

Here we have a government which pretends to speak for the Canadian people but a government which did not get a mandate from the Canadian people to make cuts in the unemployment insurance program. One must recall that the government party, the Conservative party at that, only got 48 per cent of the votes of the Canadian people. The two opposition parties combined got 52 per cent of the vote.

I hate repeating this, but since the election the support for the government has declined week after week. As a matter of fact, if it keeps at it, it will be into a negative position very soon. It has dropped from 48 per cent to 15 or 16 per cent in the recent polls.

On the weekend the Prime Minister admitted that it is not over. He is right on there. One of the few times I have agreed with the Prime Minister is when he said that this drop in the polls will continue. It will continue as long as the government insists on putting before Parliament this kind of legislation for which it has no mandate.

If the Senate is so bad in its present form, as the minister and the government members pretend, then why has the government not taken steps to reform it? In the last Parliament, in 1985 or 1986, the Conservative Minister of Justice was quite angry with the Senate and he put a bill before the House to reform the Senate. But that bill sat on the Order Paper and was never moved ahead and when the session ended, the bill died. Instead of reforming the Senate, every time there was a vacancy the government appointed senators, their favourite people.

Some hon. members: You are wrong. You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Allmand: I am absolutely wrong, they say. I could name a whole list. That is such a ridiculous comment it is not even worth answering.

It is true that the government has not yet filled all the vacancies, but after presenting the bill it did in the last Parliament and not proceeding with that bill, it went on to appoint Conservatives to the Senate. It has not filled all the vacancies, but it did not do one thing to reform the Senate which it now says is so bad.

I have heard some of the Conservative members in their speeches saying that these cut-backs in unemployment insurance are necessary because unemployment insurance is an incentive to laziness, that if you have an unemployment insurance system that really helps the unemployed to pay for their groceries and rent, there will be a tendency for these workers to quit their jobs or not to look for work and to just loaf around all the time.

I have to remind our Conservative friends that we have the same unemployment insurance system right across this country, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, in Ontario and in Prince Edward Island. It is the same program. Yet we have a 4.5 per cent unemployment rate in southern Ontario and a 17 per cent unemployment rate in Newfoundland. Are these Conservatives saying that unemployment insurance is an incentive to laziness in Newfoundland but not in Ontario? Is it an incentive to laziness in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, but not in Calgary or Vancouver?

If unemployment insurance was an incentive to laziness, it would be an incentive to laziness everywhere. That is a nonsense argument. The answer to that is that some of the most progressive countries with social programs in the world have sound, substantial, unemployment insurance programs. West Germany, Japan, Scandinavian countries, France, and Great Britain all have strong unemployment insurance programs and many of them have very low unemployment rates.

Unemployment insurance is not the cause of unemployment. It is not an incentive to unemployment. People want to work. I referred to Newfoundland where the unemployment rate is around 17 per cent and the real rate is much higher than that. Many people are forced to leave that province to seek work in other provinces because they want to work so much.

I already referred to this, but we have to remind ourselves over and over again that the economy of Canada is strongly based on resources and seasonal industries. When you have an economy based on resources and seasonal industries, no matter how much you want to work there will be times when you will be unemployed because of world prices for those resources or simply because it is winter.

We had an argument in Prince Edward Island as to whether the fact that a large percentage of the Prince Edward Island economy was based on the tourism industry had anything to do with unemployment in the winter. Well, anybody with any sense would know that there are fewer jobs in Prince Edward Island in the winter than there are in the summer because of the fact that the tourism industry has to close down to a certain extent. It is true that they are trying to get conventions to the island and they are trying to replace the summer tourism with other things, but nevertheless seasonal conditions have a great impact on unemployment in this country.

Although the government has condemned the Senate in this debate, I think we have to be thankful to the Senate because by its persistence the government has finally accepted some of its amendments. If the Senate had not taken the steps that it did, we would not have had the two amendments the government accepted the last time, one having to do with training people who have problems with illiteracy. This time the government has accepted three more amendments.

That is not nearly good enough, but it points to the fact that the sober second thought of the Senate has either forced or convinced the government that certain changes were necessary, and not only were they necessary but they were worth-while amendments. I repeat again that these amendments which the Senate presented were not ones they conceived in their own minds on the floor of the Senate, but were amendments which had been sent to them and suggested to them from all over the country by a large number of groups. As a matter of fact, many of them were similar to amendments we put forward in this Chamber but which were defeated by the large majority of Conservatives on the other side.

In responding to the government's arguments with respect to the Senate, the government keeps alleging that the Senate blocked this bill or that the Senate turned back this bill. The Senate did no such thing. The Senate could have, because there is a Liberal majority, defeated this bill. It did not do that. It did not defeat the bill and it did not delay the bill. As soon as it received the bill and received the message from the House of Commons, it dealt with it immediately in both cases. It had public hearings, it considered the bill. The Senate did not defeat it but made amendments to the bill; amendments which, as I said, were based on wide ranging public opinion in this country, and it sent the bill back. So it did not obstruct or defeat or turn down the bill, but simply attempted to improve the bill.

We in the opposition are willing to support the Senate's amendments, but only as a minimum. We do not think the Senate amendments go far enough. As a matter of fact, our preference was that this bill be totally withdrawn by the government and sent back to the drawing board and that it come up with something much better and much more beneficial for Canadian unemployed.

In the last Parliament the government appointed the Forget Royal Commission to study the unemployment insurance system, a commission that cost $18 million. The commission sat for more than a year and presented a report with recommendations. The government did nothing with those recommendations. These changes in Bill C-21 do not reflect the suggestions made by Mr. Forget and his commission. This is not to say that we the Liberal opposition agreed with all of Mr. Forget's proposals. We did not. The fact of the matter is that the government did not accept any of his suggestions either and Bill C-21 is contrary, as a matter of fact, to many of the recommendations made by the Forget Commission.

Furthermore, in the last Parliament, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration studied the Forget Commission report and the unemployment insurance system and we made 71 recommendations for improvement and change in the unemployment insurance system. It was a unanimous report on all but two recommendations. It was a unanimous report on 68 recommendations by a committee with a Conservative majority and the government has not implemented any of those recommendations or suggestions. It ignored a royal commission that it set up, it ignored a House of Commons committee where it had the majority of members, and it is proceeding with a bill which is opposed by social, religious, and trade union groups all over the country.

The purpose of this bill is not to help the unemployed or to reform the unemployment insurance system. The real purpose of this bill is to help the government deal with its deficit and also to harmonize its social programs with the United States as result of the free trade agreement.

In the United States, where unemployment insurance is a state matter, a state responsibility, the total amount spent on unemployment insurance is $13 billion. That is the same amount that is spent in Canada.

It is very significant that many of the changes that the government has in this bill are similar to provisions contained in the the American unemployment insurance laws. One has to admit that there are some states which have a fairly sound and substantial unemployment insurance system, but there are other states where it is a scandal for a modern, progressive country, where unemployed people must still rely on relief and charity.

The purpose of this bill is not to help the unemployed. It is not to reform the unemployment insurance system. It is not really to deal with training because, if the government really believed in training, it would not have cut the training program by 32 per cent between 1984 and 1988. The real purpose is to deal with the deficit and to harmonize our social programs with those of the United States.

In conclusion, we are willing to support, as a minimum, the amendments suggested by the Senate, but we really do not think that is the solution to the problem of the unemployed in this country. The solution is, of course, training, but it is also jobs, economic development, regional development and a better and more substantial unemployment insurance system because, no matter what, when people are without work they have to pay for the essentials of life.

This afternoon I have tried to deal with some of what I consider to be ridiculous nonsense arguments put forward by the minister. I did not deal with the questions of procedure or constitutionality with respect to the Senate. Our House Leader will deal with those arguments in due course.

I urge the government to listen to the people of this country. At the present time, the views of the people of this country are being expressed through the Senate and, I say, thank God for the Senate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the many points made by my hon. friend who has just spoken. He raised some very good points.

In general, we have to be very cautious as to what is occurring in the House at this moment. I think we could make the case that we are actually in the middle of a major battle, a battle between this House and the Senate, a battle between the Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices and the duly elected members of this House, and a battle between the government and Canadian workers. I think it is fair to say that there have been a lot of casualties in these battles. We do not have many foreign correspondents in the gallery or the International Red Cross, but I think we can still make the case that casualties abound.

At the top of the list in terms of casualties on this battleground is the delicate balance of our parliamentary democracy. Tragic casualties in this process has been the balance between the rights of the majority to govern and the rights of the minority to be heard, and the balance between the responsibilities of both Chambers in this Parliament to protect and to provide a democratic legislative base.

Today, I listened with interest to the minister responsible for this legislation as she pretended to defend democracy. She read part of the motion that the government has brought forward which, once again, introduces a form of closure on debating further regulations regarding people in the fishing industry. To agree to the motion would be to agree to a form of closure in terms of debate in the House in future years. That is not what democracy is all about.

The government is asking us to agree to a motion today that asserts that only the elected House has the right to study meaningfully money bills. It is asking us to defend the rights of the elected members of this House. Yet, it is this government that has done more than people could ever have imagined to diminish the rights of these same elected members time and time again.

I only have to think of those two Conservative members from Alberta who decided to do the democratic thing and represent their constituents on this important economic matter. It was not a moral issue, because I think we all recognize that, when it comes to moral issues, people ought to have the right to express freely their moral position on issues. However, when it comes to economic matters or government policy regarding taxation, surely, members of Parliament have some obligation to represent the views of their constituents.

When the member from Edmonton and the member from Calgary asked their constituents what they felt they should do in terms of the goods and services tax, 70, 80, or 85 per cent of their constituents said that they should stop the tax dead in its tracks. So, they spoke out against the tax. They said that they could not support a tax opposed by almost everybody in their constituency, everybody they knew in the country, and most Canadians by far. They could not go ahead and pass it.

What did the government do? The government that is now arguing that we must listen to the democratic voices speaking in the country and that we must emphasize the democratic basis of this institution? It kicked those members out of the caucus. They do not sit over there any more. The Prime Minister said: "You cannot represent your constituents. We do not want anything to do with democracy in this party. You are out. I do not want to see you again." So they sit with members of the opposition.

Here is the minister, shedding crocodile tears, on bended knee, pleading for democracy, when in her own caucus she supports the most undemocratic act we have seen in years.

The elected members on this side of the House, and Canadians, will not be deceived by this particular request. We know that the motion before us today will do absolutely nothing to revive or restore the health of parliamentary democracy in the country. We have seen what the government has done since it has come to office in terms of eroding what we have come to know as parliamentary democracy, our parliamentary system.

This motion will not restore the privileges of elected members to represent freely and openly their constituents' interests, unfettered by threats of closure and time allocation. We have seen something historically never witnessed before in the House. Since the last federal election, the government has threatened the House in terms of using some form of closure on legislation, on average, every eight days that the House has sat. Every eight days closure has been threatened when it is averaged out over the entire term.

This motion will not restore the privileges of elected members by the dictatorial rulings of certain committee chairs. A committee chairman is sitting here today. There have been dictatorial rulings. It is not going to change that.

This motion will not restore the privileges of elected members of the House to have the opportunity to present petitions and bills on behalf of their constituents during Routine Proceedings. Day after day we have seen the government curtail Routine Proceedings. Those of us who have stacks of petitions to present on the goods and services tax are denied that right. Elected members cannot present their petitions. This government, the most undemocratic government the country has ever witnessed, has the gall to plead for democratic understanding.

The motion before us will not make this government responsible to this House of elected members. It will not make the government come to this House to announce to elected representatives its new programs and policies.

Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, when the government decided it was going to introduce what it thought was a great environmental plan, The Green Plan? Did it introduce it in the House of Commons, before the duly-elected members representing the people of Canada? No, it was done at a press conference some place.

It will not make the government fulfil its moral responsibility to come to the House and implement policy by legislation, instead of by administrative fiat and regulatory change, as it did when it slashed VIA Rail from existence. Was that done in the House of Commons? No, that was done in secret. It was the same kind of secrecy when the government said that it did not like the priest who was standing outside the House. It did not like the fact that some protesters were out there calling government members to task. In secret, it passed legislation prohibiting a priest from standing outside the House. That is not democracy. That is undemocratic. That is why this government has the audacity to stand—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: You were on the Board of Internal Economy. Why didn't you speak up?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops has the floor.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it seems that I have touched a nerve. The government does not seem to want to be reminded of the fact that while it pleads today for democracy—

Mr. Kempling: If you would only tell the truth.

Mr. Riis: May I suggest to my hon. friend from Burlington to get a dictionary and look up the term "democracy".

Mr. Kempling: Look up the term "truth".

Mr. Riis: I suspect that the only terms he recognizes are "totalitarian" or "dictatorship". Those are his favourite words because that is certainly what he practises.

This motion before us will not restore the confidence of Canadians in our parliamentary system. How could that confidence be restored when the government has ignored the pleas of Canadians to reduce interest rates? It totally ignores those calls. People are saying: "Reduce interest rates." Financiers are saying: "Reduce interest rates." Does the government listen? No, it knows best. Big government and big brother knows best.

How could the confidence in the government be restored when it has ignored the pleas of Canadians to provide leadership on the environment? When it has ignored the pleas to withdraw regressive tax programs? And when it has ignored the pleas from fishermen, farmers and those living in the regions of Canada?

The motion before us will do nothing to restore the trust that Canadians once had in their government. I must say that it is no coincidence that since the government launched its offences against parliamentary democracy, there has been a tragic increase in intolerance, bitterness and cynicism toward government in the country. It is as though the people have lost faith in their government.

Today's skirmish is against the Senate. I want to refer to the Senate, not to the other place. Let us call a spade a spade. We are talking about an impasse with the Senate. The message before us a missile against the Senate. The Prime Minister and the rest of his war room are trying to remove the rights of the Senate to oppose, to amend, or to improve legislation, just as they have removed the rights of elected members in the House of Commons.

Unfortunately, there are many civilian casualties in this battle, including thousands of Canadians in depressed regions who for four months have been deprived of unemployment insurance benefits to which they are entitled, because the government has repeatedly refused to separate the variable entrance rate component of this legislation and give it the rapid passage that we have offered. They would rather see Canadian workers in the maritimes, rural Canada, and in the west and north live in poverty than admit that the Senate has the constitutional right to study Bill C-21.

Other casualties include Canadian mothers whose rights to maternity benefit equalities were fought for in the courts and were won. These rights are now held hostage in the battle over cuts to unemployment insurance that have nothing to do with maternity benefits.

I ask the members opposite to lay down their arms for a brief while during this debate and take the opportunity to reflect on how we arrived at this very unhappy situation. If you look back over the last year and a half, Mr. Speaker, you will see a number of events that lead us to today's debate. In the cold autumn of 1988 the Conservatives took the country to the polls on an election that became a one issue campaign, free trade. Most Canadians were opposed to free trade on November 21. Some New Democrats say that is why the government lost the moral right to impose the trade deal. The view of democracy did not suit this Prime Minister and free trade was forced through the House in unprecedented time through the use of closure at every single stage.

I acknowledge that many Canadians voted for the free trade agreement, but they did so believing that they had a commitment from the Conservatives to provide training and adjustment programs. They trusted that the government would assist those who would inevitably lose their jobs as a result of this realignment of our economy.

Some Canadians voted for free trade believing promises that the Conservatives stated again and again; that our social programs would not be affected, that they would not be harmonized with the harsher, stingier programs offered to American workers.

Five months after the Conservatives were democratically elected to fulfil these commitments they instead turned against Canadian democracy. They did so by abrogating their election commitment to training programs and introduced Bill C-21, which is what we are talking about today, which removes any federal government contribution to training.

Think of the federal dollars that go into assisting lawyers to be trained. Thousands and thousands of dollars from the general treasury go to help lawyers get training. Why not the same for machinists? Why treat certain kinds of people differently in terms of the training and education they receive?

The government also turned against Canadian democracy by abrogating its election commitment to maintain social programs, by introducing Bill C-21, which harmonizes our unemployment insurance program more closely with that of the United States program.

It also denies the government's responsibility to help unemployed Canadians, even though they lost their jobs as a result of the government policy to push consumer interest rates up past 15 per cent and unemployment to more than a million people, to say nothing about the cuts to student programs for the summer. Many students are trying to earn money for their own education and training options.

Bill C-21 is a massive policy change in that it destroys an institutionalized and complexly woven social security net in our country. No attempt was ever made to hide the fact that the Conservatives planned for months before the election to destroy this program and some suggest it might have even been part of the discussions around the free trade deal.

Was it a democratic act to make specific commitments during an election campaign and then introduce a long-planned strategy that was the very opposite of those commitments? Obviously not. Was it not an act against democracy when the government forced closure after only five hours of debate on this very sinister legislation? Was it a service to free and open democracy to severely restrict hearings on this bill? Was democracy helped when almost one-third of those groups who wished to appear were denied an opportunity to express their concerns, or when the testimony, including cross-examination, was restricted to less than half an hour? Was it remotely democratic to listen to witnesses and then ignore their testimony? The vast majority, 157 of 202 witnesses strongly opposed this bill, yet their opinions counted for nothing.

When the minister of the Crown responsible for the bill finally appeared before the committee, was it a democratic act to give members of this House less than one hour of questioning time with the minister? Were the democratic privileges of this House and the rights of its members aided when time allocation was imposed at both report stage and third reading stage? No, they were not. Was it a democratic act when members were denied even the opportunity to explain the proposed amendments and present short arguments as to why they should be adopted?

It was an affront to democracy for the government to blithely ignore the mandate it was given to provide training programs and to protect social programs. I suggest that it was an affront to parliamentary democracy for the government to blithely ignore the rights of members to debate the principles of the bill, to engage in meaningful committee review, and to offer proposed changes.

I must say that Canadians knew what was going on. They saw the House was being denied its historic rights in a free and democratic society. They saw the rubber stamp that has now become a symbol of Conservative democracy. They then turned to the Senate. I know many Canadian political activists were surprised to find themselves knocking on the Senate door asking Senators to do the work that members of the House had been prevented from doing. I know many people had to re-examine their view of the Senate. New Democrats were among those who looked again at the role of the Senate.

New Democrats watched intently the assault on democracy which took place last year. We exercised our democratic rights within our own party and voted at our December convention to change our party policy on the Senate. Whereas once we were satisfied that the Senate had to be abolished, and that was it, we are now in the process of looking at a variety of options to provide and promote better regional representation in the Parliament of Canada, including but not limited to, proportional representation, an elected Senate, and other options.

New Democrats who voted for that position are ordinary Canadians who were looking at what this government has done to parliamentary democracy in our country, Canadians who want protection from the kind of totalitarian behaviour we have seen with this Conservative government.

New Democrats were among those who went to the Senate and requested that it block the imposition of Bill C-21. Through their labour councils, social councils, churches and women's groups, they asked the Senate to protect the unemployment insurance program that their fathers and mothers and fellow social democrats had fought so hard to establish. These ordinary New Democrats and ordinary Canadians generally, told the Senate of the importance of maintaining a healthy unemployment insurance program, of the need for government to play a role in training programs, of the responsibility of government toward unemployed workers.

Unfortunately, the Senate is not full of ordinary New Democrats or ordinary Canadians. It obviously did not understand the arguments that were put before it. Instead of amending Bill C-21 in a way which would ensure the integrity of our Canadian unemployment insurance plan, the Senate offered a few minor improvements to a very bad piece of legislation.

I remember seeing Liberal Senators on television with tears in their eyes, who were so emotional at the stories they were hearing that they could not speak. Did they really do anything to change that bill? Did they stop the legislation? Did they suggest major changes? No. Did they answer the call when witness after witness came to them and pleaded for the same changes to Bill C-21? Surely not. No witness asked for the version of Bill C-21 which the Senate voted to send back to this House. It is not surprising to me that the Senate failed the test put to it by those Canadian individuals and groups which came to it, cap in hand.

The point I want to make is that the Senate failed Canadians. When Canadians made their case before the Senate committee hearings, obviously the Senate did not hear those cases. They ignored the pleas being put forward by individuals and groups across the country.

I do not know that we should be surprised at that. When you look at the Senate, as it will be at least until June 23, it was the Liberals who five times between 1975 and 1985 cut back the unemployment insurance program. The Liberals cut back on benefit levels. The Liberals abruptly changed entrance requirements. The Liberals removed the federal responsibility for unemployment insurance, except for regionally extended benefits. The Liberals developed the policy now implemented by the Conservative government that high unemployment is an acceptable price for stabilized prices.

Clearly, the Liberal Senators were not interested in helping Canadian workers. Liberal Senators were not interested in protecting a program which had been so undemocratically removed. Clearly, they were taking Canadians down the Senate path, promising hearings, hinting at a meaningful review, but in the end doing virtually nothing.

All along, the Liberal Senate only seemed to be interested in a showdown with the House of Commons. It chose to hold this showdown over a few relatively insignificant improvements to a very flawed bill. So we are back to the old battle between this House and the Senate. The debate today on this government's motion which states that the Senate has no right to improve money bills—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under Standing Order 43, the first two speakers have unlimited time with no questions or comments, but the third speaker has 20 minutes plus questions and comments. I must have unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to carry on after 20 minutes. Do I have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions or comments, the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by our House leader and member for Kamloops on this legislation. It is a regressive bill. I think the member put some of the points very clearly concerning the situation in which government has placed us.

Given the large number of inquiries we have had in our offices from people who are concerned about this legislation and other employment matters, what advice does he have for us to give to our constituents in terms of a message that we can bring to the government? If we can get the Liberals to support us in this cause to fight this legislation, where can we go from here?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, one thing that has become clear in the message we can deliver to our constituents and to the people of Canada is that a battle is taking place between the House of Commons and the Senate. It is a war, but it is an absolutely phoney war. The Liberal Senators gave the impression that they cared about unemployment insurance legislation changes. As I said, there were tears in their eyes. They could not speak at press conferences. They were moved. It was phoney. I am not saying that individuals were phoney, but when it came down to the crunch, did they change the legislation significantly in light of the material before them? Absolutely not.

Did the Senate stop this regressive legislation? No, they did not. They made a few minor changes, but I think that way down deep the Liberals in the Senate want to pass this legislation. It will pass. We will send it back now and Allan MacEachen will say, "They agreed on a couple of our amendments, now it is time to pass it".

Let us be careful when we see these people standing up and fighting against the changes to the UI legislation. If the amendments sent back are the Senate's idea of what this legislation should look like, it is pathetic. It is disgraceful. That is why I call it a phoney war. The Liberals in the Senate are playing games. While they were called upon by witness after witness to stop the legislation, they did not have the courage to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there any further questions and comments? The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was amused, to put it mildly, to hear the hon. member for Kamloops try to express his party's repentance on the Senate, saying like St. Paul on the Road to Damascus that they had seen the light and decided that the Senate, after all, was a worth-while institution, that they were no longer in favour of abolition, particularly when it is dominated by members of our party whom he knows are such staunch defenders of the common person in Canada, the ordinary Canadian.

Hon. members in the New Democratic Party laugh, but they know that in the long history of Canadian parliamentary tradition, the New Democratic Party has never been able to do anything to successfully defend the average Canadian. The defence has been provided by this party. The hon. member for Kamloops knows that. I can see that even as he looks, he knows that what I am saying is correct. What he would really like to do—and I suggest some of his colleagues would like to do it—is take advantage of the great Liberal majority in the Senate and have that Liberal majority do the work that we as an opposition in this House are unable to do because of numbers and because of the rule of majority votes in this House.

Having said that and having done our duty as best we can, the two parties, our party and the New Democratic Party, have worked assiduously to fight this legislation from the day it was introduced. What he is now saying is: "We in the New Democratic Party have changed our view on the Senate and we no longer think it should be abolished. However we wanted to stop this legislation. We now want this non-democratic, unelected Senate to go the full length and stop this bill."

The member did not say that but that is what he is implying. What he is saying, on the other hand, is they did not do enough damage to this bill to make it worth while. I do not understand it. They have improved the bill. The government itself says that the cost of these Senate improvements is $1.75 billion. That is the cost of the improvements the Senate has made to this bill.

The hon. member for Kamloops is on the one hand saying that these improvements are not good enough because they do not do everything they should do. On the other hand he is saying that this group of unelected people in the other House should can this bill entirely.

But he does not quite say that. Now which is it? Does he want the Senate as an unelected body to block the will of the majority of the House of Commons? Or, is he prepared to make a compromise, which we in the Liberal Party are prepared to do in this case, settle for less than perfection but fix the bill to some extent so the government does not run roughshod over the workers of this country as it is doing with this bill now.

We agree that the government is wrong. We agree that Bill C-21 is a flawed bill. It should never have been introduced in this House.

An hon. member: You supported the bill.

Mr. Milliken: We did not support the bill. The hon. member says that we supported the bill. He should look at the record. We have opposed this bill at every stage just as he has. I am not suggesting for a moment that the New Democratic Party has not been good in opposition. Heaven knows it has been in opposition long enough to be very good at it.

The fact is that we have opposed this bill and the senators have opposed this bill. Instead of stopping it because a group of appointed people feel it is not in their power to stop it and instead of exercising that right, they have changed and improved it.

It is not as good as it should be. It is not as good as the old law that was introduced by a Liberal government, I might point out. But it is better than what we got with Bill C-21 that this bunch of penny-pinching Conservatives introduced.

All I can say to the hon. member for Kamloops is: why will he not defend the Senate and say what a great job it is really doing for Canada and praise the Liberal senators and say that we want to support those senators in their efforts to defy the will of this government which is so wrong.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note a slight hint of hypocrisy in the air. Every Wednesday morning when the Conservatives have their caucus meeting, all of the Tory senators are attending the meeting. When the Liberals have their caucus meeting and take positions on legislation, all of their Liberal senators are part of their caucus. They are part of the Liberal Party; they are part of the Liberal caucus. I made the assumption that when Liberals stood in the House day after day, individuals from all parts of Canada, the spokespersons, and in a very eloquent way said "we Liberals oppose the legislation" they included the senators as well. I thought it included senators, not just the folks here.

I guess I made an error in judgment. I thought when Liberals said that they opposed something they meant as a Liberal Party, not just a few folks here and there. Maybe some do; maybe some don't. I made the assumption that Allan MacEachen and the Liberal majority in the Senate also opposed the bill. When it came back, they said: "We agree with it in principle". First of all it was second reading.

An hon. member: They had to.

Mr. Riis: "They had to", my hon. friend says. Is there some law requiring that? I challenge my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands who is very knowledgeable on constitutional matters particularly when it comes to the Senate and the House of Commons. Does my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands have a shred of evidence that says that the Senate of Canada does not have the authority to stop this legislation if it wanted to keep its promise to the people of Canada?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. Minister for Science.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted today to rise and make clear to this House my support for the motion of my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mr. Milliken: Cabinet solidarity forever.

Mr. Winegard: The motion before this House contains two important themes, and I would like to speak to both of them. The first is the need to assert the legitimate rights and privileges of this House, those rights and privileges that are under attack by Liberal senators for blatantly partisan purposes.

Mrs. Maheu: Abolish the Senate if you don't like it.

Mr. Winegard: The second is to reaffirm our support for the many improvements to the Unemployment Insurance Act and to programs designed to help Canadian workers.

Let me touch on the first of these themes. In 1984 and again in 1988 the people of my riding had a full slate of candidates from which to choose.

Mr. Volpe: Did they make a mistake?

Mr. Winegard: Those candidates represented various parties and perspectives on the way in which this country should be governed. Voters had a choice. On both occasions they gave me the privilege of representing them.

That privilege is one that I do not take lightly either as a member of this House or as a minister. Every decision I make, I make knowing that my government and I personally will be held accountable during the next election.

Mr. Milliken: They're getting their boots polished now.

Mr. Lewis: Bear with us.

Mr. Milliken: We have to.

Mr. Winegard: I understand and believe in that system. It is democracy. If the voters some day decide that someone else with different views should represent them, I accept that too. But in the meantime it is my obligation to accept the consequences of government policy and my own personal voting and comments on these issues.

I think I am speaking for most members of this House. We owe our places here to democratic decisions made by millions of people across Canada.

Mrs. Maheu: If you don't like the Senate, get rid of it.

Mr. Winegard: We all know that we will be called upon to defend the policies that we promote or, indeed, the policies that we do not promote. When the next election takes place the people will have an opportunity to judge once again.

An hon. member: They will.

Mr. Fisher: Bye-bye.

Mr. Winegard: I heard that bye-bye in 1988, Mr. Speaker; a lot of people who said it are not here any more.

But now we have a new and I think rather unsettling influence in the total process. We have senators claiming the same rights as members of Parliament. As elected, not appointed, members we have been given a mandate to govern by the people of Canada. It is in this elected Chamber that the force of public opinion can be brought to bear. It is here that pubic opinion receives its true reflection because we are elected and we can be re-elected or thrown out.

Mrs. Maheu: You're at 15 per cent.

Mr. Winegard: Therefore, our rights and privileges to govern must be defended as a group not just because we are on one side or another of a particular issue. They must be defended especially when we are looking at money bills. That is surely a basic issue in parliamentary democracy.

To accept the Senate's claim to power is to establish in money bill situations a very dangerous precedent. Members are well aware of the guidance we all take in this Chamber from precedents established over many years of responsible government. Senators, in seeking to expand their own power, can do so only at the expense of elected members and the government.

Regardless of our personal or party views, can anyone really support the intrusion of appointed senators into decisions regarding expenditures?

Mr. Milliken: They are but the sole defender against the tyranny of the majority.

Mr. Winegard: Can anyone really ignore the precedent? Will all the interest groups who suddenly have decided that Liberal senators are their champions believe the Senate could not use those same new-found powers to attack legislation which those interest groups might support sometimes?

This is an illustration where interest groups are saying the end will justify the means. That has always been a very dangerous precedent for democracy. It remains one. For us it is not a question of expediency; it is a question of who has the moral authority to set a budget and determine expenditures. That is the House of Commons. We were elected to govern. We accept the accountability that goes with that, and that is the issue, Sir: accountability.

How could anyone in this House defend the action by the Senate except on the grounds that it meets their particular needs today? Nothing could be more dangerous to our system of democratic government.

Mr. Boudria: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Winegard: Isn't it marvellous? Because they do not wish to write their own speeches about democracy, they do not believe that anybody else in this House can do it.

Mrs. Maheu: We feel we don't have to talk about it.

Mr. Winegard: I think members of this House, including those on the other side, owe it to the people of Canada to resolve this issue in a manner which builds upon our system of government, our parliamentary system.

It is in that sense that we as a government have agreed to some changes in the bill. We want this to be passed.

Ms. Clancy: We know.

Mr. Winegard: We think that the spirit of compromise we have shown by assenting to some of the recommendations coming from the other place should help move this through.

Ms. Clancy: An hour late and a dollar short.

Mr. Winegard: During the last debate on this issue this House agreed to include basic skills and literacy training among the many types of training offered using unemployment insurance funds.

We agreed to provide greater detail and annual development uses, all those plans which would show how the government intended to use the money provided under the UI Act.

Finally, we agreed that any proposed repeal of the system of UI benefits for self-employed fishermen would require parliamentary approval.

With the motion before us now we have decided to strengthen our commitments made during the last debate and make additional changes to the legislation.

In particular, as members of this House know, we have agreed to change an aspect of the rules affecting people who quit their jobs without just cause.

The Senate asked for lighter penalties for those people. It stated that we were being too hard on those people who quit, that they should not have to wait as long for UI benefits. It asked for change in two areas and we have agreed to one, because this is a compromise that does not weaken our emphasis on workers who quit jobs, an important principle behind this whole bill. We also understand, even if we do not share, the Senate's concerns regarding fishermen's benefits. These benefits are safe.

As I noted, the government has already agreed to eliminate a provision in the current Unemployment Insurance Act which would have allowed a government to eliminate these benefits by proclamation. This provision was originally placed there by a Liberal regime.

The government, in this motion, has modified Senate recommendation 8 to provide for a formal review process for any proposed changes to UI regulations pertaining to fishing benefits. We can agree that such a review is appropriate, but we firmly believe that this review process must be conducted in the House of Commons, and not in the Senate.

The government has made these concessions in a spirit of conciliation. We have not asked for, nor provoked, the current situation. It is disappointing that it is only this House and this government which has shown a willingness to compromise on this bill. We cannot go further without making fundamental changes which would undermine the basic principles of the bill that we originally brought forward.

One of those basic principles forms the second theme in this debate, the need to support and reaffirm our concept that the benefits that will flow from this bill will flow for training and for workers.

Bill C-21 will allow the government to implement the labour force development strategy, which provides many improvements to Canada's labour market polices and to its unemployment insurance program. These improvements are part of a well planned strategy to meet the challenges of a world economy which is being driven by scientific and technological change. Mr. Speaker, we cannot stand still.

Advances in science and technology have affected an extremely wide range of jobs. Let us use one simple example. Consider the impact of computers whether it be in the factory, in the store, on the farm or anywhere. Not only do they affect the way jobs are done, but they affect the skills that are required to do those jobs. That is the reason why no one argues about the importance of training and education.

Last year, the Conference Board of Canada found that two out of every three Canadian firms reported difficulties with employees who were illiterate and unable to carry out their assigned work. In fact, half of all Canadian firms have trouble finding workers with the appropriate skills.

Someone has said that the economic race between industrialized nations is a competition not between industries but between various educational systems. To make use of modern technology, as we must do, requires a modern, trained workforce. We need to have it built on a solid educational system linked with training and development that will meet the changing needs as they arise.

We will have to improve the training available to our workers. Otherwise, we will not be able to generate the kind of wealth that this country needs, if we are going to have the programs that Canadians want. Surely by now, we recognize that most of that training will have to be done by the private sector.

Employers benefit greatly from a well trained staff. They have the responsibility to train their employees, and to ensure that the skills are kept current. While we apparently understand that, it is generally agreed the one area which Canada must improve is industrial private sector training.

We, in government, believe it is necessary to promote a training culture in Canadian business. We know that the private sector must do its share in bringing about the kinds of skills development on which it all depends.

One major goal of the labour force development strategy is to bring the training efforts of our own private sector up to levels which match those of other countries. The bill now before us is directly related to that goal. It will make $230 million available to increase training by the private sector, where it needs to be. That money will be invested in projects which will, in turn, trigger even more investment by the private sector.

We believe the labour force development strategy can help lead to a $1.5 billion additional expenditure by the private sector over the next four years. At that level, which we are trying to achieve, on a per capita basis the private sector training in Canada will just match that of the United States. For that to happen a strategy is necessary. That is why we introduced Bill C-21 in the first place.

In a very real sense, what we have before us is enabling legislation. Changing the Unemployment Insurance Act is only a part of what we have to do. In making the changes we are talking about, it provides both the legislative basis and the financial means to pursue one of the most critical goals facing any nation today, the development of a work-force which will remain competitive in world markets and ensure prosperity at home.

This legislation is a kind of ignition key for the labour force strategy. It will address some of our most pressing problems. We have a mandate in this Parliament, as in any Parliament, to improve training and adjustment programs to bring about better training and a fairer system of unemployment insurance.

Let me remind the House that Bill C-21 will increase the federal funding available for labour force development by some 45 per cent. That is one of the purposes. Without this support, tens of thousands of Canadians may not receive the assistance and training they need to change and adapt to a new labour market and will not become productive members of that labour market.

The labour force strategy is also designed to reach those Canadian workers who most need assistance. It is about the young, the 30 per cent who have dropped out of school, who need access to better entry level type jobs. It is about women, native people, visible minorities, and the disabled, all of those who can benefit from inclusion in an equitable human resource planning concept. It is about older Canadians who need training to cope with changing job demands. They are not getting enough training now. We have to make some changes in direction. I think the strategy will clear away some obstacles. We need human resource planning, more co-operative education, and better and more apprenticeship training.

The successful nation has to have significant training opportunities for its youth, the elderly and for those people who are going to change their jobs several times during their lifetime. We have to be part of that changing work-force strategy. We think a more focused training and career development program can help unleash a great untapped pool of talent and skill, but it can only happen if we are prepared to plan for and work towards it.

We know there is a need to build organizations involved in training; business associations, unions, vocational schools, colleges and others. We need to plan together at various levels so that we can adjust our market forces, let people have the training they need to be useful members and have the pride of having a good and valuable job. That is why I support this legislation. I want that kind of opportunity for the people of this country.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the minister talks about training, training programs and how this bill will be beneficial, I want to bring up a specific example that has been brought up many times before by people on this side of the House. I bring up the example of Lockeport, Nova Scotia.

Lockeport, Nova Scotia is a one industry town, and the industry is gone. The fish plant is closed. It is finished. Lockeport is a two hour drive from Halifax where employment is reasonably steady but does not offer that much for these workers. I assure you that a two-hour commute on Nova Scotia highways in the wintertime is impossible. If the minister is going to retrain the workers from the closed plant in Lockeport, what would he and his colleagues train the people of Lockeport to do? Would he train them to move to Toronto?

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I am really delighted that question was asked, because it is so marvellously reminiscent of what has been the Liberal philosophy for so many years.

According to their philosophy, if an industry or a factory shuts down, the people are paid to stay in that location for however long it takes for the jobs come back. You pay people to wait until that industry comes back. We do not believe in that.

We believe in looking at what opportunities and alternatives are available in the community, what community future plans may be used and how that community can use its own resources and the ones we can provide, such as community futures and training, in order to give it a new kind of future. We do not believe in simply pouring in money for people who can only sit and wait, without any pride. We want them to have new jobs and their pride.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the beginning of my hon. friend's speech when he was particularly concerned about what the Liberal Senators were doing in seemingly frustrating the government's efforts.

Not long go the Minister of Justice introduced legislation in the House to curtail the powers of the Senate, to limit its ability to stop or hold up legislation. The government introduced the bill, we spent a few hours debating it, and never saw it again. The government never brought it forward. There was no more debate and it died on the Order Paper. Can my hon. friend explain to me why the government did not use that opportunity to follow through with the legislation to curtail the powers of Canada's Senate?

Mr. Winegard: It is quite simple. What we wanted the Senate to realize its true place in the parliamentary process. We had hoped that sometimes they would have a sober second look, get on with the job and pass it back here for us to go on with. We really hoped that the Senate would do what it had been doing constitutionally over many years. But no, what it has done is not sober second thought—

• (1800)

Mr. Duhamel: A bit more sober thought would be helpful.

Mr. Winegard: It is trying to rule the country, at an appointed base. Our hopes as to what would happen have been frustrated once again. Do not legislate what you do not need to legislate. We had hoped the Senate would come to its senses but regretfully it did not happen.

Mr. Kempling: I am kind of tempted to get into an interchange with the hon. member for Kamloops, but I have another question. In fact, I am quoting from a comment made by the hon. member for Kamloops when he said: "Quite frankly, I am very disappointed with the Senate because I do not think it has the right to hold up legislation". Put that in the context of his earlier remarks.

I want to ask the minister about the social assistance recipients, SARs. We have quite a good program in place for them and we want to expand it further. As you know, the largest growing group of disadvantaged people in this country are single mothers and many of them fall under the SAR program. I wonder if the minister could expand a little on what the legislation will do for them.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary does, of course, focus on a very important part of this bill. The social assistance recipient initiative has become over the years a major program representing about one-quarter of the Canadian Jobs Strategy expenditures.

Both the provincial governments and territorial governments, along with the federal government, under the Social Assistance Recipients agreement, are now currently authorized to spend something like $600 million. What we are doing in this particular bill is expanding that important initiative again in co-operation with the provinces and the territories by something like an additional $50 million. With the $50 million that we spend ordinarily on income assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan and the matching provincial-territorial fund, we will have something like another $200 million available to improve the employment prospects for up to at least another 20,000 social assistance recipients.

These training programs in this particular category have a remarkable degree of success. Something like 50 per cent of the people in these training programs end up with jobs, or three months later they have moved on to even further educational training programs. Why would you not want money to expand that kind of program? Of course we do, and that is why it is such an important part of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to touch on that particular item that the minister has raised, but I would first like to address the two points that he and the Minister of Employment have raised, and that is the rights and privileges of this House and also the changes to the format of the unemployment insurance. We jotted down some notes as the two ministers spoke. In response, the Minister of Employment says the unelected Senate is blocking this legislation and in so doing is immoral in its action and is violating the authority of the House and this Chamber.

The Tories have imposed closure at each stage of this legislation and on a variety of other important bills. That constitutes a lack of morality and a lack of respect for the democratic wishes of this House.

Second, the minister says that we must respond to the changing times regarding employment and training demands. Nobody objects to that. Nobody disputes the need for change. What is in dispute in this legislation and in this resolution is the government's withdrawing of its contribution from those program needs.

The third item the minister raises is that the government has received a mandate to govern, and therefore it must put forward a program consistent with its own philosophy. Upon reflection, as my colleague for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has noted, the Tory campaign of 1988 and the Conservative philosophy during that campaign indicated that there would be no changes to this legislation.

The public gave its support to the Tories and we are going to respect that, but I do not know whether there has been a change in philosophy or whether we have a different definition for morality and respect for democratic wishes.

A fourth item came to mind when the minister said we have to offer the unemployed a better future than one that just gives them cash. I do not think anybody has disputed that. The point is that making unemployment insurance benefits less accessible to Canadians in need and taking money away from UI beneficiaries to pay for federal ideas and projects is not the mandate of this income maintenance insurance scheme.

The minister says the money is sitting there waiting to be used for legitimate programs, but that it is being stalled by the opposition in the Senate. I never heard so much gobbledegook. The opposition is not stalling the programs. If the government really believes in these programs, let it propose legislation that is consistent with something other than violating and pillaging a program not designed to take money from premiums contributed by workers and employers for training.

The minister also says: "We have the Decima poll indicating that the majority of Canadians support using unemployment insurance money for training purposes." I thought we were governing in this House on the basis of the support we got from Canadians in a mandate at election time and continuously. Maybe the government is changing because of the way the polls read today, yesterday, the week before or the way they will read next week.

Both ministers who have spoken so far suggested that what we ought to do is consider that 80 per cent of Canadians do not want the GST, and therefore we should withdraw the legislation. I think that element of seriousness demands consistency in approach. If the argument is good for this, then it should be good for the other.

What really galls us is that the minister flaunted the Labour Market Productivity Centre surveys and said: "Look, here is the ultimate authority. It says that training is good for workers and good for Canada". I did not hear anybody argue, but since we have the bible of truth on the table for reference, it would serve the purposes of further debate to recall that the document she flaunted unanimously, through all seven task forces, said that unemployment insurance funds were not to be used for training.

Moreover, that task force indicated that there were two alternatives to funding. One is tax credits for businesses that got involved in training, and the other is a tax on all industries with a rebate if they participated in training. Then she says: "Well, we have not got the money. We do not know where to get it". The document that she says is the bible of the new labour strategy for the future is giving her the ideas and she ignores them.

What this tells us is that the real question to be discussed today is not so much the inconsistency of the minister's arguments and the minister's programs—I think they have been well documented—but that what we should be addressing and the minister should be addressing is not simply one of skills training. Nobody refutes the value of developing a highly skilled labour force, not anyone in this House and not anyone outside of this House. What everybody wants to hear is what this government's programs are with respect to job creation. It is important to understand that over the course of this last year, since the electorate gave this Chamber a mandate to initiate new legislation, with one of the government's initiatives, the free trade agreement, we have gone from a job creation rate of 383,000 in 1988 to, on the government's own admission, a mere 193,000 in the last year. Yet they trumpet that as an achievement. There has been a drop of about 100,000 jobs in terms of creation over the course of this last year since that government's initiative and they say what we need is skills development. What about the jobs that have been lost?

I can see the parliamentary secretary nodding his head. Those are the statistics they have given us.

I refer to something we learned just recently. Biltrite Upholstering of southern Ontario, a manufacturer of furniture, closed its doors, citing high interest rates as the main factor, putting 400 people out of work and losing $65 million in operational revenues. That is just one example of what is happening to the furniture and textile industries and other manufacturing enterprises in southern Ontario and elsewhere. This government still talks about skills training. People in those industries are highly skilled. They have a particular function they have been performing over a course of years and they have been extremely productive.

I add to them a group of skilled labourers in the construction industry that is slowly but surely collapsing as a result of the government's high interest rate policy and its high dollar. In southern Ontario in the great metropolis of Toronto alone, where we have seen 3,000 laid off over the course of the last few weeks, we have predictions of an additional 30,000 being laid off; plumbers, electricians, carpenters, bricklayers and other masonry workers. People who have a high skill level, people who are normally high earners and have good job prospects are going to be without jobs. It is not because we do not have good skill training programs but because the government's economic policies are depriving them of an opportunity to work. If the government had a sense of decency and if the minister had a sense of vision about what to do with our labour market, she would address that fact first and foremost. She has not been addressing that.

The statistics that give us an indication of the unemployment picture. Keep in mind that this minister has as her first mandate to deal with the unemployment and with the unemployed. Developing skills strategies is just one component of that. The rate of growth in the labour force has fallen from 3 per cent in the 1970s to 2 per cent in the 1980s. I remind all members of this House that the last eight years of this decade have seen unprecedented growth in the country.

Second, in 1989, to make things a little more particular and more immediate to us, the pace of employment growth fell by 35 per cent for women and 40 per cent for men. The prospect of finding employment decreased on the help wanted index from 154 in April to 135 in December of that same year. That does not mean that we need skilled labourers before we need everything else. What it suggests is that we have to provide a labour opportunity before we begin to talk about the quality of the labour we need in it.

The other component of this development of unemployment is that part-time workers and part-time work has increased over the course of the period I just mentioned, the last eight years, from 13 per cent to 15 per cent in 1989. The growth in part-time employment accounts for about 50 per cent of all jobs created in the most prosperous period of Canadian economic history. Why is that significant? Those part-time and low-level jobs being created, on average, pay less than 75 per cent of the national average.

In Metropolitan Toronto, employment was increasing at the rate of 4.4 per cent per year as recently as 1986-87. For 1988-89, it has dropped to a mere 2.5 per cent increase. In 1989, manufacturing and warehouse jobs decreased by 22 per cent over the 1983 level.

We are not making headway in the creation of jobs, which is what the primary mandate of this minister should be. We are not doing that at all. She sends in a little red herring. I notice that some of my friends from the Atlantic are here and they will appreciate that a lot more than some of those who do not understand double entendres.

The minister sends in red herring called skills development, when she should be talking about job creation.

Mr. Simmons: She should be here listening to you right now, too!

Mr. Volpe: She should! Over the course of the last five years, the number of so-called discouraged workers has been on the increase. The discouraged worker is that worker who drops out of the labour market because there is no opportunity for employment as a result of the economic conditions. Just how serious is that?

The minister a few minutes ago said: "You know what? If we put this thing into effect, we could provide opportunities for development for 60,000 Canadians." That is an impressive figure. It is. How much more impressive is this figure? It is impressive by what it does not say.

The number of discouraged workers totalled 83,000 in 1979. In March of 1990, just a month and a half ago, according to Statistics Canada, 91,000 people dropped out of the labour market because they were discouraged from finding further jobs.

I do not know whether the Minister of Transport has a plan to hire many of those 5,000 laid off as a result of VIA cuts by his department. I do not know whether he has a plan in place in order to provide employment for those discouraged workers who find that the economic prospects are so bleak that the skills development programs will do nary a thing for them.

Ms. Clancy: There is no program at all.

Mr. Volpe: The ministers are wont to say: "Listen, we are going to provide a better environment if we have skills development." It is needed. Real income for the average worker since 1980 has dropped by 14 per cent. What we are looking at is not necessarily a government that has a sensitive program for skills development and training. We are looking at a lot of rhetoric that is not backed up by substance.

We should be, not only taking a look at the nature of our unemployed, but addressing employment needs of the country and the government, and its sincerity in addressing those needs.

When we speak of sincerity and what is available with respect to what the government should do, I refer to one component of Bill C-21. It purports to say that it addresses some charter requisites imposed by court rulings, recognizing the rights of senior citizens, mothers and parents in terms of leave.

This minister and the government moved at a snail's pace to correct some of those imbalances. Not until the Supreme Court told the government to respect the rights of seniors, parents, and mothers under the unemployment insurance scheme, did the government finally insert that in Bill C-21. It is still holding back. Now it is blaming the Senate for something with which it has been extremely remiss.

Not only that, but one year ago we had a Federal Court of Appeal decision stating that the government, through its department, was being absolutely unfair to those who were unemployed and had received severance and vacation pay. It was being unfair in the application of a decision with respect to whether those two items should be considered continuous pay and was depriving workers of an additional $100 million per year. If the government is acting with such bad faith, can one expect that it is going to be very sincere about some of the skills training programs?

On that level, I would like to refer to some of the other items with respect to training. It is important that we understand who is going to be affected by training. I know the Minister of Transport is listening and he might be interested in knowing this. It is one of the things that the minister has not said. One cannot qualify under Bill C-21 for skills development programs unless one qualifies under the new requirements for unemployment insurance.

Keeping that in mind, I am going to pick a couple of places. My friend from Saskatoon who sat on the legislative committee with me will know and verify that the new entrance requirements and the new requisites under Bill C-21 are going to affect 60 per cent of those people from Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, who become unemployed. Sixty per cent of them are going to suffer a reduction in the rights that they normally would have enjoyed under the unemployment insurance program. Those people are not going to qualify for the skills development programs.

If we are going to help the unemployed in the country, if we are going to increase their employability, if we are going to increase the standards of their labour productivity, why would we not allow them to qualify for those programs?

I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. Bill C-21 under sections 19(3), 26(1), (2) and (4) deprives any claimant of the right to appeal the decision of a department official to qualify for any of those programs. What is the purpose of having a program if the very people who are supposed to benefit from it are going to be deprived of it, and then without an appeal? This particular minister who just spoke has the unmitigated gall to talk about a Senate that deprives the people of the opportunity to exercise the democratic right. Does hypocrisy reign totally and always unabated on that side of the House?

Mr. Lewis: The weaker the argument, the louder you yell.

Mr. Volpe: I know that I have awakened a few of the semi-somnambulant types on the other side and I am going to take that opportunity to point out something about our training programs.

Employment training, as my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce pointed out earlier, has decreased by 27 per cent over the last five years. This is the government that cut $700 million from such programs over the course of the last four years and says: "Now we are going to put in $1.3 billion." We want to take a look at—

An hon. member: They all want jobs.

Mr. Volpe: They do not have jobs. I just said what kind of jobs they have and what has happened to those discouraged workers. I raise my voice so that even the dead and even the stones could hear, and the member says: "Well, we do not know if they all got jobs". Wake up! There must be something over in Cambridge. I do not know what it is. It must be something in the water. They will get rid of that for the next election.

The Tories are taking $1.3 billion from the unemployed. It is important to understand it is coming from premiums. It is not coming from government funds. It is coming from premiums, from the people who contribute to that program because they expect that they will have income maintenance in rough times. The government is taking that money from the unemployed and using it to set up a skills training program based, as the minister says, on local control with representatives from business, labour, and government. Since the government is withdrawing its own funds from those programs, what will be the success and the utility of those training programs?

Experience in Britain reveals that similar initiatives have resulted in over 90 per cent of all moneys being directed to low-level training for school drop-outs and long-term unemployed. That is a response to demands created by lay-offs and high unemployment, not by actual market demand arising from skill shortages.

Of comparable American programs, one of the more successful local training initiatives, has been able to raise only 5 per cent of its funding from the private sector. How can any local business be willing to voluntarily devote valuable resources, time, senior personnel, and money at a time when the federal government is setting a poor example by reducing its involvement and maintaining high interest rates and a high dollar? It has been decreasing business profit margins and thereby hindering businesses' prospective generosity and ability to respond to the new market-place. If we are truly to respond to the needs of a new market-place, then we have to have a government that is going to take the advice given to it by the Senate and by members on this side of the House who say: "Change this thing completely or throw it out."

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence, and to ask if, perhaps, he can answer the same question I asked the hon. Minister of Science and Technology earlier, and which he was unable to answer.

Mr. Simmons: You will get a better answer.

Ms. Clancy: That is what I am attempting to get.

When we talk about this retraining and the people of Lockeport—I mentioned the people of Lockeport in my comments after the hon. minister's speech— I say again that there is no other industry in Lockeport. Lockeport is a one-industry town. The fish plant is closed. They are too far away from anywhere else to commute and retraining programs are not going to help the town of Lockeport. Has the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence any idea whether the government has even considered this?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to answer for the minister opposite because, obviously, the government does not have any of the answers. This is a government-in-waiting and we should be prepared to offer the alternatives.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Volpe: My colleague, the hon. member for Halifax, raises a very important point. First, in this country do we want to allow people to live in an area of their choice with an anticipation that they can derive from the benefits of this country, the same benefits that accrue to those in other areas of the country? To do that, we have to have ready an industrial strategy that will allow them the opportunity to develop the enterprises necessary to capitalize on the resources available.

If Lockeport's main resource is fish, I would like to see a government program that capitalizes on the marketability of fish and fish by-products, renewing the resources, and providing for people in that area something that would be long-lasting and long-term.

What the hon. member for Halifax also points out is that there is an unwillingness on the part of the government to recognize the other realities to which it makes allusions. One of these realities is that the government's economic policies are virtually destroying one-industry towns. The only alternative for those living one-industry towns is to move to those areas of Canada which are more highly industrialized and more diversified. What the government is encouraging is the process of urbanization. In encouraging that particular process, it is ignoring some of the consequences that accrue as a result to main centres like Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, and other cities throughout the country.

Mr. Hopkins: There is no infrastructure.

Mr. Volpe: Absolutely none. The government, as the hon. member from Renfrew has said quite correctly, has no infrastructure for absorbing massive urbanization. Canada is well on the road to becoming the most urbanized of all countries in the western world. In order for us to do that, the government has to assume a responsibility from which it has shirked. In shirking from that responsibility, it has ignored another important factor in the whole concept of employment and unemployment.

I hope the Minister of Transport and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration were listening when we talked about the nature of the employment that is taking place and the focus on part-time employment, service-sector employment, and low-paying employment. Sixty per cent of the jobs that were created in the last five years are in the category that pays less than the $10 average.

I can give you the statistics, but you cannot say that I am wrong just because you do not want to accept those figures. I have given you more figures than your research department has provided, and you have not contested them.

The other point I was addressing was that in areas like east Montreal the unemployment rate is greater than 15 per cent. We have unemployment rates that are unacceptable throughout the country. East Montreal is an example. The typical unemployed individual has less than a grade nine education and no savings in the bank to tide him over. These people are unaccustomed to holding long-term positions.

Under this government it is not surprising that the kinds of jobs being created are short-term, part-time, low-paying, dead-end positions from which one must go elsewhere. They are transitional jobs. What is required, succinctly for the hon. member from Halifax, is a government that is willing to put in place an industrial strategy, and in the context of that industrial strategy, talk in terms of labour developments and labour needs, not in isolation.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was driven to my feet by the rhetoric of my hon. friend. I could not figure out whether he was teaching a grade 11 geography class or a grade 12 history class.

I have just one question for my hon. friend. Is he saying that unemployment insurance should be paid to each according to their region, or to each according to their ability to be retrained to find work and feel good about earning a living?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I would have felt very proud to be teaching a grade 11 geography class or a grade 12 history class. Because I was speaking to the members opposite, I had to speak in very elementary terms. I do not want to insult children in my son Massimo's class. He is only in grade 4 and they have a lot of very bright young kids there. What they do know is that when you pay into an insurance scheme you pay your premiums and your employer pays his premiums—

An hon. member: Insurance?

Mr. Volpe: —insurance. Unemployment insurance. When you are paying into an insurance scheme, you receive benefits according to what you paid and what the program calls for you to receive in the event that you require income support and income maintenance. When the government is deliberately changing the conditions, arbitrarily making economic decisions that impact negatively on one's employability, on one's labour market, then the hon. minister would do well to remember that you honour the commitment you made to them under that scheme.

The minister will know that withdrawing government support from an insurance scheme is both unconstitutional and inconsistent with the higher moralities of a democratically elected government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's, just on a one minute question or comment.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my friend and colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence. He has put the issue very succinctly.

I know the minister is having some difficulty with this whole procedure. If he would only listen to what the member for Eglinton—Lawrence said, he would grasp for the first time why there are so many concerns, particularly in rural Canada, about this Bill C-21.

One solution is to scream your head off so you do not hear anything, but a more constructive solution is for the minister to listen to the devastation that Bill C-21 is going to cause.

I want to ask my good friend for Eglinton—Lawrence, a man who obviously has his head around this particular issue, does he not agree that the decision by the government, if this bill goes through, to completely get out of the unemployment insurance business, in effect spells the death knell for the fishermen's unemployment insurance program. Does he not see that the program cannot last any more than three, four or five years if the government persists in putting this infamous piece of legislation through the House of Commons?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow the hon. member a minute to answer, although his time has expired. I will recognize the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague for Burin—St. George's is absolutely right. The government, by withdrawing support from the unemployment insurance system, has left to the vagaries of the marketplace the government's contribution which would be about $2.9 billion. The hon. member is absolutely right. This is a very devious way of reneging on its obligations to the people on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts who rely on the fishing resources for their livelihood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. member for Burlington. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's on a point of order.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you heard the comment from there because I heard the minister just a moment ago. I have a point of order, and if the member for Burlington can just hold his fire for a moment he will understand that I have a legitimate point, even he will agree with that.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you heard the Minister of Transport, just a few short seconds ago, with his usual sarcasm malign every person out there who, through no fault of their own, have occasion to receive unemployment insurance. I wrote his words down because I did not think without the actual words you would believe what he said, but Hansard will show—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order, it is debate. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor on debate.

Mr. Simmons: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want on the record what was said and you can decide if it is a point of order. May I have the floor on a point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has taken two and a half minutes now to try to come up with his point of order. I will listen for another 30 seconds.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I have no difficulty coming up with my point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): With respect I will hear the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the Minister of Transport did not have the courage to say these words into the mike, but I heard him. He said what should we do, pay them UI, unemployment insurance year around? In that statement he maligns every person in this country who has received UI and that man should withdraw—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor on debate.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to answer the question put by the member for Halifax about Lockeport. You probably know if you went through the bill, Mr. Speaker, that there is tied up in Bill C-21, a Community Futures Program. Lockeport, along with 400 other communities in Canada, are lined up to apply for the Community Futures Program but they cannot get it because the bill is held up in the Senate. That is the answer to your question.

Before I get into the main body of my comments, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to reply to comments made by the member for Eglinton—Lawrence regarding the Canadian Labour Market Productivity Centre. The minister saw this report, read and reviewed it with her officials. Indeed, the report recommended that the UI premiums not be used for training. That is one of the recommendations. It is in the report. Nobody can deny it.

The minister recognized this and she made it clear that there is no other source for funds right now. All we hear from the member is, "Delay it. Do something else". The fact is that the Minister of Employment and Immigration made it clear that the Canadian Labour Market Productivity Centre recommended worthy medium and long-term goals. She does not disagree with it on principle, but Canadian workers need help now. That is why we are proceeding.

Mr. Fisher: Withdraw the bill.

Mr. Kempling: The member says, withdraw the bill. The member for Kamloops, your House leader, said, "Quite frankly, I am very disappointed with the Senate because I do not think it has the right to hold up legislation". Your finance critic, the member for Yorkton—Melville said, "I believe the Commons should have the final say. I do not think the unelected body should usurp the elected body". How do you deal with that?

Mr. Fisher: Withdraw the bill.

Mr. Kempling: I am pleased to rise in support of the motion by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the throne speech last year this government set out its intention to build a strong economy that was fully competitive among the world's trading nations.

We further announced our intention to amend the unemployment insurance program to improve its effectiveness and its fairness. This would result in more resources being directed towards active training, leading to more opportunities and a more productive, experienced workforce.

At this point I want to ask the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence if I could have his attention for just a moment because I want to give him a little bit of history. When I came to this Parliament in 1972, we had before us in 1973, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. At that time, if the minister overran his allotment in the Estimates by $400 million, he had to come before Parliament and ask for an extra allotment. In 1973, that figure was doubled, from $400 million to $800 million. In 1974, we took the lid off altogether.

Your comments about stealing money from the unemployment insurance account to pay for training is not valid. The statute and information states that if an unemployed worker needs money and there is nothing in the fund, it comes automatically from the general revenue fund. You should remember that because you are not being valid in your comments.

We were elected in 1984 and re-elected in 1988 with a mandate that includes controlling federal spending in order to maintain economic stability, continued growth, and to prepare Canadians for participation in the international economy of a wide new world.

We will help meet that mandate through Bill C-21. It sets in place a human resource strategy for the 1990s that will address the imperatives of the modern economy. Unlike the Senate, which is prepared to add at least $1.75 billion annually to the deficit, we will do so in co-operation with the private sector without expanding our debt.

The individual worker is still the most vital part of any workplace. It is in this regard that Canada faces its greatest challenge. In 1989, the world competitive scoreboard ranked Canada well down on the list with respect to managerial talent, R and D, personnel and skilled labour.

The Conference Board of Canada last year found that two out of every three Canadian firms reported difficulties with employees who were illiterate and who were unable to carry out their assigned tasks.

In fact the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre estimated that more than 600,000 job vacancies go unfilled in Canada despite the relatively high unemployment in many areas because workers do not measure up to the skill demands in the job.

This is a comprehensive program that we have involving all parts of our educational and training system. We have had to re-examine our whole approach to developing our human resources in this country, from basic education through to skills training, to labour market programs on adjustment and on unemployment insurance. This is now taking place.

The Prime Minister has called for a national debate on education in Canada and its relationship to economic productivity and competitiveness. He has further called for discussions with provincial ministers of education on the mechanism to set up a task force on resource development.

The national initiative on education complements what we are doing with Bill C-21, which amends the UI Act. It allows for a 45 per cent increase in funding for labour force development and gives life to the Labour Force Development Strategy. This strategy is to fulfil two objectives: first, to increase the quality of training and skills development in Canada with a greater commitment on the part of the private sector and, second, to increase the quality of training so that it is more relevant, hands on and committed to excellence.

Canadian industry spends less than one-half of the amount that U.S. firms spend on training, which is a fraction of what other countries such as Japan spend. Bill C-21 makes $230 million available to increased training by the private sector, which is leverage money that will trigger an estimated $1.5 billion in addition to investment and training over the next four years. Our goal is to create a training culture where employees and companies practise skills development on an ongoing basis. That means working in partnership with community colleges and the provincial government to provide quality training that is relevant and market oriented.

The Labour Force Development Strategy is designed to reach those workers who most need assistance. It is about young people, the 30 per cent who have dropped out of school and have trouble accessing the labour market. When Bill C-21 is passed we will be dedicating $100 million for the purpose of setting up new entry level training programs primarily directed at young people. This will supplement existing programs such as apprenticeship which, by the way, will be examined in consultation with industry and the provinces to accommodate the growing demand for skills in the service sector.

Moreover, we will be quadrupling federal expenditures on co-operative education, a popular program among young people which is growing in demand. Our intention is to expand this program into the high schools.

Unemployed workers will see more assistance to help them get into the workforce. The passage of Bill C-21 will enable the federal government to spend $350 million a year to reach an additional 60,000 UI recipients this year. We are also aiming to help those Canadians who are on social assistance and who have been left behind. Bill C-21 will see $50 million added to the current training and other employment programs which have been operating in co-operation with the provinces since 1986.

I do not need to remind the House that each success means another pay cheque for families in the local community, as well as the satisfaction of a worker who is able to look ahead to future opportunities. Let me add also that Bill C-21 will allow for increased training allowances to bring them up to today's standard of living.

We have difficulties with older workers. Older workers will also receive more assistance. The bill has earmarked $40 million to encourage employers to hire and retain older workers who would otherwise lose their jobs. About $50 million is intended for skills and training education upgrading to be conducted through Section 26 of the UI Act. Natives, women, visible minorities, the disabled—all those who are often denied their full place in the workforce—need the benefits that will come from a better equity based human resource planning. More focused training and career development can tap a great pool of talent and skill, but that can only happen by the building of networks and organizations involved in training, business associations, unions, vocational schools, community colleges, and others. We need to plan together at various levels; most importantly at the local level. These are the goals of the policy on which Bill C-21 is based.

The status quo is no longer acceptable for Canada. Quite simply, to stand still is to fall back.

That is the big picture, but the human side is quite simple. Canadians want to work. They want to own homes. They want to raise families. They want their children to get an education and have jobs, and they want to provide for a secure retirement of their own. Wanting these things, Canadians expect and indeed deserve the kind of help this legislation will provide.

Canadians understand the government's efforts to make the UI a more constructive, pro-active program. Recent polls show a strong majority of Canadians support the idea of using UI funds to train unemployed people so that they find better jobs and find them sooner.

We have an opinion from the Department of Justice that we are quite legal in using the funds in this way. Two Decima polls and an Environics study found that approximately two-thirds of Canadians supported the government's plan to shift a percentage of UI funds to job training through Bill C-21. It is obvious, as well, that Canadians support the bill's measures to ensure the UI system is being used as efficiently and as effectively as possible.

This general support is also reflected by opinion makers in the media and elsewhere.

Canada has one of the most generous UI systems in the industrialized world. Fine tuning that system to make it more efficient and constructive has been generally seen in the media for what it is. What we are doing has received positive comment from across the country.

An hon. member: What papers are you reading, Bill?

Mr. Kempling: Well I am glad the member asked. Editorials across Canada have decried the unjustified delays imposed on Bill C-21, while demonstrating support for the legislation's refinements to our UI system.

I could quote from literally dozens of editorials, but a representative cross-section will perhaps indicate some of the response to the obstruction to this important bill.

Here is one from the Saint-John Evening Times Globe. The editorialist writes that "to delay enactment—would hurt, not help the unemployed". This was written in November and the hurt continues.

From the Financial Post: "the Senate delay has forced new UI applicants to wait an additional four weeks" and "the delay also ignores the urgency of getting more job training and retraining programs up and running".

The Woodstock Daily Sentinel Review:

> The unemployment insurance system will be helped by the changes proposed. The changes should cut down on some of the abuses (while) still taking care of legitimate claimants.

The St. John's Telegram:

> The federal government has stopped making a contribution to the UI fund. It has kept the clamps on the civil service. It is proceeding with the—Goods and Services Tax. It means business.

The Montreal Gazette:

> The Senate may well deny thousands of unemployment people the benefits to which the new law would entitle them.

That is a tragedy. The Regina Leader Post:

> The proposed changes—are clearly designed to make the unemployment safety net more sensitive to the job market.

The Calgary Herald:

> The federal government has set out to turn UI into what it is supposed to be, an insurance policy for the genuinely unemployed job seeker.

Finally, from the Vancouver Sun:

> The Senate committee members didn't have a single question for Barbara McDougall when she gave them the opportunity to quiz her about the bill. That shows that they have run out of excuses for stalling it.

There you are, Mr. Speaker. That is what many members of the media said about the stalling of this bill. I noticed as well that members opposite have quoted Global Economics, a think-tank in this country. Members quoted these studies when we travelled with the committee across the country.

It was rather strange that when Global Economics representative, Mr. Patrick O'Grady, appeared before the Senate committee, he said: "I believe that Bill C-21 will make the UI system better and it ought to be passed". These are the very people that the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce talked about, and the study they produced which said that we were all wrong. Yet, when the people who wrote that report came before the committee, he told them that it would improve the bill and they should pass it.

Canadians are also very aware of the financial implications of continuing to play games with this important legislation.

An hon. member: Don't drink and talk at the same time.

Mr. Kempling: I wish it had something stiffer in it than water.

If the government accepts the Senate amendments $1.75 billion will be added to the deficit; $450 million is at stake for maternity, parental and sickness benefits; and $45 million is being risked by the Senate for self-employed entrepreneurship and mobility assistance.

Members talk about the small village here and the small village there. We would all like to go back and retire in a small village. But the reality is that Canada is populated by people who have moved from small villages to big cities across the country. Members can go to Cambridge and ask the hon. member for Cambridge how many Newfoundlanders reside there. He will say that half the community comes from Newfoundland.

In and around the Hamilton area, there are all kinds of people from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. They came to where the jobs were to make some money and perhaps retire. We have to balance this thing. People move to where the jobs are. We are not going to move the Steel Company of Canada to Lockeport, Nova Scotia.

An hon. member: I moved to Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver. I followed the jobs.

Mr. Kempling: The hon. member for Hamilton West, the only time he ever got a callous on his hand was holding a microphone; he never worked a day in his life.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: One-third of the increase in the Community Futures Program is being delayed, hindering 200 rural and small town communities.

The lower 10-week variable entrance rate is not in effect, which will hurt fishermen and other seasonal workers across Canada.

The Budget Papers in April 1989 stated:

The financing changes (under C-21) will contribute $1.9 billion to deficit reduction in 1990-91.

That is the key issue behind this motion. The paramount fiscal policy objectives of this government is to get the public debt under control through deficit reduction.

Let me explain how this will happen. The UI program has been financed on a tripartite basis from employer to employee premiums and from general government revenues raised by taxation and borrowing.

The proportion of benefits paid by general government revenues has varied over the years. For example, in 1989 the government paid out an estimated $2.9 billion in unemployment insurance expenditures out of a total of $12.6 billion. This was used to finance extended benefits, clients taking training, or benefits for self-employed fishermen in excess of premiums they pay. However, after Bill C-21 is passed all the UI expenditures will be financed by premiums.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When we return to debate on this bill, the hon. member will have 10 minutes for questions and comments.

PLANT BREEDERS' RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, May 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-15, an act respecting plant breeders' rights, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the third reading stage of Bill C-15, an act respecting plant breeders' rights.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, had I been present for the vote I would have voted with the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7.24 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.24 p.m.

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, Orders in Council announcing appointments made recently by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), these Orders in Council are deemed to have been referred to the standing committees indicated in the appendix.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by several petitioners from southwestern Ontario who call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab, and cause the government to cease with a proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

• (1110)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege for me to have this opportunity pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions from people from Brocklehurst, North Kamloops, Westsyde, Heffley Creek, Raleigh, Aberdeen, Valleyview and Dallas, British Columbia, who are all concerned about the government's goods and services tax.

Quite frankly, they cannot understand why the government would proceed with a tax that will tax reading material. It will make Canada the only country in the world that is actually imposing a tax on books, magazines, newspapers and reading material, which helps young people develop their reading and communication skills, to say nothing about their education generally.

These petitioners are saying that the government should stop proceeding with this tax, go back to the drawing-board and start all over again with real tax reform.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from petitioners in London, Ontario and the city of Ottawa, who point out that the number of children in Canada living in poverty is increasing.

They point out a whole set of statistics which shows the abysmal situation in which one of the richest countries in the world would tolerate literally hundreds of thousands of children living in a state of poverty. They are asking the government to take action and, in particular, to support the suggestion of the hon. member from Mission—Coquitlam that we have a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from petitioners in Kamloops, British Columbia. They are concerned about the curtailment of passenger rail service.

They point out that passenger rail service is important to develop the tourist infrastructure for the area of central British Columbia. They are asking the government to consider increasing once again passenger rail service between Kamloops and Calgary, one of the most scenic routes in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I have the honour under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present petitions against the goods and services tax. These petitioners from northeast Calgary whose signatures I am presenting today, bring the total from my riding alone to 19,000.

My constituents are opposed to this goods and services tax because they feel it is regressive and that it is going to be inflationary. They pray that the government withdraws this form of taxation.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians who are protesting the government's goods and services tax.

They state clearly that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place, a taxation system which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax but which forces lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

The petitioners call on the government to reject its proposal for a goods and services tax, and to reform the taxation system so that there is a minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from a number of Canadians calling on the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to do so in a way which will shift the tax burden not on to ordinary Canadians through regressive consumption taxes but through real tax reform.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which calls on the government to reinstate fully funding for the native communications program and also for the northern native broadcast access program.

The petitioners are also calling on the government to consult with the native groups involved before any changes in funding takes place so as to serve the needs of the department as well as the aboriginal people and their media in the future.

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Further, Madam Speaker, I have a petition from people in Port Alberni calling on the government to reinstate in full all those funds previously designated for core funding for women's centres in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of the electors of Vancouver Quadra who are represented very ably in the House by my right hon. friend, the hon. member for Vancouver—Quadra.

This petition urges Parliament to reject the goods and services tax as vicious and unfair.

I realize that the petition may have been signed late by these people, in light of the action taken in this House already. Nevertheless, they are entitled to have their views known. It can only be hoped that we will get an opportunity to deal with this bill again after the other place has made the appropriate amendments.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to table six petitions signed by students at the University of Ottawa.

Last week was Education Week and these students are concerned about the quality of education. Madam Speaker, the petitions ask the various levels of government to promise to hold a federal-provincial conference at the highest level in order to establish the financial responsibilities of both levels of government for post-secondary education and to end the shameful neglect of higher education in Canada.

Madam Speaker, the petition is preceded by arguments about the condition of the equipment at universities and post-secondary institutions and about the declining quality and accessibility of these institutions for Canadian students.

So I think it is quite appropriate and important for the House to be aware of the big problem that concerns these students.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have received an application pursuant to Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Mackenzie.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, in brief, a letter that I presented to you points out that within the last 10 days a number of things have happened regarding the farm finance scene.

Grain prices announced by the Canadian Wheat Board and guaranteed by the Government of Canada are down considerably from 18 per cent to 25 per cent. Farm Credit Corporation interest rates went up one percentage point to 14-7/8 per cent during April. Net incomes on the Prairies, in particular, are predicted to be down about $2 billion.

While the Government of Canada supposedly has half a billion dollars on the table, the premiers of those provinces involved are having great difficulty raising the money to make a matching grant. They argued at their conference in the west this week that it is not their constitutional responsibility. I think that that is the case.

I urge the House to have a discussion on this urgent matter this evening, pursuant to Standing Order 52.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): We have carefully considered the request made by the hon. member for Mackenzie. Although we are well aware of the importance of this subject, we have decided and are agreed that the hon. member's request is not urgent at this time. Perhaps it may be acceptable another time, another day, but not now.

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House resumed from Monday, May 7, consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and the amendment of Mrs. McDougall (p. 11064).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When Bill C-21 was last before the House, the hon. member for Burlington had completed his speech. The question and comment period following the hon. member's speech is now available to members, otherwise the Chair is prepared to recognize hon. members for debate.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a question.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary who, as we all know, is a very knowledgeable person in terms of the bill. He has been here for several years and he also knows procedure.

• (1120)

In the motion put by the government, the third paragraph states that the message from the Senate in regard to amendment 5(b) will be accepted by the government and proceeded with. In her remarks yesterday, the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated, as reported at page 11061 of Hansard:

> The Senate had asked us in recommendation 5(b) to reduce this—

—that is, the penalty provisions—

> —to two years and we agreed to this recommendation. We did not agree to it in the previous message because it will have some impact on our ability to fund the Labour Force Development Strategy. I would remind members that every dollar we take off the one side is not available for the other side. But we do recognize the value of compromise and we are committed to some very fundamental principles, but we are not intransigent. For that reason we are going to accept this recommendation.

At the end of the minister's speech, Madam Speaker, as you know, she tabled a motion which is lengthy and which I will not read. In it, she makes the claim that the government, conscious of this fellowship with its predecessors, reaffirms its sole and undoubted democratic right which will not in this manner be waived. Yet, prior to making the motion, she did waive the privileges of the House of Commons and reaffirmed again that there is some confusion in the government's thinking.

I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary this. How can this House adopt a motion that says that we will not waive our democratic right, our sole and undoubted rights, our privilege of being the sole House that imposes charges upon the state, and accept that the minister did exactly that? By her own admission yesterday, the minister said that this will cost the Government of Canada money.

There is in my view a double standard here. What is the Parliamentary Secretary's answer to this predicament? We have the acceptance of a money amendment made by the Senate which, in the words of the minister and previous speakers in this debate, was not to be accepted by the House. Yet, we have the government accepting it. How can he reconcile that? I would like to have an answer to that.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the member is nit-picking in the finest tradition. The minister put her remarks forward yesterday and showed the ability to compromise in certain situations.

The minister, by saying that we will not compromise, meant that the two main thrusts of the Senate amendments that would in fact gut the bill all together. It would allow amendments to be put to a bill through the Senate that could not be put in the House of Commons. It would allow amendments that would have been ruled out of order by the committee chairman had they been presented at committee. Had they been presented in the House of Commons, they would have been ruled out of order by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

That is the thrust that the minister is making in her comments, that we will not compromise on this, not the nit-picking approach that the member is taking.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn on a question or comment.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, he has accused me of nit-picking, and I am not nit-picking. I want to make my point.

Mr. Kempling: "Nit-picking" is not an unparliamentary word.

Mr. Gauthier: It is pure procedural argument and you cannot answer it. That is the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order! The hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I viewed with a considerable degree of dismay the emphasis which both the Parliamentary Secretary and the minister placed on the results of two polls, one by Decima and one by Environics. These polls apparently show that the Canadian public is very much in favour of spending UI money for training.

I am surprised that is the case. When the committee travelled across the country and spoke to representatives of these very same people, particularly the unemployed—and perhaps the Decima poll was not aimed at the unemployed—their overwhelming reaction was that this was a very wrong-headed way for the government to go, that it was a backward step, and that the victims of unemployment should not be charged for their own training.

The question I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary is this. Would he please tell us the questions which appeared in the polls put forward by Decima and Environics? It would be very interesting to know what the questions were. I suspect it would go a long way toward giving us some indication as to why the answers came forth as they did.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I do not have those questions in front of me at the moment. I have a sense that they were along these lines: Do you think the unemployment insurance fund should be revised and upgraded? Do you think there is abuse in the unemployment insurance system? Do you think that unemployment insurance funds should be used for training?

That is plain and simple. There is nothing illegal, improper, or immoral about that, as the member has stated some time in the past.

We have an opinion from the Department of Justice that states that benefits can be defined in terms of money or can be defined in terms of training. There are many people who agree that what the Senate is doing in holding up this bill is improper.

For instance, the hon. member for Kamloops said, regarding the Senate: "Quite frankly, I am very disappointed with the Senate because I do not think it has the right to hold up legislation". That was in October, 1987 when he was spoke on Bill C-22.

Then, on March 28 of this year, the New Democratic Party finance critic, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville said: "I believe the Commons should have the final say. I do not think the unelected body should usurp the elected body". That is the thrust of our argument.

Mr. Milliken: You should have been here yesterday.

Mr. Kempling: I was here yesterday.

We heard the hon. member for Kamloops yesterday do his usual little pirouette on a pinhead, talking out of both sides of his mouth all the time.

We believe that we are on the right course. We not only have editorial comments, but we have comments from across the country, from newspapers from coast to coast, commenting on what the Senate is doing. Had I time, I would read every one of them into the record again.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary a question.

Now that the other place has held up this legislation for a good many months, does he have any estimate of the cost to the country and, in particular, to the unemployed in terms of lost benefits that they could have had in the way of job retraining? When we realize the high unemployment rates that exist, particularly in the Maritimes, and the need to introduce new technologies there, to what extent has this hurt the unemployed in that region? Could he be specific about the kind of support this provision has across the country, at which he has just hinted?

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I do not know how many hours I have for this, but I will try to answer the questions.

There are many people hurt by the fact that the Senate is holding up this legislation. The hon. member for Halifax has risen several times during the course of this debate to ask about Lockeport, Nova Scotia, and what is going to happen to there now the fish plant has been closed.

What I said to her, and I will say it again, is that within Bill C-21 is the Community Futures Programs. Lockeport and a couple of hundred other municipalities in eastern Canada cannot access that program because the Senate is holding up this bill. We also have to look at the fact that under Bill C-21 an unemployed fisherman or fish plant worker would have to work only 10 weeks in order to receive unemployment payments. Under the present system they would have to work 14 weeks in order to benefit from unemployment insurance.

I would like to quote from an article in The Financial Post concerning communities where work is not available. "Senate Liberal majority leader Allan MacEachen is asking thousands of new unemployment insurance applicants in Atlantic Canada and all the depressed areas to be patient while he plays a game of political chicken with the Mulroney government at their expense."

An hon. member: It is shameful.

Mr. Kempling: He should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Proud: Same old song and dance.

Mr. Milliken: It usually is.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry I must interrupt the the hon. member. The time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I am pleased and honoured to rise again in the House to discuss Bill C-21 and the recommended amendments as proposed by the other place, about which we have heard so much.

I find it unbelievable that the government has chosen this time to inflict more hardships on Canadians, when they are faced with such high interest rates, the proposed GST, and a faltering economy. As has been stated by many speakers in this House on this topic, Canadians, and especially my constituents, are not fooled into thinking that this is a good bill.

Bill C-21 is a further attack on the working people throughout this country. It is an attack on those communities that lack industry and depend on seasonal employment, an attack on the underdeveloped areas and an attack on the basic foundations of our country.

At the same time that this bill is being proposed, the government is trying to turn the tables by placing the blame on the victims, those people who depend on seasonal employment and therefore on unemployment insurance to meet life's basic needs.

The hon. member across the floor was very quick to blame the people of Atlantic Canada for using UI as a form of social welfare. We all know that this is not the case. As I stated a few moments ago, the Atlantic region is not a heavily industrialized area and seasonal employment is the way of life, not by choice but by economic necessity.

The implication in all of this is that those who are not working 12 months a year are somehow trying to beat the system. What makes this attitude so ridiculous is that it comes at a time when federal fiscal policy is increasing our number of unemployed in its so-called battle against inflation.

A 10 to 12 week job with varying hours is not the preferred employment of the people of Prince Edward Island. What I must stress here is that it is the only employment. It is not their fault. It is simply an economic reality, the reality of living in an economically underprivileged and neglected part of Canada. Toughening the entrance requirements and shortening the benefit periods will impose further hardships on my province, on Atlantic Canada and on those people who are already living on the economic brink. Combined with the severe economic hardships associated with seasonal employment, the UI changes constitute a double hardship with very far-reaching effects on those who are seasonally employed and in turn on their families.

I would like to quote the Minister of Labour for Prince Edward Island, the Hon. Roberta Hubley: "Approximately 1,700 claimants on Prince Edward Island will no longer be able to establish a claim as a result of changes to unemployment insurance entrance requirements. Prince Edward Island recorded the largest percentage of claimants affected by entrance requirement changes. Prince Edward Island recorded the third largest percentage of claimants affected by changes to the UI benefit duration". She further stated that approximately 7,000 claimants in P.E.I. will be affected by changes to the UI benefit duration. Prince Edward Island has been singled out to bear more than its fair share of the cost of the proposed UI changes, particularly in relation to new entrance requirements. These changes will mean an increase in the absolute number of welfare recipients and will be a major blow to many residents of Prince Edward Island.

Since this bill was first introduced, I have listened to various groups, special committees and many of my constituents, and the majority of the views expressed fear of Bill C-21. The major fear is of welfare and unemployment.

Quite often the argument used by hon. members across the way is the same old song and dance about the other place. According to them, it should not even examine this bill, or if it must examine it, should ignore the wishes expressed by the people of Canada. According to the people across the floor, it should silence its conscience and without saying a word rubber stamp this legislation. I totally disagree.

The other place serves a very useful purpose. The government is not listening to the people. It is doing exactly as it wants because of its majority and that is not what democracy is about. It is true, and I would be the first to admit this, the government did win a majority. They won the majority due, in large part, to a wonderful advertising campaign. However, I would like to stress that we have checks and balances in this system. One of the roles of the other place is to be one of these checks and balances.

However, the government has to listen. That is why we have an opposition, another Chamber and, in this particular House we have three parties. All the members of this House represent all of the people of Canada.

We often hear about the number of Canadian citizens who live below the poverty line. Those Canadians must depend on food banks in order to survive. It is not a very nice fact that 3.7 million of our country's citizens live below the poverty line, but even more shocking is the fact that a quarter of these are children under the age of 16. Furthermore, one in six Canadian children is undernourished. This is a fact. As Winnipeg sociologist, Harvey Stein, stated, "Poverty, you see, is not a vote getter. The people who use food banks are certainly not the folks who make a difference at election time."

It is very sad and it is also very true. The poor, whether they be working or unemployed, are obviously not the people that politicians seem so often obsessed with when an election or hand-outs are coming. They never consider the public welfare or the fate of the underprivileged.

Senator Jacques Hébert said: "This is the only explanation that comes to mind when I try to understand why the government had the audacity to introduce a bill like C-21, which will increase the suffering of the poor and cruelly affect the many people who already face hunger."

What I find very scary about the whole situation is that, with the increase in unemployment, the cut-back in benefits and the heavy burden placed on our welfare system, what we will have are more underprivileged, undernourished and underutilized Canadians and this is a very sad situation. In Atlantic Canada it is even more sad, because we have the highest unemployment rate and the highest welfare levels. Quite often we hear the Minister of Employment and Immigration boasting about retraining and job creation and about the way this is going to solve all of our problems. Certainly we need training, and we need qualified people all over the country to do the training. In many instances, the bottom line is that you can do all the training you want, but in certain areas there are not very many jobs where these people can work.

In my home province of Prince Edward Island, and all over Atlantic Canada, the number of jobs for which you can retrain people is very limited. We realize that we can train people, who then could move on to other parts of Canada or to other areas of their region. There is nothing wrong with this, but when you train people with money taken from unemployed people for jobs that do not exist, it does not seem like a very realistic goal.

I suggest that the government, with all its great ideas and its many millions of dollars, should create an economic and industrial situation where realistic industries will be established in the outlying parts of the country. This will give people a place to work, where they can be trained for jobs. They can then go on from there.

I agree with a statement that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has made on many occasions, that the training money should not come from the pockets of those who pay unemployment insurance premiums, neither the employer nor the employees.

Many people say: "There are lots of jobs in central Canada. What is wrong with young people moving to find work?" There is nothing wrong with that. In fact, it is good for young people to move around their country. Many people have moved from east to central Canada and to the west. People from the west have moved to central Canada and to the east. This is a great thing.

It is very easy for us to say this, but there are many people in the age group 30 to 40 who are already married and raising families. It is very hard for them to uproot themselves and move to other parts of the country, when they do not know whether jobs exist there. It does not matter where many of these people live, they do not want to leave that particular part of the country, because neither their parents nor grandparents left it.

The cold hard facts of life may be that this is what is going to come, and that we have to prepare people in a different way. There has to be another way of teaching people that perhaps the part of the country where they grew up is not where they will be able to live. This is a very cruel thing to say.

In conclusion, if the government's true goal is positive reform of unemployment insurance, it should not hesitate to pass any of the amendments that are proposed by the other place. The amendments are moderate, sensible and sensitive to both the government's professed goal of deficit reduction, and the needs and dignity of unemployed Canadians.

The key word is dignity. For this reason, I fully support these amendments and urge the government opposite to do the same.

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, today, I will again try to convince all Canadian parliamentarians of the relevance of Bill C-21, tabled by our government to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I will look at this reform from the perspective of the twenty-first century. I will then consider the political aspects of the new legislation and its positive impact on the labour force across this country.

As you know, the text of this legislation reflects the goals of our comprehensive Labour Force Development Strategy, and in fact, both documents form a whole. Our objective is to get employers, unions, governments and all Canadians involved in taking every initiative they consider appropriate to raise the level of skills of our workers.

We also want to implement the policies, programs and employment approaches that will help workers achieve their potential in a technological world where the demand for skills is becoming increasingly sophisticated. The government intends, without further delay, to take appropriate steps to ensure that Canada's labour force is able to adjust to rapid changes in the job environment as a result of major demographic shifts and major changes in technology. Our prosperity and standard of living will depend very much on our vigilance and the speed with which we act. Canada, like other industrial nations, faces a world of increasingly open markets where incredible opportunities are within our grasp. However, the competition for these markets is steadily increasing. We must be prepared for these changes: time is of the essence.

Bill C-21 proposes a comprehensive approach that will help us solve our problems. Bill C-21 updates our unemployment insurance system while making it possible for more claimants to train for new technologies. Without wishing to be alarmist, we must realize that technological change means our workers must acquire additional skills. We cannot escape this imperative. A day of hesitation is a day lost for the quality of life of our workers.

The message of Bill C-21 and the Labour Force Development Strategy to the people of Canada is this: Be prepared. Prepare for your future. Learn new technologies now.

To young Canadians particularly, we want to say this: Get an education and be prepared to consider training as an on-going process. Madam Speaker, enough time wasted. It is imperative that Bill C-21 be passed and receive Royal Assent. The benefits for Canadians are tremendous. Everywhere I go, I meet people—development officers, workers, unemployed Canadians—who share our views on the Labour Force Development Strategy and Unemployment Insurance reform.

Since 1984, we as a government have started a thorough review of the legislation. Gradually and systematically, we have taken a number of measures whose ultimate goal is to adapt our legislation to the concrete needs of the workers of today and tomorrow. As part of a logical and well-thought out approach, our Labour Force Development Strategy contains four major goals which I may perhaps recall this morning.

First, we want to see a substantial increase in the private sector's role in training these workers and in ensuring that training is more responsive to present labour market needs. We realize it is our role to support the private sector in this very important task: to work with that prime resource, the Canadian labour force.

Second, we have decided to reallocate part of the unemployment insurance budget to increased funding for training and re-employment. Some substantial changes have been made, as we all know, and all these changes will benefit our workers.

Third, we want to improve unemployment insurance benefits, in order to be more responsive to the needs of working parents and workers over 65. The latter are now taking advantage of their right to continue their career, and we must adjust to this new situation.

As Minister of State for Seniors, I had an opportunity to talk to this group of workers who want to stay on the job and have a lot of questions about the changes that are urgently needed.

Finally, we want to reduce work disincentives which have tended to make the present system one under which recipients no longer actively seek employment, a situation that has gone on far too long. For each of the goals I just mentioned, we have allocated funding at levels appropriate to new demands and to a modern and pragmatic view of the situation.

Our programs thus include more help for the private sector for human resource planning and training and special assistance for older workers who must relocate. They also provide career training for young people and projects to help revitalize local economies. As a government, we believe in dynamic communities. We are prepared to listen to them and to work in partnership with these communities because they are the only ones who really know their workforce training needs.

As you no doubt know, Madam Speaker, the changes to the old Act reallocate $800 million. These funds will help us launch our labour force development strategy. Once our bill is passed and implemented, there will be more funds for basic training of beginning workers. The funds for the co-operative education program, which is working very well, will be increased fourfold.

Under our proposed changes, $350 million from the UI Fund will be used to increase the aid now given to programs for training, relocation assistance, entrepreneurship and re-employment.

Employers will receive more help for human resource planning. Nearly 41 per cent of full-time workers received no training in the last two years and 53 per cent of unskilled workers receive no training at all. This stagnation worries us because it creates a lack of mobility that harms our economy and runs counter to the present trend of globalization of markets.

In our Bill C-21, we see an opportunity for all Canadians to take a new attitude to their obligation, where they are, to train and retrain throughout their career. As technology changes, Canadians must acquire new skills. Our goal is flexibility.

But we must also note that Bill C-21 is much more than an economic catalyst. This bill faithfully and realistically reflects changes in Canadian society. Finally, the benefits of our new UI plan will comply with our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I am convinced that we have chosen the right path and I am proud to belong to this government that wants to reform this very important social program. We are convinced this is the best way. We chose this approach after repeated consultations with our economic partners. Since 1985, a sound relationship has been established which has helped us acquire specific insights and respond to genuine needs.

Employers, unions, academics and directors of associations convinced us that training was an imperative need. We were mindful of this in developing our reform.

Our bill kills two birds with one stone. First of all, it reinforces the ability of the unemployment insurance system to continue to function as a safety net for people who need it. Second, it provides skills training and offers other specific measures to help claimants adjust to changing labour market conditions.

The new legislation will also change entrance requirements and benefits. These changes reflect wide variations in unemployment across the country. They will mainly benefit claimants living in regions with the highest unemployment rates, where job opportunities are scarce. Where equity had to be restored, we saw to it that it was done.

When the new legislation is passed, claimants will have to accumulate from 10 to 20 weeks of employment to be eligible for benefits, depending on the unemployment rate in the region where they work. This makes for a system that is far more sensitive to unemployment rates and to labour force mobility.

The new legislation will increase penalties for persons who quit without just cause, refuse a suitable job or are fired for misconduct.

The benefit period will be based on the number of weeks of employment and the regional unemployment rate. However, the present three-tier structure will be brought back to a single tier.

We are proposing a complete overhaul of the present system for maternity, sickness and parental benefits. The proposed changes will enhance the flexibility of the benefit system and extend the benefit period, and as I said before, these changes will be in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Madam Speaker, our new legislation gives workers aged 65 and over the kind of protection they have never had before, because we want to protect the rights of all workers. The people in this age group have no obligation to withdraw from the labour force, and they should be treated fairly. That is what we have done.

Together with our Labour Force Development Strategy, the Canadian Jobs Strategy is a fundamental tool for this government in achieving the main objectives I have mentioned. We have developed six programs, which I will describe briefly.

The Job Development Program was designed to help the long-term unemployed re-enter the job environment with the help of on-the- job training or training in an educational institution.

The Job Entry Program helps people who have trouble entering or re-entering the labour market. It addresses the needs of women, young people and individuals with serious employment problems. Thanks to the UI reform, we have the money to provide additional resources and assistance to reinforce this program for young people, women and the disadvantaged.

We also have the Skill Shortages Program which gives employers the help they need to train employees for jobs where there is a manpower shortage.

The Skill Investment Program is designed for workers who have just been laid off or whose jobs are changing as a result of technological change or developments in the labour market.

The Community Futures Program responds to the needs of small communities experiencing chronic unemployment. We provide training support and assistance for development projects, entrepreneurs and relocation of businesses. The program operates as a partnership with the communities.

Finally, the Innovations Program, as it name indicates, promotes the development and testing of innovative solutions to labour market problems in specific areas.

The programs I just mentioned are already in effect and will be continued after Bill C-21 is passed. They are a logical component of our overall approach to unemployment insurance claimants and the various programs we have set up to help them re-enter the labour market as soon as possible and find the jobs they need.

Madam Speaker, adopting Bill C-21 and the Labour Force Development Strategy will make it possible to provide a pragmatic and intelligent solution to many of our labour market problems.

This legislation should be passed without delay. Thousands of unemployed workers and people who are otherwise disadvantaged stand powerless, waiting for the funds the government is prepared to allocate so they can upgrade their training and adjust to the demands of new technologies.

While we hesitate to pass this bill, our competitors continue to step up the training of their workers and to raise their skill levels. Canadian workers deserve better than the present lack of action from Parliament.

Most Canadians, I repeat, approve the direction taken by our government. In a Decima survey, more than 60 per cent of those questioned support updating our unemployment insurance legislation and our options for labour force training. The survey also tells us that more than 90 per cent support what we propose to help claimants find a new job. Eighty-five per cent would support the required changes, as we propose, to give Canada a more qualified labour force.

From having worked with associations of the unemployed before 1984 and from having crossed Canada since 1984, I personally tell you that the reform before us meets the specific needs of the men and women of Canada.

If we heed the recommendations of experts, the desires expressed by the public, the demands of the global economic reality, we will pass Bill C-21 quickly. Let us do so without delay for the sake of this objective, the quality of life of our Canadian workers.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, the minister and her government, in answering the message from the Senate, accepted one important change and the principle of two more, which they will incorporate in the bill.

The first amendment adopted, 5(b), deals, as we know, with the unserved period of disqualification imposed on someone who has to, or wishes to, leave a job without valid reason.

The second concerns the training plan to be submitted to the House of Commons for consideration.

• (1200)

The third amendment concerns fishermen's benefits, which, as we know today, are in the regulations and not the legislation. The government agrees to put the regulations on fishermen's benefits into the legislation, which is a step forward.

I must say that we agree with this approach, although these three amendments are very timid, because they are well received by the unemployed and the workers of Canada.

Nevertheless, the government is still hesitating and waffling on the essence of this bill, which is the complete withdrawal of the Canadian government from the financing of unemployment insurance in the years to come.

The burden will thus be borne by the workers and employers, which we do not think is the way to go at all, Madam Speaker, because we believe that the Government of Canada has an important role to play in funding unemployment insurance in the regions with economic difficulties that they cannot face, in some cases, without the help and support of the rest of the country.

I would like to ask the minister a question: The minister knows very well that Bill C-21 is an amendment to the original legislation, the revised 1971 Act. I have already argued in this House, as I am sure the minister knows, that what the Senate wants to do is reduce the present imposition by half. The present legislation provides that the government cover a large part of the cost of unemployment insurance throughout the country.

The Senate proposes that the federal government, instead of eliminating its contribution completely, contribute at least 50 per cent of the cost of benefits.

I ask the minister whether she really has a serious reason to tell Canada's unemployed that the federal government's spending power will no longer benefit them, in order—take note, Madam Speaker—to reduce the deficit. I ask the minister whether this government wants to wipe out the deficit—and it doubled the debt in the last five years—by saving money on unemployment insurance. How can they justify asking Canadian workers, Madam Speaker, to accept this government's passing the burden of lowering the national debt onto them while withdrawing its spending power for funding unemployment insurance?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): The answer is very simple, Madam Speaker: It was common sense.

We have known for a number of years that it was imperative to change the unemployment insurance system which, as you said before 1984 and as we have said since then, takes a far too passive approach.

The present government has a number of important objectives to meet, and the Senate's proposal is diametrically opposed to our objectives, which are to reduce the deficit, improve our social programs and reform the unemployment insurance system which we believe is too passive.

What we want to do, in co-operation with employers and workers, is be able to rejuvenate the labour force strategy and prepare that primary resource, our human capital, for the competition we can expect on a global market, and meanwhile achieve part of our initial objective which is to reduce the deficit. Once that has been done, we will be able to improve our social programs.

I know, from having talked to many unemployed workers, that our strategy appeals to Canadian men and women. It appeals to our departmental officers who are ready to work on these training programs.

The strategy appeals to our communities which during the past two years have worked very hard, with the help of volunteers, to define employment and development strategies and make recommendations to the government, recommendations we are now considering and intend to implement.

Bill C-21, while making it possible to reduce the deficit and at the same time maintain a safety net for those who really need it, also provides the resources to reinforce our Jobs Strategy programs, to reinforce this form of partnership with our young workers, and at this point I wish to pay tribute to the energy and enthusiasm of our volunteers, to the people who want to improve conditions in regions beset by unemployment rates that are far too high.

I can say I am proud to belong to a government that has these important objectives and that looks to the future. That is why we are proposing this reform. And if you are so concerned about the well-being of the workers of this country, I suggest you hurry over to the other place and ask your friends to pass Bill C-21 as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister said, but I did not find the comments to be all that convincing.

It is certainly true that the government has run into some trouble with the Senate—let us call it what it is—insofar as the passage of Bill C-21 is concerned. In no way does that excuse the government's lack of action in bringing in the variable entrance requirements, something that has traditionally been done over the last decade, in order to make it possible for people to be able to qualify for unemployment insurance at a lesser period of time than 14 weeks. There is no excuse whatsoever for the government not having done that. It certainly could have brought in other provisions as well, such as parental leave.

I would like to ask the minister specifically: Why was the government so adamant in not bringing in the variable entrance requirements before the end of the year in order that those people who came from regions with high unemployment were not able to access the rates and benefits which in any other year they would have been able to do?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): For the simple reason, Madam Speaker, that our bill and our reform contain this sensitivity to unemployment rates that vary from region to region and from sub-region to sub-region. The reform and our bill reflect our concern for peripheral regions with higher unemployment rates.

Madam Speaker, this legislation will help us increase the amount of training we provide, meet specific needs, and be more sensitive to regional unemployment rates. The variable entrance requirement is included in our unemployment insurance reform because our overall perspective bids us to give special consideration to those regions that are economically sensitive, and we also know that if we are to meet the requirements that will exist in the year 2000, we will have to provide training and do so in co-operation with employers and workers, and that is exactly what we intend to do with our Labour Force Development Strategy and Bill C-21.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I am certainly glad that I did not have to answer the last question which I asked. For the government not to have brought in the variable entrance requirements, which was certainly an option it had, demonstrates the mean and lean and vicious temperament of this government in many different areas of endeavour.

Over a year ago now when Bill C-21 was introduced in this House, the major government propaganda paper that was submitted with it was a piece of garbage called Success in the Workplace. We have had ample opportunity over the last year to see that government members have not been too successful in putting forth the concepts in Bill C-21 and for very good reason. It is not an accident that they find themselves in what may very well turn out to be a constitutional problem with the Senate at this time.

I could not believe it when yesterday, over a year after it had been introduced, the minister said very nearly the same things which had been said a year ago. The vision I had as she was presenting her speech yesterday was that she could hardly contain herself from not hugging herself; she was so pleased with what she was saying and so pleased with what Bill C-21 was supposed to be doing. I cannot believe that after a year she would still feel the same way about such an horrendously bad piece of legislation and something with which the government had so much trouble.

The assurances with which it was introduced have shown to be hollow, and there are a good many reasons why we would conclude that they are so hollow. There were assurances about training and assurances about the training ethic, for heaven's sake, which we may or may not get into later. In case we do not, I will just mention the private sector becoming more involved in the training of Canadian workers. We have not heard too many references to training ethic in relation to Bill C–21 since, with very good reason, because it is something that they are not all that much committed to.

They talk in the most glowing terms of human resource planning. They talk about maternity benefits that are going to accrue under Bill C–21, the benefits to those over 65 years of age and parental benefits, the last two of which except for some change of heart—and I am at a bit of a disadvantage to understand why—were really imposed upon the government as a result of court decisions. As far as the paternal leave was concerned, there was a point up until very shortly before this legislation was introduced where they were going to challenge the decision of the court that parental leave should receive a similar kind of consideration along with adoptive leave. That is just a bit of an indication of how really insincere this government is when it comes to the actions and benefits of Bill C–21.

There are references to the other things to which I have referred such as assistance for social assistance recipients. I would suggest that for the most part every one of those grand and glorious things that they so often fall back on and refer to has very little to do with what Bill C–21 really does. The only way that they can claim any validity as far as Bill C–21 is concerned is that the money they are robbing from those who become unemployed, paid for by those people before they became unemployed, and the money that they are robbing from the UI fund which is now going to go out of the UI fund is totally divorced from Bill C–21. That is why I cannot understand them even referring to these actions within Bill C–21, except that is where they get the money for the training. That is where they are going to get the money for the human resource development. That is where they are going to get the money for Community Futures. That is where they are going to get the money for some of these things that go along with training. That is fine, and we will come to that later.

There are very good reasons those things should occur. However, there are even better reasons those things should not occur in relation to Bill C–21. I think that the government is really stretching the credibility of Canadians a long way, particularly those who understand the implications of Bill C–21, to be speaking of them in the same breath at all.

Bill C–21 was introduced with glowing assurances a year ago. It is tremendously fortunate that it has taken Bill C–21 as long as it has to go through this Parliament because it has given us a chance to look at what this government does in relation to other endeavours which it has carried out over the year. We have seen that there is no reason whatsoever to feel any assurance that the benefits the government states will accrue from Bill C–21 will in fact happen.

As with many other things in which the government has involved itself and the Canadian public at the same time, we can only assume that working Canadians and those who become unemployed are in for an extremely rough time. I would suggest that the proof lies in the results of other government actions throughout the year.

When Bill C–21 was first introduced, we had not yet been exposed to the clawbacks. We had not yet realized that this government was so mean spirited that it would be taking back from the children of this country what little accrues to them through the family allowances. We had not realized that our senior citizens, those who had served this country so well and had established many of the principles upon which this country, government and Parliament are based, would have part of their old age pension clawed back.

The government has used closure innumerable times, in relation to Bill C–21 itself and almost every other piece of legislation that has gone through this Parliament. The closure principle within Parliament is one of the meanest, vilest, most desperate measures that governments can use. This government has used closure so often that is becoming almost meaningless to refer to it. In the last year the closure motion was used by this government some 35 times.

The government has introduced clawbacks. What about the sacred trust? There is no reason why the Canadian public should have any faith in this government at all.

The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was one of the foundations of protection for Canadian workers in this country. It is going to be devastated by cut-backs which this government is going to impose upon the Canadian public.

The reference to the Environics and the Decima poll which claimed that the Canadian public was so much in favour of using UI funds for training is rather amusing. If we are going to talk about polls, let us talk about polls that show how the GST is so unpopular with Canadians and yet the government is certainly not going to back off on that. That is another example of how this government, as it admits, is so entrenched in its philosophical desire to change the social fabric of this country that it will not back off.

There are other examples of why we should not be assured that changes to Bill C-21 are going to be of benefit to Canadians, based on this government's demonstration of animosity toward the Canadian public.

The government that wants to bring in Bill C-21 is so caring and democratic that it arrested two solitary demonstrators outside the entrance to the House of Commons. Would a government that brings in that kind of a regulation and does that to two solitary demonstrators within feet, literally, of this very Chamber, have any particular democratic regard or economic regard for the welfare of Canadian workers and whether or not they are unemployed? I would suggest that the answer is no.

Last December the government brought in back-to-work legislation to force their most disadvantaged employees back to work. These employees were disadvantaged because they were unionized but also because they had been prevented from going on strike ever since the moment they were unionized.

Part of the dispute surrounding that back-to-work legislation was affirmative action. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that yesterday the minister made reference to affirmative action and equal opportunity. I would suggest that any reference to affirmative action and equal opportunity made by the minister yesterday rings particularly hollow and is just that much more of an argument that what the government is proposing to do with Bill C-21 will not meet with success. The government forced workers back to work, mostly women, when tribunal after tribunal had determined that those women had been improperly paid for a long time, and that they ought to be properly paid. The government forced them back to work without addressing that situation at all.

It is absolutely foolhardy for this government to say that Bill C-21 is going to be beneficial. I would suggest it would be more foolhardy for the Canadian public to ever disabuse themselves of the idea that Bill C-21 is going to be beneficial. I am certain that there is going to be a tremendous amount of hardship wreaked upon the Canadian public when those provisions are brought into force.

The Government implies that once Bill C-21 is passed training will be available to the unemployed, and I would suggest even more particularly to those who have not yet found a job, or to those who will be re-entering the workforce after some time. The implication is that there will be training. They will find that nothing could be farther from the truth.

The very best we can hope for is access to training by a doubling of the number of people who have had access to it in the past. In the past, that number was 3 per cent. At the very maximum, the availability of training for people will be 6 per cent of over a million people who are unemployed, 94 per cent of whom will be thinking they will be able to avail themselves of training only to find out that they will not.

The language with which this bill was introduced and the language with reference to training in this bill is nothing more than trying to get people interested in a lottery.

This government ought to be saying to people that the fact of the matter is that there is a limited amount of money so not everyone will be able to access training. That is the real dishonesty of what this government is doing. Under the present unemployment insurance legislation, if you become unemployed at least you can get unemployment insurance, and to imply that if you become unemployed you will be able to access training is totally dishonest. I would suggest that spending U.I. premiums on training is no way to ensure that people will receive training and it is particularly vicious of this government to make those implications.

The government talks about all this money that is going to be available for training. The question that naturally comes back is, where is the money coming from? The answer is that the money is going to be coming from the victims, those who are going to be unemployed, because they will have to work longer to qualify for less. Employees will have to pay more in premiums and they will receive less, and then the penalties will be increased.

When the bill was first introduced the government said that the abuse of the system was not very high. Whether it was in the committee, whether it has been in this Parliament, as recently as yesterday when the minister made her reintroduction of comments on this bill, the was reference to abuse. I would suggest to this government that if it really believed that doing away with the so-called abuses within the UI system will put people back to work, then the very best thing that could be done would be to do away with UI altogether. If that is the kind of incentive we need to get people back to work, do away with it.

I would suggest that if the government did away with the unemployment insurance scheme, there is not one more person who would find a job. The reason is there are not any jobs out there. It is lack of jobs that is the problem, not that people are abusing the system and not that the fund is necessarily badly abused because people are supposedly drawing more heavily on it than they ought to be.

The incentives which Canadians need to get working are good quality jobs at good quality wages for the single moms, the poorly educated and the illiterate. I know people who are illiterate. I know people who are poorly educated. I know that they are working at jobs that are quality jobs. I know that they are working at jobs at quality wages. There are not a lot of those around any more. Illiterate people are not ignorant people. People who are poorly educated are as able to take their place in Canadian society as anyone else, if the jobs are there for them to do. They are capable of being as gainfully employed as someone who is highly technically trained or professionally trained, and are capable of earning a living if the jobs are there. I am not saying that someone who cannot read should not be given every opportunity to read, but I would suggest that taking funds away from the unemployed is hardly the way to do it.

I suspect that I am running rather short of time. I see that I have one minute. There is so much to be said but I would like to conclude by moving:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words following the first word "THAT" and substituting the following therefor:

"The order for the consideration of the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be discharged and the Bill withdrawn."

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): With leave of the House, the Chair will take this amendment under advisement and come back later with a decision. Questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I know there are several members on both sides of the House who would like to speak to this particular motion and I am wondering if there might not be an agreement to allow us to sit through the lunch hour and to therefore get on two, maybe three more speakers which would probably be helpful to all sides of the House.

• (1230)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, we, of course, would not oppose such a proposal, although it does play havoc with plans for the lunch hour of some people. They did not know they would be here speaking and had engagements outside. Of course, if it is in the interest of debate and furthering the advancement of the cause of trying to get this government to understand reason and to change its mind on Bill C-21 and make it more humane, we will try to do that during the lunch hour.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I can also consent to the request to sit through the lunch hour. We, too, believe that the issue demands as much attention as can be given to it. Hopefully, with reasoned debate from this side of the House, government members will see fit to do what is proper in this case.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions and comments, the hon. minister.

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I would like to know how the hon.

member opposite can say, with a straight face, that our proposal is taking funds out of the Unemployment Insurance Fund. He gives the false impression that what we are doing with this legislation is reduce the safety net, which, however, is still in place and will be maintained. He knows perfectly well that the money comes from a transfer of funds within the unemployment insurance system which will help us improve social benefits for workers and provide an incentive for the unemployed to find jobs. My question is this: Since his party is against tax increases and increasing the deficit, how would he consider financing this additional training?

[English]

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, I am not entirely sure whether I understood the minister's comments. I think I heard the minister say that this was merely a transfer of funds within the unemployment insurance fund. I hope that is not what I heard, because C-21 really does not do that. Bill C-21 removes from the public Treasury any assistance to people who have been working and become unemployed.

Previously, the extended benefits to fishermen came out of general revenue. Previously, other extended benefits as well came from general revenue. If a worker was unemployed and able to access a training program which continued past the expiry date of his or her entitlement to unemployment insurance, the unemployment insurance did not cease. It continued and the continuation of those payments came from general revenue. That will no longer be the case.

In a very real sense, that worker who had been working and contributing to the unemployment insurance fund, at least in some small measure, will be paying a portion of the the cost of his or her own training subsequent to the passage of C-21.

The money the government is always talking about which will be available for training—this $1.3 billion or whatever it is—is money which used to come out of general revenues and went to the direct benefit of the unemployed. That will no longer be there. I have no problem with those on social assistance receiving training. I have no problems with those on social assistance receiving much more social support than they do now.

What I and almost everyone, including employers, who submitted a brief to the parliamentary committee on Bill C-21 objected to was the abuse of funds for those kinds of things, taking it out of the unemployment insurance fund and putting it into there. If the minister meant that it is the juggling of those funds from one side of the Bill C-21 barrier into the public domain, I object to that. If that is what Bill C-21 is doing, then I have been misled and I think the public has as well.

The fact is that the UI fund has now been privatized. The employers and employees who will become the recipients of any benefits from unemployment insurance after Bill C-21 is passed are going to be the ones contributing to it and benefiting from it.

An hon. member: What's wrong with that?

Mr. Fisher: Well, I may be wrong but—

Some hon. members: Of course you are.

Mr. Fisher: I may be wrong in what I am about to say, but I believe that a tremendous amount of public funds goes into the training of lawyers. A tremendous amount of public funds goes into our universities for the training of accountants. A tremendous amount of money even goes to support General Motors and a good many other corporations within our society.

If we can use public funds to train lawyers, we can use public funds to train machinists and mechanics and, yes, labourers, too—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: —because, when one becomes unemployed, one is going to be, quite literally, paying for that trades training out of one's own pocket.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we have been treated in the House of Commons to the worst parade of socialist myths that I have heard for some decades. We have heard every one in the book: that we do not pay for medicare, medicare is free; that unemployment insurance is a benefit that can be distributed without regard to the source of funding; that everything is free; that money grows on trees; and that one does not have to balance revenues with expenditures. We have heard all the social myths, ending with the worst social myth of all: there can be progress without change. One does not change the unemployment insurance legislation, but one just learns to live with it.

The member also had the nerve to mention strikes. He did not think of the other side of strikes. He did not think of the veterans who did not receive hospital care while the hospital employees were on strike. He did not think of the fishermen, some of whom perished at sea, while the ships' crews were on strike. He made no mention of them. He made no mention of essential services.

He was concerned because the government dared to interfere with a strike in order to try to benefit the veterans and seafarers of Canada. He made no mention of that and no mention of the fact that, in the end, through the awful vehicle of compulsory arbitration, the ships' crews got pay equal to everybody in Canada plus an 8 per cent increase. There was no mention of that. The bogy of compulsory arbitration is just another socialist myth.

Who speaks for the workers of Canada? Does the member speak for the workers of Canada who never collect unemployment insurance but have to pay increasing premiums, even though the unemployment insurance rate has gone from double digits down to 7.5 per cent across Canada under this government? Despite that, workers have to pay higher and higher unemployment insurance premiums to pay for this system which he supports and does not want to change.

What about the steel workers? What about the 500,000 government employees who do not collect unemployment insurance? Does he want them to pay for all the waste in the unemployment insurance system, or does he want it to change? Does he want it to receive positive emphasis so that the people who pay will get the benefit and the people who need the benefit will receive it, but not those who simply use the system?

• (1240)

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that I did not make that last comment. I would like to tell my hon. friend from Halifax that for all my working life I have contributed to the unemployment insurance fund and I have never collected one cent. I have never begrudged any worker, anywhere, who did. I and the workers of Canada resent the implication that there is a lot of abuse.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: Insofar as the strikers are concerned, the minister seems to have a rather short memory. Time after time he attributes the loss of lives to the ships' crews strike. As a matter of fact, the ships' crews reacted in all haste whenever there was an emergency and there was no loss of life or shipping attributable to that strike whatsoever because they responded. The minister knows that. Even to imply otherwise is tremendously dishonest.

As far as the veterans are concerned—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order.

Mr. Fisher: May I have a minute or two to wrap up?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In letting the hon. member know that his time had expired, I was prepared to let him complete his sentence, but certainly not to continue for two minutes.

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I would like to say just a few words concerning this motion before the House. The Unemployment Insurance Act was changed by the Government of Canada by way of a bill which was rejected in the House of Commons by the opposition parties. That bill went to the Senate which examined it and made amendments.

What does the unemployment insurance bill do? It cuts back on unemployment insurance benefits. It cuts back because the triggering point for receiving unemployment insurance benefits under the new bill is changed so that in most parts of Canada more insurable weeks will be required than are at present. There are no other changes as far as I can see.

We have heard a lot of talk about training and changing the Unemployment Insurance Act so that somebody can be educated or re-educated. I do not see a change in the bill saying that if one wants to attend a vocational school or university one can collect unemployment insurance while going there. The act still states that, if one is attending a full-time course of instruction, one does not qualify under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Government of Canada turns around and says that it is going to allow certain people to collect unemployment insurance because it is going to buy certain seats in training schools. It does not say that everybody qualifies, as it should say. Therefore, it creates a built-in discrimination against young people and older people. In our vocational and training schools, somebody sitting in one seat is getting unemployment insurance, while the person in the next seat cannot qualify, even though they had worked in the same place.

Anyone who is familiar with the law and jurisprudence surrounding this act, or who has examined the jurisprudence laid down by federal judges—and it amounts to some 12,000 cases in the last 15 years or so—will know that it is very confusing. A person entering university will say: "All right, I was working, I am applying for unemployment insurance benefits and I am going to take three courses and maintain my status as a full-time student. I am going to be available for work. I am going to go out and look for employment. I am going to sign a sheet of paper that says that if I can find a job I will leave the school that I am attending."

The law is the law is the law, and the law has not been changed by this government to amend that section of the act that should be amended.

I recall that when the government was campaigning in 1984, it came out with a policy which was right at the top of its policy list to allow people, if they qualified, to collect unemployment insurance benefits while they attended a full-time course of instruction. It was never done, but what a marvellous policy that would be if it was actually implemented.

Every works program of the Government of Canada in Employment and Immigration is under the heading of training. In other words, if you go to work on a works program it is for training for something. If a community wants to receive any type of federal money, it has to be for training somebody to do something.

For example, take a community that is surrounded by forests in which there is a sawmill that has closed. The community applies for a works program for a year to thin the forests. Under this government, the only people who qualify to go to work in the woods are people who have never been in the woods before.

The whole structure of job creation has changed under this government so that the only work available through the Government of Canada in a logging community is for non-loggers who are going to be trained to become loggers when all the other loggers are out of work. Or you might find 10 or 12 out-of-work carpenters in a small community where a job comes up to build a public building, but they are not allowed to work on that project because they are already carpenters.

Because all of the money for works programs is zeroed in on high unemployment areas, you find that the very people who are out of work and who need work cannot go to work. You put more people into that vocation to put them out of work because once they have worked at it for one year they are not allowed to work at it for the next year.

This business of training really has no justification at all as a positive measure under this particular bill. The average unemployment insurance cheque in Canada today is about $204.50. Imagine, Madam Speaker, all the people abusing that system. Imagine abusing the system to collect $204 when, depending upon your circumstances, you would qualify for almost that amount of social security, depending upon which province you live in.

The list of cases of abuse that were just referred to are commonly identified as overpayments by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Auditor General. The principal cause of overpayments in Canada is a mistake by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, if the commission makes a mistake, or if the employer makes a mistake on his books, it is registered as an overpayment and the amount of the overpayment is to be paid back by the recipient.

Most of the overpayments were caused by mistakes by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, or by the employer. What is this poor person supposed to do who is getting $204 a week, the average unemployment insurance cheque?

By the way, the total number of people receiving unemployment insurance in Newfoundland today is about 120,000. There are only 240,000 in the workforce, yet this government claims that the unemployment rate is somewhere around 12 per cent. The hon. gentleman is finding that difficult to understand. In some provinces when the unemployment rate goes down, the total number of unemployment insurance recipients goes up. It is interesting, if you are doing a budgetary analysis, to be asking for more unemployment insurance money because your unemployment rate had actually gone down. The reason for that, of course, is that it is short-term employment. When you have an increase in short-term employment you also have a subsequent increase in the number of people collecting unemployment insurance benefits.

Just imagine saying that there is a lot of cheating going on, that people are using the system. What are they using the system for, to get 60 per cent of their wages to a maximum of less than $400 a week? That is quite a using of the system. A straight investigation would find that the cause for these overpayments is not the people themselves, but some mistake by the commission or the employer.

I noticed another misconception. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans went down to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia the other day and said on national television that people enter the fishery and work for 10 weeks and then they go home and sit down for 42 weeks. And he said: "Is that the kind of example that we want our young people in Canada to follow?"

For the information of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, nobody, not one fisherman in Canada, ever worked for 10 weeks and sat home for 42 weeks. Never has one and never will one. Of course, the reason for that is quite simple. You see, when you are a fisherman you can only collect unemployment insurance benefits from the middle of November to the middle of May.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans had a press conference on national television and said that fishermen work for 10 weeks and sit home for 42 weeks. Every fisherman scratched his head and said: "How can I do that when I can only collect for six months under the law of the land?"

Mr. Crosby: Be a fish plant worker.

Mr. Baker: That is not a fisherman, it is a fish plant worker. There is quite a distinction.

As far as changes are concerned, hon. members on the government side said, "We want to change the Unemployment Insurance Act". How about changing it to make it fairer, to end the discrimination that is built into the act that has arisen from recent changes made by the Government of Canada? As I suggested before, why not make everybody eligible for unemployment insurance benefits if they are attending a full-time course of instruction to educate themselves? Why not change the fisheries regulations to make them exactly the same as labour legislation and allow fishermen to draw unemployment insurance as any labourer or fish plant worker does? Why discriminate against a fisherman and not only limit him to November to May but also take 25 per cent off the top if he is a boat owner? There is built-in discrimination in the act.

There are some things that it is not necessary to change. The section of the act relating to someone who quits is being amended. The government is saying that instead of a six-week penalty there is going to be an eight-week penalty. That really does not mean anything under the law because it is the Unemployment Insurance Commission that determines the period of time, from one week to six weeks under present legislation, that a person is going to lose if they quit their employment without just cause.

The definition of "just cause" under the act is very explicit. The commission may say that person had good cause but did not have just cause and so is going to be penalized for two, three or four weeks. Sometimes you see a six-week disqualification, although not very often because you would have to be kind of stupid to quit your work to collect unemployment insurance at 60 per cent of what you were making, a cheque of, on average, $200 a week. So there usually is some cause involved.

There are sections of the act that should be changed, that it would be very simple to change. I have always suggested over the years that we ask the ultimate experts on the Unemployment Insurance Act what changes to make. There is one group of people who are experts on the Unemployment Insurance Act. They are justices of our courts.

Justice Dubinsky from Nova Scotia recently passed away. He was a learned gentleman who knew the Unemployment Insurance Act perhaps better than anybody in Canada knows the act. There are many other justices who know the act inside out. There is Justice Martin and other justices who could be consulted and asked what changes should be made.

Why is it that members of Parliament sit in their offices and do nothing about it? It is because they do not know what to do about it. Take, for example, the case of a man who was working, took sick, and had to go on disability. His place of employment had what is commonly referred to as wage loss insurance or short-term disability through an insurance company, or workman's compensation. There are thousands of cases that are referred to MPs every year.

The gentleman has a short-term disability of 15 weeks. Then he applies for unemployment insurance benefits, but these benefits are based on the top-up in sick pay given by his employer. In other words, after working all his life and then becoming disabled, he ends up with anywhere from $50 to $150 a week unemployment insurance until he can get his long-term disability resolved.

Under the Unemployment Insurance Act, it would be quite simple to introduce an amendment that would say: "Your unemployment insurance benefits would be based on your previous 20 weeks of employment with the company with which you were actually working", as it presently states in the act. There are numerous changes that can be made by the Government of Canada in the abduction sections of the act, but the only changes it made were to save money, to cut back on the benefits and to say: "You are going to qualify for unemployment insurance now, depending on which side of the line you live." This sets communities against communities.

Provinces have never before seen such division with people who are applying for unemployment insurance benefits.

This is an absolutely terrible bill. We commend the people who object to this legislation, and we ask the Government of Canada to accept the repeater provision immediately so that the people in high unemployment areas can collect unemployment insurance benefits with the bare minimum waiting period of 10 weeks.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): As I join in this debate, Madam Speaker, I should like to thank the Government House Leader for giving us a copy of the government response to the last Senate message this past Friday after my request in the House. I am grateful to him because at least we had a chance to consider the government reaction and to familiarize ourselves with the rather complicated provisions contained in this document.

Now then, the speech delivered yesterday by the Minister of Employment and Immigration leads me to the conclusion that the government has paid precious little attention to the debates that have taken place in both the House and the Senate. Its very timid response tells us once again that the government has a one-track mind when it comes to accepting or amending the amendments duly advocated in the Senate message. The unemployment insurance legislation would definitely be improved if these amendments were accepted.

One significant fact is that this is a first for the House of Commons, a historic first in parliamentary life: a response to a message from the Senate has been sent back to us for the second time with what are basically the same amendments, if we exclude those that have been adopted in a previous debate.

[English]

When the story on Bill C-21 is reviewed in years to come, it will be seen as one of the most bizarre episodes in the history of this House. Parliamentarians will treat it as a case study on how not to proceed with important pieces of legislation.

Briefly, I want to recall the events starting with March 20, 1990 when we received a message from the Senate telling us that it was insisting on the passage of its amendments to Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance legislation. These amendments were the same ones that were either amended or rejected by the Conservative majority in this House on March 13, 1990.

Instead of dealing with the latest message from the Senate in a substantive way, the government House leader attempted to resolve his political problem by appealing to the Speaker on what cannot be assessed as anything else but spurious procedural grounds. There was nothing before the House, yet he rose on a point of order.

He was allowed to put a long diatribe on the record, contesting the validity of the acceptability of the amendments, and wanted the Speaker to rule them out of order, but the Speaker refused to bail him out. We are now back in the same position that we were in more than a month ago, that is debating the message with amendments that are in order.

The government now proposes to send another message to the Senate, a copy of which will be appended to today's minutes for those who have time and want to read them. They will find that the government is telling senators that it agrees with a few of the amendments but disagrees with most of them.

I could not find any precedent over the weekend of how the House of Commons responds to messages from the Senate. There is no precedent for the procedure now being proposed by the government House leader. I looked in Beauchesne and found that citation 814 describes the procedure for dealing with Senate amendments. It reads as follows:

> 814. When the House of Commons does not agree to the Senate amendments, it adopts a motion which states reasons for its disagreement. This is communicated to the Senate.

We did this on March 13. Beauchesne goes on:

> If the Senators persist in their amendments, they send a message informing the House of this fact.

We received that message, as I said, on March 20. Beauchesne continues:

> Upon this,—

That is, receipt of the message from the Senate:

> —the House either accepts the amendments or adopts a motion requesting a conference to which each House appoints Members; and a date is fixed for their meeting.

That is part of citation 814. The options provided by Beauchesne when the Senate insists are to either accept the amendments or request a conference.

We cannot go on with this kind of ping-pong game, messages flying from the Senate to the House of Commons, and back and forth. Maybe badminton is a better example than ping-pong; nevertheless, it sounds to me as if we are into a process of tit for tat. That has to come to an end some time.

I would like to continue with the citation from Beauchesne to describe what happens if no agreement is reached at the conference which, in our view, should be called and asked for by the House. I read from Beauchesne's fifth edition, at page 241:

> Should they again disagree, the House may accept the amendments or the Senate may withdraw them, but when neither of these courses is followed, no further action is taken on the bill.

That is the process that has been with us for more than 100 years, and that is the way things usually work out.

It is well described in, I think, Standing Order 57 and in Beauchesne's fifth edition under the heading "Appendix 1, Forms and Formulae", page 283, where the forms which would be used in this event can be found.

This procedure of holding a conference is one that the government House leader is desperately trying to avoid. Although it is provided for in our Standing Orders and is found in all the authorities, the government wants nothing to do with it. It even suggests that this is antiquated procedure not in keeping with modern parliamentary practice. I would say bunk to that. The truth is that though conferences have been available since Confederation, they were first used only at the turn of the century and have been used sometimes since then. Those who are not familiar with the process could look it up. I could give them a long speech as I have all kinds of notes on the conference and how it should be held and how it is to be proposed. But I will not dwell on that today because this may get the government all excited and disturbed.

I want to get back to the message. The government House leader has argued in the House against amendments 5(a), 5(b), 7 and 9 on various grounds. I submit humbly that all his arguments are invalid.

The minister asserts that the amendments are contrary to the principle of the bill. A bill may have only one principle. Otherwise amendments to the clauses would be in order at second reading if it had several principles.

As stated in Beauchesne's, citation 764, subparagraph 3: "The principle of a bill is stated in its long title". The government House leader seemed to think that a bill can have several principles. For example, at page 10140 of Hansard, he speaks of a "major principle of Bill C-21" and alluded there were others. He stated that amendments 7 and 9 "are clearly contrary to that principle of the bill". However, he then says, and I quote: "For the Senate to insist upon amendments that essentially undo or negate the principles of Bill C-21—" and he goes on. There cannot be any more than one principle.

I ask the minister, since he used the plural, how many principles does this bill have? If a bill can have more than one principle it follows that it should be possible to vote, "no" to one principle on second reading, and "yes" to another, if he could only find them. There is only one principle.

The Speaker himself in his decision stated that the principle of Bill C-21 is to discontinue government support of the unemployment insurance account. That is one principle that is within the bill.

If you read Bill C-21, there is more to it than that. Many clauses of the bill, if we had to deal with only the principle enunciated the other day, would have to be removed from Bill C-21. For example, those dealing with training and development, retraining programs, and all kinds of other things which do not have anything to do with discontinuing government support of the unemployment insurance account.

Unless we return to the time tested proposition that a bill has only one principle, that the House votes on only one principle at second reading, the whole legislative process would be chaotic and meaningless.

As Beauchesne's states, the principle is stated in the long title of the bill. The long title of Bill C-21 reads:

> An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

That is what this House undertook to consider when it gave Bill C-21 second reading.

[Translation]

According to the Government House Leader, Madam Speaker, the Senate amendments fly in the face of the government's budget policies. He argues that the bill is based on government budget policies approved by the House, and he maintains that the Senate does not have the constitutional authority to amend it. What a strange argument, Madam Speaker. The minister claims that the budget vote carries a number of consequences. In his remarks he stated that the vote on the budget was tantamount to automatic clearance to collect taxes. Not true. Taxes are levied against the population, not by a budget resolution but through the legislative process by acts of Parliament. We have no statute like Britain's Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1913. The minister may have drawn inspiration from that legislation, but we do not have anything like it in Canada, it is a British statute. Never has anyone dared to suggest that it applies to Canada.

Then, the Minister claimed that in the case of a budget motion, it is unconstitutional for the Senate to amend Bill C-21 through amendments 5(a), 5(b), 7 and 9.

Madam Speaker, based on that reasonning, had the Senate simply rejected Bill C-21, those amendments would still have been unconstitutional. Even the Minister did not venture to state that openly. However, it is perfectly obvious that those amendments run contrary to the approved budgetary policies of the government. The same holds true for amendments made by the House, Madam Speaker.

Of course, the government House leader is of the opinion that the simplest budget motion referred to in the Standing Orders has an enormous constitutional impact. According to him, that allows the government to levy taxes. That changes the Constitutional Act of 1867, making it possible to force the Senate to adopt all bills relating to budgetary policies as they are approved by the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker, that confines that House to amending money bills. Is there the slightest hint of truth in what the government is saying?

[English]

I want to allude to the procedure that was followed prior to December 1968 because it is important. At that time the Minister of Finance presented his budget statement on the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into a committee of Ways and Means. If after the budget debate that motion carried, the House went into the committee of Ways and Means to consider the several Ways and Means motions tabled by the Minister of Finance at the end of his statement. When a Ways and Means motion had been carried in committee, a bill to give legal effect to the motion was formulated by the minister. Thus, every tax bill originated in the House of Commons as required by Section 53 of the Constitutional Act, 1867.

The constant complaint against that procedure was that tax measures were being debated at least three times. They were debated during the budget debate, in the committee of Ways and Means, and at the several stages of the bills. In the 1960s the House decided to eliminate the Ways and Means stage. This meant that the House would not go into a committee of Ways and Means. This meant that the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair was pointless. The House provided a new form. It replaced that the Speaker do now leave the chair with, and I read: "That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government".

This new motion has no more legislative or constitutional significance than the old one. If carried, it means that the House has not withdrawn its confidence from the government, but it does not modify the constitutional powers of either the House of Commons or the Senate when tax bills originated by Ways and Means motions are before Parliament.

[Translation]

In any case, Bill C-21 is not a money bill. Such bills must originate in the House of Commons, following a vote on a Ways and Means motion which is non debatable, as we know, since 1968.

As far as I know, Madam Speaker, no Ways and Means motion relating to Bill C-21 was tabled. The minister knows all that. He knows that Bill C-21 is not a money bill. He knows that, even if it were, a vote does note affect the powers of the House or that of the Senate.

[English]

What is he trying to prove? I asked the minister to show me where the Ways and Means motion was put to the House dealing with Bill C-21. There just isn't any, Madam Speaker. It was a statutory bill voted in 1971 which established a reformed system of unemployment insurance that we modified by having before the House Bill C-21. It was an amendment to the bill of 1971; not a Ways and Means motion but a statutory amendment. It is not renewed in Ways and Means motions by Estimates every year.

We will never find that in the Estimates, anymore than we will find the moneys required for paying family allowances or old age security pensions. These are statutory programs which the government has to follow every year. They do not come to us with Ways and Means or Estimates every year saying that we would like to have the House of Commons do this. That is an engagement. It is something we do every year and that the government knows very well is the way we operate.

I turn now to the matter of the Royal recommendation and the financial initiative of the Crown. What Bill C-21 does in the clauses amended by 5(a), 5(b), 7, and 9 is reduce the statutory charges made by the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1970-72. The Speaker, at the time he made his ruling, stated on April 26, 1990 that it would be in order for this House to restore the charges on the Consolidated Revenue Fund that are being reduced or cancelled by Bill C-21. I want to quote the Speaker:

> It could certainly be permissible in this House to restore in an amending bill charges already provided for in existing legislation. For guidance on that point, I refer hon. members to Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, 21st edition, page 716—

It is under the heading of matters involving money which do not require the Queen's recommendation and in a sense answers the question as to the constitutionality of the process.

It would have been in order for a member of this House to have moved amendment 7 at the report stage, for example. It could have been done in this House at report stage, not before. The charges that Bill C-21 would reduce or cancel exist today. They are authorized by law. Nobody is trying to reduce the financial initiative of the Crown. The Crown has an unquestioned right to initiate tax and appropriation bills, but the fact that the Crown has the sole right to initiate does not restrict the power of this House, or the Senate for that matter, to amend or refuse to pass those bills. The power to initiate is not the power to legislate.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the Government House Leader is complaining that the Senate's amendments would reduce the financial initiatives of the Crown. Nothing could be farther from the truth, which is that the Government originally mismanaged the changes it wanted to make to the unemployment insurance scheme. It should have introduced a bill to repeal the previous legislation from a date to be determined by proclamation. In this way, it could have proposed immediately the kind of unemployment insurance scheme it wanted, and the royal recommendation would have accompanied a new bill which would have been binding on both of the House of Commons and the Senate. But the Government botched up the whole thing. It has been stuck ever since in a procedural mess and has made fruitless efforts to regain some credibility and remedy the situation.

Madam Speaker, you will remember that the Speaker of the House himself had referred in a moving fashion to the Act of Parliament of 1911. Since this British statute was deemed relevant, allow me to make a few short comments on this legislation.

[English]

Let us suppose, Madam Speaker, that we have in Canada a comparable law. Would its provisions concerning money bills have helped the government get Bill C-21 enacted? They would not. The Parliament Act, 1911, defines money bills very precisely.

Money bills are those that tax, appropriate money, authorize borrowing. Nothing other than those specified matters may be included. Bill C-21 is not a money bill. Erskine May's twenty-first edition, page 751, defines a money bill and I refer members to that quotation.

Madam Speaker, I see you are going to rise and tell me that my time is up. I tell you, Madam Speaker, the government is on the wrong line of this one. I think it should accept the message from the Senate, go with it and have a better bill. I only wish that it would come to its senses.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On question and comments, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a few comments on the record and a question. The previous speaker to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier who has just completed his remarks made an incredible statement that I think cannot go unchallenged. He said that Bill C-21 was invented in an ivory tower without consultation. That is an incredible statement.

There was a task force on unemployment insurance that was produced in 1981-82 on unemployment insurance. There was the Macdonald Commission report in 1985. The Forget Commission tabled its report in 1987, and the legislative committee on Bill C-21 consulted all over the country with more than 200 groups and individuals.

Certainly it is not a bill that was produced in an ivory tower. Years of study preceded this bill, and the government has proposed a plan that does what is possible today and not tomorrow. Workers want help now, not in some theoretical future. So much for what he had to say.

I would like to comment on what the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier said. I am amazed because he portrays himself as a House of Commons man. He regularly quotes Beauchesne's and Erskine May and balances the Standing Orders on his head. He made not one comment on the Speaker's ruling. It really surprised me that he would not comment on that.

I thought he would have at least commented on the method the Senate is trying to use to bootleg in amendments to a bill which we would not accept in committee under the rules of the House or we would not accept in the House of Commons under the rules of the House. He seems to think that they are quite appropriate if they are bootlegged by the Senate. I thought he would have commented on that.

He said: "The power to initiate is not the power to legislate". That is an incredible statement. Why would you initiate anything? Would it be just for the exercise of running around in circles? You cannot legislate unless you do initiate, so we initiated the bill and want to see it put into place.

I might refer briefly to the Speaker's ruling on April 26 on page 10726 of Hansard:

> I also draw to the attention of my colleagues—and I know they will be very interested—on both sides of the House to hear the comments by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on September 7, 1917. As I say, this is not put in as the substance of the ruling. It is just brought to members' attention, and I hope the attention of every Canadian who has a chance to listen or read this judgment. This is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said on September 7, 1917.
> This was his view. He was a great House of Commons man: "Under Rule 78, the Senate has no right to amend or alter in any way a money bill sent to them from this House". Rule 78 is the same as our Rule 80 paragraph 1.
> He said: "This House alone has the privilege of dealing with money bills. The only right the Senate has is that of rejecting or assenting to such money bills. That rule has been confirmed over and over again in England".

I am rather surprised. My hon. colleague, for whom I have a great deal of affection, has promoted the independence of the House of Commons and has spoken in complimentary terms many times about this place. He speaks about how we should protect our rights and privileges, but he seems to have brushed that all aside in his speed to approve what the Senate is trying to bootleg through this House. I just wish he would perhaps comment on that.

He seems to make light of the fact that we have accepted some amendments put forth by the Senate. He knows very well that this is the normal ebb and flow of views. He knows as well that there was a time when the Senate would get a bill at eleven o'clock in the morning and pass it by twelve o'clock; that is when the Liberals were in power as as government.

In fact, if we look at the last bill that went through the House under the Liberals on unemployment insurance, I think it took a total of two and one-quarter hours to run it through the Senate in all readings and bring it back to the House. It was a same day ruling. Suddenly all these things are swept aside and the member seems to feel that we should not accept any of the rulings that the Senate has put forward. In fact he has commented that to accept any of them means that we should accept all of them. I wonder if the member could comment on that. I have given him enough avenues to run down that he probably will go on for another hour.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I would be more than pleased to do that. I see the member has done his research and I commend him for it. I have the same documents from which he was reading. I just want to remind him that in reading the documents he must at least—and I know him to be an honest person—give exactly the context in which it was put.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier was talking at that time about aids and supplies. Aids and supplies is not before the House with Bill C-21. He knows that and I know that. This has nothing to do with Estimates. I addressed that in my comments. This has to do with statutory obligations of the government, bills that encompass expenditures from funds of the government of Canada, and has nothing to do with aids and supplies. I addressed that in my first comments and I address it again.

Since he did bring up the issue, and to any member interested in reading the debate that day, the Speaker of the House was a former member for the Gaspé riding, with which my grandfather had something to do, and his name was Rodolphe Lemieux. There would be some historical events here which I could relate to my friend some time when he is interested in hearing about it. I know Madam Speaker knows all about Rodolphe Lemieux and how close he was to the Gauthier family. I will not say any more than that.

Having dealt with the issue of what was not dealt with in the debate, I would like to throw back to the member the comment made by his own minister responsible for government House business, on the Question Period program of Sunday last, May 6, 1990, at 6 p.m. I just want to quote one phrase from that because it deals somewhat with what the member was talking about, the Senate's authority.

I want to quote the House Leader on the government side, who said: "You see, the Senate's authority comes from a clause in the Canadian Constitution that says there will be a Parliament consisting of the Queen, the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Now, the Governor General has the same powers the Senate is claiming but everybody would be quite surprised, to say the least, if the Governor General said: 'Well, I am going to amend this legislation before passing it'."

Madam Speaker, we know that is nonsense. The Governor General does not have the same powers that the Senate has. The Senate is a legislative body; the Governor General is not a legislative body. If the government thinks that the Governor General has the same power as the Senate, I would put the following scenario: if the government went to the Governor General and asked the Governor General to give Royal Assent to Bill C-21, and the Governor General said: "I don't like the bill, Mr. Prime Minister". Well, that would have the effect of telling the Prime Minister, "Find yourself another job. I just fired you".

He would have lost the confidence of the Governor General. Mind you, there is the other side of the story. The Prime Minister could call the Queen and say: "Your Royal Highness, fire that Governor General". We could have that kind of fight, but that is not the way things run around here. The Governor General has a role to play, within the triumvirate, if you like, of parliament's constitutional obligations.

It is there as part of our system, but he does not have the same powers as the Senate. The difference is that the Senate has the power to amend legislation and that is what it has done here; it has proposed good amendments, we think, to Bill C-21. For reasons I do not understand, the government fails to recognize that the arguments we are making are good, sound, and acceptable, and in order.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise and speak in this debate, in support of those amendments sent to us from the other place. I wish to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, for his cogent arguments on behalf of the acceptance of those amendments.

I wish to speak a bit, today, about the region from which I come, the Atlantic region, and what it is to be an Atlantic Canadian. I wish to speak about what the policies of this government, including the policies that have resulted in the government's version of Bill C-21, are doing to Atlantic Canadians.

I sat here yesterday in this House and listened to various hon. members, including the hon. parliamentary secretary, and I think that in spite of the number of Atlantic Canadians, which number 32 in this House, sometimes members from other parts of the country are not quite so aware of what it is and what it means to come from that small region of this country.

In our history in the Atlantic region we have been coal miners, in the fishery, farmers, small business operators and loggers. There has been a very diversified but small-based economy in the Atlantic region. A great deal of the work done in Atlantic Canada in those four provinces depends upon the season of the year.

Without going into all the trials and tribulations of the fishing industry, we have seen that in various parts of the Atlantic region, fishing is a seasonal occupation. Clearly because of our climate, farming is a seasonal occupation. Unfortunately, the coal mines are dead and have long been dead. This is the product of policies of yet another Conservative government and I cannot get into the problems inherent in that industry. We have a problem in Cape Breton Island with the steel plant. We have problems throughout Atlantic Canada and Atlantic Canadians rightly, are feeling hard done by. Rightly, Mr. Speaker, Atlantic Canadians sit back and wonder about this government and how it feels about them.

My hon. friend across the way yesterday talked about the fact that Lockeport, Nova Scotia could get in line along with a number of other communities for programs under this bill. I ask the hon. member, as I am reasonably certain if I leave him enough time he will probably make some comment, what he sees as the alternative for the town of Lockeport. It is a one-industry town, I think he would agree with me on that, and that industry is based in the fishery. It is based on the fishery whether you are talking about those who go out to fish, who can no longer do so, or those who process the fish in the plant that is now closed.

I heard yesterday from various members of this House on the government side and I read last night about some journalists who adhere to the government's position. They were talking about the fact that the theory that we have called, on this side of the House, the move or starve theory, but they will not use words quite as blunt as that. They were saying that the move or starve theory is one that Canadians just have to adjust to. This is why I say there is some lack of understanding about Atlantic Canadians by some of the other members of this House.

We have been moving out of Atlantic Canada practically since the first Europeans landed there in 1604. Atlantic Canadians are very attached to the place where they were born and to the place where their roots are. I am not suggesting that Ontarians, Quebecois, westerners and northerners are not just as attached but let them make their arguments when they stand in this House. I am speaking now for the people I represent and for the people from the whole region from which I am fortunate enough to come. But to say that we have no comprehension of the economic realities of life and to say that it is enough to walk into Lockeport, Canso, Sydney Mines or Halifax and say, "Well, if you can't get a job, move out", is to show a total lack of sensitivity and a total lack of awareness about what this country stands for.

While growing up in this country, I saw lots of my friends and classmates move. I saw them go to Calgary and Edmonton and other places in western Canada during the oil boom. I saw them move to Windsor, Ontario to help build cars. I saw them move to the mines in Ontario when the coal mines in Cape Breton closed. There is nothing you can tell someone from Atlantic Canada about moving out because there are no jobs. We have been doing that over and over again.

This government promised something better to Atlantic Canadians in 1984. It tried to promise the same thing in 1988 with, I am happy to say, a little less success.

This is not something on which we base partisan politics. This is the root of Canadianism and the root of what makes our country strong, the fact that every young Canadian should be able to choose to stay reasonably close to the place where he or she was born and grew up. You should not have to move to Toronto to have a better life. You should not have to move to Calgary, or Vancouver, or Montreal. You should be able to do it in small town Canada, in rural Canada, whether it be Saskatchewan or New Brunswick, Newfoundland or the Northwest Territories.

That is not what we are seeing today. We are seeing a systematic breakdown of this country. We are seeing this country turned into huge urban centres and small town Canada and rural Canada going by the boards. One of the ways in which this is being done is through the attempted passage of this bill in the form in which the government brought it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to look at the statistics, the unemployment rates and the entrance requirements under the old unemployment insurance scheme and under the new. I ask you to look at my own riding of Halifax. The unemployment rate in Halifax is approximately 7.8 per cent.

I might add that my learned colleague from Dartmouth is not with us at the moment. He and I frequently have the discussion that because of the small areas in Atlantic Canada different places get lumped in together, and that is exactly what happens in the unemployment statistics. The city of Halifax actually has a higher unemployment rate but because the slightly more prosperous city of Dartmouth is lumped in, along with the suburban areas, the Halifax figures look a little bit better. In actual fact, unemployment in the urban area and in my riding of Halifax is not as low as 7.8 per cent. I merely bring that up for information.

The entrance requirements under the old scheme call for 12 weeks. The entrance requirements under the new scheme call for 18 weeks. The number of weeks for which you can collect benefits under the old scheme was 28 weeks and under the new scheme is 21 weeks.

An unemployed human being is an unemployed human being. Just because there is a need to make the books look better from the government point of view, why should the requirements become so much stiffer in an area that is generally economically slower than anywhere else in the country? Six more weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance is going to prevent people from ever being able to collect benefits. A twenty-eight week benefit as opposed to a 21-week benefit means that many people who do manage to qualify will hardly be able to get themselves through the difficult winter periods. In Atlantic Canada, because so much work is seasonal, a great deal of the insurable weeks is maintained through the summer months. It is maintained because of the additional work in the tourism industry, in the entertainment industry, and so on.

It is a question of fairness and understanding of what people want to do. I attended a meeting where people talked about stereotypes. They said that Canadians did not want to be stereotyped according to cultural background or according to various and sundry other criteria. I said at the time that we in Atlantic Canada were used to being stereotyped. We were used to the stereotype of Atlantic Canadians sitting on a wharf in the fog, spitting into the water, and waiting for the unemployment insurance cheques to roll in. That stereotype is as pernicious as any other stereotype.

Atlantic Canadians are hard workers. That is one of the reasons they have moved so frequently to other parts of the country. They come from backgrounds of coal-miners, fishermen, farmers, steel plant workers, dock workers in Halifax—backgrounds of hard work and physical labour.

I might also add that something that has long been established in the country is the brain-drain from Atlantic Canada. Our wonderful universities in those four provinces have sent people to other universities, to this House, and to the courts right across Canada. They have led the way academically and professionally for many other Canadians. However, we do not dwell on that because we are modest people and do not blow our own horns too much of the time.

This stereotype of Atlantic Canadians just trying to get 10 weeks of insurable earnings so they can sit around, allegedly, and collect unemployment insurance for the rest of the time is unacceptable. In my belief and in the belief of many of my colleagues on this side of the House, it is this kind of attitude that created this legislation.

I recall a man I dealt with back in Nova Scotia. He did not come from my riding but was from rural Nova Scotia. He was one of the hardest workers I have seen. During the spring and fall, he worked in the woods doing as much logging as he could, given the limited resources of that industry in Nova Scotia. In the late fall he worked cutting Christmas trees for export. In the summer he did some commercial fishing when it was available. And in the winter when he could not go into the woods and he could not fish, he would hitch-hike 20 miles into the town nearest his home in the country to shovel snow for people who lived there. He hired himself out as a handyman and generally did any job that came along. If there was any work available, this man would take it. And he was not unusual. I know thousands of Nova Scotians who are like that. They try as best they can to survive in a mixed economy.

But with the mixed economies of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, from mid-December pretty well until mid-April, there just are no jobs in many parts of our provinces.

These people work from mid-April to mid-December at a variety of other jobs. They pay into unemployment insurance. Of course, they would rather be working. Any human being who has a modicum of self-respect wants to be able to support himself or herself and to provide for his or her family. That is absolutely endemic to the human condition.

But again, in looking at this bill, it is as if the government is saying: "We do not trust you out there. We know that you do not really adhere to the work ethic that we do, and we are going to get you. We are going to show you that you cannot possibly get away with all the things you have been getting away with for so long."

It says to us on this side of the House that we have a government that does not think very highly of its own citizens, and thinks even less highly if those citizens happen to come from the four small provinces clinging to the Atlantic sea coast.

When the other place made these amendments and sent them back to us, as was its right to do, I think that there was perhaps a glimmer of hope, certainly among the people whom I represent. The response to this bill in the Atlantic has not been favourable, not at all.

I participated in some of the committee hearings in Halifax last summer and while we were sitting, another committee was set up by a group of concerned citizens to hear all the people who could not come before the legislative committee. My colleagues and I from the opposition side went to that committee as well to hear what these people had to say. They had not had the opportunity to speak to the members of parliament because time was so limited.

The stories from these people about the lives that they live and the impact the changes in this bill will have on their lives were incredibly moving and frightening. It is because of this, and because of the amendments sent to us from the other place, that I think there is some hope. The other place is supposed to be the chamber of sober second thought.

For those opposite who have been bemoaning the fact that the other place does its job, I might add that the other place is a duly constituted, constitutional body. It has a job to do and it is doing it. I say to my colleagues on the government side: "You are the ones with the majority. If you do not like it, change it. You have the power to do so." But they are not doing so. Instead, they are taking things one step too far and taking it out on the citizens of Canada, particularly on the citizens of Atlantic Canada.

When Bill C-21 was first debated in the Chamber, it was not debated long enough. Every member of Parliament did not have the time they should have had in order to make his or her views known and to represent the people of the country.

There has been a great deal of talk, as well, about the Senate's delays. Again, I think that this is unfair. What the other place has done, has been done in its usual manner. The hon. parliamentary secretary talked about the fact that, under a previous government, the other place would pass bills as quickly as an hour and a half or two and a half hours. I merely state, for his own edification, that I guess they know good legislation when they see it.

We know the bill was not sufficiently debated in the House of Commons and we know, as I said before, that many groups did not have the opportunity to be heard. Provincial governments were not heard by the House committee. Claude Forget, the former chairman of the royal commission on unemployment insurance was not heard. The Economic Council was not heard, and so on. It was insufficient. Is it any wonder that the other place, knowing its duty as the Chamber of sober second thought, was not prepared to ram this through in the manner prescribed by the government?

The hearings on Bill C-21 were organized hurriedly during the summer. Again, numerous groups which applied to be heard were not permitted to be heard, giving rise to the kind of "anti-hearings" that were held in Halifax. This bill had to be reported back to the House by October 6. Everybody knows that if you want to get something through without Canadians noticing, do it in the summer time. That is what happened and, with that sort of timetable, the committee spent only one day in every province other than Ontario and Quebec, where two days were spent. That is not very much time to hear the views of those who represent over 25 million Canadians.

The other thing is that this legislation is complex. It is difficult enough for members of Parliament—some of them at any rate—to grasp what this bill is all about, let alone members of the general public, who do not have the resources or the assistance that we have, to grasp what it is we are dealing with.

The major thing is that Bill C-21 cuts $1.5 billion from regular benefits and ends the government's contribution to unemployment insurance which, last year, was $2.8 billion. These changes are radical and they should be given very close examination. In light of the radical nature of these changes, the groups that are affected by these changes should have had every opportunity to express their views.

One thing I found particularly upsetting was with regard to the variable entrance requirements and what took place in the House last December. My riding of Halifax was probably the least adversely affected riding in the country. Without the VER, the entrance requirements in Halifax are 14 weeks and with it, they are 13. Under the new legislation, they would have been 18. In the long run, without the VER, Halifax was not that much worse off. Ergo, I can enter this part of the debate, at least, with my halo shining. But I am thinking of other Atlantic Canadians. I am thinking of Cape Bretoners, and those from South West Nova and New Brunswick who were adversely affected by the absence of the VER.

I close by reminding the House that we on this side brought in the motion and agreed that we would bring it through without debate and this government voted it down. This is something that Atlantic Canadians will remember. They will remember it along with the theory that they do not want to work and that they are still sitting on the wharf whittling and waiting for the cheques to come in. They will remember for a long, long time.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, may I just put a few facts on the table for consideration.

The member spoke at length about the hearing process, the number of cities visited and the number of witnesses heard at committee hearings. She should know that her colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, suggested every city that we travelled in Canada. In fact, she should know that we wanted to travel three weeks before he would agree. In other words, we had a date set very soon after the House rose on which we wanted to begin to travel. He said: "No, no." He did not want to begin to travel until August. That was his determination, backed up by the member from the NDP. So, do not blame us for not travelling enough. Every witness heard was agreed to by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Do not tell us that they could not be heard. We did everything we could to hear as many people as we could across the country.

Let me say, as well, the member—

Ms. Clancy: I'd love to hear it.

Mr. Kempling: It is questions and comments, so I will make comments if I wish.

The member asked what can we do in Lockeport? All the fish-net used in the whole of Nova Scotia—and probably in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, as well—is imported. The bulk of it comes from the Philippines. It is not bought directly. It is bought from a Japanese agent in Tokyo. People in Canada knit the yarn for those nets. Let the people of Lockeport look into the production of fish-nets and they would have a business that would hire more than the people employed—

Ms. Clancy: There are no fish.

Mr. Kempling: There are going to be fish, don't worry.

Mr. Gauthier: Let there be fish!

Mr. Kempling: They are still fishing. Let me say as well. All the fish hooks used in Nova Scotia, do you know where they come from? They come from Norway. There is a steel mill in Nova Scotia and, yet, no one has had the initiative to turn around and ask why we could not make fish hooks in Nova Scotia for the whole of the east coast.

Mr. Gauthier: There are no fish, Bill.

Mr. Kempling: You mean they are not catching any fish at all?

Ms. Clancy: Very few.

Mr. Kempling: I just don't believe it. I look at the quotas that have been put forward.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member may want to leave the last minute for the person who made the speech to comment. The hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Burlington suggests some interesting remedies for the town of Lockeport. I am sure as soon as the fish stocks are back up they will be interested. I do not think it will satisfy the Sydney steel plant.

I want to go back to the question. My hon. friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce does not need me to defend him, but perhaps the hon. member for Burlington is rewriting history. I am not suggesting that our Liberal colleagues did not suggest the witnesses heard. I am suggesting that government members made the timetable so short that it was impossible to visit more places.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): This is a debate that will be continued later on today.

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, global warming, ozone depletion, acid rain, air quality and sustained development are fast becoming household phrases to many Canadians. Environmental awareness is growing.

Canada is blessed with an abundance of natural beauty. However, it is being threatened by industrial pollutants and human waste which is affecting our lakes, rivers, air and land.

Protection of this planet is a global concern. Our government is determined to provide a leadership role. In fact, it is the goal of this government to make Canada by the year 2000 the industrial world's most environmentally friendly country. Recently, the Minister of Environment announced the details of The Green Plan.

This government has and will continue to take action to reduce emissions of carbon dioxide, destroy PCBs, encourage recycling programs, improve waste disposal, protection of the quality of air and water, promote conservation—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, as we celebrate National Forest Week between May 6 and 12, I would like to underline the importance of the forest sector to Canada's economy.

The industry employs nearly 300,000 people directly, while 750,000 more people, including rail workers, truck drivers and machinery operators are employed by associated industries. In 1988, productive forest land yielded more than $30 billion in the value of goods shipped.

The forests which cover two thirds of our country provide us with a great many jobs, revenues and resources.

This being the National Forest Week, I cannot help emphasizing the fact that the Government has not yet renewed its Forest Resource Development Agreements with six of the provinces where they have expired.

If the Government is really committed to the forest industry, it should take this opportunity during National Forest Week to renew the expired agreements.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, Canada's national debt is approximately $350 billion, or about $13,500 per person. Saskatchewan's provincial debt is about $10.7 billion, or about $10,770 per person.

Essentially the Government of Canada has borrowed $500 million to commit to the 1989 farm cash flow problem. This money is conditional on the provinces matching it and providing a worth while, effective method of distribution. I am confident that taxpayers would not want it any other way.

Therefore, I would like to urge the province of Saskatchewan to bear in mind the economic position of the federal government and, in the spirit of co-operation, develop a program that will see Saskatchewan's farmers obtain their fair share of federally committed agriculture dollars.

FISHERIES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, on February 9, the Secretary of State for External Affairs assured the House that the government would try to develop new markets for Prince Edward Island lobsters. Yet here we are in the second week of the fishing season with no sign of support from the federal government.

Yesterday, we had hoped to hear of positive action being taken in the development of marketing for the Atlantic fisheries. But no action was taken.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans should be upgrading its role in the area of seafood marketing.

In 1989, the P.E.I. lobster season saw prices drop and inventories of frozen lobster products reached peak levels.

Prince Edward Island's lobster fishermen want to know what this government is doing to develop new markets for their lobsters. I urge this government to take action now before it is too late.

MINERAL OUTLOOK CONFERENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, tomorrow, May 9, 1990, Energy, Mines and Resources Canada, the Mining Association of Canada, the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy and the institute's committee on mining economy, will host the Eighth Annual Mineral Outlook Conference at the Westin Hotel in Ottawa.

This year, about 700 people are expected to attend, including a large number of senior executives from the mining industry and Canadian and foreign government officials.

The conference will cover the economic and financial impact of sustainable development compatible with the environment, the Canadian mining industry, prospects in the European Economic Community and the Soviet Union, the impact that developments in the mining industry in these regions may have on Canada, and financing the mining industry.

Madam Speaker, the Hon. Jake Epp, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and member for Provencher extends a cordial welcome to all participants.

TOURISM

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, British Columbia's lucrative cruise ship industry has sailed into some rough political waters. A U.S. customs decision imposed last year will no longer allow for pre-clearance of American cruise ship passengers arriving at Canada Place in Vancouver.

Since Expo '86 hundreds of thousands of Americans tourists arriving by ship from Alaska have had their luggage sent directly to the Vancouver airport while they visited the city of Vancouver. This new ruling prevents them from spending their time and money in Vancouver before flying home.

Last year, cruise ships carried 350,000 passengers to Vancouver and contributed some $75 million to the B.C. economy.

The Minister of Tourism and the Minister of Revenue Canada should brook no interference in convincing U.S. customs officials to rescind their ridiculous ruling which jeopardizes the future of B.C.'s cruise ship industry.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Madam Speaker, at a time when emotions are running high on the topic of national unity, I rise today to quote briefly from a three page letter I recently received from W. R. Darlington, a retired veteran and constituent of my riding of Delta, B.C.

There is not time to read all of it but I would like to give a few short quotes:

> I give you leave, sir, to stand up in the House and read this letter word for word to the members and remind them that they answer to all of the Canadians of all of the provinces across this country who died for this country in the first and second world wars.
> They did not give up their lives in one short day for this great country of Canada to be tearing itself apart.
> I wish I could speak French—I would tell the French Canadians that they are a great people and the country needs them. So, from a retired 67 year old Corporal from British Columbia, God bless you all.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, Canada uses strong rhetoric in support of international human rights, yet as democracy sweeps through Europe and other parts of the world, we caution the Canadian government to pay close attention to the so-called democratic reforms in some countries before going ahead with large business projects or investments.

Atomic Energy of Canada is planning the sale of another Candu reactor to South Korea, a country known for weak commitment to human rights. We have heard the allegations that despite having signed a nuclear non-proliferation treaty Romania diverted heavy water intended for its Candu reactor to India. South Korea raises concerns about its level of commitment to democracy and human rights.

I call upon the government to urge AECL to present our concerns for human rights in its negotiations with South Korea and make this commitment known to the House.

If Canada wants to maintain its reputation as an advocate of human rights, we cannot allow it to support through aid or trade authoritarian regimes, dictatorships and other violators of human rights.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the House a unique tree planting ceremony which took place last Friday on the grounds of Government House.

Forestry Canada researchers achieved a major breakthrough in forest biotechnology, producing trees from a single cell culture. This allows for an unlimited number of trees from superior seeds to be bred for special characteristics, characteristics that will give improved growth, improved resistance to disease and to insects.

This is not only a major accomplishment by the government but it has good commercial applications. It is an example of what we in Canada can do. In National Forest Week it is one that I want to praise.

PORTS CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, anyone who takes the government at its word on spending restraint had their eyes opened a little wider this weekend.

A newspaper report showed that Tory appointees at Ports Canada are living high on the hog—and I do mean hog. From sumptuous lunches at exclusive clubs to, dare I say, a Liberal approach to expense accounts, Port Canada executives are on a spending spree that would do Donald Trump justice.

Perhaps they are just following the proud example of restraint showed by salaries in the Prime Minister's office or at the Bank of Canada.

I would like to see the Minister of Transport explain it to people in my riding who have lost VIA Rail service because the government says it cannot afford it. I would like to see him explain it to the small businesses facing the GST because the government says it wants to bring the deficit down. I would like to see him deny that what the government really means by restraint is cut-backs for the rest of us while the Gucci crowd keeps raking it in.

WORLD RED CROSS DAY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, today, May 8, World Red Cross Day will be celebrated in 149 countries throughout the world. One hundred and sixty-two years ago today Henry Dunant of Switzerland founded a movement which has made the world a better place for everyone. This movement, the International Red Cross and Red Crescent, has devoted itself to his ideal, namely, that the life of every human being must be respected and protected against the ravages of man and nature.

Respect for every human being, especially those in need, guides the efforts of the Red Cross and the Red Crescent. It helps those trapped in solitude or anguish. It helps those waiting in refugee camps, in hospitals or in prisons. Those who have seen their homes destroyed and the loss of everything dear to them depend on the help of the Red Cross. From the drought-stricken fields of Africa to the war zones of Southeast Asia the Red Cross provides humanitarian assistance where it is needed.

Canada recognizes the work of the Canadian Red Cross Society and supports the ideals for which it strives. Its many services make Canada a better place and help show Canada's humanity in alleviating the suffering of those in other countries.

Let us observe World Red Cross Day by taking time to reflect on the unceasing need to protect human life and dignity, not only of Canadians, but of all humanity.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, May 6 to 12 is National Forest Week—to encourage greater public awareness of the forest resource.

Formerly called Forest Fire Prevention Week, the new title reflects the many human and environmental needs Canada's forests are now expected to satisfy.

This week, the Canadian Forestry Association challenges all Canadians to learn more about Canada's forests and to think about the multitude of benefits derived from their wise management.

An aware and knowledgeable public is necessary to provide comprehensive conservation and management of one of Canada's greatest assets.

An aware and responsible federal government is also indispensable. I therefore urge this government to develop a sound environmental policy which will allow us to both properly utilize and protect our forest reserves.

The role the forests play nationally and, indeed, globally is of paramount importance to the continuing survival and economic and social prosperity of the citizens of the world.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, this week across the country we are celebrating National Forest Week. Our forests are the backbone of this country's economy. They are the greatest of our natural resources.

Allow me to tell you, Madam Speaker, that no one knows the value of the forest better than the residents of Temagami.

I am not talking about the sightseers who travel for a day to view the pine stands of the area. I am talking about those former sawmill workers and the many foresters of the Timiskaming region. I am speaking about the many who have lived within the forests, respecting the sustained growth for generations, those individuals and families who once lived from the productive activities of the forests and who can no longer gain access to them.

During National Forest Week we should reflect upon the fate of these Temagami families and take the time to consider the great value of working forests.

Multiple land use policies have enabled many Canadians throughout our history to enjoy a rich heritage of harvesting our country's greatest resource. I ask Canadians during this week to reflect and come to respect this heritage.

LITHUANIA

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the Lithuanian MP in charge of internal security, Zigmas Vaisvila, has been hospitalized following a severe beating by Soviet troops. He went to the press building in Vilnius on April 20 to negotiate a peaceful settlement to the occupation of that building. After presenting his documents, a Colonel Fiodorov issued an order to club him. He sustained injury to his lungs, intestines and has sustained a contusion in the brain.

That deputy was presented to this House in late 1989. I would urge colleagues and Canadians generally to send letters of support to him in care of the Supreme Council of Lithuania in Vilnius in a gesture of good will. I would urge our Secretary of State for External Affairs to issue a statement to the Soviet government protesting this action.

Finally, the Canadian delegation at the International Conference monitoring Helsinki Accords on the Human Dimension should bring this matter and all other human rights abuses in Lithuania to the attention of the conference.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the premiers of the four western provinces gave a highly damaging assessment of this government's economic policies. In a joint communiqué they said, and I quote:

> There is a growing crisis of confidence in the federal government's management of the Canadian economy, and current federal fiscal and monetary policies have created the real danger of a Made-in-Canada recession.

When will the government listen to the four western premiers, three of whom are members of the Prime Minister's own party, and stop these policies that are creating a made-in-Canada recession? Why does this government insist on creating a made-in-Canada recession?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unless something happened over the weekend there are only two premiers of my party out there, not three. But I will take that as a representation, officially.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You've left out Filmon, have you? Gary is gone!

Mr. Murphy: They all voted against the GST—kick out all three.

Mr. Mulroney: He says that they are all against the GST. We will have to see. Maybe we will have none at that point in time.

I read the comments of the western premiers, and I read the comments of the Premier of Newfoundland in regard to another matter. Clearly, you would have difficulty in getting unanimity in regard to an opinion on the Canadian economy from the provincial premiers. They all feel quite badly done by these days.

That is not the opinion of the World Economic Outlook provided by the IMF over the weekend. For Canada, it stated:

> Continuation of the present monetary policy would seem appropriate until there are convincing signs that inflationary pressures are abating.

It went on to state:

> A number of important structural initiatives are under way in Canada, including reforms relating to the sales tax and the unemployment insurance system. Together with previous tax reform measures and with the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement with the United States, these initiatives should significantly improve the efficiency of the economy and enhance growth prospects.

I realize that all provinces and all premiers have matters that concern them greatly, and we are seeking as best we can to respond to the concerns.

The Minister of Agriculture put out a $500 million package most recently to assist the western farmers. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has just come back from an almost $600 million dollar investment on behalf of the people of Canada in the fishery of Atlantic Canada.

While there are difficulties everywhere, it is interesting to note that the IMF has pointed out that the Government of Canada in difficult times is pursuing economic, fiscal and monetary policies that, while somewhat painful and difficult for the moment for many Canadians, will turn out to be precisely the prescriptions that the Canadian economy requires to provide for a period of sustained, non-inflationary economic growth, which is what Canadians require.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the people of western Canada and Canada as a whole would prefer that the Prime Minister listen to people in this country, in this case the four western premiers, rather than the International Monetary Fund. I know that the Prime Minister would like them to disappear, but the last time I looked there were three Conservative premiers: Filmon, Devine and Getty. I am not sure which one he would like to get rid of, but I know—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): All three.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I know the Deputy Prime Minister's close friend and fellow Albertan, Premier Don Getty—and maybe that is the one that the Prime Minister wants to get rid of—said that in their obsession with inflation federal officials "are fighting an imaginary foe while they drive us into a shuddering halt with our economy".

So far the government has offered even less to western farmers this year than the totally inadequate package it offered to the Atlantic fishery yesterday, the package that has been rejected almost unanimously by the people of Atlantic Canada.

For example, the mayor of Trepassey, Rita Pennell, said: "They talk about rebuilding the stocks, but they're rebuilding the stocks for the large companies—certainly not rebuilding for people. What we need is something to tide us over until the stocks rebuild".

Why did the government not offer a realistic program for the recovery of the Atlantic fishery? Is it because this government feared reprisals from the United States under the free trade deal that offered so limited, so constrained a program for the recovery of the Atlantic fishery?

If this is not the case, why did the government not offer a meaningful program for the preservation of Atlantic communities and the fishery until the fishery stocks of Atlantic Canada were rebuilt? Is it not fear of reprisal under the trade deal that made this government offer such a totally inadequate program to the people of Atlantic Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my hon. friend. I did not hear an important part of the preface of his first question about the Conservative premiers. In point of fact there are so many of them around, they are hard to keep track of.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ferguson: They're going off in all directions.

Mr. Duhamel: They're an endangered species.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot help.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, few people can. Obviously, we embrace all Conservative provincial premiers with equal affection. I would not want to convey any other impression.

With regard to the announcement made yesterday by my hon. friend, the Minister of Fisheries, I would have thought that the Leader of the Opposition would have, while not being in full agreement with everything, pointed out a number of the very beneficial aspects of this important program for the benefit of Atlantic fishermen.

It is almost a $600 million package. It deals with some of the very important structural problems that have afflicted the fishery. It deals with conservation. It deals with community futures. It deals with retraining. It deals with a lot of the important fundamentals.

Unfortunately, it does not and cannot by itself bring the fish back tomorrow to ensure that everybody in Atlantic Canada who wishes to can have a substantial job out of the fishery. But it does deal with some of the fundamental problems that have been long neglected and overdue for action by the Government of Canada.

One of the things that has been carefully considered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this is the increased vigilance with which the Government of Canada will deal with all foreigners who seek to fish off our coasts and ensure that all their activities are in full and rigid compliance with international law.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is what the Conservative Member for Gaspé thinks about the program announced by the federal fisheries minister, and I quote: "There is nothing for Quebec in the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program". Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gaspé, who is chairman of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans, added that the funds allocated to Quebec were peanut. I therefore would like to ask the Prime Minister why the government is treating Quebec's fishermen so unfairly. Why are the fishermen of this province getting this offhand treatment?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member keeps telling us what other people think. He might let us know what he thinks. If he took the trouble to examine the adjustment program announced yesterday, he would realize that the program contains several components that will benefit fishermen and communities along the coast of Quebec.

For the information of the hon. member and the House, if they are interested, I have already started talks with my provincial counterpart, Minister Pagé. In fact, we are supposed to meet this Friday to discuss further measures that could be taken jointly with the Government of Quebec for the benefit of maritime Quebec.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the government announced yesterday: "No more groundfish licences will be issued to fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador", and that "fishing should be regarded as a skilled profession requiring a range of technical and managerial skills. We propose a formal training apprenticeship and certification program for fishermen".

My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Does this licence cut-off now mean that a young man or young woman who just started fishing with their father or a relative in the fishing boat, or will start fishing this summer, will not be able to get a groundfish licence, ending the fishing tradition in that family?

What happens if the full-time fisherman who has not been near a classroom for decades flunks this formal training apprenticeship and certification program?

It is not the fishermen who need training, it is this minister and his officials who need the training.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised, given the record of that party while it was in power, that it is looking at fishermen as people who have no qualifications, people who have nothing except to go out there and fish.

We believe in the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. We believe in the fishermen of Newfoundland. This suggestion for the professionalization and certification project was made to this government by the fishermen in his backyard, in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador think that this program is an insult.

In order to add insult to injury, the Minister of Fisheries announces a lot of money now to try to find out what seals eat. Well, Mr. Speaker, the fishermen have told him what seals eat, and it ain't turnips.

Why did the minister announce yesterday: "Canadians have had difficulty locating and catching commercial quantities of turbot in the northern waters, 2J and 3K, even though Soviet and other East Bloc countries harvest these stocks on a regular basis"? Does the minister realize that we have harvested that stock for hundreds of years before the Soviets even knew what a boat looked like?

Why is the minister issuing these foreign licences for that zone in this year for Canadian quotas of turbot and codfish while Newfoundlanders are being chased out of their boats?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is easy to come into this House and grandstand on the issue of foreign overfishing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dingwall: Look who's talking. Sit down!

Mr. Allmand: Your halo is slipping.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, they do not want to hear the answer. When they are totally devoid of ideas they just shout you down. But it will not work with this guy here.

With respect to foreign overfishing, I am going to tell the hon. member and every member in this House that if there are fishermen in Atlantic Canada, in all of Canada, who want to take every fish that can be caught under our quotas in the Canadian zone, then they can go out there and I will not allow one foreign boat to fish in Canada if our people want that.

He should have been with me yesterday when this gentleman, a colleague of his from P.E.I. was saying: "Go fish underutilized stock". The guy said: "I will not fish for six-cents-a-pound fish because I have got to buy fuel. I have got to pay labour. It is not viable".

I am telling the hon. member that if he wants fishing to take place, then support this program. We have a lot of stuff in there for underutilized stock. Support the program. You will help the fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, as the Prime Minister knows, the western premiers again said that the high interest rates are savaging the prairies. Premier Grant Devine said that to get lower interest rates he would be willing to see the dollar drop. In fact that is exactly what the Prime Minister said in 1984. When he was asked if he had to choose between high interest rates and a lower dollar he said: "I will take the lower dollar".

The Prime Minister knows that high interest rates in the west have cost Canadian farmers $330 million this year. They have pushed western farm bankruptcies up 22 per cent. They have threatened 10,000 Saskatchewan farmers with foreclosure and are pricing our farm products out of the world market.

Can the Prime Minister give us one positive effect of this high interest rate policy on Canadian farmers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the high interest rates, generally speaking, do not provide immediate, palpable and demonstrable benefits for ordinary hard working people. There is no secret in that. What high interest rates from time to time are required to do is to squeeze the inflation out of an economy because the inflation can cripple once and for all hard working ordinary Canadian citizens. Inflation is a pernicious evil that we cannot unleash on the Canadian economy.

The Liberals and the NDP conspired in the late seventies and early eighties to adopt a policy that allowed inflation to get out of hand. Unemployment sky-rocketed and the country economically just about became a basket case. We want to make sure that does not happen again so we are pursuing a policy that most of the international agencies, most recently the IMF, view as productive and important and necessary in the national interest.

The ultimate benefit of the monetary policy of Canada will be economic growth without damaging inflation to any serious extent. That is what we are pursuing and that policy will throw off benefits to farmers, fishermen, auto workers and all Canadians alike.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister.

The question that farmers have and that fishermen have on the east coast is what is going to be left for them. If we look at the farm income projected for this year, the farm income is supposed to go down 63 per cent on the prairies. It is supposed to go down 87 per cent in Saskatchewan and 46 per cent in Alberta.

The Prime Minister's government has promised assistance for western farmers; it has promised $500 million. The government knows that the provinces in the west with declining farm incomes cannot afford to match that assistance. When you offer something to these provinces that they cannot possibly accept, it is no offer at all.

Will the federal government now drop its conditions to the provinces and give the assistance to Canadian farmers that they need right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the federal government offered to provide $500 million worth of assistance to the farmers in Canada.

We are strapped for financial resources. We are limited. We asked the provinces to assist us in developing a kind of package that would put more money into the hands of farmers. If the provinces absolutely refuse to participate, it will obviously mean that there will be less money to be distributed to the farmers.

We are really trying to develop the kind of package that the provinces want some share in the responsibility of. They want a kind of package that would zero in on the problems of each of the respective provinces because it is a multifaceted problem. It is drought in some areas. It is the impact of interest rates. It is the impact of low prices. It is a variation of things.

We have simply said that we are prepared to sit down and work with them in developing a plan that will improve the incomes of farmers for 1990. If they absolutely refuse to participate in that process, it will mean that there will be less money to be distributed. I regret that. As a matter of fact I am somewhat saddened by the fact that they would rather play politics than really help the farmers. That is what we intend to do, and that is our bottom line.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Those 10,000 Saskatchewan farmers are not playing politics; they are just trying to survive.

This government is tying conditions that cannot be met to funding and assistance to farmers. After all, it is this government's constitutional responsibility to ensure that the interests of Canadian agriculture are protected in international trade. Expecting prairie provinces that have declining income, 63 per cent this year, to match assistance dollar for dollar is like asking a drowning man to throw himself a line.

I ask the minister again: Are the prairies going to sink or swim? Will the government live up to its constitutional responsibility to Canadian farmers and do it now before farmers drown?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party engaged in a typical NDP distortion.

I was not accusing the farmers of playing politics. I was simply attempting to answer the question and outline our strategy for getting the greatest amount of money into the hands of the farmers. That can best be achieved with the support and co-operation of the provinces. If that is not forthcoming, obviously we will have to look at another alternative.

We are not here to play politics with the farmers' welfare, but we really regret very much that the premiers of the provinces are not prepared to share in their responsibility.

After all, this government has been providing up to 90 per cent plus in terms of support for agriculture in western Canada. We think it is time the provinces paid their fair share.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to pose a question of the same minister and preface it by saying that even though some of them may have been dropped from the Christmas card list of the Prime Minister, I do not think he is being fair to them.

If I may, I want to simply quote from the communiqué: "The western premiers note that the 1990 income deficiency is a direct result of international trade subsidy wars and as such must be addressed by the federal government". They go on to point out that the United States government is now providing over $1 more support for a bushel of grain than the Canadian government provides to try to beat western Canadian farmers out of the international market.

Under those circumstances is it not proper and responsible for this national government to match at least the efforts of other governments to keep western farmers in business, keep the grain economy going and not let the Europeans and Americans push us out of our rightful grain market that we have had for the last 50 years?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I take from the hon. member that that is a representation asking the federal government to put in place a contingency fund as the premiers have asked.

If that is what the hon. member is asking for, I will take that as a representation. If he is suggesting that we put the $500 million into a form of contingency fund to fight the international price war, I will take that under serious consideration.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the question I am posing is not just in respect of a contingency fund.

It is a comprehensive agricultural program which meets the international support subsidies that come from the Americans and the Europeans. It is one that will bring down interest rates so that 30 per cent of farmers who are now facing bankruptcy will not go broke. It is a program that will deal with the major problem of soil erosion and the major loss of markets.

When is this government going to come up with a comprehensive agricultural program so that western Canada will not face not only a recession but the depression which it is now facing straight on because of this government's lack of attention to its interest and its problems?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to extract from the hon. member what sort of policy position he would follow, because we know what he did when he was on the government side and interest rates went to 24 per cent. They did absolutely nothing.

I have the communiqué that says western premiers call upon the federal government either to raise initial grain prices or set a $1 billion contingency fund to offset future impacts of the U.S. and European subsidies.

If that is the position of the hon. member, I indicated to him that I would give it serious consideration. We have $500 million. We asked the provinces to sit down and design a program involving some sharing on their part so that we could get money into the hands of farmers now.

• (1440)

The hon. member is suggesting that we put this money aside in a contingency fund to fight the international price wars. If that is his recommendation, I will give it serious consideration.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who I hope will listen to some reason.

The federal government has offered $500 million in farm aid. Farmers desperately need that money because they have been badly hurt by the international subsidy war, high interest rates, the high dollar value, low grain prices, and drought. All these problems are beyond provincial control, yet the federal government will not make good on its offer unless the provinces participate.

Why? The federal government has the money; the farmers need the money. Why not release it now without any strings attached so that there will be no more damage to farmers and their families?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): The answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, is very simple.

Quite obviously what I was trying to achieve was $1 billion distributed to the hands of the farmers rather than $500 million. I thought that with the provinces' generosity and their co-operation we could have put $1 billion into the hands of the farmers.

I understand that this member is interested in getting only $500 million out to the farmers and does not care about the rest.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I point out that over and over again the minister has insisted that the provinces match the federal offer dollar for dollar.

Yet, just this morning in the Winnipeg Free Press the Minister of Agriculture is quoted as saying that if the Manitoba government comes through with $8 million, the federal government will come through with a contribution of $63 million.

I want to know what is going on. Is this a new set of conditions? What kind of game is this minister playing with the farmers of Canada? Why not just release the money now, no strings attached, as insisted upon by the western premiers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member does not follow the debate more closely but rather gets engaged in his own rhetoric.

I indicated in the House yesterday that the Manitoba government had come up with programs which would be eligible for a matching contribution from the federal government. We are at the stage now where $8 million from the provincial government would generate a pay-out of about $72 million to the farmers in Manitoba. I think that is a pretty good deal for the farmers and for the Government of Manitoba.

I would urge the hon. member to use his good office to influence the Government of Manitoba to come on board. I think this could facilitate and speed up the process very much.

In commenting, the hon. member should know that since this government came into office support to the agricultural sector, particularly to western Canada, has increased by about 600 per cent over the time the party of which he is a member was in office.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Yesterday the minister admitted that some rejected refugee claimants have been drugged against their will so they could be easily transported from Canada. This practice directly contravenes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as well as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Canada has no statutory justification for the compulsory sedation of detainees. It is not even used on convicted criminals who are being transported on commercial airlines.

My question to the minister is: Will she table in the House a list of the deportees who have been drugged against their will since January 1, 1989? Will she make public the existing departmental guidelines under which this practice has been condoned?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the question and the preamble to it were distorted from what was actually said.

I want to make the facts very clear because I know the hon. member has an interest in this issue. I want to take the time to explain thoroughly.

First, deportations come at the end of a long legal process after avenues of appeal on humanitarian and compassionate grounds have been considered. From January 1, 1989 until currently there have been 3,125 deportations from Canada of which 9 came following some medical examination. If someone who is to be deported and in the eyes of an immigration official requires medical treatment of any sort whether it is because they are diabetic or have a heart condition, they then call in a medical examiner. So, the 9 of the 3,125 could have been examined for any reason.

If that medical examiner determines that some medication is required, it is the medical examiner who administers that treatment whatever it may be.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question at all and I regret that she is refusing to put the facts on the table. She must be aware that the charter of Canada says that everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person, and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Will she put a halt to the practice of compelling deportees to be drugged in certain cases against their will, or at least suspend that practice until it can be reviewed. In other words, will the minister just say 'no' to drugs?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I tried to outline that there are some safety considerations involved. We have had an immigration officer who was injured in the process of accompanying a deportee travelling back to another country. Whatever treatment is to be administered is determined by a medical examiner, a doctor. It is not determined by myself. It is between the doctor and the person being examined. It is for the courts to decide if there is a complaint under the charter. It is not up to me to interfere with medical practice under the laws of a province in which the law is administered by a medical examiner.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. Yesterday the minister not only condoned but defended the drugging of deportees against their own free will.

I have confirmed with two previous Liberal ministers of immigration that this clearly was not a policy of those previous administrations.

Therefore I ask the minister whether she can now clarify if this offensive practice represents an official policy of this government and please inform the House why this became policy when in fact before, when we were still deporting people, this practice was not only not condoned but was not utilized and other means respecting medical, ethical, and human rights codes were utilized?

Is this policy, when was it started, and why?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to indicate to the House and to the hon. member that it is not a policy of this government. I would certainly be disappointed to learn that prior ministers of immigration did not call for medical assistance to treat people who are to be deported if such is necessary.

That is the action we take. Any treatment from there on is between the medical examiner and the person involved.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I find it ironic that refugees flee countries whose regimes have no respect for human rights and this government then deports people by flagrantly abusing another aspect of those same human rights. The minister cannot have it both ways.

I ask the minister again, after having reflected on this serious issue, is the minister now prepared to put an immediate end to such a deplorable practice? If we wish to protect the safety of the travelling public, which we should, are there other means by which we can do so without trampling over those medical, ethical, and human rights codes that any western civilized country would like to adhere to?

• (1450)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is an issue that I do, indeed, take very seriously, both in terms of the health and safety of the people and in terms of human rights. There is no question about that.

I do believe that physicians operate under the laws of their province, that it is their job to practise their profession ethically, as it is any other profession, and that they have a code of ethics. If a practising physician determines that some treatment is required, that is between the physician and the person being treated. I would not interfere with that process.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Yesterday he announced that there would be amendments to the Fisheries Act calling for fines of up to $1 million for harmful alteration, destruction or disruption of fish habitat. Today, 60 miles southeast of Halifax, there are 42 foreign boats fishing in what is called the silver hake box.

Ironically, Mr. Speaker, our fishermen cannot go to that area because the line next to the silver hake box, the line that cuts the two, is a spawning area for pollock.

Will these fines apply to foreigners found disrupting the habitat in our waters when our fishermen are not even there?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I do not resent being called upon to give a lesson in legal terms to the hon. member. If she wants to know whether someone in Canadian waters or someone on Canadian land can be prosecuted if they happen to breach a Canadian law, yes, they can be prosecuted.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister for International Trade. Yesterday's bail-out was less than expected by the many workers. It only amounted to $130 million and was designated only to some workers, in fact, the offshore workers for northern cod.

Was this amount so little because the minister and his cabinet feared the American reaction under the free trade agreement, or will the Americans now use the free trade agreement against the offshore companies, citing unfair subsidies received from this government?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have never had any representation, not even subliminal, from the United States, or any person in the United States, about our programs to assist Canadian fishermen.

I was very pleased to notice the reaction of Richard Cashin, President of Fishermen's Food and Allied Workers Union, who was very supportive of the program announced yesterday. Of course, he had some criticism but he was balanced in his criticism, not like the opposition who are unable to see anything good in any announcement the government makes. Even $584 million does not earn any appreciation from the opposition.

I quote from an official release which states:

> Valcourt's recognition of compensation for fishermen was encouraging.
> Mr. Cashin feels the Inshore Council will be encouraged by the emphasis put on bona fide fishermen.

That is what the leaders of the fishermen say, unlike the spurious allegations and nonsensical criticisms of members opposite.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Seniors.

In the last budget the New Horizons program was allocated $15 million. Although it was not raised from the previous year, at least seniors were happy there were not any cuts, as has happened with so many other social programs.

My office has been informed that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has secretly and unilaterally cut $4 million, over 25 per cent from this very valuable program.

Some hon. members: Shame!

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Will the Minister of State for Seniors explain why this important program for seniors has been cut after the budget allocation has been made? Could she also explain why only one province has been exempted from these cuts?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm that senior citizens will remain a priority for this government, that the programs we have put in place since 1984 are being maintained, and that as the Minister of State for Seniors, I fully intend to continue to consult this group and estabish programs appropriate to their needs.

Of course, it is only common sense to evaluate programs and adjust them to changing needs. To this government, the elderly are first class citizens, and we want to work with these people and set up programs, once an assessment has been made.

[English]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the minister ignored both questions, but I want to ask her whether or not she can confirm that this $4 million has been taken out of the New Horizons program.

Can she also indicate whether or not she feels that Solange Denis and the other seniors from across Canada have to come to Parliament Hill once again to demonstrate in order to be treated with fairness and dignity?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, as a government, we can say that today, our seniors have three times as much in the way of programs as they did when we came to power in 1984. The reason they came here on the Hill to demand their rights is that, unfortunately, any information that comes from the other side, whether we are talking about the goods and services tax or any other legislation, is given a demagogical twist. I repeat, what we must do is consider seniors as first class citizens and treat them as equals. We can talk about funding cuts, but in any case, we are maintaining our programs for senior citizens.

[English]

BILL C-21

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In my riding and in all high-unemployment ridings, workers are being penalized because they are being asked to work the same number of weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance as they do in high-growth and high-employment areas of this country.

Can the minister bring us up to date on Bill C-21, and state whether or not this question will be addressed in this bill?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I certainly thank the hon. member for this question.

This is a concern that is shared by many members of the House and by many members of the public. Bill C-21 makes the variable entrance requirement a permanent part of the unemployment insurance system, something that past governments lacked the foresight to do.

I would remind hon. members that the VER situation will become increasingly worse until we have Bill C-21 in place. Not only does Bill C-21 provide for VER as a permanent feature of the program, but it also includes $800 million in training and adjustment money which will be of assistance to the hon. member's riding and in his region.

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition, and I suspect on behalf of the NDP, that if the minister will bring a variable entrance requirement bill to the House, we will pass it in 10 minutes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the $586 million fisheries adjustment program announced by the Minister of Fisheries.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Beauséjour asked the government to tell Parliament and all Canadians how much of the $586 million in question is new money, how much of it comes out of the current UIC fund and how much of it comes from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Canadians know this is a five-year program, and Atlantic Canadians know it does not apply to every region. They are now waiting to find out whether substantial portions of the fund are going to come out of existing Atlantic development programs. We want to know just how big a charade is being pulled by this government.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, obviously the package must not be too bad.

It is so big that the hon. member wants to know whether we had to take money from other programs in Atlantic Canada to fund it. The answer is no. This is new money.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I then put the following proposition to the minister.

Does he and the government accept—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Question!

Mr. Tobin: There will be a question, Mr. Prime Minister, hold on to your shorts.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Tobin: Surely the government accepts that the current crisis in the Atlantic fishery is a consequence of government mismanagement, not fishermen's mismanagement. If the minister accepts that premise, will he now tell the House of Commons why he is telling people in fishing communities in Atlantic Canada that they must find alternate means of employment for themselves or resettle? The crisis is a consequence of government mismanagement, not mismanagement by fishermen and plant workers themselves.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, this rhetoric is quite similar to some I heard Sunday night. The hon. member may want to blame people and try to blame previous governments, but the fact is—

Mr. Tobin: You are blaming the fishermen.

Mr. Valcourt: No, I have never blamed the fishermen. Some fishermen have overfished. Foreigners have overfished. We have a problem there. We are trying to work with the people in place.

I know it is not to the liking of the member to see this government working with the people positively, but I am sorry, that is the way we work.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House resumed consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and on the amendment of Mrs. McDougall (p. 11064); and the amendment of Mr. Fisher (p. 11109).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): At two o'clock, there were five minutes remaining in the question and comment period following the speech of the hon. member for Halifax. Are there further questions or comments? The hon. member for Kamloops.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I did not finish my comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. for Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: I thank you for your indulgence, Madam Speaker, as I had not yet completed my comments with regard to the comments of the hon. member for Burlington. Particularly after the exchanges in Question Period, I wanted to thank the hon. member again for his suggestion that the town of Lockeport get into the business of making fish-nets and fish-hooks.

After listening to the comments of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the questions from my colleagues regarding the overfishing by foreign fleets and the depletion of fishstocks, and the Minister's answer about Atlantic fishermen who are, according to him, refusing to fish, I wonder if my hon. friend from Burlington still feels that there would be a viable business for the people of Lockeport, and possibly the people of Canso, making fish-nets and fish-hooks.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, if I may respond to the hon. member, certainly, there is an opportunity there. I know that business fairly well. My son is involved in it on the west coast so I speak from a good deal of experience.

Ms. Clancy: They have more fish there.

Mr. Kempling: The part that bothers me is that the hon. member seems to try to convey that there are no fish at all. Fishermen are still fishing, quotas have been given out, and they are catching their quotas. There are not as many fish. We know that. Was it our government's fault? I do not know.

Ms. Clancy: Yes.

Mr. Kempling: What about previous governments? Has there been overfishing by our fishermen? Are they selling them over the side and not reporting it? There are a thousand games played and the member knows it.

I think that anytime there is a difficult economic situation, employment can be found. The member talked about villages being abandoned and so forth. Where did the people who came to Nova Scotia come from? They came from Scotland where there was no work.

Ms. Clancy: Where they were cleared out to be replaced by sheep.

Mr. Kempling: They came from Ireland where there was a potato famine. They came from Iceland, Germany, the Ukraine, Poland, and all over the world. Why? Because there was nothing there and there is something here.

Ms. Clancy: And they thought they had a better life and they want to stay.

Mr. Kempling: That is their decision. It is not necessarily our responsibility.

Ms. Clancy: Move or starve!

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I would only say to the Parliamentary Secretary that there are many people in my area who feel there is a renewable resource there, that they do not have to leave, and that, if this government was doing a good job of administering the fisheries, they would not be leaving. It is just like those people in the west who are giving up their farms because they are not getting the assistance that is needed. This government has decided to be afraid of a free trade agreement with a country that would kill us everytime we turn around if it could in terms of trade.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for South West Nova might accept that the Chair reminds her that the question and comments are following the speech of the hon. member for Halifax, and not the question and comments made by the hon. member for Burlington.

There is a minute left for the hon. member.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I will get to the question for my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax. But, in asking the question of my colleague, I am sure that I can enlighten the hon. member regarding those terrible questions he tried to put a few minutes ago.

Coming from Halifax, I am sure the hon. member realizes the effect in the Halifax area of such a depressed fishery and the lack of direction the government is giving to it. It is having its effect even in the Halifax area in terms of the economy. Looking at figures showing the amount of money lost because of the fishery and the misdirection of this fishery, it has to be affecting the cities of Halifax and Dartmouth, the capital of the province. I would like the hon. member to comment on whether or not our people are having to go to Halifax or further to find jobs.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A very short comment from the hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from South West Nova for her comment. As a fellow Nova Scotian, I do understand. Indeed, this will have major effects on my riding of Halifax, and on the neighbouring riding of Dartmouth. These cutbacks in unemployment insurance in the hon. member's riding and some of the other more rural ridings of Nova Scotia and the government's policy of move or starve will cause many people to move to the Halifax area. They will be no better off because of the cutbacks in UI in Halifax. The City of Halifax municipal social services and provincial social services, already overstressed, will be overstressed to the breaking point. The reaction of the people of Nova Scotia, in general, is horrendous.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today in support of the motion of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

We have to go back a little in history to take a clear look at what we are doing as a party and what we are attempting to do with Bill C–21.

In the Throne Speech last year, we set out our intention to build a strong economy. We intended to put Bill C–21 into that sense of building a strong economy and building an economy that responds to the needs of the 1990s and into the year 2000.

The reason we are going in this direction is quite simply this. In 1984, when we took office, we made a commitment to the Canadian people that we were going to take the country in a direction that had been missing for many years under previous administrations. We in fact did that. In checking the record of what we had done between 1984 and 1988, Canada has had the strongest economy in the world. Between 1984 and 1988, we ranked number two in terms of growth in the world behind just one country, Japan. That clearly illustrates that we are doing the right things, going in the right direction, and doing the things that Canadians elected us to do.

This holds true for Bill C–21. We were elected in 1988 to do the right things and to do the things that would put Canada number one in the world in relation to growth, our ability to do things for ourselves, and training for workers. That is exactly what Bill C–21 is all about. It is to thrust us into the 21st century in a way which was not possible under the old administration. That, in a sense, is the history of that party.

I cannot talk in that sense about the NDP party, because, fortunately for Canadians, it has never formed a government in the country and God forbid that it ever would.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I realize that this is a small point, but it would do my heart good—and I am certain it would do the hearts good of several people across the country—if members would stop referring to the "NDP party" and start referring either to the NDP or ND party or some such formulation as that. I would surely appreciate it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure that the hon. member does know that this is not a point of order, but his wish has been heard. The Chair cannot comment any more. The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, we can always use a little humour in this place from time to time and I am glad you recognize that. I am also glad that the NDP member recognizes that as well, because they do have a lot of humour on their side and, I guess, a philosophy that in a sense has nothing to do with reality.

In this bill we are attempting to address some realities in this world, the real world. I do not have to go back too far. In fact, I can go back to what happened yesterday in Nova Scotia and our announcement in relation to the fisheries program to help the fisheries which are under siege and experiencing a number of difficulties. We are the party of realism, attacking real problems with real solutions. The only way to get out of a difficulty—and we recognize this as a party—is to work one's way out of that difficulty. Bill C-21 is going to do that. It is going to thrust us into the 21st century.

With regard to yesterday's announcement, the difference between the government, the Liberal Party, and the NDP is that we can see positive aspects in Atlantic Canada. There is a great deal that is positive in Atlantic Canada, and we are going to work on that positive base to build a future for Canadians. Not one member of the House on the opposition side, whether they be NDP or Liberal, stood up and gave us one ounce of credit for what we did yesterday, not one ounce. Why? They want to continue to bury their heads in the past.

All you have to do is examine their record, Madam Speaker. When the Liberal government got into trouble in the past, it simply got out the cheque book and attempted to pay or to buy its way out of problems. The difficulty arising from that is that it overspent for 20 some odd years and left us with a legacy of debt.

Mr. Pickard: Seventy per cent tax increases?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I am going to have a drink of water while the member next to me here spouts off and it will give me a little bit of a rest.

Mr. Pickard: You need a drink of water on that one. Seventy per cent tax increases. Doubled the debt.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, they were the ones who burdened us with the debt and we are the ones who are going to have to work out from underneath that legacy of debt.

They are attempting to do the same thing. I knew this member would bring that up. I am ready to talk on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Please, I do want to hear the hon. member's point of order, but with all the noise in the House I could not hear him. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, as usual you are miles ahead of me. My point of order was that I want to hear my good friend put his case as to why he is supporting this bill, but I cannot hear a word for the two ministers over there. I wonder if you would restrain them for the time being.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): That certainly makes at least two of us. The hon. member.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I am not sure what it is about this member of Parliament, but every time I get up to speak I am rudely interrupted by the opposition. I am not sure if it is because of where I am placed strategically in this House, but every time I speak I am always the focus of a great deal of criticism from that side of the House. I can take the criticism that they are levying at me because it is simply a reaction going back to those years, as I mentioned before I sat down, of that $200 billion debt with which they saddled us.

Before I sat down, I was mentioning the fishing aid package announced yesterday and the fact that there was not a positive statement from those people on that side of the House in relation to that package. I expect absolutely nothing positive from that particular party.

Returning to the bill we are debating today, the proposals that they are putting forward to Bill C-21 simply, clearly, and undeniably point in the direction that that party has taken for many, many years.

They are putting in proposals, via the Senate, that will raise the cost of that bill by $1.7 billion. The point that I am making is that historically the only way they get out from underneath a problem is simply by buying their way out.

In Canada, we have developed programs to help Canadians. There is no question about that. We are very proud of the safety nets that we have developed for the Canadian people, for example, for senior citizens who receive old age pension cheques, Canada pension, and the best health care in the world. We are very proud of those social nets. Those are the kinds of social programs that we want to continue to create in Canada. Most importantly, we want to create programs that we can actually pay for.

The difference between us and the socialist parties, and the Liberal party most notably, is that they want to take those safety nets and use them to entrap Canadians. Instead of using those nets as they are intended, to help and protect people, they want to entrap Canadians in them.

It is pretty clear, Madam Speaker, if you read Bill C-21, that that is exactly what they are attempting to do. No one who is knowledgeable about education and training workers would object to what we are attempting to do in Bill C-21. We want to train Canadians for the future. The opposition is living in a dream world. They are dreaming in technicolour. We are living in a world that is very competitive, where competition is not the province next door or the community next door, it is the world. If we have fallen down as Canadians, that is where we have fallen down.

There is not a member in the House who could dispute the fact that we are competing with the big world. Those workers in Canada who find themselves displaced from the workforce deserve something more than just simply money, a cheque. A cheque does nothing at all to solve that problem.

The Liberal party and the NDP do not want to face that reality. They do not want to open up that door at all. They just simply want to hand out money, regardless of whether or not we have it, just sign the cheque and get it out. To heck with the real problem, do not address the root of the problem, just throw money at it. We are not going to do that.

I want to take the liberty to point out some statistics to our friends on the other side. Bill C-21 allows for a 45 per cent increase in funding for labour force development. It will give life to the Labour Force Development Strategy; a 45 per cent increase. Does that indicate to you, Madam Speaker, that we are on the right track? I think it does. It will increase the quantity of training and of skills for workers, and with a greater commitment on the part of the private sector. That is an area in which we have fallen down drastically in this country.

We as a nation spend less than one-half the amount that U.S. firms spend on training. That tells us something about being competitive in the market-place. What the U.S. spends on training is just a fraction of what other countries like Japan spend for their workers.

Bill C-21 will commit $231 million to training in the private sector. That money will be leveraged with private funding. That will bring in about something in the order of $1.5 billion in additional investment for training in that sector.

Our goal is to create a training culture where employees and companies practice development skills on an ongoing basis so that we can remain competitive in that real world, and that we are not afraid to address it as a government and I do not think we are afraid to address it as a nation.

Part and parcel of Bill C-21 is $100 million for the purpose of setting up new entry level training programs directed at young people. If we are going to have a future and if this country is going to enjoy prosperity in the coming years, it has to be through the young people who are replacing us in the workforce. We have to offer them the training that they need to get out there and compete, whether it be at the university level or the technical school level. We must do it. We are putting dollars into programs to make sure that that happens.

I am not sure why, but in my province of New Brunswick, there is a high degree of illiteracy in Atlantic Canada. In fact, the educational levels of Canadians increase from east to west. It might have to do with the fact that many of our trained and educated workers have had to move from Atlantic Canada to other parts of the country. Maybe there is an equation there of some sort or correlation between those statistics.

There is no question that there is a high degree of illiteracy in my home province of New Brunswick. The same holds true in Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. It improves somewhat moving through Quebec and Ontario. British Columbia has the statistic which we are attempting to achieve back in New Brunswick. It has the lowest rate of illiteracy in the country.

There is no question that the success of our province and of Atlantic Canada hinges on legislation like Bill C-21, because it is going to address some of those very real problems that we cannot duck. We cannot duck those problems in the real world.

We can stand here in this House and criticize every single bill that comes before this House, if we want to be nitpicking because no bill is ever perfect. We are all mortals in this House, Madam Speaker, and we are attempting to deal with problems brought on by Canadians like you and I and we are not going to solve those problems by running and hiding from them.

Unemployed workers will receive an additional $350 million under this program. That will reach 60,000 additional UI claimants in the country. Another $50 million will go to current training employment programs in co-operation with the provinces, and we have done that since 1986.

The problem with this particular bill is that it is being held up in the Senate. The Senators are doing it for a very simple reason.

Mr. Nault: Because the bill is no good.

Mr. Thompson: Partisan reasons. They can claim the bill is no good, but they have to prove that it is no good and they cannot do it. They have not done it yet and they will not do it. They can get up on their hind legs and cry and holler and wave their arms, but the truth is they do not have a realistic alternative to this bill.

Let me read some of the editorials from around the country concerning this bill and what they have had to say about it: "The arrogance" they call it "of the unelected Senate". We have to remember that the opposition in this House, namely the Liberal party, are taking their marching orders from Allan. We refer to him as Uncle Allan in the Senate. That is who gives the marching orders. It is not the whip or the House leader. It is their leader in the Senate.

I want to quote what Mr. MacEachen had to say about the Senate as he was being sworn in as a Senator. As you know, Madam Speaker, it was Prime Minister Trudeau who put Mr. MacEachen in the Senate. This is what Mr. MacEachen had to say about the Senate when he was appointed back in 1984:

> No member of this chamber would suggest that the Senate should—systematically obstruct the will of the majority in the elected body of Parliament—

That is what he said. He is not a man of his word, because he has pulled this trick on the House of Commons on a number of occasions going right back to the election of 1988 and our free trade agreement.

There is a connection between this bill, the free trade agreement and the GST. The theme that I have been trying to reach in my short time is simply that we are part of a very competitive world. The UI bill will make us more competitive. The incentive is to get further training, to get into the industries and the areas of technology that we have to enter. The free trade agreement opens up the borders so that we can compete. The GST is going to eliminate those trade barriers in relation to the taxation of the products that we produce here at home and have to sell on the international market.

This is a bill that is going to propel us into the real world that we are facing this very day in Canada. I am proud to be here supporting this bill. I am sure that the pressure will come from ordinary Canadians to make sure that this bill does pass the Senate.

• (1530)

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the previous speaker on Bill C-21. I also listened with interest to his comments about the private sector putting more money into training in this nation. If it does, it will certainly be a change of pace from the previous history in Canada. I have worked for companies large and small. I have tried to negotiate labour contracts with companies large and small. We tried to negotiate for them to take a larger responsibility for training and I assure you that it was to no avail.

Success in the Workplace, the great propaganda leaflet that came out with Bill C-21, makes reference to the private sector. It says: "Formal training is offered in only about 25 per cent of firms, mostly larger employers. Over all the private sector in Canada spends about $1.4 billion on formal training, less than half of that of the United States on a per employee basis". The previous speaker outlined this.

The document goes on to say: "The government's objective is to stimulate an additional private sector training effort of $1.5 billion a year by 1994. The increase is needed to raise the level of Canadian private sector training to that of the United States."

Under C-21 the workers are forced, through an arbitrary increase in their premiums, to contribute more money into the unemployment insurance fund.

How is the government going to get that $1.5 billion from the private sector in Canada? Is it just going to do it on hope or is it going to really seriously get that money on a per year basis?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, coming from the NDP, that is a very good question. I take it with a great deal of sincerity.

The employers and businesses, whether they be high tech or resource sector businesses, realize that they have to contribute if they are going to succeed. Industry in this country has realized that for a number of years. It recognizes that there is a problem. If the hon. member would check his statistics he would see that there are many resource sectors and high tech sectors within this country today which are having some difficulty getting trained workers, and they are more than willing to put up their dollars, and they will.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): I would like to ask the hon. member a question. First, how can he propose the argument that the Senate is non-democratic when the institution is part of our parliamentary democracy? Were he to carry his argument to its logical conclusion, the Supreme Court of Canada, whose justices are appointed, would be considered undemocratic too.

How can the hon. member reconcile with common sense logic his argument that the Senate, the members of which have been appointed by the elected government of the day, is non-democratic? Only because it acts against the wishes of government?

Second, when the people tell us that people disagree with the proposals of government, is that will of the people not a true measure of democracy as now reflected in the amendments coming from the Senate?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, the difference between the House of Commons and the Senate is simply that we have to put our policies, our platforms and our record before the people every four to five years, and we have to be accountable to the people. There is not a person in this House who did not have to get out and fight an election in 1988. Each and every one of us, if we choose, will be doing the same thing in 1992 or 1993.

I want to quote from an article written by Jeffrey Simpson about the Senate. I think this will in part answer the question put forward by the hon. member.

In the article in The Globe and Mail of May 1, 1990, Jeffrey Simpson said:

> How exhilarating it is for senators who have never contested an election, or haven't contested one for many years, to consider themselves the public's champion. And how comforting it is, should they be wrong about public opinion, to know that they will not confront the public in the next election.

He goes on to quote Stanley Baldwin. Jeffrey Simpson says:

> As Stanley Baldwin said of British newspaper barons, senators have power without responsibility, the "prerogative of the harlot throughout history".

That is exactly the point that I am attempting to make. They do not have to be responsible to the Canadian people. They do not have to care about Canadian people. They simply have to display their arrogance when they choose. They do not have to go before the Canadian people in 1992 or 1993 as all of us in this House do. I think that has something to do with responsibility.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to my colleague with whom I have had many discussions on a number of issues. I think that perhaps at some point we have discussed this one.

I have listened to his views on the unelected Senate doing what he says is something quite terrible, that is, giving sober second thought and trying to refine a bad piece of legislation.

Since my colleague is so opposed to the Senate exercising or even being involved with the democratic process, would he agree that the Senate should not be tampered with by this government or any future government for political will? I am talking about what we have seen referred to many times in the paper, that being the stacking of the Senate, which his party is reported to be preparing to do, to put additional senators in using a clause of the BNA Act.

Is the member so committed to freeing up this unelected body that he would oppose any measure by this government or any future government to stack the Senate using the clause of the BNA Act which would allow a number of senators to be appointed at large, which, if it was done, would be just done for political purposes?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, if the Senate behaves responsibly, which I think in the final analysis it might just do, that question will simply be hypothetical. That statement or comment at this point is hypothetical because that is what it is all about, having a Senate that acts responsibly in accordance with the wishes of the people. The wishes of the people are sitting right here in this Chamber.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would confirm that the government's vision of where training and retraining is going is about as confused, unclear and fuzzy as is its vision with respect to education.

You will recall that the Prime Minister said, I believe it was in Halifax last June, that in their second term they would be concentrating on human resource development. The government cut transfer payments, reduced research and development, added a 3 per cent administrative fee on students and did virtually everything to make us non-competitive with our major trading partners.

Will he please confirm that the confusion exists not only in training and retraining programs, but throughout the whole breadth of education, training, retraining, literacy, research and development? I would like a simple yes or no.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, it is not as simple as a yes or no because of the preamble. There is no country in the western world, or indeed the whole world, that does more for its students than Canada. There is no question about it.

The quality of life in this country surpasses that of every country in the world, despite our problems. We want to enrich and enhance the training of Canadians. If you examine what we do to support university students in this country you will come to the same conclusion. We do a very good job. There is an incentive for the students to work on their own to help themselves because you get the best results from those who have to go out and do it for themselves. A certain portion of education in this country is on the shoulders of the individual. We are not going to spoonfeed anyone. But we do have the programs in place that make our educational system the best in the world.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to rise today in the debate on the government's motion moved by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I am especially delighted that I am able to speak on the amendment to that motion proposed by my hon. colleague from Saskatoon—Dundurn which would basically thank the Senate for its interesting work and simply withdraw the bill, because that is the fate it most definitely warrants.

Before addressing particularly the merits of the government's motion and the amendment before us, I would like briefly to review the highlights, if that term can reasonably be applied here, of the history and contents of Bill C-21 as we now have it. To start, we must bear in mind throughout the entirety of this discussion that the Mulroney government's changes to the unemployment insurance program are a major part of a fundamental shift in the way income security programs are designed and financed in Canada.

These changes to unemployment insurance are an attack on both the employed and the unemployed. They will have the effect of moving our UI system closer to the American model of which this government seems so enamoured in so many realms.

Despite all the changes made to UI since it was introduced in 1940, many of its fundamental principles—thus far—remain intact. Unemployment insurance is a social insurance program designed to replace workers' earnings during an interruption of earnings due to job loss, or leave due to pregnancy, sickness, child care or training. The burden of funding is split among workers, employers and the federal government, thus far.

It must be emphasized that UI is not a social assistance program. It is not designed to redistribute wealth from the well-to-do to the less-well-off. Such assistance programs as the social allowance, the guaranteed income supplement and, should we ever achieve it, a guaranteed annual income, are designed to protect people against absolute deprivation.

By contrast, UI is a social insurance program which, like the Canada Pension Plan and Workers' Compensation, is designed to replace earnings in the event of unemployment, just as the others are designed to replace earnings in the event of retirement or an accident in the workplace, respectively.

UI is a program that benefits most Canadians. While it is easy for us who have actually been unemployed to see the value of UI, it is equally certain that UI benefits those who remain employed. As the Alberta Federation of Labour put it in their excellent brief to the UI legislative committee in Edmonton on September 13:

> The income security provided by UI allows employed workers to consume more of what they earn, and hence enjoy a higher standard of living, than would be the case if they had to hedge their consumption patterns against the risk of unemployment.

So unemployment insurance is an integral part of that collection of Canadian social programs that sets us apart fundamentally from, for example, our less fortunate neighbours to the south. In Canada we recognize the value of co-operative collective efforts to insure ourselves and our friends and neighbours against hard times, and we do so through our governments.

But the Mulroney government is setting about to change this, in part through this bill. How?

First, Bill C-21 will cut regular UI benefits by more than $1.5 billion a year. It will do this in three ways. First, it will do it by increasing the entrance requirements from 10 to 14 weeks of work to 10 to 20 weeks of work, with many more instances of 20 weeks being required. Second, it will reduce the maximum duration of benefits. Third, it will increase the penalties on UI claimants who quit or are fired from their jobs from the current maximum of six weeks penalty to a minimum of seven weeks and a maximum of 12 weeks penalty.

Second, Madam Speaker, Bill C-21 will transfer the government's entire share of UI benefit costs—about $2 billion a year—to workers and employers. This is a complete rejection of the current recognition of the effect government policy has on unemployment rates. Under existing UI legislation the government's share includes regionally extended benefits when the local unemployment rate is over 4 per cent.

Third, the government will allow the UI Commission to use up to 15 per cent of UI funds for schemes and programs such as training, work sharing, job creation, moving costs, travel, business start-up, self-employment bonuses to accept a job quickly, and so on. This means that job training programs will be paid for, not out of general revenue as is currently the case but out of funds snatched from the existing UI safety net.

In all these ways the government is cutting unemployment insurance. How will these changes affect working Canadians? The most obvious effect will be that workers will have less protection against catastrophic income loss when thrown out of work.

In its release of October 2 the Canadian Council on Social Development stated: "The government is performing a high wire act with the income security of Canadians in the balance". By making UI harder to get, the government is in a sense taking one of Canada's most important safety nets out from under that high wire and moving it further and further away.

According to Statistics Canada figures obtained by the Canadian Labour Congress, increasing the number of weeks of work required to be eligible for benefits—and this is only one aspect of the changes—alone would have meant that nearly 130,000 Canadians who received benefits last year would not have received those benefits.

In Alberta, 5,400 UI claimants would have lost their benefits. In Edmonton alone, 3,000 people, accounting for $12 million in benefits, would not have qualified for UI.

The massive cuts in UI benefits will also increase the power of employers over workers. Unemployed workers denied benefits will naturally be more inclined to take the first job open to them, regardless of the wages and benefits paid by that job, and those with jobs will have fewer options and will be forced to put up with harassment or with unsatisfactory, low paid, and even unsafe work.

The erosion of UI thus not only diminishes the protection of workers who lose their jobs. It also tends to erode the wages and working conditions of all workers by providing employers with a greater opportunity to take advantage of the desperation of the unemployed and the underemployed.

In classic economic terms this is called disciplining the working class. It is odious and contemptible. Even when they are employed, workers will be hit directly in the pocket book. Starting January 1 of this year premiums will have risen by 15 per cent costing a worker making by a no means princely $400 a week an extra $62.40 a year.

It gets worse yet. Another effect will be equally foul. Those workers who need UI the most will be the hardest hit by the cuts. According to a Global Economics study, 80 per cent of all Canadians negatively affected will have annual incomes under $25,000 a year.

In Alberta, 72 per cent of those harmed by the changes, that is 51,000 people, will have an income of less than $20,000 a year. A full 32 per cent, or 23,000 people, will have incomes below $10,000 a year and will experience an average reduction in benefits of $1,800, fully 18 per cent of that meagre $10,000 a year. As incredible as it may seem, this bosses' government is proposing to enrich itself by further impoverishing those earning only $10,000 a year.

Why is the government doing this? We keep hearing the same refrain: "The deficit made us do it". Yet the Mulroney government persists in letting 60,000 profitable corporations pay no income tax at all, and more than 6,000 Canadians earning more than $50,000 a year continue to pay not a penny in personal income tax. By lowering the interest rate by 2 per cent, which it doggedly refuses to do, it could reduce that satanic deficit by $3.5 billion. Let us hear no more about this phoney deficit justification. It does not wash. It is not the reason.

What is the reason, then? Perhaps, just maybe, these changes are intended to help put Canadian business on what the government loves to call a level playing field with business in the United States. Lord knows it is not level at the moment, at least not so far as UI is concerned. Here in Canada 83 per cent of unemployed workers collect UI. In the U.S. only 25 per cent do. In Canada UI pays out up to 60 per cent of workers' average weekly wages. In the U.S., UI pays just 35 per cent. In Canada the average duration of UI benefits is 22 weeks. In the U.S. it is less than 15 weeks.

That is the direction in which Bill C-21 starts to take us. We are not there yet, but that is the level playing field that big business boosters of free trade are pushing for.

The government is using the bulldozer of Bill C-21 to help start the levelling. Not only is doing so wrong on the face of it, it is also hypocritical. Do you remember, Madam Speaker, that before the last election the government promised Canadian workers worried about the effect of the Mulroney-Reagan trade deal that they would have one of the finest adjustment programs in the industrial world? Do you remember how on November 15, 1988, just six days before the election, the government reinforced this calming message by raising UI benefits and lowering premiums? It is true. Now, just over a year later, the trade deal is signed and the government is slashing UI benefits and jacking up premiums.

Cynical, opportunistic, savage and anti-Canadian, that is Bill C-21. But the government will have its way. Oh, yes, the government will have its way. Bill C-21 will pass in this House and be rammed through the other place and become law and no member of this House, indeed no citizen of this country, is under any illusion in that regard. It may be wrong. It may be unjust. It may be cruel. It may even be a little touch of treason against the overwhelming majority of people whose Canada this really is, the people who go to work every day, day after day, for a wage or a salary, who seek to build a family and have a decent life for themselves. But that does not matter because the government will get what it wants.

This brings us back to the government motion before us and the amendment moved by my friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn. The amendments that the Senate has passed to us, while not without merit, are quite simply inadequate to deal with the fundamental execrable flaws in Bill C-21. Therefore, it matters little if the government picks and chooses among the amendments given to this House from the other place and decides that it may magnanimously adopt this little piece of tinkering here while having, unfortunately, to disregard that other little piece of tinkering there. All of that is immaterial when one considers the effects that Bill C-21 still will have on the vast majority of working people in this country.

It is not the government's motion that I wish to commend to the House today, but rather the amendment of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn. I urge every member in this House with ears to hear and a heart to feel and a brain to think, to accept that amendment, thank the Senate for its work, and have this bill withdrawn.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I have listened to my colleague quite intensely on this very major piece of legislation that is before us today. He has commended the Senate of Canada for at least holding up the bill and trying to propose some amendments to it to try to convince our colleagues in this place of the error of their ways and the negative impact that this bill is going to have on those across the country who unfortunately, because of the disproportionate spread of wealth across this country, time and again find themselves having to rely on unemployment insurance benefits for whatever period of time.

What would my colleague propose that we do? He mentioned that the bill has been in this House, out of this House, and is back in this House. He says there is no doubt that the majority, which is Conservative—catch that out there people; it is a Conservative majority that is trying to ram this bill through—will probably push this bill through this place and then it will be rammed through the other place.

I just want him to comment a little about how he feels the government might ram this bill through when it goes back to the Senate.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I should offer the modest qualification that I never said that we should congratulate the Senate or praise the Senate. I said that we should thank the Senate. I think to do otherwise would be impolite, and it is at this point only politeness with which I am concerned with regard to the Senate.

I would note as well that I assume that the amendments sent back to this House from the other place, dominated by members of the Liberal caucus, were in fact discussed at the Liberal caucus and in fact represent the Liberal caucus position with regard to Bill C-21. Lord knows we have seen no other coherent Liberal caucus position advanced at this point. I still consider them to be utterly inadequate and for that reason far prefer the amendment to the motion proposed by my friend from Saskatoon—Dundurn to the government motion or indeed to the amendments from the other place.

I fear I can offer my friend from the Liberal Party no solace or comfort in this regard but I can, I suppose, urge him to keep trying.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before I give the floor to the hon. member, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Drummond—External Trade; the hon. member for Mackenzie—Agriculture; the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk—Trade.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, perhaps we ought to remind ourselves that we are here once again with Bill C-21 entitled an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

A little more graphically, the assignment of the House, although we on this side refuse to participate in it, is to gut absolutely and irrevocably a very good piece of legislation that has served this country very well for a very long time, since I believe about 1978. Bill C-21, if implemented, would have the effect of doing some very damaging things to the country and to many thousands of people.

I hope that the gentleman from Carleton—Charlotte will pay close attention to what I have to say. I listened with great interest to him, as well. I thought the highlight of his entire presentation was when he spared no effort in praising some great social programs; what he called, and rightly so, the social net. He talked about medicare. He talked, by inference, about unemployment insurance. He mentioned the Canada Pension Plan specifically and then later in his discourse he mentioned the whole question of student financial aid programs.

I like a man who is fair. I must say that I took a certain comfort from the words of the gentleman from Carleton—Charlotte because he was in the process calling to the attention of the House a number of great social programs, all of which without exception were legislated by Liberal governments over the past several years.

My friend, the minister of energy, feels a speech coming on. We are looking forward to hearing from him in due course. In the meantime I would like to say to the gentleman from Carleton—Charlotte that I appreciated his citing those programs. He ought to have gone the extra step and pointed out two facts: one, that these programs were brought in by Liberal governments, and second: that the fight that we have had on Bill C-21 really characterizes what the larger fight is about.

We have been trying on this side since 1984 to stop the flood gates and to hold back the dikes because this Tory government, of which the member from Carleton—Charlotte is a supporter, is systematically dismantling and gutting those programs. I thought it significant that he should have spent some time talking about the student aid programs. I want to remind him that the students in universities and in post-secondary institutions in general are having much difficulty making ends meet financially these days because the government that he supports has refused since 1984 to change the basic financial guidelines.

It simply means that the students of 1990 who will be going to university this fall— some will not be going because of the policies of this government—will be asked to live on the same basic amount in terms of student loan assistance as their counterparts did six or seven years before. If he is concerned about that particular program maybe he should talk to his colleagues and see what they can do to stop socking it to those students in post-secondary institutions.

I rise to speak in this debate because I believe that the bill, if passed, will do some really terrible things to fishermen and their unemployment insurance. Of all the people who will be at risk by the passage of this legislation, none is more at risk than the fishermen. That is why the Senate took some time to propose a number of amendments.

The fishermen of this country are facing most desperate times, particularly in places like my riding of Burin—St. George's. It has 158 communities and there is hardly a one that does not have some direct involvement in the fishery. There is a total of 17,000 fishermen and plant workers who make their living directly from the fishery in the riding of Burin-St. George's. Many of those 17,000 are fishermen, either trawlermen or what we call inshore or near-shore fishermen. They are those people who commute to the fishery each morning and back home each night in boats that are from 20 feet to 50 feet long and in some cases, up to 65 feet long.

This bill, if passed, would, to use the fishing term one more time, gut the program as it relates to fishermen. I use that term because it is graphic and it strikes a note with my good friend, the minister of energy. If we could only get him to reflect on this, go back to cabinet and tell his colleagues in cabinet that they are very wrong in wanting to jeopardize the fishermen's benefits. Let me give you an example, Madam Speaker.

In 1988 fishermen paid approximately $18 million into the unemployment insurance fund and they received $269 million in benefits. That is quite a gap. It was otherwise in prior years when we had a viable fishery. There are some times when the fishermen are paying in much less than they are drawing down. If the government is going to back out of the program completely, who is going to make up that difference which, in 1988, was a difference of $251 million? The fear, of course, is that eventually some politicians will make a decision that it is time to scrap the fishermen's program as it relates to unemployment insurance. Under this bill, the unemployment insurance benefits to fishermen could be revoked by the approval of the Governor in Council only, by a cabinet decision. It is blatantly wrong that any cabinet of any government, sitting around the cabinet table, with their own immediate political agenda, without reference to the built-in accountability of Parliament, should have the authority to wipe out the benefits of such a large group of people in this country.

I could go on to deal with the adverse impact on unemployment insurance for fishermen, but I believe the point is made that we have had a good piece of legislation as it relates to fishermen and this is no time to do away with it, when the Atlantic fishery is on its knees.

Yesterday, my friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs talked about the Atlantic fishery not being in jeopardy.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): That was not what he said.

Mr. Simmons: I say to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology that he said exactly that. He took issue with me when I suggested it was in jeopardy. In yesterday's Hansard he said word for word; "the fishery in the Atlantic is not in jeopardy". That is what he said. I know the minister does not agree with him. He should have a chat with him on that point. I do not agree with him either.

Maybe that is the latest code word of the government. We heard the Prime Minister saying that there was no crisis in Atlantic Canada. Now the minister says the fishery is not in jeopardy. It is in very grave jeopardy, which is evident when we see the statistics in the community of Rose Blanche. In your mother tongue, Madam Speaker, I am sure you would say Rose Blanche. But we have found the proper Newfoundland way of saying it, and we say Rose Blanche, but to us it is home.

Mr. Epp: What we want to know, Roger, is why it was called that in the first place.

Mr. Simmons: Now there is a good question to which I do not know the answer.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): It is a white rose.

Mr. Simmons: My translator who sits beside me tells me that there is a perfectly good reason for it. Maybe she and the minister of energy ought to get together. I know Rose Blanche the community, not Rose Blanche the bit of contradictory semantics, which is another issue altogether.

In the community of Rose Blanche there were 170 full-time licensed inshore fishermen in 1987. In the winter fishery alone, from January 1 to March 31, 1987, the period when my friend the minister of fisheries says they should be sitting in their armchairs and drawing their UI, those 170 fishermen landed four million pounds of fish. That three-month period is what we call the winter fishery on the southwest coast of Newfoundland.

This year, during the same period, they did not land four million pounds, they landed fewer than 200 pounds. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs can explain how that does not constitute at least near jeopardy, I invite him to do so. I ask the House to think of four million pounds landed in terms of dollars in fishermen's incomes, the bread on the table, paying for the gas and expenses of operating the boat and paying the loan on the boat. Think of that, and then three years later, think of 200 pounds total fish landings for 147 fishermen. That is roughly one pound of fish each. That is devastating. If there is ever a time to change UI to the disadvantage of fishermen, this is certainly not the time to do it.

This brings me to the absolutely delightful revelation that my good friend the Prime Minister made over the weekend after he had had a much needed pep talk with his troops in the hills of Quebec.

• (1610)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Very positive.

Mr. Simmons: I am sure, as the minister says, the pep talk was very positive. What was even more positive was his public report of what happened in that session. I thought it was absolutely marvellous if one focused only on what was said.

Let us read between the lines. We heard the Prime Minister say that he is not a masochist. We have known all along that he is not a masochist. We have known that ever since he was in government, and before that when he was the president of the American branch plant in Labrador City, or the Iron Ore Co. of Canada. He was taking his orders out of Cleveland then instead of Washington. The one thing he has never been is a masochist. A masochist, as we know, is a person who inflicts the pain on himself. The one thing the Prime Minister has never been accused of is hurting himself. He never hurts himself. He is not a masochist. I will tell you what he is.

Mr. Kempling: Be careful.

Mr. Simmons: In the best tradition, I will say to my good friend from Burlington and my good friend from Red Deer, the Prime Minister is a—not to put too fine a point on it—a political terrorist. What is a terrorist? A terrorist, a political hijacker, is someone who takes you where you don't want to go. The Prime Minister has hijacked an entire country. He is taking an entire country where it does not want to go. That, in my language, is a hijacker, a political terrorist in the best or worst tradition of that term.

I defend the Prime Minister. He is not a masochist. He is a hijacker, a political terrorist. He is taking this country where it does not want to go. He is hurting everyone except himself and his few friends. He is hurting the fishermen in my riding. He is hurting the fishermen in the ridings of Atlantic Canada. He is hurting people in the riding of my good friend from Dartmouth. He is hurting people in Haldimand—Norfolk. Madam Speaker, he is hurting people in your riding.

[Translation]

Mr. Fontaine: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Lévis, (Mr. Fontaine), on a point of order.

Mr. Fontaine: Madam Speaker, I think we have reached the point where the debate is no longer on the bill. It is now on invective concerning the personality and qualifications of the Prime Minister. I think that if the opposition has no further arguments against Bill C-21, it should cease and desist and in so doing further the legislative process.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I can inform the hon. member for Lévis that on the contrary, I think it is very much to the point in this debate to draw the attention of the House to the motives of the Prime Minister.

[English]

It is absolutely important. It is crucial. It is related to the bill. If my friend from Lévis really wants to understand why this piece of garbage called Bill C-21 is here, it is because the Prime Minister is marching to a very different drummer than the fishermen on the south coast of Newfoundland.

It also explains what the government is doing in terms of the closure of rural post offices. It explains what it is doing in terms of the goods and services tax. It explains what it is doing in terms of the so-called aid program for fishermen. It is aimed at the shutting down of rural Canada, whether that rural Canada fishes or farms.

This government has no interest in the geographic extremities of this country. This government has no interest in people who happen to draw average or below average incomes. How else can you explain the statistics? For those who earn $100,000 or more a year, federal income tax and other federal taxes have gone down by $1,600 a year since this Prime Minister took office in 1984. However, for those who earn $35,000 or less—and that covers every fisherman in my riding—federal taxes have gone up by $1,200 a year.

I understand that, for the hon. gentleman from Lévis, it is a tender point when I get close to home on what the real motivation is of the Prime Minister, when I take his own words, and when I come to his defence and say: "No, the Prime Minister is absolutely right. He is not a masochist." Equally, I can say that he is a political terrorist and hijacker who has hijacked the people of the country, taking them where they do not want to go.

Eighty per cent of the people have said in polls: "We do not want a goods and services tax." Yet, it is being rammed down their throats. Why will the government not listen to the people who it is supposed to be serving?

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member seems to be speaking to everything but the motion. I wonder if he could speak to the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair was listening carefully. I think the hon. member was just about to make the junction with the bill that is being discussed today.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I say to the hon. member who is not in his seat, yes, I am. If some day, as a man, he wants to talk about it with me, he can, but if he wants to be a mouse and a scum, he can do that too.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: I think my comment is parliamentary and correct, too.

I want to come back to what the Minister of Employment said yesterday. The Minister of State for Privatization can shake his head all he wants. If he wants to get into the debate, he can do so. If he does not like what I am saying—

Mr. McDermid: I don't like being called a scum.

Mr. Simmons: Perhaps you should stop being a scum.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. There are two minutes left in the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, if the minister insists on being despicable, I shall attempt to refrain from responding in kind.

I want to talk about what another minister said. The Minister of Employment and Immigration who sponsors this bill made a great noise yesterday. She talked about how she could not respond to the Message from the Senate because, in her words, it would infringe on the privilege of the House of Commons to implement money bills.

I do not argue with her that it is, not only the House of Commons' privilege, but responsibility to deal with money bills. Not in isolation, of course. She will be aware that, while the Senate cannot initiate a money bill, it is part of the parliamentary process that finally achieves its passage. I am sure she was not trying to say that the Senate has no role to play in the passage of money bills. I think I understand the spirit of what she said.

What I do not understand is the minister's contradiction in terms two or three minutes later. With much sound and fury, she said loudly and clearly that she could not respond to the recommendations because of the reasons she had just given. Then she proceeded to respond to some of them. I note the contradiction and the grandstanding that she was not going to be compromised. A few minutes later, she was willing to be compromised on at least a couple of points. So, first, I note the contradiction.

More to the point, and to respond to the hon. member from Carleton—Charlotte who spoke a few moments ago, we commend the minister for the small step she has taken. She heard the Senate in part. Now that she has set the precedent and opened the door, it is possible for a minister in the House to hear some of the things the Senate has said on this issue. Her earlier argument about not being able to respond is obviously swept by the side, because she has responded on at least two details. I appeal to the minister now to review her earlier thinking, go back to look at the Senate message and respond more fully so that we can have a better bill that will serve the people.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the member finally got back to the motion that is before the House.

I would like to ask him a couple of questions about the Senate. I will not call it the other place, I will call it the Senate because that it what it is.

The Senate has never written a Throne Speech; that is not its function. It has never put together a budget; that is not its function. It has never had to put forward any national program; that is not its function. It has never initiated any economic program. Regardless of this, the Senate is exercising powers beyond its ability to carry them out.

The member has been in the House of Commons for a number of years and knows very well what has happened in the process here. The Senate has proposed amendments that the House of Commons would reject. Had these changes been put forward at committee, they would have been rejected. Had they been put forward at the report stage of the bill, they would have been rejected by the Speaker. Yet, the member and his colleagues are asking the House to accept in the House of Commons amendments that the House would not accept itself by adopting the amendments put forth by the Senate. Does he think it is a proper for the Senate to circumvent the rules of the House this way?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Burlington.

First, in his opening remarks, the hon. member used the phrase "beyond its ability" when talking about the Senate. We should be clear that the Senate has done nothing that is beyond its ability. Let us be fair about that. The framers of the Constitution very clearly provided that the Senate has a role, but that role is limited. It cannot, for example, kill a money bill. It can delay a money bill.

One must ask, if the Senate was given this power, who took it away? Is it the words of the member that takes away the power? Is this some new interpretation of the Senate Act or the House of Commons Act? The question really is this: If the Senate is doing something that is illegal, why is there not a proceeding to challenge that?

I hear the rhetoric and it is great. Perhaps, if I were over there, I would be saying some of the same stuff myself. But it has nothing to do with the reality. The reality is that what the Senate is doing is perfectly within its right. If the Senate is doing something that somebody does not like, that is another issue. But let us not get the two mixed up. It is one thing to have the Senate doing something one finds completely odious from one's point of view, but it is another to characterize it as being beyond its ability or capability under law. That is quite a different issue. Everything the Senate has done here is absolutely proper.

The Senate has a role and was appointed back in 1867 to protect the regions of the country. That is fine as long as everybody is in bed together and the Senate is doing things that everybody likes.

For example, I have not heard anybody say that the Senator Murray has no right to go around the country talking about the Constitution because he was not elected. Senator Murray has had a fairly powerful role there in his capacity as a senator. It is his capacity in the Senate that allows him to be part of the Queen's Privy Council in Canada. In order to be one of the Queen's ministers, he had to be either in the Senate or in the House, and we know he is not in the House. Senator Murray is going around the country in his capacity as a representative of the government. He happens to be a part of that government by virtue of his membership in the Senate.

If there is suddenly this new burst of interest in purifying the system so that unelected people have no role, I will make a deal. Let us bridle Senator Murray and another unelected person, named John Crow. I have never heard anybody around here say that he ought to be elected. He is out there making decisions that are pulverizing my people in terms of their mortgage rates. He is doing that and he has not been elected. But suddenly there is this great urge to have them all elected.

I am watching with great interest how the government is going to do an about-face a few months from now when it cannot get its way as it is trying to do right now. It will suddenly go out and appoint more Senators to do what it says is illegal for the Senate to do in the first place. It cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, the hon. member did not answer my question. I found the same thing with his House Leader. I asked him the same question and he did not answer it. I will ask the hon. member again.

The Senate has put forth amendments to Bill C-21 that would not have been allowed in the House of Commons had they been put at report stage and that would have been struck down had they been put at committee stage. Does he think that legislation that cannot be amended in this House should be allowed to be amended by the Senate?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I promise the member I will give him a specific yes or no answer in a moment.

First, he threw in some other phrasing that tickles my fancy, as we say back home. He said: "—amendments that cannot be put in this House". I correct him. It is not, that "cannot", but that "were not". They were not passed in this House but there was no lack of capability. This House can amend this document in any way it wants. There is nobody in this Chamber who does not believe that. We can amend it in any way we want because we are the Parliament of Canada. Nobody is going to argue against that. So, first, it can be done here.

My second point is with regard to authorities on the Senate. From the time of its inception, and going back to the first Prime Minister of the country, Mr. MacDonald, when he discussed the role of the Senate, one of the most oft-used characterizations of the Senate is a chamber of sober second thought. It is generally understood that sober second thought is one of the assigned functions of the Senate.

I put to you, Madam Speaker, the following conundrum. If the role of the Senate is to second-think some of the things that this House does—and that presumes that it might suggest changes—how can we give them that role if, in the next mouthful, it says it cannot perform that role. Does it not follow that, if it is the chamber of sober second thought, sometimes it will come back and say: "House of Commons, we have looked at the legislation you have sent to us and we are suggesting the following changes"? Surely, nobody is going to argue that that is not within the role and the prerogative of the Senate. That is what the Senate has done here.

The question that the hon. member for Burlington has put to me, as I understand it, very clearly or at least in sum, was do I think that the Senate has the right to recommend amendments to the House of Commons. The answer is, yes, I think so.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I rise today to participate again in debate on Bill C-21. I would hope that members in the House, when listening to other members in debate, would understand the realm and the acceptability of certain comments. I will try to keep mine as parliamentary as I can, unlike some other members of the House in previous debate.

I rise today to debate this bill which is once again back before the House of Commons. It is a bill that has effectively gutted the unemployment insurance program. That is a program that, unfortunately, too many of us in far-flung regions of the country have had to depend on from time to time because of failed economic policies and a lack of government policy and programs to redistribute wealth across the country.

The effect of Bill C-21 is to change the unemployment insurance system forever. What the government has done is to remove itself from participating in the fund. The government has said that from this point on it is going to be an employer-employee fund. The Government of Canada has reneged on its responsibility to look after the unemployed worker in this country. It is a responsibility that has been there since the bill was initially passed by the House of Commons.

What does the bill do? Why are we on this side of the House so opposed to it? The bill does a whole number of things. First, the bill extends the qualifying period in most parts of the country. In effect, what it means is that those poor Canadians from places like Cumberland—Colchester in New Brunswick, parts of eastern Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Antigonish County who do not have a full-time job, or a regular pay cheque coming in, and who are trying to make ends meet for themselves and their families, now will have to try a little harder. The government says: "We don't think you're trying hard enough to find work. We think that you're living off the system. What we are going to do is punish you. We are going to make you find more weeks of work. Not only that, but if you are able to find work in an area of 15 per cent to 20 per cent unemployment, then we will give you a smaller benefit period. We are going to shorten up the benefit period".

In effect, what the government is doing with this bill is ensuring that those people in this country who have not been able to share the wealth will be the very ones who will be nailed by this government, and not only for retraining, which is quite a departure for this government. The government is now saying under this legislation that those who are unemployed should bear the burden of training. Yet it is taking money out of the unemployment insurance fund which is meant as an income support program for those individuals who find hard times in various parts of this country. It is going to increase the qualifying period and decrease the benefit period as well as the benefits. That is what this bill does. It puts the onus strictly on those in our society who are at least able—for the time being—to look after themselves economically.

The bill does a little more than that. When the bill was first introduced in this House last year, in June I believe it was, it was universally condemned by social activists across this country, by provincial premiers and by individuals who work with the poor, the homeless and the downtrodden. The government did not listen.

At one point I asked the minister responsible a question in the House. I indicated that this bill was simply going to force people off UI and on to municipal welfare rolls. The minister in turn got up and indicated that the government was very concerned about helping people on welfare, and that it was allocating more resources to the Canada Assistance Program for welfare recipients.

I do not think that she realized exactly the feeling that she was conveying. The feeling of this government is that if you cannot look after yourself, do not look toward the government to give you that hand. That is a fundamental departure from the way that this country has operated.

This is a wealthy country. We have always believed that we had the resources, the dollars, the heart and the spirit to redistribute our wealth. We have always believed that nobody in this country should go hungry, that if there are hard times they should be borne by all. That was the principle of the UIC act. It was an income support program.

The bill did not come back from the Senate as quickly as the government would have wanted. The Senate was quite clearly doing its job. The Senate is the other part of Parliament. This is the House of Commons. As everybody should know here, bills get introduced, go through the House and then they go to the other place for sober second thought, for thorough debate.

Anybody who wishes to misinterpret or mislead Canadians into believing that the Senate is only there for rubber stamping, absolutely denies the history of the Parliament of Canada. In many occasions in the past the Senate, when it had a bill, would do what it was constitutionally obliged to do. It was to take it through all stages in the Senate, which includes committee. In many cases when a government has not been responsive to the needs and wishes of Canadians, the Senate, unelected as it is, has tried to do its part for the democratic process.

The democratic process means that when legislation gets introduced in Parliament, by the time it is finished it has gone through all readings in both Chambers, that it has the benefit not just of debate and committee work in this place, but the benefit of committee work in the other place. I challenge anybody in this House to stand up and tell me with a clear conscience, knowing that they would be misleading, that the Senate does no work of any value.

The Senate of Canada has produced some of the most advanced committee work that have helped this place, helped our policy areas and the government in formulating social and economic policies than this place has done.

When the bill went over to the Senate the government could not get its way. This government is hell-bent on pushing everything through. If you do not agree with the government, it tries to shut you down. If you really want to get to the crux of the matter, the government knew that it did not have public opinion on its side on Bill C-21. It knew that what it was doing was wrong. It knew that what it was doing was unpopular. It knew that what it was doing was in effect kicking in the butt those Canadians who are least able to defend themselves.

The government wanted the Senate, unelected as it is, to be like tame dogs who were going to be scared off from doing their job by some of the rhetoric flowing from the front benches opposite. The government wanted the Senate to deal with it expeditiously. Members of the government said: "Don't listen to Canadians because we on this side have stopped listening. We have plugged our ears and we just go forward with legislation. You nasty old Senators who are trying to do your job, unelected as you are, in ensuring that Canadians are heard ensure that legislation goes through both Houses and that the end result is that the legislation that is passed into law is legislation of the very best kind".

Thus it goes over to the Senate of Canada. The Senate says: "Hey, there is something wrong here. The government is being negligent in its responsibility to this program. The government in effect is dismantling a major piece of social policy legislation in this country. We think we have to study it. If the Tory government has an agenda whereby it is going to try to depopulate those regions of Canada where we have some difficulty with employment and, yes, unfortunately, where we have to look for a handout now and then, if that is what the idea is, then the Senate of Canada feels it is in the best interest of those regions that this bill get a full and thorough airing through the committee process and through debate".

I think that the Senate is really there to represent the interests of the regions, to ensure that they are not trampled on by an out of control government which is just concerned about pleasing its big business buddies down on Bay Street, just concerned about serving the centre. I am sure at some point there must have been a debate in the Tory caucus, or at least in planning and priorities, to figure out how in the name of God you can get rid of all these welfare recipients down east and what to do with these northerners who keep looking for more money. The government says: "My goodness, don't they know that this country has to be run like a business?" At least the Senate knows that this country cannot always be run like a business. There are costs to keeping a country together. You must treat a country and run a country like a nation.

If you run a country like a nation, instead of like a Bay Street business all the time, then you ensure that there are social programs in place for those who are most in need.

The Senators saw this coming. They said: "Okay, we do not want to frustrate the will of the elected place, the House of Commons, but what we want to do is try to make these guys snap to their senses. Do they not have any idea what they are doing to the poor and the unemployed?"

Madam Speaker, I represent the riding of Dartmouth in Nova Scotia, and I am very lucky to represent that riding. We have some economic difficulties, but by and large it is a riding which has benefited from being the centre of Atlantic Canada. What annoys me the most about the way this government operates and the way it treats people who are not from the royal south of Ontario with $100,000 a year incomes so they can support this government with donations and ads during election campaigns and things like that, is that I come from a place called Cape Breton—

• (1640)

Mr. Kempling: Silly ass.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Silly what? I think there was a comment from the hon. member opposite. If he wants to say it a little louder, we can get it into Hansard.

I come from a place called Cape Breton Island, New Waterford to be exact. It is a coal mining community. We have seen more dinner times than we have seen dinners down there. But we are hard workers. Probably I grew up in poverty. I did not know it because everybody else who lived on the same street, the same neighbourhood and the whole town was poor. At times we had to rely on the generosity and the heart of the federal government to get us through hard times. At times even my father had to go on unemployment insurance. If UI ran out, maybe he had to go on relief from the coal company. But those programs were there to help those communities and those individuals who wanted to contribute.

The whole intent of this legislation is to ensure that we are businesslike. Maybe, just perhaps, it is to ensure that there is a resettlement, that we can get those guys down east—who these people opposite think are perpetually on unemployment insurance and are poor because we want to be poor, which is nonsense and gutterwash—to finally come to their senses, if the government cuts off all the strings of support. I think somebody in this Chamber said a little earlier that they will either move or starve.

We have seen this over and over again by this government. It has no idea where it is going, other than to the centre. It has no other agenda than to cut those bloodsuckers off, those people who are perpetually and habitually draining tax dollars through social programs.

This bill was debated at one point in the fall, and I refer to an article from The Globe and Mail written by Susan Delacourt on October 10. I just want to give members opposite an idea of what they are doing to rural Canada. I want to give them an idea of what they are doing to areas that have perpetually suffered from high levels of unemployment.

The headline states: "New jobs policy angers Newfoundland. Shift to training viewed as disguised resettlement program". We can all get up here and spout off rhetoric, and we are all equally good on all sides of this House. But there is now a feeling in Atlantic Canada that we are no longer wanted by this government to stay in Atlantic Canada, and that just perhaps we are no longer wanted by this government as part of Canada. We have all too often had to go down the road to Toronto. Years before my parent's people had to go down the road to Boston. Only a few years ago we had to go down the road to Alberta. Now what this government is doing with Bill C-21 is trying to ensure that we go down the road forever.

As the former Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Turner said in a speech he gave a number of months back: "This government seems hell-bent on turning Atlantic Canada into one gigantic national park, devoid of industry, devoid of hope and devoid of people".

The Senate got hold of this bill. It said: "This is a fundamental shift away from Canadian social policy. Maybe we can shake this government awake and tell it what the impact is". Maybe the Senate can tell the government what the impact is in Nova Scotia where the changes to the UI act, which the Minister of Employment so smugly got up to defend in this House, are going to cost Nova Scotians in real dollar terms about $50 million. That is a lot of money in a province of about 870,000 people, coupled with the $80 million cut in the second last budget to EPF funding that goes to hospitals and post-secondary education.

The government says in this bill: "We are doing this because we want to put more emphasis on training". It cannot have it both ways. You cannot tell us that your cutting is not gutting a bill and hurting us economically in places like Atlantic Canada and at the same time say: "We are concerned about training. That is why we have done it". If you are so concerned about education, programs and training, then why in the name of goodness have you cut $80 million from the Established Programs Financing over the next five years in Nova Scotia alone?

That is money that goes to training to make sure that we have a well educated, highly skilled workforce.

I am just trying to give you, Madam Speaker, an idea of the full impact of this legislation, coupled with the other regressive measures. We found out two weeks ago that there was $50 million less transferred in equalization program payments to Nova Scotia.

We found out in the last 12 months that there was $1.221 billion in economic regional development agreements in Atlantic Canada that have been allowed to expire. Yet the minister opposite from Nova Scotia, from Central Nova, the minister responsible for those agreements, only put up $274 million. By anybody's calculation that is almost a $1 billion shortfall.

The effect of this bill, if members opposite do not come to their senses and sit down and talk to the Senate about refining the bill further, is not just going to be that a few people will have to move to Toronto. The effect of the bill is real hardship.

I do not know if members opposite who come from wealthier ridings have ever had to deal with somebody whose benefits have run out and who could not get employment. I dealt with a lot of them when I used to work for my colleague from Cape Breton—East Richmond many years ago. He comes from one of the higher unemployment areas in the country. I will tell you that the gentleman from Cape Breton—East Richmond has worked hard on behalf of those constituents to try to bring this government to its senses and to show it the real human tragedy in suffering and deprivation that is going to be caused by this bill.

Has anybody opposite ever had to sit down with a young gentleman of 22 who has two children and is living in a barn in October when the winds howl down off the east coast of Atlantic Canada because there is no work? You tell me that that man enjoys that. You tell me that he enjoys going to bed at night knowing that he cannot look after his spouse and his children. That is the impression I get from listening to speeches by members opposite.

When this bill came into the House I was annoyed. I was damn mad when I listened to some members opposite talk about the abuse of the UI system. Sure, there is abuse. There is abuse in every program, but it is a very small percentage of abuse. To correct the abuse, as they call it, they have nailed everybody.

If they have ever had to sit down at 4.30 on a Friday afternoon when every municipal and provincial government office that can help is closed and look in the eye a guy with two small boys, four and two, who is living in a barn because the system has failed him, I do not think they could stand in their places opposite and say that those people who are on unemployment insurance do not need it, that if they worked a little harder they would find a job. The reality of today's economy in those areas is otherwise.

This government is completely abandoning the principle of trying to help those individuals who need the help the most.

The amendments that have been proposed by the Senate are truly amendments not meant to frustrate the will of Parliament. They are amendments meant to put some heart and some sense back into the heads and bodies of the members opposite in the government, to try to show them what the full impact of these measures is.

What in the name of goodness are we going to do when people can no longer get the weeks work that they need to go on unemployment insurance, when they cannot get the extra qualifying weeks? How in the name of goodness are those municipalities that are now going to have to pay welfare to them going to find the money?

This government's cut-backs have cut us to the bone in Atlantic Canada. They have pummelled those that need this government's help the most.

I want to talk very quickly about the Senate. The Senate has been trying to do its job. It has been trying to save the hides of the members opposite here who are now down to 15 per cent in public opinion because of their misguided policies. Perhaps if they listened to the Senate, which has every constitutional right to do what it is doing on this particular bill, they would not be at 15 per cent in the polls. Perhaps they could sleep a little bit sounder at night. Perhaps they could come to their senses and withdraw legislation like this and put heart and caring back into government.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Can the member tell me what the employment situation was in 1984 and what it is now in Atlantic Canada?

• (1650)

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, in 1984 were just recovering from a recession. Because of Liberal policies people were not lined up at food banks like they are now in Atlantic Canada.

In 1984, because of Liberal policies, which were a safety net in case of recession so that nobody in this country should go hungry or lose their home, they worked. He asks me now what the situation is. The situation is bleak in places like Cape Breton Island. The situation is absolutely desperate in places like Cumberland—Colchester. The situation is absolutely devastating in our fisheries communities across Atlantic Canada.

I hope the hon. member was just trying to fill time when he asked the question because I am going to fill in a little bit of time for him. He asked what the situation now is dealing with unemployment in Atlantic Canada.

If you want to look at the real tragedy in Atlantic Canada, look at the measure that was put forward yesterday by a whole bevy of ministers. I thought they were delivering the federal treasury, there were so many down there for the announcement. My goodness, we had to wait weeks for the hon. Minister for International Trade to come back to get his value photo opportunity.

Yesterday what we were waiting for was a rescue package, an aid package for the fisheries which has been in a state of virtual collapse in Atlantic Canada. It did not happen yesterday. If the hon. member has been in this House since the election of 1988, he knows that members on this side of the House have been consistently standing in their places and doing everything but begging this government to recognize the crisis that was emerging in the Atlantic fishery.

Do you want to know what the situation is now with a Tory government in power? We have the town of Canso ready to go down on its knees after being shut down after 400 years of fishing tradition. We have Trepassey, Gaultois, Lockeport and a whole number of other small communities that have lost their single industry—fisheries. It is a resource-based industry that when managed properly can allow people to eke out a modest living.

This government, which is so uncaring about any industry in Atlantic Canada, did not listen to the members over here. As a result, we are seeing a social tragedy unfold. We are seeing a resettlement program.

I believe it was the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls who got up in the House one day and accused this government of embarking upon a resettlement program. I mentioned it before. It was in an October article of The Globe and Mail.

I must admit that even as a partisan in this place I had my fingers crossed yesterday, hoping that the new Minister of Fisheries who comes from Atlantic Canada would have at least found a voice to stand up and show that he understands the problem in employment in the fisheries. I perhaps got the most arrogant response of all. It was the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, not an aid program.

What we heard about the fisheries yesterday is that the government has basically accepted that the stocks are never going to recover, that we have to downsize the fishery, that we have to give them the golden handshake in those communities. The government did not come in and talk about measures, dollars and programs to keep those communities alive until the stocks rebounded. It did not talk about that. It talked about the golden handshake. They said: "We are going to retire you early. We are going to retrain you for jobs that don't exist, but they will be in Toronto".

Do you want to know what has happened in Atlantic Canada under this government? We have seen the wholesale dismantling of our economy in our resource-based industries. We have seen an abandonment by the Government of Canada of the aspirations for a rightful place in this Confederation by each and every Atlantic Canadian. That is what we got from our government.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I commend the member for Dartmouth for a very fine speech.

I would like to ask him in relation to his very last statement before the questions and comments began about the amendment which we are addressing that the government should be withdrawing Bill C-21. Does he think that that would be an appropriate thing to do?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind remarks.

The only way that we are going to get out of this regressive measure is to have the bill withdrawn. I think that the Senate has done everything in its power to try to bring these people to their senses.

I do not think that the government is going to withdraw it. I think that members of the government all have the strings through their noses and that they are all being tugged by the PM's office which tells them when to nod yes and when to nod no. If you are asking me if I think that it is going to be withdrawn, if I thought that there was anything that I could do to get this government to come to its senses and withdraw this bill, I would say yes. But at this particular point it is in a process between the Senate and the House of Commons.

This government is so arrogant that it refuses to recognize proper procedure constitutionally. Its members continue to stand in this House and tell the Canadian public and members in this Chamber that the Senate has no right to do what it is doing.

If you have been sitting in this place as long as some members opposite have, you should have read a little bit of history. I know what the Senate is legally and constitutionally empowered to do. If anybody on the other side wants to take issue with the way that the Senate has proceeded with this bill, then get their government to challenge the Senate. You know that you do not have a leg to stand on. You know that what the Senate of Canada is doing right now, even though it is unelected—and I want to see reform in that upper chamber; I want to see a chamber that is elected—is ensuring that the will of the majority, the tyranny of the majority does not rule over the will of the people of this country. Thank God for that in this case. That is why the Senate of Canada is enjoying public support in what it is doing in trying to stop this government's regressive and almost totalitarian measures against the people of Canada.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech with great interest. He is quite articulate and in his unique bombastic style has laid out his concerns regarding the bill we are discussing.

One of the things that concerns me however is that in his whole speech he was talking about people on unemployment insurance and on welfare. He said nothing about job creation, nothing about training people and retraining people for the needs of today, nothing about this government putting in more money, development money, to create employment and diversification of the economy in the east through ACOA, which I believe has been universally accepted. He has not talked in any way, shape or form of new methods of improving the situation in the east.

I have been around here both in government and in opposition. The Liberals like to talk about how many years they were in power, how wonderful things were and let us go back to the old ways. They say that we have to go back to the old ways, the way that the unemployment insurance system was because it was perfect.

Mr. Dingwall: Question.

Mr. McDermid: This is questions and comments, as I recall the rules. I am making a comment now.

I have listened to them always wanting to go back to the old ways. They say that the old ways were better. Well, they are not better, and times are changing. With the change we have to change in this place and we have to change some of the things that are going on in this country.

One of the things we want to do in eastern Canada is to develop employment for people. That is very important. That is why ACOA was set up. That is why we have training and retraining programs to bring people into the mainstream.

People in eastern Canada are no different from people anywhere else in Canada. They do not want to be on unemployment insurance and they do not want to be on welfare. They want a job. That is what this government is dedicated to do.

Why does the hon. member not stand up and give some positive ideas of how the economy can be diversified in eastern Canada rather than standing up here and whining and moaning about unemployment insurance and welfare, like he does day in and day out?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now expired.

Resuming debate with the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is very important to me to have this opportunity to comment on Bill C-21 which is now back before us in the House of Commons. I say that because there is a rumour going about the country that everything is okey-dokey in Toronto, that we do not have poor people in Toronto, that we do not have unemployed or hungry people in Toronto. As I say, that is a rumour. You can see hungry people at the food lines. You will not see many of the unemployed people because they cannot pay the Toronto rents. They are forced out of sight, out of Toronto. The 10,000 to 20,000 homeless people still lurking around Toronto are not telephoned by Statistics Canada to find out whether they have a job or not. They do not have a job. They do not have a telephone. They do not have a home to put a telephone in.

This piece of legislation is quite untimely. No doubt it is a good thing to create jobs but not to take money from people who have paid their unemployment insurance premiums on the excuse of training them for new jobs.

We know what the neo-Conservative agenda is, and we know with unemployment insurance the primary goal is to weaken the bargaining power of workers, to cause more workers to lose their rights to unemployment benefits, to cause workers to be uneasy about standing up for their rights on the job because the rules have changed for dismissing a person and for taking away a person's benefits after he or she has been dismissed.

What this government is looking for and obviously what it has promised the Business Council on National Issues is a more docile work force where people will not stand up and defend themselves as vigorously as they have done over the past decades. By taking the money from the pockets of the unemployed to do the training the government is depriving the unemployed. Many unemployed will not get the training and there is no guarantee given by the government that they will. In the short term the government is depriving the unemployed of the benefit from premiums they paid. It is also putting those who do take training in the position of having taken it from their brothers and sisters by the government's order. This will mean a meaner and less generous program.

The current President of the United States said he wanted a gentler, kinder country. He obviously thinks that is Canada. That is why he is taking it over, but we will not be a gentler, kinder country once we have been homogenized into the American pattern.

The primary fault of this system is the removal of the government from any responsibility, the responsibility it has had for nearly half a century, for not only administering the fund but also for providing input as a guarantee of both regional fairness and carryover in times of slump. The government until now has had a material interest in seeing that unemployment does not become serious.

Now the government, if this bill is passed, will go scot-free and will be able to let unemployment rise without a bill to the government for payment.

This Tory government has shown its intention by holding the present unemployed hostage to the VERs. Instead of the annual adjustment of benefits and the eligibility time to the current regional conditions, the government has tied these benefits to the bill in which it will take this $1.3 billion out of the fund created primarily by workers and employers.

The government will not review the VERs. It is now May and it still refuses to review the VERs. It will not review parental benefits in spite of a Supreme Court decision ordering it to provide them. It is showing itself in contempt of the law of the land, which it brags about. The government says we have a government according to law, only according to the laws which suit the government. As I say, they are holding the training funds hostage. There are no training funds yet because the government has cut back on most of the training programs that we have had during the 1980s. They are holding hostage the entire principle of training.

Yesterday the minister spoke at length about the importance of training. Nobody disagrees that training is important. Nobody disagrees that for our economy to sustain itself there must be training and retraining. What she did not mention yesterday was that the six labour-business task forces that she set up to make recommendations about the new training program all said: "Don't take unemployment insurance money to do it".

She brags about having set up these task forces. She brags about the training programs, but she ignored the unanimous recommendation of her own task forces on that point.

As I have said, there is a rumour about the country that everything is just lovely in Toronto. In fact in the last couple of years Toronto has lost about 77 plants, either closed or on notice of closing. This puts about 16,000 workers in jeopardy, either out of work or about to be out of work. Simply talking about the number of jobs does not answer the question of how these people can pay the cost of living in Toronto, how they can pay Toronto rents or house prices. A job at McDonald's doesn't do that in Toronto.

It is going to be the older workers particularly in Toronto who will be hit. Many of these plants have a great many long service employees or had until they were closed a great many long service employees. I know from my own experience. When the factory I worked in was closed down after about a half-century of operation, men and women 50 years or older had a very hard time finding other work, particularly if they had a few little injuries on the job. A tow motor operator with a bad back is not much sought after by the employers, especially if he is looking for something other than tow motor work because there are not that many tow motor jobs.

Immigrants and people with very little formal education will be hard hit. The policies of the present and past governments of allowing the people to drift out of the homes they want to live in on the east coast into places like Toronto have brought many people with limited schooling; not all of them but many of them. I worked with them in the factory for 18 years. Their schooling was limited; good as far as it went, but it does not take them beyond grade 7 or grade 8 in most cases. Many immigrants and people with little education will be very hard hit. They will not find it easy to get jobs to pay their mortgages. Of course, once they have had to move out of Toronto, the government will again say that the Toronto statistics look good.

There is a great deal of good work being done by the Metro Toronto Labour Education Centre. On this point I do want to commend the minister for her continued funding of that work. They are doing the kind of work that the minister and the government and members on this side of the House agree should be done. They get in touch with workers. They encourage workers to get in touch with them when they have been laid off or are about to be laid off. They can give them assistance in finding whatever benefits are due to them as well as opportunities for training and retraining, training in English or French as a second language and retraining in their own industry such as the clothing industry or for other industries that are emerging or increasing and in which these people might find jobs.

The Metro Toronto Labour Education Centre has found that among the workers who come to it for help the average length of unemployment after a plant closing is 10 months. Out of all the new jobs we are told about the average is 10 months to find a new job after a lay-off. The reduced benefits in Bill C-21 will mean that the maximum a worker can get will be 35 weeks or just over 8 months and that is in Toronto. Madam Speaker, 6 weeks of holidays without pay is not what these workers are looking for. When you live on unemployment insurance you are not saving very much money. Many of these workers are going to be over the 10-month mark, and they and their families will suffer a good deal. How do they pay a mortgage with nothing coming in?

As I said, in Toronto the housing prices and mortgage prices are seriously overheated. We also have in Toronto a significant number of the visible minority population. This government has expressed its concern, and rightly so. Other people are expressing concern about rising racial tensions in our country. We have the evidence of that in Toronto, as elsewhere. This is going to be exacerbated by the government's action in this bill. The increased penalties for those who quit their jobs could be really devastating for people who suffer from subtle racism.

In other words, if a person of a visible minority or for that matter a woman, let alone a woman of a visible minority, is being harassed on the job because of race or gender—and it happens; I have seen it in the factory and I am sure many others in this House have seen it in different places of work—it is going to be very hard to know whether he or she should stand up for themselves and risk losing the job under these new harsher penalties or whether they should button their lips and accept the racist or sexist harassment just so that they know that they will have a pay cheque next week and the week after.

This bill will make their situations harder. It will make it harder for them to stand up against the kind of racial discrimination or gender discrimination that all sides of this Parliament are opposed to.

This bill will also have the effect of forcing workers into substandard jobs, if they can get them at all. The Labour Education Centre has reported that those who re-entered the workforce in Toronto after a plant closure got a job that averaged $3 per hour less than the one they left. They were the lucky ones who got another job, but they now have to make do and pay that mortgage with $3 an hour less. Just to say there are jobs there does not tell people whether or not they can live or whether or not they can keep a roof over their heads in the city of Toronto.

It is possible that the government does not pay much attention to the findings of the Labour Education Centre or to the Downtown Churchworkers' Association which were refused the right to speak to the committee last year when they came to Toronto. But the government usually professes to pay some attention to the Economic Council of Canada. In its recent report Good Jobs: Bad Jobs the council reports that for Canada as a whole 54 per cent of those who changed jobs after the age of 55 were still unemployed six months later. More than half the older workers 55 years of age or older who changed jobs were still unemployed six months later. That is, if they had to leave a job it was six months or more before they found another. At that age, that is very threatening. Some of us here know what it is like to be in our late fifties and sixties or even seventies.

It also reported that 40 per cent of the workers of all ages who were laid of suffered a wage loss. We are talking in many cases about workers with years of service, experienced workers, laid off through no fault of their own but through changing business conditions. Two out of five of them suffered a wage loss. Many of these people are living just on the edge of making it on Toronto rents, transporation prices, and general Toronto costs. The Economic Council of Canada also reports that the gap in the unemployment rate between those with less than nine years of schooling and the average has widened significantly over the past decade.

Fortunately, schooling is increasing and the average is now more than nine years. That is good, but the wage gap for those who did not make it past nine years of schooling is increasing and they have to suffer under the same living costs in Toronto as those with higher education who are getting the jobs with the rising incomes that are increasing the gap between them and the rest.

My point is that it will be the older workers, the less educated workers, and the workers who have been laid off following the many plant closures related to free trade who will be suffering more as a result of Bill C-21. A few of them may get into the training programs we have been told about. As I said, the minister does not guarantee that any of them will. Certainly the minister does not try to tell us that all or most of them will have that opportunity.

The effect of this bill is to take money from those who generally can least afford it, in order to train people to serve those who in many cases are paying no or almost no taxes. This government has a powerful track record over the last five or six years of reducing the tax on those who have the most ability to pay and increasing the tax on those who have the least ability to pay.

This bill is another tax on those who have the least ability to pay. Yes, some of them may be trained, but the people who will employ them will in many cases be those whom this government is excusing from paying the cost of that training. Instead it is forcing their relatively poorer brothers and sisters who continue in the work force or who were in the work force paying unemployment insurance benefits to pay that cost. It will force the poor to subsidize the poorer, while the rich will pay less and less, especially if the goods and services tax is imposed.

These 80,000 or 90,000 companies that pay no tax will be able to employ workers who are trained at the cost of others. They will not have to pay the cost of training. It is a very unjust law set within a pattern of unjust laws. There are high taxes on working people. There are high interest rates that put mortgages beyond the reach of many working people. Now we have an unemployment insurance system that will take from the poor to subsidize the training of a few workers to the benefit of the rich. It is a shameful law.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend the member for Trinity—Spadina for providing us with information that unfortunately many of us did not know, particularly in relation to the fact that in many respects Toronto is not the boom town it is made out to be. That fact alone may go a long way toward shooting down the government's argument for high interest rates in order to keep inflation down, even as it applies to Toronto.

I was interested in the hon. member's comments about discrimination that some immigrant, minority or visible minority groups may be facing. Will he expand on that to give us a better idea of the problems these people face in relation to their employment and continued employment.

• (1720)

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I will not go into it in great detail but I will point out for example that in Trinity—Spadina many thousands of the people are immigrants from Hong Kong, the People's Republic of China, or the several countries of southeast Asia. These are mostly people who come with little knowledge of English or French. Their employment is often limited by their opportunities within the community of their own languages.

In past years it has certainly been found that some of these people were working at below minimum wage and were being deprived of benefits such as unemployment insurance by unscrupulous employers. Many of them are working in the garment industry which has suffered greatly from this government's action in the trade deal with the United States. If they find their place of employment closed they will have a harder than average time finding work somewhere else because in many cases, particularly among the women, they have not had an opportunity to learn English.

The policy of this government and of the previous government was to provide some English language training for those who were destined for the workforce. That means they excluded people whom they regarded as mere housewives. They could just stay home. They did not need English. That is by and large the policy, especially as the government is cutting back on English and French as second language programs.

People such as that have been held back by their working conditions because not all those housewives had the luxury of staying home every day, if that is what they considered a luxury. Many of them, nevertheless, had to get out to work to pay the rent and to make ends meet. They did not have the opportunity to learn one of the official languages, to learn what is the minimum wage amount, to learn other basic laws of our country for the protection of workers so that they could defend themselves and their rights on the job. Those people will suffer considerably.

There are other language minorities as well. There are people who speak a dialect of the Caribbean; there are people from the Azores and from the mainland of Portugal; there are others from various non-English-speaking countries, all of whom to some degree suffer the same difficulty as these East Asian immigrants. They will bear an extra cost under this Bill C-21 if it becomes law.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-10, an Act respecting the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

[English]

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House resumed consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and on the amendment of Mrs. McDougall (p. 11064); and the amendment of Mr. Fisher (p. 11109).

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could at this time get the agreement of the House to a motion which has been discussed among House Leaders and for which I think there is unanimous agreement. The motion is as follows:

> That the House continue to sit past the ordinary hour of daily adjournment until there are no further speakers in debate on the motion in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, at which time the putting of the question on the amendment and on the main motion shall be deemed to be deferred until 3.00 o'clock p.m., Wednesday, May 9, 1990, and the Speaker shall proceed with the adjournment motion under Standing 38 and adjourn the House until tomorrow at 2.00 o'clock p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the motion as moved by the hon. Government House Leader. Is there unanimous consent for such a motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I just want to repeat some elementary points, not respecting the substance of Bill C-21 which has been debated for many months in this House and in committee and in the other place, but rather the propriety of the actions of the Senate respecting this legislation.

We have had the benefit of the Chair's ruling that was requested by myself in respect of the actions of the Senate. As the Speaker very clearly pointed out in his ruling, that while he lacked, as we understood, the constitutional authority to intervene with the other House, just as the Speaker of the other House lacks the authority to intervene here, there was no question that what the Senate is proposing tramples substantially on the rights and privileges of this House.

First, the financial initiative of the Crown is infringed when, in the Senate's proposed changes in Bill C-21, major costly amendments are proposed without first securing a Royal Recommendation. It seems clear to any fair-minded person who looks at the legislation that the Royal Recommendation is exceeded vastly by the proposed amendments of the Senate.

Second, there is an affront by the Senate to this House when Senators in the majority ignore and defy the budget and its valence of Ways and Means. They have suggested in Bill C-21 that they can make changes to the unemployment insurance system which take an additional $1.75 billion out of the revenue this year and upset the budget proposed by this House to that extent. This is not just a minor adjustment, this is a $2 billion hole in the budget projections from April 1989, a budget from last year.

Third, as a result of the two basic constitutional shortfalls I have cited, the Senate puts itself in violation of the principles in Sections 53 and 54 of our Constitution Act. It might be helpful just to remind this House what those sections say because this is our constitution. They state that bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax impost shall originate in the House of Commons.

That right becomes meaningless if the other place can distort and change to an extent as to make the origin unrecognizable. What good is it to have this authority in the constitution if the other place assumes to itself the authority to distort and warp what might have been initiated in this House.

Section 54 states that it shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or at any tax impost to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message of the Governor General, the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed. That is the so-called Royal Recommendation.

If it is unlawful for this House to depart from the Royal Recommendation, how can one suggest that the other place can do so? How can we possibly accept amendments from the other House which we cannot accept if they were proposed in this House. What constitutional authority would make it appropriate for us to accept amendments from the other place which we could not accept if they originated in this place? That surely is not a procedure that anyone who respects this institution could voluntarily agree to.

Finally, for these reasons, the motion of the government makes it very clear that this House will not turn its back on the law and the constitution and our own long-established procedures here. We say in the message that we will not accept Senate proposals which cost money over which only this elected House has the power to propose.

The other place claims its authority from Section 17 of the British North America Act, or the Constitution of Canada Act, which says, "There shall be a Parliament consisting of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons."

• (1730)

The Chair affirmed in the ruling of April 26, 1990, that the strength of our parliamentary system lies in all three constituent parts respecting their constitutional roles. Section 17 could be interpreted by the Governor General to mean that he has the right to amend legislation, to alter it, to change it, to kill it, or veto it, and those who support the Senate's right to do that, must also support the Governor General's right to do that.

What kind of a democratic system would that be? Obviously an absurd democratic system that has never, ever in this country, until 1984, been a part of the practice.

I would like to refer the House to a paragraph from a book, The Modern Senate of Canada, published in 1965. That is the latest reference we have to the modern Senate. This is pre-MacEachen, obviously. It is by Mr. F.A. Kunz. After a long discussion about the relative roles of the House and the Senate, he states:

> On the contrary, the Senate has acted in full understanding of the meaning and implications of responsible government and accepted as binding upon itself the proposition that it should not unduly disturb what has come to be called "the balance of ways and means"; or, as Hopkins says, "that it would be inadmissible to tamper with the overall financial program submitted by the Government in its budgetary proposals in such a way as to effect a material change in the budgetary surplus or deficit envisaged therein".

Surely the Senate's proposal of a $2 billion increase in the deficit is, by anybody's definition, tampering with the balance of ways and means. We have a budget presented in this House. Immediately upon presenting the budget, a motion of confidence is put to the House. It is debated for six days, and there are usually a couple of amendments from the opposition. This House says in finality that, yes, this House has confidence in the budgetary measures of the government.

On the strength of that motion, taxes are collected immediately. Plans are made by industry, by the private sector, by the economy of this country. This is possible because of all these practices, such as provisions 53 and 54 of the Constitution. It has been the practice for more than a century in this country and a few centuries in Britain, upon which our system is based, that the unelected chamber does not tamper with the balance of ways and means. Until 1984, that was the way this country operated.

In 1984, some Trudeauites were appointed to the Senate and now, suddenly, we are having a debate which is more fitting for Victorian England than modern Canada. It is incredible in this day and age, in 1990, that we are seriously discussing whether in fact an elected legislature should have precedence over a non-elected body. It is incredible to find an outstanding lawyer from Kingston, such as the member for Kingston and the Islands, stand there, without blushing, and suggest that it is legitimate for this non-elected, appointed body to trample on the rights of this House.

I would like to acquaint members of the House with Standing Order 80(1), which states:

> 80. (1) All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

Were we to take the suggestions of the Liberals or the New Democratic Party to accept the Senate's amendments or ask them to go further, we would in essence be going against the Standing Orders of this House.

That Standing Order, by the way, has been there since 1867. It is based on a statement by the British House of Commons in 1671. We have over 300 years of tradition here that says this House and only this House has the right to decide the details on all grants and aids to her Sovereign. The language there is a bit archaic, the argument is a bit archaic, but it is astounding that we should, in all seriousness, be having this debate here.

I suspect that a lot of this is primarily fluff from those people who say that they believe that the Senate is doing good work, that the Senate knows what the people want, the House of Commons does not. But if you read what they say in private or to the media, you get some interesting quotes. Let me quote a few: Senator MacEachen, Question Period, 1985, speaking in respect to a borrowing bill that the Senate was then holding up stated: "I think if we did amend the bill in any serious way, or if we defeated it, I think that would be quite arrogant".

Senator MacEachen is the leader of the Liberals in the Senate. Senator Frith is his deputy leader, and he stated: "There may be 100 reasons why we should not in the Senate yield to the House, and only one reason why we should, and if that one reason is that the Commons is elected and the Senate is not, that is reason enough to yield." He is right.

Senator Hébert, remember him?

Mr. Epp: The hunger-striker.

Mr. Andre: As reported in Senate Debates, July 21, 1988, he stated: "The non-elected representatives should give away to the elected representatives leaving the people the choice to elect another government". Even he, if push comes to shove, recognizes democracy should prevail.

Mr. Milliken: That's why they only amended this bill instead of rejecting it outright.

Mr. Andre: Senator Buckwold, who is chairing the committee on the GST stated: "It should be understood constitutionally that basically the House of Commons in the end would be supreme, that there could be a very real cause for concern if the Senate rejected bills".

Senator Thériault, a Liberal from New Brunswick, stated: "The House of Commons is the legislature with the powers, as it should be as long as the Senate is an appointed Senate". He is dead right.

Senator DeBané, stated: "The Liberal party was not elected to government. The Conservatives were. It is time to bow to the will of the elected representatives. I urge my colleagues not to put any more road-blocks in the way of passing this bill".

New Democratic Party House leader, Nelson Riis, said on October 30, 1987: "Quite frankly, I am very disappointed with the Senate because I do not think it has the right to hold up legislation".

Lorne Nystrom, New Democratic Party finance critic in The Globe and Mail, March 28, 1990, said: "I believe the Commons should have the final say. I do not think the unelected body should usurp the elected body".

Pierre Trudeau, remember him, in 1984, when speaking on behalf of that party said: "No member of this Chamber would suggest that the Senate should systematically obstruct the will of the majority in the elected body of Parliament". Pierre Trudeau said that.

Perhaps it is time to acknowledge that there are a lot of things said in this Chamber about this and that, but the reality is that we all serve the public here in this Chamber, or even down the hall, and we serve that public not at all unless we continue to recognize that in a democracy it is only the elected body that has the right to insist that its views prevail.

• (1740)

I do not expect the members of the opposite side to stand up and acknowledge that fact at this point in time. I expect they will continue to vote that we listen to the Senate and that the Senate has a right to prevail. I understand that. But they do that in the sure knowledge that they are outnumbered in this Chamber. However, I would ask of them that as they meet in caucus with their Senators that they remember that this is a democracy. We are at the end of the day. It is time to let the will of the democratically elected House of Commons prevail. To do otherwise is to do damage to at least 130 years of tradition in this country and a couple of centuries more in terms of the British system upon which our system is based.

I ask that hon. members opposite aid us in ensuring that democracy continues.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On questions or comments, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to everything that the government House leader had to say. It sounded like his point of order on April 3. He will not mind me drawing the parallels, because I wanted to quote to him a few things he left out of his speech today that he said on April 3 and ask if his position is not just a little bit thick.

On April 3, as reported at page 10143 of Hansard he stated:

> Amendments 5(a) and (b) propose a different and more expensive—over $350 million—

And of course he was sounding shocked at the time.

> —scheme than that provided for in the royal recommendation. For this reason 5(a) and (b) should be ruled out of order.

That was his position on April 3. Now, here we have the resolution which the Minister of Employment and Immigration moved yesterday and I presume that the government House leader, being part of this wonderful cabinet we have here, had something to do with the drafting of this resolution. It says at the very beginning:

> That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House agrees with amendment 5(b) made by the Senate to Bill C-21.

In other words, this amendment 5(b) that was out of order, according to the government House leader on April 3, now has been properly apparently moved in the Senate, because we do not have a royal recommendation attached to this resolution that the government has moved in its proposal here.

Mr. Kempling: That is a spurious argument.

Mr. Milliken: It is not spurious at all. The hon. member says that it is a spurious argument. The problem is how did the minister come to these varying views? Is it because his position has changed since April 3, in respect of his argument, or did one speech writer write the speech on April 3 and somebody else draft the resolution that we are adopting in the House today?

I would like to know how the minister who piously intones about the rights of Parliament and has gone on and on about how he is such a defender of those rights, now is accepting that this amendment is proper, as moved by the Senate, which increases the charge on the public revenue, by his admission. We have not denied that. We have said that it simply increases it by less than the amount of the royal recommendation originally. We have said that all along, and have said that these are in order. At the same time, on April 3 the minister was saying that this is wrong, this is bad. We cannot have it. Which is it? I ask the hon. minister to explain that.

Mr. Andre: I will be pleased to explain. First, I would like to put a proposal back. If the hon. member is suggesting that he finds this amendment an affront, then I am sure we could work out an agreement to amend the motion, to scratch this amendment, if he in turn would agree to vote with us on the remainder of the motion and prevail upon his colleagues down the hall to agree. Now, if he would agree to do that, we could do this straight away.

Mr. Milliken: No, I was just worried about your position.

Mr. Andre: Oh, I see.

Mr. Epp: Just a debating point.

Mr. Andre: Let the record show that the head nod was sideways, not up and down.

The hon. member will also know that what is of concern here is in respect of expenditures from the UI account, not from the CRF. The main principle of the bill, the principle on which we must insist and which if violated would truly ruin the balance of ways and means is the principle that the unemployment insurance account will be paid for by employers and employees and not by the general taxpayer. This amendment does not violate that particular principle.

But again, I repeat my offer, if the hon. member could make commitments on behalf of his caucus both here and in the other place, we could certainly go back to the motion that we sent to the Senate the first time.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I was rather interested in the defence of democracy put forth by the government House leader. He is also suggesting that if the impasse should remain, there is a possibility that the government might, while staying within the bounds of democracy, support what I would describe as a super-saturated Senate. I would like the government House leader to expand on the proposition that if things continue, they will appoint Senators over and above the usual number.

Mr. Andre: There is no such proposition. There is a provision in the Constitution of Canada Act to allow for the appointment of additional Senators to break an impasse. People are aware of that.

Today, virtually the entire world is going to democracy. A few years ago it looked like democracies were under threat as totalitarianism was gaining throughout the world but now the opposite is occurring. Democracies are flourishing everywhere, but we wonder sometimes in Canada as this non-democratic body asserts what it claims are its legitimate rights.

As I said in my remarks, I do not think that the government will need to resort to those kinds of Draconian tactics because I believe, as the two leaders of his party, the finance critic and house leader said, the will of the House of Commons should prevail. I am sure his leader feels that way. I am sure there are more democrats in the New Democratic Party than there are people who believe the Senate is doing God's work here. I am sure there are more democrats in the Liberal party than would be evidenced by hearing their speeches and that they realize that it is the right of the House of Commons to prevail.

Around the world on many occasions, people have taken very drastic action to defend democracy and at this point in time no responsible person would dismiss any alternative in order to defend our democratic system.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I can understand why the minister chooses to deliver a sermon rather than to comment on the contents of the bill. I would be embarrassed to comment in defence of the bill as well.

Mr. Kempling: We are debating a motion, not the bill.

Mrs. Catterall: I would like to ask the minister one question. He has left on the record the implication that the delay in this bill is somehow costing the Canadian taxpayers $2 billion. His mathematics is a little wrong. We are not talking about a whole year, for starters. Perhaps he could explain to us how that compares to the cost to Canadian taxpayers of the government's interest rate policy.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, as one of my colleagues mentioned, we are debating a motion to respond to Senate amendments, not the bill. The bill has been debated ad nauseam for many months.

• (1750)

The point about the roughly $2 billion in terms of a hole in the deficit, only a Liberal could suggest, "What is $2 billion?". If MacEachen wants to drive a hole in our deficit projections by $2 billion for the sake of some political gain, he should be free to do that, they seem to be saying. That is absurd.

The question of interest rates has a lot to do with the deficit and a lot to do with us spending more than we are taking in while trying to service the accumulated debt her predecessors left this government.

If the hon. member is suggesting that one can help with the interest rate problems by increasing the deficit by $2 billion in this manner, then I suggest that the Liberal caucus is in need of better financial advisers.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, it was rather interesting listening to the diatribe of the government House leader, particularly in response to the questions which were put to him by my colleague for Kingston and the Islands.

However, in reviewing the motion before the House, I would like indicate to members present that the subject matter that we are dealing with, although very important to Canadians generally, specifically it is very important to those Canadians who have had opportunities, and some of them unfortunate opportunities, to be on unemployment insurance.

Many of those individuals are quite cynical about this entire process, especially the government's actions with regard to the statements that it has made previously. I remind members opposite and the public at large what a senior minister of the Crown said during the last election. The Minister for International Trade said during the 1988 election campaign: "No one is planning any changes in the unemployment insurance program. There has not been any change proposed to us since we dealt with the Forget commission. We are not contemplating any changes".

Those were the words of the Newfoundland representative in the federal cabinet, stating that there would be no changes to unemployment insurance. This was quoted in the Evening Telegram of October 14, 1988, on page 3.

Here we are, not too many months later, with the government introducing a budget and a particular bill to deal with the Unemployment Insurance Commission which will have, in the estimation both of government members, as expressed in this Chamber, and by those who have been recipients of unemployment insurance, tremendous, economic impact on the economies of the various provinces across this country.

As a result of this particular bill, the Government of Canada and the Department of Employment and Immigration have said that the province of Newfoundland will lose $21 million. The Canadian Labour Congress, on the other hand, states that it will be much more significant than $21 million. They state that it will be $58 million. In Nova Scotia it will be $29 million. The Canadian Labour Congress states that it will be $52 million. In Prince Edward Island, CLC states that it will be $22 million; New Brunswick, $47 million; Quebec, $256 million; Ontario, $228 million; Manitoba, $42 million; Saskatchewan, $23 million; Alberta, $60 million; British Columbia, $72 million, for a total of some $800 million, which is a very significant amount.

When I think of young people, such as a young gentleman by the name of Christopher Chisholm who is watching tonight, I wonder what his world will be like 15 to 18 to 20 years from now. What the government has done by presenting this bill is change unilaterally the social contract that Canadians, both employers and employees had with the Government of Canada since the inception of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

The changes which were put forward in the bill received vigorous debate in the House of Commons, examination by legislative committee, and were brought back to the House and thereafter debated in detail. The bill passed in the House because the government has the majority. It went on to the Senate, where the Senate did a thorough analysis, and heard from a variety of groups, including provincial governments, interested spokespersons, and organizations from across the country. They submitted what they believed were honest criticisms, and no one has doubted or questioned their sincerity, or that the facts that they did provide were authentic.

The Senate has made recommendations to this House. In part, the government has accepted some and has not accepted others. We find ourselves in a dilemma with the motion that is before us now to send certain information back to the Senate. The Government of Canada believes that somehow the Senate of Canada does not have the right to do what it is doing. That is understandable. Any time that an institution and individuals in that institution impede progress—and there is a funny way to define progress in this particular instance—that governments want to have in order to change massively the social contract that was so much a part of daily Canadian lives, it is understandable that the big corporate interests and the Conservative Party of Canada would not be pleased at all with those particular musings and suggestions coming from the other place.

As I said previously in this Chamber on this particular subject matter, these arguments have been made repeatedly by members in this House, by organizations and, of course, by the other place.

The government has a very easy way out of this particular mess they it has got itself into. Page 241 of Beauchesne's fifth edition states:

> When the House of Commons does not agree to the Senate amendments, it adopts a motion which states reasons for its disagreement.

Well, that has been done.

> This is communicated to the Senate. If the Senators persist in their amendments, they send a message informing the House of this fact. Upon this, the House either accepts the amendments or adopts a motion requesting a conference to which each House appoints Members; and a date is fixed for their meeting.

If members opposite want a way out of this particular impasse of their own making, it is very clear. Either accept the amendments of the Senate or you have a conference. It is a simple as that.

I point out to members opposite and to the public at large that this government does not know how to govern. They do not want to meet. They do not want to discuss. The Senate has every legal and constitutional right to do this, although they can argue the opposite. Quite frankly, we can argue on our side as well, but it is very clear from Beauchesne's fifth edition on page 241 that the appropriate procedure is for a conference to take place and/or for the House of Commons to accept the amendments of the Senate.

Let us not be fooled. We are not just dealing with some sort of procedural wrangling taking place between two separate bodies of one institution, namely the Parliament of Canada. We are dealing with something which is far more important than a procedural wrangling. We are dealing with the lives of Canadians across this country.

I do not say that I and I alone, because I represent a constituency in this country which has excessively high unemployment, know everything about unemployment insurance or that I have the measure of sensitivity and concern of every working man and woman in this country, but I do know that these changes being proposed by the government are unacceptable to those individuals who are presently unemployed, who may have been unemployed, and who are likely to be unemployed, because they know the importance which is associated with removing the Government of Canada from the previous tripartite social contract that we had in this country for many years.

To say to employees who work in a fish plant that they as employees will have to pay for the training for high tech workers in downtown Toronto or in Edmonton or in Montreal or Toronto, for the Government of Canada to exclude itself, as a result of the amendments which the government is seeking through this bill, is unfair. We, on this side of the House, believe that it is poor public policy.

Members can debate whether that is accurate, whether it is true or whether it is untrue, but the fact of the matter is that when you remove a major economic player such as the Government of Canada from a tripartite agreement—I call it the social contract—it is no wonder that we have such consternation, such difficulties here in the House and the upper chamber with regard to these particular amendments before us.

The changes which are being sought, not only by members on this side of the House but indeed by the majority of those in the upper House are reasonable, are desired by those who are unemployed and those who work with the unemployed. These changes are being sought by provincial governments and by individuals of different walks of life who know of the insecurities and concerns that unemployed people have in terms of conducting their daily lives.

I would have hoped that the government opposite would have seen its way, notwithstanding its argument which, in some ways, is valid. The budget was introduced on April 27, 1989. Thereafter a piece of legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act was introduced in the House and then we had the legislative committee, et cetera, and the debate has been taking place. Sadly, I represent a constituency where the real unemployment rate is, in some communities, three, four and five times that of the national average.

Surely to God we as members of Parliament must plug ourselves in and ask whether this is good public policy.

Members opposite, because of their neo-conservative views, may say that it is, but the majority of Canadians say that it is not. Of course, members opposite will ask what our test is for coming to that conclusion. It is very evident. As you travel across the country and meet with the people whom the public policy will eventually affect, they will tell you en masse that the changes sought by the Conservative government of the Prime Minister of the day are not acceptable to them and that the amendments being put forward by the Liberal party here in this Chamber, augmented if you will by those in the other Chamber, are acceptable to the massive number of Canadians.

Provincial governments concur with what we are doing. It is not good public policy. Surely a government, whether it has a majority of five, ten, twenty or thirty individuals, would not want to implement it notwithstanding the devastation that will take place simply because it believes it may have the upper hand in some sort of procedural argument.

In my concluding remarks I might say that I hope the Chamber has gone beyond that. There is no federal election due for two, three years. Surely it is the job of every member of Parliament to express their particular views, right wing, left wing, centre, neo-conservative, what have you. But you have to ask the fundamental question: Is it good public policy? Is it good public policy to have a tripartite social contract, thereafter to change that and to remove the biggest economic player in that tripartite contract? Is that fair to our fishermen on the Atlantic coast?

There is a very subtle view which is expressed, sometimes not in a public way, but in the most sophisticated way that is rather undignified, particularly for those who are unemployed, both men and women. But nowhere is that statement more apropos than in the fishing sector of our Canadian economy.

People in the fishing industry for many, many years have been able to fish on a seasonal basis, particularly in Atlantic Canada. I do not know if they fish in downtown Toronto, I suspect not, but that is due to the geography of the country. On a commercial basis for a livelihood there is not too much fishing on Yonge Street or in Kingston and the Islands, but there is a hell of a lot of fishing on the Atlantic coast. Those fishermen today know what it is like to be out in a small boat without any form of assistance.

What do I mean by that? We have an economic package which the Government of Canada has announced with great fanfare which has been found by most individuals in our region to be totally unacceptable. You make the problem even more difficult for those fishermen by saying: "And by the way, we have now changed the unemployment insurance. We are going to remove the federal government from the tripartite social contract that was there since its inception. We are going to train you in Canso, Nova Scotia, we are going to train you in Trepassey, Newfoundland. We are going to do all wonderful things for you".

They are all going to become barbers. Imagine, barbers. That is what they are going to train them for. Or maybe they are going to train them to become cooks.

It is just not acceptable that a poor fisherman who may work for a short period of time is now going to have to pay money to train, but train for what in these areas? Not only that, the Government of Canada is not even going to be there to assist and to facilitate in the training process. But this is the hook. The government says that it is going to give money for training of individuals all across Canada. It is going to help the people down there. That is how the government phrases it. It is going to help the people down there.

I charge that the public policy of the fisheries package announced by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, aided and abetted by Bill C–21 and members opposite, is nothing more than a smoke and mirrors game for what has become known in this country as and has proven to be the most disruptive public policy one could imagine, namely resettlement: resettlement of people from Atlantic Canada to other parts of Canada, which is totally unacceptable to the Canadian people regardless of where they live. It infringes upon the pith and substance of the constitutional accord of 1981–82. I believe it is a total abrogation of everything the Prime Minister has said as well as members opposite.

I conclude by urging the government to see the error of its ways. It has an opportunity here to resolve a procedural impasse by doing what Beauchesne says in the fifth edition on page 241, that is, either pass the amendments being advocated by the upper chamber and/or sit down and have a conference in order to resolve this particular matter.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise again to speak on this bill. Notwithstanding any comments the minister may have made, I have very carefully reread the motion before the House. It very clearly refers to amendments to Bill C–21, to the principles of the bill and to the objectives of the policy. It goes on to speak at great length about specific sections of the bill. I have absolutely no hesitation in talking about the bill because that is exactly the subject of the motion before us.

I was astonished to hear the minister stand in the House to speak as he did about democracy. I suspect that never in such a short period in Canadian history, since November 1988 when this government took office, has there been such a consistent attack on democracy. It has occurred not in the other place but in this House.

The figures show that at no time since Confederation has closure been used as much as it has since November 1988. I fail to remember one bill coming into this House that the opposition wished to debate on which the government has not introduced closure and stifled debate, thereby stifling accountability of this government to the people of Canada.

I cannot of one major bill that has passed this House on which there has been any input from the public. On many of them the government has chosen to ignore totally the views of Canadians. It has ignored them on VIA Rail. It has ignored them on the clawback of old age pensions and family allowances. It has ignored them on unemployment insurance, and it has ignored them on the goods and services tax. In fact it has ignored virtually every commitment it made to the Canadian people to get itself elected to this House.

It should not be one bit surprising if the House of sober second thought insists on giving sober second thought to the fact that this government is proceeding in ways that are totally contrary to commitments and to the sacred trust it swore to Canadians that it would be defending and not abandoning.

If anybody needs to be concerned about the commitment to democracy, it is not the other House and it is not the opposition. It is the Government of Canada.

I want to talk a little about justice. The government pretends that this is a bill that is going to improve things for Canadians somehow, and especially for those who most need a little help.

I want to talk about a very fundamental democratic principle, and that is a fact that we have a Constitution in this country and that Constitution contains the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That charter of rights says that people are to be treated equitably. Also the charter says—and this has been in the courts and is in this bill—that the rights to parental leave in this bill is not this government's gift to women, although the women and the unemployed of Canada will be paying for it. It is something the charter requires. This government is playing a game with those rights in this bill as it is doing with a number of other policy issues by withholding from women who are pregnant right now the rights that the courts said they are entitled to have.

The government is using those rights as bargaining chips against which it is introducing other unpopular, damaging, hurtful measures. If the government is committed to the Constitution, committed to human rights in this country, and at all observant of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada on those rights, it should be pulling that parental leave requirement out of the bill and introducing it today as a separate bill. We on this side of the House can guarantee that those improved parental rights as ordered by the courts would be through this House in 30 seconds. The government does not want to do that, because then what does it have to put as icing on this very unpleasant piece of mud pie so that the people will think there is something good about it?

The government should also ensure that those parental rights are retroactive. It is going to say that it cannot do that because this bill is being held up. It will say that it cannot give pregnant women who may be on maternity leave the same rights as other women who may go on maternity leave the day after the bill is passed. The government will say it cannot give those two groups of women the same rights because the bill is being held up; it is not passed yet.

That did not stop the government from starting to charge people higher unemployment insurance rates to pay for those parental benefits, to pay for those maternity benefits, and to pay for training that nobody is getting. Those people have been charged that extra money from January 1, even though the programs that money is supposedly going to pay for are not in place. But the government refuses to give rights and benefits to people retroactive to that same January 1.

Similarly the government is using and victimizing the unemployed because it is not getting its way on this bill as fast as it would like. It is requiring that people work longer. It is taking away the variable entrance requirements that make it easier for people in high unemployment regions to qualify for unemployment insurance. It has refused to do what is fair and just to those persons by simply extending the existing variable entrance requirements. Instead, like a little child it is having a temper tantrum and saying: "if we cannot have our way, everybody else is going to suffer too. The unemployed are going to suffer, pregnant women are going to suffer, and we don't care because we don't care about justice".

As has been said over and over again, this bill hurts those who are poorest, hurts those who are least educated and hurts those who have the hardest time in the labour market. It hurts the poorest regions of this country to the point where whole communities will be dying out because of the provisions of this bill.

I live in a region of relative prosperity with a relatively low unemployment rate. That is why it was a privilege for me to travel across this country and to listen and try to respond with sensitivity to the concerns I heard from people who live in fishing communities, from migrant farmers, from the disabled trying to compete in the labour force, and from women trying to get back into the labour force after being out of it for many years and trying to juggle child care responsibilities. We listened, and some of us heard and some of us did not, to the fact that those who can least afford to be hurt any more are going to be hurt by this bill. That is unjust.

Even members on the other side of the House have to admit that a legitimate role of the Senate, one which it is seeking to strengthen, is to represent the views, opinions and interests of the various regions in this country in a more equitable way, perhaps, than they are represented in this House. The Senate is doing that.

It is listening to people from those various regions on how their section of Canada is going to be hurt, and how this bill will harm our concept of a just and compassionate society that provides equal opportunities from coast to coast, no matter how small or large one's community, or how poor or rich one's household.

This bill hurts those who can least afford to be hurt further. Yet, the government refused to include in this bill any provisions that would ensure that those at the lowest end of the pay scale, with the least resources to compete in a changing labour force, would benefit from the training programs which their meagre incomes are going to be drained further to pay for. This government refused to include what it imposes on every federally regulated industry, which is equitable access for women, disabled persons, visible minorities and native Canadians to these training programs.

After refusing that kind of change to the bill, any government that pretends that it is interested in equity or justice or fairness has very few listeners left. This bill that is floating back and forth between the House and the other place makes no requirement whatsoever for any equity in the delivery of those programs, or assurance that they go to those who need them most. Yet it is those people who are paying the cost.

I said that this is a relatively prosperous region with a relatively low unemployment rate. Yet that very prosperity often hides the plight of the poor in prosperous urban centres. I can tell members of the government that being unemployed in an area like the National Capital Region or in a city like Toronto or in any of the better-off communities of our country is no less painful than it is in Canso, or any of the small communities of our country where people are being hurt badly by the government's economic policies. The changes to the unemployment insurance program will make it worse.

In fact, it is often more difficult to be unemployed in a prosperous area because of the higher prices for food, housing and clothing. They do not have the community support structures which we saw across this country to support and help one's neighbours in times of unemployment and hardship in communities where that is a more common problem.

I want to close with just a few comments about the government's lack of frankness with Canadians about this bill. I do not think the government understands training programs. If it did it would not have stripped money out of the Challenge 90 program and diverted it into a program to try to keep kids in high school. Surely the government must understand that for many families and for many children, the difference between whether or not they go back to high school in September is whether they have a summer job.

I know many families where the pressures of family poverty drive young people out into the workforce before they are ready. The summer job that thousands of young people across our country are being denied is often what gives them a stake in their community, a feeling of having a better future, and what sends them back to school in September. Thousands of young people will no longer have that opportunity.

The bill we are debating today, which is the subject of the motion before us, has one purpose, like so many of the actions of this government. It is not to improve training, it is not to improve employment opportunities, it is not to improve parental benefits, it is to grab more money wherever it can and particularly from victims who are vulnerable and least able to resist.

We need only look at the last few months in this House. Where is the money coming from? It is coming from women; women's programs, women's centres. It is coming from people of a different cultural background. Look at the stripping of the heritage language programs, the stripping of the communications mechanisms of native Canadians. It is coming from seniors through the clawback and changes to RRSPs. It is coming from students in a new fee charged on their student loans, loans for which they only qualify because they are too poor to pay their own way through university. It is coming from children through the clawback of the family allowance, and now it is coming from the unemployed.

If I sound indignant, Madam Speaker, it is because I am, on behalf of all those people from whom we heard right across the country. Two members of the government who were with me at those hearings are in the House today. On behalf of all those people from whom we heard, or at least from whom I heard but from whom apparently the government did not hear, I am indignant and I am angry because I think something fundamental about our sense of sharing and caring for each other in this country, not only from rich to poor but from one region to another, is being abandoned. The government is abandoning its responsibility to contribute on behalf of all Canadians and compensate for the negative effects on some people in some parts of the country for its economic policies. I think that is a shame, and I am ashamed that this is happening in this country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I was not going to participate in this debate but after sitting here yesterday listening to the hon. member for Kamloops I put a question to him. In answer to the question he challenged me to stand up and give a speech to explain to him and to the members of his party the duties and obligations of senators and the privileges of the Senate in relation to Commons bills. I said that of course if the hon. member for Kamloops wanted some advice in that regard I would be happy to provide it to him. So I am taking advantage of this opportunity today to do that.

I also wanted to correct a few misapprehensions that appear to have arisen in respect of this bill among the members of the government who have made some pretty wild-eyed observations in the course of their remarks. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West who just spoke expressed the indignation of many members on this side of the House at the government's actions in introducing this bill and in dealing with it in the way that it has. She probably also expressed the view of many of the members of the government side who are reluctant to get on their feet and say what they really think about this bill. I will proceed as best I can to point out to the government Whip and others who are here at this late hour some of the problems the Minister of Employment and Immigration brought out in the course of her introductory remarks on the motion yesterday.

The minister made a great to-do. In fact it was one of the longest speeches by a minister in this House that I have had the pleasure to witness. She seemed to have a lot of information about the historic rights of Parliament. I was delighted to hear the minister defend staunchly the rights of Parliament. I have had to play that role in the House. Indeed the opposition has had to play that role now for some time against a government which seems bent on destroying the rights of Parliament.

The minister took a new tack yesterday and put herself forward as a sort of champion of parliamentary government. As reported at page 11055 of Hansard the minister said:

> This House must defend its historic right to initiate and direct the financial policy of the elected government. This is not simply a theoretical exercise, but a defence of one of the key principles of responsible government. The battle for this right was won generations ago and we must protect its integrity.

That is wonderful to hear; I do not disagree with those words. The trouble is that the minister and I seem to have a profound disagreement on what it is we have to do to protect those rights.

As reported on the next page of Hansard, the minister went on to discuss British practice and spoke with longing for some kind of change in the powers of the Senate such as was introduced in 1911 in the United Kingdom to alter the powers of the House of Lords.

The minister has been a member of a government that for five years has not lifted a finger to do anything about Senate reform. The Prime Minister keeps saying that he will call a conference on Senate reform this autumn if Meech Lake passes the provinces by June. If it doesn't then he won't. I presume he is holding this out as a bit of a threat. I think most Canadians would regard that as something quite beneficial, because they realize the Senate as it currently exists provides some considerable defence for them against actions by this government which have been dictatorial in the extreme.

The minister spoke about the British practice and said how in 1911 the wings of the House of Lords were clipped. That of course has not happened in Canada.

The Prime Minister had an opportunity to make changes to the powers of the Senate as he negotiated the Meech Lake constitutional accord. I know he did not. Clearly it was not a priority. He knew, even though there was a Liberal majority in that body, the reasonableness of those senators was such that on any important issue he would be able to convince them to go along with the government initiative in whole or at least in part.

I suggest the fact that the government is being very irrational in dealing with Bill C-21 is an indication of the difficulty it is having in getting that statute through the other place.

I could quote extensively from the minister's speech, but a lot of it dealt with the ins and outs of the bill. I did not want to get into that too deeply. The minister made an incredible statement on page 11062 as follows:

> This government was elected in 1984 and again in 1988 largely because Canadians understood which party could be counted on to manage effectively.

What nonsense. That is not the reason. Hon. members opposite know perfectly well that the issue in the last campaign was free trade. It was not effective management. No Canadian in his or her right sense would have voted for a government that has managed as incompetently as this government has. It said it would cut the deficit. It has not. The deficit is still $30 billion. It said it would save Canada from financial ruin. All it has done is increased taxes, increased the amount of money the government brings in, and increased government spending at an alarming rate. That is its idea of sound financial management. I have spoken on that before and do not propose to go through it all again.

We come now to the real crux of the matter. Here we have the resolution proposed by the government. I put a question earlier to the government House leader who on April 3 in the House had the gall to stand up to argue that the amendments proposed to this bill by the other place were somehow improper.

The Speaker gave a speech on this subject on April 26. It is not quite clear to me what was the effect of the decision. It is certainly clear that the government House leader did not have the Speaker rule any of the Senate amendments out of order. The Speaker declined to make a ruling on whether or not the Senate amendments were out of order and in fact faced the government House leader who asserted they were and who now in this resolution says in fact that at least one of them is not because he approves of it. He does not have a royal recommendation to support it. If it was out of order on April 3 when he made his point, and he now says it is in order, obviously he has conceded the point. I suggest he went through a lot of bafflegab in answer to my question earlier because he really did not know what to say. He got himself into a corner and ended up in great difficulty because he really did not understand the constitutional position in which he had placed himself in saying that the amendment is out of order. Now he is saying it is in order. He is going along with it. I congratulate him on that. I just wish he would go along with a lot more of them and, if he did, he would probably find he would have much less difficulty in getting the bill through.

That deals with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but let us look at the government House leader because he has made some other unbelievable statements about the Constitution.

I have here a transcript of an interview he gave. He repeated some of these statements today in the House. I do not want to quote what he said because I did not write it down. I do have what he said in an interview on May 6, taped on May 4 with Pamela Wallin on the CTC news report. The minister was asked questions about his view of the role of the Senate. He made these statements which portray in my submission a profound ignorance of the Constitution of Canada.

I have urged him to spend some time in his new role reading up on this subject so he would know something more about the Constitution when he discusses it, because after all he is called upon to make comments on the role of the other place. Yet, obviously not having paid a lot of attention to this, he said:

> You see, the Senate's authority comes from a clause in the Canadian Constitution that says there will be a Parliament consisting of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. Now the Governor General has the same powers the Senate is claiming but everybody would be quite surprised, to say the least, if the Governor General said well I'm going to amend this legislation before passing it.

That is true, but had he read the Constitution Act instead of just the one clause, he would see that Section 13—and I urged him earlier today to read it—states:

> The provisions of this act referring to the Governor General in Council shall be construed as referring to the Governor General acting by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

The Governor General does not go off on his or her own. The Queen or the King does not go off on his or her own, if it were a king in this particular case. The decision is made after taking advice. Everybody in Canada knows that. The Governor General cannot do anything without receiving advice on the subject except on thing, and that is refuse or accept advice concerning the dissolution of the Parliament of Canada.

If the advice is refused, the Prime Minister must resign. That is just the way it is. Refusal of advice on any point results in dismissal of the cabinet.

We have had the spectacle of that happening once in 1926. But, other than that, it is just unheard of. The Governor General accepts advice from the government of the day, from the privy councillors who form the cabinet. That is the way it is. That is the way it has been in Canada for years, at least since the British North America Act was passed in 1867. So, for him to suggest that the Governor General and the Senate are similar in any way is simply beyond belief.

The minister went on. The interviewer, of course, was shocked. She said:

> But that is a little bit different than a body that is—

He interrupted and said "they are both appointed", which apparently makes them the same in the view of the government House leader. He went on:

> They are both appointed. In fact, Governors General are only there for five years; Senators are there for life, for heaven's sake.

If he knew anything about the Canadian Constitution he would know that in 1965 an amendment was passed which limited senators sitting until age 75, except those appointed prior to the passage of the amendment in 1965.

Senators are not there for life unless the government House leader considers that life ends at 75. I hope, for his sake, he does not. I was hoping he would live to a ripe old age and with any luck continue to sit in this Chamber because certainly his constitutional blunders cause no end of merriment to those of us who sit on this side of the House.

I suggest that he has again blundered on with his statements as to the powers and abilities, if you like, of the Senate of Canada.

I could go on and argue that his views need some correction. The British North America Act, which he quoted from, has lots of sections I could read that do not reflect constitutional reality. I could turn, for example, to Section 55. Perhaps the hon. member would enjoy this:

> 55. Where a Bill passed by the Houses of Parliament is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's Assent, he shall declare, according to his Discretion, but subject to the Provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's Instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's Name, or that he withholds the Queen's Assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the Signification of the Queen's Pleasure.

We all know that section is no longer followed, that the Governor General invariably gives his assent to bills that are passed by this House and the other place. For the government House leader to suggest that the Senate's powers are somehow similar to those of the Governor General is simply ridiculous.

I want to turn to the questions raised by the hon. member for Kamloops who has suffered—if you want to call it that—an about face. As I said yesterday, like St. Paul on the road to Damascus at least in part, he and his party have seen the light with respect to the Senate. The NDP has recognized the true contribution that the Senate makes, and I am sorry that they are not here. I am sure they would enjoy hearing some of these things and perhaps learn some things about the Senate.

The hon. member for Kamloops explained the NDP's new position this way. It had to be one of the vaguest explanations I have ever seen. He said at page 11075 of Hansard for yesterday:

> New Democrats watched intently the assault on democracy which took place last year.

Of course, so did we:

> We exercised our democratic rights within our own party and voted at our December convention to change our party policy on the Senate. Whereas once we were satisfied that the Senate had to be abolished, and that was it, we are now in the process of looking at a variety of options to provide and promote better regional representation in the Parliament of Canada, including but not limited to, proportional representation, an elected Senate, and other options.

In other words, the New Democratic Party now has no policy on the Senate. It scrapped its abolition policy, but it does not now know what it should do. That is not surprising. New Democratic Party policies change with the circumstances, just like the skin of a chameleon. In this case, we had the principle of democracy as exemplified by NDP policy, being that the Senate should be abolished.

Yesterday, we had the spectacle of the hon. member for Kamloops demanding that the Senate block this bill. In fact, he went on to say, at the same page in Hansard:

> New Democrats were among those who went to the Senate and requested that it block the imposition of Bill C-21.

He was referring to New Democrats outside the House of Commons, and he made that clear. He said:

> Through their labour councils, social councils, churches and women's groups, they asked the Senate to protect the unemployment insurance program that their fathers and mothers and fellow social democrats had fought so hard to establish. These ordinary New Democrats—

I presume the ones here are not ordinary:

> —and ordinary Canadians generally, told the Senate of the importance of maintaining a healthy unemployment insurance program, of the need for government to play a role in training programs, of the responsibility of government toward unemployed workers.

We in this party, have said the same thing, but there is an important difference between the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party when it comes to dealing with the Senate.

The New Democratic Party said: "Use your powers as an unelected body, but use the constitutional power granted to you by the British North America Act of 1867 to block this bill." As the hon. member for Kamloops well knows, there has been no amendment made in this House similar to the British amendment of 1911 which curtailed the powers of the upper chamber. We have not done that.

The Senate has full power to change any bill that comes before it, and indeed could block this bill. The Senate has chosen not to do that, and it is not by accident that it is dominated by members of this party. We in the Liberal party do not believe that the unelected body should have the power to block the will of the democratically elected House of Commons. We have always said that. It has been our position consistently, and the position is exemplified by the actions of the Senators in the other place.

Mr. Waddell: What about the trade deal?

Mr. Milliken: They did not reject the trade deal. What it did was say: "We will hold up, block and seek to correct the Commons in its errors. We will send the bill back with amendments." The hon. member knows that is what has happened in this case. I can see why he would flee, he does not want to face the music. Instead, the New Democratic Party has abandoned its democratic principle because it is inconvenient today. It says to the Senate: "Block this bill".

• (1845)

I will let you in on a secret. I know why they have said that they do not really want the Senate to block this. They say on the one hand block it, but they do not want it to happen because what they want the Senate to do is let the bill through eventually with some amendments. We are getting some more today. I see the government has softened up a bit more this time and has agreed to some of the very reasonable amendments that the Senate has proposed. Maybe if it comes back again, it will agree to more. Who knows?

What has happened is that the New Democratic Party want to be in the position where they can go to the people and say: "We urged the Senate to block this bill. We abandoned our democratic principles and we asked an unelected body to block this bill, but they did not do it".

Then they will say to the Canadian people: "Do you know why they did not do it?. Because they were Liberals and Liberals are not really in favour of protecting you by blocking this bill". That is what they will say.

They will suggest that somehow we, the opposition in this House, are somehow insincere because our colleagues in the Senate who recognize the limitations they have on their powers under the constitutional practice in Canada will not block this bill. That is what the New Democratic Party is trying to do. They are trying to have it both ways.

The trouble is in trying to get it that way they have had to abandon their democratic principles and scrap their policy of abolition of the Senate in favour of a no policy because they really have not the faintest idea of what they are going to do now.

The hon. member for Kamloops got himself into difficulty yesterday when I put these questions to him. Instead of responding in a reasonable way and admitting that their policy is folly and that they do not know what they are doing, he tried to pretend that in fact there was a sound policy base for the actions that their party has taken. He knows as well as I do that there is no basis.

This is a chameleon-like move in an effort to fill in a vacuum that has been created because we have been defeated in this House on this matter. We have lost the vote on second and third reading after closure. The government has steamrolled the rights of parliamentarians in the course of its dealings on this bill.

What we have, I submit, is a situation where the New Democratic Party ought to be delighted that the Senate has taken the steps it has and has brought forward reasonable amendments, some of which the government has had the wisdom to accept, most of which it has not had the wisdom to accept. It should be delighted that the Senate—although they are limited amendments—have at least tried to correct the folly of the government in bringing forward this bill which is so unfair to the unemployed people of Canada.

Of course, the persons who are now employed who may subsequently become unemployed and may not know it are also going to be victims under this particular piece of legislation.

I welcome the opportunity to debate these issues. I am sorry that time does not permit me to explain further the weaknesses of the New Democratic Party's position on this matter. I wish they would stay and support us in our opposition to this bill because we have indicated our anxiety to see that this bill be defeated and will continue to do so.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the staff, the interpreters, and everyone who stayed around for this debate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to the order made earlier today, the division on the amendment and the main motion is deemed to have been deferred until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 9, 1990, at 3 p.m.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.49 p.m.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this week is marked as National Forest Week and the opportunity is provided to us to consider how our lives are affected by Canada's forest resource.

More than 800,000 Canadians work directly and indirectly in the forest sector. I would like to pay tribute to those people who are the driving force behind Canada's forest industry, for it is their skill, dedication and professionalism that keeps forestry on the top of Canada's economy. National Forest Week should be a celebration of their commitment.

In particular, I would like to draw attention to the forest industry on the South Shore of Nova Scotia, to the Christmas tree growers, the woodlot owners, the sawmill operators and workers, the people of the Canexl plant in East River, of the Bowater Mersey plant in Brooklyn, Queens County, the forestry capital of Canada.

I congratulate all and thank them for their contribution to our life, our economy and our country. National Forest Week is for them.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, when it is lost, say goodbye.

Ironically, Canada Post's annual report boasted that the corporation focused on reliability, accessibility and affordability.

On November 1, 1989, a registered letter containing a $250,000 trust company draft was received in Ottawa by Canada Post. By November 3, Canada Post had lost the draft. Repeated questions by the sender, addressee and lawyers have gone unanswered.

Where is Canada Post's pride and joy in operational performance? Where is the highly touted "Track and Trace System" when you need it?

When Canadians use registered mail, do they realize there is no delivery guarantee and that Canada Post assumes no liability for loss?

Canada Post admitted receiving the letter, admitted losing it, but claims no responsibility. It cost these individuals $250,000 and, apart from an initial apology, the corporation did nothing to help these people. Its mismanagement and ambiguous regulations covered the system.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Yukon government is leading the way once again. It has become the first government in the country to adopt the major recommendations of the 1987 Round Table on the Environment and the Economy which called for the creation of government action plans for each province and territory.

On May 7, the Yukon government released the Yukon Conservation Strategy, a comprehensive management plan to guide the use of the territories environment into the 21st century. This plan is the result of extensive public consultation with industry, environmental groups, native organizations and the public in workshops and public meetings over a period of 18 months.

The Yukon government, a New Democrat government, is to be congratulated on this progressive step. It gives us hope for the next century to see a government taking this responsibility. Let us hope that all governments, including Ottawa, follow their example.

BILL C-21

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the Bill C-21 changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act have been well debated in this House. The elected representatives have made a decision, a decision that recognizes that we have a dual responsibility to the people of Canada, first to assist the unemployed and, second, to make effective use of our financial resources.

If we are to be able to continue to help those with a legitimate need in this country, we must first get our fiscal house in order. We need to examine every government program with a fine-tooth comb. The financing changes under Bill C-21 will contribute $1.9 billion to deficit reduction in 1990-91.

We cannot accept demands from the other place that will add to the burden on the Canadian taxpayer. The Canadian people will not accept it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate Mary Ritchie of Porters Lake, Nova Scotia, who yesterday succeeded in desegregating the assembly line of Volvo Canada in Halifax.

After 16 years of Volvo's refusal to hire her, Mrs. Ritchie took her complaint to Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission. Yesterday, the commission awarded her $43,000, the largest award in the commission's history. They also ordered Volvo to hire her as soon as she completes her training course, and further ordered Volvo Canada to instigate an affirmative action program for women immediately.

Mary Ritchie has won a great victory for women. The Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission has shown its mettle in the ongoing battle against discrimination.

DEMOCRACY

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in Canada we are proud of our political institutions which reflect a long and rich tradition of democracy. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there has now been a shameful departure from this tradition. Liberal senators, who are not elected and did not receive a mandate from the people, are holding up the democratic process, for strictly partisan purposes.

Mr. Speaker, when democracy no longer works in Canada, this strikes at the core of one of our most sacred values. I am concerned, and with me my colleagues and my constituents.

I therefore invite this hon. House to express, loud and clear, its faith in the democratic system and publicly condemn those who so blatantly ignore the tenents of democracy.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, Section 95 of the British North America Act of 1867, simply states: "In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to agriculture in the province", and, further "That the Parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to agriculture in all or any provinces".

You do not have to be a Bay Street lawyer to deduce that both federal and provincial governments are responsible for farmers.

Wake up western farmers!

In the past four years, the federal government has provided 80.4 cents of every dollar spent by governments on agriculture. In Manitoba, it has provided 88.78 cents of every dollar spent.

What a shameful bunch of provincial pikers who claim to support agriculture in the provinces.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of State responsible for Seniors, are playing games with the senior citizens of this country by failing to tell them what is going on with the New Horizons program. Calls to both ministers' offices yesterday, trying to confirm the rumours that the New Horizons program has been eliminated or is facing substantial budget cuts, did not produce any information which would alleviate some of the concerns.

The New Horizons program has been around since 1972. The program has served to make the lives of our seniors more enjoyable and, more importantly, they have been allowed to continue their contribution to society.

Why has the government not been up front with the senior citizens of this country? Why is it continuing to attack the seniors? First, the threat to de-index Old Age Security, then the clawback of pensions, and now the cuts or elimination of the New Horizons program. Where is the fairness and the compassion this government claims to have?

I call upon the government to lay its cards on the table now and tell the seniors the truth. Will the New Horizons program be cut substantially, or is it being eliminated completely?

ABOLITION OF TOLL ON CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, people say politicians don't keep their promises, but this certainly does not apply to the riding of La Prairie. After waiting for nearly six years, residents of Brossard, Candiac, La Prairie and Saint-Lambert finally breathed a sigh of relief when my campaign promise to get rid of the toll on the Champlain Bridge was fulfilled last Friday.

Without my perseverance, Mr. Speaker, day after day since 1984, we would still be throwing tokens or quarters in the toll boxes on the bridge.

I want to thank my regional minister, the Right Hon. Prime Minister, the Hon. Benoît Bouchard and the other ministers with whom I discussed this matter. Many thanks on behalf of my 91,198 constituents.

At last, Mr. Speaker, my fellow citizens have stopped paying toll, and I must say the removal of this obligation is a major victory for equal access for all residents in my riding, whom I thank for their trust and support.

Mr. Speaker: And we thank you, sir.

STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian steel industry is suffering. Everyone appreciates this except for the Canadian government and one of its appointed bodies, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal.

This Canadian body ruled against protecting major Canadian steel producers, Algoma, Defasco, Stelco and Ipsco and removed anti-dumping tariffs against 11 countries.

Market conditions have worsened. These countries have excess capacity and will be looking for markets for their steel plate. Domestic demand and prices are down and Canadian steel remains ever more vulnerable.

I quote directly from the CITT ruling of May 1, 1990:

> —more attractive prices in the exporting countries made renewed dumping unlikely—
> In contrast, imports from the United States had significantly increased their share.

This ruling, along with the consequences of the free trade agreement, government policy on high interest rates, and the resultant high dollar are decimating the Canadian steel industry. I ask the Ministers for International Trade and Finance to finally assume their responsibilities to Canadian steel producers and intervene in this decision and a pending ruling by the CITT.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the deadline for the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord, we must remember that we are all in this together and a solution to this impasse will benefit all of us as Canadians.

I would like to read a short passage from a letter that I received this week from Fred Antrobus, an 88-year old pioneer in Regina. He stated: "I am sure the Meech Lake program will survive. We need unity in spite of diversity—we need cooperation. Premiers are part of a team, not individualists, so there should be flexibility".

I hope the critics will heed the wisdom that only avails itself to those having lived sufficient years to become truly wise. On his behalf, and on behalf of all those in Regina—Wascana, I sincerely hope that we can find a way to be part of the solution to the present impasse and to ensure that this country remains united from sea to sea to sea.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this morning the National Research Council announced the development, by one of its leading research scientists, Dr. Patrick Wong, of a technique that augurs well for the early detection of cancer. I stand today to congratulate him and his staff. The newly developed technique will allow the detection of cancer with greater speed, simplicity, objectivity, non-invasiveness, and accessibility.

This scientific breakthrough has been made possible by the creativity of a Canadian scientist and his staff and through the resources made available to them. A scientific breakthrough of this magnitude is only possible after painstaking laboratory work under the umbrella of a secure and adequately-funded research environment.

It is fitting this afternoon to be continually aware of this and for Canada to continue to contribute to the advancement of medical science that will help ensure the well-being, not only of Canadians, but of all citizens of the world.

Therefore, I urge the government to increase its support for funding of basic research and to assure our scientists and science teachers that their endeavours are valued as being truly noble. Our excitement today about a Canadian scientific breakthrough assumes greater meaning and value when we as parliamentarians commit ourselves to increasing our budgetary support for science and technology.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. At a time when western farmers are facing a serious drop in their incomes, when American farmers who compete in the same markets are expecting increases, and when the American and European farmers are receiving massive subsidies from their governments, the western premiers, in a joint communiqué earlier this week, called on the federal government to "send a clear message that Canadian producers will not be bullied by unfair subsidies—either now, or in the future".

When will the Deputy Prime Minister respond to the western Premiers and bring forward a comprehensive and complete program to help western farmers survive and to defend themselves against these unfair subsidies? When is this government going to act?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in that same press communiqué, the western Premiers said that the federal government was spending too much money and that was the cause of high interest rates, the escalating dollar, and the loss of the competitiveness in the Canadian economy. I am not sure which one of those passages from the press release the hon. Leader of the Opposition would want us to adhere to.

We have said before, and I will say it again, that the federal government has $500 million on the table to help overcome the income deficiency in agriculture. That is not as much as we have provided in the past. The hon. member knows that we have provided support to the agricultural industry in an unprecedented fashion over the past number of years. However, given the fiscal restraints that we are under, we have provided $500 million plus $180 million for arrangements through the Farm Credit Corporation that could be provided, and an additional enhancement to the soil and water conservation program. The total package is more like $700 million. That is all we can afford at this particular time.

We have asked the provinces to sit down with us and design the kind of programs that would meet the multi-faceted problem that we are facing. It is a problem of drought, it is a problem of flood, it is a problem of high input costs, and it is a problem of low depressed prices.

I ask the Leader of the Opposition and I ask the Premiers of the provinces to stop copping-out, to come forward and to help us put together an attractive agricultural income deficiency plan which will meet all agriculture needs from coast to coast.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Deputy Prime Minister what his government was going to do to defend western farmers against the unfair subsidies of foreign governments. All we got was a meaningless tirade from him. He should know that only the federal government can act in international markets. Why is he calling on the premiers to do something they have no jurisdiction to do?

Furthermore, the Deputy Prime Minister certainly does not show much respect for the unanimous views of the western premiers, three of whom are still supporters of his own party.

• (1420)

The western premiers were also unanimous on the GST, about which they said:

> "The economic environment will be further worsened by the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax—Ottawa can still avoid the harmful effects of this intrusive tax".

Why is the government blindly persisting with this intrusive tax? Why does the Deputy Prime Minister not realize that the GST is the last thing that the western economy needs? It does not need it any more than it needs another year of drought.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the comment that the hon. Leader of the Opposition made with respect to the provinces' position on the GST as it affects agriculture again demonstrates the insensitivity of the premiers toward the agricultural industry.

He knows, and the premiers should know, that the GST will result in a saving in input costs of $250 million to the agriculture industry. Why would I want to be against that? Why would the premiers of the provinces want to be against that, if they had agriculture as a major priority in their governments?

With respect to the GST in a general sense, I ask the the hon. Leader of the Opposition, why would he be against a tax proposal that is going to generate an additional $9 billion worth of economic activity in this country—$2 billion worth of economic activity in the province of Alberta alone—which will create jobs and new opportunities for all Canadians from coast to coast?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I can see that the Deputy Prime Minister is not listening to the western premiers any more than he is listening to me. The western premiers talked about the total economic environment of western Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my third question is directed to the same minister and concerns another aspect of this government's economic policies. Yesterday, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said that with the exception of funding for measures that had already been announced, all funding for the fisheries program announced this week was "new money". Last week, however, his government was about to sign an economic diversification plan with the government of New Brunswick that would grant $38 million to this province.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he could explain why, at the last minute, the government decided to withdraw from this agreement. Is it because the government preferred to spend the money on the fisheries program instead of helping the province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition had bothered to call me before asking a question I would not want qualify as unparliamentary, I would have told him. The federal government never said to the Province of New Brunswick it was going to withdraw from negotiations on an economic diversification agreement for the province. Once again, I think you should talk to your research assistants and pay less attention to your Liberal friends in Fredericton.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, amid the disaster in the fishing industry, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans now says that he is considering charging a royalty fee on all fish that are caught in the Atlantic Ocean. The minister referred to it as "a stumpage fee". "—I go back to my trees back home," said the minister. "When I cut a tree, I have to pay a stumpage fee. So how come we have all this fish and no one pays?"

Why is the minister further distressing our fishermen by announcing this new fee on fish? Does the minister not realize that fish are not like trees? We do not chase a tree around the forest before we chop it down and Canadian fishermen are not scuba divers with chain-saws.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I prefer trees to fences.

It is true that in our consultations on this adjustment package for plant workers, the federal government will be suggesting, as part of our consultation with the unions, the companies, and the provinces, the setting up of a self-sustaining fund to which all parties would contribute. Financial security can be provided to our plant workers as a caution against the reality of a cyclical fishery in Atlantic Canada.

Everyone talks about a common property resource. It is on the basis of a common property resource that the federal government and provincial governments are asked to participate. I see nothing wrong with having those big companies, which make a large profit from the fishery, providing for the financial security of their workers.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the minister says he prefers trees to fences. Well, with the damage that he did with a motorcycle, I would hate to see him with a chain-saw.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, does the minister not realize that there is not a person in Atlantic Canada who can afford to pay a royalty fee on fish? The whole idea of paying a fee for every pound of fish that comes over the wharf is unthinkable, it is unworkable, and it is unbearable. Will he cancel this outrageous proposal?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. member says that not one person in the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada could pay a fee on either the output of a processing plant or the fish being caught. I do not think he knows the reality of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada.

Larry Wark, who happens to be the Halifax Director of the Canadian Auto Workers, stated, and I am quote from an article in this morning's newspaper: "Mr. Valcourt has come up with a great idea." Do you know what, Mr. Speaker? I think he is right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last night in his appearance before the finance committee, the Governor of the Bank of Canada said that he had made a mistake in mid-January by cutting interest rates. But he also said that his zero inflation policy will take quite a long time to produce results. He seems to be asking us to trust his judgment in this area, but we know that the zero inflation policy pursued by the Governor of the Bank of Canada means sustained high interest rates. Those are the same high interest rates are killing small business, killing farmers, and that the premiers are asking the government to lower.

Does this government support the Governor of the Bank of Canada's policy of zero inflation? Yes or no?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Hon. Leader of the NDP that inflation is a threat to the Canadian economy and a threat to lower-income people. Monetary policy and the interest rate policy which is being followed is a solution. Interest rates are not the disease but a manifestation of a problem which exists.

What the Governor said yesterday, if I understand him well, is that he will maintain this policy. That does not mean that interest rates will not come down, but we must not expect them to come down artificially until such time as inflation comes down.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, inflation in the country has clearly resulted from the government's own policies, the policy of high interest rates, the policy of higher sales taxes, and the policy of tax cuts for the wealthy.

• (1430)

If this government is seriously concerned about inflation, why does it persist with fiscal and monetary policies which include trying to implement a goods and services tax which, by its own admission, will increase inflation? Why does the government persist with these kinds of policies?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have to react to the fact that there are inflationary pressures in the system which are influencing matters not only in southern Ontario but in many other provinces.

As the Governor indicated, when interest rates were lowered in mid–January, because of inflationary pressures the dollar went down sharply and the market was very volatile. So we need to work not only on the monetary side but the fiscal side.

The leader of the NDP referred to our fiscal and tax policies.

The government has been trying to restore the finances of the country to good health, and it has been taking strong, difficult measures to do this. It needs to continue to work on both the monetary and fiscal sides.

Also, we need to work together on the fiscal and monetary policies to make sure that there is capital available to industries, and that the government does not use it all. These two policies are far from being contradictory.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I say to the minister that capital available at interest rates that nobody can afford is hardly capital available.

[Translation]

Here is my supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Last night, the Governor of the Bank of Canada repeated many number of times that we had to maintain price stability and bring inflation down to zero. However, he did not make a commitment to full employment or to acceptable unemployment levels.

Mr. Speaker, where is the limit to what is acceptable for this government?

How high is this government prepared to let unemployment rates go before it decides to reverse its policy?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the greatest threat to jobs in this country is letting inflation get out of control. Our policies and the policies followed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, which we support, are specifically aimed at controlling this threat, especially for the benefit of those on low incomes. It is imperative that we continue our methodical and systematic approach—and I am referring to the government with respect to our tax policy and the management of our finances, as well as to the Bank of Canada—to ensure that inflation is kept under control.

This is now being done. Yesterday, the governor indicated that according to certain indications the pressure was starting to drop. We cannot afford to ease up on these policies and we must continue to make sure that they are being carried out as effectively as possible and result in the kind of progress we all want.

FISHERIES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is well aware of the disastrous conditions facing the lobster fishermen on the east coast.

The processors are in the same boat. They are having a very difficult year due to the very low prices and inventories that exist. I know there are marketing plans being developed, but that is a future solution. The fishermen need to pay their present expenses.

Has the minister considered using the Fisheries Price Support Board to help the fishermen and the processors in order to break the depressing psychology that now exists, and if not, why not?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Fisheries Price Support Board was seized with an application in January, which was turned down.

There are no new applications before the board right now.

A week ago last Sunday, I met with lobster fishermen from the maritimes and will be meeting with my provincial counterparts this Friday in Ottawa. I intend to discuss a proposal that was submitted to me by the lobster fishermen.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the same minister.

Yesterday, representatives of the Maritime Fishermen's Union indicated to us that there was nearly a $7 million inventory existing on the east coast at the beginning of the May season. That is an inventory of $7 million out of $260 million or is less than 3 per cent.

Will the minister admit that it appears the fishermen are being used as pawns in this very difficult situation and that high inventories are nothing but a hoax? What will the minister do to ensure fair prices to fishermen?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, lobster prices are market led. I do not think that anyone can relate the problem of market prices with a policy of that government. If one policy could be faulted it would be the conservation and management one which over the past ten years has led to the doubling of the landings of lobster in the maritimes and an increase in its value of 260 per cent. Our lobster fishermen have not done bad at all in the past.

This year the price is governed by the market and inventory. To put the whole thing in perspective, the inventory was $20 million when I entered this portfolio. Two weeks ago the inventory was at $8.5 million, now it is down to $4.5 million. This tells me that the marketing campaign which my colleague at International Trade has instigated in some 36 countries across the world is working. We will consider what kind of measures we can take to help the lobster fishermen in the processing industry this week.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

When the minister first announced his farm aid program, he said that only new money from the provinces would be recognized for the program. On Monday in this House he said he was now crediting the provinces for some of their existing programs. Today in The Globe and Mail,—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Where? In the Winnipeg Globe and Mail?

Mr. Harvard: We read from the minister that if the provinces do not match his $500 million program, he will find another way to use federal funds to help farmers.

Why does the minister not stop his doublespeak? Why does he not stop his politicking and simply release the money to the farmers now? They need it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely nothing inconsistent in what I said. I was merely responding to the suggestion of his colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. He suggested that we use this money to set up a contingency fund to fight international trade wars.

Because of the experience and the background of the hon. member I would have no other course but to take that suggestion seriously.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has a responsibility to make sure that confusion does not exist, and that is exactly what we have.

In the April 4 edition of The Financial Post the Minister of State for Agriculture is quoted as saying this about prairie governments: "If agriculture is so important to them, they must put their money where their mouth is".

Agriculture Canada says that the free fall in farm incomes is due to a 57 per cent cut in federal support programs. I ask the Minister of Agriculture, why don't you heed the advice of your colleague? Why don't you put your money where your mouth is and deliver that money to the farmers now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that the government has stood behind the farmers in an unprecedented fashion, and still continues to do so.

As well, the hon. member knows that under Section 95 of the BNA, agriculture is a shared responsibility. The hon. member should also know that we have been involved with various joint federal-provincial programs from livestock, drought, to soil and water, to agriculture ERDAs, to assistance for grasshopper relief, to floods, you name it. This is not something new.

We have limited resources available. We have asked the provinces to sit down and try to work out the kinds of programs they would want to meet their unique needs. Then we can target the assistance and make it the most effective assistance possible. We have asked them to do that, to sit down with us and work out that sort of program.

We have indicated that any new programs they bring forward that could be seen as improving the income position of farmers in 1990 would be taken into consideration as a part of the plan.

It seems very simple. Unless the provinces want to totally cop-out of helping agriculture at this very difficult time, then we will have no other choice than to do something along the lines that was suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. I might remind the hon. member that would not put cash into the hands of the farmers right now.

We are interested in getting as much cash as we possibly can into the hands of the farmers right now and we ask the provinces to join us in that regard.

HEALTH

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of health I would like to direct this question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Up to at least 1983 one of the most popular household and institutional cleansers in Canada, Lysol, relied on the Monsanto manufactured chemical, Santophen-1 as its active germicidal ingredient.

In the late 1970s Monsanto found and then suppressed evidence of the presence in Santophen-1 of up to 65 parts per billion—that is one thousand, seven hundred parts per trillion in Lysol itself, of 2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzodioxin—TCDD, the most toxic form of dioxin known.

When did the government know, not suspect, but know of the presence of TCDD in Santophen-1 and, hence in Lysol, and what steps did it take once it knew?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern in this matter. He was courteous enough to send me notice of the question and I will try to answer it as best I can.

As the hon. member knows, dioxin is a generic term for about 70 members of a particular chemical family. He also knows that it was not until the late seventies or the early eighties that there were mechanisms to detect the presence of the particular contaminant that he is referring to, namely Santophen.

I can assure the hon. member that it was essentially through Agriculture Canada and Health and Welfare Canada that we were able to devise the methodology to detect this. I can advise him also that its use in Lysol was discontinued in the early 1980s, shortly after it was detected as being a contaminant and harmful. Therefore, it is no longer used in Lysol.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Deputy Prime Minister was able to make such good use of the research with which I supplied him. He only got a couple of points wrong.

As Monsanto's Santophen-1 was only one of the brands of 2-benzyl-4-chlorophenol in Canada, and as Agriculture Canada lists 56 pest control products containing the chemical and none have been tested by the government for dioxin contamination, will the government now move quickly—not wait for its current review to report—to test all sources of 2-benzyl-4-chlorophenol available in Canada for contamination by TCDD?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get involved in an argument with the hon. member but it is not 56. There may be 10 that have this contaminant, not 56. Those were grandfathered under the 1980 regime and they are being analysed further. When the results are known appropriate action will be taken.

I think the other contaminant he refers to is 2,3,7,8–TCDD. It has not been detected because it is in such minute quantities, that is less than one part per billion, that we do not have the mechanisms and the machinery to detect it. As it would be in so infinitesimally small quantities it would probably not be harmful.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is reported that Premier Vander Zalm of British Columbia, in preparation for the Western Premiers' Conference, has apparently written to the Prime Minister asking for assurances that no attempt would be made to proclaim unilaterally parts of the Meech Lake Accord on the 7 and 50 basis if it fails to get approval of all 10 provinces by June 23.

Many Canadians are wondering the same thing. Will the Deputy Prime Minister, today, in his place, confirm that there is no intention of asking the Governor General to proclaim portions of the Meech Lake Accord on the 7 and 50 basis?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that there is a process in place. The McKenna resolution was a subject of a parliamentary committee study. That report is being written right now. When the report is delivered and the recommendations are brought forth, the government will respond.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Many Canadians are concerned about the Prime Minister's response, saying that it is a seamless web and should be agreed to in that vein. If the Prime Minister is not prepared to give Premier Vander Zalm and Canadians in general the assurances that they seek about this matter, would they acknowledge that the only way, if such a case happens after the presentation of this committee report, for western provinces to prevent such a unilateral proclamation of parts of Meech Lake would be for one of the legislatures of the three most westerly provinces to rescind its resolution of the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Speaker: I have to point out that that is a hypothetical question. The minister may want to deal with it.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Statistics Canada has cancelled its original intention to publish monthly the effect of the GST on inflation in Canada. This was accepted procedure to the Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance for three years.

Why this sudden change? Why will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not admit that the reason this is being cancelled is that the government does not like the information which will go to the people and realizes that the GST will increase inflation by more than the 1.25 per cent that the Minister of Finance has predicted?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my friend that I have been responsible for Statistics Canada for the last two months.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): I would like to say to my friend first of all that that question was asked by Mr. Hartt when he was Deputy Minister of Finance. He should know that Mr. Fellegi, who is the chief statistician for Statistics Canada, said that it would be unfair to say that we could provide that kind of information on a monthly basis. He also said that Statistics Canada will be able to provide a quarterly report dealing with that kind of question. Once again, I believe that Mr. Fellegi is well known as being very competent and there is no reason to believe that he is wrong.

[Translation]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the quarterly report will not provide the same information. The Prime Minister's chief of staff, Stanley Hart, was the first to ask in 1987 that the consumer price index be calculated without the indirect tax. Why is the government suddenly saying today that it is no longer possible to come up with that information?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said in English. First of all, Mr. Hart was then Deputy Minister of Finance, an excellent one I might add. Secondly, Statistics Canada regularly receives requests such as this one and assesses them according to its ability to provide the information wanted. Mr. Fellegi, chief statistician at Statistics Canada, was very clear. It is not possible to provide information on a potential difference between the actual inflation rate and that due in theory to the Goods and Services Tax on a monthly basis. However, this information can be provided on a quarterly basis, and that is what they will do. It will then be relevant.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

With interest rates over 14 per cent thousands of Canadians have been forced out of the housing market. Statistics show that the number of potential first-time home buyers has practically been cut in half. There are only 270,000 potential home buyers today compared to 475,000 two years ago when interest rates were 10 per cent and 11 per cent.

Why is this government shutting out Canadians from the dream of owning a home? Why are Canadians being forced to pay more than 34 per cent of their income toward housing? How much more proof does this government need before it realizes that interest rates are too high and must be reduced?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Housing who is away on government business, I remind the hon. member that housing starts in this country over the last number of years have been running at about 220,000 to 230,000 units per year; far in excess of what we have experienced on average over the last number of years.

The projections now are about 199,000 units this year. That is somewhat of a drop from last year, but we feel that the housing market is still viable and very much alive and that there will be a fair number of starts, close to 200,000 this year, which is about the norm for Canada.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

In the last three weeks this government has often talked about the importance of economic indicators. How many hundreds of thousands of Canadians will have to abandon the idea or dream of owning a home, how many Canadians will have to lose their homes, how many Canadians will have to lose their jobs, and how many companies will have to shut their doors before this government realizes that its interest rate policies are too high and must be reduced and that Crow must go?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, there were a lot of questions in that supplementary.

Mr. Milliken: Crow must go.

Mr. McDermid: I might say that the dream of owning a home in Canada is one that we of course support.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Only a dream!

Mr. McDermid: We are very well housed in Canada, as the hon. member knows.

Second, the home builders who are talking about the high interest rates right now are the same ones who last year raised the price of an average home 17 per cent in the metro area. Inflation as we know was 5.9 per cent.

Realtors today will tell the hon. member, as they have told me and others, that the market right now is adjusting itself. The hon. member knows that it was overheated in his area as well as in my area. They will tell you that this is a watershed period of the market adjusting itself and quietening down. I have every confidence that Canadians will be well housed today, tomorrow, and into the future.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Seniors.

Yesterday the Minister refused to admit that $4 million had been cut from the New Horizons program, although it is not clear that is what has happened. What this means is that over 500 really valuable and worthwhile projects for seniors across the country have been cut.

The minister will have the figures in front of her. Would she confirm that Saskatchewan's allocation is being cut by 35 per cent, from $750,050 to $488,943? Will she also confirm that the biggest cuts are to the poorest areas of the country—Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Yukon, and the Northwest Territories—where they were 38 per cent?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): As minister responsible for the programs to help Canadian seniors, I want to thank my colleague opposite for his interest in Canada's seniors.

I would just like to go back to yesterday's statement and remind him that in Table 29 of our Estimates, he can see that the budget allocation for the New Horizons Program is $15 million in 1990–91, the same as in 1989–90. So the program has not been cut.

And I would add, Mr. Speaker, that I find it shameful that the reputation of such an important program as New Horizons is being tarnished by playing on regional rivalry. The hon. member opposite knows very well that many government programs must be divided a certain way among the regions and we respect that when we evaluate programs like New Horizons.

[English]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I take it this means that the $4 million has been put back into the New Horizons Program.

Could the minister make this quite clear to seniors and stop teasing them about the money that is involved in the New Horizons Program?

Also, could she undertake on behalf of the government not to cut seniors' programs, either secretly or otherwise, for the rest of this government's term?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, it is shameful to mislead people as the member is doing now.

We have about $35 million in our various programs for seniors. The budgets are the same as for 1989–90. I repeat, if we want sound management and to respect the needs of seniors which have evolved over the last ten years, we must evaluate the programs and that is what we are doing with New Horizons.

I am rather surprised that no reference is made to the increased funding for the Seniors' Independence Program this year. People talk about New Horizons but they should talk about the Seniors' Independence Program, whose budget will increase 20 per cent this year, compared to what was spent last year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

FOREST INDUSTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

A number of factors currently affect Quebec's forest industry, including wood chips, Quebec's notorious Bill 150, and forest supply and management contracts. The result is that forest workers will be gainfully employed for only three to six months this year.

My question is this. The Quebec–Canada subsidiary forest development agreement expired last March 31. After his meeting of last week with Quebec Minister Rémillard, can the minister tell us whether the negotiations with Quebec concerning phase II of this agreement have begun, with a view to coming to the assistance of forest workers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the regional forest development agreement did expire last March 31, as was the case in other provinces. We are indeed interested in the private forestry sector.

I had discussions with Mr. Rémillard of Quebec. We are to meet again in two weeks, Mr. Speaker, and I expect to be in a position to make concrete proposals to the Quebec government.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Communications lapsed into his Union Nationale glory days, suggesting that the CBC's 1968 national unity mandate had created today's divided Canada. Earlier his parliamentary secretary said that national unity mandates were the stuff of totalitarian regimes.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Given that he stated strong views and passionate commitment to national unity, will he attempt to direct his Minister of Communications to reverse his obstinate views and put national unity back into the CBC's mandate in the interest of peace, order and good government?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question because she was among those who put her signature to Section 36 of the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, which advocated the very change to which she now objects.

I would cite, as an authority, the distinguished new President of Czechoslovakia, Vaclar Havel who is an authority on such matters and who says that consciousness precedes being to think otherwise is to be a Marxist.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, that is really the most illogical, poorly stated, ridiculous statement I have ever heard from the hon. member.

I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it takes a big person—

Mr. Milliken: Fuzzy-headed thinking, Jim.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put her question.

• (1500)

Mrs. Finestone: I at least have the courage of my convictions and know when to change my mind when the circumstances in the country change.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, because of our unique geography Canadians use communications more than any other country in the world to link us, to inform us and to unite us.

Does the Prime Minister agree that our CBC Radio and Television, with its extended infrastructure and through its programs, should continue to enable greater contact between Canadians across this vast land? Does he agree that national unity is an appropriate mandate and that otherwise he is sending a very dangerous message across this land?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I do take the question very seriously. Of course unity is the objective which we all have in mind. But in order for there to be unity, there must first be some kind of knowledge of what the country is all about.

The hon. member knows that the standing committee found that there was a tremendous gap. There was a longitudinal lacuna of knowledge about this country from coast to coast. She knows that very well.

The standing committee report urged that the country's regional and language solitudes come together. Without fostering that sense of identity and without fostering that consciousness there can be no unity. The horse must come before the cart.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my good friend, the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls, made a comment during Question Period referring to the motor cycle accident that I suffered. The hon. member just sent me a note offering to withdraw or apologize. I told the hon. member that he did not have to do that, that I took no offence at all.

I do not want members to take offence at the comment made by the hon. member. He did not mean it in a bad way. I invited that comment and I have no problem at all with it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I made the comment in response to a statement that the minister had made. That is why I offered to withdraw the remark if the minister felt offended by it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in the course of answering a question the Deputy Prime Minister referred to the sage advice that was being offered by the member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. Alas, there is no longer such an important influence in the House. The seat of Winnipeg—Fort Garry no longer exists.

However, I am gratified that the member is still looking for advice. As the member for Winnipeg South Centre I am quite prepared to continue offering all the constructive and thoughtful suggestions I have in the past.

However, I would say that in this case the minister is wrong. The advice he suggested I was offering was in fact coming from the western premiers and not from myself. I was simply their humble messenger in this House.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is thankful for the advice from the hon. member that the seat remains the same but the name has changed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act; and of the amendment of Mr. Fisher (p. 11109).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 3 p.m, pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, May 8, 1990, the House will now proceed to the taking of the division on the amendment and the main motion in relation to amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

The question is on the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn (Mr. Fisher).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Fisher), which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the amendment lost.

The next question is on the main motion in the name of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Does the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wish to raise a point of order?

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I think you would have the unanimous consent of the House for applying the results of the previous vote to this motion, but in reverse, because we are against this bill.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I was unavoidably detained by honest toil before the taking of the last vote.

I am present for this vote, however, and wish my vote recorded against the government motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

FORESTRY CANADA

TABLING OF 1988-89 ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the 1988-89 Annual Report of Forestry Canada.

This is National Forest Week and I can assure you this is a wonderful year for forestry in Canada, since the proclamation of the Department of Forestry Act, which has given us, a full-fledged Department of Forestry.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise today to present a petition signed by Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax. They ask Parliament to reject this tax.

These petitions have been circulated by citizens who are calling on taxpayers to join them at a rally on Parliament Hill on Saturday, May 12, at noon, to show that Canadians are opposed to the government's goods and services tax.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 regarding the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The petitioners from Kamloops, British Columbia, outline a whole list of concerns, including applying the tax to heating fuels, haircuts, diapers and, in particular, to reading material.

They are asking the government to come to its senses and simply stop proceeding with this tax.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to table petitions on the subject of Lithuania and its independence.

I have here the signatures of over 20,000 people who state that because the people of Lithuania through their democratically elected Parliament have passed unanimously a declaration of independence from the Soviet Union; and whereas the Soviet Union has failed to recognize the validity of this resolution; and whereas the people of Lithuania require the assistance of the various governments in the world to support their desire for freedom and independence, the petitioners call upon Parliament to act upon the all-party resolution of March 12, 1990, and recognize and support the right of the Lithuanian people to declare the independence of the Republic of Lithuania.

• (1540)

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition from veterans in my riding of Parkdale—High Park. These petitioners are complaining about the new measures in the last budget creating hardships for veterans because the money allotted for services will be denied to these veterans.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise in the House today to present a petition signed by Canadians who are opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitions were circulated by residents asking taxpayers to join them in a demonstration on Parliament Hill on Saturday, May 12, at noon, to show that Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax proposed by this government.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I also rise today to present a petition signed by Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax. These petitioners are followers of a group called Tax Busters, and they are very concerned that the Canadian government does not need more money from the taxpayers. It needs conscientious, responsible representatives to diligently manage the money it already gets in taxes.

These petitions have been circulated by citizens who are calling on taxpayers to join them at a rally on Parliament Hill this Saturday, May 12, at noon, to show that Canadians are still opposed to the government's goods and services tax.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise under Standing Order 36 and present a petition on the government's low-level flight training in Canada.

The petitioners from various parts of the lower mainland in my province of British Columbia ask Parliament to demand that the Canadian government end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada and oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training centre at Goose Bay, Labrador. They ask that the government redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and livelihood, and toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I have a further petition containing 357 names from throughout the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, which names I would like to add to the thousands of names on petitions I have now presented to the House.

The people of various places within my riding including Grand Forks, Oliver, Greenwood, Midway and others, will simply not be tricked by this government dropping the rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent or pushing through the goods and services tax. They are asking this government to bring in a proposal of tax reform that will, in fact, address fairness in all taxation.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise to present a petition signed by Canadians opposed to the goods and services tax, along with the thousands of petitions I have presented from Kootenay East. These are petitions mainly signed in Ontario.

These petitions were circulated by citizens who are calling on taxpayers to join with them at a rally on Parliament Hill on Saturday, May 12, at noon, to show that Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax and want the tax stopped.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston and the Islands who are opposed to the proposal in the government's recent budget to slash the benefits to Canada's veterans. They call upon Parliament to reject any cuts to veterans' services in Canada.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have provided you with notice today under the provisions of Standing Order 52 requesting a debate on a matter of urgent and pressing concern.

As a member of a farm constituency I have witnessed the farm financial crisis first-hand. I have a large number of people who are communicating with me weekly on this issue.

As you are aware, Madam Speaker, on two occasions in the last two weeks members of the New Democratic Party have risen to request an emergency debate on the farm financial crisis in western Canada.

As you are also aware, Madam Speaker, this week the premiers of the western provinces who met in Portage La Prairie, Manitoba, called unanimously for lower interest rates in this country, as well as for the release of federal funds earmarked for the farm community. They said that they could not match dollar for dollar the programs that the federal government was asking them to match.

The provinces in clarifying their views on this matter sent a message to this House indicating that there appears to be little room left for negotiation and that possibly the federal government may have to act unilaterally.

I believe it is incumbent upon Parliament to express its views to this government as quickly as possible to ensure that this government has adequate information from the members of this House to make the point to act unilaterally and possibly to release the funds as the provinces are now asking it to do.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I want to thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake for his thoughtful note and for the remarks that he just made.

Coming from a farm community in the east of the country, I am quite aware of the situation.

We have studied the hon. member's request very seriously. Notwithstanding the importance of the subject, we do not feel that at this time we should grant leave for a special debate.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)) moved that Bill C–37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is with much pride that I open debate today on Bill C–37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

Similar legislation, Bill C–152, was introduced in the last session of Parliament. At that time it was referred to a committee of the House for detailed examination and recommendations.

Those recommendations, and the helpful suggestions of many of my colleagues, are reflected in the bill we are considering today.

This legislation adds further substance to the multiculturalism policies of this government and to the strong commitments we have made to multiculturalism in Canada.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, when the Canadian Multiculturalism Act came into force on July 21, 1988, it received the unanimous approval of all members of the House of Commons.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act is a promise, a commitment made by the government on behalf of the Canadian people to this country's future.

The bill introduced in the House today is an integral part of this promise and reflects the hope and optimism contained in the Canadian Multiculturalism Act.

[English]

Section 3, subsection (1)(i) of that act clearly states the policy of the Government of Canada to preserve and enhance the use of languages other than English and French, while strengthening the status and use of the official languages of Canada.

• (1550)

I am proud to remind my colleagues of this government's commitment to official languages. They are the essential vehicles for our communication and progress as a people. We have strengthened the Official Languages Act. As Secretary of State, I continue to work with the provinces and community organizations to promote official languages throughout the country.

This bill, to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, gives substance to the spirit of our multiculturalism policy. It matches visionary ideals with concrete initiatives. As outlined in Bill C–37, the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute will facilitate the acquisition, retention and use of all languages that contribute to Canada's multicultural identity.

[Translation]

Today, more than 70 languages are spoken in Canada. Some of them are native languages and were used well before the arrival of the Europeans in this country. Native languages are a very special part of Canada's linguistic heritage.

[English]

For this reason, I would draw the attention of all members of the House to the explicit reference to aboriginal languages in this legislation. I should note that this was an amendment to Bill C–152 proposed by members of both opposition parties, which I am glad to accept. I should also point out that the inclusion of aboriginal languages in the Heritage Languages Institute does not preclude native Canadians from pursuing the establishment of an aboriginal languages institute.

[Translation]

Other heritage languages were brought here by people from all over the world, people who decided to make Canada their adopted country.

Wherever you go in Canada, you will hear people communicating in languages other than French and English. Those languages are present all around us. They are a tangible and vibrant expression of Canada's cultural diversity.

[English]

Language is more than spoken words or a system of communication. It is the product of a community's past history. It is an important vehicle to transmit the culture of a community and its values to future generations.

Heritage languages enrich family life. When I was a young boy my only way of communicating with my grandparents was to speak Yiddish. I still am able to understand it and speak it quite well. At an appropriate time I might even introduce some of it into the debate.

Mrs. Maheu: How about now?

[Editor's Note: Minister spoke in Yiddish.]

[English]

Mr. Belsher: Translate it for us.

Mr. Weiner: I will leave that for the record.

Without that third language, which I had learned at home, a whole world of eastern European culture would have been lost to me and, in later years, to my own children. Even more important it was a way of making contact, of reaching out to loved ones and of sharing the warmth and richness of family history.

In travelling the world and meeting family that I had never met before, some of them spoke Spanish, others spoke Romanian, others spoke Hebrew as their first language, but somehow, with Yiddish I was able to communicate and to have a better understanding of the family relationship. This was a way that the language of my heritage was very important to me in helping me understand my family roots. I know it is so for all other cultural communities.

[Translation]

Heritage languages are also a major economic resource. They are a tool that we can use when doing business at the international level, or in peacekeeping missions or educational exchanges. They revitalize our tourist industry by making it possible for us to welcome visitors to Canada in their own language. They are also an invaluable asset in multicultural publishing and broadcasting, on trips around the world and in academic circles. In all these fields, heritage languages serve our national interest and promote multiculturalism.

[English]

Our multiculturalism gives us an edge. It takes us beyond our homes and into the global market-place. If our trade delegations include people familiar with the languages, the values and the ways of doing business in other countries, then we have a competitive advantage.

The proposed Canadian Heritage Languages Institute will provide a new kind of support mechanism for the learning of ancestral languages.

In Canada today many languages are taught, both within and outside the regular public school system. In fact, we know that many provincial education systems have been expanding their activities in this field.

In the prairies, provincial governments support three types of heritage language learning: courses in which heritage languages are the medium of instruction, a variety of core second language courses, and community based classes. More than 41,000 children are involved in these programs. Almost 25,000 children in Quebec are also learning their heritage languages both within and outside the public school system with considerable provincial support. In British Columbia the provincial government has recently announced some funding for heritage language classes in addition to second language programs currently being offered.

In 1988–89 the province of Ontario had about 100,000 children enrolled in heritage language programs. These children were instructed in one of the 62 languages taught in Ontario. As a result of new legislation enacted in July 1988, these numbers are expected to increase considerably. The new Ontario policy requires that all school boards provide heritage language instruction of up to two and a half hours each week, when requested by the parents of 25 or more students within the board's jurisdiction.

These developments positively reflect earlier research in this area indicating the preference of many Canadians to have their children receive heritage language instruction as an integral part of the public school system. The teaching of heritage languages in regular schools ensures that they are indeed part of mainstream education activities, as they should be.

The growing importance that Canadians attach to the acquisition and maintenance of ancestral languages led my predecessor, the Honourable David Crombie, to consider the establishment of a Heritage Languages Institute.

He asked two eminent Canadians, Dr. Henry Kreisel of the University of Alberta and Dr. Michael S. Batts of the University of British Columbia, to advise on the establishment of an institute.

[Translation]

After much consultation across the country, these specialists discovered that the teachers in heritage language classes had little or no teacher training. They observed that they especially needed to know the various teaching methods. They also need access to Canadian material so that students can learn in a Canadian context.

[English]

In their research the professors found that heritage language teaching is often carried out in isolation and that teachers, even within the same language group, have little contact with each other. They discovered that there is an urgent need for networking. They recommended greater dissemination and sharing of information and resources between regions in the provinces and between the provinces. I am honoured today to open debate on legislation which will make these recommendations into law. What this legislation provides is an ambitious and challenging mandate, a mandate with one central purpose: namely, to provide a national focus for the teaching of heritage languages.

• (1600)

The institute will bring experts from across Canada together and direct them to the different priorities in various parts of the country. In this way, all available Canadian expertise and resources will be shared to find creative solutions to community needs. The Canadian Heritage Languages Institute will reach out to the educational and cultural communities, to the business community and to all levels of government. It will be an institution without walls, operating as a co-ordinator and a central contact point for the major areas of activity set out in its mandate: promotion, information exchange, teaching skills, materials development, networking and research.

The government believes that heritage languages are a major national resource. We believe they can best be preserved by a partnership that unites the federal and provincial governments, community groups, institutions and individuals.

As with any institution, there are financial considerations. The Canadian Heritage Languages Institute will be federally incorporated as a charitable organization. The status will give it much wider fund raising possibilities than would otherwise be possible.

[Translation]

The Institute will begin its work on a solid financial base. The federal government plans to give it a capital fund of some $800,000 for the current fiscal year and the next four fiscal years. Moreover, the Institute will receive $500,000 a year for its operating expenses in these five years.

Madam Speaker, this bill before us today is based on our past achievements and is also forward-looking. This legislation recognizes the importance of preserving and respecting our many cultures and languages. We thus enrich the life of Canadian society.

[English]

When we passed the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, this country told the nations of the world that we value our multicultural identity. We consider it an invaluable asset in strengthening Canada and in making this country a better, fairer place in which to live, a nation where all Canadians, of all origins, have an equal and fair chance to contribute to the process of our nation building.

The Canadian Heritage Languages Institute will be in keeping with this proud and visionary tradition. It will serve as a point of intersection, a crossroads, linking our many cultural communities to their own vast potential within Canadian society.

We are a people who understand what progress means and how to achieve it in real terms. There are opportunities today and every day to make progress happen, to foster a society that has fairness, equality and understanding at its foundation: a nation spurred on by a spirit of competition and committed to the cause of human rights around the world. We have made impressive inroads to date, but we know even greater opportunities lie ahead. This kind of Canada can be our generation's legacy to the children of today and tomorrow.

The Canadian Heritage Languages Institute bill is one step, but a vital one, toward a more progressive Canada for all of our citizens. It is my hope that the House will give this legislation rapid passage so that the institute can assume its rightful place as a signpost of a modern Canada, and as a sign of hope for the next generation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak to Bill C-37, an Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

The concept of legislating support for the teaching of heritage languages is not really new in this country. At the turn of the century, when the Prairies were settled, large numbers of immigrants who spoke neither English nor French were attracted partly by the promise that their children would receive instruction in their mother tongue. At first, arrangements were made to provide for this, but towards the end of the settlement period, these provisions were withdrawn.

Sociologist Evelyn Kallen recently raised this question, saying that Canada's commitment to multiculturalism would be neither genuine nor realistic until heritage language rights were guaranteed under the Constitution. Without proposing to grant official status to heritage languages, she replied that if we are truly to respect our ethnic diversity, we must guarantee access to education in the language of choice.

A research study by Reitz, The Survival of Ethnic Groups, shows us that preserving its heritage language is more important for an ethnic group's identity and interaction than membership in an ethnic church or living in an ethnic neighbourhood or even marrying within the ethnic group. The conclusion is that the emphasis placed on language in our cultural policy by official and other language groups is, by and large, justified.

For all these reasons, I certainly agree with the principle of creating a Canadian heritage languages institute, but—there is always a but—I have serious reservations about the commitment of this government.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I would like to highlight what the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute's goals are so everyone can have a clear understanding of the proposed bill.

They are: one, to promote and develop the field of heritage language learning in Canada; two, to undertake public education, develop and disseminate Canadian-oriented learning materials, assist in the development of programs to improve standards of heritage language instruction and carry out research activities of importance to heritage language learning in general; three, to be located in Edmonton and work closely with organizations, individuals and groups from across the country. It is to consult with community-based organizations, educational institutions and the provincial territorial governments to ensure that all who are concerned with heritage language learning benefit from the activities of the institute.

It should be managed by a board of directors appointed by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the minister following consultation with appropriate government institutions, organizations and individuals. It will receive $6.5 million over five years from the department, part of which will establish an endowment fund to ensure its continued operation. It will be a charitable foundation which can receive financial support from the private sector and community sources and as well, from provincial and territorial governments. It will present an annual report of its activities to the minister for tabling in Parliament which will include financial statements and an auditor's report.

It will be evaluated by the minister in consultation with the board following anniversaries of the passage of the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Bill. These are very impressive goals. Let us look at them a little closer.

• (1610)

Madam Speaker, how can a government that claims to listen to Canadians on the one hand have a goal of consulting them and on the other turn a deaf ear to the requests made by the organizations consulted?

The 1990 Budget showed us how important the Conservative government thinks multiculturalism is. We saw that while it talks about its commitment to heritage languages through the creation of an institute, in one stroke it cuts the very necessary funds for the schools that teach these same languages.

That is a strange way to implement objectives 1, 3 and 4, involving education, co-operation and promotion of heritage language teaching.

But maybe I misunderstood. Perhaps the objectives will only be taken into consideration once the bill is passed and for now, they are to be ignored.

Madam Speaker, the Conservative government says that it wants to help community organizations so that they can benefit from the activities of the Institute. Could the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship explain to me how these organizations can benefit from the Institute's activities if they first have to close down owing to his government's lack of commitment?

Canada is now going through a national identity crisis and this is the time the Conservative government has chosen to cut the funds for schools that teach heritage languages, nearly 1,500 schools affecting over 150,000 children and 5,000 teachers!

Madam Speaker, when I asked the minister in March why it was necessary to cut the funds, which seemed to me and still seems to me to be contrary to his policy, he answered, "Times are tough". However, going back to objective 6 of Bill C-37, we see that the Institute will receive $6.5 million. Would it not have been possible to decrease the Institute's funds a little in order to gradually reduce, instead of drastically cut, the funds for schools that teach heritage languages, thus giving them time to get back on their feet?

[English]

Madam Speaker, the cuts to heritage languages do affect unity, whatever the minister might say. We sell Canada as being a mosaic as opposed to a melting pot. The Conservative government, by oh so subtly denying individuals from belonging to their ethnic group through culture and language, does not permit these individuals to feel a part of this mosaic. Language training is essential in understanding the importance of culture, and maybe immigrant groups would have a better understanding of the French fact in Canada having had to work hard to maintain their own language.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, promoting the establishement of chairs in multicultural studies in Canadian universities is to be commended. One cannot deny the importance of discovering the expression of ancestral cultures through literature, the performing arts and the plastic arts. All this is wonderful but far removed from the day-to-day teaching of heritage languages in some remote corner of Canada.

Why is this government cutting funds by $4.1 million, an amount that heritage language schools need to survive. Where did it find $14 million so that adults could get language training? Doesn't this government have strange priorities? I guess as long as it looks good and pays dividends—

The government is unable to find $4.1 million to maintain a long-standing heritage language teaching program, but has no problem spending $14 million on classes for business people. Would it be an investment in the next election?

Madam Speaker, I want to be perfectly clear. I am not against business people learning another language, far from it. But I am against using budget cuts as an excuse to withdraw $4.1 million, when both amounts are spent on non official language classes. Where is the logic in this?

[English]

In the news release of the Minister of State for Multicultural and Citizenship of September, 1989, the minister said, and I quote:

> The need for this Institute is stronger than ever because enrolment in heritage language classes is greater than ever. Our figures show that there are 129,000 students enrolled in 1,557 supplementary heritage schools across the country studying 60 languages.

The news release continues by specifying that these schools run classes outside the public school systems with as many students enjoying heritage language instruction offered under the aegis of the provincial ministries of education. Then, there is this specification which states: "All of these students should benefit from the activities the Institute is expected to undertake".

I would like to minister to tell us what happened between September, 1989 and budget day. Since when did the term "all" mean "half"? And, if one of the reasons justifying the creation of an institute was the number of students enrolled in programs. Why were the funds cut?

Madam Speaker, establishing such an institute will help us enhance the professional skills of heritage language teachers, but no attempt should be made to play the role of universities or provincial governments. Until further notice, education falls under provincial jurisdiction.

Another role of the Institute will be to prepare didactic documents of Canadian content, and this has to be done through consultation with and consideration for communities as such, and not only the intelligentsia. These documents will reflect the Canadian reality to the extent that they relate to actual endeavours and past educational experiences. This will be one way to find out whether the Conservative government is serious, for to this day it has yet to demonstrate real interest in the survival of heritage languages and cultures.

The second aspect of the Institute's mandate will be to undertake extensive research into the learning of heritage languages in general. Again we will have to keep a close watch to ensure that the trend is not to publish papers which will end up gathering dust on the shelf.

It is far too easy to get sidetracked in research and write about lofty theories which are of no use to anyone. We in the opposition will see to it that any research undertaken is directly related to the teaching of heritage languages and that, above all, it is likely to improve the short- and long-term situation. Since the Institute is intended to be a tool for teachers, it will be up to us to make sure that it is and remains so.

[English]

Consultation seems to be a key element in the raison d'être of the institute. If this is the case, why are aboriginal groups included in multiculturalism? Their view of multiculturalism is one that excludes aboriginal groups. They consider themselves as first people, and rightly so. Were they not consulted? Were they not heard? Or, were they not listened to?

The Conservative government said that it wished to promote heritage languages to enhance the Canadian mosaic. But, at the same time, it is ironic that in the 1990 budget cuts aboriginal people were hit so hard by the Secretary of State, that the Native Communications Program of $3.4 million was cut. It provided funding for 15 native language newspapers. They provided opportunities for work experience and enhancement of aboriginal literacy. These cuts dealt a severe blow to those seeking to preserve and promote aboriginal cultures. The natives provided funding to the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation and will affect 95 per cent of all the Inuit who watch its programming. Again, this corporation provided for the opportunity for cultural retention. Is this how the government promotes language and culture?

• (1620)

Madam Speaker, how can anyone trust a government that acts this way? A government that claims to promote Canadian multiculturalism and in the same breath destroys the bases of these cultures. Whether one closes down a newspaper, reduces funds to a radio station or cuts grants to schools for teaching heritage languages, the results are the same: denigration, destruction, and increased tensions and prejudices.

How can the Minister of State claim to be interested in the Canadian mosaic when he cannot convince his own party that it is important? How can he accept a $4.1 million cut-back in language teaching while the Minister for International Trade gets $14 million for the same reason but not for the same clients?

Madam Speaker, if we want a strong Canada, we must invest in its multicultural heritage. It is important for everyone to feel that he or she has a place in our society and cutting funding is not the way to achieve it. If the conservative government really wants to promote the Canadian mosaic in concretely and not only in theory, it must act without calculating to the penny how much its measures will bring in.

In these times of political and economical questionning, tensions build up and we look for scapegoats. We must act now! We must stop giving differences a negative value and find their plusses.

The conservative government doesn't seem to realize the importance of heritage languages in the preservation of cultures, pride and dignity. It is only when we are able to respect others with their differences that they will respect us and that we are going to build a strong Canada.

Madam Speaker, the creation of the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute could very well be a step in the right direction. I say "could" because there is a long way to go from the project to its realization. That is why we, of the Official Opposition, intend to keep an eye on the government so that, as the minister promised in September 1989, the Institute will have positive impact as much on complementary schools that will have new financial needs as on public schools. If the government really believes in the Canadian mosaic, now is the time to prove it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would take this opportunity to indicate that tomorrow will be an allotted day for the purpose of supply.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Weiner that Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to this bill, Bill C-37, an act to establish a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute for western Canada. I think it is very much needed in many respects. However, I will say at the beginning that we have some very strong reservations related to the priorities represented in this bill.

As the minister indicated earlier, this was introduced as Bill C-152 in the last Parliament. I noticed, in looking over the previous bill, that there were some amendments that I assume were made in committee, including the emphasis on the promotion of heritage languages. I noticed the addition of "and their benefit to Canada." I think that is a very important point.

Before I get into the bill itself, I would like to mention something for the benefit of certain Canadians. I can imagine some of them in Vancouver East at this moment who might cynically say: "Why do we need to be putting money into heritage language classes and a heritage language institute? Why is this important when we are short of funds? Why should we not be teaching just English or French as a second language to the many immigrants who are coming to Canada? They need this in order to adjust, become part of our society, get employment, and so on."

I agree that teaching English or French as a second language is the important language responsibility of the federal government. It is a first priority so that people can become part of Canadian society and adjust very quickly.

However, the purpose of this bill, and heritage language training generally, is very definitely a Canadian purpose. Let us make no mistake about that. That purpose and the goal is to enrich the multicultural heritage of Canada and Canadian citizens, both those whose parents and grandparents came from another country and those who were born in Canada of English or French heritage who may also want to study heritage languages.

In Canada, heritage languages are treated as ancillary languages, supplementary to either English or French which all Canadians should speak. In many cases, we know that it is the children and grandchildren of immigrants who go to classes on Saturdays or in the evenings. They do it as a part-time activity. We think that heritage languages are very important, particularly to immigrant families, as an enrichment and to promote family unity.

Many of the children in my riding would not be able to communicate with their grandparents, as the minister indicated in his experience, unless they were able to learn the language of the grandparents. If they do not know it when they become teenagers, there is a greater risk than ever of both poor communications and a division of cultural attitudes.

Getting back to this bill, the purpose of the proposed Canadian Heritage Languages Institute was outlined by the minister today. Also, as my hon. colleague from the Liberal side has just mentioned, it was outlined by the minister last September. As she has mentioned, it is very important to look back at that statement because it was said in a different context.

The press release reads:

> The Institute, whose objective will be to encourage the preservation and use of heritage languages throughout Canada, will be located in Edmonton—It will not, however, be a location where people will go to attend classes.

A lot of people have asked about this.

> Institute activities will focus on national teacher training and program development, the production of Canadian-oriented learning materials, public education and research into all aspects of Canada's heritage languages.

The press release goes on with regard to funding. I am repeating what the member just said, but it is very important. The press release continues:

> "The need for this Institute is stronger than ever, because enrolment in heritage language classes is greater than ever," said Mr. Weiner.
> "Our figures show that there are currently 129,000 students enrolled in 1,557 supplementary heritage language schools across the country studying 60 languages," he added.
> These schools run classes outside the public school systems; there are as many students again enjoying heritage language instruction offered under the aegis of the provincial ministries of education. All these students should benefit from the activities the institute is expected to undertake.

It was a very important statement by the minister last September. He is definitely saying—I believe he was right—that the reason we need an institute is to service the front-line, community heritage language classes in 60, 70 or 80 different languages. Parents are sending their children to those classes and some adults are going as well. Their teachers can benefit from the resources that an institute would provide. However, if there are only "x" number of dollars and you have to choose a priority, which is going to be your priority? The front line classes to teach heritage languages, or this fancy academic institute in Edmonton?

It is pretty clear that the $4.1 million the government took out of heritage language classes in communities is a first priority. If we do support this bill, it will be with that in mind, that the funding for those classes must be reinstated.

It is quite irrational to think that we would be proposing to spend over $7 million, if my arithmetic is correct, over five years for this new institute, if we are refusing to fund a very small amount per class to the community classes which this institute is to serve. I will come back to that point.

We originally did support this bill to establish a heritage language institute in western Canada. We felt that this would balance similar services that are now available in Ontario and Quebec. We do not object to it being in Edmonton because we know that the Tory members in Edmonton need a lot of political support these days. We will support it being in Edmonton, provided that there are decentralized services available in all four western provinces and in the major centres where there are a great many of the heritage language classes. This is very important.

In the briefing that we had from the minister's staff, we were told that there would be outreach and there would be resources that would be decentralized. But there is nothing in the bill to indicate that. That is something we should be looking at in committee.

As has already been said, the institute would provide resources and training for teachers and students and improve the Canadian content in textbooks and resources. That is a very important point. I have had complaints from people who are studying Cantonese and Mandarin. The Library of Canada and many of the local libraries only have books from Taiwan. Of course, many of them, both from the point of view of the culture and also politically, do not accept that these books should be produced in Taiwan. Canadian materials would make much greater sense.

The institute would also help to improve teaching skills, provide research and so on.

I would hope that in a western institute located in Edmonton it would stress the most common languages in the heritage of western Canadians. In this way, it may be very different than the eastern institutes. Again, I will use Vancouver East as an example because it is such a multicultural community. Cantonese, Mandarin, Korean, Vietnamese, Punjabi, Hindi, Japanese, as well as Italian and Portuguese are the languages that the families in my riding need and that I would hope would be stressed in resources from the institute.

We also agree with the method of financing provided in this bill which provides an investment of capital funds, $800,000 per year, the interest to be used for operational purposes in developing programs and a further $500,000 for operating costs. That is a sensible way to do it. This would be a charitable organization which could raise funds additionally in the private sector and from individuals.

Now I come back to the crucial point of our criticism of this bill. We approved this institute prior to the recent budget. As I stated earlier, the minister had related it to local community programs last September. We felt that it was an important resource that should be funded.

However, the recent budget and the devastating impact that it has had on frontline heritage language classes in local communities is quite unacceptable. The complete federal funding of over $4.1 million has been withdrawn from such programs with very little warning. This has undermined classes right across Canada. I was in Saskatoon not too long ago when this was announced. They were quite unsure of what to do. They were having to lay off teachers and close down classes. In their case, it was the total multi-language institute that they have in their own community that was threatened.

The teachers in these classes are not paid very much, and they should be paid more. They are dedicated people, usually immigrants themselves. Parents help out with the maintenance in the centres. The facilities are quite often donated so rents are not high. We are not talking about a lot of money for the number of children and the classes provided. The government must simply reconsider and reinstate funding for these community classes.

I mentioned earlier that the government has also taken money from ESL classes when they cancelled the CILT program. One wonders if the money from these two combined programs, heritage language classes and CILT are what is going into this new institute. If so, that is something that we cannot support.

The community languages classes are an integral tool of multiculturalism. The minister has stated this. They promote family unity and a real appreciation of ethnic culture. Someone once said that to eliminate language is to eliminate culture, because we transmit cultures through language.

The federal government's withdrawal of funding for community classes contradicts the minister's statement which he made and the statements he made today praising this bill. Yesterday in committee I asked the minister to give us the rationale for cutting the funding for heritage language programs in local communities. The minister said that he felt that classes could manage very well without federal funds. I know that for the classes in my community, this is not true at all. Many parents are working very hard. They have several children going to these classes. They quite often work for minimum wages, or they have a small business that they are struggling to survive in and they simply cannot afford to pay the full cost of classes.

The minister said that personally he could afford to pay for the language training he had. Well, perhaps that is true in his case, but it is certainly not true for many families across this nation. It is very unfair to say that.

He also said that heritage language training should not be trivialized. I could not quite understand what he meant by that. Perhaps the minister would explain later what he meant by that. Heritage language should not be trivialized and therefore cutting funds somehow is trivializing heritage languages. It did not make any sense.

According to the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and the Canadian Coalition on Multiculturalism, recent figures show that there are 150,000 young Canadians learning 60 languages in 1,556 community schools across Canada. That means that thousands of teachers are also involved in these programs.

What a rich heritage this represents for all of us, not just for the people who are enrolled in those classes. It is an investment in our future. I am sure that the minister of trade has recognized that learning languages, particularly those of the Pacific Rim, will be very valuable economic assets and very essential to our international relations and trade. The best time to teach these languages is when children are young. We know from our experience with French and English teaching that it is far more effective at that stage. It is a small investment for such great benefits.

I have visited many heritage language schools in my riding and in other communities. I know how hard they are working and what an excellent service they are providing. We must have those funds reinstated, as I said before.

It seems most contradictory that the federal government would be willing to pay $7.5 million over five years to establish a heritage language institute as a resource centre for these community classes, when the community classes themselves are not going to be able to continue in many cases, or are certainly not going to be able to use sophisticated resources because they will probably have volunteer teachers.

• (1640)

The teaching of heritage languages is a fundamental aspect of multicultural policy in Canada. The Canadian Ethnocultural Council states that: "Federal funding cuts are a back tracking on the commitments that were made in sections 5.1(f) and section 5.1(e) and 5.1(h) of the Canadian Multicultural Act".

These are the sections that deal with heritage languages and heritage cultures.

The CEC also states that this contradicts the government's intention to improve Canada's international competitive position, as fluency in the world's languages gives us an edge in trade development.

One cannot help but be mystified as to why the government is giving $14 million to the minister of trade to teach Canadian business people Asian languages in order to enhance their trading abilities, and it cannot even give $4 million of that amount of money—take it from the minister of trade, we do not care—for frontline classes that are a far more effective and economical way of teaching Asian languages.

The Canadian Coalition on Multiculturalism that was here a number of weeks ago also has taken a very strong position. This group represents some seven million Canadians in the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Polish Congress, Chinese Canadian National Council, the Federation of Korean Associations, German Canadian Congress, Hellenic Canadian Congress, the National Congress of Italian Canadians, the Ukrainian Canadian Canadian Committee and the United Council of Filipino Associations.

I met with these people and I know they tried to meet with the minister. I hope they did. They are absolutely furious and insulted that the government would take $4.1 million from the cultural enrichment programs, which are the language programs that their associations support for their communities. They give the statistics again of how many children this involves.

They are opposed to these regressive and ill-conceived measures. The coalition is composed of nine national organizations which represent some seven million Canadians. They state:

> We realize that we must all contribute to the reduction of the national deficit. But this should not occur at the expense of the equality of cultures nor should it be used as a means to do away with multiculturalism. The people of Canada would be better served if there were as strong a commitment to multiculturalism as there apparently is to maintaining the public image of federal Ministers. In fact, each Minister's personal operational budget in this fiscal year will increase by 16 per cent—

That is an interesting figure the Canadian Coalition gives us.

They deplore the government's action and urge that this be corrected by the immediate reinstatement of cultural enrichment programs. And so do we.

Another matter which concerns us very much is the aboriginal people of Canada. In the definition of heritage language it includes the languages of aboriginal people of Canada. This is an error that must be corrected. The aboriginal people do not want to be included in any of the multicultural programs. They are the original first nations of Canada, of this nation, and their languages are unique throughout the world. They are unique Canadian indigenous languages. They are not imported languages. There are some 53 languages and I was told that only three of those are languages that are not threatened. Therefore, it is probably even more important that aboriginal people have an institute to fund, to sustain, to encourage the development and to research into aboriginal languages.

We agree, as do aboriginal people, that an institute such as that proposed by the member for the Western Arctic in her private member's Bill C-269, an act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation, is the way to go. We would like to see the government give funding for a separate institute or foundation, if that is what people want to call it, for aboriginal people. They should not be lumped into this institute in Edmonton.

I am amazed that there was not closer consultation by the people who developed this, not just with one or two educated native people, whom I understand they may have consulted with, but with the grassroots, with native organizations across the country that feel so strongly about this.

We oppose very much that funds to this institute would take away from aboriginal languages. It is very important that both are funded.

The Canadian Ethnocultural Council has also taken a very strong position on this matter. It made a very good proposal when it asked for an amendment to the definition of languages in the bill and for aboriginal languages to be removed from the definition of heritage languages. We will come back to this point in committee.

One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Kamloops, will be speaking in greater length on the whole question of aboriginal languages. We feel it is a very vital point and probably one of the most important priorities for the government in this whole field.

In some ways Bill C-37 is already out of date and it must be updated. The objectives of the institute were established in the earlier bill before the minister had time to withdraw these federal funds. It is very important when we go to committee that we look at this issue very carefully. It was before the minister emasculated the whole meaning of this institute by cutting out the front line heritage language classes. As I say, not enough consideration was given to the fact that aboriginal people do not want to be included in multicultural heritage language programs.

Because the situation has changed so drastically, I would urge the minister to consider an amendment to Bill C-37—and I believe that the Canadian Ethnocultural Council has also suggested this—which would provide an addendum to the functions of the institute. It could be included in one of the clauses that refers to other responsibilities and would allow the institute to give some direct funding to heritage language classes. This might be one way that would make people more appreciative of the institute.

It may not be that this would need to be used right away, if the government reinstates funding, which we want it to do, but it is something that should be more flexible. There may be certain languages that as yet do not have classes or teachers that the institute would give particular priority to helping to fund and establish in communities. That should be added to the bill.

I know that many community organizations would feel much more positive about this institute if it had more practical value in assisting to develop language programs in their communities which they feel are needed. I do not think that they are going to have too much sympathy for an elite academic service which is largely for professional linguists at the university level. They are certainly not going to feel very happy about it if they are losing funds for their own programs.

I have received a number of suggestions from the president of the Saskatchewan organization for heritage language programs, Mr. Shakeel Akhtar, which will be very helpful in committee as well. I would like to thank him for these suggestions and ask that other people contribute. I hope the committee will hear from witnesses and will tour the four western provinces so that we can get input about this bill and about the need for heritage language programs generally.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, probably the three highest language priorities for federal dollars for languages should be the reinstatement of funding for English as a second language for immigrants of all ages, not just people going into the workforce but mothers who are still at home, grandparents who want to be able to communicate and become part of Canada, and for children in school as well who need much more.

Australia has one program that provides ESL classes—and in our case it would include French as well—for all immigrants regardless of their ages. That is what we should have in Canada, but instead of that the government has cut back.

We also think that a priority is to establish funding for aboriginal languages and, as I said, my colleague will elaborate on that.

Third, we feel it is very important to reinstate funding for heritage language classes in communities, taking this money from the minister of trade's $14 million if necessary.

• (1650)

In summary, we will support a heritage language institute provided that there is a restoration of funding for community heritage language classes, provided that aboriginal languages are funded separately under the administration of native people, and provided that there are assurances that the institute services will be decentralized and accessible in the four western provinces.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to express my support for the passage of the Canadian Heritage Language Institute bill. This legislative initiative will take an important lead in introducing a new era of federal support to Canada's heritage languages.

Many language groups from across Canada have called on our leadership in a promotion of this rich and living resource. They have been highly supportive of all efforts to realize the potential of an institute. They have witnessed the evolution of this government's commitment to heritage languages, a process marked by a new direction and application of our efforts.

We are providing leadership at the federal level to ensure that these languages continue to give expression to our multicultural character. The Canadian Heritage Language Institute is a symbol of our new approach and will ensure that heritage languages continue to make significant strides toward mainstream Canadian life.

More and more people now understand that heritage language programs are not mechanisms for fostering sentimentality. They are the life source for our cultural communities and a vehicle to transmit culture from one generation to the next. Indeed they are a genuine source of cultural enrichment for all Canadians.

The institute will match ideals with practical means to achieve them. It will promote new ways and means to ensure the use, acquisition and retention of all languages that contribute to Canada's multicultural identity. One way it will achieve this objective is through the development of better teacher training and language programs and Canadian oriented learning materials. The institute will also conduct practical research into all aspects of Canada's heritage languages.

The institute will put an end to isolated research and will place a new emphasis on applied research. Above all, it will address the practical needs of particular language groups, help to and meet these needs where they matter most: in our classrooms.

The institute will be located in Edmonton. It will work closely with organizations, groups and individuals from all over Canada to encourage the preservation and use of Canada's many heritage languages.

The board of directors will consist of knowledgeable and experienced individuals with expertise in the area of heritage languages.

The institute will tap the collective knowledge of experts from across the country: linguists, teachers, language specialists, and scholars. It will make use of the language skills and cultural understanding of individuals of all origins living within our borders.

While the institute will represent a collaborative effort, it will also play a leadership role by helping achieve nationally acceptable standards of teaching for the successful retention of heritage languages.

To be worth while our response and assistance must be timely, with a view toward future horizons. The institute will also have sufficiently broad scope to respond to contemporary challenges.

Since the institute will be incorporated federally as a charitable organization, its financial resources can be augmented by outside funds. In particular, we hope the institute will be successful in encouraging the support of provincial agencies and ethnocultural communities. The money allocated for the institute is nothing less than an investment in our cultural identity.

Charles Berlitz, the pioneer of multilingual instruction, compared living in this world and speaking one language to "living in an enormous mansion and staying in one room".

As Canadians we cannot close doors on the vast potential for growth offered by our multicultural identity. Heritage languages open a door to untold opportunities and potential for Canada.

I am proud to support the establishment of the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute as a contemporary way to promote the development of Canada's rich linguistic heritage.

I urge my fellow parliamentarians to join me in supporting this important piece of legislation as we seek to fulfil the promise of this innovative yet also truly human institution. In the long run we can be confident in the knowledge that our support to this institute has contributed to building a truly multicultural society where the needs of our people are our greatest priority.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglington—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I imagine this applause is for the opposition, and I am referring to the Liberals, before they start speaking to a subject that is very important to the spirit of this country, the soul of its people and the vision this country wants to give Canadians of their future.

When I hear people— I see my colleague from Quebec who probably thinks this subject is far too complex for his lights. I will switch to another language unless he shows some appreciation of the subject we are discussing today.

Madam Speaker, I find it hard to understand why we are talking about this matter in very vague terms and also with a certain amount of condescension.

Madam Speaker, why are we talking about multiculturalism and heritage languages in a way that reflects shallow principles and statistics and figures without substance, when we should really be talking about the identity of this country? When I think about what I heard today in this debate, I wonder whether there is a basic problem when we talk about multiculturalism and the identity of this country. Personally, as I have said before in this House, when we talk about the multicultural character of Canada, we at the same time accept the distinct identity of all the various groups that together form this mosaic. To me, language is essential to express the identity of each of these groups. I believe that my friends and colleagues from Quebec, and they perhaps more so than others, will understand the significance of language for all ethnocultural groups in this country. What I have to say is perhaps more for their benefit because they can appreciate the true essence of language.

[English]

I heard various speakers address the question of the purposes of this institute. They are all valid. They are all acceptable. They talk about integration and the importance of bringing ESL studies in order to teach all of those new vast hordes of peoples coming into our nation those languages which are important for integration into the mainstream, whether that be English or whether that be French.

I heard them talk about setting up a model for establishing that which is necessary for a valid heritage lane program, be it in the question of developing resources, be it in the question of developing materials, techniques for training teachers or for establishing national standards for the teaching of a heritage language and training teachers so that they would be able to produce the kind of work in the classroom that would reflect those standards which are Canadian.

• (1700)

Madam Speaker, this surprises me.

[English]

I am really surprised to hear things such as this. Recently, we heard the minister acknowledge, as we all do, that education standards in the classroom are under provincial jurisdiction. Perhaps one of the great tragedies of this country is that we do not have enough national standards for our two official languages. We are going to impose national standards on the establishment of heritage language studies.

A Canadian context for the establishment of studying Cantonese and a Canadian standard for teaching Italian. Does the minister want to establish a Canadian context for the appreciation of materials that will help in the understanding of Spanish, whether the student comes from Ecuador, from Castille, from Mexico or from Argentina?

If we are going to recognize that this country is truly multicultural, and if we really are serious about establishing a centre that fosters, promotes and enhances the study of heritage languages, then we have to be serious about the diction that we employ. We cannot on the one hand support a centre that imposes a new image of Canada that recognizes the demographic reality represented by 8 to 9 million Canadians who are of neither francophone nor anglophone origins but share a great equality that we have established in this country.

We cannot in a most condescending fashion, dictate that they will learn their language in a way that we think reflects Canada when we do not accept those same standards for establishing a milieu when studying English or French. You might remember just a few days ago, Madam Speaker, the Sorecom poll that indicated that in Quebec the residents are, increasingly, beginning to think of themselves as Québecois.

That sends shutters of fear everywhere. As I read the rest of the Sorecom poll, it gave me an indication that one of the things that is happening in Quebec and everywhere else—perhaps this government is beginning to recognize it—with the establishment of this particular institution, is that people are beginning to take great pride in the means by which they express their individuality, their character, their aspirations and, in fact, their very existence.

Language is the soul and expression of everything that we aspire to, and everything that we live. We use it to express our emotions, the love we have for our families, the aspirations we have for our children, and to conduct our business.

I am not of English or French origin. I had to learn both languages. English is not the language that I use when I speak and communicate with my family; nor is French the one that I use when I conduct business. I really do not appreciate anyone telling me what my cultural and linguistic metropolis should be, whether it is in Edmonton by a group of academics, scholars or linguists who come together to establish a linguistic national standard for the way that I address my family, with the experiences that I have had in this country and before.

Madam Speaker, if you will permit me, in my own language—

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Italian.]

[Translation]

I cannot allow another to dictate to me how I should express my thoughts, experiences, aspirations, the love I have for my family, my culture, the manner in which the history of my people developed and continues to develop, and how to express the very essence of my being and character. I cannot permit this, especially when funds are being cut in one area, and an effort is being made in another to camouflage it. I find this intolerable.

[English]

Madam Speaker, I wanted to express these views, which I stated already in English.

The hon. minister gave us an indication that a true appreciation of the heritage language character, the multicultural character of Canada, should be expressed with great pride, without shame, without reservation, but with a sense of acceptance and equality, whether it be Italian, Spanish, or in Yiddish as he spoke earlier when he introduced the bill.

As I said in Italian a moment ago, one can accept this particular concept of establishing the institute even in the context of having cut $4.1 million from a heritage language program. That cut is clearly unacceptable, and is certainly inconsistent with the kinds of principles the minister presents to us today in consideration of the bill. I think he would agree with that.

I think he might also agree that while the Secretary of State contributes close to $300 million for education and promotion of two official languages in a domain that goes clearly beyond the federal jurisdiction, it is a valid and valuable exercise nevertheless. In that context, however, this institute will not be given the kind of mandate that would suggest that we have made funds available to one-third of the population that regards another language as its method of expressing its psyche, its character and its aspirations.

I want to applaud the minister for having taken the initiative to establish such an institute. At the same time, I want to reserve the right as an opposition member to criticize and analyse whether this institute will be practicable in the context of a budget that calls for cutting away opportunities which permit the expression of heritage language. I find the inconsistency virtually unacceptable. I say it is virtually unacceptable because I know we will get this institution.

I want the government to understand very clearly that academics and scholars who will operate out of Edmonton on an international basis will do nary a whit for all these children in Toronto where the funds available for them to practise their language, my language. My children are personally affected. Those children will go into class with well qualified people, but people who do not meet the standards presented by the Department of Education in Ontario. They talk about a different type of educational system and a different type of program. I do not know whether this institute will be able to set the kinds of standards that I will be happy with as a parent.

I want my children, and I know I speak for many Canadians who desire the same things for their own children, to be able to study the language of their origin in the language and environment in which their parents feel comfortable. The integration process involves family members being able to relate to each other in a dignified fashion that respects the past, origins, cultures and history, and which is expressed in a language that is alive, current and contemporary. The minister will understand this, because he has given us a personal example of his own history. It is not classed in the parochial confines of, what we would say, one country.

Madam Speaker, there is a no more proud Canadian than the one that stands before you this moment. There is at least one Canadian who says "I want to be able to dictate how I learn my language and how I want my children to learn my language. I want to make sure the minister understands that the funds be available for them to practise their language in the way that funds are available for every other language, including the two official ones, especially when it comes under the area of federal jurisdiction, which is outside the parameters of both the BNA Act and the amended Constitution Act. I refer obviously to education. If we are going to be involved then we will do it on a much more equitable basis and I charge the minister to do that, and take that spirit along with his initiative on this institute.

• (1710)

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member who made such an eloquent speech to give his views about inclusion of the aboriginal languages in this institute. If he looks at the bill he will see that the definition of heritage languages includes aboriginal languages. I think native people to whom we have spoken, including many organizations, are very upset about this. They feel there is quite a difference between their languages and the need to protect them, being unique to Canada.

If there is not an Italian class in Toronto Italian will still survive. We want all kinds of Italian classes in Toronto and elsewhere, but the languages of the native people are dying out and if there is not something to develop them they will become non-existent. This is a loss not only to them but to all of us, in fact to the culture of the world.

Now they say, and this is not surprising, that they want any such institute for aboriginal languages to be under their jurisdiction. It should be under a board which would include native people and there should be experts from their communities who are developing and teaching these languages. They want it to be under their control and funded directly. This means there should be money set aside for that program. To immerse it in an institute that is teaching all kinds of languages and where the majority of the staff is not likely to be aboriginal is not the way it should go. I wonder what his views would be on that.

Mr. Volpe: Madam Speaker, I want to suggest to the hon. member that if there are no longer Italian classes in Toronto perhaps Italian may still prosper and flourish in Italy. But the soul of Italian Canadians will have been extinguished in Canada. There are only about a million of us in all of Canada, and only about 600,000 in Toronto and environs. That may not be a significant figure to many people; it certainly is significant to me—just as it is significant for all Canadians to be able to use language as a means of expressing their total being and character.

I find no problem with aboriginal Canadians thinking in terms of having standards they think are appropriate, not only for the maintenance of their language but the promotion of their language, so that the spirit of their being is not only protected—and I think we have to go much beyond that—but is allowed to flourish. If it would flourish to the extent that it spills over and is then appreciated by others as a focus point not only for study but for communication, so be it.

I have to take the minister at his word when he says that the establishment of this centre is not going to preclude the establishment of one for an aboriginal similar type program. I will take him at his word. The hon. member may not.

What I do not agree with is that there is a suggestion some place that there are those who fit into the multicultural definition and those who do not. Perhaps I did not make it very clear although I tried very hard, but as far as I am concerned this country is multicultural. There is an ethnic language called English; there is an ethnic language called French; there is an ethnic language called Italian; there is a heritage language called something else, whatever that case may be.

It is true that on an official basis for legal, traditional, economic needs, we use two languages. I recognize the importance of that but, if we are going to achieve total equality in this country, then we have to respect each other in the way that we express our experiences with and among each other. If, in this House, in our laws, and throughout the nation, we use French or English as the means by which we access government and justice, then so be it.

I caution the member not to think in terms of excluding ourselves from the multicultural concept. I can think of and treat everyone as equal because to me they are all part of that same multicultural, ethnocultural mosaic. Whether their particular language has a specific focus is another matter and I do not want to contest that. I want, for all others in Canada, the same kinds of considerations that I know the member would like to have for that particular group.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to join members here in speaking to this bill which deals with the issue of heritage languages in our country.

I cannot get into my remarks very far without noting, for the record, the nature of the riding that I represent, Scarborough—Rouge River. It is a riding that has many new Canadians who have brought with them their own languages from other countries around the world. One of those languages is English, but the proportion of others is so great that, as I look to my own riding executive, almost everyone on it brings with him or her another language beside English. This has made us in our community stand and deal with the issue of first language, second language, and heritage language.

As we all know, this country has been founded on diversity, so much so that many of us wonder from time to time how we ever managed to bind the country together in the first place. To begin with, we have many native tongues still spoken across the country by the aboriginal community. I think it is fair to say that this is an area where the country has not paid enough attention to fostering the continuance of the native languages for our aboriginal peoples.

Culture rides on the back of language. Language is a vehicle that carries culture and, in many cases, the continuance of valid and rich native cultures is in jeopardy.

In my riding—I am sure it is true for many urban ridings—there are many languages being spoken on the street: Greek; Italian; German; Chinese, by some 30,000 constituents, both Mandarin and Cantonese; Filipino; the south Asian languages of Hindi, Urdu, Punjabi, and others; Japanese; Armenian; Spanish; and Portuguese.

My native tongue is English, and there are others who, of course, speak the other founding language, French.

Bill C-37 is intended to assist the country, its educational institutions, and its community institutions to rationalize, Canadianize, consolidate and manage the delivery of heritage language education. Why do we feel it necessary to do that? I suggest to the House that every single heritage language that we have—and perhaps I could just walk away from the word "heritage" and say every single language that is spoken in this country—is an asset.

I believe they are assets to the country in the same way that our museums and art galleries attempt to acquire and secure representations and manifestations of our history and culture. Perhaps a terrible example of that is Voice of Fire, which is not Canadian at all. We have in existence in Canada something which is not artificial and created by artifice but true and living languages which we now recognize as being an asset for all Canada. I know that we would be remiss if we did not attempt, as a country, to organize and assist in the furtherance of the teaching of those languages for all the children who will come after us.

There is a problem that we run into. We have already run into it in my riding and in other parts of the country. The public school board in Scarborough has now realized that the influx of large numbers of new Canadians bringing with them languages of birth, that is original languages other than English or French, has become a very serious problem for elementary and high schools in communities where large numbers of new Canadians settle. This becomes a very serious problem in a community that prides itself on its quality of education.

Where you have significantly large numbers of students who do not speak English or French as their first language, the school board has an obligation, if it is going to teach them at all, to provide them with additional supplementary training in the English language. At the same time, the study programs of these students is damaged severely by their inability to undertake programs in English or French as a first language. As a result, there is a real danger that in some parts of our country an entire generation of students is not receiving the standard of education in English or French needed to carry on with their lives and to be successful in Canada. That is the problem we run up against in a riding where there are a lot of heritage languages.

I regard this statute as an opportunity for the country to step into the field of heritage language and to assist Canadians who have a heritage language other than English, French, or a native tongue. I suppose I should be including natives as well because they are mentioned in the bill, but they may in fact warrant special attention and I will not speak to that directly. The statute will give the opportunity to the country to get into the field and assist in consolidating the delivery of the education in those heritage languages, to set priorities, and to provide a Canadian focus. The net result will be to produce continuing generations of Canadians who will know other languages and all the value that has for Canada.

In addition, it will be at least a small step in reducing indirectly the barrier of intolerance that exists across the country in the general population to other languages and cultures. That does not mean intolerance on the part of someone who happens to be English-speaking, French-speaking, or native tongue-speaking. It applies to anyone, of any culture or language, being intolerant of the language of another group or person.

By willingly and aggressively undertaking the task of locating management and finance, and the setting of priorities in the field of heritage language, we will at least in part address the need to overcome those barriers of intolerance.

While there are challenges in many urban ridings such as mine, I am convinced that a real initiative, not just a cosmetic one, that can follow implementation of a bill like this, will produce benefits for all Canadians right across the country.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to participate in today's debate on Bill C-37, an act to establish a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. I speak with mixed feelings about the legislation.

In my constituency, there is a large variety of ethnocultural communities dominated by Italians, Sikhs, Germans, Ukrainians, Norwegians, Finns, Swiss, Swedes, and I could go on. It gives the community of Kamloops a special richness that one may not find in all communities. When it became known to the various organizations that reflect those communities, there was some rejoicing that finally we were going to take a serious step toward recognizing the heritage languages in Canada by establishing an institute in Edmonton to promote and encourage the development of heritage languages.

On the other hand, the interpretation of heritage language in the bill states:

> "heritage language" means a language, other than one of the official languages of Canada, that contributes to the linguistic heritage of Canada, and includes any aboriginal language;

It is that particular phrase, "and includes any aboriginal language", that was brought to my attention by all the chiefs and band councils in my constituency. They said to me that in their minds their language was not one of the heritage languages and ought not to be considered alongside the various ethnocultural groups and their languages in this institute. They represented the founding languages of Canada. They settled the country of Canada, or the area we call Canada now, and settled it thousands of years ago, literally thousands and thousands of years. They had flourishing cultures, dynamic languages in terms of communication and rich, dynamic communities. To find themselves attached to an institute with a variety of other heritage languages was something they could not understand. Their languages are unique to here. The only place you will find the Haida language is in Canada.

I certainly respect the value of the institute and the promotion of languages such as Italian, Ukrainian, and so on. The point is that these languages do not live or die as a result of this institute. In Canada, they may and that is why it is so important. Over all, this is not life and death situation. However, for aboriginal languages that is the case. There are 53 aboriginal languages across Canada and only three can we identify as being safe and secure in terms of their ability to carry on. It is a real struggle for all of the others.

One of the reasons we have this struggle is that last year the Secretary of State spent $500 million on official languages, encouraging the development and promotion of English and French in Canada. And we support that, of course. But only $1 million was spent on aboriginal languages. I think we can make a case, with aboriginal languages being the founding languages of Canada, that it would not be unreasonable to expect that substantially more money be put into the development, encouragement and promotion of those languages.

However, the situation is going to worsen now. If you look at the bill, you will notice that only $1.3 million will be spent each year on all the heritage languages which, at the moment, includes aboriginal languages. So the situation is actually going to worsen, to say nothing of the almost embarrassing announcement by the government not long ago that it is going to cut back on native communications, on native publications and the ability of native organizations to communicate with one another. For any culture to maintain itself, it must have the ability to communicate. Language is the culture. The medium is the message, if you like.

At a time when we are encouraging aboriginal peoples toward self-determination, self-reliance and self-government, when we are trying to establish in a whole variety of ways self-reliance among native people, to say we are going to cut back serious funding for native publications and native media, I thought was, quite frankly, marginally embarrassing. The native community, of course, to this day cannot believe that it is happening.

That is why the native communities are so concerned that they not be part of the heritage institute. They have some interesting support. A letter written by the President of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council to the minister responsible says the following: "On behalf of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council executive committee, I am writing to urge that the aboriginal languages be removed from the definition of heritage languages in Bill C-37, the bill to establish the Canadian Heritage Language Institute."

Here we have the umbrella organization, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, agreeing with aboriginal people across the country that they ought to have their own institute, or their own version of institutes, or their own facility to promote the founding languages of the country so that native people can communicate among themselves.

We are simply agreeing with the Canadian Ethnocultural Council on this particular suggestion. My hon. colleague from Vancouver East made an excellent presentation. I have heard a lot of excellent speeches in this House by members from all sides, but the speech today by the member for Vancouver East must be one of the most thoughtful and compassionate speeches we have heard in this House for a long time. She pointed out some of the strengths as well as shortcomings in the legislation before us and indicated that she wants to move appropriate amendments to improve the legislation.

She also referred to the staggering rate of illiteracy among native people, something which we should keep in the back of our minds as we consider funding for the appropriate system to encourage aboriginal languages.

I said that there were 53 aboriginal languages in the country, 50 of which are endangered. The 53 aboriginal languages are grouped into 11 language families, six of which are found exclusively in British Columbia and Yukon. The Haida, Kootenayan, Salishan, Tlingit, Wakashan and Tsimshian languages are all perilously close to extinction. Well, extinction might be too strong a word to associate with the state of the languages, but perhaps not. They, particularly the young people taking advantage of the elders of the tribes, are struggling to develop an understanding and appreciation of and competency in these languages.

The Assembly of First Nations' Declaration on Aboriginal Language states:

> The Aboriginal Languages were given by the Creator as an integral part of life. Embodied in Aboriginal Languages is our unique relationship to the Creator, our attitudes, beliefs, values, and the fundamental notion of what is truth.
> Aboriginal Language is an asset to one's own education, formal and informal. Aboriginal Language contributes to greater pride in the history and culture of the community; greater involvement and interest of parents and the education of their children; and greater respect for Elders.
> Language is the principal means by which culture is accumulated, shared and transmitted from generation to generation. The key to identity and retention of culture is one's ancestral language.

Those are beautiful words which I think come to the very heart of the point being made, that is, the need to have a separate initiative from the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute to establish a foundation for aboriginal languages.

I might also emphasize the point made by my hon. colleague for Vancouver East in terms of the consultative process that went into the formation of this legislation. You know, Madam Speaker, that Bill C-37 was influenced by a consultant's report prepared for the then Secretary of State, David Crombie, back in December of 1987. One hundred and thirty groups and individuals were consulted or invited to submit briefs during the consultation process, yet only three academics knowledgeable in native affairs were consulted, two from St. Thomas University in Fredericton and one from the University of Alberta. Not a single national aboriginal representative organization was consulted in the process of drafting the bill nor was there any consultation with native experts or native groups across the country.

I think this is a gross oversight and, as a result, the government has made this woeful error of lumping in aboriginal languages with heritage languages generally. I think the minister understands the error of that decision and we will look forward, in committee, to changing this whole matter.

We would be remiss if we did not say what it is we are advocating. In the moments remaining I want refer to Bill C-269 which is an act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation, sponsored by the hon. member for Western Arctic. I want to read the purpose of this foundation as set out in this bill.

> The purpose of the Foundation is to facilitate throughout Canada the acquisition, retention and use of aboriginal languages that contribute to the country's aboriginal heritage by
> (a) promoting, through public education and discussion, the learning of aboriginal languages and their benefit to aboriginal peoples of Canada;
> (b) providing the public with information about aboriginal language resources;
> (c) developing programs to improve the quality of aboriginal language instruction;
> (d) assisting in the production and dissemination of Canadian-oriented materials related to the study of aboriginal languages;
> (e) assisting in the development of standards for the learning of aboriginal languages;
> (f) conducting research into all aspects of aboriginal languages;
> (g) establishing scholarly and professional links between the Foundation and universities, colleges and other organizations and persons interested in the Foundation's work;
> (h) ensuring the perpetuation, revitalization, growth and protection of aboriginal languages;

(i) responding to the needs of aboriginal communities as each community is in the best position to determine what is needed to ensure the survival and functional use of its languages;

(j) providing the funding required to enable communities to develop and control the process, resources and activities needed to promote their languages; and

(k) undertaking any other activities in furtherance of its purpose.

• (1740)

I cannot imagine anything that would be more appropriate as a beginning in launching a foundation to establish aboriginal languages securely across the country.

In conclusion, we support half of the principle of this bill. We have serious concerns about the other half of the principle of the bill since it includes aboriginal languages as part of the heritage language definition.

The Shuswap nation in central British Columbia has spent a considerable amount of not only financial resources but human resources in developing their language and support literature, books and research for the enhancement and development of the Shuswap language. They have struggled on minimal resources.

I hope and pray that as a result of this initiative to create an institute of Canadian heritage languages, and through recognition by all of us that we must take a special initiative in terms of aboriginal languages through a foundation or some other course, that funding, support and encouragement will be forthcoming in the future to all native organizations which wish to enhance and expand their ability to communicate within their cultural groupings through language, both written and spoken.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my friend on his presentation to the House. I also congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver East for her excellent dissertation on this matter.

There are a number of things about the legislation that bother me somewhat. Although the idea appears to be an excellent one, there are to be fairly massive expenditures of money. There is $800,000 to constitute the capital endowment fund and an additional $500,000 to be expended for the purpose of the institute.

The expenditures, I suppose, are to be commended except when looked at in the context of what we have just seen happening in this last budget with cuts to English as a second language and cuts to citizenship and language training. I wonder what good a heritage language institute will be if there is no money for heritage language classes.

Section 10 of the bill sets out very nicely that the chairperson and the other directors shall be paid such fees for their attendance at meetings of the institute and for work performed for the institute as are fixed by the Governor in Council. We have no way of knowing what this will be. I am looking at these expenditures of money at a time when there are cutbacks. Although the idea is a good one, I would suggest that there is some hypocrisy in the government setting up an institute at a time when it is cutting out other programs that help in the binding of this country together as a mosaic.

We have often heard some very good ideas brought in with much fanfare, but as soon as the government gets the program instituted it seems to run on the rocks of the finance department's shoreline and the good idea sinks on those rocks. Does my friend have any comments comparing this program to other programs in the past that started out as a good idea but, because of funding cuts by the Department of Finance, were scuttled?

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question. I suppose it is a matter that is on the minds of many people watching or listening in, who are concerned about how serious are the government's intentions of proceeding with the heritage institute and supporting aboriginal languages.

This is no reflection on the minister—I am certain that the minister is sincere—but I do remember on a number of occasions the huge fanfare and announcements about the Polar 8 contract for British Columbia. Finally, after all sorts of promises, fanfare and so on we were to have this Polar 8 icebreaker built which would provide jobs. It was to be a symbol of British Columbia. I notice my hon. friend from the Fraser Valley is here. He will remember those days. We all felt proud that finally British Columbia was going to get something. I remember bands playing, people cutting ribbons, fireworks, and everything else.

Then of course nothing happened; it all fizzled out. The government said: "We are sorry. We have changed our mind. We cannot do that any more". British Columbians felt as though someone had jammed a dagger in their stomach one more time. We are looking like a pin cushion out there. We are getting jammed and jabbed all of the time.

My friend is absolutely correct to ask whether the government is serious this time. It sounds good. On paper it is a great idea. I guess we will just have to wait and see. It is easy to say all these things, but of course the commitment must be there financially to make it work.

When I see the government cutting back on native publications, language training programs for new Canadians, and ESL courses in the west, I just wonder how serious the government is in its commitment to the development and encouragement of heritage languages. I can only assume by its actions that it is not serious. Let us hope that there has been an enlightenment, a change of mind, and that as a result of this legislation today the government will start putting its money where its commitments are verbally.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure and a privilege to stand in support of the principle of this bill.

The establishment of a Heritage Language Institute is certainly a step in the right direction of supporting our commitment as Canadians to a multicultural society and to something which has been happening at the grassroots of Canada for many decades now, that is teaching young people in particular whose families come from a different cultural background based in a different language how to speak that language, how to relate through that to the culture of their family's origin and how to relate through that to other parts of the world and other peoples of the world.

As we all know, as we face a changing global economy, as we face the tremendous challenges of the global environment, as we face the challenges of learning to live peacefully together on this earth, the ability to communicate with and relate to people all around the globe becomes an increasing strength, not only for an individual but for a nation.

That is what many people who have come to Canada over the generations have done. That is the foundation they have built for Canada as a nation to play a stronger role on the globe and to play a stronger role in some of the major issues confronting the world in the next decade and indeed in the third millennium.

The institute is intended to support, as I said, what has been happening throughout Canada for decades now and for well over a century in the case of some language groups, that is the teaching of heritage languages and all that goes with it. It is for that reason that in rising today to comment on the bill I cannot avoid commenting as well on the fact that it raises some spectres of empty promises and empty shells of institutions when in the same year that the government brings forth this bill it has also obliterated any direct federal funding for heritage language programs.

I met recently with perhaps 60 people in the national capital region. Where better to represent the essence of Canada? These were people represent over 50 schools where heritage languages are taught in this region. I want to mention a few of them because I think it is important that people know the richness and wealth of different cultural backgrounds that exist in our communities, not only here in the national capital region but across Canada.

We have schools teaching Armenian, Arabic, Lebanese, Bengali, Hebrew, Yiddish, Aramaic, Tamil, Spanish, Czechoslovakian, Mandarin, Lithuanian, Dutch, Finnish, German and Urdu. We have schools teaching Greek, Hindi, Hungarian, Italian, Khmer, Laotian, Portuguese, Malayalam, Vietnamese, Japanese, Korean, Ukrainian, Punjabi, Filipino, Persian, Polish, Russian, Italian, Swahili, Sinhalese, Tulugu and Turkish.

We have a wealth in this country, a microcosm of the entire globe. The idea of supporting the continuation and enrichment of that is certainly one deserving of our support. Yet the people with whom I met and the people across this country who are in their own communities, their own schools and their own churches, in whatever place they can find to teach their children through the second, third and fourth generations the language of their family's origin, are concerned about whether they are going to be able to carry on those programs as effectively as they might.

The programs that are going to be most affected by the cut in funding the government has delivered this year are the smallest programs with the smallest pool of parents, families and community to draw on to support their schools. These are not schools that have ever been supported just by government. They have been supported by the communities, the families, and the businesses in those communities.

Those communities that are the poorest—and that often means the ones that have most recently arrived in Canada—absolutely need the kind of funding they are getting. They really question whether it is more important to continue the funding of the actual teaching of the languages than to fund an institute.

The smallest communities—and again those are often those which are newest to Canada with the least base to draw on—are those that are going to suffer most. Many of them are concerned about whether they can continue their program or will have to start charging fees such that the parents will not be able to afford them.

The newest schools, those that are just starting out of communities which are just getting established in Canada or have just reached a critical mass where having a school is a real possibility and which have all the start-up costs, are the ones that are deeply concerned their programs are going to be hurt by the funding cut that has hit them this year. They too question the priority of putting money into the actual teaching compared to the priority of putting money into an institute.

There is basic funding through the provinces for the teaching at heritage language schools, but that provides only a bare minimum. It does not provide enough to create a school. That is why there is such deep concern about the diversion of funding away from these programs. It does not provide enough to introduce the cultural element that keeps young children in school on a Saturday morning when all their friends are out playing, for three and sometimes four hours. The diversity of activities that teach them the language is what makes it meaningful for them, rather than just the book learning.

It is the federal funding that has provided those extra things which go into making a school and making a total cultural experience of the language. It is the federal funding that has allowed them to buy the books, the videos and all other things that go into a complete program. It is that which has allowed them to pay their teachers more than a bare honorarium, to avoid charging excessive fees to the parents, and to bring in all those extras that make a school function.

The people who run these heritage language schools talk to me about what they feel they contribute to their community, to the broader Canadian society, through their schools. They talk, as well, about how the schools are important in their integrating into Canadian society.

There is one school in my riding which is a virtual United Nations. It is wonderful to see. The children have over 27 different languages, most of which have been learned through their heritage language schools. They know their culture and they have learned that with the help of federal funding over the years. They are sharing that with other young people. They are building in other five, six, seven, eight and ten-year olds an understanding not only of their own backyard but of the world. They are building bridges between cultures right there in their classrooms, in their playgrounds, and in their social life with their friends before and after school.

They are making an invaluable contribution, not only to the personal experience of their fellow students but to what those other students bring to Canadian society, bring to their adulthood, and bring to Canada's role in the world.

Their schools also serve as a useful bridge in other ways between the broader society and the members of the family who are slower to integrate and slower to learn the language, and that often means the woman in the household who may be home looking after the children, who may be in a job to earn extra money to support the family where her learning of the language is hampered and where she simply does not have the opportunities that other members of the family have to learn the Canadian language. The heritage language schools become for the mothers and for other people in the community another bridge integrating them into Canadian society while they retain their own unique identity.

That is why the schools are concerned that at the same time as we are building and funding an institute we are cutting back the funding to the very heritage language teaching that the institute is supposed to support. They really question not whether the institute is a good idea but whether they are going to get the institute at the expense of the very programs the institute is supposed to assist and to enrich.

I will just refer in my last couple of minutes to what are the objectives of the institute. The first is the learning of heritage languages. We do not need an institute for that. For nearly 200,000 children across Canada that is already happening.

Mr. Nicholson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I believe if you will canvass the House you will find a disposition not to see the clock so that we might proceed with the second reading debate of Bill C–39.

Mr. Angus: I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. I concur with my hon. friend, but I would not want to leave the impression that the extension of the hours would allow for continuation of the debate on the bill that is before us. That is certainly not the intention and not why I have waited around. I had assumed that that bill, by agreement, was going to be completed in this particular stage this afternoon before we moved on to Bill C–39.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, to clarify the situation, my intention was to speak for no more than two or three additional minutes. Is the understanding that we will not see the clock until I have completed my speech, as I understand there are no other speakers, and that that will conclude the business for the day?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, the understanding reached through discussions among the House leaders was that we were to wrap up this debate and to complete debate on Bill C–39, which is to follow immediately thereafter. I am sure that the House is agreed that we will give the member another couple of minutes. We will not see the clock on the understanding that immediately after that each party will have a few moments to express itself on Bill C–39, which will also be passed at that time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1800)

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I was referring to the objects and why there is some concern that this institute not replace heritage language teaching across the country as it seems to have done in this budget year.

The institute has as one of its objectives to provide the public with information about heritage language resources. It can only do that to the extent that those resources are also supported and continued.

It also intends to produce materials for teaching. One of the problems is that it has been federal funding that has gone traditionally to the heritage language schools which has provided the extra funds we need to purchase those materials. They are a little sceptical about an institute providing materials for them which they concede are badly needed materials with Canadian content, materials that can be more easily acquired at a more reasonable price, but if they have no money to buy them, then those materials do not do them an awful lot of good.

While I personally agree and support the principle of this bill, I caution the government against thinking that funding an institute, or for that matter a department of multiculturalism, in any way replaces its obligation to fund the very programs in the communities at minimum cost to society. These programs are carried out by the communities themselves, with only a bit of support from the government.

This institute in no way replaces that obligation. That message is clear from the groups and schools I have spoken to. I deliver that message now to the minister.

I am certainly in support of the principle of the bill, with some of the provisos that have been mentioned already by previous speakers on the bill. But we are not finished yet with the funding for heritage language schools.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C–39, an Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the other members of the House who have co–operated to help move this important piece of legislation through the legislative process.

The Canadian Laws Offshore Application Act provides for the application of all Canadian law to the offshore and it is designed to reflect the sovereign rights and jurisdiction given to Canada by the modern Law of the Sea.

In preparing this legislation, the government has had three fundamental concerns in mind: legal certainty, Canadian sovereignty and co–operation with the provinces.

Before beginning with the issue of legal certainty, a few words of background about the concepts of international law that we are dealing with here will help bring the legal problem into clear focus. The bill is concerned with the application of Canadian law to installations on the Canadian shelf.

The general presumption is that Canadian law does not apply beyond the territorial limits of Canada unless there is some specific and express indication that it is intended to have such application. This means that there could potentially be serious questions about the applicability of Canadian laws to areas that are under our resource jurisdiction, but that lie beyond the 12–mile limit of our territorial sea. This is obviously a legal question of great importance. Bill C–39 is designed to remove this uncertainty.

The second of the three objects I mentioned a moment ago is the strengthening of Canadian sovereignty. The bill reflects our sovereignty concerns in a number of ways. Sovereignty is secured through the effective exercise of national jurisdiction, which is precisely what we aim to achieve by establishing a comprehensive legal regime in the offshore through the application of Canadian laws.

Another of our basic objectives is co–operation with the provinces in the context of offshore development. This is the spirit that has given birth to the Atlantic Accord and the Canada–Nova Scotia Accord, and it is the spirit that animates this legislation.

We have taken great care to ensure that the legislation is entirely neutral and non–prejudicial with respect to those provincial offshore claims that remain unsettled at this time. You will note, for example, that Clause 3 vests offshore rights and interests in Her Majesty in right of Canada. But it does so only with respect to areas that lie outside the limits of any province.

In addition to applying federal laws offshore, the legislation will establish a basis for the application of provincial and territorial laws to offshore areas outside the provinces and territories.

Clause 7 of the present bill will allow for the application of provincial and territorial legislation to the offshore on a more general and comprehensive basis. I should think that this provision will be especially useful in the context of ordinary private law matters such as contracts and tort claims, where we have no body of federal law that can be applied.

We recognize that the provinces and territories will want and expect consultations on the application of their laws to adjacent areas outside the provinces and territories.

Clause 7 will be proclaimed in force separately for each province or territory and each proclamation will require 60 days advance notice in The Canada Gazette. These requirements are designed to guarantee an opportunity for full consultation with each province or territory.

I would like to bring to your attention, Madam Speaker, a consequential amendment made necessary by the introduction of this bill. I attach particular importance to the application of our criminal laws to offshore activities. This will be accomplished both through the general provisions of the bill and through a series of amendments to the Criminal Code.

At present, with some exceptions, the code applies only within the territory of Canada and on Canadian ships and aircraft. We consider it essential that offences on installations operating on the continental shelf and under our jurisdiction should be be able to be tried in Canada.

The Criminal Code amendments will mean that our law will now be applicable to offences committed by a Canadian beyond the territory of any state.

I would like to point out that we have simplified and replaced provisions dealing with the world-wide application of Canadian criminal law to Canadian flag ships.

Finally, to complete the package, the legislation provides that the jurisdiction of the courts, federal, provincial and territorial, will extend to installations on the continental shelf in the same manner as if they had arisen on land. This, again, will eliminate the jurisdictional uncertainty that has been apparent in a number of decisions over the course of the last few years.

Madam Speaker, I take pleasure in asking the House to support this bill.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, first, let me thank the hon. member for Moncton for trading places with me tonight so that I can make my brief intervention and attend to the other business that we all have to do around this place.

Let me say at the outset that the member for Niagara Falls has clearly indicated the purpose of Bill C-39, and I will not go into that.

I would like to indicate that my caucus is in support of this legislation. We welcome the fact that the government has finally produced a bill that purports to protect Canadian sovereignty. It follows a steady stream of initiatives that have seriously eroded our control over our own destiny—the free trade deal, gutting foreign investment review, cutting the Polar 8, and acquiescing time and time again to U.S. foreign policy. It is nice to see the government moving the other way just for once.

We do have some concerns with the manner in which the legislation is to be implemented. For that reason we want to see the bill go to the legislative committee to deal with a number of questions. They are not major items. However, we think the principle of the bill is sound. It is to extend our jurisdiction in a number of ways beyond our 12-mile limit.

For example, we are concerned with the power that this bill gives to the Governor in Council. We need to know just what effect this bill would have to whole new areas that suddenly fall under provincial purview, for example, collective agreements, environmental laws, safety standards and labour laws.

It would appear that with a stroke of a pen—I realize it is not quite that simple—that Cabinet can switch on or off provincial or territorial laws in a particular offshore area at a whim. We want to be sure about the ramifications of those matters.

In terms of its application of provincial and territorial laws, the bill may in fact give additional powers to the federal government to control the tax, royalties and resource revenues that are currently going to the provinces. We want to make sure that that is not the case.

We would like to know more about how Cabinet may suspend the operation of certain labour standards to make an area's economy more attractive to large employers—in other words a federal version of the Michelin bill in terms of Atlantic Canada.

We want to know what the effect will be on the day-to-day lives of the people who work on the offshore, be they riggers, fishermen, sailors, or what have you.

We are concerned about the lack of appeal over and above the 60-day notification in The Canada Gazette. Because of the far-ranging nature of the kind of regulations that may be made, we are not sure that 60 days is an appropriate period of time.

These are the kinds of things that will be around for quite some time and have a major impact. Perhaps a period of 120 days or longer might be considered.

Finally, we support the principle of the bill. We welcome it. We wonder why it took from October 2 of last year to get to second reading. I notice in the draft paper that the House leaders are reviewing that it is not even on the agenda for completion of third reading by this summer. I question the government's commitment to move quickly on this matter. Certainly, we need the review of it but we are quite prepared, providing that we get satisfactory answers, to continue to support the bill and to move for its enactment as soon as possible.

I again thank my colleague for Moncton for trading spots with me. I thank the member for Niagara Falls for his intervention as well.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill C–39.

Our party, as well, supports this bill going to a legislative committee. We see that the bill has some definite progressive implications in the area of Canadian sovereignty, the application of federal and provincial laws and with the Criminal Code amendments.

As we see it, the bill is an attempt by the government to assert Canadian sovereignty over the Arctic and in our offshores generally, and it updates our laws in order to take into account the increased jurisdiction of coastal states under the Law of the Sea.

It sends a clear message to the international community that international waters and territorial seas are definitely part of Canada's concern. For that reason we support it.

It also confirms that the reference to internal waters or territorial seas includes a reference to the airspace above and the seabed and subsoil below. Those are important matters and issues to be considered.

It also takes into account the growing importance of the Arctic and the oil and mineral rights and assets of which exist there, something which we are most supportive.

As well, the bill recognizes that no longer can oil rigs be considered, but also other areas like production platforms, subsea installations, pumping stations and the like. These are all very positive aspects.

We are also pleased to see the Criminal Code amendments which allow us to have some hot pursuit and search, arrest and seizure provisions on the international seas as well as in our own waters.

It also makes Canadian laws applicable against Canadian fisheries in Canada and allows Canadian fisheries officials to carry out their duties on foreign vessels which, again, we see as positive.

I should say that we are looking forward to it going to the legislative committee. It needs detailed study, obviously in the area of the discretionary powers that are given to the Governor in Council.

There are concerns that the provision of the bill may subsequently be compromised or altered by regulation which can cause us some problems. It is essential that we have a very detailed study at the legislative committee stage.

This legislation looks at a new frontier, new definitions, and new players. It is very far–reaching in the areas of energy policy, environment, the Criminal Code, as well as natural resources such as fish and the like.

We are supportive of the bill. We will have other comments to make when the matter is before committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I am rising pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present yet another batch of petitions from Victoria against the goods and services tax.

We have already had thousands of signatures on petitions urging the rejection of this tax, and here are some more. The tide has not yet ceased. The people of Victoria, in overwhelming numbers, are asking the government to back off this unfair tax and to reform the tax system in a much fairer way than is presently proposed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with several hundred names of Canadian war veterans who belong to the Royal Canadian Legion branches in Blind River and Espanola, Ontario. They complain that the government has reduced homekeeping services to veterans and substantially increased the cost of long-term care.

They point out that veterans have already given a great service to the country and call on the House of Commons and Parliament of Canada to reject these budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise in the House today to present petitions signed by Canadians who are opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitions were circulated by residents who ask taxpayers to join them in a demonstration on Parliament Hill at noon on Saturday, May 12, to show that Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax proposed by the government.

To all those who do not speak French, Madam Speaker—

[English]

I would like to extend the same invitation; twelve o'clock, Saturday, Parliament Hill.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty, in accordance with Standing Order 36, to present a petition from residents of Toronto; Ottawa; Woodstock, New Brunswick; Saint John; Willowdale and Scarborough, Ontario; and Burnaby, B.C.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador to demand that the Canadian government end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada and oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training base at Goose Bay.

They ask that Parliament redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and livelihood, and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to table a petition, certified correct as to form and content, from members and friends of Branch 83 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Florence, Nova Scotia.

There are 100 signatures, and in part the petition states that the Government of Canada has introduced changes that will reduce homekeeping services to veterans and substantially increase the cost of long-term care.

Whereas the veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by these measures, the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject those budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition bearing 50 signatures. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to stop wasting our tax dollars and to reject the proposed goods and services tax. I fully support that position.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I, too, have a petition which I wish to present to the House. It is signed by people mainly from the Hull, Vanier, and Ottawa areas.

These people call upon Parliament to stop wasting the tax dollars and to reject the goods and services tax. They also invite people to a rally this Saturday.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, following in the footsteps of hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are opposed to the government's goods and services tax, today I wish to present another petition signed by Canadians who strenuously object to this tax and who want to come here next Saturday, May 12, to demonstrate their dissatisfaction with a government that wants to saddle Canadians with a new tax that will be regressive and very costly.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to present several petitions on behalf of my constituents showing the wide range of their dissatisfaction with the government.

Perhaps the first one I should present is on behalf of the veterans of Canada who fought for their country. They are objecting to the measures in the last budget that will place additional hardships on them by depriving them of proper services and increasing their financial hardship.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I have some other petitions from the farmers of Lambton—Middlesex, from Oil Springs, Petrolia, Bothwell, Alvinston, Camlachie and Wyoming, and even some from my colleague's riding of Kent.

The petitioners all object to the very high and injurious interest rates that are being imposed upon Canada and the farmers of Canada. They want the government to reinstate the fuel tax rebate and the interest free provisions of the advance payment for crops, to provide fair and equal market access for Canadian farm commodities, and to introduce agricultural policies that will encourage agricultural development in Canada.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I also have some other petitions to present. They are signed by various people from across my great riding. They are calling on the government to re-evaluate and upgrade the VIA Rail service cuts that took place across the country on January 1.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Finally, I have petitions from across the riding as well. The petitioners state that the federal government wants to impose on Canadians a new 7 per cent goods and services tax. They point out that this new tax will apply to books, magazines, newspapers, et cetera.

• (1120)

They point out, quite rightly, that this is the first time this would have been done since Confederation. The petitioners call on the government to exempt Canada's books, magazines and newspapers from the proposed goods and services tax.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise in the House today to present petitions signed by Canadians who are opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitions were circulated by residents who ask taxpayers to join them in a demonstration on Parliament Hill at noon on Saturday, May 12, to show that Canadians object to the goods and services tax proposed by the government.

[English]

I have several hundred signatures of people involved in and concerned about the whole area of reading. They have brought to our attention that Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers which are now proposed to be included in the GST. They feel that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a corner-stone of democracy, culture, and education, and that a literary and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application.

Therefore, the petitioners have asked the House to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Last, Madam Speaker, also in the interest of the concern around the GST, and perhaps joining us on Saturday on the Hill in the demonstration, will be people who are involved in occupational therapy, physiotherapy, social services, speech language pathology and audiology outside of public institutions.

They call upon Parliament not to impose the goods and services tax on any health care services, whether delivered in public institutions or in the community.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am tabling today a petition from Chibougamau concerning the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas. This community is without question an isolated area, and that is why your petitioners object to the recommendations in the Brunelle report.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, with a petition signed by constituents of Ottawa Centre.

The petition states: "If our tax dollars were spent wisely instead of being foolishly wasted, we would not have to be taxed to death. The Canadian government does not need more money from the taxpayers. It needs conscientious, responsible representatives that diligently manage the public purse and reject the proposed goods and services tax".

They will hold a rally this Saturday on the Hill.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I, too, have in my hands a petition signed by scores of Manitobans, including many from the riding of Winnipeg St. James. This petition in effect excoriates the goods and services tax. It lists a number of reasons showing just how pernicious this tax is.

The petitioners ask Parliament, once again, and particularly the government, to withdraw the tax because it will not be in the best interest of the Canadian economy.

I am aware of the rules, Madam Speaker, and I appreciate your umbrage, so I will not tell anyone that there is a rally this Saturday at noon.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, with a petition signed by a number of people from the Ottawa area.

These people see the goods and services tax that is making its way through the legislative process as the last straw in a series of tax measures that has made the tax system increasingly unfair. They call on the government to withdraw that measure and introduce fairness to the tax system. They, too, plan to be at the rally on Saturday that is not being mentioned with respect to these petitions.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I, too, am pleased to stand here this morning, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by many Canadians who are opposed to the GST.

These petitions have been circulated by citizens who are calling on taxpayers to join them at a rally on Parliament Hill on Saturday, May 12. I would personally like to invite the people of Nepean, my city, who are opposed to this tax to join me on Parliament Hill at noon this Saturday to demonstrate our opposition to the GST.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present petitions signed by Canadians who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions were circulated by people who ask taxpayers to join them for a rally on Parliament Hill at noon on Saturday, May 12 to show that Canadians are opposed to the government's proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present some petitions today. One relates to the goods and services tax.

The people of the country again petition the government opposite to come to its senses and withdraw this goods and services tax before it causes some harm to the economy of Canada. Again, they ask that we participate in the rally on Saturday at noon.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I also have petitions from veterans in my riding of Kenora—Rainy River who ask the government not to impose the added costs for home care services for veterans, thereby substantially increasing costs of long-term care.

These ladies and gentlemen, who are veterans of the wars in which Canada took part, ask the government not to put this burden on them. They feel they have paid their dues and that it is time for Canada to pay them back.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, I rise today to ask the Chair to rule favourably on my request for an emergency debate concerning the farm crisis, particularly in my own province of Saskatchewan.

I recognize that several of my colleagues in the last few of days have made the same request of the Chair. They have very eloquently and forcefully put forward the position of the farmers who are faced with decreases in the initial grain prices. Interest rates have increased and various other costs such as transportation costs have risen. There is a real crisis facing farmers today.

There is a new factor that has occurred in the last 24 hours. The Minister of Agriculture and the Premier of Saskatchewan have met. They reported, smiling, when they left the meeting, how happy they were that they had had successful discussions and so forth. Yet, no announcement is planned to be made.

The farmers in my home district and in the province of Saskatchewan in general need to know right away what the situation will be. They have to make decisions yesterday, today, and tomorrow on what their future will be.

Therefore, I ask the Chair to call upon Parliament to debate this issue, to stop this phoney war between the federal and provincial government, and to act so that my constituents and other farmers in Saskatchewan will be able to make their living and put the seed in the ground this year.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to thank the hon. member for his very eloquent plea.

We have studied this request very carefully and still feel that at this time it would not be appropriate to grant this request for an emergency debate. Maybe at some later date.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa

May 10, 1990

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Gérard V. J. La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, May 10, 1990, at 3.15 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Léopold H. Amyot
Secretary to the Governor General

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NORTHERN CANADA

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved:

That this House condemn the government for its lack of commitment to northern Canada and for its failure to treat northerners fairly and equitably as demonstrated by:

(1) its lack of commitment to economic diversification;

(2) deserting northern Ontario by slashing VIA Rail services;

(3) abandoning all northerners with its regressive unemployment insurance legislation;

(4) planning the cancellation of the northern residents deduction for isolated areas;

(5) imposing a 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber;

(6) cancelling the mining depletion allowance and flow-through share benefits for mining exploration;

(7) imposing a goods and services tax; and

(8) failing to implement adequate adjustment programs for single industry towns.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I have two matters. As a result of discussions among the parties I believe there is a disposition on the part of the House to continue to sit through the lunch hour today from 1 p.m. until 2 p.m. I believe that that would be accomplished by unanimous consent at this time rather than by a motion for extension of hours. I would ask for that concurrence now.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, in light of the co-operation demonstrated in this House yesterday when we were able to do a similar thing to expedite government business, we are more than happy to co-operate, with the assurance, of course, that there would be no dilatory motions, quorum calls, or other disruptive procedures.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, there has been consultation and we are quite prepared to support the proposal.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I may say that of course there will not be a quorum call by the opposition on an opposition day. It is the government that normally does that. They forget that opposition days are in fact on government business.

The other matter I wanted to raise concerns the length of speeches. We have a number of members who are interested in debating this motion today. Rather than have 20-minute speeches on our side, we would request that each of the speakers on our side be limited to 10 minutes with five minutes for questions and comments. That will apply throughout the day. If members of the other parties wish to do the same we have no problem with it but I am simply indicating our intentions and asking for the consent of the House to proceed in that fashion.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I have no problem with the Liberal party splitting their time. I believe that our speakers will take their full 20 minutes, but perhaps as in the past, we could indicate at the beginning of our speeches the length of time we are going to take. I do not think there will be any problem that way.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, of course we will co-operate with the Liberal request to split the time. We have no problem with that at all. We may well look at it ourselves later in the day but certainly our lead speaker will want to take the full time. We will indicate our intention to the Chair and the House at a later time during the day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I see that there is unanimous consent. The Chair is of the understanding that speeches of Liberal party members would all be 10-minutes. With other parties, I would appreciate being told the length of each speech as it would allow me to make things easier for the different speakers by telling them when there is a minute or two left, and allowing them to complete their interventions.

I will now recognize the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to discuss business that relates to northern Canada. It is a topic that is very dear to my heart. Not too long ago on a supply day, we on this side of the House debated the regional development programs and the effect the lack of those programs has had on northern Ontario and northern Canada and also the parts of Canada not considered to be in the mainstream of Canadian society.

I would like to talk today about the problems created by the government in northern Canada and specifically northern Ontario, which I know the best. As is said in the motion in front of us, there are many issues created by government that have affected northern Canada and northern Ontario.

I do not want to re-read the motion because I think it speaks for itself. It concerns the reduction in unemployment insurance, the cuts to VIA Rail to the mainline that ran through northern Ontario, the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber and the cancellation of the mining depletion allowances which has basically made the flow-through share mechanism useless. Finally, and possibly most severe to us, will be the imposition of the goods and services tax in the near future. These issues have been debated in the House already so I would like to talk about a few other issues in the time allotted to me.

There are two issues that we have not talked about, but I have had correspondence with ministers opposite trying to rectify them because of their direct effect to northerners and specifically, to single industry towns. One of those issues is Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. For those who are not familiar with this particular corporation, it has a mandate to help Canadians receive affordable housing.

CMHC has a policy concerning high-risk communities which relates specifically to mining communities in northern Ontario. Not too long ago I wrote the Minister of Housing to tell him of the particular problems this policy is creating in communities like Pickle Lake, Ignace and more than likely in the future, Red Lake and Golden. This policy does is not allow individuals in these communities, when a mine is in the process of being closed, to purchase a home without guarantees from the mine itself. There are a few problems with this. Because of northern Ontario's need to diversify its economy, it has gone to great lengths, with help from the government, to put in programs to entice businesses to move to these communities where these mines are in the process of shutting down. We come to the problem, Madam Speaker.

I have a letter from the community of Ignace and it concerns its housing shortage. Can you imagine a community sending a letter to its member of Parliament and to CMHC telling us that they have a housing shortage when, at the same time, they are telling us that a large mine is shutting down. All the houses that were built by the mine are for sale. It does not sound possible but it is a fact.

I would like like to read a few lines from this letter which outlines the situation. Ignace has a housing shortage and the letter goes on to say:

> Due to industry shifts, there is a local demand for housing. The Mine has stabilized operations at 236 employees and requires all of its available housing to attract skilled personnel for the continued operation of Lyon Lake. With the closure of Camp 418 of Canadian Pacific Forest Products, between 20 and 30 employees will be looking to relocate to Ignace. Furthermore, Original Log Cabins is scheduling a spring move from Pine River, Manitoba to Ignace and will need accommodation for approximately 10 employees—
> The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation General Policy on Underwriting for Ignace is destroying our potential to stabilize our economy and ultimately compromises CMHC investments made. Stable sectors within the Ignace economy are unable to secure new employees because housing is not available. This policy is encouraging Noranda and the township to walk away from housing opportunities and cease proactive economic development activities until such time as Lyon Lake closes and all the homes can be dumped on the market.

• (1140)

It goes on and on.

I brought this situation to the attention of the Minister of Housing not too long ago. I would like to read part of what the minister said in response. The crux of the letter, that goes on and on is this: "CMHC officials will continue to monitor the economic situation of Ignace on a regular basis to ensure that this policy does not create any hardship in the community."

I find this totally unacceptable. That is the reason why these supply days are so very important to members on this side of the House. We have particular programs and situations implemented by the Government of Canada that have affected the regions we represent. We bring them to the attention of the government and the answer is simply: "There is nothing wrong."

Let us consider the mining communities. We know that once a mine is opened eventually it will be shut. Communities are now getting more involved in trying to diversify their economies before the mine shuts down completely. As is known in mining communities, there is a cutback of employees before the magic day takes place.

Here we have a community that is working as hard as it possibly can to diversify its industry, and what do we hear from the government? It states that the policy is perfectly acceptable. Wait until the mine shuts down, and it will simply dump homes on the market. Basically, it will put the housing and real estate market right down to the lowest level where it possibly can be, and in essence, it will probably put that community and those individuals in a bankrupt position. That is totally unacceptable.

At this time, I would also like to talk a little bit about another situation that I brought to the attention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I see that the new minister is here, which is good but even though this does not relate to him I hope he will take this very seriously.

In northern Ontario, we have many isolated reserves. The minister is very well aware of that. Not too long ago, we wrote and simply said that we must diversify the economies of those communities. In my riding, there are roughly 10,000 individuals who are isolated and have no access by road to the outside world. What takes place in those communities is that everything is flown in, except in a few key areas which have winter roads which are run on ice and very difficult to maintain.

I have written to the minister on numerous occasions and stated that I thought it was a great waste of the taxpayers' dollars to continue in the long term to fly equipment and material north to the different communities. I said that it would be to the benefit of Canada, the taxpayers and the communities themselves to look at getting involved in road building for these communities, whether they are winter roads or permanent roads.

The minister's answer is simply that government policy states that the only time they build a winter road for these reserves is when they put in funds for these roads when they have a capital project under way. I say to the minister and to Canadians who are listening that in the long run that particular policy is costing us a lot of money. If we were to look at the road system and its effects, we would see that in the long run it would be to the benefit of all taxpayers.

I see that my time is almost up. I say to the minister and the government that we have to look at these problems seriously and the effects they will have on northern Ontario and northern Canada. Because it comes from opposition members, the government cannot just not accept them. It must look at them a little more seriously. I hope that the government will look at these two problems I have mentioned today because they are very legitimate and important concerns that we have.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): As hon. members know, I do not like to interrupt and cut an hon. member off in the middle of a sentence. If members want to split the time, they should be a little more careful because when I give the sign for one minute or two minutes, then the time is over. I would appreciate it and it would be fair for everyone.

Questions or comments, the hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River on his speech today. He really got down to some of the specific problems that face his riding. As critic for Indian affairs and aboriginal peoples, he has been especially concerned with the problems of housing and the maintenance of reserves.

I would ask the member to comment briefly on one item in the motion before the House today that concerns the export tax on softwood lumber. There has been a general problem in northern Ontario since the imposition of the export tax on softwood lumber. That industry has become very run down.

About the same time or very shortly after the tax was imposed, the Canadian dollar rose from 73 cents or 74 cents to about 85 cents, which really imposed a second tax of 15 per cent. At the same time, regulations were brought into play which disadvantaged northern Ontario with regard to competition with British Columbia for softwood lumber sales in the United States. I know that in northeastern Ontario the combination of these three factors have had a devastating impact on that whole industry which provides a lot of employment.

It has forced a number of companies to sell out to other companies which do not necessarily have the same social and community concerns as the smaller operators had. I thought it would be useful to hear from the member about the impact on northwestern Ontario because both areas of northern Ontario are very dependent on resource industries, especially mining and forestry. I would like to know the kinds of problems faced in northwestern Ontario with the imposition of the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber several years ago.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I appreciate that you are trying to keep us on time with our 10 minutes. I know it is always difficult to bring forward the many problems that we all have in that short time.

I thank my colleague for the question as it relates to the export tax on softwood lumber. That particular tax has created many problems for northern Ontario. Specifically, in my riding it has caused two sawmills to shut down and a third to scale down its production considerably. These are problems, as I related in my opening remarks, that will occur when we, as northerners, are given a particular policy of the government to follow, and then as members of Parliament have to try to live with that.

• (1150)

We have asked the government about this on numerous occasions and have been told by the Minister of Forestry that he tried to get into a negotiation type mode with the United States to look at changing this 15 per cent export tax because of the changes in the dollar and the situation that created.

Once the goods and services tax comes into effect and that 7 per cent tax is tacked on to the 15 per cent export tax, even more problems will be created because it is a long way to ship those goods to market. If that continues, we will price ourselves right out of the market.

I say to the government to be very careful when it puts those types of programs in place because of the types of situations that will occur. They will definitely affect us. To add insult to injury, there are the cuts to UI. Because of the effects of cuts in the industry, we again have to look for unemployment because there is nowhere else to work. I suggest the government has to look at all these in one context.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this motion before us today. Although it deals with all northern areas of Canada, it is of special concern and interest to those of us from northern Ontario. It covers the whole range of perceived problems we face because of government changes, both in the economy of northern Ontario and in government policy, this past couple of years.

The removal of VIA Rail service in northern Ontario, which we believe will be completely wiped out within the next couple of years, is especially distressing to communities dependent on rail service.

The tightening of the UI program is difficult for those industries that operate on a seasonal basis. The loss of the northern residents deduction for income tax purposes will be a real blow to those communities, not in the area I represent, but in the far north. We have discussed the 15 per cent export tax and the loss of the mine depletion allowance as listed here. This is a very important item.

I want to speak primarily to that item today because of the problem we face in the communities of Elliot Lake, Blind River and the north shore area of the Algoma District. During the past three months we have had the announcement that some 2,000 miners will be laid off in the next 12 months in the town of Elliot Lake with a population of 16,000, and another 5,000 in the area along the north shore, including Blind River. That is a tremendous blow. I want to deal with some of the details surrounding this lay-off and with the loss of the earned depletion allowance and flow-through shares.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources says that if we are going to have mines coming on stream in the next 10 or 12 years, whether it is in British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec or other parts of our country such as Yukon or the Northwest Territories, we have to invest money now in exploration and development.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources says that we should be investing something like $1.2 billion or $1.3 billion a year now. It is not that every dollar will be successful in that regard, but if you are going to have mines coming on stream in 10 or 12 years time, you have to make the investment now. Unfortunately, in the last two or three years we have lost those major programs. We lost CEIP in the last budget. We lost the flow-through shares and mine depletion allowance arrangements along with capital gain arrangements in the last two or three years. The result is that the amount of exploration and development dollars being spent in this industry next year will be of the order of $400 million.

That is being spent by Inco, Falconbridge and the senior mines. That means we are going to have about one-third the number of dollars being spent which our own Department of Energy, Mines and Resources say is necessary. This is extremely bad news for northern Ontario because we know that down the road, at the turn of the century, there simply will not be those new mines coming on stream. The dollars are not being spent now and under the present regime will not be spent in the years ahead. It is extremely bad news. It has to be changed. We have depended for the last five or six years on the junior mining companies, traded mostly on the Vancouver Stock Exchange, to provide the $800 million or $900 million exploration and development dollars.

The Minister of Finance has given the commitment to the Prospectors and Developers Association that he will review this matter. I know that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if he believes his department, will want to see that happen. It is terribly urgent in the long run.

I want to talk briefly about the challenge facing us in communities like Elliot Lake, Blind River and the north shore area. Our challenge over the next 12 months and the next few years is to try to make those adjustments to maintain the viability of these communities. A lot of responsibility will fall both to the federal government and provincial governments.

The mining companies have a responsibility as well to assist in developing procedures and activities to assist their employees. I believe they have a responsibility for lump sum funds to assist mining communities in these massive capital expenditures for municipal infrastructure. I believe that should be done. A great deal of responsibility will lie with the federal, provincial and municipal governments to the extent that they are capable of doing that.

Clearly, we need money immediately for manpower mobility and job search. We face the loss of 450 jobs by August. We hope the additional loss of another 1,600 jobs will not take place until a year from now, in April or May of 1991. In fact, it may take place in August or September of this year. If that happens then the amount of money needed will be several times that being sought now by the Community Futures group.

There is a need for money for manpower mobility, job search and retraining programs. We have requested the Department of Transport and the Minister of Transport to develop and improve airport facilities. That is one alternative for the creation of employment. The idea of itinerant mining service, such as used in Rabbit Lake and Saskatoon in Saskatchewan, could be used in communities in northeastern Ontario such as Detour-du-Lac and other communities where new mines will be coming onstream.

I believe programs like the FedNor program are very beneficial in creating small expansions or development of new industry. That program is simply not adequate to deal with the massive restructuring which will have to take place in communities facing massive lay-offs. Much of this is in areas of provincial jurisdiction, so it is very important that we develop them and have programs such as ERDA and economic and regional development agreements where two levels of government can combine to put forward major industrial adjustments.

We did this a few years ago in the forest products industry where we had to restructure it to bring it up to proper environmental standards in order to create the productivity and ability to compete. That is the kind of massive industrial adjustment program we need.

• (1200)

I simply call on the government to be extremely co-operative and to take its responsibility seriously during the next 12 months and in the years ahead to provide industrial adjustment programs and capital intensive assistance mechanisms to ensure that communities like Elliot Lake, which are facing the loss of something like one-half to two-thirds of their labour force, can make that adjustment and continue to be viable communities, even if slightly smaller, so that their community life will continue and families will survive.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I had the honour to be in parts of northern Ontario with my colleague from Nepean on a task force that looked into infrastructures in the area. We will be reporting back to our caucus fairly soon on our findings.

One of the things that we noticed on the positive side is that northern Ontario is one of the most beautiful land masses in our country. It is one of the finest areas that tourists can visit to look at the beauty of the rivers and lakes, as well as the mountains and valleys.

The unfortunate thing that we noticed is that there is absolutely no way that you can get to certain parts of northern Ontario because of the lack of roads, as the hon. member just mentioned.

What also astonished us was the fact that in many of those areas there are no sewage facilities. People still have to use huts.

We were informed while we were there by the mayors and reeves in the area that large numbers of youth, once they finish high school or primary level, are moving down to major cities like Toronto, Ottawa or other areas to finish their graduate studies and not returning to their homes. We are seeing a depletion in terms of the human resources that exist there.

One could suggest that this is an excellent opportunity for the government to move in and provide northerners with the tools they need, that is access to main roads. I cannot see anything wrong with the request that the government move and move fairly quickly on this issue. I would like to commend hon. members for their comments.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Ottawa Centre for his comments. One of the thrusts of municipalities in this area is the creation and improvement of transportation facilities. I have already mentioned the improvement and the requests that we have in for navigation aids to the Minister of Transport. It is urgent and important that he make a decision on that very soon.

The second area relates to road infrastructure. In the next four or five years we expect that a decision will be made by Ontario Hydro to build an electrical generating plant in the area of Dean Lake, just west of Blind River, which will involve the expenditure of some $8 billion or $10 billion over a 10-year period for an electrical generating centre.

One of the things which will be needed is a better road, transportation facilities, to that centre to accommodate workers coming from Elliot Lake and Blind River—the whole north shore area. One cannot bring in 3,000 or 4,000 construction workers and all the required infrastructure without having good transportation units and transportation corridors. At this time we have only the Trans-Canada Highway, which is a two-lane road that will not have the needed capacity.

Co-operation between the two senior levels of government in transportation might be part of a major ERDA agreement.

The second area mentioned by the hon. member was the provision of municipal infrastructure. If we lose one-half or two-thirds of our labour force in Elliot Lake in the mining industry, which is a primary employment area, we will lose it in the area of secondary jobs as well, not to mention the service area. I think the mining companies have a responsibility to assist in the large financial obligations that the municipalities take on for municipal infrastructure for sewer and water when a mining company shuts down its operation and moves out. It seems to me it has a responsibility to provide some of the lump sum assistance in those circumstances so that the remaining population is not left with that financial obligation.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River for presenting a motion to the House today which allows many of us, members of government and opposition, to discuss issues of concern to the north and not just to bemoan some of the problems, as they have been described, but also to talk about the tremendous positive progress that Progressive Conservative government has been making in the north since we first took office in 1984.

In fact this progress reflects a legacy of commitment to northern Canada which goes right back to the earliest times of Confederation, but it was certainly reflected in the policies of the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker as Prime Minister of Canada who pioneered the roads to resources concept together with the former hon. member from Qu'Appelle—Moose Mountain who was the minister responsible in those days and who, I might add, had as his parliamentary assistant as he travelled the north the present Prime Minister of Canada.

There is a legacy here of a sustained commitment to northern Canada by successive Progressive Conservative governments because we have always held a vision for the future of the north. That vision sees the north as a place where Canadians, those who live in the north whether indigenous or non-indigenous, can find their future.

Other governments over the years have had the Ottawa attitude toward the north as a place to be exploited by southerners to add to the tax revenue base of the federal government, but that certainly has not been the approach that successive Progressive Conservative governments have taken.

That is why I am honoured to participate in this debate as the minister responsible not only for the needs of our Inuit and Indian people but also of all northerners, especially in the areas north of 60.

I point out that other members on the governments side, parliamentary secretaries and my colleague, the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, will be participating in this debate. In contrast to some of the negative aspects of the motion before the House, we will be putting forward very forcefully the strong, positive record of this government in dealing with the problems of northern people.

I heard, for example, the hon. member for Algoma indicate that the motion referred to a whole range of perceived problems. I recognize that it is the role of the opposition to talk about perceived problems, to criticize, but I think we would all welcome some positive, complimentary observations on the tremendous record that this government has achieved over the past several years.

Since my appointment several weeks ago to my present responsibilities I have been travelling extensively throughout northern Canada visiting many communities, listening to and speaking with northerners and indeed making some significant progress on a number of important northern issues which I wish to describe during my comments here today.

Since 1984 there has been a dramatic positive change north of 60. I am pleased to be able to continue to assist in facilitating additional beneficial improvements.

We are changing priorities. That is why this government is not so popular at the present time. We are doing things differently for the betterment of our children and the future of Canada. We are not afraid of criticism when we know that we are doing the right things, that we are on the right track. We are replacing old, antiquated programs and initiatives which have not worked with new improved ways of doing things to the benefit of Canadians and in the present context to the benefit of northern Canadians.

I just want to give a few indications of the progress that has been made in the period since this government was elected. It is interesting to note that incomes north of 60 in the two territories have increased by 10 per cent in the period from 1985 to 1988 in the Northwest Territories and by 30 per cent in Yukon. More significant, the Gross Domestic Product of the Northwest Territories has increased by 31 per cent over the period between 1984 and 1988. In Yukon the Gross Domestic Product has increased by 73 per cent.

These are significant indices of improvement in the Gross Domestic Product of northern communities. At a time when the economy in total has not grown nearly as rapidly we have seen a significant improvement in the economic output of those northern regions.

To reinforce those statistics, I want to point out that the commitment of the federal government since 1984 to providing assistance by way of transfer payments to the northern territorial governments has virtually doubled. When we came to office the commitment was something less than $500 million annually. It is now approaching $1 billion annually. That is a 100 per cent increase in the commitment that this government makes to the needs of northern people.

That has been reflected in a virtual doubling of the per capita assistance the federal government is rendering to the people of the north. It is being targeted, in particular, to certain areas of special need, as the mining and forestry industries change, as environmental issues take on a greater significance, and as comprehensive land claims are settled with finality for all time.

For the past three years our government's policies and programs for the north have been shaped and guided by what is called "the northern political and economic framework". It was my predecessor, now the Minister of National Defence, who took this new policy framework to cabinet, had it approved and announced it in 1987, in order to create a consistency and a continuity to all our efforts in northern Canada, in order to develop the north more effectively in a sound and orderly fashion.

This northern political and economic framework has four main elements. The first is to continue the transfer of programs and responsibilities to the territorial governments.

The second is to settle once and for all a piece of unfinished business, that is, the comprehensive claims of northern Indian and Inuit people.

Third, this program is designed to facilitate environmentally sustainable economic development in our north by encouraging the diversification and the strengthening of northern economies.

Finally, this policy framework reinforces Canada's ability to administer effectively Arctic lands and waters, all of which adds to the strengthening of Canada's sovereignty in the north.

These are our strategic priorities for northern Canada. I am happy today to be able to report more specifically on substantial progress we have been making on a number of these fronts.

In just the past few weeks Canadians have witnessed the conclusion of final agreements with the Council of Yukon Indians and the Dene-Métis of the Western Arctic.

Just a week ago I was proud to be present in Igoolik in the eastern Arctic when we signed the agreement in principle with the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut, an agreement with the Inuit people long forgotten in terms of our obligation as a nation toward their needs, and now reflected in the signing of this important agreement in principle which will lead to a final agreement within 18 months of great benefit to the some 18,000 Inuit people of the eastern Arctic.

In the conclusion and signing of the agreement with the Council of Yukon Indians, which conveyed to the Yukon Indian people some $248 million in the form of cash settlement and 41,000 square kilometres of land in exchange for their giving up of their claims and stated rights to the balance of the Yukon Territory, we have seen the ability to bring certainty and predictability to the planning and development of the northern economic and social needs of Yukoners, both native and non-native.

That is why on April 1, on Parliament Hill, there was a great celebration upon the signing of this final agreement. The thing that I wanted to comment on is the happiness, the joy, the sense of peace and positive optimism that accompanied the conclusion of that important agreement. After many years of negotiations, of aspiration by the Yukon Indians stretching back to 1905, this government did the right thing. We finished a piece of unfinished business which will be of tremendous benefit to that important western part of the Canadian north.

Three weeks ago we did the same thing in Yellowknife by concluding a final agreement which must now be ratified over the next few months by the Dene-Métis people. It is an agreement which involves a compensation fund of $500 million to the Dene-Métis people of the Mackenzie Valley and the western Arctic, and a 181,000 square kilometre granting of land title to the Dene-Métis people in exchange for their commitment and generosity to Canada in enabling us to complete this historic agreement.

All told, these significant agreements in northern Canada represent the final recognition of the fact that our indigenous people were here and occupied these northern lands long before the European settlers, the whalers and sailors and those who came to these shores to populate and occupy the land that we now know as Canada.

This unfinished business has been concluded by this government, bringing possible potential prosperity, stability and a very strong voice and role for northern indigenous peoples in the important political and administrative decisions to be made as we pursue orderly development of these northern parts of Canada.

That is why at all these occasions when I have met with the chiefs, elders and leaders of these communities, there has been a great sense of relief, elation and hopeful positive expectation—genuine joy—which I sensed on the part of northern people. This government and I in particular are proud to have done these fellow Canadians great justice.

These agreements in total represent a settlement amount of some $1.3 billion and the confirmation of land ownership to the Dene and Métis Indian and Inuit peoples of the north of an area almost equal to the total area of the country of France. They involve management understandings in regard to economic development in the areas of energy, forestry, mining, indigenous enterprises such as trapping, hunting and fishing, in business development, transportation and tourism promotion.

These agreements therefore all bode well for the future strength and security of northern peoples.

Since 1984, our government has also been committed to the steady transfer of provincial-type responsibilities to both Yukon and Northwest territorial governments. Our policy has been to pursue this goal, working in close co-operation with the territorial governments and at a pace with which they feel comfortable while ensuring that we continue to deliver programs in a manner fully commensurate with our existing and traditional responsibilities.

A general memorandum of understanding to guide the transfer of these programs was worked out with the government of Yukon in 1988. We expect to reach a similar understanding soon with the Northwest Territories, hopefully within the present fiscal year.

• (1220)

I and many of my colleagues in the federal Cabinet, including many former ministers of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, travel regularly to the northern territorial governments to meet with their leadership. In fact we continue to work in our respective jurisdictions on the orderly devolution of responsibility so that the northern territories are developing the capacity to manage their responsibilities in a sense of the full meaning of provincial status.

Good progress has been made in transferring intra-territorial highways. In fact only this week we have announced with finality the conclusion of an agreement wherein the government of the Northwest Territories will manage highways within the Northwest Territories.

I myself in my former capacity as Minister of Fisheries concluded an agreement to devolve freshwater fisheries to the Government of Yukon.

A number of other transfers are already in place and further will be negotiated and completed during the year ahead.

These will include withdrawal of my department from the land titles field in both territories and transfer of the freshwater fisheries to the Northwest Territories government. Together with Transport Canada we have recently transferred responsibility for class B and C airports in Yukon, and we expect to make a similar transfer this year to the Northwest Territorial government.

We also are negotiating health care transfers, especially in the Yukon at the present time. We hope to revive very soon negotiations toward an agreement in principle for the transfer of forestry management responsibilities to the Government of Yukon.

All these changes that have taken place in northern Canada in the past few years have been of positive benefit. None has been more significant than the rapid political devolution of provincial-like, province-like government authorities north of 60. My department will continue to lead this process of political devolution toward the day when both territories will have the full powers and authorities comparable to those of provinces to the south.

Broadening and strengthening the economic base of our northern territories is a major challenge facing northerners, northern governments and the federal government. We are looking for improved ways to develop stable, sustainable industries that can supplement and complement the non-renewable resource industry sector.

For the past several years the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has co-operated with the territories through a series of economic development agreements and sub-agreements. Our Northern Affairs Program is the regional economic development agency for northern Canada, in some ways comparable to the Western Economic Diversification Program and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, both of which were established by this government.

Our economic development agreement with Yukon expired last year, but we are extending funding in the present year. We will be renegotiating both with Yukon and the Northwest Territories a set of new economic development agreements when the Northwest Territories' agreements expire at the end of the present fiscal year.

Future economic development programming in the north will focus on priority areas for northern people, areas such as mineral development, environmental industries, arts and crafts, tourism and community planning. The development and the assistance that we can lend will concentrate as well on remote and underdeveloped communities and on sustainable development opportunities relating to the northern environment.

On an international level, the recent signing of the Canada–U.S.S.R. agreement on co-operation in the Arctic represents an historic step forward in co-operation with the vast Soviet territory on the other side of Arctic pole. This agreement as you know, Madam Speaker, was signed when the Prime Minister was present in Leningrad during the month of November. It has opened a new era in Canada–Soviet Arctic collaboration. It represents a major step forward in circumpolar collaboration. I look forward to serving as a joint chairman of the Canada–U.S.S.R. mixed commission as we implement the provisions of this agreement.

In the same vein, this government committed itself to the creation of the Canadian Polar Commission which will deal with the economic and social needs of indigenous people and all northern people. We will be bringing forward the legislation creating the Canadian Polar Commission, hopefully later this year for approval and support.

We are also taking the lead in my department for developing an Arctic environmental strategy. Important consultations jointly with the Minister of the Environment and other ministers are taking place throughout Canada as part of the public discussion of "The Green Plan" of my colleague, the Minister of the Environment. Meetings will be held during the month of June with ministers present in the northern communities of Canada from Whitehorse on the west to Iqaluit in the eastern Arctic.

I think it is unfortunate that the motion put forward by my hon. friend from Kenora—Rainy River is in a negative vein. There are many, many positive successes, achievements of this government, of all ministers working together in the spirit of previous Progressive Conservative governments and the vision of our leaders to bring true economic and social benefit, the same equality of opportunity and the quality of life to northern people that most of us enjoy here in the southern regions of Canada.

Thank you, Madam Speaker, and the hon. member for giving us an opportunity to debate these very important questions. I am sure hon. members will be looking forward to many other positive interventions as the day unfolds from my colleagues who do, indeed, speak positively about the tremendous bright future which faces northern Canadians under Progressive Conservative government.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the minister on the agreement which has been struck concerning native land claims in parts of the far north.

I want to ask him more specifically about the land claim for the Manitoulin Island United Chiefs and Councillors land claim. On February 2 of this year an agreement was reached with First Nations of Manitoulin Island and the Ontario Government involving some 36,400 hectares of land and payment in value of $8.9 million in land claim.

During those difficult negotiations, which really reached a peak because of a court challenge by the First Nations of Manitoulin against the Province of Ontario, the federal government essentially took a position of observer status at those hearings. Yet there is a claim by the United Chiefs and Councillors, the First Nations of Manitoulin, against the federal government for the loss of the use of those lands for 128 years since the original treaties were signed in 1862.

In view of the progress that has been made on those land claims which involved right-of-way and unsold surrendered lands and so on, will the federal government's policy be similar to the agreement which was reached with the Dene and other groups in the Northwest Territories and Yukon? I am sure that eventually the federal government will end up in court with a claim by the First Nations of Manitoulin. Rather than go through all that litigation, which as sure as night follows day will occur, are the federal government and the minister willing to sit down and do the negotiations for the loss of the use of those 36,400 hectares of land during the last 128 years rather than go through the court challenge first and then be dragged kicking and screaming to the negotiation table?

Would the minister give us the general approach that he and the department would take in this specific claim for the loss of these lands over a century of time?

• (1230)

Mr. Siddon: I thank the hon. member for Algoma for this question, which I know is extremely important to a group of his constituents, the First Nations of Manitoulin Island.

In recent days, I have received some preliminary briefing on the status of this specific claim. I am not in a position to discuss details of any specific claim in the House. I can assure the hon. member that, in accordance with our policy on the negotiation of comprehensive and specific claims, all legal and historical factors bearing upon the federal government's position and, in this case, suggested obligation, will be examined thoroughly. We cannot resolve individual specific claims in isolation of a number factors relating to our comprehensive claims policy and the legal provisions of treaties and the extent to which they may or may not have been breached.

I certainly cannot indicate that I would personally intervene and do anything which bore a particular parallel to the comprehensive agreements which we have achieved in recent weeks, but I certainly will look seriously at the status of this claim on behalf of the hon. member for Algoma.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Through you, Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his speech. It gives me an opportunity ask him questions that I otherwise would not have been able to.

I found the minister's speech very interesting in that he talked about much relief and elation over many of the progressive things that are happening. There are, however, some indications about the downside of northern development. Being the international year of literacy, from a Southam report and other indications, we know there is a rate of approximately 40 per cent illiteracy in the north. We have a very high drop-out rate in our schools. We also have a very high incidence of unemployment, in some areas almost as high as 90 per cent, because there are no economic development opportunities.

The minister also went on to speak about the land claims agreement signed with the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I have some very specific questions about that process.

Why did the federal government not change the comprehensive land claims policy to allow the negotiation of self-government at the same time as the negotiation of the land claims? That is a very big question for those two areas. In relation to that, does the minister believe that the inherent right to self-government should be entrenched in the Constitution?

Were there any taxation provisions made within the land claims agreement for corporations that will be developed and also for treaty Indians?

The minister also talked about a transfer of programs. It has been the experience that the transfer of programs has been severely hampered by the fact that the present level of funding for these programs is not perceived to be the same level that will be carried over along with the responsibility for those particular programs. I refer, particularly, to highways and airports.

In the Territories we have a severe problem with the standard of airport and airline safety, because we have communities that have airports that are essentially muskeg with gravel on it. That is not safe and it is not acceptable anywhere else in Canada. We rely almost solely on air transportation.

I would also like to know about the Polar Commission and his involvement in it. I know that the minister is the joint chairman of the Canada-USSR committee. Is the Polar Commission going to be a real Polar Commission? Is it going to be located in the Polar region? Is it going to be administered by Polar peoples? Is it going to be in an area that is a Polar region, or is it going to be in a central Canadian location like Ottawa or Quebec?

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I certainly appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Western Arctic has a number of questions on her mind. Those questions are posed, I believe, in the context of general support for the initiatives that the government is taking in the western Arctic and in northern Canada.

Although the hon. member has not said so in the House, I believe that she is pleased with the conclusion of this historic agreement with the Dene-Métis people of the western Arctic. I certainly was led to believe by the hon. member that she did support the conclusion of this agreement.

There are many unanswered questions. I am not able in the time permitted me here today to answer those questions. I will be appearing before the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs next week. Other members and ministers, including my colleague, the Minister of State, will be here this afternoon and could perhaps elaborate on some of these questions.

Let me for a moment comment on this question of entrenching self-government. The comprehensive claims policy does not provide for the constitutional entrenchment of institutions of self-governments, because there has not yet been a constitutional consensus on that question at a constitutional conference attended by the premiers of the 10 provinces and the Prime Minister. With the successful conclusion of the Meech Lake Accord, which I trust the hon. member supports, we will be able to get on with dealing with those important constitutional questions, such as the definition for all time of aboriginal rights and not merely passing reference to aboriginal rights in the 1982 Constitution. It would be a true and serious discussion of the definition of entrenched self-government. Those are constitutional matters.

I am sure the hon. member and all members of the House want us to conclude this historic Meech Lake agreement with the Province of Quebec so that we can get on with making these important further steps of constitutional improvement on behalf of the aboriginal people of Canada.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate today. I compliment the member for Kenora—Rainy River for having given us this opportunity to discuss in the House issues and problems facing northern Canada. I would also like to say that I appreciated the comments of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Certainly, I do not want to give the impression that we live in a totally black and white world, and that there is not from time to time progress made on some fronts. However, the Minister drew attention to the fact that the government represents the tradition of the late John George Diefenbaker and his vision for northern Canada. I must say to him that I represent the constituency that the late John Diefenbaker represented and certainly the residents of that constituency do not feel that there is the same type of commitment to northern development as this government's predecessors made so evident.

The minister dealt with some of the accomplishments of the government and the issues facing the Territories and the far northern regions of the country. But very often the areas that tend to be forgotten are the northern areas of the provinces. Very often, those are regions that are both out of sight and out of mind to both the provincial and federal governments. It is that type of region that I represent and that type of region that I would like to speak to in my remarks today.

Life has never been easy in many of these communities. They obviously face some of the most rigorous climates in the country. They have always suffered from isolation. There have often been boom-and-bust cycles going all the way back to the fur trade, then through the mining industry, the forestry industry, and the other industries that have grown up in the isolated areas of the country.

Very often these communities have felt, and rightly so, that they were victims of decisions made elsewhere, that the levers of power were not in their hands, and that, in fact, both politically and economically, they were very far from being able to control their own destiny, much more so than communities in southern Canada.

This whole phenomena of being left out of the decision-making process and the feeling of powerlessness has been accentuated and reinforced by the philosophy of the government, for which it makes no apologies. It is very much a bottom-line philosophy which says that big business can set the agenda for the country. Essentially, if something is in the interest of big business, if it serves the needs of the free flow of international capital, it is the government's job and responsibility essentially to get out of the way of any type of control over what happens to the big capital and the big dollar, and to leave the decisions affecting these communities to boardrooms—not necessarily even in the big metropolitan centres of our own country, but centres in the United States, Europe, Japan and other places.

Certainly, the free trade agreement moves us another step down that road. A whole shameful phenomenon of the government arguing that it needs to bring some fiscal sense to the country so that we do not perpetually pay such a high percentage of our tax dollar in interest charges is a legitimate argument. Nevertheless, the government has repeatedly seen fit to make cuts to those who are the most vulnerable, who have the least ability to fight back, who are not going to be heard when the cuts happen them and whose protests often go ignored.

An example of this is the regional development programs. In western Canada, last year 16 agreements expired worth $310 million. This year another 10 regional development agreements expired worth $316 million. In Saskatchewan, alone, these agreements were worth $190 million.

The people of my constituency and I feel that in a particularly direct fashion because we have calculated that these agreements—the forestry agreement; the tourism agreement; the mineral development agreement; and the NEDSA agreement (the Northern Economic Development Subsidiary Agreement) in Saskatchewan—meant approximately 1,500 jobs every year in my constituency. This constituency has a very high unemployment rate and a rapidly growing labour force. Yet, this government has seen fit to go a whole year playing internal bureaucratic games trying to figure out who is responsible for regional development, be it sectoral ministers or regional development ministers. This constituency has been left high and dry for a whole year while 1,500 jobs were lost.

In the meantime, many valuable initiatives in forestry, tourism, and, particularly, community development in areas like the Clearwater region, northeast Saskatchewan, the La Ronge region and others, have been left to die on the vine. These were initiatives that people thought were going to continue.

We have seen huge cuts to the fur industry. We have seen cuts to the Native Communications Program. Missinipi Broadcasting, one of the prime vehicles of communication in northern Saskatchewan, had to go off the air for the whole month of April because of the budget cut that it experienced. The very valuable publications, Saskatchewan Indian and New Breed were also cut.

We have seen the whole gutting of the UI program. The UI program was never a particularly successful program in northern Canada for a number of reasons. First, it is very difficult to establish an unemployment rate through the mechanisms used by Statistics Canada. Certainly, in the La Ronge region, which is the northern region of Saskatchewan, there is an official unemployment rate of 13 per cent to 15 per cent. That is hardly credible because the majority of those communities are experiencing unemployment rates of 50 per cent or 60 per cent, or even higher than that. Then we see an unemployment insurance program being brought in that is predicted by the government to cost this region of the country $4 million. However, by other estimates, it will cost $11 million in lost benefits, not taking into account the seasonal nature of employment. It will make it even more difficult for people to try to patch together a living from the different kinds of opportunities that come to them from time to time so they can remain living in their communities and take advantage of the opportunities that do offer themselves. The changes to the UI program are going to make that even more difficult.

The Northern Tax Benefit Program is now very much called into question by a task force which this government appointed. I might add, the task force was appointed before the election which raised people's expectations that all isolated communities that should be eligible for this program would be eligible for it. After the election, it recommended that of the 3,224 communities that were originally eligible for this particular benefit, only 423 be left eligible. In Saskatchewan, only 15 out of the 165 communities that were previously eligible for the northern tax benefit would remain eligible under these recommendations. This is totally unacceptable. Not only is the cost of living so much higher in these regions, as everybody knows, but it makes it even more difficult to develop a viable society, a society that has professionals, business people and people who are able to carry on the tasks that a modern economy in those regions requires.

We have seen cuts in the flow-through share program. In Flin Flon, Manitoba, there is a smelter that desperately needs upgrading to meet today's environmental standards, yet the financing for that smelter depends very much on new mineral deposits being found. The way those mineral deposits are going to be found is if the junior exploration companies, which are very dependent on these flow-through shares, are able to stay in business and continue their activities.

We have also seen the introduction of the goods and services tax. Again, we see this having a particularly negative impact on northern areas. In northern areas, the costs of many goods and services are sometimes as much as two or three times as high as in comparable southern communities, and incomes are certainly no higher. This will mean that the impact of the goods and services tax is felt by the region of the country which is least able to afford it. Given the high illiteracy rate and the fact that many people still rely on the traditional economy and are not registered under the income tax system, the tax credit, which the government claims is going to mitigate the impact of the goods and services tax, will not be available to many of these people.

We also see a desperate need for housing. Housing conditions in many communities are desperately overcrowded, contributing to family breakdown, to poor performance of children in schools, and to a sense that these communities are not able to enjoy the same standard of living and the same type of amenities that lead to a healthy and productive life.

What do we see from this government? On the one hand, we see a cut-back, and on the other hand, a study. Certainly, neither a cut-back nor a study will solve the problems of housing.

In closing, I would like to offer a few suggestions that I think the government should look at seriously. We need to look at the whole situation of northern development, not just in terms of business development, not just in terms of assisting business, but look at economic development as a whole. We need to take a comprehensive look at what it takes to develop a modern economy in the communities of northern Canada, with a focus on community development, some faith and assistance for the grassroots, and some assistance to build the kind of infrastructure that we need.

We need sectoral organizations that can organize the producers in the various renewable resource sectors. We need to require the banks to give some kind of banking service to the northern communities, because it is virtually impossible to run any kind of economy without access to a banking system. We also need a modern transportation and communications system.

We have to take our commitment to sustainable development seriously. If there is any one development that is going to assist the communities of northern Canada towards a brighter future, it is if southern Canadians and Canadians as a whole take the whole concept of sustainable development seriously. Two-thirds of the country lies within what is often referred to as northern Canada.

There should be community based monitoring of resources and the setting aside of 12 per cent of our land area, as the member for Skeena recommended, to make sure that we look after it. Not only will those areas be protected for the good of the ecosystem, but also so that people from around the world will see this as a place to visit and tourism will be enhanced. We should also make sure that we do not see continuing conflict between economic development and the environment.

All of these things depend very much on us taking sustainable development seriously and making sure that the communities in the north are an integral part of this development. It is their environment, after all, an environment many of them have lived in for thousands of years.

Without serious and significant movement towards native self-government and the settlement of native land claims, we are not going to see the type of development in northern Canada which all of us would want to see.

The largest growing sector of the population in this country is the native population and much of the native population of this country resides in northern communities.

The frustration is growing. Institutions need to develop to capitalize on the type of momentum and aspirations which have been developing in the native community over the last number of years, as well as the confidence that has been developing in their own institutions. Without a serious commitment to that whole evolution, the development of northern Canada is going nowhere.

The minister made reference to the fact that we need to pass the Meech Lake Agreement so that development toward self-government can occur. I would like to say to the minister that the time is long overdue to recognize the whole thrust towards native self-government and the role of aboriginal people in this country.

Northerners have worked as hard as any Canadians to build this country. Northerners have the same hopes and aspirations for themselves and their communities as any other Canadians do. Northerners demand and deserve the same respect and sensitivity from their government as any Canadians do.

Therefore, I call on the government to see the world through the eyes of northerners, to stop letting its philosophy get in the way of what really needs doing in northern Canada, and help northerners make the contribution to the building of the Canada of the future that they want to make and which they can make.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. colleague from Prince Albert—Churchill River that for some time, we have often heard members of his party speak in this House against flow-through shares because they claimed these shares were tax breaks or benefits for the wealthy and rich in society.

I well understand his interest in seeing an industry in his constituency develop, and mining exploration is important for that industry, but I am surprised to see him today ask the government to use tax incentives to encourage mining exploration and development when a while ago, he and some of his fellow members spoke against flow-through shares; they used opposition days to speak against them.

My other point, as a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is to ask him to admit with me that in recent months, this government has made considerable efforts with the native peoples, the first nations, for self-government, and I would ask him to acknowledge that with me.

[English]

Mr. Funk: I thank the member for his question. I was elected to this House in the fall of 1988. Therefore, I was not party to the debate with respect to flow-through shares before that time.

I do understand that this was an aspect of fiscal policy that my party did support in principle. Their opposition to particular aspects of it came with details of the program that perhaps did permit tax advantages to accrue that in some cases may not have been warranted.

I would like to point out to the member, as perhaps he knows, that $3 billion of the $4.8 billion of mineral investment that occurred through the flow-through share program was spent by junior mining companies, not the major companies. Therefore, I think it is entirely consistent because these junior mining companies are the ones that create the most local employment and are very often headquartered in the northern communities rather than in the metropolitan areas of the country. Therefore, I do not think that it is an inconsistent position on the part of my party at all.

His second question dealt with the whole aspect of self-government and land claims. In my own constituency there are two outstanding claims. One that has been recognized is the claim by the Peter Ballantyne Band which is a huge land claim. The economic development of the whole northeast part of Saskatchewan depends very much on that claim being resolved.

Another land claim which has not been recognized but is being pressed by the La Ronge Indian Band has resulted in caveats being applied in the Candle Lake area of Saskatchewan. The band is using that mechanism to try and attract the attention of the government to something they have been pressing for for about 15 years. It has not got the attention of the government. Certainly it has the attention of the property holders in the region whose properties now have caveats attached to them. From the perspective of the Indian people of my constituency, they do not see movement toward self-government. They have not seen any kind of constitutional movement since the breakdown of the First Ministers' Conferences some years ago. If there is to be such a movement, certainly people would welcome it.

I would like to give credit to the appointment of a treaty commissioner in Saskatchewan. I do want to recognize that as something that has been welcome and I welcome it myself.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I was listening to the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River talking about the need for co-operation between the two levels of government. It struck me that a lot of the agreements which took place in past years are ending up the same way as this year's whole fiasco on financial support to western farmers.

The government waited for three or four months after the demand by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the premier of the province for special funding, finally called in the provincial ministers and negotiated for a couple of days towards the end of March, getting very close to the start of the seeding period, and finally placed $500 million on the table but demanded that there be support from the provinces.

At the same time, the Minister of Finance brought in a budget which cut the transfer payments by $100 million or $200 million to these provinces, placing them in a financial position where they could not possibly match the federal government funding. One minister said: "Well, we really snookered those guys this time because they have not got the money to put up to match it". All the while, farmers are at a loss to get the funds that they need for seeding their crops this spring.

This morning, we see a headline in The Financial Post which states: "Prairie premiers won't match federal farm aid". It goes on to say that there is a common front by the western premiers. I wonder if the hon. member sees this as a technique to make the government look good, as it is attempting to do, while the provinces cannot possibly come up with their share of the money. All this time, the farmers are suffering. They do not have any money.

• (1300)

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, certainly I can identify with the comments of the hon. member for Algoma. Not only do I represent northerners, but I represent farmers who are becoming very frustrated with this whole game of political arm wrestling that has been going on.

Indeed, I can also identify with the point he makes that the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces have a severe impact on northern areas of the country because those are under-serviced areas generally. Cuts in transfer payments means that the under-servicing will continue.

With respect to regional development programs, the government does not even look good. With respect to the farmers, the whole game perhaps is to make the government look good while, at the same time, not spending any money. This whole situation has to come to a quick head because the small wonder is that the government is running 15 per cent in the public opinion polls. While this may make for good headlines and satisfy hon. members opposite in the House, the farm community and the northerners who are falling victim are not going to put up with this kind of thing much longer.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Madam Speaker, I have some comments on the answer given by the hon. member who spoke for the New Democratic Party to the question asked by the Liberal member for Algoma concerning transfer payments and federal-provincial agreements that were steadily diminishing. I would also appreciate the hon. member's comments on the fact that from 1984 to 1988, the federal government, with the provinces, invested over $1.1 billion in forestry agreements, and that in 1988, after the election, the federal government renewed agreements with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and signed a Plan de l'Est with Quebec. Unlike the Liberals and the New Democrats, the federal government does not act unilaterally but prefers to negotiate with the provinces.

I may remind the hon. member, when he speaks about forestry and agriculture, that the provinces have at least as much responsibility as the federal government in this area and that the problems facing farmers can only be dealt with through co-operation, consultation and concrete funding.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Western Arctic.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I would very much like to take this opportunity to talk about a vibrant and enthusiastic part of Canada where we believe we can make a significant contribution to this great country, Canada.

Together, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories make up over one third of Canada. As you know, Madam Speaker, it is a land of startling beauty and diverse geography. Fewer than 80,000 people live in approximately 75 communities scattered over this vast part of Canada.

In the Northwest Territories, one third of the people are Dene and Métis, one third are Inuit and one third are non-native. All Dene and Métis communities are located inland along the major river and lake systems in the forested western portion of the territories. All Inuit communities are coastal, except for Baker Lake.

For thousands of years, native people in the Canadian Arctic lived a subsistence lifestyle depending upon fish and wildlife to provide food, clothing, tools and materials for shelter. As fur traders, miners and whalers moved north, life for native people began to change. Although adjustments to lifestyle continue, even today the primary foods for most northern Dene, Métis and Inuit families are still fish from the lakes, rivers and oceans, and meat from caribou, moose, seal, musk-ox and water fowl. Good hunting and fishing skills are respected by everyone and often influence the choice of a community leader. These are not just recreational items or activities. If it sounds like I am describing something which sounds unfamiliar, I probably am. Most Canadians have not been there but Canada's Arctic is what makes Canada unique.

With regard to Meech Lake, my constituents will know that as a member of the special committee to study Premier McKenna's proposed resolution, I am working diligently with my colleagues to ensure that northerners are not casualties of the 1987 Meech Lake Accord.

I want to express appreciation on behalf of Western Arctic residents to Premier McKenna of New Brunswick. His proposal stands in stark contrast to those who have treated the negative impact on the north as an acceptable level of damage in this round. When our Minister of Justice, Michael Ballantine, appeared before the special committee, he stated and I quote: "Premier McKenna has given us hope that our efforts to improve upon the Meech Lake Accord over the past three years have not been in vain."

Northerners complained about the alteration of the process for the creation of new provinces. The extension of provincial boundaries, the lack of territorial participation in the nomination of senators and Supreme Court judges and the exclusion of the territories from the whole consultative process leading to the Meech Lake Accord are many of the concerns that the New Brunswick resolution addresses.

The Prime Minister failed to represent the northerners when we were excluded from the meeting in May 1987 and he has neglected to show any principle or fair leadership since. He did not recognize that, like Quebecers, northerners are eager to become full partners in the constitutional councils of this nation. The Prime Minister is wrong if he believes that Quebec wanted the two territories to become casualties in this national reconciliation with Quebec. The Northwest Territories is the only jurisdiction in Canada in which aboriginal peoples constitute a majority of the population. The elected representatives of the people of the Northwest Territories are trying to shape a tolerant society that will meet the distinct aspirations of Canadians in the northern third of Canada.

I am pleased to tell the members of this House that through a recent amendment to the NWT Official Languages Act, the legislative assembly has recognized the six major aboriginal languages as official languages of the Northwest Territories along with English and French. This is unique in Canada. In many ways northerners are showing leadership in their desire to try to understand one another. They are role models for all Canadians. There are 53 distinct and unique aboriginal languages indigenous to Canada, only three of which are not threatened and there are no provisions for these languages anywhere. Aboriginal peoples in the Northwest Territories have been striving to be full partners in Canada for a very long time. Recently, the Dene-Métis and Inuit initialled comprehensive claims packages which cover most of the territories. Now that outstanding comprehensive land claims in the north are finally being concluded, the people of the Northwest Territories are in a much better position to move toward provincial status in a way that respects the place of the distinct aboriginal cultures of the north.

Northerners goals for provincehood is also enhanced by the north's rich resources. Oil and gas reserves in the north could make Canada energy self-sufficient. The Government of the Northwest Territories is negotiating with the federal government a northern energy accord which would give the N.W.T. control and management of oil and gas rights, including the administration of oil and gas resource revenues such as royalties, bonus payments, rentals and licence fees. If the federal government would give Canadians some indication of its national energy policy, then northerners and westerners could plan with more certainty the development of oil and gas resources. But we do not know whether the government is committed to frontier energy or east coast or tar sands.

• (1310)

In typical fashion, the government continues to play one region against the other. The federal government has to start recognizing what northern Canada can offer instead of trying to cripple our very existence. Government members must wake up to the fact that the nineties are here.

For decades, the Northwest Territories has been described as the last frontier, a part of this nation having great potential, but not yet fully integrated into the Canadian mainstream. I have tried to challenge this myth since I was elected to Parliament, but challenging the myths and perception about the frontier also means identifying how we could be affected, like any other region of this country, by forces which are sometimes beyond our control.

This means identifying how national initiatives, such as the GST, could undermine the encouraging economic climate we are currently experiencing and which is expected to continue into the future. In its current form, the introduction of the GST will mean that northerners will pay more taxes on almost all purchases. In total they will pay much more than residents of southern Canada who purchase similar baskets of goods and services.

An employee in the Northwest Territories earning $30,000 might have the purchasing power of an individual earning $20,000 in the south. The southern resident will receive the full benefit of a tax credit, but the northern resident will not because the credit will be phased out for families earning over $24,800 annually. The impact of the GST on business and industry in the north is disastrous.

I do not know if the economy of the north is strong enough to withstand another two or three years of the federal government's anti-regional development policies. The 59 communities scattered throughout the N.W.T. are located in an area comprising roughly one third of Canada's land mass and only six of them are accessible on a year-round basis by the national road network.

Forty per cent of the population must rely entirely on air and marine transportation services for the movement of people and goods. Referring to the minister's speech, through you Madam Speaker, it has to be a consideration when these programs are developed or transferred. The distances between these communities are great and, combined with the small population in most of them, the result is that the costs of getting into and out of them are high, compared to southern Canada.

Employers are forced to maintain expensive stockpiles of materials and equipment to ensure continued operations. These conditions, coupled with the possibility of delayed access due to extreme weather, restrict the mobility of a large number of N.W.T. residents, limiting not only access to goods and services but also access to training and job opportunities.

The housing shortage is also critical in the Northwest Territories. The need and demand for public housing and subsidized home ownership is growing, far exceeding the supply available. Physical and systemic barriers to employment also exist. The lack of readily available day care facilities, adult training centres and public housing rental rate structures create disincentives to those on welfare and must be overcome. We have waited for six years for this government's child care program, but the Prime Minister cannot understand that six years is too long.

I would like to thank you for this opportunity. The north is a diverse region of this country. We have many aspects of our economy, of our constitutional development, of our social entity that we could speak to and go on forever, but I know my time is limited.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague on a very good speech in the House of Commons as it relates to the difficulties of the far north.

I would like to ask my colleague a specific question relating to her remarks about Meech Lake. I would like to know her feelings and the feelings of people in the north relating to the creation of provinces, if Meech Lake goes through as is. I think that is something I have heard her speak of on numerous occasions. It would be to the benefit of all of us to have her elaborate on that particular difficulty as it relates to that agreement.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, it is not so much what I as a member of Parliament feel but what my constituents and government representatives of the Northwest Territories have put forward to the joint standing committee of the Senate and the committee on which I sit to deal with the McKenna resolution.

The Northwest Territories want to revert to the pre-1982 arrangement for the creation of provinces, that is for the government to have the sole jurisdiction for the creation of provinces, which is how all the other provinces were created. This is what they want. This is what McKenna's recommendation is and what seems to be favourable. They feel anything outside that will freeze them out forever and negate any opportunity for them to become provinces in the future.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have a short question for my hon. colleague. I too congratulate her on her presentation.

Based on her intimate knowledge of the north and the Dene people, I would like to ask a specific question regarding the Dene-Métis agreement signed recently. I have heard that the Dene people are very supportive of it. We have heard some positive comments, but I have not heard the member give her official position on it. I would appreciate her taking advantage of this opportunity to give us her position on the recent signed agreement.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I have absolutely no hesitation in making my position clear. I spoke with the Dene-Métis, before they set forth to initial the agreement, on my views regarding the agreement. I sat in the House when the Prime Minister indicated that he wanted me to thank the government for the Dene-Métis having initialled such a wonderful agreement.

My own official position is that the Dene-Métis have worked very hard for the last 16-odd years. I congratulate them because they had to go through a very difficult negotiation process. That process involved their affinity for the land, their lifestyle and the fact that they settled the land claims without dealing with one or two very crucial elements.

The Dene-Métis wanted to negotiate self-government while negotiating land claims, but because the land claims comprehensive policy was as it was and the government would not change it, they could not do that. Furthermore, the minister indicated there could not be the possibility of entrenching self-government in the Constitution until the first ministers were on board at a constitutional conference.

It has been a severe dilemma for the aboriginal peoples who have settled land claims not to have self-government. I have indicated to my people that they make the decisions and I support them whole-heartedly.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak today on the motion of my colleague who represents the riding of Kenora—Rainy River. I am pleased to speak on this motion because I think the government has to hear what the people are saying regarding its policies. That is exactly what I will try to do today.

The government's record with regard to the well-being of the northern region is shameful. As a member of Parliament representing a northern Ontario riding I am very concerned about the effects of recent legislation introduced by the government.

I am speaking more specifically about the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, the VIA Rail cut-backs, and the effects of the goods and services tax especially as it relates to tourism in northern Ontario.

The proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act will have an extremely negative impact on the poor and middle class in my riding of Nipissing as well as on the rest of the country and northern Ontario. It will also put a heavy burden on small business which makes up the majority of the economy in the north.

The government has targeted the average person and small business with a whopping new federal tax, one that it is now trying to sell to the public. How will the government ensure that the social safety nets are in place to protect people who bear the burden of unemployment this new tax will likely create? The government hits people with another blow, another unemployment insurance cut when they are already down.

• (1320)

At a time of expected inflation, economic slowdown and therefore anticipated unemployment, a responsible government should be trying to ensure that its social safety nets are secure and something in which the people can have a sacred trust.

How does this government plan for the future of its citizens? It has done so through the eyes of the free traders who want to make sure that the government makes no contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. This government is proposing to stop contributing to the fund completely.

Its cutting of contributions will be substantial, about $2.9 billion this year, and it will leave the workers and business to pick up the shortfall. This will mean an increase in contributions by workers and employers. For small business which makes up the majority of the northern Ontario economy, it will put pressure on them when it comes time to expand. Can they really afford to hire anyone else? Can they afford the ever increasing rates of contributions.

We all know that those increased costs are passed on to the consumers whose net pay has just decreased through the higher deduction for unemployment insurance. This government's quest for a level playing field is going to end up ploughing under the workers and small businesses in northern Ontario.

The tourist industry which northern Ontario relies on cannot withstand more cost increases. We are already seeing the impact of this government's policy in this sector. The tourist industry is a large employer in the north. How will the workers survive on the reduced benefits that they must rely on with seasonal jobs?

The government looked at the unemployment insurance fund and saw a surplus last year. With its usual lack of foresight, instead of realizing that a surplus is necessary during economic growth so that funds will be there during a recession, it decided it was great time to pull out of the program altogether.

The government saw the surplus as a perfect excuse to walk away from its responsibility to the unemployed in this country. It could not leave it at just that. It would have been bad enough, but it was not enough for this government. No, it also had to increase the number of weeks needed to be eligible for benefits and then cut the length of time a person can collect.

In my riding of Nipissing a person would need 17 weeks of employment to receive about 24 weeks of benefits if the legislation were in effect today. Even if a person has never collected before in his or her life, he or she is only eligible for 45 weeks of benefits. If the government is no longer going to give money to this program, then why on earth should it be deciding by itself how to change the program? Where is the input from employers and employees? Who will pay for the entire program?

Employers know that without unemployment insurance the local economy suffers. They know that people on unemployment insurance can at least afford to keep buying essentials and paying their bills. That will not be the case if they are forced on to welfare.

Tourism is one of the biggest hidden industries in the country, particularly in northern Ontario. It is an industry which contributes $24 billion to Canada's Gross National Product, which provides employment for 10 per cent of the country's workforce, and which is Canada's second largest earner of foreign exchange at $7 billion per year. It provides employment in all regions of Canada including summer employment for students and part-time employment and jobs for unskilled labour.

In the near north alone tourism generates $200 million annually and $1 billion across northern Ontario. yet through its policies the government continues to neglect this vital industry and places its existence in jeopardy.

In 1989 we experienced the unprecedented $3 billion balance of payments deficit in the travel account. To compound the problem, Canada's share of world tourism has been cut in half over the last decade. What is the government doing? It is making it even more difficult for our industry to compete effectively by adding an additional cost of at least 7 per cent.

Fifty per cent of travel in Canada as a whole and seventy-five per cent of travel in northern Ontario is a result of Canadians deciding to travel. Where is the incentive for our own citizens to travel in our own country when they can get more value for their money south of the border? With the exception of British Columbia, every province has experienced a net decline in tourism over the past year.

With the dismantling of defence industries around the world and the opening of the East Bloc tourism in the 1990s will rapidly become the world's largest industry. With its natural endowments and breathtaking scenery Canada is in an excellent position to expand its market share. This could only happen if we offer good value at competitive prices and if we undertake more effective promotion. However tourism is highly price sensitive. There is no question that if the GST is introduced it will cripple this industry. What about more effective promotion, when the government slashes the budget for tourism from $35 million to $20 million at the same time as it provides about $30 million in aid to McDonnell-Douglas of Toronto? One has to question the priorities of the government.

Let us examine the effect of the GST on northern development. Northerners experience high prices for most consumer goods, and industries in the north incur higher costs due to higher transportation costs. With a 7 per cent GST added to transportation, how enticing does the government think it will be for business to set up shop in the north?

The cut-backs to VIA Rail are yet another example. Last year's cuts to VIA rail were a tremendous blow to the northern Ontario region. Thousands of VIA Rail workers lost their jobs and the effects on the economy were crippling. Transportation infrastructure in the north is absolutely essential for the development of its economy. How are northern towns and cities supposed to attract industries and tourists if we further reduce the transportation infrastructure?

The government advocates economic policies that are almost entirely based on the private sector as the driving force of the economy. We have news for the government: the economy in northern Ontario is suffering, and it does not need a kick in the vicinity especially where your back changes it name. That is what this government has done.

Traditionally Canada has always maintained a balance between the private and the pubic sector to keep its economy strong and vibrant. This principle is especially important in the poorer regions of Canada which are dependent on the government for their economic well-being.

Canada's northern region is no exception to that. Northern Ontario needs the implication of the government to develop itself to its full potential. A good transportation system is essential to achieve that. I urge the government to reintroduce the VIA Rail routes which were cut and to reaffirm its commitment to the north. It is clear to all of us on this side of the House and to all the people of the north that the present policies of this government are extremely devastating to the north.

Why is this government not listening to the people who elected it? These people are asking the government to put policies in place which will assist them, but the government is proposing and advocating detrimental policies.

We need the VIA Rail service for a proper transportation infrastructure. We need a proper unemployment insurance system which will assist economic development in the north. We do not want the GST; it will only cause considerable hardship to our economy.

Finally, we want a strong commitment from this government for the well-being of the north. I do not think I can make myself clearer on these issues. I just hope that this message has been clearly understood by our present government. I thank you, Madam Speaker, and my colleague from northern Ontario for the opportunity to speak on this motion.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Nipissing, on his very extensive and detailed analysis of what is going on in the north. Particularly, as I think all my hon. colleagues will know, I feel very strongly about his words relative to VIA Rail. It is nice to see the parliamentary secretary here today to listen to these remarks about VIA Rail. I hope the government will heed the words of the hon. member.

One of the areas the member did not touch on which is something that is also very critical to northerners is the high interest rates and how they affect northern business. I thought it might be appropriate to ask the hon. member to elaborate and give us some insight on what the effects of high interest rates will be on northerners if these rates stay at the current level or increase in the coming months.

Mr. Wood: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the question. The high interest rates in the north are having an extremely detrimental effect, especially as far as enticing new business to the north.

FedNor, the regional development tool which was set up, has worked fairly well; but it has come to a grinding halt in the last three or four months because to make this program work we need money from the private sector as well, money put in by investors themselves. It seems to have bogged down mainly because of the current high interest. The companies that are looking to come to northern Ontario are holding back and waiting for the interest rates to go down. Nipissing is probably one of the more active communities in northern Ontario in enticing business to come to that area. We have been fairly successful in utilizing a lot of the government programs and have been very successful in enticing new business to the North Bay and Nipissing areas. A lot of companies that want to come to northern Ontario are looking at expansion but are waiting out the interest rates and that is having a tremendously detrimentalaffect in northern Ontario.

The Canadian dollar is high and I think that the people who want to compete in the United States, now that the free trade agreement is here—we might not like it but we have to live with it—are waiting for the dollar to drop so they can compete under the free trade agreement and make money. We have lots of money but who can afford to borrow at the present rates?

The regional development program of the government seems to make it easier to move different departments in the area than to develop. We have many opportunities for development but with the high interest rates it is very difficult. In northern Ontario we would certainly appreciate the interest rates dropping so that we could become competitive with the rest of Canada.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I too, appreciate the comments from my hon. colleague opposite. I would like to put my question with regard to his comments on VIA Rail.

The number one problem in this country, I am told regularly by my constituents, is the state of the national deficit. They are concerned about spending. We all know that the average subsidy for every rider on VIA Rail was about $100 last year. We were spending over $600 million a year subsidizing VIA Rail. It is very comfortable sitting in the opposition criticizing the cut-backs in VIA Rail. I would like to know how much more the hon. member was willing to subsidize VIA Rail before he would support a cut-back in the service.

Mr. Wood: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. The VIA Rail cut-backs were devastating to northern Ontario and I think that although the people on this side of the House recognize the deficit, to cut off a service that is of really great help to northern Ontario is not the way to go about it, especially the way the government did.

It does have VIA Rail running through northern Ontario but, for some reason, it has it running through the northern portion of the province which has a population draw of roughly 50,000 to 60,000 people, instead of maintaining a route through North Bay, Sudbury and the Thunder Bay area which has a draw of roughly 400,000 people.

If the government is trying to provide a service to northern Ontario that would help expansion that, in my mind, is not the way to do it. The particular run that through northern Ontario that it cut was the third most efficient run of VIA Rail. According to some of the articles in the paper recently, VIA Rail was on track. According to many reports, it was just a matter of time before many of these runs that were cut would have become viable.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I rise to debate today the motion put forward by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River, who also is in regular attendance at the transport committee meetings. I am sure his seatmate was speaking about something dear to his heart. This government is committed to building a strong economy encouraged by incentive and opportunity, an economy which is competitive with the world's trading nations.

In order to fully achieve this goal we must create a solid base which will allow our economy to flourish in the coming years. Measures which seek to control the deficit and reduce the national debt are an essential element to this foundation for the future.

Equally, measures which seek to establish a sound fiscal framework to sustain continued economic development are essential to our purpose. These objectives are reflected in this government's commitment to a sound transportation policy. Transportation is and always will be at the heart of our nation's economy. This is why we have undertaken to provide Canadians with a safe and efficient transportation sector. This commitment is the core upon which our policy of economic regulation reform was built.

Madam Speaker, I should indicate to you I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Abitibi.

With the advent of the free trade agreement the role played by transportation in our economic development has become increasingly vital as we enter the next decade and the next century. A cost-effective transportation system is essential if Canada is to preserve and enhance its position in world trade. In order to meet this challenge we must make the best of each mode of transportation. We are not just talking about air, rail, marine, truck, and bus transportation, but the use of the automobile as a transportation mode, something with which Canadians have a love affair.

Continued subsidization of a mode of transportation which costs more and more and used less and less is not a sound investment in our future, particularly when that investment is being made with the Canadian taxpayers' money. That was exactly the situation we were facing with respect to our national rail passenger network.

VIA Rail subsidy rose to an unprecedented $641 million in 1988. This translates into a subsidy of $100 per passenger. We were asking all Canadians to pay this subsidy but only 3 per cent of the travelling public used this mode of transportation. Canadians have demonstrated their preference for other modes of transportation. With a market share of 84 per cent, the automobile is clearly the mode of choice.

Reducing the subsidies to VIA Rail was a difficult decision to make. We had a system that was expensive and inefficient. The government, however, does recognize that in a country as large and diverse as ours there are some truly isolated communities which do not have access to any other mode of transportation. In order to meet this need, nine routes in five provinces were maintained and continue to be subsidized. They are Winnipeg to Capreol, which can now be serviced by The Transcontinental; Jasper to Prince Rupert; The Pas to Lynn Lake; Wabowden to Churchill; Winnipeg to Churchill; Sudbury to White River; Montreal to Senneterre; Senneterre to Cochrane; and Montreal to Jonquière.

Many other countries are making decisions concerning rail passenger services based on their unique demographic and economic realities. Our decision has to be considered in light of the fact that we have the second largest country in the world with one of the smallest populations. VIA service must be consistent with the realities of the density of the Quebec-Windsor corridor and also the different needs of Canada's regions.

Contrary to the wording of the motion before us today, I believe we have taken the necessary action to ensure the future of VIA as a national, affordable and sustainable rail passenger network. The combined public and private spending on transportation in Canada over the next 10 years can only be measured in hundreds of billions of dollars. Therefore, an effective consideration of such an integrated system required the government to establish a forum that would permit all Canadians to be heard in a thoughtful, comprehensive and forward looking manner.

• (1340)

The royal commission announced by the Prime Minister at the same time as the changes to VIA Rail, will inquire into and report on a national integrated inter-city passenger transportation system to meet the needs of Canada and Canadians well into the future.

The size and importance of our transportation system cannot be overstated. Its future development must lead to a system which will meet the challenges of the 21st century.

The royal commission was asked to inquire into and recommend solutions on the role of a national integrated inter-city passenger transportation system and its relationship to the entire transportation system, the structure of a suitable multi-modal transportation system demonstrating linkages, the potential for and constraints on achieving a national system and the appropriate financial arrangements to achieve such a system, taking into account the jurisdiction of all levels of government and the role of the private sector.

The commission will look ahead into the 21st century to advise the government on the needs of Canadians and on the relationship between the modes of transportation of the future. This royal commission, through its wide consultation and broad mandate, is expected to provide a clear action plan that will ensure that the transportation links among Canada's regions are maintained and improved.

In making this announcement, the Prime Minister stressed the importance of taking into account the wide range of interests of Canadians and the respective roles of all levels of government and the private sector in the provision of inter-city services. He also emphasized the necessity to balance Canada's transportation needs with the government's policy of environmentally sustainable economic development.

The royal commission will examine Canada's unique social and democratic trends and look ahead to ways in which the transportation system must respond to meet the competing needs and demands of users, operators, employees and other interested parties. The commission is expected to provide Canadians with a blueprint for a comprehensive, co-ordinated passenger system to take us well into the 21st century.

All Canadians are aware that we must reduce the burden of the debt. Canadians have been asked to tighten their belts and VIA cannot be an exception.

This government has distinguished itself during the past four years through fiscal responsibility and judicious allocation of federal financial resources. When money is scarce, it has spent where it was most needed and most likely to produce results.

I invite members opposite and, indeed, all Canadians to look at the facts and to judge for themselves the validity of the fiscal realities under which we currently labour. If we have had to make difficult decisions, it is because in 1984 we inherited a legacy of debt, a legacy which I personally do not care to pass on to my children and to their children.

The difficult choices we have been forced to make have allowed us to reduce the growth of the deficit and bring the rate of inflation down to a more acceptable level. Responsible fiscal management combined with sound economic policies have paved the road to a rate of economic growth which rates among the highest in the industrialized world. As responsible Canadians we owe it to our children to leave them with every opportunity for development that we ourselves have enjoyed.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, if he thinks so highly of the rail cutbacks, how he can justify that with what the Deputy Prime Minister said in the 1980s, particularly in 1984 and 1985 when he reinstated routes that had previously been cut. He also promised there would be new equipment for rail service in Canada, and by so doing raised expectations among the people. But he did not then provide the new equipment or give the reinstated routes and previously existing routes the opportunity to do any promotion of their own to increase rail passenger service. He summarily cut it out just a few short months ago.

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, I am not sure time will allow me to get into the whole framework of what the hon. member has brought before us.

However, we must remember that the government did not have the money which was going to be demanded for VIA to bring in new equipment. The government did replace the engine fleet. The orders have been placed and most have already been delivered. We are updating, I believe, some 200. Half of the fleet is being updated and brought in so that it is electrified and not steam-heated, as it is now. All these things are in concert with the role that VIA is being asked to fulfil in our country. In 1988 and 1989, it looked as if the utilization of the passenger train was going up. The revenues were going up. At the same time, expenses were going up at a higher rate than revenues. The line was getting further apart. That is why we have turned around and had to cut out a number of the routes.

Mr. Nault: CN was gouging.

Mr. Belsher: What do you mean, CN was gouging? CN was not gouging them.

The facts did not bespeak that when we saw CN's annual report last year. The hon. member opposite says the railway companies gouging them. There were incentives built into the contracts. If the on-time was maintained on the routes, there were premiums to be paid on the amount of utilization. Incentives were built in to make sure the companies would not stand in VIA's way in performing its role.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to what my friend, the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, had to say about cutting costs and so on.

I would just point out that during the last four or five years the deficit has doubled from $170 billion to about $350 billion today. I am not sure he is doing that great a job in that regard.

In northern Ontario—and we are talking about northern areas today—we got word of the cutting out of Air Canada service to all northeastern Ontario on a Monday. I think it was the Tuesday that we heard of cuts in Air Canada service to Timmins, Sudbury, North Bay, and the communities in between. Then, there were VIA Rail cuts. Our frustration is that, after the cuts, VIA Rail ends up servicing communities with some 20,000 or 30,000 people, whereas it was previously servicing some 300,000 or 400,000 people in Sudbury, Thunder Bay, and so on. The chances of success are really very limited. One can see the frustration people have with the cut-backs in transportation, as a regional development tool, made this past winter. The government has done a tremendous disservice to northern Ontario with these cut-backs.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A short comment from the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, the hon. member begins his remarks by talking about the debt. There was a $200 billion debt in 1984. It has cost $120 billion to service that debt. I talked about the slowing down of the rate of growth. That is the problem, but nobody on the other side of the House wants to admit it.

An hon. member: That's the Liberals' problem.

Mr. Belsher: Well, it is true. Those are the facts. They put their heads in the sand and—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now expired.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Fraser Valley East for letting me use his allotted time.

The goods and services tax will have a substantial, positive impact on all regions in this country, including the north, and more specifically, northern Ontario and northern Quebec.

The existing federal sales tax makes our products less competitive on foreign markets and favours imports over Canadian goods. This applies to northern Canada as well.

No fewer than 22,000 provisions and administrative arrangements have been required for a tax system that has only 75,000 taxpayers.

Furthermore, consumers have practically no way of knowing how much federal tax they pay when they purchase an item. Since the tax is applied at the manufacturing level, most Canadians don't even know they are paying the tax.

The federal sales tax is archaic and undermines the competitive potential of our economy. It must be replaced, and the federal government has made the requisite commitment.

The GST will differ from the existing federal sales tax in three respects.

First, the GST will apply to most goods and services, at a rate of 7 per cent. Because of its narrow base, the existing tax applies to only one-third of goods and services, at a rate that is normally 13.5 per cent.

Second, to collect the GST, only the value added to goods and services at each production and distribution stage will be taxed. Businesses will collect the tax on their sales to other businesses or to consumers, but they will obtain a full refund of the tax paid on their business purchases.

Third, the GST will be a visible tax. Its visibility consists basically in the fact that it will be applied at the retail level, to a very broad base and at a uniform rate.

Mr. Nault: That isn't true!

Mr. Saint-Julien: In this way, Canadians will know when they pay federal sales tax and at what rate.

Madam Speaker, the hon. member implies that the GST will increase the cost of goods, thus penalizing businesses located in the north, in northern Ontario and northern Quebec. In fact, northern businesses are now paying federal sales tax on a wide range of inputs, including fuel, vehicles, computers, office supplies, construction materials and communications. Even inputs that are exempt from the present tax contain tax components. Consequently, the existing federal sales tax adds substantially to business costs.

With the GST, businesses will be able to recover all federal tax paid on their inputs. All suppliers of goods and services who collect the GST on their sales will receive a credit for the tax paid on their inputs. The difference between the GST collected on their sales and the GST paid on their inputs will be paid to the federal government.

However, when the GST on purchases exceeds the GST on sales, the difference will be refunded to the business.

Merchants selling tax-free items such as basic groceries, prescription drugs, medical devices and goods and services for export will also be eligible for the input tax credit, even if they do not collect GST on their sales.

It is clear the GST will result in lower production costs, compared with the present system, and will improve productivity in all our regions, including the north.

It is often said that the positive economic impact of the GST will not be uniform across Canada, favouring Central Canada's manufacturing regions at the expense of other regions. In fact, the positive impact on the primary sector will be twice as substantial as on the manufacturing sector. We all know that the resource industry, including exports, is the mainstay of the economy of Canada's north, of northern Ontario and northern Quebec.

Long-term production gains for the primary sector as a result of sales tax reform will be 3.3 per cent, compared with 1.4 per cent for the manufacturing sector.

Furthermore, productivity in the transport and public services sector will increase 3.1 per cent, more than twice as much as the manufacturing sector.

The existing federal tax does not apply to manufacturers but to manufactured products. These are used everywhere in Canada, especially in those regions that are largely dependent on natural resources. In fact, the extraction and processing of raw materials involves to a considerable extent the use of equipment and construction materials. As I said earlier, Madam Speaker, these goods include substantial federal sales tax components, both directly and indirectly, thus increasing production costs and making companies less competitive.

The input tax credits will completely eliminate the federal sales tax on production and distribution. Buyers of equipment will see the cost of capital goods go down by about 4 per cent. This will result in increased production in northern areas, including northern Ontario, whose economy is heavily dependent on raw materials and exports.

The question of transportation costs has been raised many times. At present, the transport of goods is taxed indirectly since carriers pay tax on a large percentage of their inputs. These costs are reflected in the price of their services and ultimately in the retail prices charged to consumers. Under the GST, transport companies will claim the tax paid on their inputs and this will lower their operating costs.

Retailers and wholesalers will be better off because they in turn will benefit from the tax credit on inputs.

One of the most important features of the new tax is the GST credit, which is meant to protect Canadians on low and moderate incomes. Families whose annual income does not exceed $30,000 will pay less tax than they do now. Three quarters of families headed by a senior or a single parent will see their after-tax income increase once the GST is in place.

The GST credit is a simple and fair way to protect less fortunate Canadians. It helps those who need it most.

Madam Speaker, those who think the government is not committed to Northern communities are mistaken. The goods and services tax is fair and equitable because it will apply to all Canadians equally, taking account of their particular economic situation. This tax will bring the North considerable benefits, not only for businesses but also for individuals.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague from Abitibi a question relating to the goods and services tax, which he spent the majority of his speech talking about.

One aspect he did not elaborate on was that, once the goods and services tax comes into force, there will be a tax on services. This is something northern communities in an area like Abitibi, an area very similar to northern Ontario, have never had to deal with. The member would be well advised to explain to his constituents the effect this new service tax will have on the tourism industry and the price of goods transported from southern regions.

The member seems to believe that there are hidden costs in the manufactured product. Once the MST is removed, it will be transferred to the consumer as a saving and the price of goods would not rise.

Would the member tell me if he feels that because there was no service tax before—and there will be when the GST comes into effect—that this will be an added cost to his constituents?

I give him the example of electricity. In our region this has already increased by 15 per cent. They believe the goods and services tax will have that affect on them, and they are getting prepared for that now.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, to follow up on the comment made by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Nault), we know the situation is the same with Hydro-Quebec in Quebec. This utility raised the tax substantially. But Hydro-Quebec, in our province, forgot to pass on the benefit from the GST.

But I would like to say to him that if we impose a visible 7 per cent tax, why did the Liberals, who were in power for 20 years in Canada, never make the 13.5 per cent tax visible?

Mr. Duhamel: It was 9 per cent five years ago, don't forget!

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to statements by members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, this is National Forest Week. It is not too much to say that in Canada the forests are the environment. Of course, we all know that no subject is more important to the world today than the environment, and in Canada, no subject is more important to the environment than our forests.

If the concept of sustainable development is ever going to be applied successfully in Canada, it must begin with our forests. To put it simply, at least in my view, we must start the process of sustainable development by placing the forest map of Canada on the table with all of the players present, then we must decide in advance what we all want to accomplish. We must determine what our forests can produce and sustain over time and space, and we must reconcile ourselves to a consensus with society's interest in the balance. Only in that fashion will we be able to find a vision for Canada's forests which is both attainable and sustainable.

PARENTS' RESOURCES INSTITUTE FOR DRUG EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, PRIDE is the acronym for Parents' Resources Institute for Drug Education. It was established in 1983 in Saskatoon as a response to the growing problem of illegal use of drugs in Canada.

It provides information, products and services for the fight against the inappropriate use of drugs. It is really a partnership among youth, their parents and teachers, as well as other professionals who have joined together to try to combat this growing menace.

It is supported by different organizations. For example, in my constituency, it is supported by school boards and schools. I note that the Norwood School Division, the St. Boniface School Division and the St. Vital School Division are supporters of PRIDE.

Right now between 1,500 and 2,500 young people and their supporters are in Winnipeg celebrating the sixth annual conference. This year's theme is "The 90s—Building a Drug-Free Canada".

BURK'S FALLS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased and privileged to offer my heartiest congratulations to the village of Burk's Falls on the occasion of its centennial. The centennial of Burk's Falls has a special meaning for me as I have proudly called that village my home for over 50 years.

Opening celebrations begin on Saturday, May 12. I would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge with many thanks the hard work of all the organizers responsible for planning theme events throughout the village. No doubt residents and visitors alike will be enticed into reflecting upon the proud heritage that has shaped the unique and wonderful village of Burk's Falls.

Our special guest of honour on that day will be His Honour, the Honourable Lincoln Alexander, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario.

I am confident that the next 100 years will be embraced with the same vigour and sense of community that has graced the first. I look forward with great anticipation to taking part in the year's festivities.

We are hoping many former residents will come back home for the July 1 homecoming.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, while the Conservatives and Liberals continue to wage their turf war between the Commons and the Senate, tens of thousands of unemployed people continue to suffer the consequences.

Variable entrance legislation is necessary to balance the unemployment insurance coverage for those people who live in areas of high unemployment and to provide for them the benefits to which they are entitled.

Every day I get calls from people from all across Canada wanting to know why they are being penalized by these two parties when their families are without basic necessities because of this ping-pong game being played by the Parliament of Canada.

In the name of fairness and decency, I ask this government to withdraw Bill C-21 and to pass immediately the variable entrance legislation which the New Democratic Party has asked for since November of last year.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on October 15, 1988, the Prime Minister of Canada stated: "As long as I am Prime Minister social benefits, especially for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished."

He also said: "Let me say a special word to senior citizens here tonight. In the future Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you."

Cutting moneys to the New Horizons Program is not doing more for Canadian seniors. We have not been successful here in this House in obtaining a firm answer from the minister responsible, nor has the Minister of National Health and Welfare been very co-operative in providing information on the subject of provincial allocation of New Horizons money and whether or not funds have been cut or perhaps shuffled.

Today I called the office of New Horizons to ascertain the provincial allocations. There has been a gag order placed on officials of that department not to provide information to members of Parliament.

In 1988, over 10 per cent of Canada's population was over the age of 65. By the year 2021 the number will have risen to 21 per cent. This government is not responding to the needs of our Canadian seniors. If anything, it is going behind their backs to cut the funding from such organizations as the New Horizons Program.

TRIBUTE TO JEAN-GUY LAPOINTE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, like many other Quebecers, Jean-Guy Lapointe is starting his golf season, but if you know that both his arms have been amputated, it takes on a whole new meaning.

Indeed, I could not help feel immense admiration when I saw Mr. Lapointe's photograph in Le Journal de Montréal of May 8. His golf equipment includes a breastplate or jacket surrounding his chest. Attached to it are an artificial wrist and a hook to hold the clubs. Mr. Lapointe's golf partners, in this case his wife Monique who has always supported him in his greatest desires, only have to put the clubs in his artificial limb.

This 51-year-old man was involved in an accident as a lineman nine years ago. A lover of sports before his accident, he has remained so and he now runs 20 kilometres a day. He intends to take part in his second marathon next fall in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to pay special tribute to this man today for the example of courage he gives to us all as Canadians.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, since January, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his department have had a proposal from the inshore fishermen concerning the 1990 quota allocations in fishing areas 4X and 5, but they have taken no action on it. Nor has the minister responded to the repeated requests by fishermen and municipal officials to sit down with him and his predecessor to discuss the situation since the fishery closed last summer.

These fishermen have had very little chance to fish in the last year, and their frustration with the minister's inaction resulted in their occupying the Fisheries and Oceans office in Yarmouth on Tuesday.

If the minister does not act within the next few days, he and his officials will have to accept responsibility for what happens.

These people are tired of being told that the stocks on Georges Bank must be protected when they see the Americans landing record catches on Georges, the offshore freezer factory ships within our waters and the foreigners overfishing.

I call on the minister to meet with the premier, who said yesterday to these people that he had to have a meeting with the minister as soon as possible to discuss this urgent crisis in the fishery. I call on the minister to meet with the premier before next week.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, over the past months a number of strong public statements have called upon this government to demonstrate further prudence in its management and expenditures. Canadians recognize that we need greater symmetry between our fiscal policy and Canada's monetary policy. Both must be more supportive of the other.

It follows that further spending restraint can only be more supportive of the Bank of Canada's ongoing fight against inflation. These actions on the fiscal side, although often difficult, can only lead to much needed latitude for interest rates.

The task before us is to get on with it. The Auditor General and others have outlined opportunities for us to do so. I call upon all my colleagues to be more cognizant of the problems posed by government expenditures and to have an active interest or involvement in their reduction.

GUYANA

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my voice with that of a delegation from International Solidarity for Democracy in Guyana who are here today to call on our government to review its economic recovery program for Guyana. The disbursements of the program's funds have led to unrefuted charges of misappropriation, misspending and abuse by Guyanese government officials to secure their positions. Human rights abuses are legion.

An angry United States has threatened to withdraw its contributions to the economic program. It is time that Canada too made aid conditional upon the correction of these abuses.

The Guyanese president still refuses to provide audited accounts of how aid moneys will be spent. Resentment and frustration is widespread among the general public and economic disarray is evident everywhere. Emigration is escalating.

Effective economic recovery can only take place with a change in direction at the top. I urge this government to insist on free, fair, internationally monitored and supervised elections as a pre-condition for aid.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): The federal transport minister's version of the American war on drugs is an unwarranted attack on the fundamental right to privacy of 250,000 Canadians who work in the transport industry.

In a media conference here yesterday, the Seafarer's International Union launched a public campaign to persuade the minister and his government to drop their mass urine testing strategy. Having sent empty vials to all government MPs, the SIU is now urging their members and Canadians everywhere to send urine sample bottles to the minister. This could be called a "measured" response to the government's plan for drug testing, which has nothing to do with safety.

The real reason the government is pushing this policy is the American demand that we submit to their laws by January 2, 1992. The Tory idea of rights and freedoms and public safety seems to be a plan to deregulate industry, but regulate people.

I call upon the minister to drop his plan for mass testing of working Canadians and move instead to deal with the real hazards to public safety in transport, such as short staffing and massive overtime among air traffic controllers and radio operators who have been screaming for years for government action on safety.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, we are currently celebrating National Forest Week. The enormous contribution of pulp and paper, timber, wood panels and other wood products to our balance of trade is an impressive indication of the economic importance of Canadian forests. Indeed, our forests are the basis for our enviable economic position in the world marketplace.

The theme for National Forest Week is "Living Forests—Giving Forests". Our government's commitment to establishing a full-fledged Department of Forestry with a well-defined mandate is an indication of the importance accorded to the forest industry in Canada.

NATIONAL NURSES WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is National Nurses Week and, as in previous years, there will be an opportunity provided for members of Parliament to meet with members of the Canadian Nurses Association in the booth set up under the rotunda near the main entrance.

The more than 200,000 practising nurses in Canada are an integral part of the health care system and provide invaluable service in health care facilities, in the community and in the workplace. Their impressive contribution enhances the strength and effectiveness of our health care system.

The theme for National Nurses Week, May 7 to 12, is "Nurses and the Environment". This is certainly a most timely and appropriate emphasis on a subject of current global concern.

To pay tribute to the nurses of Canada for their unique contribution to the health of Canadians, I ask my colleagues to join me in recognizing National Nurses Week.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, recently 30,000 copies of a brochure entitled Today It's Canadian Pork were published through Agriculture Canada. The purpose of the brochure was to advertise the Canadian pork industry throughout the United States.

At the last minute the brochure was scrapped and burned because of industry protests over the photographs which showed an inferior product, a product portrayed as unappealing, unappetizing and hardly conducive to selling pork.

The costly mistake, $30,000 of taxpayers' money, is just one example of profligate government waste. This mistake could have been easily avoided had Agriculture Canada consulted with the pork industry at all steps of creating the brochure.

How often do costly and careless mistakes like this occur and how many departments condone this kind of needless waste? Proper consultation between government and industry must be the rule, not the exception, where public money is being spent.

Oral Questions

FORESTRY

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the recent global warning conference held here in Ottawa has been a great reminder of the importance of the forest industry to the future of Canada and, indeed, the world.

Their message was clear. Scientific evidence points to a need for more extensive forestry research and funding falls far short of this urgent requirement.

The theme of National Forest Week this year is: Our Forests as a Resource. Last December, a two-year forestry resource management agreement was signed for Nova Scotia. This agreement lacks the long-term vision which is so necessary for this resource. If Nova Scotia is to improve its forest resource then forest management must be enhanced and private land owners must have universal access to improvement programs.

This agreement requires woodlot owners to contribute to the upkeep of their stands. As many cannot afford this, the result will be a mismanaged resource.

With the glaring example of the fisheries crisis in Atlantic Canada, let the goal of the newly formed Department of Forestry be to avoid the depletion of this valuable resource and ensure that the forests do not fall victim to poor management and remain the foundation which supports the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. In a leaked U.S. State Department telex we learned today that Canada has agreed to join forces with the Americans to block further progress in the fight against global warming in discussions that will take place at a conference in Bergen, Norway, later this week.

Yet last April, in response to President Bush's "go slow" approach on harmful carbon dioxide emissions, the minister said: "The price of inaction is too high—We have sufficient indications (of global warming) to implement whatever action we can now."

Why has Canada agreed with the United States to hold back in getting additional progress in the fight against global warming? Why is this government saying "yes" to the Americans and "no" to the environment?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to state clearly and firmly that there is absolutely no agreement between the United States and Canada to achieve these resolutions. There has been no commitment by Canada to the United States on this.

I want to repeat that, while in Washington, I made a commitment publicly which I would like to reconfirm today. There will be targets and schedules for the reduction of CO_2 in The Green Plan.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the minister and his government support precise commitments to reduce carbon dioxide at the discussions in Bergen, Norway, taking place this week? Will he support efforts to get these commitments at Bergen this week? If he does not do that, is he not admitting that he has caved in to the Americans? I ask him today, again, to say "yes" to the environment and "no" to the Americans.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is an international process set up by different countries to achieve those commitments. The agenda was set up in Noordwijk a few months ago where all countries, Canada being in the the forefront of them, made the commitment once we are provided with the IPCC report, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change next August. After the Geneva conference in November precise commitments will be made in terms of targets and schedules to achieve CO_2 reductions. The Green Plan will reflect this when it is announced this fall.

We always say the same thing. It was never intended that commitments would be made on targets and schedules for CO_2 reductions at the Bergen conference. It is a conference intended as a follow-up to the Brundtland commission to prepare for the 1992 Brazil conference where, I hope—and Canada is pushing very hard for this—a convention will be concluded to set up targets and schedules to reduce CO_2 emissions.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister said last April, I repeat, "The price of inaction is too high—We have sufficient indications (of global warming) to implement whatever action we can now".

I ask the minister again why he is not willing to use the conference to carry out that commitment he made in Washington, and which he claims to be repeating now, to use that conference in Bergen to achieve progress with the other countries that want it in the fight against global warming.

[Translation]

I want to ask the minister a specific question. Who sets Canada's foreign policy on the environment: Ottawa or Washington?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if there is one area in which Canada has dissociated itself from certain U.S. undertakings, it is certainly the environment. We signed the declaration of The Hague, when the Americans did not. We signed the Basel agreement on the transportation of hazardous goods, but the Americans did not. We took the initiative on reducing acid rain, and we did so several years ago. The Americans are now following suit.

An hon. member: The Liberals did nothing.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): We have been active on many fronts. The Prime Minister was the first to announce that a convention must be signed in Brazil, in 1992, to set restrictions on CO_2 emissions.

We have an independent policy, but at the same time we co-operate with other countries because realize that the environment demands international solutions.

[English]

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the contracting practices of the government.

Yesterday, in sworn testimony before the Disciplinary Committee of the Quebec Order of Engineers, former Conservative MP Michel Gravel said that he had personally given to a former cabinet minister, namely Roch LaSalle, thousands of dollars representing the proceeds of a party at which businessmen had contributed $5,000 each.

Has the minister looked into this matter? Has he satisfied himself that the highest conduct of behaviour was observed by the then cabinet minister and by the Department of Public Works in the awarding of its contracts?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member would know, the RCMP is now aware, of course, of the allegations that were made yesterday. I am informed that the RCMP is looking into the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister. Aside from the RCMP inquiry which, according to the Solicitor General, is about to begin I have the following question for the Deputy Prime Minister: Is he now prepared to ask for a royal commission of inquiry on contracts awarded by the Department of Public Works and the Department of Supply and Services between 1984 and 1989, as I have been asking in this House for the past four years? Yes or no? If not, why not?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure why the hon. member would want a royal commission of inquiry when the Solicitor Generàl has indicated that the RCMP has taken cognizance of the allegations that have been made and they are investigating. What more does the hon. member want?

Oral Questions

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment who is aware that global warming is probably the most serious threat we have ever faced. The minister knows that in Toronto in 1988, Canada, along with many other countries, adopted to reduce carbon dioxide emissions into the atmosphere by 20 per cent by 2005.

We know that the intergovernmental panel report will be out in August. We know that there is going to be a meeting in Geneva in November. What members of this House and Canadians want to know in relation to the meeting that the minister is going to in Bergen is whether Canada will be moving on preliminary steps to stabilize the amount of carbon dioxide going into the atmosphere. The progressive countries, the countries that are alert to the nature of this threat, are seeking consensus and the United States is seeking to break that consensus.

Will Canada be on the right side of this issue or the wrong side?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will have the pleasure of being in Bergen in good company. As a matter of fact, it will be my pleasure to be there with two hon. members of the opposition and we are very happy to welcome them. I invited them with us because I felt this is a non-partisan issue and we should not repeat the kind of debate being discussed here in foreign countries. I trust that we have the full support of those colleagues.

This conference, I repeat, was never meant to announce specific commitments by any government on the CO_2 reduction issue. It is a conference in view of the Brazil conference in the following the Brundtland commission report.

This government has made a commitment that in The Green Plan this fall there will be the announcement of targets and schedules to reduce CO_2 emissions.

There are two reasons for doing this. The first is that all the countries in the world have said that they need to be provided with the IPCC report, in August, before making commitments. Second, we Canadians have engaged in a broad consultation process to learn what Canadians think and expect in regard to CO_2 reduction measures. We will respect the process. We believe that we must respect Canadian opinion, support and consultation on this. When we are ready, and we have announced that it will be in the fall, we will announce the commitment.

So we will not be there to create expectations. We will be in Bergen to support the countries, in view of the Brazil convention, and for the implementation of overall sustainable development measures.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think most members of this House are now aware that the implications of greenhouse warming mean that some entire nations on this earth could disappear beneath the surfaces of the oceans. That is a fact and it has been represented by many scientists in world fora.

My question to the minister is a very simple one and he does not need to beat around the bush. We have lost two years since Toronto. It is two more years until Brazil. During that four-year period we could have done a great deal to reduce particularly the amount of carbon dioxide emissions in the atmosphere.

Is the minister telling this House that while he is in Bergen on behalf of Canada he will support consensus for the reduction of carbon dioxide emissions?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will support the consensus to reduce CO_2 emissions and we will support what was established as the process in Nordvik a few months ago, the necessity of making precise commitments after all the countries are provided with the IPCC report.

Let us remind people that this report will be the end result of a very important and intense effort to gain scientific knowledge and reach conclusions on the extent of the phenomenon of global warming.

I think before issuing such threats as the disappearance of countries under the sea, my colleague should wait until he has the report. We know that there is some measure of scientific uncertainty. We Canadians feel that, while we are uncertain, we must subscribe to an insurance policy and announce during the fall precise commitments in terms of reduction of CO_2, and we will be doing just that. I can tell you that we will be one of the few countries in the world to do that.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My final supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. The minister has endorsed the Brundtland directive that full environmental assessments apply to both policy and projects in order to achieve sustainable development.

Can the minister assure this House that this will be fully honoured in the EARP legislation soon to be tabled in the House?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the government has made a commitment to present to Canadians a set of new measures to address those issues and to set up mechanisms to assess projects, policies and programs.

New measures are being drafted by the government and when they are ready, which will be very soon, certainly before the end of the session, we will announce what we have in mind and propose them to the country.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

In view of the fact that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has stated repeatedly that confidence in the Canadian dollar is one of the cornerstones of his monetary policy, and in view of the fact that representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and presidents of leading exporters in the pulp and paper industry and the mining industry are stating categorically that they need a reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar in order to survive, how can the Minister of Finance expect Canadians to be confident with the government's monetary policy when it is faced with such reservations by leading Canadian business leaders?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that these people are not saying anything other than what we are saying: the interest rates have to come down. Except, instead of believing in a rather magic or ill-defined solution as proposed by the opposition, we are using a monetary policy which is very clear, which is addressing the problem, and which will cause the pressures to come down in Canada. Then, with the inflationary pressures coming down, we will be able to lower the rate of interest and make sure that our economy continues to prosper.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. Since the Governor of the Bank of Canada says he is not at all sure when the situation will be such that he will be able to lower interest rates, could the Minister of State (Finance) perhaps tell Canadians when the government is going to realize that its monetary policy is creating a disaster situation for Canadian exporters?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member for Gloucester that inflation is the greatest threat to our exports, our economy and to progress in all our regions. He knows that perfectly well. We saw what happened under the Liberals, at the beginning of this decade, when we had interest rates in excess of 20 per cent and spiralling inflation. We don't want that to happen again. It is our policy, and we support the Governor of the Bank of Canada, whose policy is intended to take the steam out of an over heated economy that has been growing for six years and reduce the pressure, so that we can start a new period of growth in which our economy will make spectacular strides.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of State for Finance.

An information flyer is going out to every household in the country, at taxpayer's expense I might add. Its purpose, we are told, is to give some straightforward answers about GST.

The flyer states that Canadians pay $700 a year in hidden taxes. It neglects to say that Canadians will be paying $400 more a year in taxes after the GST is imposed and that this tax will probably be hidden in most cases. Does the minister realize that this pamphlet is misleading Canadians?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we would not print such a thing because it is not true. The tax reform we are introducing is excellent for the economy of Canada, particularly for the lower income family.

We have been receiving more than 250,000 calls—we simply believe our tax is getting to be more and more popular—asking us for information. We are providing it to Canadians, as the hon. member has indicated, but why should we go out of our way to tell things that are untrue? Families with incomes of below $30,000 will be better off after tax reform than they were before.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, the minister is right: the flyer does state that the GST credit protects modest income families, but studies by Global Economics have revealed that families with income under $30,000 a year will be worse off after the GST than they are now. Furthermore the tax credit is not fully indexed.

Mr. Gauthier: Aha.

Mrs. Marleau: Does the minister not realize that this is misleading Canadians?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, whenever we discover whatever the policy of the Liberal Party is maybe we can send out a pamphlet on it to allow Canadians to see it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Loiselle: We are beginning to realize that our colleagues across the floor are beginning to believe us. They say that maybe they are telling the truth but it is not indexed. Maybe in a couple of years it will be different. They are beginning to see the light.

Another thing that they seem to forget is that the reform by the removal of a hidden negative tax for an exporting country like Canada will inject into the economy $9 billion of new activity. This is a very good thing for medium income families.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the face of clear public evidence that Roch LaSalle, while he was Minister of Public Works, accepted money from contractors who were seeking his favour, the Deputy Prime Minister has again today refused to have a full public inquiry into this matter. It was refused in 1986 and it was refused in 1989. The government has refused an inquiry into the Gravel affair, the Grisé affair, and now the Roch LaSalle affair.

What is the government trying to hide?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I just indicated a few minutes ago, I believe in response to the same question, obviously the RCMP is aware of the allegations that were made yesterday. I am informed that the RCMP is looking into it.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has been aware of these allegations for a number of years, let alone a number of months. The question is: Why was Roch LaSalle not charged?

Mr. Speaker: It may or may not be a question, but it is not an appropriate question to put to the government. The hon. member who is a lawyer knows perfectly well that the administration of justice is not conducted by cabinet ministers or the treasury bench deciding who should or should not be charged. The hon. member may have a question which is in order, but it will have to be corrected.

Mr. Brewin: Will the government be prepared to hold a full public inquiry into the conduct of the administration of justice in the Roch LaSalle question and into the other issues that are undermining the confidence of the Canadian people in the administration of justice?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated twice, allegations were made yesterday. The RCMP is aware of those allegations and I am informed that it is looking into it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last year the minister described global warming as the most serious threat facing the world. He later added: "We cannot wait for all the answers because we may not get another chance to turn things around, the risks are that high."

Why is the government going across the country to talk with Canadians on The Green Plan while, we learned in yesterday's leaked memo, it is making secret back room deals that are reducing Canada's commitment to the environment?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canadians want to speak about that matter.

In the last week we have conducted 30 information sessions during the consultation process. Just this week in Winnipeg we had more than 500 persons attending one of the information sessions. This is not the full consultation process; this is one of the many information sessions we have had. We had 500 persons attend one of those 30 meetings. It means that Canadians are very willing to take part in the solution and that they will be intensely active in this very important consultation process we will launch in a few weeks from now.

What we are doing is democratic. What we are doing is strong for the environment, and it will provide the country with a very serious and profound action plan.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

The people are interested. Unfortunately The Green Plan is already weathering.

• (1440)

How can the minister on one hand be in the process of convincing Canadians nation-wide about the crucial importance of cleaning up the environment and taking action now to abandon efforts to combat global warming?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, let us be serious and responsible.

We all know there is a problem. Now we need to implement the solutions. The solutions will call for sacrifices. They will call for sharing the burden. Canadians must be part of that. We cannot deliver speeches or put questions like that in the House without thinking about the kinds of solutions that will have to be implemented.

We need very important resources. We will need participation. We will need change of behaviour. This calls for the support of Canadians, and we will get it in coming weeks.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Manuel Marin Gonzalez, Vice-President of European Communities and Commissioner for Fisheries and Overseas Development.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Ivan Carnogursky, Secretary General of the Christian Democratic Movement of Slovakia and a delegation of parliamentarians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who is fresh from his tête-à-tête with the Vice-President of European Communities and Commissioner for Fisheries and Overseas Development.

Are the Europeans finally beginning to comprehend the misery, the havoc that their piracy off Newfoundland is inflicting on our people and on our fish stocks? Are our fishermen and plant workers any better off as a result of this morning's meeting, or was Manuel Marin in the driver's seat again this morning, as usual?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member and members of the House will be pleased to know that our working session with Mr. Marin is not over. It will continue right after Question Period.

I think we can look forward to progress being made. As the hon. member ought to know, since Mr. Marin has taken his position at the European commission, we have seen the commission lower its quota. It is not to our liking, but we are still having discussions with the commission and I am optimistic that we can make some progress.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, they lowered their quota; they are only stealing four times as much as they are supposed to now.

I have a question for the Minister for International Trade.

An hon. member: They are not stealing.

Mr. Simmons: If they are stealing, I would have the guts to tell them in their presence.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Simmons: I ask the Minister for International Trade who so far has come up empty handed every time he tries to beat some sense into the Prime Minister on this issue.

The Prime Minister meets with Mr. Marin later this evening. As the minister demanded of the Prime Minister that he finally stand up for those 100,000 fishermen and plant workers, does the minister fear as I do that once again the Prime Minister will see the meeting as a further opportunity to fabricate his international reputation on the—

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. We see reports today that the minister and the Premier of Saskatchewan left their supper meeting yesterday with smiles on their faces. The farmers on the Prairies are not smiling because they are still caught in the phoney war between the federal and the provincial governments with respect to this long promised money.

The minister has argued that the provinces have to get involved to get more money to farmers. On the other hand, the farmers need that money now. Therefore, I ask the minister at what point he will end this game of arm-wrestling between the federal and provincial governments and get some money to the farmers, even if he has to go it alone? When will they see some real money? When will there be some money in the hands of farmers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member, it was not a supper meeting, it was a meeting that took place yesterday afternoon.

We talked about the short term assistance package. We also talked at great length about the need for a long term stabilization and safety net. This is the subject of a committee which has brought down a number of recommendations for consideration by the ministers. We will consider that report at our meeting on May 18.

The Premier of Saskatchewan would like to see the short term assistance program phased into a longer term stabilization and/or safety net, which would provide the kind of confidence and security for the future.

I took the opportunity to indicate to him that the representations we received really reflect the multi-faceted nature of the problem. Most of the representations we receive in our office indicate that drought is the most serious problem.

There are other problems with respect to debt, the input costs. Low prices is one of considerations, but not the top consideration. I also took the occasion to stress to the premier the need for provincial government co-operation in terms of the design of the program, the delivery of the program and cost sharing. I think it was a very productive meeting.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture is aware that interest rate increases in the past two years alone have taken about $460 million out of the agricultural economy in western Canada.

Does the Minister of Agriculture not realize that this farm financial crisis is a result of reduced income and high debt, that he must release this $500 million that he has on the table immediately, if for no other reason than to make up for the losses suffered by the farm community caused by his government's high interest rate policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true. We do have $500 million ready to be distributed. We want the support and assistance of the provinces to get as much money as we possibly can into the hands of the farmers. If the provinces were to match the $500 million that would mean there could be $1 billion unleashed into the provincial economy.

I find it rather strange. If the hon. member is trying to defend the interests of the farmers, why does he not stand up with the federal Minister of Agriculture and try to lever the provinces into coming on board with this program so that we can get more money into the hands of the producers, and in a very timely fashion, because that is what is required. I urge the hon. member to support us in this cause.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture is asking for co-operation to talk to the provinces.

Is he not aware that the Prairie provinces have already received substantial cut-backs in transfer payments from his government? The province of Manitoba received close to $100 million alone. Is he not aware that these governments have already made major additions to their agricultural budgets? Is he not aware that they are losing 10,000 to 15,000 people per year?

Is he not aware that these are poor provinces that do not have the necessary resources and it will require a major national effort to save the grain economy of western Canada? Is that not the reality of western Canada, and that all the government is trying to do right now is divide and conquer the Prairie provinces and stop the Prairie farmers from planting as they should do right now, this week, with proper resources?

• (1450)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see that the hon. member defends the interests of western Canada. When he was a member of the government in office, he sat idly by and saw $5 billion annually extracted from the province of Alberta through the National Energy Program. He said nothing. He did absolutely nothing.

I indicated to the hon. member before, we have $500 million. That is the extent of our resources. We are simply asking the provinces to help us in terms of additional programs which would help in dealing with the income deficiency problem and/or with cash.

We have had very productive discussions with the province of Manitoba and with the other provinces as well. Yesterday the premier indicated that he wanted to have a meeting between myself and the three prairie ministers of agriculture. I am prepared to meet with them to see whether we can work out a satisfactory program. I remind him that the federal government's capacity to borrow is limited as well. We pay 35 cents of every taxpayer's dollar we receive to pay the interest on the debt that was left to us as a legacy of the Liberal government.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in the case of—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister can carry this on when we hear the next question. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary, and just by way of trying to help the minister with his history lessons, I was also the minister responsible for putting $3.6 billion into the prairie railway system to help our farmers move their commodities to market. It is something the hon. member was never able to do.

I want to come down to a simple reality. The minister says he has only $500 million. I want to know when he is going to give it to the farmers. Why is he waiting until it is too late for the farmers to plant? Why is he going to wait until it is too late for them to get the seeds in the ground? The farmers need their money now. The government is simply trying to play a divide and conquer game with the provinces. Will this minister change his tactics, change his formula and change his approach so the western grain economy will not go down the drain because of this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): We have seen a bit of a flip-flop here, Mr. Speaker. A couple of days ago he asked me to put the $500 million into a contingency fund. Today he tells us to pay it out now with no strings attached. We want more than $500 million to be distributed. I invite the hon. member to help us in convincing the provinces that they should come onboard so the farmers can get more money and get it fast.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry. Given the forestry minister's responsibility to protect the interests of the forest sector, and given the disastrous effects on that industry of the government's high dollar policy, what measures is the minister taking to help ensure that the high dollar will be lowered or, at the very least, what measures is he proposing to offset the harmful effects of this policy on the forest sector?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the forest ministry has been equipped with a new forestry act, but it is not envisaged that this new act embrace the authority or jurisdiction over fiscal monetary matters.

I can tell the hon. member that we will continue to work closely in strategic partnerships with the provinces and the industry to make sure that through research, through the restoration and improvement of our timber stands, the industry can retain its health and dynamism.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

While the minister has admitted to us that he is unable to offer the forestry sector any relief for the high dollar value, could he at least tell us why the six Forest Resources Development Agreements have not yet been renegotiated? When will they be renegotiated? Why laugh at the industry and the provinces in such a way?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, some of the agreements have been negotiated and signed with the province of New Brunswick. The province of Nova Scotia has agreements. As to the other Atlantic provinces, some of the agreements are still in place.

Negotiations and discussions are continuing to get all the agreements throughout the country in place before they cause any disruption in the important task of restoring and replenishing the areas of our forest land which has been overcut and not properly restocked.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

It concerns some straight-forward answers about the goods and services tax. I would like the minister to explain why the ad states that there is no impact on housing affordability when the government has already admitted that there will be an increase of $450 on a new home.

Other reliable organizations, particularly the Canadian Home Builders' Association, have documented that there will be an increase of at least $3,000. I would like a straight-forward answer from the minister: Does he believe in truth in advertising?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we say in this brochure what we have been saying from the start.

The impact of the GST on housing will not create an additional impediment to affordability, and this is the case. I could give the hon. member a lot of numbers. For example, the net effect on monthly mortgage payments on a typical house purchased in Halifax will $2 a month. The hon. member can tell me if this is really an impediment or incapacity to the affordability of houses.

In North Bay it will be $1 less, and in Regina it will be $4 more. This is the kind of impact we are talking about. The general impact will vary by about 1 per cent. This is not an impediment to the affordability of housing.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): At least the government has been consistent.

Again today, the Canadian Home Builders' Association has asked the government to disclose the detailed calculations on the GST and the price of new homes. Again the government has refused.

Will the minister explain why the public should believe his figures when he consistently refuses public disclosure? What is he trying to hide?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we are not hiding anything.

This has been discussed at length in the technical papers. Even in this House time and time again, the Minister of Finance indicated what effect the present manufacturers' sales tax has and what effect the reform will have. He said the difference between the two would be an over-all impact of about 1 per cent. It will vary from region to region, but on the whole these numbers are very precisely reported in the technical papers.

Certainly, it will not adversely affect the affordability of housing. That is nonsense.

PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKER ADJUSTMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. The one elegibility requirement under the Program for Older Worker Adjustment is that, in cities with a population of 500 000 and over, at least 100 workers have been laid off. Does the minister know that 98 per cent of Canadian businesses have less than 100 employees? Will he review that discriminatory requirement which hurts small business workers living in cities with a population of 500 000 and over?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transports)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member from Saint-Léonard that the Program for Older Worker Adjustment is a joint program that has been negotiated with all the provinces in Canada. Its aim is to help workers 55 years old and older who are collectively laid off, their layoff having such an impact on the community that they have very little chance of relocating. I would also like to point out that the program meets those criteria as well as the objectives that led to its implementation.

• (1500)

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): My question is directed to the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

My colleagues in the metropolitan region of the Quebec National Assembly have told me that the Quebec government is prepared to change these criteria. Will the minister negotiate with the Quebec Minister of Labour so that workers in the metropolitan region of Montreal might have access to this program?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, discussions were held with our colleagues of all provincial governments before POWA legislation was drafted. If Quebec government officials are indeed prepared to negotiate, I wish they would do so directly with the minister rather than through the member for Saint-Léonard.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday the Speaker of the House— not the Speaker of the House but the government House leader—

Mr. Andre: The next one.

Mr. Gauthier: God help us!

Mr. Robichaud: Don't get carried away!

Mrs. Maheu: Don't overdo it!

Mr. Gauthier: The House leader usually gives us an indication concerning business for the coming days. I would ask him to tell us the House business for tomorrow, Monday and Tuesday next.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that tomorrow I will be calling Bill C-18, the bill to set up a department of multiculturalism for the completion of third reading, hopefully.

On Monday, I will be calling Bill C-65, the borrowing authority bill, for report stage. I will continue with it on Tuesday. Hopefully, we will be able to complete report stage and third reading in that time.

Either Wednesday or a day later in the week will probably be an allotted day.

I would like to have consideration of report stage and third reading of Bill C-57 which deals with integrated circuits.

As well, if returned from committee, I would like to deal with Bill C-34 which deals with the management centre for the public service.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I would not want to raise this issue every day, but once a week should do it.

Can the minister tell us if consultations to find a good Deputy Speaker—we have a good and even an excellent one, but he cannot take the chair—

Mrs. Maheu: A female Deputy Speaker!

Mr. Gauthier: Can we rest assured that the government will act fairly soon on this so the House may have a Deputy Speaker, male or female?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are negotiations and discussions actively under way. I am pleased to report that an announcement will be made soon.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I, too, have a question for the hon. government House leader.

The Minister of Environment, in his remarks during Question Period, indicated that legislation would be forthcoming with regard to the environmental assessment review process.

Could the House leader advise the House, for scheduling purposes, when we might anticipate that legislation being tabled? Will it be next week, for example?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I am not able to give a precise answer to that question. It is certainly the intention of the government, as indicated by the Minister of the Environment, to have that legislation brought forward at least for first reading and consideration by this House and the public as soon as possible.

It is literally a question of drafting and getting it in shape for presentation in the House. That is going to be done as soon as possible. I cannot be more precise than that, I am sorry.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, just for further clarification, is it the House leader's understanding that the legislation will be tabled before we break for the summer?

Mr. Andre: It depends on when we break for the summer, but, yes, it is hoped that that will occur before we break for the summer. Hopefully, the break for the summer will not be beyond the intended time, if you will. We are certainly looking to do it as soon as possible, and certainly before we do depart for our constituencies for the summer.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NORTHERN CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nault:

> That this House condemn the government for its lack of commitment to northern Canada and for its failure to treat Northerners fairly and equitably as demonstrated by:
>
> (1) its lack of commitment to economic diversification;
>
> (2) deserting northern Ontario by slashing VIA Rail services;
>
> (3) abandoning all northerners with its regressive unemployment insurance legislation;
> (4) planning the cancellation of the northern residents deduction for isolated areas;
> (5) imposing a 15 percent export tax on softwood lumber;
> (6) cancelling the mining depletion allowance and flow-through share benefits for mining exploration;
>
> (7) imposing a goods and services tax; and
> (8) failing to implement adequate adjustment programs for single industry towns.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I rise today to address the motion of my party which states:

> That this House condemn the government for its lack of commitment to northern Canada and for its failure to treat Northerners fairly and equitably—

I might add that with a motion such as this we could add all regions of the country that are not centrally located. Regions such as Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver seem to fare quite well.

We in northern Ontario suffer from a lack of proper transportation. VIA Rail services have been cut and we are all very much aware of that. This imposes great hardships on many communities in the north.

When the Conservatives came to power, they privatized Air Canada. As a result we now no longer have the benefits of Air Canada in any place in northern Ontario, except Thunder Bay. This means that we have lost some prestige. Some might say this took place because Air Canada was not making a profit in some areas. But I can tell you from my days on city and regional council in that area that we commissioned a study back in the early 1980s which proved to Air Canada that it did make a profit and it stayed on in the community.

With a lack of commitment to anything but privatization, Air Canada now feels that it does not have to worry about these markets. After all, we are captive market. We pay more and have less service, but there is very little we can do about it.

We have talked about the GST and the kinds of hardships that will be imposed on northern communities by it. Today, during Question Period, I spoke about a flyer and some straightforward answers about the goods and services tax. It mentions that in some instances consumers will have to bear the full brunt of the 7 per cent. It mentions dry-cleaning and movies, but the flyer neglects to mention that hydro and heating bills will bear the full brunt of the 7 per cent goods and services tax.

When one lives in a northern community, one's heating and lighting bills are high. The further north you go, the higher it is. There is no getting away from having to bear the full brunt of that goods and services tax. We have spoken with people from Ontario Hydro and the heating industries. There is very little manufacturers' sales tax buried in their rates now. There is no argument when these people say themselves that they are going to have to increase their fees because of the goods and services tax. They are sending out notices now stating that someone living in the north will have to pay far more because of this tax than someone living in the south.

Back in the fall, I asked a question of the Minister of Finance in which I explained that the goods and services tax will add a great burden on people in the northern and more remote areas of the country because the cost of transportation will be taxed.

At that time, the minister was not completely aware of the effect of the cost of transportation on goods. He said that the merchants can claim a credit for the tax they pay on transportation. The fact of the matter is that the cost of transportation is included in the final price of the goods. The 7 per cent tax is added on to the final price of the goods. So, you do pay more if you live further away.

There is not only that, but your goods are less attractive. If you produce goods in the north, then you have to ship them. There is a higher transportation cost in the beginning to reach the larger markets. These people also have to bear the brunt of additional GST on a higher end result price. There is absolutely nothing in the GST that is of any use to people in Canada, especially not for people in northern Ontario and the more remote regions of the country.

There is no incentive for people to invest in some of the resource industries in the north. We have talked specifically about the cancellation of the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program. This was a form of subsidy for junior mining companies to go out and explore some of the sites in northern Ontario. The total amount of money now being spent on exploration has decreased, and decreased drastically. It will continue to decrease until only the large mining companies will be doing exploration. They will continue to do exploration. In 1987, we were benefiting from $1.2 billion in mining exploration. That figure will go down to about $400,000 by the year 1991.

We talk about retraining. We say people want to be retrained. Yes, they do want to be retrained, but they want to have a job to be retrained to. In a community such as Temagami there are the wood and mining industries. The wood industry is suffering greatly because of the 15 per cent surtax on softwood lumber. One of mining sites in Temagami was closed down just recently.

What do we say to the people of Temagami when we tell them we will retrain them? What are we going to retrain them to do if there are no jobs there? If we do not create incentives for people to create jobs in these areas, they are going to have to move. Do we tell a family: "Sell your house. Move to Toronto"? How can they afford to buy a house or live in Toronto? These are very difficult choices that we must ask these people to make.

Furthermore, there are pressures in asking anyone to move to Toronto. There are pressures for social housing. It is not worth the incentive to move them to Toronto. It is far costlier to keep a person in Toronto than in an area where they have affordable housing.

The government has to change its mind-set. It has to decide that it has a commitment to northern Ontario, and to the regions of the country. It can do that, first, by enhancing diversification programs so that companies will be anxious to locate in these areas. Second, it can provide infrastructures such as transportation so that the goods that are produced in these areas can more readily reach the larger markets. That is absolutely essential. It is essential that all levels of government sit down together to map out some kind of plan. We cannot just say: "There is nothing we can do. Business will rule all." If business rules all, then there is no hope for anyone in this country. They will all move south.

I ask the government, please, to reconsider its stand. Any time there are any cut-backs in jobs at the federal level, offices in northern Ontario are closed. The Government says: "You can call Toronto or travel to Toronto, or you can travel to Ottawa". That is great if there are the facilities to travel and the money. But it does make the cost of doing business in northern Ontario much higher.

Just recently, Consumer and Corporate Affairs closed an office in Sudbury. All bankruptcies and trusteeships are now handled through a Toronto office and a Toronto number. This causes an additional aggravation which the people of northern Ontario do not deserve.

If there was any way possible to bring in some programs which would offer incentives for jobs to be created in northern Ontario, or in any of the other far-reaching regions of the country, then that would be the answer. Take the Atlantic provinces, for example, which are suffering. Take some of the western provinces and their agriculture. There are problems there.

Perhaps the government will wake up and realize before it is too late that it has to consider seriously pushing Mr. John Crow into easing his high interest rate policy and letting the value of the Canadian dollar drop somewhat to a more reasonable level. Then those exports which are vital to the northern communities would be allowed to trade at a reasonable profit and more jobs could be created.

I have to end my remarks now and say that, after this morning's meetings with Mr. Crow, I am not at all optimistic that Mr. Crow is going to consider reducing his pressure on high interest rates. I would think that Mr. Crow is watching the Toronto market and even the Toronto market is suffering because the manufacturers are shutting down in all these very important aspects of our economy.

I suggest that we condemn the government for its complete and total lack of action. It is not only a lack of action, but an action in reverse by cutting back programs to the regions. I ask that the government reconsider and give everyone a chance.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I wish to ask my colleague a question, after listening to her very enlightened remarks. She recognized the seriousness of the Conservative government's policies and the negative impact they have on the people living in the outlying regions of this country. These actions are really dividing us, not only rich and poor but also regionally. They are having a very negative effect on everyone.

When I travelled with the VIA Rail task force we were up in the Gaspé. I heard about the very serious problems that exist for the handicapped and for children in need of treatment who had to get to Montreal. I presume they would have to go to Toronto or other major centres if they come from other outlying districts. It is impossible to travel in comfort by bus, according to them, and I can understand that. Travel by car is often very difficult both in terms of the weather and in terms of the cost. Planes are very expensive, and I need not underscore that point.

What are people doing now that the services of VIA Rail have been cut? How are the needy, in terms of physical and mental health, seeking the kind of services that they require, let alone all the other aspects that you have looked at?

Mrs. Marleau: Madam Speaker, that is a very good question. I want to say to my hon. colleague that I have a nephew who is severely disabled. He was explaining to me the difficulties he has in taking a bus. It is absolutely impossible for him to take a bus to travel to Ottawa or Toronto. For him to get on an airplane now is also very difficult because the Air Ontario planes are much smaller. There is very little room. They need a certain number of days for an advance booking. It is quite a procedure. It is a very demeaning procedure also, which I think is the most difficult thing of all for him.

There is no real way for him to travel except for his parents to transfer him to the car and drive him to wherever he has to go. The problem with this nephew of mine is that he is now in his thirties and his parents are now in their sixties. It is becoming much more difficult for them to do this for him.

Train travel was the answer for him. When there is a severe medical problem there are air ambulances and the like. That of course applies across the province of Ontario. It is a provincial initiative used only in extreme cases where a person's health is in danger. The Government of Ontario through medicare will help cover the costs of that. So in that sense he is protected.

It is the more mundane acts of ordinary living that are very difficult for these people. The lack of adequate transportation does not enhance the situation. It is a detriment to them becoming more mobile and more self-sufficient as they should be.

I thank the hon. member for that comment.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on this opposition motion.

When we talk about condemning the government for its lack of commitment to northern Canada and for its failure to treat northerners fairly and equitably, I want to stress that we are talking about all regions of northern Canada.

I want to start by telling Canadians about an experience that I had two weeks ago when I was in Gravenhurst, Ontario. I was speaking with people at Gravenhurst High School. We were talking about the environment. They were telling me that just three weeks prior to my visit the sewage treatment plant in the town of Gravenhurst, an antiquated plant about which they had been worried for many years because it was out of date and which, with the influx of population, was under stress, broke down and spilled 100,000 gallons of raw sewage into Lake Muskoka.

There may be some who do not realize this but the Lake Muskoka region is one of the most precious assets of this country. At first blush many people would not realize how serious this was for the whole community. Here is a community that depends on the purity of the clean water for that region. If that tourism feature breaks down, then there is absolutely nothing left in the region.

What I am sensing is that there is a general lack of commitment to address northern concerns. It is almost as if we are paranoid about the deficit. We are cutting all the time and refusing to be creative, or we are being penny wise and pound foolish. I am not just talking about the national governments, all governments are responsible here. Had that sewage treatment plant been replaced two to five years ago this incident never would have happened.

There is a litany of examples like this across northern Canada where I think we are really being negligent. Yes, it is important to be careful of the deficit and debt of this country, but I also think we have to be creative. One of the great features of northern Canada is its value in terms of tourism. As you know, Madam Speaker, tourism is the biggest job creator in this country. If we fracture the stability of our tourism industry in this country, then we are in serious trouble. That is going to add an even further difficulty to the national debt.

Sometimes when I see some of the small cuts that the government is making in its programs, I get a sense that it is really not thinking long term. For example, in the area of tourism promotion, there have been massive cut-backs by this government. This is an area in which we should not be cutting back. We should be increasing the dollars that we put into the promotion of tourism in this country. With the GST coming we are going to need a lot more tourism advertising to lure people here because the GST is going to be a massive disincentive. That tourism factor touches every northern region of this country.

In other northern parts of Canada we have concerns about the environment at James Bay. We also have the concerns of the Cree to consider.

The James Bay project is the largest man-made project in the history of the world. We have to make sure that not only the rights of the aboriginals but also environmental concerns are fully addressed. We must put the government on notice that we are not just going to let some kind of a quick assessment of the environmental problems create a rush on the Cree causing them to lay back letting the decision of the provincial government and the national government be the rule of the day.

We have seen time and time again where these rights and the environment have really been compromised. Fortunately, right now we seem to have a government which seems to be getting a sense that the people of Canada are absolutely dedicated to making sure that our government and all people in public office are committed to the environment. I say that in light of this government's Speeches from the Throne and its recent green plan. This is another area where we must keep the government on its toes.

The same problem exists in Barriere Lake where we have had to press hard to make sure that the rights of the Algonquins are protected.

As we move across to western Canada, we see problems in Athabaska and the Great Slave Lake where there is great concern that the effluents from the pulp and paper mills will be flowing into the north as well, something which affects the fishery and the life of the aboriginal peoples there.

We have a real litany of concerns in northern Canada. We have a government that is not being as sensitive as it should be. These are precious assets for Canada, for all of us and for our children into the next 20 or 30 years.

If we lose our commitment to these areas, there will be billions of dollars we are going to have to—

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (1540)

[Translation]

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

Bill C-16, an Act to establish the Canadian Space Agency and to provide for other matters in relation to space. Chapter 13.

Bill S-11, an Act to restructure the Eastern Canada Synod of the Lutheran Church in America under the name of the Eastern Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada.

Bill S-13, an Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Ukrainian Greek Orthodox Church of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, I must inform the House that the questions to be raised this evening at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan—Air Safety; the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre—Refugee Status.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NORTHERN CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nault:

That this House condemn the government for its lack of commitment to northern Canada and for its failure to treat northerners fairly and equitably as demonstrated by:

(1) its lack of commitment to economic diversification;

(2) deserting northern Ontario by slashing VIA Rail services;

(3) abandoning all northerners with its regressive unemployment insurance legislation;

(4) planning the cancellation of the northern residents deduction for isolated areas;

(5) imposing a 15 percent export tax on softwood lumber;

(6) cancelling the mining depletion allowance and flow-through share benefits for mining exploration;

(7) imposing a goods and services tax; and

(8) failing to implement adequate adjustment programs for single industry towns.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as I was saying earlier, the government seems to be really missing the assets that we have in northern Canada. As I mentioned before we broke for Royal Assent, the greatest job creator in this country is tourism; our environment in the north, our water, our resources, our aboriginal peoples, Canada's first environmentalists are resources and assets that we cannot treat lightly. We cannot take them for granted.

This government always seems to be retreating from its responsibility, whether it is unemployment insurance, VIA Rail or selling off Crown corporations. One day the government states that they are being sold off because they are not making money. Then Canada Post makes money, but it is going to be sold off. There is a total lack of consistency in terms of its financial planning.

I am concerned that our north, right across Canada, is going to be put into jeopardy. We on this side of the House are concerned. As my hon. colleague from Thunder Bay said earlier, it should not be that just because a city in the north is having difficulty that we shut it down and move everybody to Toronto or to Montreal. That is not the spirit that built this country. We are here for equality of rights and we are here for disadvantaged regions in every part of Canada. We should not allow this government to enshrine its principle of treating this country like a business, where if something does not make economic sense today it is shut down and things are shuffled around like they are pawns on a corporate chess board. That is not the way to run a nation. It is certainly not the way to run the north.

We on this side of the House condemn the government for its treatment of northern Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, Earth Day was barely a week ago.

[English]

During the course of Earth Day, I had the occasion to meet a number of youth groups. I would say to my hon. colleague who comes from a large urban area like I do, you from Toronto and I from Montreal, that I was quite fascinated with these young people from an urban centre who were expressing serious concern. They wanted to know: "Is it true, Mrs. Finestone, that the land mass that they are going to flood to meet Vermont, New Hampshire and New York's electricity needs is as big as France?" I said: "That is a very good question. I think so." They said: "But why are we doing that to our land? And is it true, Mrs. Finestone, that that is where the aboriginal peoples live? Did they not first come and settle this country? Are they not the first peoples of land? I understand that they have complained and they feel that their rights have been abridged."

The other part of the question, which they did not raise but on which I recall very heated arguments and exchanges in the House with the present Minister for International Trade, was with respect to water and the inclusion of water in the free trade agreement. We are all living with some concerns about the heat wave that is supposed to be coming, the desertification of our land, and the greenhouse effect. All these issues would indicate that we have to husband the waters of the north, take care in conservation and in planning and the directions we wish to go in terms of public policy.

I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood ran a very important seminar this summer which came out with some important decisions with respect to the environment. Did you address some of the questions that the young people asked me on Earth Day? Did you look at the implications of water in the free trade agreement?

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague from Mount Royal for the question.

The very first time I spoke in this House I mentioned that I was absolutely paranoid about the section relating to water in the free trade deal. The Government of Canada has stated that water is not part of the free trade deal. However, I have listened to some of the best lawyers in this country and they say the exact opposite. In fact Clayton Yeutter has said on many an occasion that the real jewel in the free trade deal is that they have access to Canada's water.

As I suggested almost a year and a few months ago, if the Prime Minister of Canada were so confident that water was not part of the deal, it would seem very simple to put all of us at ease. He has a very good relationship with the President of the United States. He could say: "The people of Canada are concerned about water in the free trade deal. Could I please have, Mr. President, a one-page special protocol letter, which you and I will both sign, saying that water is in fact not a part of this deal?" I have yet to hear a response from the government.

The real sleeper in the free trade deal, the thing that we must all keep our heads up for, is the section related to water.

As for your first question that your students put about the environmental concerns and the rights of the Cree, we have been studying this problem for years and years. There are legal minds on both sides of the issue. The Prime Minister's former principal secretary is now lobbying on behalf of the party going against the Cree. When heavy-hitters such as that are brought in, there must be some legitimate concern.

It is incumbent on each and every one of us on this side of the House to make sure that not only environmental concerns but aboriginal rights and the rights of the Cree are protected. We should not only be catering to Hydro Quebec and the eastern United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood was talking to the hon. member for Mount Royal through the Speaker, was he?

Mr. Mills: Absolutely. Pardon me, Madam Speaker. As time goes on I will get used to all the rules here.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this morning when I saw the Orders of the Day, I noticed that the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River had put forward a motion. It almost reminded me of a shot gun type of approach into which he figured he would throw everything. However, Madam Speaker, he missed one thing. I thought for sure he would have condemned the government because we had a lot of snow in northern Ontario this year.

I have been here since 1982. I had the opportunity to sit in opposition between 1982 and 1984. If you are a Liberal, you never have to say you are sorry and you never have to say you are wrong.

When a motion such as this one is brought forward, it gives me a great opportunity to show the difference between 1982 and 1984, 1984 up to the present, and exactly what changes have been made in northern Ontario.

Members of the House and those who are listening to this debate should go back a touch and focus on what has happened, because sometimes we forget.

• (1550)

Unemployment climbed from 358,000 in 1968 to 1,384,000 in 1984. That is before we were in power.

We have been hearing a lot about the bank rate in Canada in the last number of days and weeks. In 1981 it climbed to 21.24 per cent. The chartered bank prime was 22.75 per cent. A five-year mortgage was 21.75 per cent. If you are are a Liberal member, you do not have to say you are sorry. That is what happened up until 1984.

Let me review a couple of other fundamental issues just so we get this debate down to where it should be. Spending in the federal government climbed from $12.3 billion in 1968 to $109 billion in 1984. That is an average of 14.6 per cent. The deficit climbed from $400 million in 1968 to $38.3 billion in 1984. That is 96-fold increase. The debt of this nation climbed from $18.1 billion to $199.1 billion, an increase of 1,000 per cent.

You would almost think on September 5, the day after the 1984 election, just like a mushroom, all of a sudden it is the Tories who caused the deficit in this country, that there was never a deficit up until September 5, 1984. The truth hurts, but I think Canadians really have to understand why this government has had to make the changes it has.

We heard in the House today about unemployment. Let me review a few comparisons. In 1984 the annual unemployment rate in north eastern Ontario was 14.9 per cent. The annual unemployment rate in 1989 was 8.1 per cent. In northwestern Ontario it was 9.7 per cent in 1984 and 5.9 per cent in 1989. The unemployment rate in northern Ontario in 1984 was 13.6 per cent. That was after 15 solid years of great Liberal management. At the end of 1989, under a Conservative government—the bad boys, as they would like to convey to Canadians, and the people who do not know how to run the country—it was 7.5 per cent. I think those figure speak for themselves.

I would like to go through a couple of the areas that the member for Kenora—Rainy River wanted to talk about, for example, the lack of commitment to economic diversification in northern Ontario. Until 1984 if northern Ontario wanted to deal with the federal government there was only one way to do it. We had to go to Toronto. Yes, we had a couple of offices in northern Ontario, but there was never a decision made in northern Ontario. The decisions were made either in Toronto or Ottawa, and they were usually too busy looking at booming parts of the country to worry about the concerns of dear old northern Ontario.

The Prime Minister, the minister for industry and trade at the time, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, and the cabinet decided that it was time that northern Ontario was recognized as an area of economic development with its own program. It is the first time that northern Ontario has been recognized. It was recognized with a program called FedNor. Offices were set up in Thunder Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, and Sudbury with boards made up of local individuals, people from northern Ontario communities who discuss and know what projects should go ahead.

Since 1984 this government has contributed over $19 million to the economy of northern Ontario. That is over 300 projects that ensure the opportunity for northern Ontario companies and communities to be able to have their own say and their own direction. That has never happened before.

We do not stop at that. We have never stopped. We are continuing to work along that line. I heard my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood talking about tourism. I recognize that tourism is very important to northern Ontario and this government recognized it.

On November 23 of last year the minister of tourism made an announcement of an $8 million contribution to FedNor to be specially earmarked for tourism. The maximum contribution allowed under the program is the lesser of $500,000 or 35 per cent of capital costs for theme parks, ski centres, tour boat operations. It is the lesser of $100,000 or 35 per cent of capital costs for accommodation and marina projects. This never happened before. This happened because local individuals on a board representing northern Ontario came to the government, talked to the minister and said: "We need to have something that is going to help develop the infrastructure of tourism".

I would like to move on to another area we have talked about: the budget. The night of the budget it was put across northern Ontario by the opposition that FedNor was gone; the government had cut FedNor.

The government made one change in FedNor. That change is that projects over $100,000 will have an option which is plain and clear. It could be a loan repayable over five, ten or fifteen years on which no interest will be paid. If the board decides that that adjustment is not correct, it can be a straight grant. However, projects under $100,000 will continue to be seen as they were prior to the budget. We have increased FedNor by $14 million. Again I say to my colleagues who were crying wolf that they are wrong again. FedNor is strong. FedNor is there to support, and it will continue to support with extra dollars.

The part that is so troubling is that it is such a good program and that has been recognized. I wish the odd time my colleagues from the other side would take some time out and start to applaud it. The reason I say that is that I have a few figures here that I would like to place on the record.

Accepted FedNor assistance for electoral districts to April 12, 1990: For the riding of Algoma, 54 projects, $2,093,292 or 128 jobs created or maintained; the riding of Kenora—Rainy River, 36 projects, $1,386,660 or 148 jobs created or maintained; the riding of Nipissing, 20 projects, $3,855,994 or 425 jobs created or maintained.

FedNor has played an important part in bringing recognition to northern Ontario. The Marylin plumbing fixture plant will be built in North Bay, the first time a plant of this size has been located in northern Ontario. The efforts of the FedNor board and its employees enabled us to ensure that the infrastructure dollars were going to be there for that project.

I should mention that these are opposition ridings. They are not held by Tories. These are opposition ridings that this government believes in supporting. The Sudbury Nutrino Centre is a science centre, the only one in the world. This government has committed itself, from the Prime Minister with research and development, to the minister responsible for FedNor, to the Minister of Science and Technology. We are committed to this project and to spending more than $30 million.

Two weeks ago in Thunder Bay we announced funding of $2 million to help get the Nordic International Games in Thunder Bay in 1995.

There are two other areas of FedNor I would like to take a moment to talk about. I have to watch how I say this, but we in northern Ontario have had a difficult time selling to the government, whether it is a stationery store, a furniture manufacturer, or a printing company. To be able to get on a list or to be able to get that opportunity at least to quote would be advantageous.

• (1600)

In 1986, under FedNor, we set up a procurement incentive program. An official based in Sault Ste. Marie works directly with the companies in northern Ontario to ensure they get the opportunity, are put on lists, and are informed of exactly who to call and how to fill out the quotation forms.

Furthermore, the Conservative government that members opposite would have people believe is so bad, will bring together on May 28, 29 and 30 here in Ottawa over 100 companies from across northern Ontario. They will be setting up displays, giving the opportunity for all departments to come and see what we have to offer in northern Ontario. That is a first. That, to me, indicates a real commitment to all the companies in northern Ontario.

There are areas in northeastern Ontario that are going through some difficult times. I can say that the town of Elliott Lake is having troubles. We are looking toward the advisory board and Pathfinders to ensure that everything can be done to help that community. My own riding of Timiskaming and communities within are certainly having difficult times.

Companies such as Dingwell's Machinery & Supply Company, which requires an investment of $430,000 will receive a FedNor contribution of $107,000 toward this sum. Company vice-president, Robert Bell, said:

> FedNor was great to work with. They supported us throughout the whole endeavour. They looked at it carefully to see if it was viable. They looked for stability, and feasibility.

That is what economics is all about. That is what this program is all about. That is what northern Ontario is all about.

I would like to move on to one other area. It concerns the 15 per cent surtax on softwood lumber. There is no doubt that the lumber industry in northern Ontario is going through a difficult time. There are a number of reasons for that.

It cannot be blamed only on the 15 per cent surtax. If the hon. member over there would understand what the combination is and listen, I will tell him exactly what the reasons are. For instance, the logging and hauling costs combined account for 64 per cent of the over-all costs of operation. Poor timber quality results in higher cost factors. There are higher sawmill costs. There has been a 30 per cent decline in sales to eastern U.S. markets since 1986.

The province of Ontario, through the 15 per cent that they get back from the federal government, which is supposed to go back to the industry, received $30,551 million in 1987. In 1988 it was $21,358 million, and in 1989 it was $17,710 million. That totals almost $68 million.

That money should have been put back into the industry to help with modernization and silviculture and help them through the difficult times. Instead what did the province do with $68 million that belongs to the industry?

Madam Speaker, it is easy to talk but when you look at the facts, they are clear. To put the blame on the 15 per cent tax is not the answer. You must look at the combination of reasons why the industry is in trouble.

If my colleagues in Toronto at Queen's Park are listening, I hope they will lobby the Minister of Natural Resources to come to her senses and join in with the rest of the Canadian provinces and the forestry companies, to sit down and negotiate a way out of this. Of all the provinces, Ontario is the only hold-out before we can do anything to negotiate with the Americans. The province of Ontario is the hold-out, but I can see why. Who would want to get rid of a $68 million cash cow.

Anyway, I would like to move on to deal with a couple of areas.

We hear a lot about unemployment and the fact that the unemployment programs are not correct. We know that the other place is holding up Bill C-21, a bill that is so important for regions of this country. It is a bill that would give the opportunity for adjustments whether in mining, the sawmill and particle board industry, agriculture or the expenditure of $350 million a year for training for an additional 60,000 people who would like to be trained. Additional training is available for modern technology, which is becoming more and more important to be competitive.

I should mention that this government, under the former minister from Kingston and the Islands, made the right decision in formulating Community Futures Program through which communities have the opportunity to ensure that the programs for worker adjustment are there.

I would like to take a moment to describe the employment, training and data programs that are ensured in ridings such as Timiskaming and Algoma in northern Ontario in order to show what this government is doing. In the year 1988–89, the riding of Algoma has received "$7,946,000".

Again, it indicates that this government is certainly recognizing that ridings such as these should be supported. Kenora—Rainy River received $7,645,584 for such programs as employment training, job development, job entry, Challenge 88, skills shortages, skills investment, Community Futures, Innovation.

Madam Speaker, if you listened earlier today, you would think there was not a thing that this government is doing in northern Ontario. We are doing everything we can, but this government was left with an anchor around the neck. There was mismanagement of the economy by a government that was in power for 15 years. It did not care about the future and whether there was a debt left for our children and grandchildren. Spend, spend, spend. Spending is popular because it gets one elected. Those days are over.

Canadians recognize that we have a problem and that we have to make adjustments, whether it is under the free trade agreement, on our tax reform or on the goods and services. This government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, is making the correct moves. We are making sure that we will be able to challenge Europe in 1992. Our country will be able to challenge anybody around the world with regard to manufacturing, ensuring that we have a strong structure in place for our children and grandchildren.

I say again that this government has done more to ensure the stability of northern Ontario and other regions across this country in the last five years, and we will continue to do so over the next three years. I will say here right now that whether it is 1992 or 1993, Canadians are going to recognize what this government has done and that we have set the course for the next decade. They will be sure to elect this government one more time.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the member's remarks.

He began by saying: "Being Liberal means never having to say you are sorry." He had it almost right. What he really should have said is: "Being Liberal means never having to say you are Tory." He had it a little bit wrong. Notwithstanding those remarks, I want to ask a question of my colleague across the way, who made these vicious attacks against the Ontario Minister of Natural Resources, the Hon. Lyn McLeod. It concerns what he considers the failure of the Ontario minister to sign the Canada-Ontario forest agreement, which has a tremendous impact on my own constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Only a few miles from Ottawa, we have the Larose forest, the second largest transplanted forest in the country, and I want to take this opportunity to invite all my colleagues to come and visit this beautiful Larose forest.

• (1610)

I want to read, to my colleague across the way, a letter I have in hand which was just received today, signed by the Ontario Minister of Natural Resources and addressed to the Minister of Forestry. It reads:

> Dear Mr. Oberle:
>
> Your recent remarks in the House of Commons about the Canada-Ontario Forest Resource Development Agreement were very troubling to me. In those remarks, you indicated that your Government was waiting for Ontario to indicate that it wished a renewal of that Agreement, and that Ontario was displaying little urgency.

That follows in line with what the member across the way was saying. Let us hear the truth, Madam Speaker. Here it is. The letter goes on:

> You surely know that this is not the case. Ontario has been pressing, at both Minister and staff levels, and on numerous occasions, for such action. My letter of December 19, 1989—is just one instance of our urging that the Agreement be renewed.

I want to ask the member across the way, how dare he make such a criticism against the Ontario Minister of Natural Resources, when it is his own government that is failing to sign that agreement with Ontario and failing to provide the leadership necessary for reforestation, not only in the north but all across the province of Ontario, including my own riding?

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, to the hon. member, if Liberals were popular they could probably have formed the government in 1984 and 1988. They sure did not do that.

Frankly, since 1984, this government has increased the budget for forestry by 300 per cent. It is finally starting to become apparent that the Ontario minister finally woke up and decided that she has to do something. For the last two years, we have been trying to get an agreement. We have done everything possible to ensure that the opportunities are there.

I know the Ontario Lumbermen's Association, the Sawmills' Association and the municipalities all want an agreement, but she has been dragging her heels. As she did in closing down Temagami if she had stood up and fought for the natural resource, fought for the fact of cutting and multi-use in Temagami, we would still have 80 jobs left in there.

She is not listening to the people of the north. She is being dictated to by the people of the south, and I hope someday she will wake up and start doing what is right for the people who live in the regions and ensure that the forestry opportunities are going to be there.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I also would like to pursue, with the member, the forestry agreement for British Columbia.

The forestry agreement for British Columbia expired at the end of March. There has been no effort by the federal government to sign the agreement with the province of British Columbia. For goodness sake, with all of these good programs that the member is talking about and all of the good work that the government is doing, is it not time that the federal government announced its proposal for the amount of moneys to be made available for British Columbia for its forestry programs so that the service groups that provide the seedlings and so on, can operate and manage their programs for the years to come? For the minister to—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair has difficulty with the hon. member's line of questioning.

The question should relate to the hon. member's speech and I have not heard the hon. member talk about British Columbia a lot in his speech. Maybe the hon. member would want to answer.

Mr. MacDougall: Whether it is a forest in northern Ontario or in British Columbia, I support it.

I should say that I know there are negotiations going on between the province of British Columbia and the Minister of Forestry. I would expect that, within a very short period of time, there will be some good announcements.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member's speech. In the motion tabled in the House this morning, we read, under item 1: "Its lack of commitment to economic diversification". I heard the hon. member mention FedNor, the program for northern Ontario. I also heard about all the benefits northern Ontario residents have enjoyed under this program.

My question is this: Was there any similar attempt under the previous government to develop a specific region, as we have done? Did that government take any concrete action, Madam Speaker? For instance, we introduced a plan for western Canada, for Atlantic Canada, and the "Plan de l'Est" for Quebec.

If this is so important to the Liberals and the New Democrats, were there any programs at the time to stimulate job creation and diversification of the economies of these northern regions?

[English]

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, prior to 1984, if someone in northern Ontario wanted to look into the expansion of a sawmill, an industrial welding shop, or a small business, their only opportunity would be to apply through Toronto. The applications went into a great big drum and, with any luck at all, at the end of the month, six weeks, or 12 weeks, they might have been recognized. In that period of time, there was so much red tape and so many hoops to go through that a year would be over.

One of our greatest concerns in 1984 was to ensure that we had a program in place so that individuals across northern Ontario, northwestern Ontario and northeastern Ontario, would have the opportunity to have counsellors who would move forward to ensure the programs were recognized and the applications received and reviewed by individuals in northern Ontario. This is what we tried to do.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, on the point regarding red tape, I support the hon. member. I still think there is too much red tape, even though we have a place in the north. He did mention some interesting pluses which we recognize. The Sudbury Science Centre is one of them.

Some of these infrastructure commitments he made are interesting. A plant in North Bay produces toilets for houses and industry, but we are not building houses because the economy is not going forward and there is a whole spirit where the entire nation is lacking in confidence. This is where the member is missing the point we are trying to make.

The hon. member has an interesting list of statistics, but somehow they are not translating into moving the nation, turning on the nation, or getting the nation excited. He cannot use the argument that the government inherited a debt because, yes, we did have a debt but this government doubled it from 1984 to 1988 with one of the best economies we have had in years. The GNP went from about 450 to 620 in a four-year period. It was fantastic. That is when it should have been making some of its cuts.

When I was talking earlier about tourism, I was talking about marketing. We are going to have to stimulate and work twice as hard to get people to come to the north. The signal we are sending out regarding the problems we are having in terms of national unity and the GST is a bit of a nightmare for some American tourists.

An hon. member: For everybody.

Mr. Mills: We will have to do something totally different from what we have done in the past. This is what concerns the people and it is reflected in the fact that about 85 per cent of the people in the country at this moment lack confidence in the government. I dare say it could change and I am not being smug about that 85 per cent. It could bounce back a bit.

How does the hon. member respond to that feeling out there that shows a general lack of trust and confidence, in spite of all the statistics and contributions of the government, especially in the north? I will give the government credit also for other parts of northern Canada as well. I am more concerned about turning on the nation so that we can dream again and have feelings. Would he please address that?

• (1620)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A short final comment from the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. MacDougall: Madam Speaker, I will make it quite short. The vast majority of the population in northern Ontario has a tendency to turn off when they feel that the comments being made are not really adjusted to what is happening.

I would like to make two small comments. With regard to the plumbing facility in North Bay, it is not only new houses that use new fixtures, it is an over-all market. The other part is that in that market-place we are also shipping into the United States. If this facility had not been built in North Bay, it would have been built in Illinois. It is an opportunity to export.

We also have a job to do in tourism. There are no two ways about it. We have a short season up there. If it is a good year, we might have eight weeks; if it is a a bad year, we are down to four weeks. So, we do have a job to do. Through different programs and opportunities, we have our tourist operators and associations going to the United States and southern Ontario with programs, starting off in mid-November through to the end of February. It is an effort that has to be made. Quite frankly, you cannot turn everything around at once. Through FedNor and other programs, we are doing everything possible and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate today on the motion of the Liberal party. There are eight specific points mentioned in the motion, indicating the lack of commitment by the government to northern Canada and, from my perspective, northern Ontario, and the failure of the government to treat northerners fairly and equitably. It is demonstrated by the list which I think it is quite appropriate. But I do not think the list is all-encompassing. Very quickly, I jotted down at least two other areas in which the government's approach to its policies has negatively impacted on life and the ability to survive in northern Ontario and northern Canada.

Let me start with one of my favourite topics, VIA Rail. That is a battle that northern Ontario residents fought as hard, if not harder, than other people across Canada. At 11.40 p.m. on January 15, we saw the last transcontinental train arrive and depart the Thunder Bay station. Well over 1,000 people who had attended a rally earlier that evening marched the half mile to the station to greet The Canadian.

Now, I should put into context that Thunder Bay is not a community that is known for visible protests. It is not the norm for its people to march on city hall in large numbers. We have a few committed individuals who, from time to time, are out there protesting certain actions by some level of government, but never in my lifetime have we seen over 1,000 people at 11.40 at night protesting a government policy.

It was important to them because it was not just a minor fine-tuning of the service. It was the out and out elimination of service. After that night, there were no more passenger trains rolling through Thunder Bay, Schrieber, Terrace Bay, Nipigon and Red Rock, Upsala, Ignace, Dryden, or through Kenora. We had lost 100 per cent of a service we had had for over 100 years.

Thirty thousand people got on and off in Thunder Bay with that service, but for the students at Lakehead University and Confederation College it was the only affordable method of travelling to and from our university and college community. People at the university and college have already noticed a decline in out-of-town student enrolment because of the cuts to VIA Rail.

It impacts on our seniors. Some chose not to drive or to fly to visit family and friends elsewhere in Canada, but others had no choice because of their physical make-up but to take the train. They no longer have that option. Residents of those communities in northwestern Ontario, who are confined to a wheelchair, no longer have an accessible means of transportation available to them, accessible in the sense that they can roll on and roll off by themselves. They did not have to have a stranger grappling with them to remove them from their chair to put them into a seat. They did not have to go through—let us face it—the insult of having to be carried onto a plane or a highway bus. With trains, they did not have to go through that but now they do.

With the combination of the loss of VIA Rail, the deregulation of air, and the movement toward smaller and smaller commuter planes that are clearly not accessible for the handicapped, citizens in the smaller communities of northwestern Ontario have no choice but to relocate permanently to the Thunder Bays, the Winnipegs, the Torontos and the Sault Ste. Maries, of this land.

The battle over VIA Rail was not just a romantic battle because we had had the train for so long. It was a key element in our ability to commute into and out of northwestern Ontario. The same applies to Atlantic Canada and northern parts of the prairies and British Columbia which were served by rail until this government decided that people were less important than the bottom line.

As you know, Madam Speaker, yesterday I was in the Federal Court of Appeal. We are waiting for a judgment on an action which I took along with Greenpeace Canada and my home community, the City of Thunder Bay. I mention that only to point out that decisions made here in Ottawa have far-reaching impacts on life-styles and on the environment. The government has argued in court not only that the Governor in Council or the cabinet is exempt from the environmental assessment review process, but so, too, is the Minister of Transport. If that is the case, what is left? Is the only person who has to adhere to an environmental assessment review process the typist in the steno-pool at Fisheries and Oceans? I hope not.

Just before I leave VIA to talk about some of the other items on the list of the motion, I want to read to you from a column that appeared in the weekend paper of the Times-News Chronicle-Journal of Thunder Bay. The writer is Gerry Poling, who is the regional editor for the paper and a life-long resident of northwestern Ontario and who has a really strong feeling about the north. He writes about his experiences post-VIA. He writes, and I quote:

> In wiping out VIA Rail service to Thunder Bay, Transport Minister Benoit Bouchard, still left Canadians with a railway service across Canada, but via Armstrong. What he neglected to consider, however, is how one gets from Thunder Bay to Armstrong.
> If you wanted to go to Vancouver by train, for example, you can buy a one way fare for $275 or, for seniors, $248. But then, to get to Armstrong, you have to take Grey Goose bus, which leaves Thunder Bay at 5:30 p.m. daily, and ride the 200-kilometre-long snakey, bumpy highway for 3 1/2 hours.

What he does not say is that that highway is the primary highway for hauling raw fibre from the bush. It is inundated with transport trucks, driving at very fast speeds, making a very unsafe situation for motorists and passengers in buses.

• (1630)

Just to continue, the cost for a one-way ticket is $24.20 or $38.70 for a round trip. Once you reach Armstrong you then have two hours and fifteen minutes to kill before train time, that is if the train is on time at 11.50 p.m.

He also points out that, by the way, the transcontinental train leaves Armstrong on Wednesdays, Fridays and Sundays only, so you must make sure you have the right day before you get on the bus.

The reality is that people are being forced to use alternate means of transport. More people are being put on the highways in northern Ontario, highways that have been killing people on a systematic basis for many years.

Mr. Milliken: Highways don't kill people.

Mr. Angus: The hon. member chuckles but the carnage on those highways, because of conflicts between transports and private automobiles, is very serious. More than a dozen people a year, not just from northwestern Ontario but from across Canada, are killed in traffic accidents. The more people that are put on the highways, the more dangerous they become.

Let me leave VIA Rail and touch on some of the other aspects. With regard to unemployment insurance legislation, research that we have done shows that because of the changes to unemployment insurance—the reduction in the work weeks, the qualification period being longer, et cetera, upwards of $60 million a year is taken out of the northwestern Ontario economy. That economy is already struggling. We have communities like Atikokan, Ontario, in which one of every two people is out of work at some time each year and where there is a sustained unemployment level of 25 per cent.

The new UI act is not going to make it easier for them. Sure, they can get training, but for what? There are no jobs available. They have been through the training mill. They have had training for welders, log hauling, and for this, that and the other thing, but the jobs still are not there.

What northern Ontario and northern Canada needs is a more community-based form of economic development. We have to provide the tools at the local level to support the individual entrepreneur and to attract the investment group from outside. But beyond that, the north and, I would suggest, all regions in this country really need a better transportation policy.

I cannot put the onus on the federal government alone because transportation is controlled primarily by the two senior levels, provincial and federal, but the federal government does have a fairly major leadership role to play.

We hear these cries for Senate reform from western Canada and other parts of Canada based on the belief, and quite rightly so, that they have not been getting a fair shake. They see the jobs being created in the Golden Horseshoe and the greater Montreal area. Consequently, they see more government involvement visible in those areas. So they say to themselves that they need Senate reform so that they have some checks and balances and can get a fair deal, no matter what the stripe of the government in power, it will have to take notice of their needs.

There is a different way, and I think it is one that this House should explore from time to time to see how we can come up with a mechanism. It all stems around transportation.

One of the realities of the Golden Horseshoe is that because of the millions of people who live in that market it becomes cheaper to produce within that market the goods that that market consumes. The reason you cannot produce those goods in Thunder Bay, Atikokan, Calgary or Moose Jaw, is because of the high cost of moving those products from the manufacturer to the purchaser. That will always be a problem in Canada because of our geographic structure, that thin ribbon along the American border with a lot of drags south. We are seeing this now, not just because of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, but because of the natural forces of the economy between our two countries.

The solution is to find a way to neutralize the cost of transportation, to make it possible for the widget manufacturer who can sell 99 per cent of her product in Toronto, to also be able to make that product in Thunder Bay, Nipigon, or in Schreiber, and not find that it is impossible to compete with a Toronto-based producer because of the difference in the price of moving the finished product.

It may be a combination of the use of modes, a requirement that a good must travel by the cheapest mode, in other words, truck to rail to marine to final destination, so that you minimize the use of energy and maximize the saving to the producer.

The other way, which some companies already practice, is having a regional or national pricing policy. The best example in Ontario is beer. A box of beer costs the same on Yonge Street as it does in Kenora because the transportation component is rolled in as part of the wholesale price for the distribution. Therefore, everybody pays the same. Simpson Sears does it. Eaton's does it for a lot of their commodities on a regional basis. That allows them to market a fridge, stove, vacuum cleaner, or what have you at the same price in that regional market.

In effect, the purchaser in the Toronto area pays a couple of pennies more so that the purchaser in northwestern Ontario pays many dollars less. That is another method.

Another way would be to provide, through government intervention, some kind of tax credit system that would allow, again, for the neutralization of transportation costs. People may say that that is going to cause problems with those we compete with in the United States, offshore, and what have you, but as long as we are doing it for domestic purposes I cannot see any problem.

That is only a rough suggestion. I have not completely worked through the mechanics.

Mr. Redway: Would that not be a corporate tax rip-off?

Mr. Angus: No, it would not be a corporate tax rip-off because those who are being ripped off today would finally get the benefits. It actually might help to lower the cost of housing throughout the province as well. The hon. minister might want to consider it from that point of view.

Let me deal with a couple of other areas because I realize that my time is almost up, but I would be more than happy to respond to members' questions about this concept I have put forward.

With regard to the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Seaway, this government has recognized that the Western Grain Transportation Act, as adopted by the Liberal government before it, is having a negative impact on the port of Thunder Bay and other ports along the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Seaway. This is another transportation policy which sought to equalize a particular mode of travel, in this case rail, in order to ensure an equal treatment in the movement of grain. The result has been a skewing of the system, a skewing of the marketplace, so that the west coast ports are favoured over Thunder Bay, Churchill and the Great Lakes system because the marine component is not included.

I realize that the Minister of Agriculture will be handing something down in June to deal with this, but it is a crucial matter to the port of Thunder Bay. We have gone from 1,700 or 1,800 grain handlers down to about 700. Men with 20 years of seniority did not get enough work last year to qualify for unemployment insurance under the old rules. So, Madam Speaker, work needs to be done in order to protect that component of the port of Thunder Bay, which allows it to be one of the few fully diversified communities in northern Canada.

• (1640)

On one final point, the member who spoke before me made reference to the contribution of the federal government to the World Nordic Games bid for the city of Thunder Bay. I was pleased that that happened. I supported the government and the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport all the way. I appreciate his help in securing that $2 million. I appreciate the help of some of his colleagues, particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister for Tourism and Small Businesses for their assistance in convincing Cabinet that it was important to assist Thunder Bay in its attempt to get the 1995 World Nordic Championships, which I know we will get in two weeks, and Thunder Bay will once again be back on the map internationally.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I know of the hon. member's interest in transportation because we have had many discussions on this in the past.

I know he would not want his comments to go by without also mentioning the fact that the government, realizing the need for a transportation policy in this country, especially on passenger transportation, has formed a royal commission on passenger transportation. I am sure that it will be looking to the needs for transportation for passengers in northern Ontario and northern Canada as much as it will in the Golden Horseshoe. In the Golden Horseshoe it is more a case of lack of capacity than a lack of ridership.

The member mentioned that people who are handicapped are not able to get access as easily now that the train has gone. I am sure that he will be glad to know that there has been a lot of investigation and, in fact, trial routes are now in place. Buses have been modified to give disabled people far more accessibility than the trains offered them in that they can be very conveniently lifted in their wheelchairs and put into place on the bus so that they never have to leave their chair.

I have spoken with disabled people who have tried this new system and they find it far superior to anything that they had before. It gives them far more ability to travel than they had in the past.

I know the member's concern about VIA Rail service in the north. I know how much effort he has put into it and I also know of his support for Thunder Bay and the port.

He raises a point about grain coming through Thunder Bay. I think he would also have to acknowledge the fact that part of the lack of grain travelling through Thunder Bay now is due to the fact that our markets for grain have changed. Much of our grain market now is in Asia and it is shorter to ship through the Pacific ports. That is one of the reasons why some of the grain is no longer going through the port of Thunder Bay.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her comments.

Let me start with the last one. The minister might be interested in knowing that grain from the prairies going through Vancouver is destined for Egypt and has to go through the Panama Canal.

The minister is correct that the markets have shifted. There is no question about that. There is also no question about the impact of the EEC getting its act together and becoming an exporter of grain. That has had an impact. What bothers me is that the Canadian Wheat Board is being more aggressive in seeking out markets in the Pacific Rim than it is, for example, in North Africa and the Soviet Union.

Admittedly, the mandate of the Wheat Board is to get the highest price for the lowest cost to the producer, and I have no objection to that. My party has long supported that concept. But that, in conjunction with the WGTA, has forced the Wheat Board to go that way. It has closed its office in Europe and opened a new one in the Pacific Rim. So I do not think it is fair to say that it is strictly market forces that have created that situation. There is also the drought. We have to admit that there just is not as much grain as we used to have. But the important point is that they are maximizing the west coast and using Thunder Bay for whatever is left over. Right now we are down to 30 per cent of the export trade, and we used to be at 60 per cent.

With regard to the bus modifications, yes, I am aware of those. I would have preferred that they had been in place across the system before there were any cuts to VIA Rail, because we have in fact disenfranchised a number of our citizens.

I found the minister's comments about southern Ontario interesting. I think she said their problem is lack of capacity, not lack of access. Perhaps another time she might like to explain why the Government of Canada, through its Order in Council, reduced the number of trains and the number of cars available in the southern Ontario component so that there is less capacity available. In the meantime it is going to sell off the rolling stock that VIA has declared surplus to its needs.

On a final comment, I will be appearing before the Royal Commission on Transportation to outline what direction I and my party feel Canada should be heading into the year 2000 and beyond.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I wonder what thoughts the member has with regard to the equalization of transportation costs. I think it is a great concept. Each province is taxing the diesel used by freight trains travelling across their province. This has been a tremendous deterrent for shipments, especially of coal from the western regions to the eastern regions. Has he any comments on that? That is beginning to be a very heavy burden on top of the other situations.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

Provincial tax on railroad fuel was one of the questions that came up time and again during the VIA Rail debate because VIA Rail is also charged that tax. It is interesting that that tax is really a road tax to assist in the maintenance and construction of roads within the provinces. The irony is that the one mode of travel that owns its own roadbed is being taxed on its energy consumption to help pay for the roadbed that everybody uses, not for free, but without paying the full cost.

With regard to the coal question. I know that my colleague, when he was here the first time, did a lot of work on the issue of coal from the Kootenays coming down through Thunder Bay, being processed there and going on to Ontario Hydro plants. I took up some of that work when I was elected in 1984, as I know did the hon. Deputy Prime Minister who heads a task force to examine coal.

Quite frankly, I am disappointed with the province of Ontario and my own provincial member, the Hon. Lyn McLeod, who is the Minister of Energy. The province decided not to purchase additional amounts of coal from western Canada, low sulphur coal I might add, a cleaner burning coal. It chose to continue to draw high sulphur coal from the United States to use in the Ontario Hydro generating stations. We will continue to push for that. Obviously, the elimination of the fuel tax on rail will be one of the ways in which we can help make western Canadian coal much more competitive with the American high sulphur coal.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the House today and to apprise it of this government's commitment, not only to the people of the north but to economic development and diversification in northern Canada.

The current economic conditions in the north contrast sharply with those of the mid-1980s. In 1984, the economic indicators such as the GDP, value of production and employment still demonstrated the effects of an earlier economic recession. Today these indicators show signs of growth, due in large part to the joint federal-territorial economic development programs under the Economic Development Agreement.

• (1650)

We must, however, ensure that the improved situation today is sustained and that the current growth which has occurred, thanks in part to the policies and economic development programming that we have provided, continues.

In particular, this government recognizes that Yukon and the Northwest Territories must continue to strengthen their leading sectors and diversify into other sectors if they are to achieve greater stability in the future and provide northerners with an adequate number and variety of economic opportunities.

This government has undertaken a number of successful initiatives to help support economic development in the north and to provide a stable planning framework. From a policy perspective, it has provided greater certainty to northern developers by, first, reaching agreements in principle with northern native groups on outstanding land claims, by reaching agreements in principle with the territorial governments on a northern energy accord, and by introducing a northern mineral policy.

Through targeted economic development programming under the federal-territorial Economic Development Agreements, assistance has been provided to northern entrepreneurs and to organizations to investigate and pursue new employment and business opportunities. This programming has been successful because with minimal support the federal government is able to lever additional territorial government dollars along with project dollars.

It has also been successful because much of the Economic Development Agreement spending has been targeted at strategic priorities and projects that are now showing and will continue to yield definite long-term benefits. Importantly, infrastructure has been put in place in numerous communities under the auspices of economic development planning subagreements. These subagreements have included renewable resources, mineral development, arts and craft development, small business development and tourist development.

Participation by native people and organizations as proponents of these EDA projects in the Northwest Territories has been significant. In the Yukon participation has been increasing but we know more can be achieved. The federal government has introduced the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy, or CAEDS. This is to support native business and employment opportunities and to address economic development requirements of native people in general. With representatives from native organizations participating on the EDA committees, a greater understanding of the programming that is necessary has been gained with a resulting increase in usage.

The efforts under EDA to date have certainly made a positive contribution toward expanded, diversified and more stable territorial economies. However, to realize the full potential long-term benefits of the federal government's contribution to economic development, further government support and assistance is needed in the sectors that we have been encouraging.

Although the EDA with the Yukon expired last year, extensions have since been put in place. As well, the EDA with the Northwest Territories is scheduled to end this year. This government has, however, initiated preliminary discussions with both territorial governments with a view to developing new programming for a five-year period beginning in 1991.

The future challenge for the federal government in co-operation with northern governments is to continue the transformation of northern economies. This involves further diversification of the economic base with increased emphasis on sustainable economic development, structural changes to sectors, such as mining, to enhance the returns to the communities and to their residents, as well as linkages among the sectors.

Given the relative strength of the Canadian, Yukon and Northwest Territories economies and the possibilities arising from the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, it is easy to see that there are opportunities which can be pursued.

Under the subagreements of the EDAs, opportunities exist for the improvement and expansion of a number of essential areas, including the mining industry and the area of renewable resources, the tourism and business sectors, human resources development and skills acquisition, and ongoing economic planning by communities and governments.

The theme of diversification is not new. It has been a thrust of the federal and territorial economic programming in both territories over the last six years. We all recognize it as a solution to another challenge, which is to minimize the reliance upon a few sectors for revenue and employment.

Import substitution is a principal component of diversification, and the renewable resource sector is an excellent example of this type of development which will lead to stronger linkages between the wage economy and the traditional economies of the aboriginal people.

Technological innovation is another avenue for generating business opportunities, especially at a time when science and technology is a national and international growth area for future development.

Regardless of the approach taken to diversify the economy, long-term benefits can only accrue when economic growth has been balanced by the development and maintenance of a healthy resource base.

The key to this is the acquisition of requisite skills and training by our northerners participating in their expanding economy and the provision of an infrastructure achieved through community based planning which will encourage industry to locate and develop. This will be the key in the future.

I expect future federal economic development programming for Yukon and the Northwest Territories to recognize these many opportunities and to ensure that our efforts are directed to this accomplishment.

As well, this week the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development signed a roads program transfer agreement with the Government of the Northwest Territories. This transfer represents yet another step made by this government in the development of responsible northern government.

With this transfer the territorial government will not only be directly responsible to its citizens for the existing roads system, but it will receive $10.5 million to do so. This is an increase from the original program budget of $9.4 million and effectively paves the way for increased access, development and exploration.

In addition to the further developments of the preceding sectors, there are other events which I foresee as having significance to the development in the north. These events include the North American air defence modernization project, the renewed interest in northern gas pipelines, and oil and gas projects in the Beaufort Sea. Opportunities for new or expanded businesses and employment will undoubtedly be generated by these endeavours.

These will be reflected in and complimented by the organization of the land use planning commissions and recently initialled final agreements to settle land claims for the Yukon Indians and the Dene–Métis as well as the agreement in principle for the land claim for the TFN.

The settlement of land claims will be of particular significance to each territorial economy. Obvious benefits will be derived from direct injection of funds into the economy as well as through any investments made by native development corporations. It also means that native people will have a substantial land base to manage and develop for their future. The future of the north will be one of co–operation in a common goal for growth and prosperity.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments? Resuming debate, the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak on this motion which I believe addresses a particularly important question, Canada's north.

The motion raises most of the critical issues that I believe need to be addressed. It speaks about economic diversification and the need for additional diversification. It points out that some of the transportation services have been reduced rather dramatically and it gives us the example of VIA Rail. It points out that some of the transportation services have been dramatically reduced and it gives as one example VIA Rail. It also points to the regressive impact of the unemployment insurance legislation for high unemployment areas such as the north. Of course implied within that observation is that unemployment in the north is much greater than in a number of other areas in Canada. It talks about the planned cancellation of the northern residents' deduction. It identifies the imposition of the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber. It identifies the cancellation of the mining depletion allowance and flow–through share benefits for mining exploration and that the imposition of the goods and services tax will have a particularly negative impact on the north because of the higher costs involved. Of course 7 per cent is a great amount when we are dealing with costs that are higher than ordinary. Finally, it points out that there are no adequate adjustment programs for single industry towns.

• (1700)

How much do we really know about the north? I think this begs an even more fundamental or perhaps more basic question. How much we do really know about our country? How much do we really know about the province of Ontario if we have not lived there? How much do we really know about la province du Québec, the Atlantic provinces, or the western provinces? How much do we really know about the north?

It has often been said that Canada is a country that does not know nearly as much about itself, its people, its regions, and its resources as it should. Therein lies a great problem.

I am particularly happy that this motion gives us an opportunity to talk about the north, one of the regions of Canada that is probably least understood.

When I think about the north right away I think about our two territories: Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I have been told that Yukon from a land mass perspective is roughly the size of Manitoba, which is approximately the size of France. In Yukon I am informed that there are approximately 25,000 people; in Manitoba, slightly more than one million; and in France, 55 million. I give these figures to show the dramatic differences that exist on this planet and in this country.

When we talk about the Northwest Territories, basically we talk about one–third of Canada's land mass. There are just a few more than 50,000 people, people who identify with the Dene, Inuit and others; a mixed group to say the least.

When we talk about the north we must also include the northern part of many of our larger provinces, because they very much lie in the north. The north occupies much of Canada's land surface. It has much of Canada's mining, including gas and oil reserves. It has much of Canada's forests, water and soil. Without the north we would not only be a very small country; we would indeed be much poorer from a number of perspectives.

The north has a uniqueness, as I believe most areas and most peoples do, which is not very well understood. We often talk about small rather isolated areas, although that is not always the case. We often talk about small numbers of houses, residents, students, or whatever. However, there are extra costs that people do not understand as well as they should. Because of the large distances covered and because of the small numbers we do not get the economies of scale and indeed there are huge transportation costs. All people in the north want the essential services that are taken for granted in many of the larger of centres, such as a quality education system, quality health services, and social services which respond to the needs of the citizenry. That is fair. I think what this country needs to be all about is trying to make sure that those who do not have as much do have that which is necessary so that they can feel as if they are a full partner in this country we call Canada.

Recently I had an occasion to speak to some people in Inuvik, Iqaluit, Churchill and a number of other communities. I wanted to talk to them about the costs of bread, meat, fish, cheese, vegetables, fruit, paint, and fishing equipment. I took those at random because I wanted a sense of how much larger the costs were there than they are in Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver or Halifax. It was virtually impossible to draw any real mathematical relationship. Clearly it is much higher.

It was as much as four to twelve times higher depending upon the item and depending upon the locality. In conclusion, I was extremely surprised by that large gap, which I was told was mostly because of large transportation costs and because of the small numbers that are often purchased by the population that I have mentioned.

We need to address a basic fundamental question in the north, but it is essential to make a commitment to the provision of services equal to or equitable to those in other areas of Canada. I think whenever possible those services need to be on site or, whenever that is not possible, they need to be accessible. In other words they must be available. My first preference would be that essential services—health, education or any number of social services; I could go on—be there.

Like many other Canadians the people of the north want to feel part of this country. They want to feel that they are understood, that they are appreciated, and that what they have can make a difference to this nation. They believe they need the political power, not a disproportionate amount but sufficient that their regional development initiatives will be realized.

They want education that is comparable to other centres, school facilities, and teachers with training and experience who can do the kind of job and deliver the quality education so needed in today's society in order to be competitive and to contribute to one's community, one's province, one's territory and one's country.

They actually believe that there is no reason the quality of education should not be equal to those of other centres. As well, they are concerned about the post-secondary offerings, because clearly their numbers do not permit the construction of a college or a university in each centre, but they want access to that post-secondary education because they recognize how increasingly important it has become.

They realize that there are new technologies out there, new concepts such as distance, correspondence education which has been around for a while but which has been refined, campuses that can be set up, and people who can come in to assist in creating a more level kind of arena, a situation where they can get their fair share.

People in the north as I have defined it are aware of the special costs of transporting students to school, college or university; the special costs of books and equipment; and what have you. They are concerned about this matter. They want people in government who will appreciate that uniqueness and be ready to respond to it.

• (1710)

These people also believe as I do that there is a need for special opportunities to be provided so that they can be equal, equitable or competitive with others. There are a number of ways of doing so. Clearly it is not always to give the same; sometimes one needs to provide more in order to make sure that that is the situation.

Madam Speaker, I notice you are signalling that my time is up. I am a bit confused, because I thought, and in fact I was told that I had 20 minutes. I would need some clarification.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I can inform the hon. member that earlier today, I was given notice by the representative of the hon. member's party that all Liberal members would share their 20 minutes. If the hon. member, with the consent of his colleagues, is to speak for 20 minutes— I simply wanted to make things easier by letting him know that his time had expired. It was not my intention to interrupt his speech.

Mr. Duhamel: I appreciate your comments, Madam Speaker. I had understood that I had 20 minutes. So I have your permission to proceed, since I believe I have the support of my party. Thank you.

[English]

I was pointing out how important I felt it was that special opportunities were offered to those who life in the north. I was about to give an example of some programs in Manitoba, access programs which provided special opportunities to individuals who have now entered the medical profession, the law profession and other professions. This has provided role models for certain communities and groups that were particularly important. In other words, there is something that can be done. We have the proof that there is success in those kinds of programs.

As I pointed out initially, the motion addresses the whole issue of diversification. There have been attempts to be fair about the diversification of the north, but there needs to be greater opportunity and greater attempts undertaken in order to accomplish this very worth-while goal.

The economy of the north should be given an opportunity to diversify beyond natural resources and it can be done only if the basic infrastructure is in place. We need good roads, social services, and telecommunications services. As one of my friends who wrote to me recently pointed out, not only do we need these good roads, social services and telecommunications facilities, "the north can be used as a base for high technology research into forestry, the environment and other areas."

I want to address the whole question of aboriginal self-government. It is time for us to make a full and total commitment to our aboriginal people so that they can become full partners in this country we call Canada. They need to have the political power in order to realize their goals, dreams and aspirations.

We have tried in a number of ways to help them, but that assistance has not been particularly successful if we look at where they are in terms of housing, education and a number of other factors. It is time that we took that step, that made the commitment, and that we explored openly and honestly the concept of self-government and greater autonomy for our native people.

I want to address the question of health care. It is easy to ignore that question in a sense by saying that these are small, isolated communities with few people, but it is not good enough. Clearly we cannot have a hospital in each centre. In fact it is impossible depending on the size of the centre to have medical professionals, but clearly we can have access to medical facilities available to people who live in our far outlying areas. It is absolutely essential to offer the kinds of medical services that we would find in other larger centres, as I pointed out either on site, if it is feasible, or accessible by air or any number of ways that may be adequate.

One of the questions that I think is important to raise is what does the north want? What would it like that it does not have today? I think the question is one that has been raised by most regions in Canada and by people in Canada generally. It is to be understood, to be appreciated, to have the political power and tools to realize its destiny and potential. It wants to be treated fairly and be able to participate fully in the planning of its future.

[Translation]

The Northern region is a misunderstood region that we do not know well at all as Canadians. It is rich, not only because of its people and its natural resources, but also because of its large potential that remains to be developed. It is somewhat fragile, from an environmental perspective. Caution must be used, otherwise long-lasting damage could be made. It is inhabited by people who want to be given the opportunity to have their say in the decisions made which concern them in the Canadian governmental systems, whether territorial or provincial. They are people who have children, like you and I, and who want their children to have an education so that they can either go work elsewhere, if they wish to, or stay home and contribute to the development of their community.

I am referring not only to elementary school and high school, but also to post-secondary education. I understand, like many, that it is not always possible to have a community college or a university in a community, because of cost considerations for instance. Many other possibilities exist, however, through technology, through distance teaching and through allowing teachers from some colleges and universities to go and teach in small communities. It is also possible to invite students, as it has been done on several occasions, to come and study in colleges and universities in the south.

We nevertheless have a commitment to make. We must commit ourselves to providing them with education at home whenever it is feasible. These people want both an education system that will allow them to be competitive and other systems, such as health services, social services, etc. In general, I think that those people want to be understood, they want to be appreciated. They want Canadians to know that they exist, that they live in a part of the country that is extremely beautiful and extremely different from one side to the other. If you take, for example, the community of Lac la Martre and if you compare it to Iqaluit, Inuvik, Eskimo Point, Churchill or Dauphin, you will see enormous differences. But, nevertheless, there are great similarities. Those people want to participate fully in this country that we call Canada. The want to be partners who not only are appreciated, but who can contribute their talents, their energy and their resources.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague on his excellent, well-prepared presentation. It seemed to me that there is a long wish list for northern Canada and rightly so, because there is a definite problem there. I guess we can provide them with all the institutional requirements and schooling they need, but unless we give them a reason to remain where they are, we will see over the next 10 or 15 years a mass move from northern Canada to southern and western Canada and elsewhere.

• (1720)

One of the factors that will persuade the northerner to move is the GST. The goods and services tax is a reason for many northerners to think twice about remaining in the north.

In my view, we need to provide them with all the necessary services and institutions, especially educational, that they need. They should be provided with the required population in order to maintain and provide the taxation base they will need in the long run.

I would like the government to think about the immigrants who come to Canada using the business criteria for immigrating, somebody who applies with $150,000 or $200,000 and gets access to a visa to come to Canada. Perhaps the government might consider the creation of some sort of incentive to newly arrived business immigrants to locate in certain parts of northern or western Canada. This is one thing that can be done.

Also we have here in Canada many immigrants who come from eastern Europe, Asia, or Africa who are professionals, engineers or doctors for that matter. Those people are not allowed to practice in some provinces such as Ontario or Quebec or elsewhere. Maybe it is time for the government to make an assessment and look at the possibilities of encouraging those people to go to northern Canada and certain other parts of the country where they can practise.

There are many ways to skin the cat, Madam Speaker. I guess the most important element is that we have the will to encourage and help the people of northern Canada.

I would like once again to commend my colleague on his excellent presentation and I welcome his comments.

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I appreciate some of the points raised with respect to responding to the north more sensitively perhaps than we have in the past and I would like to explore each of those.

I guess we have to start from a basic principle that I want to enunciate and repeat. That is, we need to make a full commitment to ensuring that people from the north have access to the same kinds of services that we have.

The opportunities to develop economically will increase, particularly when the infrastructure is in place for the education systems, health systems, social systems, roads and what have you.

If I had had more time it would have been interesting to have explored some of the uniqueness of the peoples of the north. We are talking about several native languages. A few years ago I worked on a short assignment in the western Arctic where, if my memory serves me correctly, seven native languages were used. This impressed me significantly because they were being used in some significant harmony, and we are not unaware of the fact that we sometimes have real difficulty across Canada in using two languages.

There are cultures in the north that very few people know about. They really require nurturing and support and I would hope that that might be the possibility of another discussion at some other time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. government House leader.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I would just take a moment, Madam Speaker, to get to some House business which has been under active discussion.

The first item has to do with what is now Government Order No. 6, in terms of government business, and what is known to members as the motion dealing with Private Members' Business. This was introduced and debated very briefly before it was amended by a motion of the hon. member of Kingston and the Islands, that the question be now put.

I think you would find unanimous consent, first of all, to set aside that the motion be now put for the purposes of amending the original motion to put the following motion:

That the motion be amended by adding thereto the following:

And that the provisions of this order be in effect until the last sitting day in December, 1990.

The effect of that would be to have these rules respecting Private Members' Business as set out in this motion be in effect until the end of this year.

The purpose is to see how they work. In essence, it is a kind of sunset Standing Order. So, I believe, Madam Speaker, there is unanimous consent to proceed to amend the motion with this sunset clause, if you will, and then I think there will be unanimous consent to pass the motion as amended.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to confirm what the hon. government House leader has said.

The committee had originally recommended that these rules be amended for a period from January to June of this year. Because we were unable to agree on adoption of the committee recommendations in the time frame, it seems reasonable to us that the rules as introduced by the government, with the slight modifications made, would apply for a limited period. We are prepared to work with them on a trial basis to the end of December of this year.

I welcome the amendment. I am delighted that we have finally achieved agreement in dealing with these rules which, in our view, will assist in dealing with Private Members' Business in a more expeditious way. I thank the government House leader for negotiating this arrangement and trust that the new rules will work out to the benefit of all hon. members.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise to indicate support for the amendment and the motion itself, particularly in light of the comments by the government House leader earlier today that he was not quite sure as to when the June break would occur, it is probably appropriate that we keep it going through until December.

I just want to make it very clear that this is not a precedent in terms of passing Government Orders on allotted days.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent for the hon. minister to have leave to present the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you will also find there is agreement for the following consent motion.

It is after considerable discussion that agreement between all three parties has been reached on how to handle a very controversial piece of legislation, namely, Bill C-43, the abortion bill. What we sought, and hopefully achieved, was a consensus that will allow all hon. members who want to participate in that debate, the opportunity to do so. No one is attempting to curtail in any way, shape or form, the rights of members to participate in the debate, but rather to allow the debate to terminate and the appropriate votes to be held, at a time that would be convenient for the maximum numbers of members of this House.

It is a complex motion, Madam Speaker, but the purposes are to afford members the opportunity to debate and to afford members the ability to organize their affairs so they might be here to participate in the vote. Therefore, I move:

> That the following provisions apply to further consideration of the report and third reading stages of Bill C-43, An Act respecting abortion:
> (1) on Tuesday, May 22, 1990 and Wednesday May 23, 1990, Report Stage consideration be the first order of the day; and
> (2) on Tuesday, May 22, 1990, all selected motions shall be moved seriatim, at the start of Orders of the Day, by the Member in whose name each stands, with each such Member speaking for up to ten minutes immediately after his or her motion is moved;
>
> (3) on Tuesday, May 22, 1990, immediately following the proceedings set out in (2) above, any Member may speak once, for up to 10 minutes, and may refer to any of the motions moved pursuant to (2) above;
> (4) on Tuesday, May 22, 1990, the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment and until 9.00 o'clock p.m., at which time it shall adjourn;
> (5) on Wednesday, May 23, 1990, the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment and continue report stage consideration of the said bill, until no later than 9.00 o'clock, p.m., at which time the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and, successively and without further amendment or debate, put every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said bill, following which the Speaker shall adjourn the House until 11.00 o'clock, a.m. on Thursday May 24, 1990, provided that if debate on report stage is concluded before 9.00 o'clock p.m. on Wednesday May 23, 1990, the sitting shall be suspended until 9.00 o'clock p.m. the same day, at which time the Speaker shall begin to put every question as set out in this order;
> (6) on Thursday, May 24, 1990 the order for third reading of the said bill be the first order of the day, and the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment until such time as no member rises on debate, provided that in such debate:
>
> (a) any member may speak only once and for a maximum of 20 minutes followed by 10 minutes of questions and comment,
> (b) following an indication to the House by a Whip of any party, members of that party subsequently recognized in debate may speak for no more than 10 minutes, followed by five minutes of questions and comment,
> (c) no member shall be recognized in debate more than once on the said day; and
>
> (d) no amendments shall be accepted by the Chair; and
>
> (7) at the conclusion of debate, which shall be no later than 9.59 a.m., Friday, May 25, 1990, the putting of the question or questions shall be deemed deferred until 3 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, May 29, 1990, at which time any recorded division requested shall not be deferrable.

• (1730)

That is the motion, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, if a seconder is needed for the motion, I would like to second that motion.

Indeed, this motion is a result of negotiations in good faith by all sides and all parties. I want to give thanks to some of our under-utilized but sometimes overworked assistants and tell the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for Peace River that we appreciate their contributions very much.

We were trying to reach an agreement here which would allow all members a chance to put forward their views on this very important issue, and also give them the opportunity to plan according to the day and the votes and the hours at which these things will be held so that there will be no surprises. In this way everyone will know the day and the hour. Therefore, they will be able to be in the House and do what we are being asked to do by Canadians, that is, to take decisions.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I, too, rise to indicate that there have been lengthy discussions and negotiations on this matter.

I would also like to compliment the parliamentary assistant to the government House leader and the member for Kingston and the Islands for their diligence in this matter.

It is not easy in the House, on partisan issues or non-partisan issues, to reach agreement. I appreciate the manner in which my two colleagues have dealt with this matter today.

May I say as the Whip of my caucus that it is nice to know when any vote is going to happen so that I can have my people here.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I understand there is unanimous consent for the hon. minister to present the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In order to clarify, Motion No. 6 was amended and agreed to as amended, is that right?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NORTHERN CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nault:

That this House condemn the government for its lack of commitment to northern Canada and for its failure to treat northerners fairly and equitably as demonstrated by:

(1) its lack of commitment to economic diversification;

(2) deserting northern Ontario by slashing VIA Rail services;

(3) abandoning all northerners with its regressive unemployment insurance legislation;

(4) planning the cancellation of the northern residents deduction for isolated areas;

(5) imposing a 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber;

(6) cancelling the mining depletion allowance and flow-through share benefits for mining exploration;

(7) imposing a goods and services tax; and

(8) failing to implement adequate adjustment programs for single industry towns.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the House today on this opposition motion. I welcome the chance to clear up as well any misconceptions put forward by the claim that northern Canadians in any way receive less than fair and equitable treatment by the government.

In terms of Bill C-21, the new unemployment insurance regulations will, in fact, improve the effectiveness and the fairness of the current unemployment insurance program. It represents a natural evolution of a social program, an essential part of this country's compassionate ability to provide income security for those Canadians in all regions who are out of work and in need. It is part of our commitment to provide all Canadians, the north included, with the best training and adjustment programs possible.

We recognize the importance of the UI safety-net to many communities with seasonal industries, particularly in areas like the north and Atlantic Canada. Under Bill C-21, these areas will continue to benefit from the flexible entrance requirements tied to differences in unemployment levels.

I would imagine that the hon. member who spoke some time ago was referring to areas of high unemployment when he made his misguided statement about regressive UI legislation. It is wilful ignorance to suggest that plans to create a more active approach to unemployment and to build an efficient, competitive labour force would be carried out at the expense of Canadians with no prospects of finding a job. This simply is not the case.

Bill C-21 is explicitly designed to shield those people who live in regions of highest unemployment. This bill is designed to help, not hurt them.

Bill C-21, in conjunction with the new proposed boundaries for the country's economic regions, will make the unemployment insurance program more regionally sensitive. If anything, it will mean a more generous system for the north. The economic boundaries will better reflect the reality of today's regional work patterns based upon previous unemployment figures, individual and family income levels, and regional industrial structures.

Yes, it may be true that claimants in northern Ontario will be affected by the bill. Some people will have to work more weeks to qualify for UI benefits, but to tag the legislation "regressive" does not do justice to the intelligence of the members of the House.

We were elected in 1984, and again in 1988, with a mandate that included controlling federal spending in order to maintain economic stability and continued growth, and to prepare Canadians for participation in the competitive global economy. Recent polls show that Canadians understand the government's efforts to make UI a more constructive, pro-active program.

Recent Decima polls and Environics studies show that about two-thirds of Canadians support the idea of using UI funds to train unemployed people so that they can find better, more stable jobs, and find them sooner.

It is foolhardy for anyone to suggest that Canadians do not want a more effective and efficient UI system. The Labour Force Development Strategy and Bill C-21 which flows from it is one means by which the government wants to use its resources better.

It must be kept in mind that the changes to Bill C-21 will free up significant resources and will result in reallocation of some $350 million to help claimants gain work experience and upgrade their academic qualifications while receiving benefits.

Eight hundred million dollars additionally a year will be made available for enhanced training and other re-employment measures which will enable more Canadians to find secure and lasting jobs. This is almost a 50 per cent increase in the $1.7 billion funding currently available. This is particularly beneficial to regions where the economy is more fragile and the need for skills and innovation is greater.

Two of the more successful government programs which offer important adjustment help to communities and businesses will also receive increased funding once Bill C-21 is proclaimed. The Industrial Adjustment Service, or IAS, effectively helps businesses and their staff work together on solutions to adjust problems. It plays a particularly important role in one-industry areas that can be devastated by massive lay-offs or shut-downs.

At Dona Lake, Ontario, for instance, the IAS assisted the Windigo Tribal Council to ensure jobs for natives in construction site jobs. This agreement involved the provincial government as well.

In the Yukon at Elsa, a silver mine closed, throwing 200 employees out of work. Through an IAS agreement, social services support was provided, prospective employers were brought in for the purpose of recruitment, and resume preparation and job search activities took place.

Bill C-21 means that an additional $15 million will double the number of firms which receive help. That means 1,000 businesses instead of the current 500.

Another very important program is the highly successful Community Futures Program. It was designed to help small and rural communities which face chronic unemployment and economic decline. Towns like Hay River and Pine Point in the Northwest Territories, Sault Ste. Marie and Ear Falls in northern Ontario, and Fort McMurray in northern Alberta have all benefited from Community Futures.

• (1740)

The new UI bill will also add $50 million to this fund to help increase the number of communities which will benefit from the various options available. Some 200 additional rural and small town communities will be helped.

I would also like to mention briefly the maternity and parental benefits that will come into effect with the passage of Bill C-21. At present, maternity benefits are available for 15 weeks. This will be enhanced so that up to 30 weeks of benefits can be claimed. I know that many northerners are patiently waiting for these improvements to be put in place.

I can speak from personal experience with respect to phone calls that I have been receiving in my riding. I have received calls from Wanda, Belinda, Ken and Lori, Sharon, Greg, Shanna, Janis and Janet, just to name some of the people who have called me within the last couple of days. The question on their minds is: When oh when will this bill be passed? These are young parents expecting and anticipating to use one of the major benefits of this bill to provide for a basic opportunity to be good and proper parents to the new-born that they are about to bring into this world. Having the 30 weeks, the double period of time available to them, means so much more to them.

Janet, the last woman whose name I mentioned, is of particular interest to me, not that one constituent should be any more important than another, but she is my daughter. She says: "Dad, when are you going to get that bill through?" I keep saying to her that we are doing all we can.

Perhaps, Madam Speaker, if members of the Liberal dominated Senate were capable of experiencing a pregnancy they might be moved to show a little compassion for these young people. It is tough enough to raise a family and be responsible for its development. Why does the other place insist on standing in the path of young Canadians seeking this much needed help?

You can see, Madam Speaker, from the few examples that I have given that the government is not abandoning anyone, let alone northerners whose livelihood the Labour Force Development Strategy is designed to secure. I wish I could say the same for the other place.

Our goal is to continue to provide the necessary safety net for those in need while fostering a dynamic economy where workers enjoy opportunities.

Canadians deserve the best in social programs that we can deliver. We believe that Bill C-21 will do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Madam Speaker, first of all, a few words about the hon. member's magnificent speech, mainly about Bill C-21.

What is the connection between Bill C-21 and an opposition motion that says or appears to say that the Canadian government does nothing for northern regions? I think even Bill C-21 recognizes the fact that some regions should receive more than others.

Madam Speaker, as you know, Bill C-21 also provides for a new designation of economic regions. In Quebec, in more remote areas, this is extremely important, because often these communities are far removed from our urban centres and are more or less ignored. In the past, before Bill C-21, they were included with our large urban centres, and they were, in fact, terribly penalized because of the way the regional unemployment rate was calculated. It was far more difficult for people to obtain unemployment insurance benefits or access to programs tailored to the needs of regions that are economically and socially disadvantaged.

Madam Speaker, unfortunately, Bill C-21, which was tabled in the House, is now being held up in the most partisan way by the Liberal Senate. This means we cannot implement measures that are adapted to today's needs, measures that will recognize the needs of isolated regions, of centres that need more government assistance than others. Unfortunately, because of the present delay caused, as I said earlier, by the Liberal Senate, all Canadians will have to pay the price.

And as far as the opposition motion is concerned, I read that the government is condemned for its lack of commitment to economic diversification.

Madam Speaker, when we look at what has been done in the way of job creation since 1984, and when we know that since 1984, 1.6 million jobs have been created in this country, 80 per cent of which are permanent jobs, I don't think this happened exclusively in our large urban centres.

When we look at the distribution of government funds among the provinces, it is clear that every part of the country has been affected.

When we look at what the government did in terms of decentralization— My colleague from northern Ontario was telling me that since FedNor was established, people in outlying areas can call on local officials and agencies without having to go to the large centres such as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Victoria. Regional development is within their reach. And the government knew that, by creating agencies such as the Western Diversification Office, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and FedNor, implementing the Eastern Plan, signing the Canada-Quebec Agreement on Regional Development and providing funds for northern regions, it was decentralizing this money. It did it not to hinder but to promote the development of isolated areas because decentralization brings us closer to the problems. We are thus able to find solutions and make immediate decisions without having to go back through the system. I do not want to blame officials, far from it, but often when they get documents from a remote area, they are not too sure where it is and what the problems are. Sometimes they say yes, sometimes they say no.

By decentralizing, the progressive conservative federal government has provided a great deal of services to the Canadian people.

The Opposition says that we did almost nothing for diversification. I want to remind them that since 1984, we have signed federal-provincial agreements with each and all of the ten Canadian provinces in most of the crucial economical sectors like agriculture, forestry, mining, transportation, all economical sectors that promote regional development, that result in the success or the failure of a region.

In Quebec, we do have some remote areas, although they may not be as far up north as some of those areas in other provinces. The federal government has been supporting Quebec's remote areas, especially its forest industry, with the Eastern Quebec Development Plan, put in place to assist what was considered a doomed region about twenty years ago, because of a perceived lack of economic activities and initiatives necessary for the survival of the communities. With Phase II of the Eastern Plan, the federal government injected close to $50 million to help entrepreneurs develop forestry resources which are vital and essential not only to the economy, but also to the environment. That gives you an example of what we have done.

As far as regional development is concerned, I mentioned earlier the Canada-Quebec Industrial Development Agreement that involved some outlying areas. Some funds have been frozen, if I may use that expression, to be used for those areas only. We have given them the opportunity to do more, to develop at their own pace, since sometimes remote areas cannot develop as fast as larger centres, not because of a lack of willingness of course, but often because of insufficient financial, human, and other resources. By implementing specific programs for those areas, the federal government has made a step in the right direction. But we still have a long way to go.

The government does not believe it solved all the problems of remote regions in Canada, nor does it intend to say it did. As we know, there are about 26 million of us in a huge country, we have to deal with long distances, a small population and the whole economic question which, let it be said, is not always easy. Nevertheless, we signed agreements with the provinces, agreements which worked well, and this is new in Canada. Serious negotiations between the federal government and the provinces, strategies to share the more efficient spending of money between the provinces, the federal government, the institutions and the regions, are new indeed.

• (1750)

It wasn't easy, I admit, but the cooperation that had been lacking for several years was rediscovered at a negotiation table where there were frank exchanges of views and finally, we succeeded in many instances in doing more with less.

During those discussions, Madam Speaker, we came to recognize that there are some regions that need more intervention by the governments, where the amount of help cannot be arbitrary and has to exceed what was planned or what is considered to be the national average.

Madam Speaker, I am happy I was directly or indirectly part of the process by giving my support to my government these last few years.

The forestry agreement is extremely important. Some hon. members said a few minutes ago that the federal government did nothing concerning the 15 per cent surtax on softwood lumber exported to the U.S. but I can say, Madam Speaker, that the—

There were discussions with each of the Canadian provinces, the majority of which, 9 out of 10, including Quebec, of course, and British Columbia, the two biggest softwood producing provinces, accepted to negotiate, to cooperate in order to find a solution where as the money, instead of going to the American Treasury stayed in Canada where it could be used to develop the forest sector.

Thanks to that kind of joint action and discussions we were able to better help the forestry sector.

Madam Speaker, I was quite amazed this morning when the hon. member for Algoma, who is usually such a good critic in agricultural matters, said that the federal government had done next to nothing for agriculture. Let me remind him that we have increased spending in agriculture by close to 600 per 100 since 1984.

Let me remind him also that this government that introduced a long term dairy policy, a policy long awaited since the early 1980s, but which the Liberal government did not want to give to farmers.

Moreover, I would like to remind him that this governement has done enormously for our Western Canadian producers in terms of spending, in terms of money granted as drought relief.

Finally, in all the intiatives the government has undertaken in the last few years, whether in agriculture, forestry, mining, natural resources or natural resources systems, it has always been present and taken its responsibilities, sometimes alone, often in co-operation with the provinces. That, Madam Speaker, has produced interesting results that allow us to say remote areas are getting more, will be getting even more in the future and will be able to look after themselves and develop to the full extent of their potential and aspirations.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague for his great speech, particularly for the clarifications he has given us.

I would however like him to explain what he meant exactly when he talked about two provinces signing or approving that agreement. Could he clarify that statement for us?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): I thought my hon. colleague from Richelieu would start a debate, but I see that he chose to ask a question instead.

The two provinces are of course very important in the context of the discussions on the 15 per cent surtax. I must however remind the member that Quebec and British Columbia are not the only provinces to have agreed to take on that 15 per cent surtax. There are nine others.

Therefore, I could tell him that both the federal government and the provinces have taken their responsibilities regarding forestry. That goes to show once again our concern for those issues and to prove that we are interested in not only discussing them but solving them in a positive way.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Forestry.

Earlier in the debate there was some concern expressed about some of the forestry agreements and the manner in which they were being worked on, whether or not there were any increases at all in budgets since 1984, and whether or not silviculture and working closely with the industry has been part of forest management. With it being National Forest Week, could the parliamentary secretary take a moment to bring us up to date on exactly what the department is doing?

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): I suggest this is a most important issue, Madam Speaker. If we fully analyse the Department of Forestry, we discover that since 1984— as a matter of fact, in 1984, our Prime Minister had made a firm commitment to give back to forestry the status it deserved. How did we do it, Madam Speaker? By increasing by as much as 300 per cent the forestry budgets, and through Federal-Provincial agreements which resulted in over $1.1 billion investments in forestry. It is important for us, Madam Speaker. We went even further, because we are often blamed by the Opposition members who kept on asking the Hon. Member representing Northern Ontario what he had done under such and such agreement? I wish to remind them that from 1984 to 1988, or 1990, depending on their renewal date we signed the agreements.

We promised to do more and to renew these agreements. That is what we did with New Brunswick. That is what we did also with Nova Scotia. That is what we did finally with Newfoundland. That is what we did under the Eastern Quebec Plan. Madam Speaker, when the Minister of Forestry stood up in the House and promised to renew the agreements, to maintain the level of investments and to ensure the economic development of the forest industry, I think he clearly indicated his major interests and concerns as Minister of Forestry. By the way, Madam Speaker, it was our government which re-established forestry as a full department, no longer dependent either on the Department of Environment or the Department of Agriculture or any other. It is a full fledged department which assumes its responsibilities and will continue to do so in the future.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I am happy that my collegue from Champlain (Mr. Champagne) mentioned that this government created of a distinct department of forestry. Up to now, its functions where shared by several departments. This new department made it possible to have a greater concentration, more precise budgets, as well as a more equitable distribution of moneys. My collegue mentioned the provincial distribution, the federal-provincial agreements reached since we took power, and, of course, those signed with the province of Quebec, which has made the most of the money and the agreements to have a thriving forest industry.

There is still much to do, of course. But it seems we have been on the right track for the last few years, and that the policy stated once again by the minister is an indication that our forests are in good hands.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, unusual though this may sound in terms of forestry, I hail from a region half of which perhaps is covered by trees, and we are blessed with this exceptional Canadian industry which creates hundreds of thousands of jobs. I should point out that since 1984 our government has been very active in the forest sector, not only by establishing a full-fledged Department of Forestry but also by signing agreements which have enabled the regions to develop. This has made it possible to maintain and create hundreds of jobs, while at the same time working in close co-operation with the provinces to administer our forest resources. We knew this of course, but we made Canadians realize that forests are not an endless resource. Trees are renewable, sure, but this process can only be achieved through close co-operation on the part of both government levels. I would suggest that this is a good time to acknowledge the outstanding work done in this field by the current minister, the parliamentary secretary and various other people. I think that we as Canadians can be proud and expect a very promising future for Canada's forest industry.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, one is always juggling a number of roles in this place, but I am pleased have made it on time to raise with the government on this adjournment debate the response that I received in April 1989 dealing with the question of the safety of airlines.

On that day I raised with the minister the fact that at the same time that the House of Commons was considering the bill to amend and actually create the National Transportation Agency, the National Transportation Act, which is the vehicle for deregulation of air, primarily, that the government had in its hands documentation from its own senior staff which suggested that the government was not prepared to handle the ramifications of deregulation. By that, the document meant that they knew they did not have the staff to deal with the increase in the number of carriers that was clearly going to happen because of the experience in the United States where there would be a mushrooming of the number of airlines servicing points in this country.

We have seen it in my home community of Thunder Bay where we have tripled or quadrupled the number of flights in and out of the Thunder Bay airport. We have become a hub. What this document showed was that the government was not prepared in terms of having the right number of inspectors in place in the right places, nor did it have the other components of the kind of protection system that all of us in this House and all of our constituents expect to be there. We want to know that every time we get on a plane that that plane is safe. At the same time that this House was considering the deregulation bill, this report warned that Transport Canada did not have the trained bodies available to them in order to handle this influx.

We saw that in the United States there was an increase in the number of accidents. We have had an increase in incidents of problems with airline safety. We have had at least one carrier grounded because of its unsafe operation and its licence pulled by the Minister of Transport. We have seen questionable practices.

We have ongoing a major inquiry into the Dryden air crash. Some of the testimony before that inquiry has suggested that inspection was extremely lax. We have had other evidence in northwestern Ontario that a detected problem with an aircraft in terms of its welds was detected by an inspector in Winnipeg and recorded but never acted upon and ultimately that plane crashed because there was not the inspection procedure and follow-up that Canadians used to take for granted.

I was chastised by the minister at the time I raised the question for always connecting safety with deregulation. Ministers of Transport, right from the hon. member who is now the Deputy Prime Minister, through the minister of trade to the former Minister of Transport and even to the current one, kept saying that safety shall not be compromised. However, the reality is that there is cut-throat competition and the banker breathing down your neck, ensuring that you make those payments every Friday. If it comes down to making a choice between buying that replacement part that just is not worn out yet, but is close to the end of its life span, or making your payment to the bank, because you know if you do not make the payment to the bank they are going to pull the plug and put you into receivership, you take the chance. You say it is rated for 200 more hours and common sense tells me to replace it now, but I cannot afford common sense.

• (1805)

The government was warned of this, not just by my colleague, the member for Regina—Lumsden, who has recently celebrated more than 21 years on the transport committee of this House, but by their own bureaucrats that, at the very least, they did not have the capability of monitoring the changes that would occur in the aviation environment.

It goes beyond that. At the same time that the government was pushing deregulation, which I should remind the House was started by the Liberal government before them, they were cutting back on air traffic controllers, placing in jeopardy the people who travel and who live in areas around Vancouver and Toronto.

Madam Speaker, I know that you know that I could go on for minutes if not hours on this important matter, but I recognize that my time has run out. I thank you for your patience and with interest I am awaiting the response of the government.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government has said many times and it will continue to say that safety is our number one priority. Perhaps the problem is that the hon. member opposite does not like to accept the enormous success that has been the reality of economic regulatory reform. The promise of the National Transportation Act in 1987 that less regulation will result in competitive market forces thereby ensuring adequate service levels and the establishment of equitable fares, appears to have unfolded as envisaged.

It is important to note that two large carrier families have emerged, both of which effectively link together the opportunity for national, regional and local airlines. As a result, Canada now, for the first time, has two fully-competitive coast-to-coast networks providing intensive competition on heavily-travelled intercity routes and in local service markets. Yet, notwithstanding the development of the large carrier families, the ranks of independent air carriers continue to grow.

As far as the recent failures of some charter operations, it is most misleading to blame deregulation for this. Economic regulatory reform created an atmosphere in which to compete. In a competitive world, there will necessarily be adjustments, and some growth and some failures.

Turning to the question of provision of resources, yes, Transport Canada as a whole has taken a cut in person years in some areas. This is nothing new. These goals were established in the 1985 budget with the government's commitment to reducing the size of the public service. These reductions are being accomplished in a number of ways, none of which will impact on the safety or the security of the travelling public.

These reductions to our human resources have been accomplished through a co-ordinated program recognizing and streamlining administrative functions, reduction of levels of management, consolidation of support services, increased contracting out and increased use of technology. It is important to emphasize that none of these will be affecting the department's ability to assure transportation safety and security.

• (1810)

In fact, the continued safety of the system is such an important issue that the former Minister of Transport established a task force in order to seek the expertise of the private sector, industry and government. The aim of the task force is to ensure that we have the right resources and that they are used in the right way in order to meet the challenging needs of the future.

The task force has been asked to look into the aviation traffic system and to provide the minister with recommendations on the approaches that will ensure safety standards are always maintained while improving the efficiency of the system to cope with the anticipated demands of the coming years and into the 21st century.

The member has forgotten about some of our recent initiatives, such as RRAP, CAEDS and MOS. I would like to say to him that we are very concerned and will continue to ensure safety and that the National Transportation Agency will undertake a complete review of the impact by 1992.

REFUGEE STATUS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, on April 9, I asked a question in the House about Lebanese refugees. I said to the minister that there were thousands of Lebanese here in Canada who had yet to obtain their refugee status and who were waiting for various committees to examine their files. I may point out, Madam Speaker, that the Lebanese are not the only ones, in fact there are a great number of people—I am particularly concerned about the Lebanese because I have had a lot of requests at my office and phone calls from Montreal. Many people from other countries come to Canada to live. Canada is a country of peace and opportunity, and it is perfectly normal that they should wish to live in this country.

In the past, Canadians were always known for their generosity to immigrants. If I may look back, I would like to say something about the role played by immigrants in Quebec and how they were received, and in fact, I have first-hand experience. My father, who came from Lebanon in 1906 to settle in Canada and who went to Quebec was very well received. My mother, of French-Canadian and Irish ancestry, raised nine children. So we have a whole family, my father's relatives, his brothers who came over from Lebanon and were well received in Quebec—I think there are very few countries that can pride themselves, as Quebec does, on having welcomed immigrants with open arms. Look at the mosaic we have in Montreal! There we see that immigrants enjoyed the same benefits of prosperity as all other Canadians.

Today, there are refugees, like the Lebanese and Romanians I have met, and people from countries like Peru and Chile and Central America. They are all here in Canada, waiting for committees to decide whether they can stay.

I believe that perhaps one of the most important characteristics of a people is its generosity in receiving others who are seeking peace and trying to make a life for themselves, to have children and take advantage of opportunities they did not have in their own countries.

I would like to focus mainly on the Lebanese community, which is well represented in Montreal and elsewhere in Quebec and Canada. Since 1975, they have experienced a terrible war in their country. And I may add, Madam Speaker, that they were not fully responsible for that war. The Lebanese people themselves are not directly responsible for the civil war. They are involved of course, but look at the presence of foreigners, Israeli soldiers in Lebanon, Syrian soldiers in Lebanon, they have no business there. But as you know, it is not easy to expel them in this kind of conflict. And so there are thousands of Lebanese and especially children who have suffered the most and who are forced to live through these hostilities.

But some of them have been lucky, for it must be said that one has to be lucky to reach the island of Cyprus or flee elsewhere in the Middle East and eventually land on Canadian soil. I know that many of them did not come here through normal and legal channels. Some landed here with tourist visas and claimed refugee status. I can understand them. When you come from a war-torn country, it stands to reason that you would want to remain in Canada. Who would not? In committee I saw reports where these Lebanese people explained why they wanted to be given refugee status. Unfortunately they are told: Well, you have no sound motive to seek refugee status. Or else they are told: We do not believe your story. They are hardly in a position to know what really happened. When looking at a country destroyed by war, I would be inclined to believe that they are quite right to seek asylum in this land. That is why I made insistent representations by letter and by phone to the Minister's office to ask her not to return any Lebanese nationals to their country, at least for now. I say "their country" but it is shared by foreign armies. I am asking her not to deport any Lebanese citizens.

I would ask the same thing for victims of harassment, in Central America for instance. That is all. It is that simple, Madam Speaker. I am confident that the Canadian people will understand my request and I would ask those listening to my speech to send the Minister a letter saying: "Given the conditions in which these people live, especially the Lebanese but also Central Americans and others, those who are here should be given the chance to be heard. We should also find every reason to be as generous as possible and grant them refugee status so that they can live in peace.

[English]

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, since the beginning of the civil war in the mid-1970s the Canadian government has with only brief interruption facilitated the immigration of Lebanese affected by the fighting who have close relatives in Canada.

The Lebanese special measures have allowed more than 17,000 assisted relative category immigrants to come to Canada under relaxed criteria. Many of those would not have qualified under normal circumstances or criteria. Together with those whose admission was authorized under normal immigration criteria, this constitutes a major contribution to the alleviation of the distress experienced by relatives of Canadian citizens and residents. The program is precisely designed to match Canadian efforts with the needs of those persons of direct concern to Canada: those who are the relatives of our citizens and residents and those directly affected by the civil strife in Lebanon.

The hon. member knows that Canada withdrew its embassy from Beirut in 1985 because of the danger posed to Canada based staff. On April 27 1989 Canada opened a temporary immigration office in Nicosia, Cyprus in response to the influx of Lebanese to Cyprus. The office complement is now three Canadian visa officers, four Quebec immigration officers, and 22 locally engaged employees. Consequently, that office provides Lebanese applicants with a quality of service comparable or superior to any Canadian visa post abroad.

From the opening of the temporary office in Nicosia until April 5, 1990, that office issued more than 5,000 immigrant visas, 657 visitor visas, and 175 ministerial permits to Lebanese. To the end of March, our office in Damascus has in 1990 issued 1,668 immigrant visas and 227 visitor visas to Lebanese citizens.

Canada is the only country to have implemented such special measures and to have increased the levels of service in response to the flight of Lebanese nationals to Cyprus. Our response is both sympathetic and effective in considering the needs of individuals affected by the situation in Lebanon. We shall continue to assess the situation as additional issues emerge.

With respect to the immigration and refugee board, members of the board undergo extensive training to assist them in carrying out their responsibility of determining whether or not claimants are refugees as described by the 1951 United Nations Convention relating to the status of refugees. The acceptance rate for refugee claimants from Lebanon was 82 per cent in 1989.

DEPARTMENT OF MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Tom Hockin (for the Prime Minister) moved that Bill C-18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I open third reading debate on Bill C-18. The minister could not be here today due to a long-standing commitment he had in Winnipeg.

We are now in the final phase of deliberations on Bill C-18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Moving this bill through its final stages in the House and on to the other place follows a strong commitment of the Prime Minister reaffirmed a few weeks ago in Toronto. The Prime Minister did so because he knows this department will help strengthen our sense of being Canadian and promote equality for all in Canada.

[Translation]

Last June the Secretary of State told the legislative committee to which Bill C-18 had been referred that it was nothing more than a housekeeping measure. In short, it is a bill concerning government management and aimed at establishing a new department.

• (1010)

[English]

In the debate on this bill we have heard small voices rooted in the past, urging Canadians to look backward, urging Canadians to grind the wheels of social progress to a halt.

We have listened to some hon. members in the Opposition. The government has reviewed the amendments they proposed at committee stage and in the House, amendments that go far beyond the scope of this bill.

As the minister explained in detail at committee hearings on Bill C-18, this legislation is an administrative measure to provide the legal framework for a department. It does not in any way replace the Multiculturalism Act or the Citizenship Act.

Yet, time and time again, my hon. colleagues have been critical of the bill because it does not include a definition of multiculturalism. Quite frankly, their logic is elusive.

I would direct my hon. colleagues to read the title of the bill. We are not talking about a department of multiculturalism only. Do members of the opposition suggest we be so flippant as to dismiss the citizenship mandate of this department? Why are they only speaking to one side of the department?

None of them over there has even given the slightest thought to the imbalance that will arise if we defend multiculturalism and do not do the same for citizenship. They do not understand that we have given a much broader scope to this institution than just multiculturalism.

Maybe they just were not listening, or maybe they were only listening to certain overly vocal lobbyists.

Sometimes the most obvious is worth reiterating. There is a difference between a department and the policy that falls within its mandate. A department is an instrument. It is put in place to help implement the policy. It is not the policy itself. All departments are administrative instruments for implementing policies and programs.

Unfortunately, some members have forgotten this important distinction. They have proposed amendments that go far beyond the scope of an administrative bill. Ironically, they would be limiting the scope of the department to narrow issues. They would limit the department only to multicultural matters. They and their lobbyist friends would create an ethnic ghetto in the name of providing what they call "precision".

Do we really want to re-open debates that took place in 1988 on the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, an act which was passed unanimously by this House and which embodies our multicultural policy? Who were the members of the opposition listening to then? They were hearing many voices, but listening to only one, a decidedly negative voice—the executive of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

Let me remind the House and the Opposition that this organization originally favoured a strong Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. But when we did not accede to the narrow, and let me say, self-serving proposals it made to the legislative committee, it changed horses mid-stream, retracting its support.

I suggest to my colleagues across the way that there are some other voices out there that they should be listening to. For example, they should be listening to the Canadian Citizenship Federation, the National Voluntary Organization, national literacy groups from across the country, Harambi Centres Canada, the Committee for Racial Justice, the Association of Multiculturalism, and immigrant serving agencies of British Columbia, to name but a few.

This government believes their views do count. The thousands upon thousands of Canadians who have expressed their support for the establishment of a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship should not be ignored. If there is an outstanding characteristic of this department, it is that it is inclusionary. Everyone has a stake in this federal department, just as they do in our nation-building.

[Translation]

The sole purpose of Bill C-18 is to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship whose mandate will be to promote equality, fight against racism, and strengthen our common values.

[English]

With this bill we in Parliament are seeking to make multiculturalism and citizenship integral parts of the mainstream life of this nation. I believe the gap between our aspirations and reality is slowly narrowing. We have built up an equity in our multicultural policy. We are not starting over again. We are not going back to square one, as members of the Opposition would have us do.

We have rejected the old, tired ideas of the past about what multiculturalism means to Canada. This Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will carry out a more meaningful policy. It will help move us one more step forward toward a higher ideal for this country.

[Translation]

The department will relate to all Canadians, men and women alike, for they are all members of our multicultural society and share the binding link of citizenship.

There is no question here of a department solely responsible for multiculturalism nor of a small token department for so-called "ethnic groups". The government simply will not indulge in that kind of cynicism.

[English]

The creation of this department follows directly from the vision and the ideals expressed in the Canadian Multiculturalism Act of 1988. As a people we recognize that multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of our society. Multiculturalism is essential to an understanding of what it means to be a Canadian.

As well, one of our strongest ties as a people is our shared Canadian citizenship. It is both a symbolic link and a living expression of our Canadian unity.

Canadian citizenship is never a final achievement. The new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will foster a greater sense among all Canadians of the responsibilities that go hand in hand with the rights of our citizenship.

When the Prime Minister announced his intention to set up this new department, he sought the careful balance of multiculturalism and citizenship as characteristics central to our contemporary sense of Canada. He did so with great insight. The Prime Minister recognized that governments cannot live our lives for us. They cannot exclude the Canadian people from their own social policies. Certainly, this is true of multiculturalism and citizenship which are elements central to our being Canadian.

Canadians must judge the new department on its aims and objectives, what it strives to achieve within the context of contemporary Canadian society. I would like to cite some examples, such as enhanced literacy, greater understanding about the value of human rights, more widespread participation in the critically important voluntary sector, fighting racism, and promoting the values inherent in our shared citizenship.

I will tell the House what this department is not about. It is not about confrontations, quotas or regulations. The department's mandate is to work co-operatively within government and with all sectors of our society to build a Canada where there are no barriers, a Canada where each of us as individuals can contribute fully to the prosperity, growth, and development of the country, and where everyone can assume all the rights and responsibilities as citizens of this great land of ours.

The greatest strength of the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship resides in the very ideals that give shape to its mandate. Few countries and few people can claim so many close ties between communities. The department seeks to foster these ties to promote greater understanding among Canadians.

Yes, as Canadians, we do have great expectations for ourselves and for our country.

We must fight racism, the sometimes quietness of racism. I believe the most dangerous kind of prejudice is not necessarily the loudest. We must work to ensure that all Canadians have an opportunity to contribute to society and that they can assume and exercise the rights and responsibilities inherent in our citizenship. We must strive to teach all Canadians, new and old, of the values which are fundamental to our understanding of being Canadian.

• (1020)

How can ideas as vibrant as these be captured in a static definition? This has eluded our friends across the way.

A new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship cannot do it all, of course, but it can help focus our energy. It can assist in making our vision and our hopes possible.

This department is about fairness and equality. It is about our future together. That is the heart and soul of its mission.

[Translation]

The new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will strengthen our previous commitments as expressed in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, and new legislation on citizenship. This country needs the contribution of each and every citizen, and we must ensure that all Canadians are given every opportunity to do their share.

The estimates of the new department are an unmistakable indication of our intentions. They relate to participation, understanding, awareness, and enhancement of our society's basic values. The Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will become a key department for the future of the country. The department will not be control- or protest-oriented, but rather dedicated to the fulfilment of the hopes harboured by all Canadians.

[English]

I would like to conclude my remarks today by encouraging hon. members to support this bill, and to move it rapidly to its passage.

I urge them to do so for their fellow Canadians. People are what this country is all about. They are all this nation of ours can be. In the end, it is not departments or agencies that are the legacy of an administration or a Parliament, but the human progress that is achieved.

Today, the government is living up to a promise we made to all Canadians, for all Canadians. We do so mindful that there is an even greater promise to keep. We must work together for the day when all our citizens enjoy the full richness of life in our beloved Canada. Only then can we say we are truly satisfied.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Saint-Laurent-Cartierville (Mrs. Maheu) has a question?

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Thank you, Madam Speaker. The hon. member for Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle raised a number of points on which I would like to comment, but unfortunately, we don't have enough time.

[English]

I wonder what the hon. member means when he says that certain groups are trying to grind the wheels of social progress to a halt.

He also referred to a definition of multiculturalism. A little further in his speech he asked: What does multiculturalism mean to Canada? I submit that it is up to this member and this government to give us finally a definition of multiculturalism. That is what we have been asking for.

We have been asking the minister and the department to tell us what multiculturalism means to this government. As a matter of fact, we are questioning the commitment that appears to be there when we talk about it. We pay lip-service to it, but what are we really doing?

The hon. member also said that members of the Opposition and the other party are not defending citizenship. I do not know where the member hides himself, but in my riding the almost all the immigrants become citizens. Every chance we have, we talk about Canada. We talk about them choosing this as their country. If they want to become citizens of our country, we are there to help them. I have worked in the community at the grass roots for 20 years. I know what I am talking about.

The hon. member talked about an ethnic ghetto that is being formed. Before too long, the ethnic communities of the country are going to outnumber the francophones and the British who founded it. I do not think we are forming a ghetto in this country at all. I object to anyone saying that the Canadian Ethnocultural Council is trying to form an ethnic ghetto. It represents about 20 or 30 groups in the country. Let us tell the National Italian Congress of Canada that it wants to form an ethnic ghetto. Let us tell CRARR from Montreal that it wants to form an ethnic ghetto. I strongly object to that suggestion.

I would like the member to explain how a ministry or a department, with no logical objectives, no responsibilities, and no accountability, can help the multicultural mosaic of our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Debate.

Mrs. Maheu: That was a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I made a mistake earlier when I asked for questions. There are no questions or comments following the speeches of the first two speakers at third reading. It was my mistake. I thought the hon. member was rising on debate. The hon. member may continue on debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before the hon. member begins, I wish to advise the House that I have received written notice from the hon. member for Edmonton Northwest that he is unable to move his motion during Private Members' Business on Monday, May 14, 1990.

[Translation]

Since the Chair is unable to arrange an exchange on the order of precedence, Private Members' Hour will be suspended for that day, pursuant to Standing Order 94.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been consultations among the parties in light of the announcement that you just made. I think you would find unanimous consent for the receipt and passage of the following motion. I move:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, May 14, 1990, the House meet at one o'clock p.m. and proceed to the consideration of Government Orders from one o'clock p.m. to two o'clock p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to move his motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate, the hon. member for Saint Laurent—Cartierville.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, it is too bad there is not a period for questions and comments. The member raised several points that I feel were contentious.

[Translation]

As multiculturalism and citizenship spokesperson with my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate today. The government is to be commended for tabling this bill. Creating a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship is a positive gestures, reflecting our recognition of the diversity and equality of all Canadians, irrespective of race, nationality or creed.

[English]

This new department is a step in the right direction, but for it to be more than a front—and that is what I was referring to—it must be a leader from the start. It is necessary that a senior minister take charge and, also, that part of the staff represent or at least be knowledgeable of the real needs of the different groups it wishes to help. Without clear goals and a good framework, it would be difficult to assess the demands and effectively react, thus the importance of objectives and controls from the start.

• (1030)

[Translation]

Today, almost 40 per cent of the Canadian population is of ethnic origin—that is, not French or British—and this percentage is increasing steadily. Our new multicultural reality is both a major asset and an extraordinary challenge for Canada. It is a major asset, because the entire country can benefit from this multicultural diversity, both economically and culturally.

Canada's future depends on its ability to recognize and promote this Canadian mosaic. Recognizing and encouraging this fundamental characteristic of our country means, in practical terms, that we must develop political mechanisms and programs that will enable Canadian society to establish harmonious interracial relations, based on mutual respect and equal participation.

That is the challenge of Canadian multiculturalism. Failure to meet this challenge would be a serious threat to our future. Imagine what our country would be like if intolerance, racial tension and conflict, were the rule.

[English]

Canada cannot afford, if it wishes to stay a country, a rise in tension and intolerance between the different groups living here. It is a new challenge because we are now discovering new minorities and different races all over this country. We must learn to accept and learn from these new groups as they from us. The road towards social harmony is a long one but it is one that the government has accepted to take. Let us stay alert and assure it fulfils its task.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, while recognizing the importance of a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, I question the potential for action by this department. It seems there are still a number of gray areas in this bill, despite all our efforts in the legislative committee to clarify certain points and suggest amendments. Unfortunately, we did not succeed.

Most issues relating to multiculturalism and citizenship will be the responsibility of a new minister whose duties will include ensuring that the multiculturalism policy announced in the Department of Multiculturalism and citizenship Act is implemented. He must monitor the policies of all departments and federal institutions, which is not made sufficiently clear in the bill.

Madam Speaker, the specific duties of the minister, as set forth in the bill, include to promote national policies and programs with respect to multiculturalism and citizenship; to provide services for the acquisition of citizenship; to promote greater understanding of human rights; and to make grants and contributions in support of special programs for race relations.

[English]

The new minister's mandate is a very broad one, so broad that one wonders how it will be possible to control what is to be done effectively in the new department and what is to be done in all other departments affected by the minimum quotas to be respected with regard to hiring people from different minority groups, among other things.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, while the government is to be commended for increasing funds to promote race relations, I must say that at the same time, the government has disappointed both me and community groups by imposing budget cuts on organizations involved with ethnic groups, native people, the disabled, young people and especially, special-interest groups.

My point is, Madam Speaker, that while overall, the budget for multiculturalism has gone up, the funds for community support and participation have decreased by $400,000 this year. This represents a 15 per cent cut in funding for such groups as the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

[English]

The Canada Ethnocultural Council represents 40 groups across the country. When they bowed down and said: "Yes sir, how high do I jump?", that was fine. The minute they started questioning politics and government policy, they are no longer considered to be a representative group of cultural communities.

[Translation]

These groups act as coordinating and liaison bodies to help the different communities communicate with each other and with the various levels of government.

Madam Speaker, I am also concerned because we do not know whether the obvious trend to limit operating grants for groups will last for one year or more. If it continues, the Department of Multiculturalism will be less effective in fighting racism in Canada. It is important for the department to co-operate closely with these organizations so that it is aware of what is in fact happening, and for that, it is essential that these organizations survive.

Madam Speaker, another point that I consider worth mentioning is the staff of the new department. The present employees to be transferred from the Secretary of State's Department are too few to fulfil the responsibilities of this new department.

Mr. Moore: It changes nothing!

Mrs. Maheu: Oh! I would like to have an explanation as to how it changes nothing.

Clause 5 of the bill stipulates that the minister's duties are to initiate, recommend, coordinate, implement and promote national policies and programs with respect to multiculturalism and citizenship. This is a big responsibility and the number of people working in this new department and the funds to support them must be increased for it to be effective.

It is also very important that additional staff be of diverse origins and cultures. It is essential that the new department set an example in hiring visible minorities, but it is just as important for those working there to be aware of the issues. They must come from the grass roots and understand the real needs of the communities so that they actually represent what Canada is today.

Madam Speaker, it is essential to hire people who are culturally attuned to multiculturalism and it is also important to provide funds for community programs. It is essential that groups speaking on behalf of cultural communities have sufficient funds to remain a real resource that helps the government in its work.

Madam Speaker, it is also necessary to provide a medium- and long-term budget so that the new department and the various organizations representing groups can take positive action from the start in order to give effective recognition to the mosaic that is Canada in 1990. Above all, we must not have a department with expectations that cannot be met because of budget cuts.

Neither must the funds given to the new department come from cuts to associations reflecting the various groups across the country. Both must work together so that the new department meets the challenge it has set itself and for that, the minister must have both the staff and the budget.

[English]

Without a budget a department cannot function. With only a short-term budget, projects will be limited and poorly motivated because of a lack of security. A new department, and especially this one, must be guaranteed a long-term budget if it is to be pro-active in today's society and permit all to be treated equally in fact and not merely on paper.

• (1040)

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the department must not be allowed to become a department of good intentions which pave the road to hell, as they say. It must be an active department. By creating expectations and promising positive action, the government has put it reputation on the line. Now it will have to deliver.

Here is what the minister said in his speech in June, and I quote: "The central responsibility of this department is to strengthen the solidarity of the Canadian people by ensuring that all Canadians participate fully and without discrimination in defining and building Canada's future. This is a time of change and transition in our nation, a time when the evolving cultural and racial diversity of contemporary Canada presents a new image of what we are as Canadians. It is a time when we are seeking to ensure that all Canadians receive fair and equal treatment, that all Canadians have the same chance to participate and to achieve their dreams."

If we really want all Canadians to have the same chance to participate, it is crucial that all citizens have access to current events, so that they can have their say, either through presentations, letters, elections or by any other means. This implies that everyone must be able to read, write and communicate in one of our official languages. That is a major challenge, but it is one the new minister will have to meet early on, if he really wants all Canadians to have the same chance to understand what is happening in our country.

Madam Speaker, to ensure all these pious wishes come true, we feel that, as recommended by a number of groups that appeared before the legislative committee, it would be desirable to have a commissioner of multiculturalism who would monitor enforcement of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship Act. This position would be similar to that of the Commissioner of Official Languages, and its incumbent would operate on an arms-length basis to ensure his right to criticize.

Madam Speaker, another option would be to have the Canadian Human Rights Commission monitor implementation of multiculturalism and rule on complaints filed with respect to multiculturalism and citizenship, as provided under the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Madam Speaker, our emphasis on the need for monitoring by a commissioner is merely to ensure that in the years to come, under the department or government that happens to be there at the time, there will be positive action, with programs directed towards the future, programs that are people-oriented and that teach the target population.

Not that we have any particular doubts about the effectiveness of the future minister, especially since we don't know yet who it will be. Will there be a new minister? Will it be the Secretary of State again? We also have some concern about responsibilities that have not yet been set out. We are concerned, however, about ensuring continuity between the written word and concrete action, so that all Canadians become aware of a genuine openness in Canada, directed to those who make this country what it is today and what it will be tomorrow, on the eve of the twenty-first century.

Madam Speaker, a tool that has been little or poorly used to promote and understand the differences that make us unique as Canadians is the media, and especially television.

It is essential that what we see on television reflects the multicultural and multiracial reality of the Canada in which we live. It is also very important, Madam Speaker, if we are to have a proper understanding of the needs of the various groups this medium is to represent, to have on staff people of different backgrounds and races, who are aware of the needs and are in touch with these communities, so that the correct image is projected. Once again, by example and education we can discover together the rich resources of this country and those who live in it.

Whatever our background, we are all Canadians and proud of it. That is the reality that should be projected through all the media. It is essential that the government uses wisely the tools at its disposal, so that all Canadians will have the same chance to participate.

Madam Speaker, as I said earlier, creating the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship is an important step towards the future, but the government creates expectations it must be able to meet.

To ensure the department's credibility from the outset, Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, must contain a reference to Bill C-93, an Act for the preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism in Canada. This reference, Madam Speaker, will provide a better framework for the new department by including, for instance, a definition of multiculturalism.

We realize that Bill C-18 is the logical sequel to Bill C-93, since the government wants to create a department. But to avoid misunderstanding or false expectations about the new department, it is necessary to clearly state for whom this department exists, so that its future actions and positions can be better understood.

It is still fundamental to lay the proper groundwork, including the rationale, power and target groups of the new department, so that it starts off on the right foot, whence the importance of reference to Bill C-93. What seems obvious today, which would justify not referring to Bill C-93, will not necessarily be obvious tomorrow. It is always better to have more information rather than less, so that we will have a department that can take its rightful place and meet its commitments.

[English]

If the government really does wish to have a new department that will have a positive impact on our society it is important that, from the beginning, the role, mandate, budget and control system be specified, thus avoiding unnecessary mistakes.

[Translation]

While we appreciate the creation of a new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, we remain cautious about its future effectiveness. Since it has such a broad mandate, we will remain on the lookout to see if it will in fact take positive action and have clout in 1990. The government has raised expectations in various ethnic and racial groups. Let us see whether it will keep its promises.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise on third reading stage of Bill C-18.

I think it is unfortunate, as my colleague said, that we were not able to respond to some of the comments made by the spokesperson for the minister as he was actually distorting the facts, perhaps because he was not involved in the committee procedure. Bill C-18 should be much more than a housekeeping bill and more than just an administrative bill. It is an important piece of legislation which should provide the mechanism and structure for implementation of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. We all know that was the act passed in 1988 to preserve and enhance multiculturalism in Canada.

It should also be the vehicle to strengthen and promote Canadian citizenship, the values which unite all of us as Canadians, and promote a national identity regardless of our ethnic origins.

I am resentful of the comment of the minister's spokesman in this regard when he said that we were ignoring citizenship. It was my amendments that proposed changing the title of the act to put citizenship first, to put a definition of citizenship in the act and to strengthen the wording in several sections. I hope the minister's spokesmen will correct his information.

There is no reason why an administrative bill should not have a clearly defined purpose. In this case the purpose is to implement multiculturalism as spelled out in the Multiculturalism Act. That is the very reason we need a separate department.

The main purpose of the bill is to establish a department of multiculturalism and citizenship. I would prefer to call this a department of citizenship and multiculturalism, stressing our commonality as Canadians first, and then our diversity. This was not accepted by the minister, so I question his spokesman today.

We supported the establishment of a separate department of multiculturalism and citizenship at second reading because we felt it was needed. We still feel it is needed. We want an effective department. It is needed to provide leadership, visibility and the resources to move Canada forward as a multicultural, multiracial society. Perhaps some day it will not be needed; when we have truly achieved equality for all our citizens and when we are truly multicultural. Until that time, we feel a department is needed.

We wanted a ministry and a department that would be recognized by cabinet, that would have a strong mandate within the government, that would have the power to bring about institutional reforms in all government departments and federal institutions. That is what the Multiculturalism Act was set up to do and what this bill should be administering. It should be a vehicle, not just to sponsor multicultural events and fund programs, as is done through Secretary of State. We need this to continue and we need funds to be assured and increased in that regard. A multicultural department should also be a catalyst to bring about major changes in the policies, attitudes and practices of our country's institutions to make us multicultural in fact, not just in words.

We are in a critical time in our history as a nation. We have moved from being a colonial society formed from two European countries that ignored aboriginal peoples and immigrants from other countries. We must stop thinking of ourselves as people of French and English origins primarily with the "others" category tacked on as a vague third multiethnic category and native people added as an afterthought. We do not need four categories in Canada. We are one people. We are a multicultural, multiracial society in Canada. It is time our institutions of government reflect that. That is what a department of multiculturalism would aim to do. Therefore, it must be spelled out in the mandate of the department. That is why we want definitions and tougher language, particularly in reference to racism.

We must respect and appreciate the rich diversity of all our people, while actively promoting a unified, multicultural Canada that respects diversity and protects the rights of all citizens equally. Multiculturalism is for all Canadians. We do not want that statement to be just jargon, we want it to be there in the protection of rights and in the provision of open opportunities for all people, regardless of their ethnicity or race. I think we are moving into a new era in Canada and our constitutional struggles reflect this. Strong advocates for multiculturalism are urgently needed in the constitutional debate to implant in our national psyche that we have arrived. We are not just a bilingual, bicultural, white Canada, we are a multicultural country of colour. We should rejoice being a rich mosaic.

Bill C-18 offered a wonderful and timely opportunity to take us another step forward to clearly define multiculturalism more clearly and to listen to the wishes of ethnocultural communities and a range of ethnocultural groups. We heard from a number of them at committee stage, but not nearly enough. There were some groups that were left out and they felt badly about this. We should be promoting equality and justice for all Canadians. Witnesses who appeared in committee agreed that the bill should be strengthened. This was felt by all witnesses, not just the Canadian Ethnocultural Council which seems to be such a threat to the government because it cannot take advocacy or criticism any more. There are many groups and that organization represents national groups which in turn represent millions of people across the country. It is a pretty broadly-based constituency.

The responsibility of the minister and the new department should have been directly related to the new Multiculturalism Act. That is why the minister did not bring in any direct reference in this bill. Also, he refused amendments in that regard. We wanted to include a clearer definition of multiculturalism and we wanted a mandate for the minister to act as the lead minister in implementing multiculturalism. I know my colleague from the Liberal caucus spoke strongly on that issue many times.

We wanted a specific reference to the elimination of racism. I remember the Congress of Black Women speaking with great eloquence on this point. I drafted amendments based on their appeal. We wanted the promotion of employment equity for cultural and racial minorities. Surely this could have been made explicit in the bill. We wanted the establishment of an independent commissioner of multiculturalism to monitor programs similar to the Official Languages Commissioner. Representatives of citizenship organizations, and I hope my friend on the opposite side who was so critical about admission of citizenship will listen to this because we listened to the representatives of the citizenship organization, wanted a much greater emphasis on citizenship in this bill. We proposed a name change and the toughening up of a number of sections to do this. But the government and the minister were the ones who turned this down in committee, so let us get the facts straight in this House today.

In the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism, which was meeting concurrently with the legislative committee, we worked as an all-party group to get consensus on an all-party definition of multiculturalism. We took the preamble to Bill C-93, so it was not anything new. It was not an invention of myself or anyone else. It was in the act but we were rephrasing it and putting in a slightly tougher wording on the equality aspects. We agreed in the standing committee that this should be presented. The minister would not listen to it. It is ironic that the government at report stage of the bill had to bring in a hundred Tories to vote against the simple definition of multiculturalism. They could have brought in their own definition if they wanted to and we would not have cared. They obviously did not want to strengthen this bill.

I would like to refer the House to our proposed preamble which referred to strengthening the Citizenship Act which provides that all Canadians, whether by birth or by choice, should enjoy equal status and are entitled the same rights, powers and privileges and are subject to the same obligations, duties and liabilities; whereas the Canadian Multiculturalism Act establishes a multicultural policy for Canada, including the requirement that all federal departments and institutions implement this policy; whereas multiculturalism is for all Canadians and is a fundamental characteristic of Canada based on the recognition of the diversity and the equality of Canadians as regards race, national or ethnic origin, colour and religion while recognizing two official languages. Multiculturalism is a government policy commitment designed to preserve and enhance the multicultural heritage of Canadians, to eliminate racism, and to achieve equality for all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do apologize, but I must interrupt the hon member. Of course she will be able to continue after Question Period.

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I rise today to address an issue that I am sure is of concern to many members. As the Soviet Union evolves under Mikhail Gorbachev's glasnost a resurgence of anti-Semitism is reaching a dangerous level. The rise of nationalist movements such as Pamyat are of great concern to those of us who are interested in seeing a transition of the U.S.S.R. into a prosperous and tolerant member of the international community.

I would like to express my profound concern for the safety of the Jewish people in the Soviet Union. I urge the Government of Canada to communicate to the Government of the U.S.S.R. to allow those individuals who wish to leave the Soviet Union the opportunity to do so. It is also time that Canada act in a manner consistent with its image as a caring and thoughtful nation.

I urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to staff the Canadian embassy in Moscow with more immigration officers to facilitate the reunification of Jewish families with their relatives in Canada.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to note that the government has decided to renew the Court Challenges Program for another period of five years.

This program provides financial assistance for test cases of national significance put forward on behalf of or by disadvantaged groups and individuals. These cases serve to clarify the language and equality rights of Canadians under the Constitution. In renewing the program the Government of Canada has demonstrated its commitment to the advancement of human rights in Canada.

I am pleased to see that the report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons on the Court Challenges Program has contributed to this positive action on the part of the government. The renewal of the program will be received very favourably by all the groups which appeared before the committee.

TOURISM

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, next week is National Tourism Awareness Week.

Tourism is Canada's fastest growing job creator and by the year 2000 will be the largest industry in the world.

Over 1.2 million Canadians are employed directly or indirectly in tourism at all levels of education and skills, which means that one out of every ten workers in Canada is employed in tourism, and 60,000 businesses generate all or most of their revenue directly from tourism.

Tourism brought $24 billion into the Canadian economy in 1988 and ranked third among foreign exchange earners, surpassed only by the auto industry.

While this vital industry continues to be a leading economic factor, it is also an industry at risk. The goods and services tax will curtail its job growth rate, and our travel deficit continues to grow.

Canada competes world-wide for tourism dollars and marketing is the key. We must ensure that we fight aggressively to keep our share in this industry and to keep Canada competitive in the global tourism marketplace.

NATIONAL HEALTH DAY

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, tomorrow we celebrate National Health Day. This year's theme, "health services, a resource for our community", was chosen to highlight the essential role health services play in society. Service to the community and financial responsibility are the cornerstones of this vast multifaceted public system that has been established over the years to meet the growing and very diverse needs of Canadians.

I therefore invite all Canadians to join in the activities of this special day that gives us an opportunity to recognize the skills and devotion of thousands of professionals and volunteers who work in the health field and provide the high-quality care that we all enjoy in Canada.

On behalf of the federal government, I wish to thank very sincerely the Canadian Public Health Association and the Canadian Hospital Association, the two organizations that have sponsored National Health Day for several years now.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, in spite of all the constructive efforts of Liberal members to make the Conservatives understand that Canadians do not want the GST the government has gone ahead and adopted this regressive and repugnant measure, over of the objections of the Opposition.

Well, Madam Speaker, the fight is not over. Tomorrow, bolstered by thousands of fellow Canadians, Liberal members will rally on Parliament Hill in yet one more attempt to convince the Conservatives that they must immediately drop the GST bill.

Tomorrow, May 12, at noon, Canadians will gather here on Parliament Hill and, given the unpopularity of the Conservatives, we will try again—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The time of the hon. member has expired.

CANADA HEALTH DAY

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, tomorrow we are celebrating Canada Health Day throughout the country.

This year's theme "Health Services: Our Community Resource" was chosen in recognition of the significant role played by health services in communities throughout Canada. Health services, which are supported by public funds, respond directly to community health needs. Community service and fiscal responsibility are the cornerstones of these important community resources.

I invite all Canadians to join in recognizing the skills and dedication of the thousands of voluntary and professional health care workers who contribute to the high quality of health services that we enjoy in Canada.

On behalf of the federal government, I would like to thank the Canadian Hospital Association and the Canadian Public Health Association for taking the initiative to sponsor Canada Health Day.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, the Tory government is punishing unemployed workers for attempting to upgrade their job skills by undertaking training programs under Section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As of April, 4,000 British Columbians, including people taking training for nursing, child care, computer programming and forest resource workers, have had their UIC discontinued. These include students who are paying their own fees. The government can provide training assistance under existing UIC legislation. There is no need to punish these people because Bill C-21 has not been passed by the Senate.

I call upon the government to restore the training allowance immediately to these 4,000 deserving British Columbians.

NATIONAL FORESTRY WEEK

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): In a few hours, Madam Speaker, we will be witnessing the closing activities of our National Forestry Week.

The purpose of this annual event is to make all Canadians aware of the importance of our forests. They are the income source of 800,000 Canadians and their economic impact is undeniable.

However it has become imperative to stress further the environmental impact of this precious resource. Fortunately, Canadians are ever more conscious of this issue and their positive attitude augurs well for the years to come.

Let us make sure that National Forestry Week is not an event which people forget the minute it is over. Each of us must see to it that showing respect for trees and nature becomes part of our daily activities.

They are our forests, let us look after them.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Canada's largest union, will be seeking wage increases of at least 8 per cent to 9 per cent to protect workers from the GST.

According to CUPE, these increases include a 3 per cent hike to cover the impact of the GST and another 5 per cent to 6 per cent to allow for inflation.

The government has been working under the assumption that the employees will not seek or will not ask for higher wages as a result of the GST.

Obviously the government's assumption that there will only be a 1.25 per cent inflation increase has flown out of the window. As a result of the GST, for at least another two years, inflation will be higher, interest rates will be higher, and the deficit will continue to increase.

Once again, Canadians will be gathering on Parliament Hill tomorrow at noon to oppose this tax. What is it going to take for this government to put a moratorium on this tax? It takes leadership. Where is it?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, Canadians do not want higher prices in the stores. Canadians do not want higher interest rates in the future. Canadians want assurances that we are going to have a stable economy next year, particularly when the goods and services tax comes in.

Right now the consumer and corporate affairs committee is holding hearings into exactly how we might be able to achieve this, but at the same time a major labour leader is telling Canadians he is going to use the GST as an excuse for major wage demands.

In today's press, the leader of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Jeff Rose, stated:

> We are telling our 377,000 members across the country to factor in a 3 per cent hike for the impact of GST and another 5 to 6 per cent for—inflation.

This is irresponsible on the part of the union. This is exactly what we do not need. This is the kind of fabricated demand which will lead to higher inflation, higher interest rates, higher prices for consumers, and an economy in trouble.

Responsible Canadians call upon our major labour leaders to be responsible and not put their own interests before those of Canada.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, this morning we awoke to the shocking news and nauseating view of the desecration of a mainly Jewish cemetery in the south of France. This kind of deplorable act, possibly by fringe lunatics or fanatics, is not an isolated incident; it has occurred in my own community in Montreal. People of good will do not accept such acts of racism. When racism raises its ugly head, we all have to fight it. It calls for the world to speak up.

And how sad is the irony in this expression of anti-Semitism the very week that world Jewish leaders went to Wansee Villa where officials of the Third Reich met 48 years ago outlining the policy of Nazi genocide. The Jewish leaders declared the forty-fifth anniversary of the defeat of Nazism as a victory for all mankind over this lowest point in man's inhumanity to man.

Leaders of good will around the world should never remain silent in the face of malevolent acts of racism wherever and whenever they occur, for to do so can be mistaken for indifference.

Most Canadians reject the desecration of consecrated land and even in the most challenging of times still share a belief in tolerance, understanding, and respect for basic human rights.

S. O. 31

STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, just a few minutes ago we heard the chair of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations attacking the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

It is interesting to note what kind of justice that union can expect to receive from a chair who has attacked it publicly at this time. It throws into question the whole role of the chairs of our standing committees. Obviously the chair of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Orders is acting as a spokesman for government policy and is not acting in the interests of all members of Parliament.

In addition, we heard a Liberal member speak in favour of the Canadian Union of Public Employees. However, it was the Liberals who supported the Conservatives in the standing committee, summoning the Canadian Union of Public Employees before that committee and the Canadian Labour Congress.

It is interesting to note that those same groups were denied the opportunity to speak in front of the finance committee in opposition to the GST, another committee—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

CANADIAN CYSTIC FIBROSIS FOUNDATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Madam Speaker, for the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, 1989 was a year to remember. The discovery of the gene responsible for cystic fibrosis, a genetic disease which affects the lungs and digestive system of young people, was announced by researchers at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto. Thanks to these remarkable accomplishments, we can all look ahead with hope and promise.

As a result of the breakthrough, it is hoped that the goal of finding a cure, or effective control, will be achieved much more quickly than was thought possible only a short time ago.

Since this is cystic fibrosis month, it seems appropriate that we reflect on these recent achievements and also salute the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, its many volunteers and financial donors who make it possible for the foundation to contribute approximately $3 million to $4 million annually toward cystic fibrosis research, in addition to supporting clinics for patients and providing information and public education programs.

Congratulations to the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my office has been deluged this week with phone calls from Public Service employees wondering whether they are allowed to participate in a rally on Parliament Hill tomorrow against the goods and services tax.

They are concerned that their jobs may be in jeopardy if they turn up here at noon tomorrow, Saturday, May 12, on Parliament Hill, to tell the government what they think of the goods and services tax.

This symbol of freedom and democracy, this place where the people speak, is already under a shadow, a shadow of excessive use of closure, ignoring the petitions of hundreds of thousands of Canadians, and the arrest of people who come here to speak their mind.

I am telling people that not even this government would dare fire or discipline somebody just for saying what they think about something that is going to affect them and their families every day of their lives.

I urge them to come here tomorrow, Saturday, May 12, at noon on Parliament Hill and let the government know what they think about the GST.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Today, we learned that the top five executives at Canadian National Railways, which is owned by and accountable to the government, last year received wage increases averaging over 18 per cent.

This is the same government that is asking ordinary Canadian workers to bite the bullet on wage increases to help fight inflation.

How can the government be taken seriously when it asks Canadians to exercise wage restraint when top executives of its own Crown corporations are receiving wage increases in excess of 18 per cent? How can the government be taken seriously on this in any way, shape or form?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would like to clarify for my hon. colleague opposite that the facts that were reported in the story talk about cash compensation. It is not a question of salary. There are bonuses included in here and it is quite confusing.

When I read the article, I have to underline to my hon. colleague that those bonuses for 1988 have been mixed with the 1989 salary levels. In 1988, CN had its best year ever and that is why those increases are there.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister's answer is totally unsatisfactory. The executives still got the money. Call it cash, call it compensation, they got the money. How can the government possibly defend these massive increases in the salaries of CN executives when, at the same time, in the same period, ordinary workers at CN got increases of only 4.5 per cent?

Will the government order an immediate salary roll-back for these executives, a roll-back to the same rate that it expects Canadians to live with? Will it roll-back these salaries? Yes, or no?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. colleague how these compensation numbers are arrived at.

Under the former government, an independent commission was set up to report so that salaries for Governor in Council appointees would be set in an independent way from government. That is the Burns Commission. The Burns Commission is the one that makes the recommendation both for the salary ranges and for the bonuses to be paid when performance exceeds what has been predicted.

We are following the rules set out by that independent commission that I mentioned. It was initially set up well before this government took power.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, there is an important difference. At the present time, the government is asking ordinary Canadian workers, not to do anything to compensate for the goods and services tax and to hold back their wages so that they will not be adding to inflation. It is a matter of do as I say, not as I do, when it comes to this government.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the government keeps repeating that Canadians must tighten their belts but supports massive salary increases for CN's top executives.

Why are the top brass of Crown corporations like Canadian National getting salary increases that, on average, are four times those given their employees and four times the rate of inflation? Will the government immediately demand that CN's top executives make do with salary increases that are in line with those of their own employees, yes or no?

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. colleague first of all that we are very conscious of these salary adjustments. We have looked very closely at the performance in that area.

Average actual increases for senior public servants, including deputy ministers, Governor in Council appointees to federal agencies, board and commissions were limited to 4 per cent in 1988, and 4.2 per cent in 1989. That is very much in line with what we have given to the unions throughout the system.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Miniser of Finance. The GST is not yet in effect, but the Minister of Finance is already talking about raising the rate. Yesterday, he said he had at least a hundred good reasons for raising the rate of this new tax. In fact, the minister raised the manufacturer's sales tax four times: from 9 to 13.5 per cent. Here is my question.

Could the minister be very specific and inform the House today what the GST rate will be in 1992 and 1993? If he cannot, will he make a commitment today not to increase the GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is referring to a quote that came out of a press scrum yesterday. I answered that question in the context of what had been done with other countries.

Of the other countries that have a value-added tax, a GST type of tax, about 18 or 19 have made practically no change in the tax. Other countries have made a change in the tax by raising their GST, the value-added tax rate at the same time that they brought down income tax rates. New Zealand is a good example of one of those countries. The United Kingdom is another example. Other countries have raised their tax to finance additional spending.

The only point that I am making, and I will make it again to the hon. member, is that different countries will treat this in a different way. The underlying point that I made in Canada was that any government, regardless of political stripe, will have to justify very carefully any change in the GST rate from 7 per cent.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, the minister also said yesterday that if workers demand wage increases to compensate for the GST, there will be an increase in interest rates. This is my question.

What happened to the 11.1 per cent interest rate in the minister's last Budget? Today, even without the GST, the Bank of Canada rate is at 13.75 per cent. When will the minister finally realize that his economic policies are a total disaster for this country?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I need only refer to a column that is in The Globe and Mail this morning by Ted Carmichael who indicates very clearly that the GST is a good policy for Canada and is the answer to a lot of problems that we are facing today.

I have just come back from Washington where I attended the meetings of the International Monetary Fund. The International Monetary Fund is very supportive of the introduction of the GST.

The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the OECD in Paris, also indicates the significance of this tax in improving our competitive position.

If the hon. member is asking why we should change the existing tax, I say that the reason is because it will improve our ability to export into other markets. It will also change a situation where Canadian producers are paying about a third more sales tax than the imports they compete with.

The more obvious question is, why is the hon. member supporting no change in the policy? Why is he supporting the maintenance of a tax that is going to undermine our competitive position, undermine our ability to sell products in other markets, undermine our ability to create jobs in this country, and undermine our ability to get the deficit down? Those are the questions that he should be answering.

TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is interesting that the Leader of the Liberal Party attacked the government for having the workers at CN receive only wage increases of 4 per cent while the senior executives averaged pay increases of over 18 per cent, because the Liberals voted for that back-to-work legislation on August 27, 1987.

The Minister of Finance has allowed extremely high increases for Mr. Crow. He is allowing very high increases for CN. The Conservatives have attacked workers for trying to make up for the increase in the GST.

What justice is there in this country when the corporate elite are receiving pay increases of 18 per cent, 39 per cent, 40 per cent and workers are not allowed to fight for the increase in the cost-of-living?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I can only repeat my earlier answer. The wage increases for deputy ministers and Governor in Council appointees, the senior management of our Crown corporations and the federal public service are exactly the same wage increases that the government has negotiated with our unions.

I will say once again that these salaries were limited to a 4 per cent increase in 1988 and a 4.2 per cent increase in 1989. So I think there is equity in the system and a demonstrable restraint on the part of government in terms of compensation.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, when CN vice-presidents receive pay increases of 39 per cent, through cash bonuses or whatever other mechanisms, I would like to see the government negotiate those same increases with workers.

What is the government's economic policy for all employees? Are the rich going to get richer and richer and richer, whereas employees cannot fight the GST? Is that the policy of this government?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, perhaps the hon. member has not understood my answers so far. The wage increases for senior public servants and GIC appointments are exactly the same as those that were given through collective bargaining to all the other employees. It was 4 per cent in 1988, 4.2 per cent in 1989 and that is comparable. I must say that in some groups that were collectively bargained the increases were higher. This is an average. It is an average, though, that applies to everybody.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is again directed to the Minister of Finance, or the other minister who is getting up in his place. We do not care whether he says it is 3 per cent or 4 per cent on average. The reality is that some senior people, whether it is the Governor of the Bank of Canada or whether it is CN officials, are receiving 39 per cent more.

Answer the question: Where is the justice in this country? Where is any sense of economic management when you are deliberately giving vast increases to those at the top while telling those who work for a wage, which is all they receive, that they should not negotiate to compensate for the increase in the cost of living which is going to result from the GST coming into place?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, that is precisely the reason why the Burns commission was put into place, to have an independent body in the private sector to make recommendations as to compensation in the upper echelons of the federal public service.

We follow the recommendations of the Burns committee. It is a committee that has served this country well over the years. I believe that what they are doing is seeking equity and fairness in the compensation that we offer our senior executives.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who has repeated several times that the government target for salaries for senior government employees is 4.5 per cent.

The president of CN and other senior executives who got an 18.7 per cent increase are also, as executives of Crown corporations, indirectly employees of the government of Canada.

• (1130)

Jeff Rose, the President of the Canadian Union of Public Employees which represents 377,000 Government of Canada employees, has now said that he is telling his membership to look for an 8 per cent to 9 per cent increase because of the effect of the GST.

Is the minister responsible for the Treasury Board prepared to stand in his place today and tell that president that the government will negotiate that 8 or 9 per cent? Or, will he stand in his place and say that in the current circumstances those salary increases of 18 per cent for CN executives and 28 per cent to 35 per cent for the Governor of the Bank of Canada are immoral, wrong, and an act of hypocrisy and will be turned around in the current climate?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct somewhat the premise of the question. I never talked about a 4.5 per cent target. I talked about what actually happened back in 1988 and 1989. The increase for that group of public servants and GIC appointments in 1988 was 4 per cent and, in 1989, it was 4.2 per cent.

Those are facts. They are not targets, they are not goals. Those are facts. They are well in line with the compensation generally offered to all employees of the federal government. That is what we are monitoring, with the help of independent commissions, to ensure that our employees are paid fairly and equitably throughout the system.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Surely the minister will understand that there are, among provincial governments, about 400,000 civil servants in the country. Among federal employees, there are another 250,000 civil servants in the country.

Three-quarters of a million civil servants are being told to forget the impact of the GST and to hold their wage increase expectations at about 4 per cent to 5 per cent, at a time when the minister and the government are doling out 18 per cent taxpayer-dollar-increases to senior executives of the CN and, the greatest act of hypocrisy, a 35 per cent increase to the Governor of the Bank of Canada who wants to fight inflation on everybody else's back but his own.

Will the government call in the board of directors of both the Bank of Canada and CN, and direct that those wage increases be rolled back to be consistent with what ordinary Canadians are expected to bear in this time of fighting inflation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague opposite talks about wage settlements in the provincial sector, in other government sectors, or in the private sector. We have no lessons to take from the group opposite. We have the best record of anybody in the country in exercising responsible wage management and negotiations. We have the lowest rate of wage increases in the public sector and, in comparison to the private sector, we have been doing very well indeed.

PORTS CANADA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the unconscionable expenses of the patronage appointees to the board of directors of Ports Canada.

Documents recently obtained from the Department of Transport detailed an absolute orgy of arrogance and abuse, with some directors claiming as much as $35,000 over a period of three months on trips to conventions in Florida and high-priced wining and dining.

How can the minister possibly justify this blatant abuse of taxpayers' money at the very time the government is telling Canadians to tighten their belts and to do with less? How can he possibly justify that?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take the question on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, who is unable to be here today.

I am advised that the Canada Ports Corporation Board consists of 17 members who, in fact, live in all parts of the country and who are responsible for promoting the use of Canada's major ports. They need to travel extensively to attend board and other meetings and to perform that function of promoting Canada's ports.

Funding for their travel comes from funds provided from the revenues of Canada's major ports, which made a profit last year of $43 million.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I might as well direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board, because the Minister of Finance collects it and the President of the Treasury Board spends it.

In response to public outcry at these outrageous expenses, a member of the board said: "Ports Canada made between $50 million and $60 million in profits last year. Unlike other corporations, this one is successful. We can't nickel and dime ourselves."

Has the minister ordered an internal audit into the board's behaviour? In the interim, will the minister issue a set of guidelines to stop this blatant squandering of taxpayers' hard-earned dollars?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to make undertakings in the House on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, but I would be happy to convey to him the hon. member's opinion of these events and his sense of outrage.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I must say that you would not know that the last people who put wage and price controls and wage freezes into effect in the country were the Liberals.

[Translation]

However, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in Quebec, the minister said he had a hundred good reasons for raising the GST. Will the minister make a commitment now that he will not raise the GST? Yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I find myself in the unusual position of being able to associate myself fully with the first part of the preamble to the hon. member's question where he expressed surprise at the feigned outrage of the Liberal Party on the matters that have been put before the House today.

On the question of the GST rate, I have responded to that in response to a member from the Liberal Party. That matter came up in the context of what other countries had done. I pointed out that other countries had raised the rate for a number of reasons. Some of them related to spending increases and some of them related to a completely offsetting reduction in their income tax rates. A number of countries, 18, I believe it is, have made practically no change in their value-added tax rates.

But the underlying point that I made in relation to Canada—and I want to stress this very strongly—is that no government in the future is going to be able to increase the rate on the GST without being able to lay before the Canadian people, in a very clear way, some substantive reasons to support any change in the rate. At this point, we have no intentions whatsoever of making any change in that rate.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for being onside with my preliminary comments. I just wish that he had not voted with the Liberals in favour of the six and five program in the past.

The minister and the Bank of Canada have both been trying to sell Canadians on the GST, saying that the tax will have just a one-shot impact on inflation. Does the minister not realize that by refusing any guarantee yesterday he destroys that argument? Does he not see that refusing a guarantee and refusing to say to Canadians that he will not raise the goods and services tax will lead to the very inflationary spiral that he says he wants to avoid?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend could contribute to ensuring that the GST rate does not go up in the future by supporting the government on the various proposals to control government spending that it has been making from time to time for the last number of years. Tax rates are related to government spending. If the New Democratic Party was at all concerned about the level of tax rates, it would not be so outrageously irresponsible in proposing increases in spending.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that student tuition fees and student debt have been growing throughout Canada at an alarming rate.

Now that the minister has received representations from credible national organizations, such as the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Canadian School Trustees' Council, the Canadian Federation of Students, and the Canadian Association of University Teachers, pointing out the extremely destructive effects of the goods and services tax on education, will he eliminate the education tax that he is about to impose?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is no tax on education. There is no GST on educational services. That is a simple part of the legislation.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I find it increasingly surprising that these credible national organizations disagree with the minister, but that is another question.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, since the minister refuses to eliminate the GST on education, is he prepared to cancel the cuts in transfers to the provinces for education, the same cuts he and the Prime Minister refused to touch? Will he cancel these cuts?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I find it very hard to confirm for the hon. member that I will remove a tax that has not been applied. Can he tell me where the tax is applied on educational services—

Some hon. members: On books.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —and then we can talk about it. But educational services are not subject to the goods and services tax.

The hon. member has made reference to the transfer payments that we make to the provinces. The transfer payments to the provinces will increase in this coming year in total by 3 per cent. That is exactly the same rate of increase for the total program spending for the Government of Canada. So, we are not asking the provinces to do anything more than what we are prepared to do ourselves.

I would also say that the impact of the changes in the transfer payments to the provinces that were announced in the last budget amounts to less than 1 per cent of their total revenues in year one and a little over 1 per cent in year two. Surely, in the interest of meeting the broad national objective of getting the deficit down, the provinces can adjust to that small amount of reduction in their expected growth of their revenues.

RAILWAY SAFETY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the beleaguered Minister of Transport. I do not know who will answer on the other side today.

The government's blind drive to deregulate the transportation industry has created problems. A Canadian Press story this week indicates that CN's sloppy inspections permitted a rail car full of dangerous acid to travel from Sarnia to Montreal, not once, but twice. Thousands of Canadians were put at risk, including residents of Kingston, Brockville and Cornwall, to name but a few.

What has the minister done to halt these breaches of the regulations?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice on behalf of the hon. Minister of Transport.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the National Transportation Agency decried CN's inspections and called for a study of railway freight safety across Canada.

Since this recommendation came from an agency headed by his former colleague, the hon. Erik Nielsen, will the Minister of Transport act now to protect Canadians from the foolhardy policies that the government insists on pursuing?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, God forbid that, by taking a question as notice, I should prevent the hon. member from having the full benefit of his supplementary. I can assure him that the goals that he suggested are the first priority of this government and I will be pleased to communicate his concerns to my colleague, the Minister of Transport.

ABORTION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Seventeen constitutional legal experts from law schools across the country have clearly pointed out that the minister's legal justification for the abortion bill is seriously flawed. They have called it legal nonsense and they say the bill creates no entitlement whatsoever to abortion in the country.

Will the minister take the advice of the majority of legal experts in this country on the constitutionality and the appropriateness of this criminal legislation, and will she withdraw Bill C-43?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-43 is before the House. I have no intention of withdrawing it. I would be very pleased to take issue with the report of the legal opinions which was in The Globe and Mail earlier this week. Perhaps the hon. member would like to refer herself to my comments before the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General yesterday where I did so.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, these constitutional legal scholars have sent these opinions to the minister. They are from Osgoode Hall, McGill, Western, UBC, the University of Ottawa and the University of Victoria, and they are all telling the minister, in very strong terms, that she is wrong with this legislation. Will she at least refer Bill C-43 to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the opinions that were proffered—and I have only seen the report in the newspaper about them—did not relate to the constitutionality of this bill at all. According to the newspaper report, they related to the interpretation that I made of their effect with respect to the possibility of provinces to legislate.

I would also point out that the article in The Globe and Mail indicated that one of the opinions solicited happened, in fact, to agree with me. I am not aware of the circumstances under which the opinions were solicited or how the question was framed.

I would also point out that the chairman of the Law Reform Commission of Canada agreed with my interpretation of the effect of the law.

One of the delightful things about being a lawyer is that there is an unlimited number of legal opinions that one can put forward. All statements with respect to the future impact of Bill C-43—and I reiterate again that the issue was not its constitutionality but its impact on the scope of legislation that would then be permitted to the provinces—are, by definition or their very essence, speculative because they will not be resolved until the matter goes before the courts.

I would conclude by saying that in one of the paragraphs of the article—and I am sorry I do not have the clipping with me—it states that the legal academics agree that provincial legislation will be struck down where it is found to be in conflict with the federal law or intended to subvert the intent of a federal criminal law. That was, in fact, the essence of my view and I stand by it.

PACKAGING AND LABELLING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Canadian manufacturers at the retail level are required to comply with the labelling and packaging act to provide bilingual and metric packaging. Yet American firms are accessing the Canadian market with labels in English only and without metric.

Canadian companies are caught in an unfair situation which will only worsen under free trade and the removal of tariffs. Why will this government not protect Canadian manufacturers from importers who are not complying with the Canadian law?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, indeed people have complained several times that imports were treated differently. I must say that since then, with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, we have set up teams to ensure that these products from abroad comply with Canadian laws. We are improving the situation, but our market is increasingly global. Things like that can happen. But I can assure you that since the manufacturers' association and the retailers' association communicated with us, we have taken measures at the border with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to deal with the situation, which has improved since then, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, the minister should know that in a letter of April 17 the national organizations which are in place to protect the Canadian retailers are saying it is not working. The minister should know that customs officers do not go around opening boxes at the border to look at the packaging and labelling on the products. They only check to make sure the proper papers are filled out.

Canadian manufacturers are fed up with spending money to conform with the act while their American counterparts are ignoring it. Is it not time this law was enforced? Is it not time that this government stood up for Canada instead of the United States?

• (1150)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I clearly stated a moment ago that obviously, in a situation like this, where Canada wants to increase foreign trade and open its borders so that our own people, our own manufacturers can sell abroad, such situations can at times occur when products enter our country. But we must not set up new non-tariff barriers and start harassing people at the border again. We must ensure that the law and regulations are clearly enforced. We have an interdepartmental committee that worked on it. My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and officials from my own department met the manufacturers and retailers to explain the situation to them. We are taking the required action at the border. We enforce the law every day. But you must understand that we are in a free market, where borders are losing their significance all the time. That must be understood, Madam Speaker. We have no choice.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Since the charges were laid against Michel Gravel, and up until today, the government has stonewalled on important and proper questions relating to the way this government does business.

It is now settled that Gravel took the money but the government has covered up on two serious questions, what Gravel did for the money and what Gravel did with the money. This week this cover-up has come unstuck. Is the government now prepared to answer these two questions?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the Solicitor General responded to a question similar to that yesterday. The hon. member knows that normal processes will be followed. The RCMP has indicated that it would be looking into these statements.

In terms of the broader area, the contracting procedures are clearly established. There are Treasury Board guidelines. These issues are examined on an annual basis by the Auditor General. There are the respective standing committees. There are the checks and balances.

If the hon. member has anything specific in mind, perhaps he should come clean and say what he has on his mind.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, I will say what I have on my mind. Is it the position of the government that the only way we will find out what Gravel did for and with the money is if it involves criminal activity?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is making a lot of assumptions and that is why it is very difficult and very inappropriate for me to make any comment. The RCMP is investigating this matter. Why would the hon. member want to interfere with the process of the RCMP investigation?

HOUSING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing. A week ago I asked the minister whether he had made representations to the Minister of Finance concerning the devastating impact of high interest rates on housing construction. Since then, additional information has come forward showing a sharp decline in construction and a further reduction in the application for building permits.

Why is the minister sacrificing the residential construction industry and home buyers? Why is he content to let the industry twist in the wind?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, quite clearly housing starts are down but they are down to levels which are still 50 per cent higher than when this government took office in 1984. They are still at a very substantial level, just under 200,000 a year. That certainly is anything but the devastating picture that the hon. member is trying to paint.

Quite frankly, there is no question that housing starts have levelled off, but they are certainly still well above figures from the past and 50 per cent above the figures when the government took office.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, the minister knows very well that once the housing industry shuts down it takes another year to get it started again.

Yesterday in the finance committee I put a question to Mr. Crow concerning the impact of high interest rates on housing. In his answer it became evident that the government fully intends to continue with its high interest rate policy.

In view of that, what plans has the minister of housing for preventing a complete collapse of the residential construction industry and therefore a shortage of housing?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, certainly there is no indication of a complete collapse of the residential housing industry in any way, shape or form. In the last few years there have been some very high prices and very hot markets in housing across the country. The hon. member has been indicating that he feels we should be doing something to control those prices and to keep housing affordable.

It is interesting to note that in the Financial Post today, Frank Clayton, the president of Clayton Research Associates, who is very well known in real estate economic circles, has said that housing prices got so out of whack compared to income that this situation now is a very welcome development for a great many people.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and also concerns the Gravel affair.

We have had many police inquiries into this issue. We have had charges laid and we have had a conviction in the case of Mr. Gravel. We have had convictions in the Brodilaf affair in Drummondville, yet the evidence has never come out.

Why will the Deputy Prime Minister not consent now to a full royal commission of inquiry into the contracting procedures of the government between 1984 and 1988 as I have been asking for in this House for the last four years?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member has a charge or an allegation which he can substantiate, why does he not come clean and lay it on the table with the appropriate consequences?

I indicated to the hon. member that the contracting procedures are clearly established. Treasury Board guidelines are clearly established. These things are examined by the Auditor General. Parliamentarians have the opportunity to examine all of this through the respective committees.

Why does the hon. member not do his homework and expose whatever he has before a parliamentary committee? He has that source available to him. Why does he not go to work on it, rather than sling the kind of innuendo that he is suggesting here in the House?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, with respect, it is not a matter of my making charges. People have entered pleas of guilt and have been convicted. That is not the issue.

[Translation]

I should like to direct my supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Earlier he told my colleague from York Centre that the RCMP are investigating this case.

Yesterday outside the House of Commons the Solicitor General indicated that the RCMP are checking the evidence to see whether an investigation is warranted. Yes or no, is there an investigation? Is this not proof that the minister himself blames others instead of doing his job?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, why does the hon. member not let the RCMP do its work? As the Solicitor General indicated to the House yesterday, they are checking into this matter and they will obviously take whatever action is necessary. Why does the hon. member insist on interfering with the process of the RCMP?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There will be a single question by the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester and a single question by the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

BILINGUAL LABELLING OF CONSUMER PRODUCTS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

For at least two years now, Consumer and Corporate Affairs officials have been dragging their feet about the labelling issue. Canada does have labelling legislation to ensure that labels are in both languages, English and French. They must also indicate the contents of products for sale.

We are importing ever more products from the United States, Madam Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Would the hon. member put his question, please.

Mr. Bellemare: I want to know what the minister intends to do in the immediate future about labelling and the labelling legislation which is being ignored by Americans who have been marketing their products in Canada for some time now.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I have somewhat already replied to this question earlier. We should not overlook the fact that Canadians are above all the retailers involved in the distribution of these goods in Canada.

As I said earlier to your colleague, my predecessor met last fall with the people involved in the retailing business. It is not easy in a country where there is such a free movement of goods from coast to coast, across the borders, and even from Europe and Asia, to stop each and every item when entering Canada.

We have met whit the presidents and CEOs of the various organizations involved in the distribution of goods and we have informed them of the Canadian legislation and regulations. Together with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue, we have reinforced these measures and I can tell you that we have already seen an improvement in the situation since last fall and we will keep up our improve it further.

That is what I can tell my hon. friend and I think that people in the end will benefit from these measures.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance.

While the Minister of Finance argues for wage and price restraint to combat inflation, we find that the top five executives of Canada's Crown owned Canadian National received wage increases of 19 per cent last year.

CN President, Ron Lawless, got the smallest increase of $41,000. That is an entire year's salary for an ordinary Canadian. My question to the minister is: How can the minister justify these outrageous, fat-cat salary increases for the corporate executives of CN while, at the same time, getting ready to kick ordinary Canadians in the teeth both with the GST and with the possibility of wage and price controls?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I believe I answered that same question about five times today.

I would like to repeat briefly for my hon. colleague who wants to have a specific answer that, in terms of the top management of the Public Service and the Crown corporations—the Deputy Ministers and the GIC appointments—wage increases for 1988 were 4 per cent, and for 1989 were 4.2, well in line with wage increases in the Public Service of Canada.

PETITIONS

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to table a petition certified correct as to form and content for members and friends of Branch 128 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Sydney.

In part it states that the government of Canada has introduced changes that will reduce homekeeping services to veterans and substantially increase the costs of long-term care, and whereas the veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by these measures, the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject those budget measures that deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have petitions signed by hundreds of individuals in the constituency of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who strongly oppose the goods and services tax which they say is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment and they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and service tax.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36 it is my honour and duty to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians in Toronto, Thornhill, Oakville, Huntsville, Willowdale, Minden, Bramalea, Scarborough and other places, including Vancouver, who are asking Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador to stop the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training, to demand that the low-level flight training for NATO and NORAD in Canada cease, and to oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training centre at Goose Bay.

They ask that Parliament redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal people to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I actually have three sets of petitions here, all dealing with the goods and services tax. The first highlights the bad or poor planning by the government. They oppose it as an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians which will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment. They call on the government to reject this tax. I have hundreds of signatures in that regard.

The second group of petitions I have, again with respect to the goods and services tax, come from the occupational therapists, the physiotherapists, the social service workers, the speech language pathologists and ideologists who feel that it is unconscionable to put a health care services tax, in the form of a goods and services tax, anywhere in public institutions or in the private sector in those areas.

The third set I have relates to the industry of books, magazines, and newspapers. The fact is that for over 120 years it has been the cornerstone of our democracy, culture, education and literature and has been not taxed. They reaffirm the historic principles embodied in a free tax status for printed word and ask the government to please ensure that it retains the zero rate in the GST legislation for these regulations.

Last is a call to a large gathering here on the Hill this Saturday at noon. Please bring your concerns to the attention of this government. Hopefully it will listen.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have in my hand a petition signed by Canadians who are calling on the government to scrap the goods and services tax and are calling all other Canadians to join them in a rally on Parliament Hill tomorrow at noon to protest the goods and services tax.

• (1210)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present this petition on behalf of Canadians who are concerned about the goods and services tax, particularly the high unemployment, higher prices and higher interest rates which will be created according to the government's own documents. The petitioners, of course, can voice their concern here on the Hill tomorrow afternoon against this terrible tax.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present several hundred signatures in opposition to the goods and services tax.

I think it is worth noting that these petitions come from Canadians in a variety of circumstances. A number of them are from seniors on low incomes, modest income tenants, very high income home owners, several dozen are from the riding of the Minister of Supply and Services, and a number of others are from small businesses.

It is my pleasure to remind all these people who filled in these petitions to come to Parliament Hill tomorrow at noon, Saturday, May 12, to protest.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition signed by a variety of people from different municipalities in the greater Ottawa area.

These people are resentful of being taxed to death and they want to give Parliament a message. They also ask Parliament to stop wasting our tax dollars and to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, on behalf of a number of residents in the Outaouais region, petitions that were circulated by residents. Your petitioners ask Canadian taxpayers to join them in a demonstration on the Hill tomorrow, at noon. They are fiercely opposed to the GST and ask that the bill be withdrawn.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition under Standing Order 36 certified correct as to form and content.

One hundred and twenty-five Canadians are expressing their opposition to the goods and services tax, calling upon the government to eliminate waste as a way of cutting back on the need to raise more money, and further inviting people to come to the rally on the Hill tomorrow at noon.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Vancouver, New Westminster and Coquitlam, British Columbia.

These Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax and have signed the petition and sent it to the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra for presentation in this House.

I am pleased to present this petition calling for Parliament to reject the goods and services tax. I am sure if these Canadians could fly to Ottawa, they would want to be at the rally on Saturday to protest this tax on the lawn of Parliament Hill.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I, too, am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by people from Ottawa, Nepean, Aylmer, and some of the communities surrounding the Ottawa-Nepean area. These people are very concerned with the imposition of a goods and services tax. Their statement says that they are fed up with government waste eating up their tax dollar. These people will also be on the Hill at noon tomorrow where there will be a rally for people who oppose the goods and services tax.

I invite all my constituents of Nepean to join me. I will be here for sure.

WOMEN'S CENTRES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, first of all, I have heard the last number of petitions from the Liberal caucus on the GST. I found it quite interesting, especially since the Liberal majority in the Senate allowed the GST to go through in principle at second reading just a week ago. I always find it curious how Liberals say one thing in one House and do the opposite where they have a majority in the other House.

My petition relates to the fact that the government has cut back core funding for the women's committees across this country. I believe that we not only need reinstatement of this money for this year, but we must have reinstatement for a number of years in the future. We call upon the government to provide long term guaranteed funding for these very necessary centres right across this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I have a petition from several Canadians asking that we cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform, pointing out that now haircuts will be taxed, diapers will be taxed, heating fuels will be taxed, not to mention one of our most sacred things of all; reading.

Mr. Moore: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question mentioned by the parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to Questions on the Order Paper.

On March 9, 1990 a question of mine was answered in part. It related to the business done with certain legal firms which had Conservative senators as members of those firms.

The nature of answers given in this House are very important. If I can read from the answer given on March 9, 1990, at page 9063 of Hansard it states that the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office did work with a law firm January 21, 1988. The amount of the bill for professional servies was $24,862.86. That was information given in this House.

Since then we have tried to get that particular bill through access to information, and we have been told in writing that the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office do not have those documents.

How can that information be given in the House of Commons, saying that these documents exist and that that is the amount of the billing, and at the same time or later on we can be told by the PCO that it does not have these documents?

I would like to have the parliamentary secretary look into that point. We understand the importance of Questions on the Order Paper. They must have accurate and the information we are given must be complete. The same applies to access to information. When we get two completely different answers, it is obviously something which concerns this House very much.

Mr. Moore: Madam Speaker, I will pass on the hon. member's remarks to the government House leader. We will return to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEPARTMENT OF MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C–18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): At eleven o'clock there were nine minutes remaining in the intervention of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, as I was saying, the minister refused to add a preamble as a context for Bill C–18. He also refused our amendments, stating that the department and the minister are responsible for implementation of the multiculturalism act. The minister has the duty to work toward the elimination of racism and discrimination in all aspects of Canadian life.

In a later section referring to implementation of employment equity for minorities, a Liberal amendment to establish a commissioner of multiculturalism and our alternate proposal to monitor through the Human Rights Commission also were turned down. At report stage we tried again to include more limited amendments, and once again the minister refused them and offered no improvements himself. Ironically he brought in 100 Tories to vote down my simple definition of multiculturalism.

Because the government resisted any improvements to Bill C–18 and offered no improvements itself and because of budget cuts for funding of multicultural programs which have taken place over the last year, we can only conclude that the government is interested in token political gestures toward multiculturalism. A new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will have no real clout to implement multicultural policy, and the minister will have no influence in cabinet or with other colleagues to influence necessary changes because there was nothing added to this bill to give it teeth and to give a clear mandate to the minister.

• (1220)

We were told by the minister that the new department will have no additional resources but merely will have present personnel transferred from the Department of Secretary of State. It will have responsibility for literacy and voluntary action as well as human rights, multiculturalism and citizenship, which is quite a tall order. Although there would be the cost of a new director and support staff, we wonder where this funding is coming from in as much as community groups have been cut back so drastically.

This refusal to improve Bill C-18 has been disappointing to us. It must have been even more disillusioning to persons who are working in front-line programs and as advocates for a strengthened multicultural policy in Canada.

Over the past year since this bill was introduced there have been severe cut-backs in funding to advocacy groups, a discontinuation of the citizen instruction and language training program, and a complete emasculation of heritage language programs which are basic to the transmission of culture. A federal funding total of $4.1 million was removed from these programs. These are programs that teach 60 different heritage languages to 140,000 in 850 community schools across Canada.

At the same time, ironically, the minister of trade was given $14 million to try to teach Pacific Rim languages to adults. Does this make any kind of sense? Does this show that the multicultural minister has clout to get money for languages? Indeed it does not, and it bodes very poorly for a future department.

However, I would like to commend the minister for one thing he has done. He has consistently stated that funds for race relations programs are his priority, and I agree. This is an urgent concern in Canada. I only wish that he would support existing groups that have this as their goal.

Why has he refused funding for advocacy groups and refused the request of 40 organizations for funding of a media watch project that was deliberately targeted to deal with racism, images and so on in the media, which is very important in this field? Why has he instead decided generously to fund a politically appointed advisory committee? Why has he very secretly, recently through his personal staff, set up a new hand-picked race relations network, which is competing with existing groups?

It was evident in the comments of the spokesman for the minister this morning that this government and this minister are threatened by advocacy groups who have in their mandate an obligation to try and work toward the improvement and the implementation of multicultural policy and the elimination of racism. They think that if they establish new groups, appoint their own political appointees, have complete control over what they say, and have everyone say "yes, yes, you have wonderful programs, to the minister", this is the way to go. This is no commitment to democracy. It is certainly not a sound way to operate a multiculturalism department. I do not know what the minister is afraid of.

The first annual report of the Multiculturalism Act which was tabled a couple of months ago is disappointing. It describes various multicultural programs quite adequately, but it does not really get at the meat of the operation of the Multiculturalism Act, which is to try to influence and change federal policies and the policies of federal departments and institutions, to promote greater equality, to promote the elimination of systemic discrimination, and to promote multiculturalism. This is the main goal of the Multicultural Act. There is nothing in that report that allows us to know what has been done between departments or with federal institutions, if anything at all has been done.

The minister of a new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship should be the lead minister to act as a catalyst to bring about institutional and attitudinal change in all our government systems. This is what we want. It is analogous to the role of the Minister responsible for the Status of Women whose job it is to monitor and promote sexual equality in all aspects that come under federal jurisdiction. This is the kind of thing that should have been spelled out in Bill C-18.

Several examples over the past year come to mind where the minister could have influenced public policy and institutional change in government. I do not think he took an active enough stand. The first was multiculturalism in the media. We had a number of incidents brought forward of concerns about stereotyping and the insensitivity, particularly of the CBC Crime Connection program and Disparaître on Radio Canada.

Did the minister or his staff do anything constructive to get to these networks and to CRTC to make sure that we have a better way of monitoring and ensuring multiculturalism in the media?

The question of hatred propaganda. The minister spoke out against racist pins from Alberta, but he really did nothing to meet with ministers to bring in new legislation or tougher restrictions under the Criminal Code. I doubt if he talked to the Attorney General about the question of Sikhs and turbans in the RCMP.

The question of an advocacy role, a pro-active role by the minister in entrenching multiculturalism as a fundamental characteristic of Canada in our Constitution, is vital. The minister should have been out front and foremost to do something about this matter.

Also I referred to employment equity. The minister's own department is lacking in this regard since it has only one visible minority person in a senior position.

I would like to go on and on, Mr. Speaker, but you are telling me that my time is up. I wish I had more time to talk about citizenship. I want to say we are very disappointed in this bill. We are disappointed in the defensiveness of the minister who was completely inflexible and would not bring in any changes of his own. We wanted a strong department of citizenship and multiculturalism.

Bill C-18 could have been an effective vehicle to promote a truly multicultural Canada with equality for all Canadians. We regret that it is so limited. We will not oppose this bill because we want a department. We hope in future years it will be improved, but we cannot endorse this very unsatisfactory bill with any enthusiasm at all.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague's comments. I know that she speaks with a great deal of passion and understanding of the issues of multiculturalism and racism in Canada.

I would like the member to make some comments on what she had hoped would be—

[Translation]

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

This morning, when the minister's parliamentary secretary spoke to Bill C-18, the Chair said there would be a period for questions and comments, but when she realized there was no question period at the third reading stage, she interrupted me immediately.

[English]

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that there are no questions and comments at third reading.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Lopez): The hon. member may now proceed with questions and comments for the hon. member who just made her speech. The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I actually regret that there was no opportunity to ask questions of the representative of the government because it certainly was not a very bold declaration of the government's commitment to multiculturalism in this country.

My question to the member concerns her remarks. I would like her to expand on what she hoped would be forthcoming in this legislation as it deals with citizenship.

• (1230)

Ms. Mitchell: I am particularly glad the member asked this question because I think the government representative really was not presenting the facts as they occurred in committee. I put forward very major proposals in regard to citizenship, and this was in response to concerns of the Canadian Citizenship Federation as well as other groups.

I think it is very important that we deal with multiculturalism within the context of Canadian citizenship and that Canadian citizenship really comes first. It is very important that all people who come to Canada identify with something that is bigger than their own ethnic origin and heritage and this quite often takes some time. We really ought to actively promote and educate people to be able to identify with Canada and Canadian society.

As you know only too well, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about Canadian citizenship we are talking about citizenship in a country that is multicultural. That is what is so wonderful and exciting about Canada and I just think it is really sad that the government, first of all in this bill, did not emphasize the citizenship aspect.

I tried to put in a special definition from the Citizenship Act to refer to it. I do not know why the minister objected. I also tried to change the name of the act to put the word "citizenship" before "multiculturalism", calling it the Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act which I believe would give the perception to people that we are all citizens of Canada first, regardless of our specific ethnicity.

I was sorry that this was not a major emphasis in the act. I know we will have the Citizenship Act later and I look forward to that, but I think it is very important that we promote multiculturalism within the framework of Canadian citizenship and that we promote something that is called "Canada" which we all belong to and is common to all of us regardless of our particular ethnic origins.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak on this particular bill in the House today. I believe that Bill C–18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship merits our support, but it is flawed.

There are some very real major problems which I would like to identify so that we can do something constructive about them when the opportunity arises.

There is a certain amount of cynicism about the bill. Some people are wondering whether it is a symbolic effort on the part of the government in response to a group of Canadians who have often been denied, and perhaps not treated as equitably or with as much sensitivity as could have been exercised.

Of course Canadians generally are really quite knowledgeable about the smoke and mirror competency of this government on a number of issues. There is often much glitz and puffery in everything that it undertakes. Therefore there is nervousness; there is cynicism. It is really unfortunate because I think fundamentally it is an issue that is particularly important in Canada as we know it today.

I want to review just briefly a bit of history. Both parties are often most anxious to point out Liberal lack of achievements. I would hope that, before this debate is over, they could commend the Liberal Party for some of the initiatives that it has taken in the past with respect to multiculturalism.

It was in 1971 that the Liberal government introduced a multicultural policy, and I shall quote three of the objectives that were brought forth at that time:

> 1. To support all of Canada's cultures, by assisting, resources permitting, the development of interested and needy cultural groups.
> 2. To assist members of all cultural groups to overcome cultural barriers to full participation in Canadian society.
> 3. To promote creative cultural encounters and interchange among all groups in the interest of national unity.

It was in 1982 that the Liberals took another first step. At that point in time, the concept of multiculturalism was sufficiently entrenched to warrant recognition in Section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of the Constitution Act, 1982. I think that is a historical moment of some significance.

Mr. Speaker, you will perhaps recall that these Liberal initiatives were congruent with the United Nations subcommittee on the protection of minorities and the prevention of discrimination, a committee that gained prominence because of the human rights issues that were surfacing at the time. The point to be made is that the Liberals undertook some very important initiatives, and this is an attempt to continue to develop those policies. In that sense, they are truly laudable.

As I indicated initially, what has happened is that there is some nervousness out there because people are wondering if this is a symbolic gesture. Why do they ask if it is a symbolic gesture? Everyone who follows the proceedings of the House knows that there have been substantive and substantial cuts in the area of multiculturalism. In light of that fact, why is this being promoted? There is no provision for a commissioner who will ensure that the policy is going to be enforced, that the various initiatives which are going to be undertaken and the objectives that have been set will be realized.

Is it real? Is it serious? Is it really a commitment? Some people will know that there was a rather harsh cut to the citizenship and language instruction agreement. It penalizes new Canadians who want to learn one of our two official languages.

Another point that has made people cynical and nervous about this whole initiative is that there have been no changes allowed. If the government is truly serious about this initiative why has it not allowed even a minimum of change?

I should point out, as well, that there is no definition of multiculturalism. When we talk about multiculturalism, are we talking only about people who come to Canada from different language backgrounds? Are we also including people of religious backgrounds?

We all know that there are cultures and various socio-economic groups. For example, the poor have a culture. Are we including the culture of women, men, the elderly, youth, the west, the Atlantic provinces, the north, Quebec, Ontario? What do we mean by "multicultural" or "multiculturalism"? There is a suspicion that it is not known what is meant. There is a further suspicion that it is not even known what culture in itself really is, because we are cognizant that there are many definitions out there.

[Translation]

Is this a purely symbolic gesture? Is this a genuine commitment to a group that deserves some special consideration? Why were cuts made in the budget for multiculturalism? Why is there no definition of the term itself? Why is there no commissioner to ensure the objectives are met and, if they are not met, to ensure these deficiencies are identified so that we, in Parliament, can try to correct them?

• (1240)

Where will we take the staff to fulfill that new department's mandate? Will they be civil servants? I have nothing against that. But will these people have the knowledge needed to enable the department to meet its objectives? The basic question is this: Is this only a token gesture or is it a real initiative? You probably remember the TV add about a certain hamburger chain where the lady was asking: "Where's the beef?" With this bill, many persons ask the same thing: "Where's the beef?"

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to deal with this important legislation the purpose of which is to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Canada has always been a country that has welcomed people from all over the world who come here seeking freedom, peace and properity.

From the very first French, Irish and Scottish immigrants to the post World War arrivals of European immigrants, and the recent waves of Asian nationals, we have all found in this country a place where we can make our dreams come true.

Like thousands of immigrants who have become Canadian citizens, my family and I are very grateful to Canada and Canadians for accepting us as brothers and for allowing us to fully participate in the life of our community, our city, our province and our country.

[English]

I feel that the most concrete way in which we can express our gratitude is to pursue an active role in the country we have chosen. We want to see progress toward greater harmony and prosperity. Our objective is to create a Canada which reflects the ideals and ambitions of its citizens.

[Translation]

As a member of one of Canada's ethnic communities, was able, like many others, to bring to this country a wealth of culture, tradition and expertise which undoubtedly contribute to a large extent, not only to the specific character of Canada, but also to its unique social and economic vitality. Clearly, stronger, more vibrant and more dynamic ethnic communities mean a stronger and more productive Canada.

For instance, Canada already benefits from the fact that it can dialogue and negotiate with the rest of the world in both its official languages. But when it taps the linguistic wealth of its cultural communities, it can readily have access to Europe and Asia which are among the most valuable markets in the world.

But in order to achieve the ambitious goal of building a Canada for the 1990s which accurately reflects its citizenry, we must first develop a successful dialogue, not only among the founding nations of this country but also its various cultural communities which, over the years, have contributed to the richness of the Canadian mosaic.

Mr. Speaker, this dialogue between the various components of our society must be based on mutual knowledge and understanding of our diversity, and even our difference.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner) expressed this notion so well when he said that there is no majority in Canada anymore, and that one way or another, we are all members of a minority.

Once we have perceived and accepted this reality, it becomes much easier to develop a cultural dialogue and to accept others as equals.

Fighting racism, harmonizing diversity, developing a consensus in spite of differences, providing real equal opportunities represent tough challenges for any country or people.

A recent study done in the United States shows that, despite the noble battles fought by great black leaders such as Martin Luther King and our perception of progress, racism is almost as prevalent today as in the sixties. In some regards, it may be less visible than when segregation was legal but its practical consequences remain about the same. Unfortunately, Canada is far from immune from this social cancer.

By the year 2000, three Montrealers out of five will be of ethnic background. We are already almost half and half. It means that Canadians of every origin, particularly those living in large centres, must quickly adapt their mentality and behaviour to the reality of minorities, especially visible minorities.

It will take time, energy and above all tolerance.

We also need moral and political leadership. We are no longer satisfied with symbolic gestures, token appointments and bandaid solution.

[English]

The present government has clearly not understood Canada's multicultural reality of the 1980s and understands even less the coming reality of the 1990s. Despite the electoral promises of 1984 and 1988, the situation today has not improved. The lack of government direction has produced nothing but stagnation, confusion, and, in my opinion, a deterioration which will sooner or later heighten social agitation.

[Translation]

In order to enhance its image vis-a-vis the cultural communities, the government has tabled a bill on multiculturalism.

Instead of giving multiculturalism the same support as that given to bilingualism by the Official Languages Act, the bill introduced by this government merely sets the legislative framework for existing programs and extends the principles of multiculturalism to the various governmental branches.

This fooled no one, neither Canadians nor the representatives of our cultural communities.

The Tories are looking for the ethnic vote, but their lack of vision of a strong, united and multicultural country is obvious. This government is putting through a bill regarding multiculturalism and establishing a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship while, at the same time, making cutbacks in the heritage language programs.

How can multiculturalism be promoted in Canada when the means to achieve that goal are been cut?

It is the same with official languages. The government introduced and amended an existing act but did not implement the regulations, making the act inoperative.

The Conservative Party is nothing but a political party, a government without vision, without a cause and with no backbone.

[English]

The same half-hearted approach was taken by the government in the area of appointments. With seemingly impressive numbers, the government claims to have treated cultural minorities well in this regard. However, looking closely at the appointments, they have been at low levels in crown corporations and the bureaucracy, and often in strictly advisory organizations.

Canada's cultural communities deserve better. To everyone's benefit, we should be able to find Canadians of ethnic backgrounds involved in all sectors, in decision-making roles at the highest levels of the bureaucracy, right up to the presidency of crown corporations.

[Translation]

Everything has yet to be done. And we certainly cannot rely on the conservative government to expand on the measure. It has proven its incapacity to see the changes in our society and to respond fairly and with compassion to the needs of Canadians of all origins.

[English]

I am proud to be Canadian, and I am proud to be a part of a cultural community. I am also proud to be associated with a political party which has always been conscious of Canada's multicultural reality and which has never hesitated to reinforce and develop the role of our communities in the Canadian mosaic.

• (1250)

Canada is a multicultural society made up of native peoples, francophones, anglophones, and ethnocultural groups and all institutions should reflect this.

When I see the current discord on both sides of the language issue it makes me sad. My Canada is a generous, tolerant, and compassionate country. If the language and the culture of the French minority in Canada and of the English minority in Quebec cannot be preserved and promoted, how can we expect that the ethnic languages and cultures will be preserved and promoted. Every time we attack and diminish the value of multiculturalism we increase assimilation and that is not the Canadian way of life.

Canada is a model society in the world, the best country in the world. Regardless of our origins, let us work to keep this country together, living together and recognizing and accepting our differences. It is the way the rest of the world will live in the year 2000. We should work toward that objective and give our example to the world as we have for the last 150 years.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, Canada stands for tolerance, generosity and compassion. Canadians can live together in spite of their differences.

This new department must promote Canadian unity and the Canadian way of life if Canada is to survive.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on his very eloquent and moving speech, as a Canadian, about Canada, his country and my country. He mentioned several things and I agreed with much of what he said.

One of the things he talked about that I was particularly interested in political band-aids and that some of the multicultural activities of the government seem to be, what I would call, tokenism and looking for the ethnic vote. He also said that the situation is worsening. I wonder if he would elaborate on that.

I know, from the point of view of racism and discrimination, that we have had increasing concerns over the last year. There have been quite a number of incidents of this nature. There was concern expressed today in Statements Pursuant to S. O. 31 about some of the attacks on Jews in various parts of the world.

Here in Canada, we had such a strong protest against allowing Sikhs to enter the RCMP. They have a religious symbol which is very important to them, which is their turban. We had racist pins being circulated and other paraphernalia from Alberta. We had a number of very tragic, long-term cases revealed. One was the Donald Marshall case and there was another case in Winnipeg of discrimination against native people. There are many other things. Certainly in the Indo-Canadian community there have been concerns as well, the rise of the skinheads being one.

I would think these are symptoms that there is tension in Canada. The government, in many ways, has tolerated this and allowed it to escalate. I wonder if the hon. member would like to comment on this, along with any other solutions he could suggest.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's compliments and I thank her for allowing me to develop my thoughts on this question.

Canada is a mosaic. The only way to succeed is for us to accept our differences, to recognize our cultural traditions and differences, and to try to live together in harmony. For 150 years this country has stayed together, but lately we have a serious problem. I do not want to enter into the Meech Lake Accord debate because I think it divides us and I would like to speak on things that unite us.

For example, a couple of weeks ago on a national television program, The Journal, I saw people walking on the Quebec flag, burning things, and saying things. When we show that on national television, there is an impact. I know that makes news and the journalists are looking for very appealing events. But many people who watched that program were given the impression that English Canada thinks that way toward French Canada. I strongly believe that that is wrong.

The government says: "We do not have to give CBC a unity mandate." We have to find something to keep the country together and we should use our institutions like the CBC. The departments need a goal to keep the country together which is not an easy thing.

It is almost the year 2000 and we can see what is happening in the Soviet Union and Europe. We are already together. In order to succeed, and to continue to give an example to the rest of the world with our way of living together—celebrating our differences and loving the same country, with different perspectives and different priorities—we should all be Canadians. I believe that the government has to show the leadership.

For political reasons, the government has not shown the leadership needed to keep the country together. We have no cause. Why should Canada stay together? We have to show leadership. We cannot keep the country together only by economic aid. There has to be a reason to be Canadian. Quebec should not stay within Confederation because only it benefits economically. If that is the only reason for Quebec staying in Confederation, one day or another, when Quebec has a stronger economy, it will say: "Canada, we do not need you anymore. We are going to leave."

To stay together, Canada has to have a cause. It has to represent something and, as national politicians, the federal government has to give that kind of message and show leadership. That is the only way we can achieve national unity in the country.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise and support the principle of Bill C-18.

At the outset, I would like to make perfectly clear that, because of the refusal of the minister to entertain reasonable improvements to the proposed legislation during committee debates, I have some serious concerns about the adequacy of the legislation.

The bill establishes a new department of multiculturalism and citizenship following the earlier Canadian Multiculturalism Act which, in itself, establishes objectives for multiculturalism policy in Canada. Although the new department will have the power over most matters relating to multiculturalism and citizenship, and also the responsibility to enforce implementation of our multicultural policy, the proposed legislation is lacking in many specifics.

My colleagues and I reluctantly support Bill C-18. We whole-heartedly support the principle, but we do feel that the current legislation fails to adequately address the need for a true and vital program of multiculturalism in Canada. That has been a policy of the New Democratic Party for some time.

The bill requires specific improvements imperative in order to establish an agency that would carry out the objectives of the federal policy on multiculturalism. There are several concerns which we continue to have about the particulars of the legislation, such as the questionable ability of the new department to carry out its mandate and objectives.

For example, the present staff members who are to be transferred from the Department of the Secretary of State are simply insufficient to carry out the expanded responsibilities of this new department with its enhanced mandate. Extra staff members with very diverse backgrounds will be needed. It is imperative that staff members who are hired are sensitive to the dynamics of Canada's cultural mosaic.

• (1300)

It is critical that there are sufficient funds available for the deployment of those community-based multicultural programs. If not, then the new department will simply be a form of window-dressing, another example of political tokenism which has been the hallmark of this administration.

My colleague from Vancouver East has spoken eloquently about the cuts and about the needs which are not addressed in this present bill. For example, multicultural organizations have been cut over a three-year period, I believe, by some 50 per cent.

We were very concerned to hear that funds for the citizenship instruction and languages textbook program had been slashed by 50 per cent in 1989, and that the program is slated to be eliminated this year.

These are government initiatives that are simply going in the opposite direction. They are the antithesis of a strong multiculturalism policy.

The minister knows full well that the act states the obligation to promote an understanding of the value of Canadian citizenship, and to encourage the participation in the social, cultural, political and economic life of Canada. But how can the minister promote these lofty ideals when his government has in fact slashed the very foundations needed to implement those same programs?

When this bill was first introduced in the spring of 1989, we felt that it was more of a housekeeping measure rather than one which set forth a specific mandate to administer the multicultural act in Canada. My New Democratic colleagues at that time felt that the bill should define specifically multiculturalism, and that it should lay out specifically ministerial responsibilities to implement the policy of multiculturalism in our federal institutions. This bill fails to do that.

Since this bill was debated at second reading last fall, several things have changed which weakens our support for what could have been a very good piece of legislation.

First, in committee, the minister refused to allow reasonable amendments to this bill which would have strengthened it considerably. The suggested amendments included the specific role of the minister and the department in enforcing multiculturalism in federal institutions, a specific reference to the elimination of racism in Canada, the provision for employment equity and the monitoring of the agency by a non-governmental body.

In addition, the budget of the government has made drastic cuts to Secretary of State funding for multiculturalism. These cuts, as I have mentioned already, seriously undermine the ability of our community-based programs and our advocacy groups to function accordingly.

We have seen further cuts to advocacy groups such as the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and the citizenship language training programs, while at the same time the government has been dumping millions of dollars into the construction of a heritage language institute. Here again the government prefers to create expensive central institutions rather than fund worth-while community programs that are so badly needed across Canada.

The minister had an opportunity in committee to make these reasoned changes that are necessary to create a truly workable piece of legislation, one which New Democrats could unconditionally support, but he refused to do so. He refused to give himself the mandate that is so clearly needed to really make things work.

Thus it became apparent that the bill was really window-dressing, and window-dressing is simply inadequate with such an important issue.

New Democrats firmly believe that equality rights must be the primary objective of any policy of multiculturalism in this country. Long before my New Democratic colleagues and I had the privilege of serving in this Chamber, leaders such as J. S. Woodsworth, J. Coldwell and Tommy Douglas spoke out strongly and eloquently about prevailing injustices toward Canada's ethnic minorities. They spoke out about the long history of violations of basic human rights which, regrettably, are an indelible part of Canada's history.

We fought with vigilance the shameful and brutal treatment of our Japanese citizens whose lives were literally ripped apart and whose pride of Canadian citizenship and identity were torn asunder when they were humiliatingly interned during the Second World War. Canada has only recently recognized the need to redress this national crime against our Japanese citizens.

We have pressed for the need for full recognition of our aboriginal peoples, including the right of self-government and the need for a negotiated settlement of native land claims.

We continue to protest the injustices in our present immigration policies. We continue to deplore the systemic discrimination in employment against visible minorities in this country. We continue to fight against the growing intolerance in the incidents of racism in Canada.

Whether or not it is expressed in our Constitution, multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of Canada. More than one-third of Canadians come from origins which are not aboriginal. They are not French or English. Their numbers are increasing rapidly.

Together these non-indigenous groups form the largest segment of the Canadian population. In many communities out west, particularly in the Vancouver area, for example, non-English, non-French descendants are actually the majority. In recent years people have come in increasing numbers from Asia, the Caribbean, the Middle East and from many Latin American countries.

Canada has truly become a rich and colourful mosaic, a celebration of culture diversity rather than a homogeneous melting pot as is evidenced in our neighbour to the south.

This accelerating pace of ethnocultural change has not come without its costs. According to official pieties, Canada was born and raised in the spirit of cultural pluralism. Its culmination is the present policy on multiculturalism. Would that we were born to such a perfect world. Unfortunately, the demons of racial and cultural prejudice have never quite been exorcized from Canadian society.

Incidents of racism and intolerance are etched deeply in our history. For that matter, they are increasingly easy to find in the headlines today, from Alberta-made posters decrying turbaned mounties, to the skinhead rallies in Toronto; from increased hostility toward Hong Kong immigrants in the Vancouver area to growing tensions towards east European immigrants in the maritimes.

The growing tensions are symptomatic of something much deeper and very threatening. At their heart lies the discriminatory hierarchy that differentiates among Canadians and treats some of our citizens as little better than outsiders. Exposure of institutionalized racism in our justice and in our police systems, such as the wrongful imprisonment on a murder charge of a young Indian, Donald Marshall, and the evidence exposed in Manitoba's aboriginal justice inquiry reveal all too clearly the dark side of our national soul.

Canadian petitions to prevent the RCMP from accommodating orthodox Sikh requirements for dress are indeed profoundly disturbing, particularly when one cuts through the misguided arguments of Canadian tradition and finds that we are left with the most painfully frequent argument that Sikhs and their traditions are simply "unCanadian". "Let them take their foreign paraphernalia and go home" is the rallying cry of a vocal faction of our Canadian citizens.

• (1310)

The searing racial intolerance of this argument takes us as a nation a long way from our avowed belief that Canada is among the world's most tolerant of countries.

It seems likely that opportunities for racism and growing intolerance to other ways of life are likely to grow as the composition of Canadian society becomes increasingly diverse. It is symptomatic of a reaction to an accelerating pace of change that will see within the next two decades 20 per cent of the populations of our major cities belonging to non-white minorities.

In conclusion, one hopes that there is no half-way position in human rights. Either we accept the proposition that no race, religion or culture is intrinsically better than another, or we will continue to act and to react in ways that are hypocritically at variance with our declared pluralistic and democratic principles.

We have a lot of work to do to ensure that Canada remains a country recognized globally as a tolerant nation. Canadian norms are multicultural and pluralistic. There are many equally valid ways and equally legal and productive ways of being Canadian. That is our reality.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would certainly like to commend the hon. member who just spoke. I am very proud to have him as a member of our caucus. I know that he started on his speech just a short while ago, which is a real sign of a professional.

I want to ask a couple of questions to clarify one point about funding cuts. There has been one cut as a result of this past budget which, perhaps, should have been added to his list. I refer to the $4.1 million that were cut for heritage language programs. These are the programs for children of immigrants right across the country who are in many hundreds of different classes. It is wiping out completely federal funding for that program.

At the same time that the government is cutting funding for heritage languages under the multicultural department, somehow in this time of cut-backs it has found $14 million for the Minister for International Trade who apparently is going to try to educate adults in Pacific Rim languages. If anyone here has tried learning Japanese or Chinese, they will know that it is not something you can do very quickly as an adult. Yet at the same time the government is cutting off a very natural evolution of language training for children.

First, would the hon. member like to comment on this situation?

Second, what does he think of the government's priorities and what they mean as far as the Minister of Multiculturalism's position in Cabinet and his ability to get funds for essential programs is concerned as compared to the Minister for International Trade who does not seem to have any problem?

Mr. MacWilliam: Madam Speaker, my colleague raises a very legitimate point, one that I had touched on but perhaps not embellished.

The biggest concern that we have with the current legislation is simply the fact that, again, we are dealing with the concept of window-dressing. We are attempting to demonstrate that we are creating an institution which is going to do the job it has set out to do. In fact no piece of legislation, no created department, no created mandate can do the job if the funding is not there at the community level.

It is one thing to pump millions of dollars into creating central institutions, which this government is wont to do. The reality of the problem, in terms of promoting a workable policy and mandate for multiculturalism across Canada, is to put the funding in at the community level for the very programs that are needed in language training of our new citizens and in helping the many community advocacy groups which so desperately need help.

The simplest way to look at it is to consider the analogy of the initial cuts of some $1.6 million to women's programs. While cutting those very necessary community based programs, the government somehow miraculously was also able to justify spending the equivalent amount of money, some $1.6 million, for upgrading the Senate chamber. When we look at it in terms of priorities, it is very obvious that the government is very narrow-minded in determining where its priorities should be.

We say that the funding priorities have to be at the community level and have to be put into the programs that are required in order to make this kind of legislation really workable.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too am very pleased to stand today in support of Bill C-18, which is an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Although the bill is lacking in strength, the current legislation is eminently better than what we have today. It is the appropriate way to move.

The main purpose of the bill is to establish a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. Under that heading there are many areas for which the department will be responsible. It makes me wonder whether, with the projected budget for the 1990-91 estimates of $155,000, just how it is going to achieve all of the goals that it has set out in the guidelines.

I look at the Department of the Environment and the budget estimates that were set up for it and I see the same situation. I do not know why the government tries to set up a new department and allows the estimates to come from each department having each department competing for the same dollar. It makes it very difficult for the minister of that department to achieve his goals or to arrive effectively within the projected guidelines of the department.

The focus of Bill C-18 is on the machinery of government. The new department will consist of five branches at departmental headquarters. They will be multiculturalism, citizenship registration and promotion, literacy, voluntary action, and human rights. We all realize that every one of those areas is an area that certainly requires a tremendous amount of compassion and assistance, not just from members of Parliament but from all Canadians.

Since 1971 the Canadian multicultural policy has evolved. I am very pleased and proud to say that it was enunciated by a Liberal government. The main purpose of the policy was to support all of Canada's cultures to assist the development of interested and needy cultural groups, resources permitting; to assist members of all cultural groups to overcome cultural barriers to full participation in Canadian society; to promote creative cultural encounters and interchange among all groups in the interest of national unity; and to assist immigrants to our country in the acquisition of one of Canada's official languages so to become full participants in Canadian society.

That is pretty heady stuff, but very necessary. Yet there is not the teeth in the bill to achieve all those things. There is not the funding provided in the bill to achieve all those things. They are very necessary if we are to maintain the cultural mosaic that we have here in Canada in which we all live together, where there are many Canadians like myself who were born of Canadians, but an equal number of people who are not Canadian born have adopted Canada as their country.

As immigration continued through the 1970s and 1980s the policy of multiculturalism took root within the many ethnic communities of Canada. By 1982 it had become sufficiently entrenched to warrant recognition in Section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

• (1320)

International developments and progress in the area of human rights and fundamental freedoms helped the policy of multiculturalism take root. At the United Nations the Subcommittee on the Protection of Minorities and the Prevention of Discrimination gained prominence through its work.

The Canadian policy of multiculturalism, with its emphasis on citizen participation, human rights and cultural diversification, matched a variety of goals established by the United Nations to foster tolerance and understanding. In addition, multiculturalism was also intended to promote national unity and help better define a national identity. Thus the policy of multiculturalism as established by Liberal governments met both domestic and international goals.

What seemed like a policy without flaw was placed under increased strain throughout the latter part of the 1970s and 1980s. Racism manifested itself with increased frequency, and the rapid growth of ethnic communities led to criticism of multiculturalism on the grounds that the policy did too little or too much to help immigrants and thus left them in cultural "ghettos".

The Conservative government enacted the Multiculturalism Act again in 1989 when Bill C–18 was introduced in the thirty-fourth Parliament. Conservative action on multiculturalism is in part an attempt to make inroads into a substantial voting block with a high level of political participation. These groups have provided long-standing support for the Liberal Party. Whether Conservative policies are eroding the support is open to speculation.

My party, the Liberal Party, endorsed the concept of a separate department of multiculturalism in the 1988 election platform. At second reading of Bill C–18 the party again supported the concept but expressed reservations about this bill and suggested amendments in committee. At third reading the party supports the notion of a separate department but still has serious reservations about this bill.

Although the establishment of a department is a step in the right direction, the lack of guaranteed funding to each specific branch within the department could very well cause problems if each branch has to compete more vigorously for a decreasing amount of money. I mentioned that earlier and I compared it to the new Department of the Environment where each department puts forward its request. They talk about the issues. They are all competing for the same dollar.

Another weakness is that the bill fails to provide an adequate enforcement mechanism, such as a commissioner of multiculturalism who would monitor and enforce the proper delivery of multicultural policy.

While the concept of the bill is a welcome one, this government's actions are large symbolic. This bill could have been much stronger. It could have established institutional organs to help better define and enforce multicultural policy, guaranteed levels of funding for the department, and a policy path that would expand the impact of multicultural policy.

Hence, multicultural policy would not service a few client ethnic groups but rather educate all Canadians of our multicultural heritage about the principles of racial and religious understanding and about the concept of national unity and the need to develop a Canadian identity while retaining one's ethnic culture.

On March 31, the Conservatives terminated the citizenship and language instruction agreement. This agreement provided textbooks to the provincial and territorial governments for half the class instructional costs and up to the full amount of costs for citizenship textbooks. How is national unity to be promoted and how does Canadian identity become defined when the federal government withdraws from progress that could strengthen both?

Quite recently I attended a meeting of the heritage schools in the Ottawa—Carleton area in which my riding is located. I cannot remember the exact number, but there were at least 20 heritage schools operating in this area. They have had drastic cuts in funding. These people were trying to retain a small portion of their heritage for their children in order to pass it on from one generation to another. They have no idea from where they are going to get the money. If this government is really serious about multiculturalism in this country, that money would be reinstated.

We Canadians are very fortunate to live in this cultural mosaic that is called Canada. As I mentioned earlier, many of us are Canadian born, but there is equally a great number who come from other lands from around the world who have chosen Canada as their country.

We must not be smug or casual about our way of life. We see great division in this country today, a division that is extremely distressing for people of all cultures. I would just like to mention one. This morning my colleague stood up in the House of Commons under Standing Order 31 and mentioned the desecration of a cemetery, anti-Semitic actions against a Jewish cemetery in France. We cannot tolerate this kind of action.

Our Sikh community has been discriminated against probably more in some parts of the country than in others. There have been great discussions with regard to allowing turbans in the RCMP.

Our native peoples have been discriminated against for years. They were the original Canadians. Yet they probably have been the most discriminated against group of people that this country has ever seen.

Again, I have been very pleased to stand here and speak on this bill this afternoon, a bill that we have to support. Although it is weak and although it does not provide enough, if Canada is to move ahead and recognize the cultural mosaic that we are, then we must have an act to establish a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would like to comment on some of the problems that I have heard in debates in the House. There seems to be a number of people in the Liberal Party who are opposed to the fundamental concept of multiculturalism. They seem to be opposed to any separate department or any attempt to allow the development of multiculturalism or the support of programs. They feel that that is inappropriate.

I would like the member to comment on whether that is close to the Liberal Party's position or whether her statements are it. Where does the Liberal Party stand on the promotion of multiculturalism?

Mrs. Gaffney: Madam Speaker, I cannot say that I am pleased to hear a member of the New Democratic Party ask a question that is so divisive.

Mr. Milliken: Silly nonsense.

Mrs. Gaffney: It is silly nonsense, as my colleague says.

The multiculturalism policy of this country was started by the Liberal Party. We are all very proud of what is happening in our country today. To make a statement like that is idiotic, smug and divisive. I do not wish to comment on it any further. I find it absolutely appalling that a member of this House would stand up and make a statement like that.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I feel that the Liberals are very touchy. There are members of that party who have said in this House that they do not support the concept of multiculturalism.

The hon. member talked about politics. It seems that the hon. member was more concerned about what the Tories did that might cut into their vote pattern than on the principle. I support multiculturalism in terms of principle, not because it is going to have some impact on a voting block.

The Liberal member gets very indignant about that, yet she stands there and says that what she is concerned about is that the Conservatives may make inroads into the ethnic community. The New Democratic Party and I support multiculturalism, not because of its political implications but because we will do it on principle.

• (1330)

Mrs. Gaffney: Madam Speaker, just a very brief comment on that: again, an appalling question.

An hon. member: An appalling statement.

Mrs. Gaffney: An appalling statement, you are right. If that is the only reason this government has proposed Bill C-18, then that is not a reason for establishing the department of multiculturalism and citizenship. The government has not put any money into the bill; it is spreading it out over a whole group of departments and there are no teeth in the bill. I am really questioning the government and its motive in establishing such a department.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to talk to a principle and a philosophy that we desperately need for the Canadian experiment to become a reality in our country. Although founded by the aboriginal peoples of our land, the reality of Canada emerged with the arrival of the English and the French. We have added to the stream which is Canada with that third more important and growing sector, the multicultural dimension.

That reality was recognized in the early seventies when the principle and philosophy of multiculturalism was brought forward in the framework of a bilingualism policy by my predecessor for Mount Royal, former Prime Minister Trudeau, in October of 1971. It was at that time of the B and B commission that some serious observations were made about this third strand in our society, the multicultural community. Although we all knew that that sector was there and was enriching us all, we did not quite identify the kind of measures that were needed to make sure that this new kind of Canada would grow in tolerance, understanding, appreciation and respect for the differences.

We were, in this experiment, very different from the American experience. One did not come here, like one would come into the United States, and immediately salute the flag and forget one's roots. That is one way to proceed. In Canada, people were invited to bring their culture and their heritage. They were told to respect their roots, honour their ancestors and add to the Canadian experience, never denying who or what they were.

I think that is a very exciting dimension, but it has problems inherent in it. When one comes from lands of intolerance or lands that promote discrimination or fight over language, race, creed or culture, there is obviously the tendency to bring along those inherent structures and that frame of mind which has developed through history and through geography.

We say to those people: "You have now moved to a country that has a new concept. Be part of the mainstream; be proud as a Canadian". We say to you, through public institutions, whether it is through our broadcasting services, radio or television, whether it is through the printed media, whether through magazines, books, or any other ways in which we express ourselves in a cultural sense in this country, "We admire who you are; we want to know more about what you are".

Madam Speaker, those are perhaps idealistic ways and, perhaps, some people would say, a very Pollyanna view of how Canada is to grow and flourish. I do not believe that that is being Pollyanna. I think it is perhaps somewhat visionary. It could be realized if a truly multicultural bill were put into this House, as a bridging mechanism for all Canadians and not directed strictly to visible minorities, not directed strictly to our aboriginal founding peoples, not directed to minorities per se, but directed to all Canadians in an inter-active way, so that we can learn to appreciate, respect and even love each other.

My colleague from the Ottawa region alluded to a comment I made earlier today with respect to desecration of sacred land, of consecrated ground, cemeteries. I cannot think of any more mischievous, nefarious, and hurtful way to attack a community than to attack a place where families go to pay respect to ancestors who have given of themselves and passed on.

That is not the Canadian way; that is not the tolerant way; and that is not indicative of the love and affection we share for each other regardless of race, religion, language, creed, or country of origin. These are acts of racism we have seen manifest against our aboriginal peoples, as we have seen in the Donald Marshall and other cases with respect to our Indian population, as we have recently seen through Disparaitre on Radio Canada.

This was an insensitive documentary, very one-sided, presented by a woman, also very narrow-minded, who was named to head the fiftieth anniversary celebrations in Quebec, which was to celebrate all women and all women's contributions in Quebec. However they forgot to include visible minorities in their planning, forgot to include English-speaking women in much of their planning. They went ahead, 3,500 of them, and raised their glasses in a toast to the wonders of Quebec and Quebec women. Yes, I can tell you that we can toast the wonders of Quebec and Quebec women. But forget the narrow-minded people who have forgotten to open their minds. That is why we need a bill like this.

I can tell you about Madeleine Parent. She is a wonderful women 71 years of age, with a long line of history and family in Quebec, a trade unionist who fought against racism, fought for the under-privileged, fought for employment equity, and fought for the right of all women to have their place equally in this society. It didn't matter their colour, but it was important that a voice spoke out.

I can tell you about women from the Indian community who fought for the rights of the Indian woman to be recognized as a person with fair and equal rights with her brothers in this society.

There are many areas that need to be approached. The problem with this bill is really an unfortunate one and makes me question the government's thinking. Unfortunately, the whole question of the definition of multiculturalism is unclear. That is regrettable. Perhaps it will evolve in time and amendments will be adopted, because they are desperately needed. From strong support from the Canadian Ethnocultural Council in 1987, 1988, and 1989, we now have serious reservations from them on May 11, 1990, as they see the cynicism behind this bill, the lack of sincerity because of its weakness.

They are very unhappy about the definition of multiculturalism. They are very unhappy that the bill does not link itself to the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. They are unhappy with these weaselly words "should", "perhaps", "may", "shall", nothing that is directive or concrete.

There is nothing that will ensure employment equity. That bill, too, which is coming up again, is a sham.

The bill is weak, but the principle and the philosophy is important. As the term does not include "multiracial" I was wondering if the multiracials are included? As it does not include the aboriginals, are they included in this mandate? Is this to promote integration of men, women, and children, and if so, how? What are the educational parameters? What is the relationship with our provinces? Is it at the First Ministers' table? What kinds of directives and powers are given to this minister and his ministry, because it is important, if we believe in a vision of Canada, for all people to understand. Is its purpose to ensure a sensitivity and an upgrading on the employment equity act? Will there to be grants and support to cultural groups, or is it another song and dance, an opportunity for all of us, including myself who might take advantage of it, to go and hand out a grant?

• (1340)

That is not its purpose. It is too important. We should have laid out ministerial responsibilities. We should have ensured that projects like the heritage language project, aboriginals communication, which is not only for aboriginals, but for the whole north, should never have been cut.

There are so many serious funding questions to be asked. Since it is important to move ahead with this bill, I flag them as questions, not as a destruction of the concept. It is a pretty package. The question is over its content.

What about staffing? All members of this House know that if you do not put sufficient funding into a project, you do not end up with a proper goal. We cannot realistically expect projects of principles and philosophy to grow if they do not have staff and management and some funds behind it.

I want to know how this will be put it into effect so that we get knowledgeable representative people who reflect the whole society, men and women of all races, colours and creeds, who can work together to implement a wonderful philosophy that is the Canada of tomorrow. It will be a unique nation among nations if we can meet the goal.

Supporting this policy would be a joy. I support it, but it is not the joy I would have liked, because the objectives are not as focused as I think they should be. The issues, policies and programs are not sufficiently clear to address what is fundamentally a very vital issue as we depend more and more on immigration. We have to make sure that everyone, even if they have been here for hundreds of years, learns to live, respect, grow and glorify in our own differences. Otherwise, the will is puffy and pretentious and does not do what it was meant to do. I think that would be an unconscionable message and not one that I think the present minister of state would want to leave. That is not the nature of this man. I believe he is a person of goodwill but I think he is being frustrated at the ministerial table. That is most regrettable.

I have said most of the things that have been in my heart with respect to this bill. I thank you very much for the patience to listen.

In my riding I am seeing increased intolerance between racial groups who have come from many parts of this world; from Asia, Africa, the Caribbean, the Middle East, the Far East, from all parts of the globe. They are not getting alone right now, either as newly arrived or as the indigenous population.

This ministry, and this minister, have an incredible challenge for all of us. Together we must ensure that he has the funds, staff, and mandate to see that something concrete and helpful takes place in this country.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask my good friend a question from her particular area of expertise. Of course, she has many areas of expertise, but I am thinking particularly of communications.

The member knows, I am sure, that one of the major achievements I would hope for the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, and for a new multicultural department and the minister for that department, would be to make the communication networks of Canada multicultural. As various speakers have pointed out today, it is so very important because of the effect of TV, the portrayals on TV and the background staff of TV and radio, and all aspects of the media. I am thinking of a couple of situations that we were concerned about which we mentioned in committee. I do not think the minister intervened to do very much about these situations.

One was the program that she mentioned, Disparaître, on Radio Canada that, as she knows only too well, was bordering on racism. The other was the CBC Crime Connection program in Vancouver at a time when there was extreme tension around increasing immigration, particularly from Hong Kong. It did a series on Hong Kong and pictured many Chinese Canadians as being connected with crime. That was a kind of stereotyping. It was not deliberate, but it had a tremendous impact and it was very upsetting on both sides of our country.

I wonder what the hon. member could suggest. How would she see the CRTC guidelines tightened up perhaps and, beyond that, much greater leadership and influence from a multiculturalism department and its minister in preventing this kind of negative stereotyping and stimulation of intolerance that very frequently occurs in our media.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague. We have had a lot of interesting side trips together on the child care issue and I think we have shared some serious concerns about the future of our country.

I am also pleased to see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications here in the House today because the kinds of questions that I was just asked indicate the fundamental importance of the building of a sense of national unity. As he has said, and I agree, the end goal of national unity can only be reached if there is a sense of national consciousness and a sense of national understanding. The national consciousness and understanding are in the bill. The government forgot the national unity, but it is part of the whole. If we want to live together in unity and in mutual respect, we have to know each other.

One of the problems is portrayal. It is not only the face of the multicultural and the multiracial on the little box which speaks to you. It is also those who are hired behind the scenes to pick the news and to reflect what is important from their country of origin because they understand the issues better than we do. They sensitize us to the international world. They also effectively allow us to know each other from coast to coast and up to the far north. Portrayal is very key.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has brought in some very good amendments, as we have, and, in fact, the government also has with respect to the multicultural and multiracial dimensions of Canada in the bill, including the aboriginal peoples.

We have also brought in the employment equity observations which one of the hon. member's former colleagues, the former member for Broadview—Greenwood, felt very keenly about. She talked about the employment equity situation in the broadcast media—that is radio, television, film and all aspects of cultural properties—with respect to the hiring and view of women in our society.

With respect to racial tolerance, or the intolerance that is being manifested out there, journalistic freedom must be protected at all times. It has to have the right and, in fact, the obligation to portray things as they are. They cannot be forced through change and through misrepresentation. But the more one sees of the illness caused by racism, or any of the isms in our society, then the more the Minister of Multiculturalism must take the kind of educational and public relations actions that will enable society to speak out when that kind of judgment, or that sick approach comes to the fore. If one does not speak out, then that silence is taken for acceptance, and that is not what one wants. Never does one want the media to change what the reality of today is. We would expect the media to cover it fairly and honestly. Journalistic freedom is very important in this society.

• (1350)

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, of all the times I have risen in the House as a member of the opposition, never before have I wished so dearly that I would not have to be standing here in opposition.

In the matters of multiculturalism and citizenship, I would have hoped that the development of this department was an attempt by the government to take us to the next step of helping us to define what Canada is. It would have been a wonderful thing to stand here and speak without having to make any kind of criticism—opposition, possibly, but in the sense of being able to make what are sometimes called friendly amendments to the proposition before us. Unfortunately, that is not the case and, in spite of the fact that it is not, I am not going to go criticize too much criticism, because that has been well done by other speakers.

I know time is limited and I would like to dwell on some other things with respect to this department in this context.

In this context, let me start this way. I am white, that is rather obvious. If you were to look at the spelling of my name, Madam Speaker, you would probably conclude, and rightly so, that I am an Anglo-Saxon. You could draw some conclusions from that as well. I willingly add that I am also Protestant which makes me a WASP.

In the context of what is going on in our country today, I certainly speak for the members of my Party who say it is inexcusable that organizations in this country are trying so hard to steer their communities towards an English-only approach. I say that as a WASP who cannot accept that. I would also say, being a monolingual White Anglo-Saxon Protestant, in the context of this very thing in Canada today and having had to look at myself within that context, that I would suggest that a lot of the problems from these groups stem from a feeling of arrogance.

As a White Anglo-Saxon Protestant, I do not have to learn another language. Almost all those who have ever come to our country have accommodated to what is essentially my culture. I think that is a tremendously large part of the problem we are facing today. It is unfortunate, and I would say to those who are of British origin: "Smarten up! There is no particular reason why you should feel arrogant. There may be some reasons for you to feel culturally disadvantaged, but there are ways to overcome that as well."

I would hope that there are few in the House and in the nation who do not feel joy, if you will, at the skirl of a Scottish bagpipe, and when you add the drums, you have an added pleasure. Is there anyone in this nation who has not heard a Welsh choir? That is certainly part of my culture. Is there anyone in this nation, particularly those watching who are here today, who would deny the English the tradition of what we are doing at this moment, and what I am doing at this moment?

I would say to those of English origin: "Get involved within your own cultural milieu in your communities. Envelope that which is British and develop a greater appreciation for the other cultures within your community as well."

I know that co-operation among linguistic, ethnic or cultural groups cannot be fostered by law. As a matter of fact, when people are forced into that kind of co-operation, it has the opposite effect and animosities are thereby engendered. As law-makers, it is possible to assist the co-operation which we are aiming toward and of which we are part.

This is the third reading of the bill which establishes the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. A great opportunity has been lost because the government was not willing to envelope some of the suggestions made by the opposition parties. Those suggestions would have gone so much farther toward aiding the evolution of a nation of which we all so proud and of which multiculturalism forms such a great part. The problem is that that did not take place. Now, all we can express is a feeling and a prescience of what we would hope would either be amendments to this or the next succession to this concept within our nation.

One of the surprises I had as a Member of Parliament was being introduced to Citizenship Court. That prompts me to suggest that the name of the department is reversed. It would have been so much better had it been the department of citizenship and multiculturalism. That is not the case, but a good case can be made for that being what should have occurred.

As a member of Parliament, one of the greatest pleasures I have is going to Citizenship Court. There are three or four different reasons why I find it so pleasurable. The first one reminds me that it was not always possible to be a Canadian citizen. When I was younger, there was no such thing as Canadian citizenship. When I went across the country and entered a different school, the first thing the teacher asked was: "What is your national origin?" Of course, my answer was: "Scots." That is why I referred to the bagpipe first in my references to the wonderful things which have come out of the British Isles in the cultural sense.

• (1400)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I think there would be a disposition on the part of the House not to see the clock for a few moments to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks. I believe that he is the last speaker on this bill, and we could then dispose of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If the Chair is aware of such an understanding between the parties, she will, of course, not see the clock.

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, I thank the members, and on that basis I will make my remarks shorter.

Briefly, I would like to go through the points that do occur to me in relation to Citizenship Court. Since becoming a member of Parliament, I have thought about being away from Canada. I find that after being out of the country for two or three weeks, I feel something. Originally, I did not realize what it was, and then I understood that it was being away from home. That gave me a far better understanding of what it is to be a Canadian and what being home means.

The fourth thing citizenship and Citizenship Court and my role in Canada brings to mind is my wife. Perhaps that should be the first. However, I think of her because my wife is a naturalized Canadian who came to this country from Germany. Her original nationality was Polish. The vagaries and stupidity of war intervened into the life of that young girl who was born in Poland, causing her to go from one country to another and one citizenship to another. That certainly exemplifies some of the stupidities that occur in this country.

As a Canadian, is there anything more touching than to see those new Canadians, people who have chosen to live in Canada, but at the same time have brought their language, their culture, their wonderful ethnic addition to this country?

I have received a tremendous amount of correspondence from people within my constituency in connection with multiculturalism, and with trying to maintain that mosaic which we are in Canada, decrying the cuts in funding to the schools which operate within our communities. I have received letters from as far away as Edmonton, from the Multicultural Council in Saskatoon, and the Cambodian Association. It is tremendously touching when you hear the way in which they express their concern at the cuts in the funding to these schools. I cannot emphasize it enough. Here are letters from the Norwegian community, the Ukrainian community, the Jewish congregation, and the Hindi School. A special mention should be made of the Jewish Canadians within our community whose synagogue was defaced not that long ago.

I thank all these groups for having sent letters to me, and I am sure many other members of Parliament also received letters.

It is unfortunate that funding to the heritage schools was cut. It is also unfortunate that specific reference to racism was not addressed in the bill. Whether or not it is true, I suspect that racism is at the core of much of the tension functioning within our society today. I can only suggest that there was a lost opportunity in not going the full distance with this department.

The words of the song in the musical South Pacific are, "You have to be taught before it is too late, before you are six or seven or eight, to hate all the people your relatives hate. You have to be carefully taught". If it is true that you have to be taught to hate, it is likely also true that you have to be taught to love.

I would suggest that a tremendous amount of potential has been lost within the formation of this department for helping us as Canadians to love one another more.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being two o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

ACT OF INCORPORATION OF DESJARDINS MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis) moved that Bill S-15, an Act to amend the Act of incorporation of Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to give you details about the Act to amend the Act of incorporation of Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company, and act to permit Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company, a federally incorporated company, to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

Bill S-15 is similar to Bill S-5 passed by the Senate on June 29, 1989 to authorize The Safeguard Life Assurance Company, the other life assurance company of the Desjardins Movement, to come under Quebec jurisdiction.

All the organizations or body corporates of the Desjardins Movement operate under Quebec laws, except the Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company and its recently acquired subsidiary, Laurier Life Holding Limited which controls Laurier Life Insurance.

Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company does most of its business in Quebec. The Desjardins Movement wants to merge Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company with La Sauvegarde in order to consolidate its operations in Quebec and thus benefit from potential synergy within the Movement. This initiative was taken in the over-all context of the restructuration of the Desjardins Movement initiated last year.

A change in jurisdiction is necessary since the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, which Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company now comes under, does not allow mergers with a company under provincial jurisdiction. This change also follows a decision taken at the March 21, 1990 special meeting of the Company's members that was convened specifically to authorize the continuance of Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company under Quebec legislation and to introduce a private bill to that effect in the Canadian Parliament.

All members of Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company, in other words, all policy holders, were mailed an invitation to this meeting, with a proxy form enabling them to vote. The vast majority of them voted in favour ot the proposal.

The company that will emerge from the merger of Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company with La Sauvegarde will become number one in Quebec in the insurance sector.

• (1410)

The government's policy for charter repatriation is to grant such requests from mutual insurance companies unless the policyholders object, which is not the case for Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance. Furthermore, the federal government recognizes that a financial institution's decision to come under one jurisdiction or another at a particular time depends on the amount and kind of business it does and on its plans for expansion.

The federal government wishes to accommodate the desires of financial institutions in this regard. To this end, I move that the House pass this bill and I believe that hon. members would agree to refer it to the finance committee instead of the legislative committee as mentioned in the introduction.

I thank everyone for their co-operation in this matter.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am proud to support the motion of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) concerning this Life Assurance Company. We, in the opposition, also agree to his suggestion that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance instead of a legislative committee. Since the bill will be studied in the finance committee where we will have the opportunity to put forward some ideas and suggestions, I will not pursue the matter any further this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I also wish to inform the House that the New Democratic Party supports the bill at second reading and is quite happy to have it referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

We note that this is the second time this year that the Desjardins group has had to come to this House to ask for special legislation to regroup itself under Quebec law. We are wondering if this is not because of the delay of the federal government in bringing forward a new framework for financial institutions and we are thinking that maybe the other approach is better. Therefore, we are hoping that the finance committee will take this opportunity to look at these factors also.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990-91

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-65, an Act to provide borrowing authority, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak at the third reading stage of an important bill that provides the government with the necessary borrowing authority so that it can proceed with its operations. At this point, I think it would be useful to recall some of the historic and economic highlights of the years since 1984, when the Conservative government was elected.

As you know, one of the government's major initiatives was the economic message tabled by the Minister of Finance in November 1984, in which the government set out its economic policies for the years to come. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that this message mentioned being competitive, reducing the national debt and of course our annual deficit, and creating jobs. It mentioned opening up our country for trade. Since 1984, the unemployment rate has gone down, and job creation has improved considerably, not only in terms of the number of jobs created but also in terms of their quality. You will recall that before that time, 80 per cent of the jobs created were for a limited term: programs to build or paint fences, clean windows and do general repairs, while 80 per cent of the jobs created by this government since 1984 are permanent jobs. These are jobs where women have their share of the market. This is another innovation that did not exist before 1984.

The economic message of the Minister of Finance mentioned trade. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this government negotiated and finalized the free trade agreement, and in November 1988, Canadians also finalized the free trade issue by electing a majority Tory government, the only party that supported free trade, a matter of vital importance for the future of this country. Without wishing to expand on the free trade debate, I think it is important to point out that in an economy like Canada's, we must have secure access to markets outside Canada. That is what free trade has done, by removing tariff barriers between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement was also important because we had to ensure that Canadian companies would be able to export to the United States, without the tariff barriers we have faced, in certain cases, between 1984 and 1988, and I am thinking of cedar shingles and shakes, for instance. Of course, free trade was also an integral part of the economic policies of the Minister of Finance in November 1984. There was the issue of our national debt which, as we all know, was $200 billion in 1984. And that is too much, far to much. In 1984, the annual deficit was $39 billion, which means that in 1984, this government, spent $39 billion more than it collected in revenues. Imagine if a Canadian family, whatever its income, spent $39,000 more than it earned in a year, and that this was added to the $200,000 it had already overspent. This family would definitely go bankrupt.

Since 1984, we have had to apply draconian measures to existing programs, to planned government investment in various areas and to the federal Public Service. We had to make decisions that were not necessarily popular, in order to reduce government spending and thus reduce the annual deficit which had reached alarming proportions, continued to increase each year and unfortunately still continues to add to the national debt.

In 1984, the government spent—forget interest costs for a minute; unfortunately we cannot do that as a rule, but for the purposes of my example, let's leave out interest costs—the government spent $15 billion more that it collected in revenues, and this does not include the interest paid on the debt. The government still spent $15 billion more than the revenues it collected. This year, that same government, again excluding interest payments, will spend 9 billion less than the revenues it collects. This means that after nearly six years, government spending in all areas, whether we are talking about the public service, programs, capital spending or investment—this year, we will spend $9 billion less than what we will collect in of taxes. That is what I call good management.

However, Mr. Speaker, we still have the deficit problem. In fact, why do we have a deficit this year? The deficit exists because we have additional expenses in the form of the interest that must be paid on the debt, and the national debt was the legacy we received from the former Liberal Government in 1984. Since that time, the cumulative debt is the interest that we have to pay on the legacy we received. It is just something we have to live with, Mr. Speaker. I think Canadians are also more aware of the increasing problems created by the rising cost of this debt burden, which will mean that this year, for instance, 35 cents out of every tax dollar will go to pay interest. You can imagine what we could do as a government, with the help of the opposition, if we had those 35 cents per dollar to give to Canadians through various programs. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, as you know, we do not have it.

But, again, we are off to a good start. Interest rates and costs hurt the government, as I think everyone would admit, but at least we are managing and spending less money than we take in.

Very often, Mr. Speaker, we hear the opposition say that tax increases explain why the deficit has gone down. That, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely false, and I want to emphasize it. Seventy per cent of deficit reduction is due to government cutbacks and 30 per cent is due to tax increases since 1984. I think that is a fair balance.

Remember 1988, when we reduced the income tax on individuals. I do not remember hearing the opposition talk about that often. Obviously that is good news, Mr. Speaker.

This year we are implementing the goods and services tax, and that is good news. It is good news if it is dealt with honestly and frankly. For 66 years now, we have had a federal sales tax at the manufacturer's level. That means, Mr. Speaker, that no one, no Canadian, sees the rate of this tax and is even aware that he or she is paying this federal tax on most goods and services in the country. For 66 years, this hidden tax has meant that every year, the government collects money without Canadians being aware of it.

We are the only country in the world now that still has a federal sales tax at the manufacturer's level. However, 48 countries have already adopted a consumption tax, whether it is called a VAT or a GST. Mr. Speaker, now more than ever it is time for Canada to take its place as well and implement a progressive, fair and equitable tax system. It is hard to have a tax that is fair and equitable.

The GST meets these criteria. It will replace the present federal sales tax which is bad for Canadian taxpayers and also bad for Canadian businesses. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the federal manufacturer's sales tax favours foreign companies that send goods to Canada because they do not have to pay 13.5 per cent on the goods they produce.

Thus foreign goods have an advantage over goods produced in Canada. You know, Mr. Speaker, that makes no sense. Moreover, when a Canadian producer wants to sell abroad, his costs include a 13.5 per cent manufacturer's tax that no other country in the world has. So when he comes to sell this chair, he has a 13.5 per cent tax in his costs which his competitor in country X, Y or Z does not have. What does this Canadian producer do? He is stuck with his goods; he is unable to sell them because they cost too much.

The goods and services tax will eliminate that situation. It is a 7 per cent consumption tax that will appear on the bill the consumer pays. This means that all Canadians will know what the goods and services tax costs them whenever they spend money on something.

But even more than that, Mr. Speaker, all Canadian families whose income is $30,000 or less will receive a tax credit in advance. That is, in December 1990, the Government of Canada will send a cheque to all Canadian families whose annual income is $30,000 or less. A cheque just so the GST is fair and equitable, just so low-income families are not penalized by the implementation of a new tax. I want to point out that it was the new Conservative government which began to follow this new approach in 1986. It was the new Conservative government which in 1986 first gave a tax credit applicable to the federal sales tax. A higher credit is again given with respect to the GST, and again it goes to families that have a higher income than they did before. Again it is given so as to make the tax system fair and equitable. You will hear opposition members criticize the GST. Mr. Speaker, I dare you to recall a single instance where they came up with a fair and valid monetary alternative for Canadians after criticizing the GST. How easy it is to say that one is against higher taxes, against taxes. That is the easy way out. But this government has responsibilities in connection with the deficit, elderly people, and provincial transfers. The federal government has to collect money to meet its responsibilities and redistribute the wealth. Anyone who is against the GST has to tell me where else the $18 billion will come from so we can meet the needs of Canadians. That is the question. In that respect opposition members are not doing their job when they fail to come up with an alternative and keep saying they are against it.

• (1320)

Again, Mr. Speaker, I look at the riding of Trois-Rivières where competition is fierce among people who sell cars, cakes or what have you. But when a dealer claims his product is better, he explains why it is so and why he sells it. When they talk about the future of the country and say that a measure tabled by the government is no good, if they are a genuine opposition party, they ought to come up with a solution. However, when we hear the opposition talk, no solutions seem to be forthcoming.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): We could invoke the same reasons you gave in 1984.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will be very pleased to comment on my speech later on. I am looking forward to that.

The GST, in addition to being a fair and equitable tax, will favour exports of Canadian businesses and will benefit Canadian businesses that must compete with foreign companies that export goods to Canada. If our Canadian companies produce more, that means they need more workers. If they need more workers, that means more jobs will be created. That is how this government has been running the country since 1984. It all goes back to the economic message the Minister of Finance tabled in November 1984.

About the unemployment rate on the weekend in the riding of Trois-Rivières, it was announced that the unemployment rate had gone down. Why did the unemployment rate go down since 1984? It went down because Canadian companies looked at the government and said: They are working very hard to run the country the way we in the private sector run a business. And when that is the case, people invest. They have confidence in the government, they invest, and that is how jobs are created. You know, Mr. Speaker, we often brag about the fact that the government creates jobs, but basically, it was the good financial climate created by the government that led Canadian businesses to invest and increase the number of jobs in this country. And I am talking about permanent jobs, not part-time, patchwork jobs. I am talking about permanent jobs in lucrative areas, in areas where women also have their share of the labour market.

Mr. Speaker, that was a summary of the highlights of what has happened since 1984, while also situating the importance of this bill in the Canadian economic context.

With your permission, I would also like to mention the deregulation of the energy and transportation industries. I could speak at length about the National Energy Program, which was a disaster for all Canadians, for Western Canadians as well as Quebecers. It was a real disaster, and we had to do a hatchet job on this program, which, I must confess, we did with considerable pleasure.

The same could be said of Investment Canada. In the transportation sector, government decisions were made which helped this sector and helped our Canadian businesses to operate well, to be more competitive, to progress, to make money and to pay their taxes.

We often hear the opposition say there are 50,000 or 60,000—I am not sure how many—companies that don't pay income tax. That is false, Mr. Speaker. That is totally false. All Canadian companies pay income tax. When they do not, the reason is they don't have any tax to pay, Mr. Speaker, and that happens when a company incurs a loss. So of course it will not have to pay income tax. Any Canadian taxpayer who in 1989, for instance, earned $45,000 and in 1990 incurs a loss of $35,000, may apply the loss incurred to a previous year's or the next year's income. This is allowed under the Income Tax Act. And the same applies to companies.

Most of the many companies, if the opposition is to be believed, that do not pay income tax are, in fact, small businesses like the ones in your riding, in Trois-Rivières, or in their ridings, which make a profit one year and lose money the next. We know, Mr. Speaker, that life isn't easy for small businesses. There are some good years, and there are years when business is slow, but the opposition wants us to tax a company that has already lost money!

The companies that make money, Mr. Speaker, pay their taxes, and they have done so since 1986, when we introduced a minimum personal tax. Every single Canadian is paying his fair share of income tax, despite all the tax shelters people can dream up or try to use. Even if they have 18,000 tax shelters, they will still have to pay their fair share of tax because we now have a minimum income tax that this government established, Mr. Speaker, at the same time it abolished the scandalous scientific research tax credits of the former government. It was a scandal. Millions of dollars were wasted, the way this scheme was organized. We put an end to it, Mr. Speaker.

Now if you want to do scientific research, there is no problem. But you still must account for these expenditures in the normal way and not according to the system brought in by former finance minister Lalonde in 1984.

So, getting back to our bill, we must consider the emphasis we have put on things like the Jobs Strategy since 1984. You will recall that before 1984, there were summer programs for students that involved painting fences and sweeping. Mr. Speaker, tell me what post-secondary or university students learned by painting fences in the summer. They learned nothing! Those programs were boondoggles.

• (1330)

Mr. Speaker, we established the Challenge Program which helps students do work that is partly subsidized by the federal government in their future field of activity. Last Friday in my riding, I had the opportunity to take part in the opening for the summer of the student employment centre for the ridings of Trois-Rivières and Champlain and the person in charge of the Challenge Program pointed out the importance of this program whereby students can earn money and learn during the summer about the field in which they will eventually work. The honorary chairman, Mr. Gaulin, a dynamic young man, is in charge of personnel for a company in my riding. He pointed out how good it is for a company during the summer to have one, two, three or five young people with their new expertise and new techniques that they learned during the year. As they earn money, the young people help the company, which also helps them financially, and learn something practical. We all know that universities are wonderful places but are sometimes weak on the practical side. Thanks to the summer program, young people at the end of their university studies will graduate with a diploma and practical experience. Mr. Speaker, that is what the Challenge Program, established in 1985, does and it works very well.

With respect to employment programs, Mr. Speaker, consider job development programs for which applicants are necessarily people who want to learn something new. The organization or the employer that has such a program trains the applicant in a new sector and pays him or her. Of course the federal government is there to help pay part of the costs. This is a productive program prepared and launched under the Conservative government. Before, as I recall, there was the Canada Works program under which people were hired to shovel snow in yards. Mr. Speaker, shoveling snow in yards is hardly the way to acquire a new skill.

An hon. member: It is not a profit-making proposition.

Mr. Vincent: Not a profit-making proposition, as my colleague puts it. Not unlike the Challenge program, the job development program helps our constituents find work and learn something new. In most cases the company or organization which has hired three employees under a job development program and keeps them on the payroll for a while will end up giving a permanent job to one or two of them. That, Mr. Speaker, is an economic strategy which keeps the nation moving forward. It is the kind of initiative we need in employment, in public financing, in international trade and, above all, here in the House.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I see you are giving me a signal— I see that my colleague is anxious to have the floor.

Mr. Milliken: Your time is unlimited.

Mr. Vincent: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, in 1990, some major changes are taking place, and I think we should be well aware of this. For 66 years, we have had a federal sales tax no one has ever seen, whose existence people were not aware of. I remember when I was studying at the University of Sherbrooke in 1978, where I took a master's degree in tax law, and my professor told the class: We are begging the government on our knees to change this tax, which is a disaster. That was said in 1978 by a well-known professor who belonged to a Quebec accounting firm which now has offices across Canada. This professor said 12 years ago: The federal sales tax is bad for the country. That was 12 years ago, Mr. Speaker. This government got the message. Yes, we are going to change the tax system. Yes, we are going to introduce a new tax called the GST, the goods and services tax, a tax that will be paid by the consumer. That is a major change, and Canadians are worried. They are asking questions. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, when they put their questions to government members, they get good answers. When they put their questions to the opposition, the answers are less than accurate.

I think the opposition has a duty to explain the GST properly, because it should be explained. It is a major change—

Mr. Milliken: It's a disaster!

Mr. Vincent: It is a tax change that will replace a hidden tax of 13.5 per cent with a 7 per cent consumer tax.

Mr. Peterson: It's a disgrace!

Mr. Vincent: All Canadians will see the tax.

Mr. Milliken: All Canadians are opposed to the tax!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the opposition is finally starting to react. I waited thirty-five minutes for them to react, and finally, it worked!

I repeat, the GST has the advantage that Canadians will be able to see this tax. A number of people in the beautiful riding of Trois-Rivières told me: We trust the Conservative Government, and we know you will keep the tax at 7 per cent. But if the Liberals ever come to power, 10 or 15 years from now, they are going to raise the tax to 8, or 9 or 10 per cent. That is what the people of my riding are saying. I tell them no. The great advantage of the GST compared to the federal sales tax is that it is visible. The party in power, whether Conservative or Liberal, will be ashamed to raise it because it will appear on people's bills the next day. That is the guarantee Canadians have that this tax will stay at 7 per cent. It is a visible tax, compared to the other one at 13.5 per cent that no one sees. How much federal sales tax at 13.5 per cent did I pay on that? No idea. No one knows. The same goes for my glass and furniture. Starting January 1, 1991, we will have a visible tax, which will let everyone know what they are paying. Again, there will also be a tax credit.

The opposition cannot challenge the figures published in an article in La Presse maybe two or three weeks ago. In it, a journalist explained, for example, that a senior whose annual income is $12,000 will be in a better position with the tax credit for the federal sales tax in 1991 than that person is in 1990 with the present tax. The La Presse article has figures to back it up.

The same calculation was done for a single person earning $25,000 a year who has two children. Once again, the figures show that a single-parent family with two children would be in a better position in 1991 than in 1990. They would have more money in their pockets in 1991 with a 7 per cent GST than in 1990 with a 13.5 per cent FST. Mr. Speaker, we must talk about it; we must emphasize it. I think that the opposition members who will speak must also point out that the GST is advantageous for families earning less than $30,000. They will have more money to spend. We must say that. Some sectors of the economy will feel the benefits.

• (1340)

The owner of the Jean Coutu pharmacies whom I met in my riding last weekend, Mr. Speaker, was telling me: "Prices will go down next year with the GST." In the car industry also, big companies like GM and Ford with big money involved and certainly a few accountants looking into that kind of thing full time admit that cars will cost less in 1991 thanks to the GST. The Sears stores said the same thing. The goods they sell will cost less. The same for Canadian Tire. Mr. Speaker, there are nonetheless national chain stores saying: "Yes indeed, consumers will pay less once the new tax is implemented." Some will ask, and rightly so: What guaranty is there that the 13.5 per cent will be taken off? There is always competition, Mr. Speaker.

Domestic economic realities must also be considered. As we remember, when cameras first came onto the market, they cost a fortune. If we wanted a better zoom or some other feature, we needed another part. It cost an arm and a leg. Now, we can walk into any fine store and buy a camera that does everything by itself. At the push of a button, the flash, zoom and everything else work automatically, and the price is a fraction of what it used to be. For example, when color television sets were first sold in Canada 25 years ago, they cost more than today even with inflation factored in because technology is improving every year and competition is everywhere. Today we pay the same price, or even less, for a small color TV as we would have paid 25 years ago for a big one.

The competition is there. It has its place and will make the GST a viable proposition for all Canadian consumers.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my friend from Trois-Rivières as he introduced debate on third reading of Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority.

If the government gets the agreement of the House on this bill, it will give the government authority to borrow up to $25.5 billion during this fiscal year, 1990-91.

I would like to respond to two or three points raised by my friend from Trois-Rivières. He started by saying that he was going to give us some of the historical background. He ought to have said, I submit, that he was going to give some historical background—I believe he has a new speech coming on. Did the member want to intervene?

Mr. Vincent: I was wondering if you were going until 2 p.m.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the member from Trois-Rivières was saying he would give us some historical background. I thought he should have qualified that by indicating that it was very much his version of history or, more to the point, the version written for him by whoever writes those marvellous pieces that those parliamentary secretaries get up and read. It is well read, I say to him, very well read although I am not sure I would stake my reputation on it, if I were him. He reminded us that when the government took office in September 1984 one of its undertakings was to reduce the national debt. The government did a marvellous job of that, an absolutely marvellous job of reducing the national debt. Indeed, if we go back and look at the national debt as it was in September 1984, or during the fiscal year when the government took over, we will find that it was in the order of $150 billion or $160 billion. I have the figure here somewhere. It was $170 billion when the government took over in September 1984.

We understand, according to the Minister of Finance then and now and according to the gentleman from Trois-Rivières, that the undertaking was to reduce the national debt. The government reduced it all right, I say to him. He should have a talk to his speech writer. The government reduced it all the way from $170 billion down to $360 billion. How is that for reducing? That is a new definition of reduction. The government has more than doubled that national debt in six years.

Mr. Milliken: They pretend to deny it.

Mrs. Browes: Look who started it.

Mr. Simmons: That is another issue altogether, I say to my friend, the hon. member for Scarborough Centre who says: "Look who started it." It does not take a lot of brains to figure out that if I stand here and acknowledge that the debt was $170 billion when this government took over, then obviously it must have been started and contributed to by some previous governments. I congratulate her on an absolutely brilliant insight. I remind her that, yes, other governments did have a part in that, including the government led by her good friend and colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the right hon. member for Yellowhead. He had a part in contributing to that deficit. She should do her homework on that point.

The problem with yelling across the corridor is that she sometimes puts her foot in it. That is the danger, but I am sure she did not realize that. She has been taught by the gentleman from Baie Comeau that those big bad Liberals had done everything and she forgot that there was an interregnum between May 1979 and February 1980 when we actually had a government led by the gentleman from Yellowhead.

Mr. Peterson: A sad day for Canada.

Mr. Simmons: My friend, the hon. for Willowdale, says that was a sad day for Canada. I say to him, with respect, that everything is relative. It was not nearly as sad a day for Canada as the current administration represents a sad nightmare for Canada over many, many days, unfortunately.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières on the first point has struck out completely. In so doing he has misled the House, not deliberately, but he has inadvertently misled the House. He talks about how this government has reduced the national debt, while the public accounts of this country will clearly demonstrate that during the stewardship of this government alone, from September 1984 until now, May 1990, or the end of the fiscal year, March 31, 1990, the public debt has gone from $170 billion up to $360 billion.

Mrs. Anderson: The compound interest is high.

Mr. Simmons: Oh, here we are. Sometimes I am too uncharitable toward my friends on the other side, particularly the hon. member for Simcoe Centre. She has put her finger on another key issue in this whole debate. She talks about compound interest and, by inference, she talks about interest rates. She is absolutely right. If she would talk to her friend and colleague, the Minister of Finance, and persuade him to do now what he said we ought to do when he was in the opposition, that is persuade him to get interest rates down, I would be the first to agree with her that the interest on the debt would be less, the compound interest on the debt would be far less. If she wants to make a contribution to this debate, she can do it, not only in debate but behind the curtains. She can talk to the Minister of Finance and tell him to beat some sense into that fellow, John Crow, who is keeping rates not only sky high but a full 5.5 points higher than the American rates. There is no justification for it whatsoever.

Mrs. Anderson: Inflation.

Mr Simmons: Oh, she mutters "inflation". Tell me about unemployment: Does she know that John Crow and, by inference, the Minister of Finance have a hidden agenda that says we have to drive the unemployment rate in this country higher, up to 8 per cent, because "that will get our inflation down to zero", they say.

• (1350)

Inflation is important but employment is also important. I do not buy the line—and I do not believe that the member for Simcoe Centre buys the line either—

An hon. member: No, she doesn't.

Mr. Simmons: —that we must have interest rates as high as they are. I do not believe she believes that. Her constituents are watching and on her behalf, since I have the floor, I can tell them whether or not she agrees with that. I gather the jury is still out on that point and she is still making up her mind as to whether or not she supports the high interest rate policy of this government.

An hon. member: No, she doesn't.

Mrs. Anderson: My constituents are doing very well, extremely well.

Mr. Simmons: Anything else now? Don't be shy, don't be shy.

The member says that the people in her riding are doing very well. That wasn't quite the question I put to her. I wanted to know whether her interjection here in this debate, a welcome interjection I may say, meant that she was supportive of the high interest rate policy of this government or opposed to it.

Mrs. Anderson: Nobody likes high interest rates, but we're doing the best we can.

Mr. Simmons: I will say to her constituents who can't see her but should be allowed to hear her—I will speak for her—that basically she is doing one absolutely marvellous job of skating at this present moment; she is for and agin it. She wants to have her cake and eat it too.

The gentleman from Trois-Rivières also gave us of his wisdom on job creation and how this government had got us away from painting cemetery fences and that kind of thing. I will tell you something else it got us away from. It got us away from building wharfs and slip ways in fishing communities along the south coast of Newfoundland. It got us away from providing needed infrastructure in the fishing industry that was most beneficial in helping fishermen pursue their trade—slip ways on which to pull up their boats, wharfs to tie their boats to, stages on which to split and clean their fish.

Those people who want to knock the short-term job creation programs are very selective in how they characterize them. They always pick the painting of the cemetery fence. Yes, that was done under some of those programs, but what was done much more often under those programs—and therefore he ought not to be maligning those programs—is that good infrastructure was put in place such as wharfs and slip ways. I could mention health clinics. I could mention a Girl Guide camp in one part of my riding, a place called Jean de Baie. It is a regional Girl Guide facility used literally by thousands of Girl Guides every summer. It was built under job creation.

We could go to Marystown and see the fire tower which was built to train firemen from all over eastern Newfoundland in emergency procedures. However he chooses, instead, to talk about painting cemetery fences. I say to him that he ought not to knock what was a program that served rural people particularly very well. It served them a lot better than the present charade is serving them, where they are told they can get job creation money provided they will agree to be retrained. That is the magic word now: retrained.

Nobody in his right mind in any community in this country is against retraining, but we have to look at it in the context of some small communities in Atlantic Canada. I will pick one because it has been much in the news lately: the community of Gaultois which is in my riding on the south coast of Newfoundland. It is one community on an island called Long Island. There is no road connection from the island to the mainland of Newfoundland. My good friend, the hon. member for Willowdale, and I visited the community of Gaultois in the last week or so. He saw, as I have seen for many years, the industry of those people. We watched them in a plant pursuing a skill that they had acquired, refined, and improved over a lifetime.

The government says that they ought to retrain. For what do you retrain people in the community of Gaultois? That is not to be condescending; it is to underline the point that those people already possess any training, any skills that they need to survive in that community. Whether it is the skill to split and clean fish or to catch fish, carpentry skills, welding skills, homemakers' skills or secretarial skills, the skills which are needed in that community are there in abundance.

Retraining in that context, in the context of the government's program, is a code word for forced resettlement. These people will have to pack their suitcases, pick up their bags, leave their homes, leave their loved ones, and go off to urban Canada.

I am looking forward to hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe Centre. She is just bursting with ideas today and as soon as I am through sometime today, tomorrow, or Wednesday—whenever I get through here—I hope she will get up and tell us her concerns about this particular bill that would have the government borrow $25.5 billion, but I digress.

I was responding to some of the points made by the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières. He also said that this government, the government of which he is a supporter, had opened up the country to trade interests. I would say that is putting it rather charitably. Opening up the country to trade interests is a very charitable way of stating what has happened. I would put it more bluntly and to the point: that it has sold out the country to certain interests.

One only has to look at the government's sweetheart deal with American Express, with Amex, to realize that one has to be a foreigner to get a deal with this government, either a foreigner or on a very short list of people who funded the Tory campaign in the last federal election. I say a short list because it did not take a very long list; if they are all throwing in money up in the millions, it does not take many contributors to fund a campaign.

I wanted to say, in response to the gentleman from Trois-Rivières, that he should be a little more candid when he is talking about what this government has done in terms of trade interest. I say to him that beyond opening up the country it has sold out, particularly to American interests. That is a theme that I would pursue if I had the time.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: I know the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest does not concur with my views, but that does not detract from my right to express them. Actually there are a few over there who do not agree with my views. That is the difference between us; they are on that side and we are on this side.

An hon. member: Vive la différence.

Mr. Simmons: Vive la différence.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières also talked about what they had done to improve unemployment insurance. I hope the 170,000 recipients of UI who are going to be cut off at the knees out across this country heard that statement, because they had thought otherwise. They had thought that the UI changes were anything but an improvement. However I sense today either a misrepresentation by the gentleman from Trois-Rivières or a change of heart when he tells us that the government has improved the unemployment insurance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

MEMORIAL CUP

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will wish to join in recognizing the Oshawa Generals as a great team of champions for their thrilling Memorial Cup victory yesterday.

Though the Generals always enjoy an outstanding reputation on the ice, this is the first time they have won the Junior A championship since 1944. Their win was most convincing. The Generals are the first team to be undefeated through the round robin play-offs.

The Generals have brought great pride and pleasure to citizens of Oshawa and the Durham region. Our heartiest congratulations to all members of this supreme hockey team; to their coach, Rick Cornacchia, managers

Frank Jay and Scott Clark; and to the Oshawa Generals president, John Humphreys.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, since 1972 each successive federal government has shown its concern for women's issues by meeting with representatives from the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. These annual meetings provide an opportunity for both NAC members and cabinet to openly discuss issues that affect all Canadian families.

The government may not always have agreed with what NAC had to say and NAC may not always have liked the way government was conducting business, but at least the lines of communication were left open. This policy has now changed. The government has now shown its contempt for women's concerns by refusing to meet publicly with the representatives of the more than 500 organizations with memberships of over three million. It has sent a clear signal to women that their concerns are not high on the Tory agenda.

This government has slashed support programs, threatened to close women's centres, ignored the day care crisis and has now turned its back on the NAC spokespersons. It is time that this government remembered that its mandate also included public accountability.

NATIVE AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, yesterday at Rocky Mountain House Historic Park, I was privileged to join with elected provincial and municipal politicians, along with Chief Tom Bigchild and Chief Caroline Beaverbones from the Sunchild and O'Chiese reserves to officially recognize Native Awareness Week in the province of Alberta.

Chief Caroline spoke quietly and eloquently as she, on Mother's Day, told of her pride in her children and grandchildren and her equally strong pride in her heritage.

We all spoke on the need to foster tolerance and understanding, and of the need to be proud of our heritage and our country.

The young people from the Sunchild, O'Chiese and Bighorn Reserves provided examples of that pride in art, poems and song.

My compliments go to the organizers from the Rocky Mountain House Native Friendship Centre and the parks staff who provided an opportunity for natives and non-natives to further appreciate the culture and contribution of native Canadians.

NATIONAL TOURISM WEEK

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of National Tourism Awareness Week and I invite all Canadians to participate in events designed to heighten our awareness of this critical industry.

Not many people know how important tourism is to the Canadian economy. It is our third largest industry at $25 billion per year, our second largest earner of foreign exchange at $7 billion, and it contributes $11 billion in tax revenues to government. It provides employment to all regions of Canada and to all segments of the labour force. In fact, 632,000 people, or 10 per cent of the labour force, derive their living from tourism.

In the near north alone, which includes my riding of Nipissing, tourism generates $200 million annually and $1 billion across all of northern Ontario. Yet this government continues to neglect this key industry. At a time when competition for the world travel market is intensifying, we should not be tacking on an additional 7 per cent to the cost of our tourism products. Indeed, when the government sees fit to slash the tourism promotion budget from $35 million to $20 million, we have to question its commitment to this vital industry which will be the world's largest by the next decade.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, although the government is always ready to meet with its corporate friends, it has once again refused to meet with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

Were the government listening, it would hear a reasoned voice on the subject of peace and disarmament. Women have been at the forefront of the peace movement. Agnes Macphail, the first women MP and a member of my party, worked tirelessly for the cause of peace and international co-operation. New Democrats are proud to continue that tradition.

The NDP has been speaking out about the considerable economic advantages of peace and disarmament. Savings in defence spending will produce what has been called a peace dividend. Canadian women are demanding that these funds be used to promote improvements in the human condition. The peace dividend can and must be part of a fundamental restructuring of global priorities. Much can be achieved in the current political climate. What is required is leadership.

The time is long overdue for a complete and progressive update of our foreign and defence policy. When will this government listen to the voice of women?

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, ten years ago today then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, at the height of the referendum debate, told a gathering in Montreal's Paul Sauvé Arena that a "no" vote would lead to a renewal of federalism. The majority of Quebecers who voted no, and in fact the rest of Canada, believed that this renewed federalism would involve all provinces, including Quebec.

As we all know, in 1982 Canada patriated her Constitution. Mr. Trudeau affected a renewal of federalism. The problem was and still is that Quebec was left out.

In 1987, the Prime Minister joined all ten Premiers in drafting the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord. This accord fulfilled the promise of renewed federalism, unkept for seven years.

Ten years have passed since Quebec voted yes to Canada. Ten years have passed with Quebec out in the constitutional cold. Ten weeks have passed since I encouraged Canada's 11 First Ministers to reconsider their positions and find a way around the constitutional impasse that we now face.

There are now five weeks left to Meech. All Canadians are counting down to Meech. All Canadians are counting on Canada's First Ministers.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to use the next minute to implore the Minister of Justice to get a move on in the David Milgaard case.

David Milgaard has been in jail for 21 years for a murder he says he never committed and there is now serious doubt as to his guilt. Even the RCMP are interviewing a suspect in the case.

Despite the fact that the Department of Justice was asked more than a year ago to reopen the case, the file has yet to reach the desk of the minister. Why? What is behind this procrastination? Is it sloth? Is it indifference? Is it hubris? Is it the desire to protect the reputations of certain individuals?

Whatever the reason, it is now time for the Minister of Justice to act on the David Milgaard case, for justice delayed is justice denied.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to inform the House of a significant development with respect to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That committee, last Thursday, sent a summons to the Canadian Union of Public Employees indicating the union is an important witness in our study of the economic effects of the GST. CUPE President Jeff Rose has now responded saying he will appear before the committee next Tuesday evening.

This is an example of responsible leadership. Mr. Rose and I may disagree fundamentally on a number of issues but I would like to hold Mr. Rose up as a model of a responsible labour leader in this country and I urge every other labour leader in the country to be as responsible. I hope Shirley Carr is listening.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, last February 15 I made some comments in this House concerning the finance ministry's provision of brochures, in one official language only, to residents of my riding concerning the goods and services tax. On May 1, I again received a letter from a constituent complaining that he had received government information concerning the GST in one language only.

[Translation]

The same problem also occurred throughout the Acadian peninsula where a number of people received a GST English-only publication from the Government of Canada.

I have to remind the Minister of Finance that the residents of the riding of Restigouche—Chaleur are bilingual and that New Brunswick is the only officially bilingual province in Canada.

My constituents expect bilingual services and the government must see to it that they do.

How much longer must New Brunswickers wait until the federal government offers them services in both official languages?

ANTI-SEMITISM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are sickened at the barbarous desecration of Jewish graves and the mutilation of a corpse that occurred last week in France which stimulated similar incidents over the weekend.

• (1410)

Parliamentarians and all persons who respect human rights and abhor racism join with Jews to lament and protest such anti-Semitic acts which create fear of another holocaust and bring shame on us all.

As Canadians we must not be complacent. In 1987, B'Nai Brith recorded a 57 per cent rise in acts of bigotry against the Jewish communities. In Toronto alone there were 39 reports of harassment of Jews. Six desecrations of Canadian synagogues occurred. In the Ottawa area, swastikas were painted at the scene of a golf course.

I am ashamed that the Premier of British Columbia condones a "Christian only" policy in his party and even made anti-Jewish jokes.

Many of these acts are blamed on neo-Nazi skinheads who are recruiting young Canadians.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, it has been over ten years since the majority of Quebecers voted no in the referendum after what was described as a major and memorable intervention by former Prime Minister of Canada Pierre Trudeau. He did assure them that no meant yes to renewed federalism, and I quote: If the answer to the referendum question is no, we all said that the no will be interpreted as a mandate to change the Constitution and renew federalism.

But after patriating the Constitution in 1982 without the agreement of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, the former Prime Minister reneged on his promise.

This is why I consider that the current Meech Lake Accord is the obvious sign of the fairness and efficiency of the constitutional program and objectives of the Prime Minister of Canada. I for one hope that he will be able to win the faith and good will of all Canadians.

MOTHER'S DAY

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was Mother's Day 1990. Canadians celebrate this day to show reverence to all mothers and to appreciate the sacrifices they endure for their children throughout their living years.

Lest we forget, let me quote a few lines from Susan Kastner's reflections in "Mother has Reason to Weep" which appeared in yesterday's Toronto Star.

> There are mothers weeping over children who have disappeared—; who weep while they hold their starving children in their laps; —who weep for daughters and sons—sold into prostitution to get the family a little to eat; —who weep because their young are being murdered by drugs; —who weep because their children will grow up paying forever for the colour of their skin; —who weep for children sent to war; there are mothers who weep because there are no jobs for their men or for themselves, and the future holds no prospect of jobs for their children.

Yes, mothers continue to think of their children and men. We in Parliament should think always of all mothers and of those for whom they weep.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it has become obvious to even the most casual observer that the priorities of this government are misplaced.

The Minister responsible for the Status of Women and her colleague, the Secretary of State, are making much of the reinstated funding for women's centres, but this action betrays the shallowness of this government's commitment to women in Canada.

Bill C-69 will limit funding transfers for child care, for shelter for battered women, for income support. That is the Tory commitment to women and children in this country.

Women and their children are the victims of this government's misplaced priorities. It has cut the Canada Assistance Plan, it has cut UI coverage, it has clawed back old age pensions and it has clawed back family allowance. This government has no commitment to women's equity. It has no commitment to children. Its priorities are misplaced and wrongheaded and Canadian women will neither forgive nor forget this government for its insistent attack upon them.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

STATUS OF WOMEN

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. This morning I and other members of the Official Opposition met in an open and constructive public dialogue with members of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, a widely based group representing more than 500 organizations representing hundreds and thousands of Canadian women.

The government, in a failed attempt to control the agenda of women, refused to take part in a similar session, preferring instead to try to allow only a handful of NAC members to meet with only three ministers in closed-door sessions.

Why did the government refuse to take part in this important public dialogue with NAC delegates today? What has it got to hide? Why is it so ashamed of its record when it comes to fighting for the rights of women?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, the government's record with respect to women in this country is second to none and you are very familiar with our advances. We meet with representatives of women's organizations on an ongoing basis. We had hoped to have the opportunity to meet with representatives of NAC this morning. In fact, the executive had agreed to do so, but I understand the general membership decided not to proceed.

I will continue to look for opportunities to have constructive dialogue with representatives of NAC and with other women's organizations, where both sides can tell their story and both sides can listen.

We have entered into those kinds of discussions with groups such as the National Council of Women of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women, the Canadian Federation of University Women, and the Canadian Catholic Women's League. I look forward to opportunities of meeting with representatives of NAC during the coming year hopefully to build a constructive, positive relationship.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was certainly not clear and convincing. Why did the government refuse to hold a public meeting? Why was there only a closed-door session, in which only the three women in cabinet met the representatives of this important group?

I repeat, why didn't the government organize public meetings including the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Secretary of State, two ministers who play a key role in developing policies concerning women? Why didn't the government organize a public meeting with all delegates of the National Action Committee, like the opposition did?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, it is our feeling that a public meeting is not productive unless there is a full opportunity for both sides to tell their story and for both sides to listen.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare recently met with representatives of NAC and is away from Ottawa today. The Secretary of State is also away from Ottawa. He has indicated he would be prepared to meet with representatives of NAC at a mutually acceptable date later this month.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the opposition parties found it possible to be present today. Furthermore, they found it possible to have a dialogue with the representatives of NAC.

I want to turn to a specific case of lack of concern by the government for the rights of women. I am talking about the case of Mary Pitawanakwat. She was fired by the government two years after she complained of facing sexual and racial harassment in her job as a social development officer with the federal Department of Secretary of State.

Why has the government been attempting to obtain a Federal Court order to block her efforts to have the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal deal with her complaints on their merits? Will the government drop these efforts and allow the commission to get on with the job of ruling on these complaints on their merits?

Does the government not realize that, if it continues with these efforts to block this case being heard, it is in direct contradiction with its own national campaign against racial discrimination and for the promotion of affirmative action for the rights of women and natives?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I know that case is before my colleagues for consideration. I met Mary a few weeks ago. I am sure that they will be taking that issue under consideration. I have nothing further to report on it today.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It is with regard to the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technologies.

This Royal commission is due to report in October of 1991 and hundreds of groups, women and men, nation-wide, want to contribute to this process.

• (1420)

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell Canadians that the process will start immediately, or is this just another example of the government stifling debate, particularly when it relates to women's issues?

Mr. Andre: We set it up.

Ms. Clancy: You set it up, Harvey, but let's get it moving.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, we discussed this in committee last week. I am pleased to inform the hon. member that that commission is proceeding. It is hiring its staff. It is preparing for hearings which, I understand, will be held this fall throughout the country.

As I am sure the hon. member is aware, once a Royal commission is established, it is the author of its own destiny. I am sure that its work will proceed and it will be able to bring forward recommendations which will stand in the interest of both men and women in this vital area for the future.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Canadian women are, to say the least, disillusioned by the government's failure to restore funding to eight major research groups in the country. The Royal commission, in spite of the good words that we hear, is still not on the road.

Will the Acting Prime Minister show that the government is committed to research and development, and restore funding to these research groups? Will someone announce the royal commission's timetable?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that the royal commission is planning its hearings. I am meeting with some of their people in the near future.

I cannot assure the member that there will be any changes with respect to funding. The Secretary of State has had to have funding cuts, as have all government departments, in order that we can proceed with deficit reduction and ensure that our economy is moving ahead. That will absolutely be the most important issue for women in the future.

I have met with representatives of these organizations. The Secretary of State has met with their representatives to work with them to find alternative sources of funding in order that they continue with the good work that they undertake.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. The largest women's group in Canada, representing five million women, had asked to meet with all three political parties today. The government and the minister responsible for the Status of Women refused to do so.

The government meets with business groups and that is reported on publicly. It meets with the corporate sector and that is reported on. The government travels around the world and meets with other governments, and that is reported publicly.

Even if her colleagues will not, why will the Minister responsible for the Status of Women not meet with the National Action Committee representing five million women? Why does she not have the courage to say: "I will meet with you in public. I will be accountable for my government's policies"?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, I did offer to meet with its representatives to enter into a dialogue on what I believe would be a constructive way of approaching these issues.

I am also, of course, prepared to meet with women's organizations across the country and speak to their annual meetings upon invitation. I will continue to do so, including, of course, with NAC upon an invitation that might be extended to me.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that the question is, why she will not meet in public.

I want to raise again with the Minister responsible for the Status of Women an all-party report from 1987 called Fairness in Funding. It is a report endorsed by her party.

The report states that funding for women's programs should "at least be maintained and indexed to a cost of living allowance". This report also endorsed increased funding for women's programs. It also endorsed considering increased funding for northern and rural women's programs.

How can the Minister responsible for the Status of Women meet her mandate? How can she stand there and say she will not meet publicly with women's groups? Will she again confirm her endorsement of these principles, as her party did in 1987?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, I am willing and prepared. I think I have met with representatives of some 40 women's groups across the country over two months, in nine of the ten provinces and in one of the territories. I will continue to do that. I will listen to their concerns and encourage my colleagues to enter into constructive dialogue and effective lobbying in order that we can further women's equality in the country.

The Women's Program of the Secretary of State, of course, undertakes valuable work but that program, like all programs of government, must recognize that we are in a period of financial restraint and we all must share in that restraint.

However, on the other hand, I think it is important to recognize that the work that has been undertaken by my colleagues in Health and Welfare and in Employment and Immigration. They are funding a wide variety of activities to further women's equality through the Canadian Jobs Strategy program and the family violence prevention program.

The holistic approach of the government to support women in their various activities is a growing and expanding role and the results, we are going to ensure, will be the furtherance of social, legal and economic equality for women in the country.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the Minister responsible for the Status of Women that, unlike sometimes in Question Period, it is possible to have a dialogue with the women of Canada. We had a dialogue with the National Action Committee today. This minister can have one too.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my last question is directed to the same minister. In December, all women, in Quebec and across Canada, were horrified when fourteen young women lost their lives, murdered by a man who had a grudge against feminists. The minister must give a clear response to all Canadians who are trying to understand.

Will she order a public inquiry on this tragedy and on violence against women in society?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, the incident in Montreal was a tragedy of proportions beyond, perhaps, the ability of any of us to truly understand.

The issue of violence against women is probably my top priority. The government must look further into the causes and prevention, and try to deal with this problem in an effective way.
I will be working with my colleagues and other colleagues in women's organizations across the country to help us find answers to this really dreadful problem in our society.

A royal commission on that particular incident would not be within the prerogative of the federal government. I think our approach should be to start to address the root problems of violence against women and also, of course, to support women who find themselves in situations of abuse, to provide protection for them and to deal with this problem from a holistic approach as well.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Multiculturalism and Citizenship, and in his absence, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister to respond.

At the meeting of the standing committee last week, the minister was unable to justify his failure to hire representatives of visible minorities, especially women. Today, could the minister give us his reasons and tell us when he intends to remedy a situation that has become unacceptable and intolerable?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, we have been making considerable progress in recent years as far as visible minorities are concerned. Although we would like to do more, the objectives set for 1991 show an increase of 3.8 per cent in minority representation in the Public service, compared with 3 per cent in 1989. I may add that the departments are committed to meeting these objectives.

Regarding women's employment in the Public Service, Mr. Speaker, I think we have worked very hard in this area during the past years. In fact, I can inform the hon. member that in all categories— including management, scientific and professional, and administrative—there has been a major increase in the percentage of women's participation, compared with the situation in 1984 when this government was elected.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. minister that this does not answer the problems, the double-whammy that visible minority women face.

• (1430)

[Translation]

My supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The latest report on the Employment Equity Act clearly shows that the government is slow to act in this area, despite your figures. When will the government amend the Act in order to increase the number of women in key positions in the Public Service and when can we expect concrete results?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, concerning key positions in the Public Service, I would like to remind my hon. colleague that the proportion of women appointed to positions by Order in Council—ambassadorial positions, and so on—has increased as never before in the history of this country.

I would also like to tell my hon. colleague that the management category, for example, which is the most important one in the Public Service, was only 7 per cent female in 1984. This proportion increased from 7 per cent in 1984 to 13.6 per cent in 1989. We doubled it, Mr. Speaker. We are continuing, we are not stopping there.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and concerns the desperate financial situation facing western prairie farmers.

Six weeks has passed since the government promised to take some action with regard to the financial crunch facing prairie farmers. Now that the western premiers have adopted a common front saying they simply cannot afford to cost share any supplementary assistance to farmers because the government has cut off or reduced their transfer payments, how long will the government continue to stonewall western farmers on these payments, payments that were needed weeks ago and are due now?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this government has never in history stonewalled farmers.

There is a meeting taking place at the present time in Winnipeg dealing with this special problem. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds are meeting at the present time with the ministers of agriculture of the three provinces to formalize and, hopefully, to finalize an agreement with those provinces.

We are hopeful that we can be successful. If we all work together, I am sure we can be.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, meetings like this have been going on for six weeks now. Is the parliamentary secretary aware that credit is simply drying up for farmers on the prairies?

With wheat prices down by $30 a tonne and with interest rates up above 15 per cent, farmers simply cannot get credit. In light of the parliamentary secretary's comments, can he assure western agriculture producers that cheques will be sent out before the end of this month? When will payments be made to these producers?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it would be very premature to make any indication of that when a meeting is taking place today.

The Minister of Agriculture has indicated that he is very flexible in terms of matching funds that the provinces can make available to match the $500 million that the federal government has put up.

As I said before, it would be very premature to make any announcement today while the ministers are meeting.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women answered the leader of the New Democratic Party by saying that violence against women was her "top priority". I certainly wish that this matter would become the top priority of the government.

If this is her top priority, and if it is any kind of a priority for her government, why did the government put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan? This is the federal-provincial funding mechanism for shelters for battered women. Why is their a cap on CAP?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am the minister responsible for the Canada Assistance Plan. I can indicate to the hon. member, as most members of the House of Commons recognize, it is important that the federal government have controls on federal spending.

The one area which has not been controlled up until now has been transfers to the provinces which have been increasing at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. The caps apply only to the wealthy provinces.

In the case of Ontario the cap on transfers on EPF and the Canada Assistance Plan amount to less than 1 per cent of the revenues of the Ontario government for this year. It is absolutely possible for the Ontario government, as it is for other provinces, to find money for family violence or any other area of importance to them.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the women who are battered in the province of British Columbia and the women who are subject to abuse in Ontario and Alberta are just as battered and just as bruised as any of the women in any other part of this country.

When are we going to see the government take this situation seriously? When are we going to see real dollars and a real plan of effective action to combat violence against women in our society?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first, the hon. member mentions British Columbia. The cap on CAP amounts to 5 per cent growth per annum, which is permitted for every province. British Columbia did not meet that target last year and likely will not this year. Thus the cap probably will not affect that province.

Second, the commitment to doing everything we can to fight family violence remains. We are determined to do that. We have committed money specifically to family violence programs, quite outside of the Canada Assistance Plan. We are going to continue to do that.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for fisheries. Last week, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a fisheries adjustment program that is far from meeting the needs of the regions concerned. Besides overlooking many communities, it makes no mention of fishermen in Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Can the minister tell us why the government completely forgot about the fishermen in these provinces? Or maybe the government still believes, as does the Prime Minister, that all these people seem to be happy and doing fine?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should know that the program announced a week ago today by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program. It certainly applies to New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador, and Nova Scotia.

With respect to the province of Quebec, the Minister of Fisheries is prepared to discuss with the province of Quebec whatever program may be particularly needed in that province.

In addition, this program concentrates on the problems of the fishery, particularly with respect to the offshore and in connection with the total allowable catches that were recommended as a result of scientific advice and the interim report of the Harris committee this year.

The inshore fishery with particular reference to Newfoundland and Labrador has not been affected in so far as total allowable catches go because the allowance remains at 115,000 tonnes this year. If the fish strike in and we have a good fishery there, that is one situation. If it is a poor fishery, that will have to be dealt with later.

With respect to the question of whether it is new money or not, this is usually something the hon. member asks. He asks his old canard. This is money in Canadian currency, and it is all new money.

With respect to rebuilding the fish stocks, the $150 million under that heading is all new money that was not provided for before.

Mr. Robichaud: Taken away from other programs.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): Just wait now. The hon. gentleman wanted to know if it is new, old, in between or tattle-tale gray. I am telling him.

For economic diversification there is $146 million, which is all new money never provided for before in the Estimates.

That is $146 million plus $130 million. I have missed $130 million for adjusting to current realities, which is all new money.

Add up $130 million, plus $150 million, plus $146 million and what do you get? A hell of a lot of new money.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): My supplementary is for the same minister.

The whole lobster industry is in a severe crisis. Fishermen are receiving prices that do not even cover their operating costs.

Will the minister come up with a price support program—new money—for the lobster fishermen? Or will he just offer to promote the sale of lobster at prices that will drive the fishermen out of the lobster industry. Is that what the government is offering?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the lobster season has really just begun in its fullest sense at the present time. There is a problem with lobster because there is an over-supply in so far as the markets are concerned.

• (1440)

The way in which one can attempt to overcome that is to try to increase the demand. That is what the minister is attempting to do. He announced a program involving $2.4 million on May 11 with the fisheries ministers of P.E.I. and New Brunswick to promote New Brunswick and P.E.I. lobster during the next three years.

In addition, the Departments of External Affairs and International Trade have launched promotional efforts for lobster in more than 20 foreign posts abroad.

Various fairs, missions and market intelligence activities are planned to enhance the diversification of processed lobster to encourage the development of new products in an attempt to overcome this problem, which is not a simple one because it is a problem of over-supply.

I am surprised that the world does not eat all the lobster that we produce and that the demand does not outrun the supply. But we have to make sure that they understand.

I attended a promotional effort in London last fall in connection with lobster. I expect that this problem will eventually be overcome, but it will take some time.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of International Trade in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The minister will know that federal scientists announced in St. John's today their latest findings, namely, that previous estimates of northern cod stocks were too high, and that the fishery is in even worse shape than they had projected earlier. Yet his bosom pal, the European fisheries minister, has called for yet one more study before they stop pillaging our fish stocks.

When is the government, and in particular the minister, going to take off the kid gloves and stand up for the fishermen and the plant workers, his fellow contrymen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, long before the hon. gentleman came into this Chamber and long after he is gone from this Chamber I will be standing up for the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Rather than this approach of alarm that the hon. gentleman is trying to spread, we are dealing with the problem. Today, there was a meeting of the Atlantic Groundfish Advisory Committee in St. John's so that the people who participate, and the press, could be fully briefed on the latest scientific information. It is an open process that our Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is involved in.

The new estimates confirm last year's assessment and the conclusion of the Harris panel. The 1983–84 year classes are now considered to be among the poorest ever seen. The spawning stock will decline in 1991 as these year classes mature.

However, there is a brighter note as well. The 1986–87 year classes appear much stronger in research surveys and could contribute significantly to stock rebuilding in 1992 and later years, if not extensively caught as juveniles.

These estimates now have to be confirmed through meetings with fishermen. Toward the end of the year there will be formal scientific advice for next year, at which time the minister will discuss the options with Atlantic fisheries ministers, the industry and the unions.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, while he is standing up for fishermen, probably he could tell us this in relation to last week's aid package. He will know that in the 1986 FPI privatization agreement, provision was made to keep the plants at Trepassey in his riding, Gaultois and Grand Bank open.

Is the minister prepared to recommend to his colleagues in Cabinet that the community adjustment funding provided for in last week's package be applied to keep Trepassesy, Grand Bank and Gaultois open under Clause 5 of that privatization agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. gentleman that he was a member of a government that gave away 9,500 tonnes a year of prime northern cod within the Canadian 200-mile limit to the European community. This is the same hon. member who now abuses diplomatic representatives who come to the gallery of this House. He got up the other day and insulted those particular people.

Mr. Boudria: That is not proper.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am rather timorous. I get frightened and worried by the noise opposite.

With reference to community development funding, those communities can use those funds for any economic development in their communities, including using them to see whether the plants in their community can continue to operate, so long as they do not use them for operating subsidies. They can use them otherwise to try to ensure that the plants continue to operate under new ownership or other arrangements.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. I assume there is one across the way.

Since the Brundtland commission, the Federal Court, the National Task Force on the Environment and Economy and the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council have either ruled inclusion or called for legislated environmental review of cabinet policy, and since in the last few days Canadians have been shocked to learn that this government has decided to exempt its own cabinet policies from environmental review, will whoever is the Acting Prime Minister today take this opportunity to reverse publicly this odious decision?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the Minister of the Environment is attending a very important international conference.

However, he did answer a similar question that the hon. member posed last week in the House before he left in which he reiterated the government's commitment to place before the House and the country a very comprehensive plan and the government's new policy which will reflect not only the government's commitment to a new ethic but also the programs that we intend to initiate in terms of the ERP review process.

The details of the legislation are still in cabinet. The hon. member will have to await the outcome of the final determination.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Acting Prime Minister. I do not know whether that is my friend Frank or not.

Earlier today an alliance led by Greenpeace, representing more than a million Canadians, called for a royal commission on the national emergency facing Canada's forests. Perhaps unknown to most Canadians, Canadian forests are disappearing to fire and clear cutting at a rate comparable to that in the Amazon—one acre every five seconds.

I wonder if someone on the government side, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister, might announce that there will in fact be a royal commission of inquiry into Canada's most valuable natural resource, our forests.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Perhaps if my hon. friend would reflect on what the government has done over the last five years in terms of developing the necessary strategic alliances with industry and the provinces which have, after all, the principal and the first line of responsibility for the custodianship of the resources that lie within their scope of jurisdiction, the hon. member would recognize that much has been done.

This year 1.2 billion trees will be planted. Some of the policies that we have been able to put in place over the last five years are showing very impressive results.

Perhaps the hon. member would wait for the final assessment of the progress that has been made over the last five years before he would call or join the chorus for a royal commission.

INCOME TAX REFUNDS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, constituents of mine from the riding of Simcoe Centre have made numerous inquiries on the status of badly needed tax refunds they are expecting from Revenue Canada.

I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue what he is doing to provide accurate information to Canadians regarding the status of their individual tax refunds in order to reassure them that they will receive the money owed in a timely and efficient manner.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member could be aware, we have processed a record number of 6.2 million refunds as of April 30 due to the improvements in our productivity efforts in order to assist the taxpayer.

• (1450)

Nevertheless, I would like to point out to the hon. member that starting tomorrow, as a matter of fact, all taxpayers will be able to take advantage of a tele-refund program, which is a national computerized service, which will provide up-to-date information on any refund services to the taxpayer.

This is yet another step to improve productivity and to make the system fairer and simpler for Canadian taxpayers.

NEW HORIZONS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I have been informed that in northwestern Ontario the New Horizons Program for seniors has been severely cut. In fact, there will only be a total of six applications approved for all of northwestern Ontario this coming year in comparison to nine applications which were approved in my riding last year.

Can the minister tell us exactly what is going on with the New Horizons Program for seniors? I think all seniors in this country would like to know.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, you bet I can, and I would be particularly delighted.

I am pleased to inform the hon. member and the House that he was particularly well treated last year relative to virtually all the other members in the House of Commons.

The allocation for the hon. member's constituency was some $36,806. The amount spent was $74,975. The amount approved was some $86,688.

Already this year the amount committed from the previous year carried over some $33,574, and there is a further allocation of some $24,620.

In terms of programs to be submitted for my approval over the next two to three weeks there is some $9,794.

The hon. member should be pretty pleased with that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting that the minister knew exactly what I was going to ask him.

I would like to inform the minister, since he seems to know so much, that the fact is that my riding has been cut by 32 per cent for the upcoming year.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nault: That is not too bad. Last week the minister suggested to this House, through another minister, that there were no cuts at all to the New Horizons Program.

On the one hand the minister says simply that there have been no cuts, while on the other hand I am being told that I have been cut by 32 per cent. Even though we have been treated so well in Kenora—Rainy River, I would like that to continue.

Could the minister simply tell us if there are any cuts or if there are not any cuts? I would like to know one way or another so that the senior citizens of Kenora and in the area I represent will be able to make their plans for the upcoming year.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit puzzled. The hon. member seemed surprised that I knew he might be asking a question. His office called to tell me so. Perhaps his office did not inform him of the possibility.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: I can simply confirm for the hon. gentleman that his riding was disproportionately well treated last year. With the amount of money carried over this year, he will be exceptionally well treated again this year as well.

CITY OF MONTREAL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the city of Montreal.

The lead editorial in yesterday's The Gazette stated:

> A dark shadow is clouding Montreal's entrance to the 1990s as a dynamic, progressive and prosperous city.
> The shadow is cast by deepening poverty and misery, by an expanding underclass of Montrealers with no jobs or precarious jobs, substandard housing, poor health and little hope.

This assessment was made in a recent report by Paul Lacoste on behalf of the Montreal Centraide campaign.

Considering this shocking analysis, will the federal government now get together with the city of Montreal and with the Government of Quebec to develop a comprehensive city-wide plan to re-establish Montreal as a strong economic centre with good and productive jobs? When can we expect some action on these serious matters?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am always surprised when the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce makes such comments about Montreal, considering the situation in which the former Liberal government left Quebec in general and Montreal in particular and considering the programs that have been announced. The hon. member obviously did not refer to the announcement I made two weeks ago in southwestern Montreal, which was extremely well received by Montrealers, and to the efforts that have been made in eastern Montreal. Of course, we are not talking about the hon. member's riding, because it is probably in the best health of all those on the Island of Montreal, Mr. Speaker.

In view of all this, Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce knows very well that since the present Government of Canada, the Government of Quebec and the City of Montreal have implemented a package of measures, we are keeping the promises and commitments we had to the city of Montreal and the region in general.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this is not my analysis, but an analysis made by the Montreal Centraide campaign and The Gazette of Montreal. The plan that he put into operation last week was only for southwest Montreal.

In addition to the Lacoste report to which I referred, a recent survey by the Montreal Board of Trade found that Montreal companies are increasingly pessimistic about business conditions in that city.

Another report indicates that construction starts are down 31 per cent.

The regroupement des depts. de santé communautaire stated that one in four Montrealers are living in a state of poverty.

The Montreal Island School Commission said that poverty in Montreal is tied to illiteracy and to immigration conditions.

These are not our assessments—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I want to know when the government is going to take these reports seriously—these reports, not our analysis—and do something about it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the member will not be surprised if I do not always agree with The Gazette.

I believe that we have done for Montreal what we said we would do, and we continue to do it.

The member does not seem to be impressed. He should go and see what we did in southwest Montreal and find out from the community groups what they think about what we did.

The hon. member should speak to the city of Montreal and to many other organizations in Montreal which recognize that with the way the Liberals left Montreal in 1984, we had a lot of work to do. But it is what we do, and we will carry on. We will give Montreal the pride to be a great city of Canada.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy who is responsible for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. It has to do with reports today that the government might be considering throwing good money after bad in helping to complete the Candu reactor project in Romania.

Knowing what he does about the shoddy work record on that site and the contentions about the diversion of nuclear materials, heavy water, et cetera, could the minister tell the House whether the government is prepared to make the decision that this project is beyond redemption and not continue with that work in Romania?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have just a couple of points in answer to the hon. member.

First, with respect to the matter of the publicity relating to the diversion of heavy water, I point out to the hon. member that Canada was not involved. That should be kept in mind with respect to the publicity surrounding the diversion of heavy water from another country.

The second point that should be kept in mind is that all the moneys that Romania obligated itself to pay to date on the Cernovoda project have been paid up to the fourth quarter of 1989. There are no arrears.

In response to his question, the Government of Canada was approached after the fall of the Ceausescu regime by the present government for consideration of an extension of EDC credits on repayment terms and obligations such as Romania had met earlier. We have not made a decision on that issue yet.

With respect to any changes that would have to occur, obviously safety as well as technological and project management would have to be put into Canadian hands in order to meet the safety obligations that we have.

• (1500)

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, knowing the desperation of the nuclear industry in Canada and knowing that it has a strong ally in the minister, I do not expect the government to be as rigorous as we would like it to be in making this decision.

The minister mentioned that Romania paid its debts on this account. It is no wonder it could pay its debts; the site was a forced labour camp and nobody in AECL managed to notice this. If, God forbid, they should go ahead with this project, would the minister please ensure that he sends people to Romania who have their eyes open and who are not so committed to the sale of Candu reactors that they do not notice over a period of years that the place is a forced labour camp, something which was attested to time and again in front of the external affairs committee and by others? Would he promise to send people there who are not so tied to the nuclear industry that they cannot see what is going on right in front of their faces?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, along with Canada's international responsibility to the non-proliferation treaty, my obligation is to advance energy, including nuclear energy.

I point out to the hon. member that the province of Ontario has well over 50 per cent of its electrical generation in nuclear right now. It is moving toward 60 per cent when its present construction is completed. The point, I say to the hon. member, is that it is my responsibility to look at all energy forms rather than the biases that he, so often over the years while he and I have been in the House, has expressed.

At the present time, since the fall of the Ceausescu regime there are no military conscripts on site. I appreciate what he said in terms of other people working on the site during the Ceausescu regime. It is for those reasons that we are demanding certain changes, keeping in mind that there will be an election on May 20 and hopefully democracy will be restored to that country.

PRIVILEGE

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have a question of privilege from the hon. member for Skeena. Before the hon. member pleads his case, I want to suggest an approach to this matter which I think would be helpful.

First, I compliment the hon. member on having given to me in very great detail the sum and substance of his position. I want to let the hon. member know that I have looked at the material very carefully. I am not at this time ruling as to whether it is a question of privilege, but I must indicate to the hon. member that there is some doubt about that.

However, in the hon. member's letter supporting his question of privilege, he makes a serious argument that there was an intention to mislead as a consequence of contradictions in statements made by the hon. Minister of the Environment and material put forward by the hon. minister's department.

What I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with is my suggestion that this matter be adjourned until the minister gets back. I will take the information that I have as having completely secured the hon. member's right to raise the matter, but under the circumstances I want the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair in postponing it until the minister can be in his place.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what you have had to say.

On the two points that I raise I think it would be quite appropriate to wait until the minister returns. In both cases, as you will see from how I have laid it out, they both relate to matters that happened in the House on Thursday and in relation to some documents that were made available to me either on Friday or over the weekend. I wanted to flag them, because this was my first opportunity to do so, but I am sure the Minister of the Environment would want to be here to hear the argument in person.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the response of the hon. member.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table a petition, certified correct as to form and content, from members and friends of Branch 126 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Westmount, Nova Scotia.

There are many signatures on this petition, and in part it states that the Government of Canada has introduced changes that will reduce home keeping services to veterans and substantially increase the costs of long-term care.

Whereas the veterans have already given service to this country and should not be targeted by those measures, the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject those budget measures which deprive veterans of proper services and increase their financial hardship.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition signed by numerous residents also largely members of a legion branch in Kingston, and in fact is signed by some in Napanee, Ontario, who are objecting to the cuts the government has proposed to the veterans services, particularly to the housekeeping costs for veterans and the additional charges for veterans in long-term care.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the budget measures that impose these cuts and ask the government to reinstate them at the earliest possible date.

I am pleased to table this petition on their behalf.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand before you and present these petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of the constituents of Kenora—Rainy River.

Today I have 33 petitions, totalling 3,314 signatures of people in my riding, that again call on the government to change its mind and reassess the reasons for putting this particular legislation in place as it relates to the goods and services tax, knowing full well that it will put our country into a major recession and cause severe inflation that these Canadians know very well we cannot afford.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of constituents from Simcoe, Rainy River, and St. Thomas, Ontario, I would like to present a petition in opposition to the goods and services tax.

It points out that it is a tremendously unfair tax on the basis that it is regressive in that it is taxing people who are least able to afford this kind of tax. It asks the government to change the tax system, for sure, but to bring in one that is equitable, progressive and taxes people according to their ability to pay.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Question answered orally is indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 304 will be answered today.

[Text]

CHAIRMAN OF THE CANADA COUNCIL

Question No. 304—Mr. Harvard:

Does Mr. Allan Gotlieb receive a salary for his services as Chairman of the Canada Council and, if so (a) in what amount per year (b) is it a full-time or a part-time salary?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Please refer to reply to Question No. 214 answered March 23, 1990.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990–91

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before recognizing the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nunatsiaq—Goods and Services Tax; the hon. member for Drummond—External Trade; the hon. member for South West Nova—Fisheries.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I was responding to some of the points that my hon. friend from Trois-Rivières had made. I recall that in particular he had talked about job creation and about the jobs that this government had created. He went a step further. If I were the Minister of State for Finance, I would not applaud until I heard how the gentleman from Trois-Rivières put his foot into it. He went on to say that it was the quality of the jobs created that excited him.

It may excite him, but it does not much excite the people who live in the fishing communities of Atlantic Canada. Up until now these people have had good quality union rate jobs either in fishing boats or in fish plants. There is a disaster in the fishery which is not of their creation, a disaster which is created very largely by the overfishing by Spain, Portugal and France, a situation that this government has aided and abetted over the past six years. I can give my friend from Simcoe Centre some figures to support that contention, as I shall in a moment. She could get the same figures by just calling the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, but I will recite them for her in a moment.

When the member talks and brags about the quality of jobs created during the administration of the gentleman from Baie Comeau, he ought not be so fast to brag when he realizes that people who have heretofore had union rate jobs in those communities in Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada generally are now being reduced to service type jobs, if jobs at all. Most of the jobs created during the life of this administration have been service jobs. They have been $4, $5, and $6 an hour jobs. That is the shame of it.

The gentleman from Trois-Rivières in speaking and introducing this bill on third reading on behalf of the government also went on to talk about how the government is being managed effectively. When is this member going to get serious? It is one thing for him to read the script prepared for him by someone else, but he ought to at least pre-read it before the fact so that he can realize just how outrageous are some of the statements that he has been asked to read into the record.

To suggest to Canadians who have been watching the shenanigans of this government over the past six years that the government is being managed at all well is just a falsehood. Perhaps the member for Burlington does not know what happened recently. If you want an example of effective management, let me lay this one on you, brother. Have you heard that the government, when the Prime Minister went to Costa Rica, actually went to the expense of flying two limousines down to Costa Rica. Does the member for Burlington know that?

An hon. member: Cadillacs?

Mr. Simmons: The assertion by the gentleman from Trois-Rivières is not that the Liberal government managed effectively. His assertion is that the Tory government manages effectively. I am attempting to demonstrate and to put into the record some examples so that the public of Canada who are watching can judge for themselves. The present example, the one I was giving to my good friend from Burlington, is that the government decides that the vehicles in Costa Rica are not good enough for our Prime Minister.

Mr. Hawkes: Liar, liar, liar.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The hon. government whip knows what he has to do. He has been around here for a long time. I know it is very warm outside and is also very warm in here, too. Sometimes members get excited, but I am sure the hon. member knows that he has to withdraw.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, in sitting here today and listening to him talk about an RCMP decision as if the government made it, I was impelled—

Mr. Vincent: It was the RCMP.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The government whip should withdraw his comment.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would be only too happy to withdraw and point out that the member opposite—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: I said you are not saying the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, parliamentary niceties aside, I am sure my friend the government whip was trying to make a point. I believe the point he was trying to make—and I will make it for him—was that I was not telling the truth when I suggested, alleged, or informed the House that two vehicles were flown to Costa Rica for the use of the Prime Minister who was going there on government business. That I understand to be the case.

Mr. Hawkes: That is true.

Mr. Simmons Now he says it is true. Thank you.

Mr. Hawkes: That is true. It was on government business, but it was the RCMP who made the decision.

Mr. Simmons: He makes the fine distinction that it was not the government, it was the RCMP.

Mr. Hawkes: Are you going to tell the RCMP what to do?

An hon. member: They do not tell you what to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I realize that under Standing Order 43 there are no questions or comments for the hon. member. I know hon. members like to get their questions and comments in during a speech, but I would hope that hon. members would refrain so the hon. member can complete his debate.

Mr. Foster: Now, straighten them out once and for all.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, let me try one more time to say that I would find it passing strange if the Prime Minister did not want those cars there if someone decided to bring them anyway. I have no doubt that they were brought at the specific request of the Prime Minister. It also tells us volumes about his style of prime ministership. That is another theme that I won't—

Mr. Hawkes: How many agents have bullet-proof limousines?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I think we struck a nerve here. Let me just quickly make this point and get off it. The point is that if you are going to brag about good government management, and I say to the gentleman from Trois—Rivières, I am going to give some examples so the people of Canada can decide for themselves. The one I have put on the record concerns flying two limousines to Costa Rica and, by the way, finding out after the fact there is no gas for them. That is an interesting aside I should have mentioned. I do not think that constitutes good government management.

Mr. Hawkes: Give us an example.

Mr. Simmons: Oh, the member wants another example. Why does he not get up and tell us about the 160 or so vans the government bought for the Open Skies conference because it wanted to drag a bit of luggage from the airport. Why does he not tell us about that example of good government management? I can give him examples. Let us go back to the Costa Rica objection, that somehow the RCMP is not government. The last time I checked the public accounts of this country, the RCMP expenditures were part of the public accounts. I believe that is still the case, but the member know that already.

Mr. Hawkes: You can't find a government example.

Mr. Simmons: I have just given the member, soon to be minister, two examples already and there are many other examples, if he would like to have them.

Mr. Hawkes: Do you know what government does? The Minister asked if I know what government does, or does he mean do I know what this government does? It is hard to keep track of what this government does. It doubled the public debt, if the minister is looking for some examples of what the government did. It went from—

• (1520)

An hon. member: You did it.

Mr. Simmons: It's my debt, all of a sudden. You should make up your mind. If I wasn't there very long, I couldn't have driven up the debt as much as you say.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Simmons: You cannot have it both ways.

We had a good Liberal government in 1968, too. A good Liberal government in the period leading up to 1968 led by Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Speaker, you will know that I have all the time in the world. There is no clock on me at all. So, as long as members opposite want to get rid of their frustrations, I will indulge them. No problem at all. If I do not get finished today, I have tomorrow and the next day. This is a bill that requires adequate discussion and I intend to do exactly that.

The next issue is that the goods and services tax is fair and equitable. I shouldn't take him seriously. He obviously sat down this morning and said "What eight, ten or 12 things can I get up and say that will be most incongruous or unbelievable?" He talked about government management and all the great jobs the government is creating. They are all service jobs, as we know.

Now he comes to the question of the goods and services tax. He may believe that it is fair and equitable. That is not what small business is saying. That is not what the economists are saying. That is not what 80 per cent of Canadians are saying. They are saying the opposite, that it is the most regressive and unfair tax. Even if none of those were saying that, the member himself would know it is a regressive tax. He will know if one applies an across-the-board percentage at all income levels, it is de facto regressive because a larger portion of low incomes is devoted toward essentials such as housing, shelter, electricity, food, and so on, than would be the case with high incomes. The goods and services tax is a very regressive and unfair tax.

Nobody is arguing that we should keep the FST. What we are arguing is that the Minister of Finance should go back to his undertaking of 1984 in which he said that a new tax to replace the federal sales tax would be fair, equitable and revenue neutral. We know he has flunked on all three points. It is not fair, not equitable and, of course, it is a tax grab. It is taking in several billion dollars more than the manufacturers' sales tax, the so-called FST.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières should not read these scripts without reviewing them to see if he believes them because I am sure he does not believe some of the nonsense he said.

We come to the next profound wisdom he uttered. He said that the big bad Liberals on this side of the House offered no alternative to the goods and services tax. I like to be fair, and I think I quoted him very accurately. He said that, and he nods his head to the effect that he said it.

Mr. Waddell: You are going to adopt the tax.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: I say two things to my friend from the NDP. First of all, his leadership is over and if he must get involved, just lean down closer so your mike can pick you up.

Mr. Waddell: I said the Liberals are going to adopt the tax.

Mr. Simmons: The hon. member for Trois-Rivières said that the Liberals have no alternative to the goods and services tax. First, the role of an opposition is to point out what is less than perfect about the government's policies. On the goods and services tax, we have had no difficulty whatsoever finding some imperfections. If we had done no more than that, we would have served our role as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Being the thinkers we are, we went a step further. We knew those big, bad Tories are going to suggest, that we have no alternative. We went out and got a few alternatives. Let me outline them for the sake of debate?

First, we said that a consumption tax ought to be fair. We are not the only people who say that. The Minister of Finance said it back in 1984. He said that the first principle of a tax is that it ought to be fair. We stand by that. In government we will stand by that. The tax must be fair.

Second,the tax must be equitable. The Minister of Finance said that in 1984.

Third, the tax ought not to be a tax grab. The Minister of Finance said that in 1984 although he is now perpetrating a tax grab on the Canadians.

Fourth, the minister said and we say that the tax ought to be visible. When people buy something, they ought to know what portion of the cost is for the goods and what portion is for the tax.

These are the four principles that we intend to apply to a federal tax to replace the flawed manufacturers' sales tax. These are just principles, but they are important principles even though they do not say very clearly what kind of tax to implement.

What we are doing now in opposition is not unlike what the Tories did when they were in opposition. One tries various ideas, but one really does not know until one is in government and sees the books whether what one is proposing is completely plausible. Subject to finding out just how bad a situation this crowd leaves us, one of the many good suggestions that we have been promoting with a lot of support is the single tax.

My hon. friend from Broadview—Greenwood has done a lot of work on this. I tell the hon. gentleman from Trois—Rivières that we are getting a lot of support for that tax right from his own riding and throughout the province of Quebec. Indeed, the support for that tax has probably been most enthusiastic from the province of Quebec in terms of the mail that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is getting.

The hon. members opposite shout that that tax is regressive. I think I heard the Minister of State for Finance say that. I want to tell him that that is not what his good friend and my fellow Newfoundlander, Michael Walker who heads up the very conservative think tank at the Fraser Institute in Vancouver, says. He is very supportive of the tax. He says it would be a considerable improvement and light years ahead of the government's proposed goods and services tax.

Michael Walker is one of many hundreds of informed, prominent Canadians who come forward to support this single tax. If the government wants alternatives we could offer all kinds of credible alternatives to what the government is proposing in this goods and services tax.

Let us not forget that what we are debating this afternoon is Bill C–65, an act to provide some borrowing authority for the government so it can rush out and borrow another $25.5 billion to keep afloat for another year. I take the view that borrowing itself is not a sin as long as one borrows within his or her capacity to repay and also, if it is for a reasonable purpose.

These are basically the two yardsticks that prudent individuals apply to themselves when they go out to borrow. They borrow having in mind their ability to repay the indebtedness, and they borrow for a good purpose. In individual terms, it is often a house, a car or any justifiable expenditure. If those two criteria are applied to personal borrowing or government borrowing, there follow a number of questions as to the government's ability to repay or how that ability could be improved. I touched briefly on that point when speaking before Question Period, earlier today. I indicated that the government has within its power changing the interest rate policy of this country.

I happen to think what is going on now is unconscionable. It is unconscionable in terms of what it is doing to the deficit, a matter that is of tremendous concern to people opposite—although one would never know it when one sees what they are doing to the deficit by allowing interest rates to continue very high. It is unconscionable when one realizes that we are fully 5 or 5.5 percentage points above American interest rates. So, the argument of attracting foreign capital does not really apply here. We have already put ourselves in a position that is more than competitive in terms of competing with American loan institutions to attract capital.

It is absolutely unconscionable in what it is doing to family budgets across the country. People who are locked into house mortgages have absolutely no control. They have no say whatsoever when asked to pay that extra $50 to $100 a month over and above what they should be paying. The government has allowed the interest rate to become unconscionably high. People who have consumer loans for cars, for home improvements, for university education, and made those commitments of indebtedness in good faith at a time when interest rates were considerably lower, are now caught, not by any misdemeanour they have committed, but by the terrible insensitivity of the government.

These people all across the country are now paying through the nose, many hundreds of dollars more a month for many families, for their house mortgages, car loans, consumer loans of various kinds, university education loans. They are paying much more than they ought to be paying. If only the government would come up with a fairer and a more sensible interest rate policy or, more to the point, would allow interest rates to fall somewhat.

Of course the government's answer is that it is protecting consumers against themselves. My experience with consumers is that they have more skill and a better track record in protecting themselves well than does the government. Indeed, consumers today would be reasonably well off if they were not saddled with those extra expenditures on mortgages, car loans, and those other expenditures.

Also, when talking about a borrowing bill, one raises the second question that I raised a few moments ago: Are the purposes for which the loan is being made justifiable and reasonable? I am thinking of individual personal consumer borrowing. Once that question is applied to the realm of government, of course, the borrowing is for many, many purposes, but all of which come under the general umbrella of providing hopefully good government for the country.

One must take some particular examples and ask whether the government's expenditure in certain areas is justifiable. I gave a couple of frivolous examples just now to show it was not, but I would like to come to the other side of the question: Is the government, in its stated objective of bringing down the deficit, not cutting in the wrong places, and how can it justify that kind of cut in the light of its request to the House today for another $25.5 billion in borrowing? I think particularly of two examples, and there are many I could give.

Student aid in the country is in an absolutely terrible mess. It is in that kind of a mess because of the frustration which parents and students feel at the government for not having upgraded the criteria. These rules determine the amount of living allowance students can claim and the amount that parents are expected to contribute and they have not been changed since 1984. Not since the government took over has it changed the levels, despite the fact we have had some inflation and some increase in the cost of living over those six years. It is common knowledge that in 1990 one cannot buy a commodity for the same price it was six years before. Those people who are trying to get an education with very meagre means, in all parts of the country, are not able to access student aid.

What is student aid? Is it a government hand-out? No. It is a program drawn up by the former Liberal administration and, to its credit, continued by this administration—although a little more stingily, as I have said. It is a program that allows young men and women, who otherwise would not be able to go to university, to access some funding. It is not a government grant. We all know that. It is a loan advanced by the state to those individuals who are required contractually—they signed a contract—to pay back every cent of it with interest.

We are not advocating that there ought to be a Santa Claus approach, that all university education for all people who want it should be given out at no cost to them. Student aid, in effect, just defers the cost to them. It allows them to go to university while they are 17, 18 or 20 years of age and then, when they have some economic power and are employed, they can then pay back those amounts. That seems to me to be a very sensible approach.

That program, as good as it is, is being seriously undermined by the penny-wise, pound-foolish approach of the government. In nickeling and diming away at the deficit, the government sacrifices the university educations of thousands of Canadians from coast to coast.

I was in St. John's a few weeks ago and I attended that massive demonstration of students in post-secondary institutions in St. John's. Students who attend Memorial University of Newfoundland, the Cabot Institute and the Marine Institute came together, several thousand of them, to vent their feelings and to send a message about how the government is hurting them because of the freeze on student aid.

The problem could be cured with a stroke of the pen, but what a beneficial stroke it would be. It would send a signal to thousands of Canadians, young men and women, who are out there now with the knowledge that they are not able to get to university this fall because they cannot afford to go and, under the present rules, they cannot qualify for the necessary funding to go. With one stroke of the pen, the Minister of Finance or the delegated minister could solve this problem by just bringing the rules for student aid, the qualification criteria, up to 1990 standards.

So often in the House we are told, in effect, as I was a few minutes ago, that it is not enough to criticize, and asked: "How would you do it?" Well, I have just said to the minister, to the House and to the government, how we think it should be done. It is very simple. Be fair and apply 1990 guidelines to the student aid program, instead of allowing the 1984 guidelines to stay there. They are not only six years out of date, but are doing some real damage in terms of interfering with the capacity of thousands of Canadians to attend post-secondary education this fall.

I raised that issue as an example of how government spending rules can impact unfavourably or, to put it more bluntly, can hurt ordinary Canadians. There are many other examples.

We know the example of the women's funding issue. The government finally relented on that and agreed to extend the funding for another year. I am delighted to see that my friend, the minister responsible for the status of women is here. I want to say to her that, while the extension of funding took the heat off for the short term, she will owe it to women across Canada, and the cause they stand for, to go to bat to have that funding continued on a permanent basis.

In my riding there are two women's centres, one at Stephenville and one at Port aux Basques. As the minister will know, they have earned a reputation over the years of being among the better women's centres in Canada. I have seen some of the work that they do in terms of coming to the aid of people who are victims of family violence. I could cite some specific examples of the good work that those women and their organizations have done in those two communities.

I like to think that perhaps one of the reasons that the funding was cut in the first place was that there was not a sufficiently good understanding of the work that was being done by some of those centres. If that is the case, insofar as the two centres I have mentioned are concerned, I am prepared to document for the government some of the examples of what is being done. Members of the House would be encouraged that tax money is being so well spent.

Under the aegis of the debate on this bill, I wish to address the whole issue of regional development, a subject I am sure my friends from rural Quebec would love to hear about. In fact, I would like to hear them talk about the issue because they will know that the policies of this government have devastated the capacity of rural Canada to survive, whether talking about the closing of rural post offices; the closing of rail lines in Newfoundland a year or so ago and now here on the mainland Canada; women's funding, which I mentioned has temporarily got a reprieve so we will not beat that one to death right now in terms of an example; or the cut-backs in ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency funding.

In many ways the government's record on regional development poses the question: Why should we be voting for this government to borrow more money when it is not spending very well the last borrowings we gave it in the House a year or so ago?

Also, I want to comment on the fisheries aid package that was announced the other day. I wish the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was here. I understand he is away on business and I am not criticizing him for that, but I do wish he were within the hearing of my voice at this time. I wanted to say to him, as I have said to him privately, that I believe the fish aid package will go some way to addressing some of the problems and easing some of the pain. I have no hesitation in saying that publicly, and I have already said it to him privately.

There are a couple of key issues that it does not address and he acknowledges at least one of these. Let me deal with that one first. It does not address the issue of the inshore fishermen, the so-called fixed gear fishermen. The Minister for International Trade in his response during Question Period earlier today essentially acknowledged this matter as well.

I want to again use the Newfoundland example, although I am sure that colleagues from other provinces could use ones with which they are familiar. Part of my riding on the southwest coast includes a number of communities that depend exclusively on what we call the fixed gear fishery, or the hook and line fishery. I am thinking of communities such as Grand Bruit, La Poile, Petites, Rose Blanche, Isle aux Morts, Burnt Islands, Fox Roost, Margaree, Port aux Basques, and Codroy.

Mr. Edwards: Channel?

Mr. Simmons: The member for Edmonton Southwest is right. There used to be a—

Mr. DeBlois: How do you explain only 200 people?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that hon. members would allow the member to finish his speech. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's has the floor.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Montmorency—Orléans for his question. It does not relate to fish. I could be unkind and suggest that he does not want me to talk about fish, but I do not think that was the burden of his question. The question was, how do I explain the number of people who showed up on the Hill for the GST protest on the weekend?

Well, I was not among them, not because I am for the GST, but I happened to be in my riding. I am sure that would apply to a number of other people. However, I am sure he is aware that this past weekend we celebrated one of the most marvellous institutions that we have in this country, called Mother's Day. He will understand that the organizers made a mistake on the weekend, they set up an absolutely impossible and terrible choice, asking the people to choose between their mothers and the future of their country. It is a very hard choice. Many people who were out kissing mom, sending her notes, or taking her to dinner were nevertheless realizing that next year or the year after when they take her out, it is going to be even more expensive because they are going to have a 7 per cent goods and services tax.

I was talking about the fisheries aid package. The fishermen in those communities who use the fixed gear equipment were not helped at all. There was not one red cent for them. That is not a new statement. The minister is aware of that, and the Minister for International Trade acknowledged as much today.

If I heard the minister of trade's answer correctly, I understand that at the end of the season, the government will look at the situation and see what kinds of incomes those people have had. I have news for the minister of trade. It is the end of the season. He is from Newfoundland and he should know that the so-called winter fishery on that coast runs from the first of January to the end of March. Also he should know that it is well beyond the end of March and that I have been giving him the figures both by letter and in this House. I will give them one more time. I will pick one of the communities that I mentioned a few moments ago, the community of Rose Blanche. In that community, there are 147 licensed inshore fishermen. Three years ago, during the winter fishery, the period January 1 to March 31, those 147 fishermen landed four million pounds of fish. In the same period this year, those 147 fishermen, given one or two who may have died or retired, landed not four million pounds as they did three years ago, but fewer than 200 pounds; they landed no fish at all. The fish just are not there. The season is over.

If the Minister for International Trade is saying today that they are going to wait until the end of the season, I say to him that they have already waited a month or so too long, because the season ended at the end of March. I will be following up with him as a result of his answer to my colleague from Beauséjour earlier today on that particular issue.

If I may return to the fisheries aid package, there are two points I want to make. The first one I have just dealt with. A whole group of people, many thousands of fish plant workers as well as fishermen are affected because of the domino effect. If the landings are down from four million pounds to nothing in a particular community, then there are no fish to be cut and no work in the plant for those several hundred workers of that plant and also for the many other plants along that coast.

Literally thousands of inshore fishermen and thousands of inshore fish plant workers really do not know today, as we sit here, where the next dollar is coming from. We are not talking about getting enough income to get UI stamps to qualify for unemployment insurance. We are talking about enough income to put bread on the table today. They are not reaping enough from their fishing efforts to pay for gasoline and the expenses of the boat, let alone to put bread and butter on the table. There are in very desperate straits. They have a need that this government ought to address right now.

This disaster has happened through no fault of those people. They did not do anything. They did not stay in bed because they were lazy. They did not refuse to buy bait. They did all the things that they were supposed to do. They baited their gear the night before, put it in the baited trawl unit, went home and snatched four or five hours sleep, got up at 2.30 or three o'clock in the morning, put the tubs of gear and fuel aboard the boat, put their lunch aboard the boat, and sailed sometimes for as long as two or three hours to the fishing ground. They did that in the months of January and February, in the worst kinds of weather. So do not let anybody suggest that we have a lazy group of people on our hands. That hardly sounds like laziness to me.

The work ethic I have described is not exclusive to Newfoundland. I see other members in this Chamber who represent other fishing constituencies. I understand that the work ethic is no less honoured by its practice in those constituencies than it is on the southwest coast of Newfoundland. That is the way it should be.

The point I wanted to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, is that those people, through no fault of their own, despite their best efforts day in and day out, six days a week, every day except Sunday, have come up empty. They do not have enough money to put bread and butter on the table as a result of their efforts day in and day out. That is the first issue that the fish aid package does not address.

Another issue has to do with the money that is being paid to those communities whose fish plants are under the gun. I am thinking of communities like Gaultois and Grand Bank in my riding, Trepassey in the riding of the gentleman from St. John's West, also St. John's, or as we call it back home, the South Side Hills, the south side plant. These are four plants that are affected.

Other plants that are seasonal operations are affected. The Burgeo plant in my riding, which used to be a 12 month plant, has been cut back now to a six month plant. The workers are uncertain, because there is a rumour that the company is talking about selling that plant. That might be a blessing in disguise, but we will not know that until we get more information. That is an important issue but another issue.

I want to come to the question of Gaultois, Grand Bank, and Trepassey and the south side St. John's plant. If you read the actual print, the fish aid package states that money is being put in to assist those communities. I have no doubt that there are ways that those several millions of dollars, in the case of each of the communities, can be expended to be of some help to the communities.

What I put to the minister today during Question Period, and what I hope he will take up, is the suggestion that the funding made available for the community adjustment program ought to be applied to trigger Clause 5 of the FPI, the Fishery Products International privatization agreement.

In the agreement between the Government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland and Fishery Products International at the time that FPI moved from government hands to become a private enterprise, that clause provides that if at some time the company decides that it wants to close one or more plants, the Government of Canada and/or the Government of Newfoundland can keep those plants open by providing the incremental funding.

Nobody is suggesting that government ought to fund that ad nauseam forever and ever. However, if we do the things that Dr. Harris and his panel recommend, and if we get control of the foreign overfishing issue, we are told the stocks are going to rebound in five or six years. That is a different issue, but if we believe the government's assurances, in a matter of time that will be taken in hand. I have a strong view on that, but I am trying not to get sidetracked from the point that I want to make.

If we believe the government's agenda on foreign overfishing and believe the scientists and Dr. Harris and what they say about rebuilding the stock, we have to conclude that four or five years down the road we are going to have a fairly healthy northern cod stock and a fairly healthy stock in 3PS, that area between St. Pierre and Miquelon and the south coast of Newfoundland, the Burin peninsula and Fortune Bay of Newfoundland.

If that is the case, here are my questions. If we are going to be back in five years to where we were three or four years ago, where we had enough fish to keep all the fish plants going, why are we dismantling what is clearly today's excess capacity? Why are we encouraging skilled labour who know how to process this fish to go on to other occupations, and in many cases move out of the community because that is what going to other occupations means in most cases? Why are we dismantling the plant facilities and getting rid of the skilled labour to process those fish, if we are going to need both four or five years from now?

Is it not a much more sensible proposition to keep that capacity and those skills, even if it requires some government dollars in the interim three or four years? Again, I am not asking for the government to find some more money. I am saying to it, why not apply some of the money put aside under the fisheries aid package to address that particular situation, to keep the plants open at Trepassey, Gaultois, Grand Bank, and in St. John's south side?

There are so many issues that come to mind when debating the borrowing bill. I wanted to talk about the government's cut-back in social housing and the devastation those cut-backs are creating. I wanted to talk about the fact that the government is bringing us very close to the brink of a recession, but I am sure other colleagues in this debate will pick up on those issues. There is a great need for social housing in this country and this is not the time to cut back on it.

• (1600)

I am sure others in the debate will want to pick up on that theme. Over the last hour and a half or so, I have had an opportunity to give you some of my views on the issue. Thank you for your indulgence, Sir.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is quite an experience to follow a speech of that duration and scope.

Certainly I will not try to deal with the vast range of issues in which the previous speaker indulged himself. However, I would have to say that I find myself in a somewhat unusual position. In a certain respect, I agree with what both Conservative and Liberal spokespersons have said in this debate so far.

In other words, I agree with what the Liberals have said about the Conservatives, and I agree with what the Conservatives have said about the Liberals. When we are talking about borrowing $25 billion with the fiscal and monetary mess that this country is in, if we are looking at this question honestly, I think they are each probably equally culpable. We have seen the same kind of tax policies and high interest rate policies in response to inflation from both Liberal and Conservative governments.

Certainly, when we look at this borrowing bill and the amount of money that it represents, we have to be honest about the kind of deficit that this country faces. The kind of interest payments that it takes to maintain the borrowing on that deficit is something that we cannot live with forever. The question is: Who is going to pay down that deficit? Who is going to bear the brunt? In other words, on whom will the pain fall?

I contend that the pain right now and under the policies that have been followed by successive Liberal and Conservative governments has fallen by far the most heavily on low and middle-income Canadians in the outlying regions of the country, in northern Canada, the prairies and the maritimes. The less wealthy regions of the country have borne much more than their share of the burden of reducing the deficit.

In my own province of Saskatchewan, we are in the middle of what might well be considered not only an economic calamity but one that is threatening the whole future of that province. It is a social calamity, a political calamity, a calamity of confidence in hope of the very future of the province. In 1987 we saw 361 business bankruptcies in Saskatchewan. In 1988 we saw 453 bankruptcies. In 1989 we saw 556 small business bankruptcies, the people who create the jobs in that province.

What are these people getting out of the fiscal and monetary policies of this government? They are getting higher interest rates which increase their costs of inventory, the cost of borrowing for any expansion they might want to do in the face of what is already a poor economy, and they are getting the goods and services tax.

I do not think anybody, even on the government side, argues that, in its initial phases and far down the road, the goods and services tax is going to be a disaster to the small business community. It is the centrepiece of this government's fiscal and economic policies.

Farmers in Saskatchewan are in a situation where there is a very good possibility that there will not be any net income for those farm families at all in the coming year. They will not have a single dollar to spend after the expenses have been paid, much like what has been described by the previous member in respect of fishermen in the maritimes. The expenses of farming will eat up every dollar of income that those farmers will get.

I did some checking in my own region, and the Prince Albert Farm Credit Corporation office reports that of its 2,900 accounts, 916 or 33 per cent are in arrears. That means that one third of the farmers cannot pay their bills. Certainly, low prices and other factors have been a contributing cause to that fact, but the high interest rates that have been paid over the last 10 years or so have also been a contributing factor.

It is very discouraging to the young people in that province who started farming in the last 15 years when they see real incomes and the prices of their products decline. At the same time, they see interest rates rise. Thirty per cent of the farmers right across the province are in that kind of situation. Those farmers are asking me: "Where is the money that has been promised by this government? When is it going to get there? Where is it going to come from?" This government has got itself into such a fiscal and economic mess that it cannot afford to pay any more.

Four months ago, the Minister of Agriculture said yes, there would be money to assist the prairie farmers fight the international grain wars and other problems that they were facing. Six weeks ago there was an announcement that there was $500 million available and that the minister would be negotiating with the provinces in an attempt to up the ante on that. In fact at that time, he was demanding one-to-one dollars with those provincial treasuries.

That is a ridiculous proposition. The very provincial economies and provincial budgets that are being asked to share this money are the ones that are being negatively impacted. How can a treasury, such as the treasury of Saskatchewan, match a one-to-one dollar when its very tax revenues are dropping like a stone because of the crisis that it faces?

In Canada, the situation we are then left with is that our national government is the only government in the world that is asking its local level governments, in other words its state or provincial governments, to pick up the burden of fighting the international subsidy war which is driving prices down. The European Common Market, the United States and all our competitors are doing it at the national level.

The national governments are taking responsibility, as they should, for matters of international trade and for making sure that the bank accounts of individual farm families are not the ones competing in international grain wars with the treasuries of the European Common Market and the United States.

We have the total absurdity in the province of Saskatchewan where 23,000 people were forced to leave the province in the last year. They were faced with fiscal and economic policies that were designed to fight inflation in a few metropolitan areas such as Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. In our own province, and in many rural areas of Canada it is the people there who are fighting dis-inflation, de-inflation.

The net value of farms, homes and businesses is falling. There is no inflation at all. There is de-inflation. That is what people need to fight in those regions of the country, and the government's fiscal and economic policy takes no account of that.

The problem we got ourselves into stems from a fundamental change in the government's public, fiscal and monetary policy that occurred about 20 years ago. I think it can be honestly argued that both Liberal and Conservative governments have been equally culpable in making this massive shift in fiscal and economic policy.

The hon. member says that an NDP government would have also been responsible for making this shift in policy, if it had ever been elected.

I would like to remind the hon. member that the New Democratic Party governed my home province of Saskatchewan for 11 years, 1971 to 1982. During that period, through good times and bad times, that party managed to run a surplus budget in every budget year and managed to provide the citizens of Saskatchewan with some of the best programs seen anywhere in the country. There was great innovation in a wide variety of programs. At the same time, they managed to balance their books. I think that is an example of what you can do if you not only pay attention to where you are spending money but also to where you are collecting it.

• (1610)

The shift from the corporate sector, the share that the wealthy in this country pay, to the individual taxpayers is very clearly laid out in the following figures. In 1950 the proportion of taxes paid by the corporate and individual sectors were roughly equal. By 1988, individual Canadian's proportion had risen from 35 per cent of revenue to 47 per cent. Corporate tax revenue has gone down to 12 per cent from 40 per cent in 1950. In 1988 terms, if the corporate sector contribution matched that of Canadian families, we would have a surplus of $18.5 billion instead of a $30 billion deficit. That would certainly cast a much different fiscal and monetary light on the situation that we are in today. We would be able to afford the programs for farmers, women, children, fishermen and regional development which the government argues it is not possible to fund.

As well as raising income tax, this government has raised sales and excise tax revenue from $14.1 billion in 1984–85 to $28.8 billion in 1989–90. That is before the GST, which will only compound the problem. With the theory that you need high interest rates to fight inflation and with the government admitting that the GST is going to cause even more inflation, we are going to get into another vicious circle of more inflation from the GST, causing higher interest rates. It is no wonder that not only economic forecasters but individual Canadians are seeing the economy of this country in ever more gloomy terms.

A second point needs to be made about the GST in the context of the fiscal and monetary policy of the government. It has a very insidious effect on the general thrust of government policy. This is due to the role of government traditionally being seen as having something of a redistributive responsibility to make sure its fiscal and economic policies raised the income of all Canadians. The idea was to have a wider tax pool to draw from so that more people had more income in order that the government could raise more revenue. That is only an effective kind of fiscal and monetary policy if in fact taxes are based on net incomes.

With taxes based on consumption, that kind of economic theory no longer applies because all the government needs to do is tighten the screws further on individual taxpayers with very little regard for their ability to pay. The balance that an individual has left to spend as disposable income, with what the government draws in taxes, is very little. Therefore, there will be very little difference with what the government collects under a consumption tax like the GST.

We see the hypocrisy that Canadians are confronted with when they are being lectured that they are not supposed to try and catch up with the inflationary effects of government policies such as the GST and high interest rates. There is the looming threat of wage and price controls and other kinds of Draconian mechanisms. At the same time we see the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the architect of this policy, raising his own wages and those of his senior officials by 35 per cent. We see executives having their salaries raised by 18 per cent and this government taking no countermeasures. This is not on salaries that ordinary Canadians receive, but salaries in the $250,000 to $400,000 a year range.

I would like to speak in more detail about the effect of high interest rates and some of the commentary around this high interest rate policy. In appearing before Commons committees, the Governor of the Bank of Canada has said that the high interest rate policies are not working. Yet he maintains that. We have heard western premiers say that the high interest rate policies are a disaster for that whole region of the country, yet we see the policy maintained.

A year ago when interest rates were much lower we saw the finance committee of the House of Commons, with representatives of all parties, table a report stating that high interest rate policies were leading us to economic disaster and a possible recession.

We have seen an interest rate policy which now has us with interest rates 5 per cent higher than rates in the United States, as opposed to the historic 2 per cent. What does this mean? It means that any perceived or potential benefit from the free trade agreement in terms of reduced tariffs has been more than wiped out by the high Canadian dollar.

We have an interest rate policy that is crippling our exports. Through its direct effects it is crippling anything positive there might have been from the free trade agreement. In fact this entire high interest rate and high dollar policy is contradicting everything this government has said about the necessity of replacing the manufacturers' sales tax with the GST. The argument has been that this is to make our exports and exporters more competitive. At the same time the government is raising interest rates and pursuing a high dollar, which is make them much less competitive.

In fact this indicates that we have become much too dependent on hot money, on capital that will move at the slightest fluctuation in interest rates and rely far too little on internal mechanisms to generate capital, employee controlled investments, our own pension funds, co-operatives, community development based initiatives, and different kinds of locally based investments that would in fact be possible if Canadians were left with their own money to spend.

I would also like to mention briefly the effect of the high interest rate policies on home owners. The Homebuilders Association has said that whereas two years ago 475,000 Canadians were able to afford new homes, now only 270,000 Canadians are able to afford new homes. In other words, the number of Canadians able to afford new homes has been cut in half in just two years. Less than 12 per cent of people under the age of 45 years can afford to buy the average priced home in this country. In our own province of Saskatchewan the situation has become so ridiculous in fact that there are only 82 new home starts in the first months of this year.

I would like to conclude by saying that the fiscal monetary policy represented by this borrowing bill is a disaster for the country as a whole and a disaster for individuals coast to coast. The deficit has become an excuse to pursue a monetarist, Thatcher-like agenda of cuts to ordinary Canadians, cuts where they hurt the most, and massive tax benefits and breaks to wealthy Canadians. It does not have to be this way. There are alternatives.

A 3 per cent cut in the interest rate would yield $4.8 billion. Tax measures that would equalize the amount of tax paid and bring in a fair tax system would yield another $12 million to $13 million. The vast part of the deficit that we currently see could be eliminated by very common sense measures. That would allow us to invest in the kind of things like a decent education system for our children, the infrastructure of this country, the environment, and regional equality.

However to do that we need a mixed economy. We cannot rely only on one sector. We cannot leave decisions and the ability to make investments in the hands of one sector. The government, the private sector, and the community sector all have to work together to get this fiscal and economic mess we are in under control and to get Canada moving again.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief comments with regard to Bill C-65 and the Borrowing Authority Act, which would permit the government to borrow up to $25.5 billion to meet its fiscal requirements.

• (1620)

I want to draw the attention of the House to an article which appeared a few weeks ago in the Ottawa Sun entitled "Bankrupt". It is quite an article. It states:

> Argentina, once one of the world's richest nations, is broke. The treasury is empty, inflation is raging at over 7,000 per cent per annum and unemployment has reached 25 per cent.
> Argentina is self-sufficient in oil and one of the world's leading exporters of meat, grain and produce.

I think that indicates what Canada is all about. It is quite interesting. The article continues:

> Back in 1945, Argentina was still rich from exporting food to a warring world.
>
> An army general named Juan Peron seized power with the backing of the nation's labour unions. Peron's strategy was simple.
>
> Promise workers ever-increasing salaries, subsidized food and housing, health care and all sorts of other benefits.
>
> The government would employ anyone needing a job.

Over the last number of weeks and years that I have been in this House, there have been indications by some parties that this is what they would like to do.

Bankruptcy does not happen overnight. It takes a number of years. You can see where Argentina, a country that was once self-sufficient and proud, is sitting today compared to where it was in 1945. Today, it is dealing with an annual inflation rate of 7,000 per cent and an unemployment rate of 25 per cent. It certainly makes Canadians realize how important it is to address the concerns of the deficit of this country.

The government recognizes the seriousness of the large growing public debt. Since 1984 the government has taken action to bring the debt problem under control.

We have some new members in the House elected in the 1988 election. They should be made aware of the climb in spending from $12.3 billion in 1968 to $109.2 billion in 1984. That is an average of 14.6 per cent per year. The deficit of the federal government climbed from $400 million in 1968 to $38.3 billion in 1984. That is a 96 per cent increase. The national debt climbed from $18.1 billion to $199.1 billion, an increase of 1,000 per cent.

It is interesting to watch Question Period time in and time out. I had the opportunity to be a member of the opposition between 1982 and 1984. You would almost think that on September 5, 1984 that this debt was something like a mushroom. All of a sudden, those who had been in power for 17 years or so had were not willing to tell Canadians at that time that there was this type of debt.

We also hear claims about government financial structuring being in dark economic times. I think it would be worth while to put on the record and refer back, if we are talking about dark economic times, to figures indicating that unemployment climbed by more than a million, from 358,000 in 1968 to 1,384,000 by 1984. The unemployment rate climbed from 4.5 per cent to 11.2 per cent. Turning to inflation, items that cost $1 in 1968 cost $3.22 in 1984, an increase of 222 per cent. We have been hearing a lot about interest rates in the last number of weeks, that they have sky-rocketed and out of control. However the Leader of the Opposition never refers back to 1981 when the Bank of Canada rate climbed to 21.24 per cent, the chartered bank prime climbed to 22.75 per cent, and a five-year mortgage to 21.75 per cent. We never hear these figures.

It seems that every time we try to indicate to Canadians that there is a very serious problem, there are still people who would like to say that the problem only started in 1984. Really, the problem that we are dealing with is the mismanagement of the economy prior to 1984. That is the problem with which we are faced. It would be interesting had we had the opportunity to come in here in 1984 with a zero deficit and had been able to move forward with all the programs that we would have liked to.

There is one other area I want to make comparison to. It indicates the way that the policies of this government are working correctly. I want to review the employment and the unemployment statistics for northern Ontario. This is only up to December 1989, but it gives a reference in this regard. In 1984 the rate in north eastern Ontario was 14.9 per cent and the annual at the end of 1989 it was 8.1 per cent. This is a change of minus 6.8 per cent. In north western Ontario in 1984 the unemployment rate was 9.7 per cent and the annual in 1989 was 5.9 per cent. That is a minus 3.8 per cent. The total unemployment in northern Ontario was 13.6 per cent in 1984. The annual average in 1989 was 7.5 per cent. That is a difference of 6.1 per cent.

For those individuals who want to say that this government has not been able to control or look after the future of this country, I think those figures indicate that the policies put forward by this government are the correct policies.

I would like to add a little good news, because we continue to hear day in and day out about the negative stuff. They say that the country is headed down the shooter and that since 1984 this government has done everything wrong. It is funny that we keep coming up with figures such as 1,604,000 jobs have been created since September 1984 and 966,000 jobs have been created for women. The national unemployment rate has fallen from 11.6 per cent to 7.7 per cent. The youth rate has fallen from 18.2 per cent to 11.9 per cent. Business investments in new machinery and equipment has climbed by 103 per cent since the 1984 election, and 215,000 new homes have been built in 1989 compared to 135,000 in 1984. The number of Canadians living below the poverty line has fallen by 757,000 since 1984, including 259,000 fewer children and 229,000 fewer adults.

It is very interesting to hear all the negative information that is given, but the reality is that this government is moving forward in a lot of ways to ensure that there is a stable future in this country.

Let us look over what the federal government has done in the province of Ontario to ensure stability there. I would just like to look at a few of areas. Again, we never hear about the good things that are going on. I think it is only right when talking about a borrowing bill and fiscal management that we look at the way in which the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have done such a superb job in ensuring that the enhancement and opportunities for all Canadians are there.

We can look at the agricultural side with the federal government participating with a $30 million tobacco assistance program or at the establishment of a bank for surplus maple syrup, which helps a lot of eastern Ontarians. I know my colleagues from the province of Quebec would certainly applaud this type of program. The federal government provided $6.5 million for renovating the veterinarian college in Guelph. The list is so long that I just do not have the time to continue.

However I just want to go to a few other areas. I noticed earlier that a colleague from the NDP was mentioning housing. An agreement in clearing the way to construct 6,700 non-profit housing units in Ontario has been signed by the federal and provincial ministers of housing. I should congratulate our Minister of State for Housing. He is doing a superb job, not only in Ontario but across this country. Earlier this month I had the opportunity to participate in a sod turning ceremony in New Liskeard.

In March 1989 in Ottawa, Ontario a working agreement to fund literacy initiatives in the province was developed. Funding arrangements were announced in June 1989. These projects are part of a $110 million federal literacy strategy announced in September 1988.

I would like to break it down into parts where I think it is so important. We talk and hear about the ongoing process of regional development over the next five years. This government has recognized how important regional development is. In recognizing this we have put $225 million to be spent in regional development in Ontario. Part of that is $100 million of expenditures under IRAP, or the older DREE programs.

I would like to touch on the area of northern Ontario because I want to applaud the Prime Minister, the minister of industry, the government House leader and the finance minister for really looking at this area with initiatives that can help. I would like to talk about FedNor and the way that we have been able to develop a program that has given the opportunity for investment in northern Ontario.

It also has given an opportunity for a board to be set up with a system of offices, whether we are looking at Thunder Bay, Sault Ste. Marie or Sudbury, where officers are working directly with everyone in northern Ontario. We are looking at a program that has $55 million of new money available. In fact, we have topped it up with another $14 million in the budget this year. On the night of the budget, it was interesting to hear members of the opposition crying that FedNor was dead. Instead, this government recognized regions of the country, like northern Ontario, and increased the budget by $14 million.

With money such as that we have been able to do projects, whether it is the Sudbury Nuetrino Centre, which is world class, whether it is a new plumbing fixtures company in North Bay or whether it is money toward the winter Nordic games in Thunder Bay.

We are going through some very difficult times in my area. It is one of the unfortunate facts when you live on resources. When you have been involved in forestry or mining for a number of years, as a mine opens you know it is one last day before it is going to close. We have gone through some difficult times both in the iron ore and the gold and silver sector. With a combination of five cabinet ministers, the Prime Minister and a striking committee, we have been able to resolve some of the difficulties and change some of the problems we are facing.

The other part of the FedNor program is to ensure that tourism, loan guarantees or the opportunity to establish co-operation between both provincial and federal departments does indeed take place.

The PC government income tax reform proposals means a fairer system with lower rates which will benefit all Ontarians. Earlier, we heard about tax and tax reform but we never heard the good part. It is that 300,000 Ontario residents will no longer pay federal income tax. Almost 4.5 million have seen their taxes cut. Small business tax rates have been cut and a full $500,000 capital gains exemptions for small business began in 1988.

Agriculture continues to enjoy one of the lowest tax rates of any sector with the lifetime capital gains exemption for farmers remaining at $500,000.

Ontario's economic output is estimated to increase by 1.1 per cent after the 13.5 per cent manufacturing sales tax is replaced with the 7 per cent GST. As someone who was involved in business for 18 years prior to being elected, I can say how confusing this tax system is.

We are competing in an international market-place. We are competing where products come in from outside the country. We are also competing with products that are built here in the country. We must ensure the opportunity for fairness, for the manufacturers to be successful not only in this country but to be able to compete on an international basis.

Another problem we faced was dealing with companies with tax licence numbers, whether they were sawmills or mines, at the end of the year. The auditors might suggest that the company can claim this case of paper towels because it is used on the production line. Revenue would end up getting a whole raft of invoices from individual companies stating "We believe that this should be clarified and be part of tax exemption". So, Revenue Canada, an accounting company and the individual company would have to try and resolve these problems. The new tax system will be easier and fairer for all Canadians. As we all know, no one likes to pay tax.

We are dealing with the same arguments we heard about the free trade agreement. Individuals are using scare tactics in order to enforce their political beliefs on individuals. They will know better once this tax system is in place and individuals earning under $30,000 a year get their first cheque on or about December 15. They will realize it is a Christmas gift.

I was at home on the weekend and a constituent told me that after having the opportunity to read and understand the process, while he does not like to pay the tax but now can understand what we are dealing with.

The Economic Council of Canada stated that the free trade agreement will lead to the creation of 95,000 new jobs in Ontario. I know the opposition has a job to do , but the fact is that the stability of the country is a result of the actions of the government. As a result of these expenditure actions revenue measures, the deficit in 1989-90 has declined by almost $8 billion from that of 1984-85 when it peaked at $38.3 billion. This represents a reduction of 45 per cent in the deficit-to-GDP ratio.

The growth of the debt has slowed dramatically and is now roughly in line with the growth of the economy's output of goods and services. Behind these improvements in the government's deficit there are even more significant changes in the ongoing structure of government spending and revenue.

The government now has a $9 billion operating surplus. The cost of government programs is more than completely financed by ongoing government revenues.

With the annual deficit of $30 billion, debt interest costs increase $3 billion each year just to service the annual build-up in debt. This means that the operating surplus has to improve by $3 billion each year just to keep the over-all deficit from rising. The problem is compounded by the vulnerability of the government's fiscal situation to increases in interest rates.

This exposure to interest rate developments was dramatically illustrated in late 1988 and through 1989. With the economy at capacity and inflation pressures mounting, higher than anticipated interest rates added about $6.5 billion to public debt charges in 1989-90 relative to the fiscal framework projected in the February, 1988 budget.

In response, the April, 1989 budget introduced substantial expenditure reductions and revenue measures. With the actions in this budget, the government was able to set out a fiscal framework designed to deal with Canada's fiscal problems.

Since the April, 1989 budget, inflation pressures have proved to be more strongly entrenched than expected. This has resulted in interest rates remaining higher than expected. Further fiscal action has been necessary to hold the fiscal framework set out in the April, 1989 budget.

When we talk about that, we should mention the fact that there was a budget just brought down in the province of Ontario. It is quite interesting to read that the real growth is projected at 1.7 per cent but the planned spending increase is at 6.8 per cent. This indicates to me one of the greatest problems we are facing. We are trying our utmost to ensure that we have stability in this country and we are trying to do our utmost to ensure that we have a steady economy going. However, how can we do it when the province of Ontario will not try to curtail its increased spending but only ensure that we are going to have more pressure put onto our dollar, causing higher interest rates.

• (1640)

Mr. Speaker, I know that you are giving me a signal that my time is coming to an end. Our actions in the February 1990 budget, together with measures announced by the President of the Treasury Board in December, reinforce the momentum of earlier measures. These ensure that the goals of the April 1989 budget will be reached.

In closing, I want to say that I think that this government and this finance minister should be applauded for the manner in which we are managing the economy and ensuring the future of our children and our grandchildren. I hope that we can look at quick passage of this supplementary money.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate today, on third reading of the government's borrowing bill, because it gives an opportunity to review the really disgraceful financial performance of this government, that we have been witnessing in this House, for me only since November of 1988 but for other members on this side it has been since 1984. The disastrous consequences of those policies are coming home to roost on Canadians, as they are faced with massive tax increases, in addition to the numerous tax increases they have already had under this particular government of incompetence.

I wanted to start by referring to the speech just made by my hon. friend who spoke about the increase in the Ontario budget. Ontario has a Liberal government and I am sure that fact is not lost on hon. members opposite. It certainly is not lost on the general public in Ontario because I think they realize with that government the difference between competence and incompetence.

Here, in Ontario, they have a government which is able to balance the budget. It inherited a very substantial deficit from its Conservative predecessor government and it has managed to bring that deficit completely under control. It managed to have a surplus last year on its accounts and this year it has budgeted for yet another surplus, in spite of the fact that a $490-million cut in its transfer payments to that province has been announced in the Minister of Finance's budget. In addition, a $1.2 billion cut in transfer payments has been applied to that province since the current Minister of Finance became that minister in 1984. In other words, the province of Ontario has suffered greatly at the hands of federal government in terms of the funds that were made available to it. In spite of that, it has managed to arrange for a balance in its budget.

It was interesting to listen to the hon. member bleating on with his figures trying to blame every shortcoming of the present government on previous Liberal governments, doing his best, to make it appear that all the blame could be laid there, which even the Minister of State for Finance knows is nonsense.

He neglected to talk about the Ontario civil service because he knows that the province of Ontario is one of the best managed in Canada. I would not want to draw any unfair comparisons with other Liberal provincial governments in this country, and there are some very, very good ones, but the one in Ontario is, I submit, an outstanding example of fiscal prudence and responsibility.

What we need to do is look at the figures for the civil service in Ontario. This government has made a great trumpeting cry about how oversized the civil service was and has announced that it has cut 12,000 jobs, I believe, from the civil service since 1984. Anyone who has any familiarity with the way the civil service works knows that all the government has done is cut the jobs and farmed the work out on contract to their fat-cat Conservative friends. That has been going on now for five years and it continues. One can look at the figures provided on the number of civil servants per person in the population. Ontario, which administers such extensive programs as health care, education, and maintenance of highways in the province, has a civil service of 83,300 people. Ontario's population is 9,598,000, so that there is a ratio of 115.2 people for every civil servant in the province of Ontario.

Compare that with the government of Canada which, after all, does not bear such heavy responsibility for such intensive programs in any part of Canada, except possibly in the Territories. It has a civil service of 294,400. The population of Canada at 26,151,000 yields a ratio of population to civil servants of 88.8. With 88.8 as compared with 115.2, one gets some idea of why the federal government has difficulty curbing its expenditures and getting them under control.

There is something else that the hon. member who just spoke neglected to mention. He spoke about the great control the government had exercised on government expenditures. Let us take a look at revenues. In 1984–85, the year he said was such a dreadful year for Canadians, government revenues were $70,898,000,000. In 1988–89, the last full financial year, they were $103,981,000,000, an increase of some $32 billion over the five years of Tory mismanagement.

That is the kind of record we are supposed to be proud of. This is a record the government says is a great one. Well, I think it is a disgraceful record and I think most Canadians agree. If the government is so great, why does it not resign, put its record on the line, and go to the people to see what they think about the record.

That $103 billion, incidentally, was the revenue before the goods and services tax comes in. The government itself admits that the goods and services tax is going to be helpful in reducing the deficit which means it is going to produce more income than the current manufacturers' sales tax. Finally, that admission has been made. It is right in the document.

The government, through its incompetence, keeps raising taxes and spending more at an alarming rate. Spending has gone up by the same amount over the same period. Yet, the government says the reason for its inability to control expenditures and its requirement to raise taxes is all because of the previous government. Everything is blamed on the previous government. Every time we hear speeches from members on the other side, they harp back to the good old days of the Liberal government, telling us that if it was not for those profligate days everything would be coming up roses now.

Well, it was not the Liberal party in 1984 that promised to bring fiscal responsibility to Canada. It was not the Liberal party that said the deficit was going to be reduced to almost nothing within the first term of office of the government. It was the Conservative party that made those promises. It was the right hon. Prime Minister who made those promises. Of course, there is now a string of broken promises.

The Minister of State for Finance said—he did not use these words, of course—that the reason the government could not keep its promises is because of those bad old days. In fact, he knows that the reason for the problem now is the complete inability of the Minister of Finance to manage the affairs of the country and the government. The whole cabinet is party to those decisions. I submit they are all equally to blame and they are all equally incompetent.

Another criticism we hear from the other side is that never, ever, does the opposition make suggestions on how to bring about a balanced budget. The government somehow feels it is our responsibility, as elected members of the House but sitting in opposition to the government, to provide the government with all the answers. I do not think we need to do that and I will not go into all the answers. But I will suggest that the government itself pays for its advice on how to solve its financial problems and, having paid the money, it ignores the advice.

This year, the Economic Council of Canada prepared a very significant and detailed statement called "Legacies" in the form of their twenty-sixth annual review. The Council is the primary economic advisory board, if you like, to the government. It was designed and created in the 1960s over the objections, I may say, of the Conservative party of the time. It did not think it was such a hot idea and I urge the Minister of State for Finance to look at the speeches given on those occasions by the right hon. Mr. Diefenbaker, then Leader of the Opposition. He felt it was a bad idea. I do not know exactly why, but he was not much of an economics expert himself. In fact, the only government I can recall that has managed worse than this one in this century was the one headed by the right hon. John George Diefenbaker, and Canadians expressed their views on that government in the elections of 1962 and 1963.

• (1650)

The fact is the Economic Council of Canada published this review and it contained certain information for the government. How much did the advice contained in this report cost? Well, I do not pretend this is the only publication of the Economic Council, but I checked the Estimates for last year. The total estimated budget for the Economic Council was $9,515,000—roughly a $10-million exercise. There are 118 people shown on the list as person-years working at the Economic Council and they produced a report. They produce more than this; I do not belittle their efforts. In fact, I suggest that this report is probably pretty good. It certainly details the problem that the Minister of Finance whined and whimpered about for months, once the election campaign was over. That was the national debt.

So, it presented this report. It was available to the government. My recollection is that it was available before the Budget was handed down—I do not know the date it was tabled in the House, but my recollection is that it was available. It contained information that would have helped the Minister of Finance balance his budget had he really wanted to do so.

We know, of course, that this is all a lot of frilly talk and nonsense. The Minister of Finance has no more interest in balancing the budget than he had in 1984 when he made the promise to Canadians that he would do it. In the 1985 budget, he told us that the deficit this year would be less than $15 billion. We all know that, in fact, it is double that. He was just dead wrong. He was wrong is 1985, he was wrong in 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, and, I suggest, he is wrong in 1990.

Let us look at what the Economic Council of Canada suggested. In great detail, the council gave arguments that the Minister of Finance has used, stating that the national debt was a serious problem for Canada. Then it said:

> Within the realm of what is controllable, we consider the following possibility.

The Minister of State for Finance might want to listen to this because he may need this kind of advice. He may soon be replacing the Minister of Finance who has not been very successful.

> Suppose a two-year freeze (in nominal terms) were implemented in five areas of government spending, effective from 1 January 1990 to 31 December 1991. Normal expenditure growth would resume on 1 January 1992 in the affected spending categories. There would be no "catch-up"—i.e., the reduction in spending attributed to the freeze would not be recouped. Thus the level of government spending in the categories affected would shift downward. For the purpose of our analysis, we chose the following areas as those being affected by the freeze: capital assistance to business; subsidies to business; transfer payments to the provinces; the indexing factor for family allowances; and the hiring of federal public servants. (We assumed that the provinces would respond to the cut in revenues by raising provincial personal income taxes.)

Now, I note that the Minister of Finance took this advice in part and, of course, you can guess which part he took. He took the part that put the freeze on the payments to the provinces. He decided to put the squeeze on them instead of putting any squeeze on his caucus colleagues who are the big time spenders in the big time league here. Later, I will provide some examples of their profligacy, but I will leave that for a few moments to finish this point.

The Economic Council also said:

> If such a freeze were implemented, the reduction in government spending from the base-case level would be $4.6 billion in 1992. A revenue loss of $1.6 billion would also occur, however, as the immediate effect of the freeze would be to lower the level of economic activity.
>
> By the end of 1992, therefore, the improvement in the government deficit would be about $3 billion. By itself, the freeze would advance the "crossover" date by two years—

—that is the cross over from a deficit to a surplus—

> —from 1998 in the base case to late 1996.
> Suppose that, in addition to the freeze, an easier credit policy were to be instituted, so that by the end of 1991 nominal rates of interest would be lower by about 2.5 percentage points (250 bases points). Under those circumstances, borrowing costs to the federal government would be reduced by about $7 billion in 1992. In addition, easier credit would stimulate the economy, thus replacing some of the demand lost as a result of the spending cuts. This would turn a revenue loss into a revenue gain. By 1992, the budget would be in balance, and by 1995 a strong surplus would be recorded. If such a policy were pursued for the duration of the decade, a substantial portion of the existing debt stock could be paid down.

There you have it, in black and white, from the Economic Council of Canada. The Economic Council was paid $10 million to provide this advice, among other things, and the Minister of Finance ignored the advice. He took it in part, but he took it in very selective bits. I submit that he chose the part that he felt he could sell, because he could force the costs onto other people and onto other governments, and he ignored the part that applied to his own misspending. I submit it shows a complete lack of concern for Canadians. What he did was to say: "We are not willing to bite the bullet on anything. All we are willing to do is pass on our debt problems to the provinces and let them muddle through as best they can."

Not only is it unfair because it hurts the smaller provinces and the ones that are least able to pay, but it helps to divide the opportunity within Canada for a national government to assist in ensuring that Canadians in all parts of the country have equal opportunities. If Ontario is able to pick up these cuts in federal transfer payments easily because of its very significant and substantial tax base, how can it be fair for a smaller province to be expected to do the same and administer the same programs? We have been making this point in the House for months.

The government does not care about the remote parts of Canada. It is prepared to write them off for the sole purpose of ensuring that it can win seats in central Canada. That is all that is of interest to it. One only has to look at the last set of election results to realize how precarious the government's position is. In the province of Ontario, the government barely won half the seats in the province. In fact, this party did exceedingly well in that province. The fact that so many of us are here from eastern Ontario is testimony to the government's failure to sell its vision of Canada, even in large parts of Ontario. I realize Quebec was a different situation, but I am sure the next election will correct that.

This Economic Council report perhaps did not get all the publicity it might have received when it was tabled. Perhaps that is why we have not heard a lot about it. Certainly, we have not heard the Minister of Finance discussing it at any length, but it certainly attracted some attention in other places.

One was the Canadian Federation of Independent Business in its pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance which, of course, he would not receive in person. It had to be delivered. The federation strongly recommended that the minister look at the report of the Economic Council and adopt the recommendations contained in it.

Other groups made similar submissions to the Minister of Finance and called on the government to stop the cuts in areas that were going to be damaging to the regions of Canada. Yet, the government continued on its merry way, ignoring the advice of the Economic Council and choosing instead to adopt its own set of advice which will leave us with a substantial national deficit in Canada throughout the remaining term of this government and for many years beyond. The Minister of State for Finance, I am sure, could give us the figures for the deficit that the minister is projecting for the next few years. I would suggest that if Canadians are to take the minister's figures at face value, at least the one for five years from now—and I assume it is going to be in the $14 billion or $15 billion range—it should be doubled. Certainly that has been the experience with this government in the past.

The figure that the Minister of Finance gave us in 1985 in his budget was that the deficit this year would be under $15 billion. In fact, we know it will be more than $30 billion. The minister's projections are consistently wrong and I suggest that when we hear them we should double them, at least if we are projecting a few years ahead.

The other thing that I thought might be useful is to look at the government's own document, A New Direction for Canada; An Agenda for Economic Renewal. This was the document that was tabled in the House of Commons on November 8, 1984. It was supposed to be the great new policy paper that explained the wonderful things that were going to happen to Canadians through the next five years of Tory mismanagement. Certainly it did indicate a certain weakness in government.

I am glad to see that the Minister of Transport has joined us. His knowledge of control of government expenditure, I know, is substantial. I am sure that in the next year he will cut the cost of the Department of Transport by reducing the gouged salaries that are being paid to the officers of Canadian National. Having closed down the railway in Canada, supposedly to cut government subsidies, the government now takes the extra subsidies and piles it into its own pocket.

These payments should not be allowed. This government should roll those increases back. That is where the money is going. Where are the profits going? They are going into the pockets of the directors in the form of increased fees. It should not be happening. This government says it needs the money for the railroads. It closed down a whole lot of lines in VIA Rail and now it is going to pay the people who did that hatchet job additional money. That is unfair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? Debate. The hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate today. I must extend to you my condolences. I am on duty now. I have been sitting here listening to a speech. From four until seven on Monday afternoon I am obliged to come to this House and represent the interests of my party, as do a lot of our other colleagues. We have to sit and listen to speeches. I have just listened to a speech for 20 minutes and I only have to listen to this kind of speech for three hours a day. I understand that you have to listen to this day in and day out for five days a week. My condolences are extended on the basis that you have to tolerate speeches of this nature that castigate or credit the government. I do have great sympathy for you.

I am really pleased to participate in the debate on this borrowing bill. We are asking the people of Canada to allow the federal government to borrow another $26 billion or so. That is an awful lot of money. I would be just as happy to stand here today and say that we are not borrowing any money, that this is a bill to pay down some of our debt.

Unfortunately, that is not what is in front of us today. We are having to borrow money. Why are we having to borrow money? There is no secret to it. We are spending more than we are collecting. That is it in a nutshell. We are here to ask for money to pay the bills for those things we are going to spend money on.

I listened to my colleague opposite who just finished speaking. In his whole debate did he make one suggestion about where the government might have spent a little less money, or where the government might have cut $500 million here, $2 million there, or $3 billion there? Did you hear any concrete suggestions, Mr. Speaker, as to how the government might further cut its expenditures? No. In fact, you did not hear any concrete suggestions at all from the member for Kingston and the Islands. I understand that. He will argue that that is not his role.

The member did bring out the book called "Legacies" put out by the Economic Council of Canada. He quoted from that book. We have all received copies of that book. He did make some valid comments about the recommendations contained therein. I say comments, but really what he did was read what they said. But did he say he agreed with their recommendations? No, he did not. Did he say he disagreed with their recommendations? No, he did not.

Let me just refer back to their recommendations so that you can determine for yourself whether you think that we as a government are moving in the right direction. He was quoting from page 28 and 29 with regard to an alternative Canadian policy. It says:

> There would be no "catch-up"—i.e., the reduction in spending attributed to the freeze would not be recouped.

That relates to their recommendation for a two-year freeze in five areas of government spending. For their purposes they chose as one of the areas to be affected by the freeze the capital assistance to business. Well, as you know, in the budget there were in fact a number of capital assistance programs cancelled. They were not just frozen but out and out cancelled. That is what the business community wanted. In fact, in the process in which I was involved on the goods and services tax we travelled across Canada and heard more and more business groups saying to cut out the grants to business. You will find that in fact the government did exactly that.

Did the member who spoke previously agree with that? I appreciate he is a Liberal so he really does not want to show his position on some of these issues.

Mr. Richardson: Or he does not know.

Mr. Soetens: Or he does not have a position, or he does not know. That is right.

Subsidies to business was another point he referenced. As I have just mentioned, we have addressed the subsidies to business. In fact, our position now is that business subsidies are in fact loans that are repayable, unlike the kind of loans that previous governments were involved in.

I can recall a loan from a Liberal government of the past to a trucking company which hauled material back and forth between Montreal and Toronto. Did that government honestly believe that if a certain trucking company went bankrupt goods would stop flowing between Montreal and Toronto or vice-versa? It did. It lent that company money. The company went broke anyway and the end result was that goods still travel back and forth between Toronto and Montreal. The difference is that it took an awful lot of taxpayer money with it. That is the difference between Conservatives and Liberals. We do not make loans of that nature.

Mrs. Catterall: No, you specialize in strip clubs.

Mr. Soetens: Here is another one. The member mentioned transfer payments to the provinces. If you read all the newspaper articles from across this country and listen to budgets of various finance ministers or treasurers from the various provinces you know that they are criticizing the federal government for not freezing transfers as was recommended by the Economic Council of Canada. We only increased them 3 per cent. Can you imagine? We did not give them less money, we did not give them the same money, we gave them 3 per cent more than last year, which is not what the Economic Council of Canada is recommending. Did my hon. colleague who just spoke say that was good or bad? No, he did not talk about that.

Another recommendation was that the indexing factor for family allowance be cancelled. I did not hear my hon. colleague say that he agreed with that. He must, I guess, because he brought out this book and he quoted the recommendations so I have to presume he agrees with that philosophy of deindexing family allowance. Well, that is not a policy that we espouse. It is not one we are following but it seems, since he wanted to use the reference, that he must agree with that.

The book talks about the freeze on the hiring of federal public servants. Of course, Mr. Speaker, as you know, in this budget we in fact are reducing the number of employees by some 1,000 over-all. So we have done some of the things recommended here and some we do not quite agree with, because it is not fair to out and out freeze transfers to the provinces.

My colleague did refer to the good province of Ontario. He and I are both residents of the province of Ontario and we both represent constituencies in this provinces. He proceeded to compare the government we have here in Ottawa with the government that exists in Toronto. He talks about competence. I am not going to suggest that either government is incompetent. I think there are elected officials in both jurisdictions trying to do the best they can with the resources available.

One the the differences is that the Liberals in Ontario inherited a government which, for 42 years, had been well managed. They did not inherit a budget circumstance where 50 cents of every dollar that was being spent was borrowed money. We had a deficit of $38 billion federally versus a deficit of some $1.5 billion provincially. He did not seem to want to mention that that really changed the lifestyle.

He talked about the budget surplus in the province of Ontario. I am a resident here and I recall how the Ontario Treasurer really raised the roof that our supposed cut-back in transfer payments was going to desperately affect his budget. Well, they were able to increase their spending by 6.8 per cent while we held ours to 3 per cent. What was the matter with them? Why did they not hold their spending to a 3 per cent increase? They were able to do 6.8 per cent more even though, he argues, we cut their transfers by $490 million.

As you know, we did not cut their transfers. They got more money than they got last year but, having said that, they still increased their spending by 6.8 per cent. I am happy that they were able to have a budget surplus this year. That is the way it should be. But did you hear him mention the employer health tax that was put in place across the province of Ontario? I do not think you did. Although that tax was in last year's budget it came into effect this year and that employer health tax in fact is an added burden on Canadian industries substantially in excess of what they were collecting through the old OHIP premium basis.

The member talked about the federal civil service. We have reduced our civil service by 12,000. The province of Ontario has increased theirs by 8,000. We went down 12,000, they went up 8,000. Ontario only had 83,000 civil servants so it only took it five years to increase it by 10 per cent. Having increased it by 10 per cent, is the service the province of Ontario is providing better and more efficient than what was in place five years ago? I can honestly and very comfortably say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not better.

In fact let me give you some very clear examples of where it is worse. The whole morale in the system has been destroyed. There is a psychiatric hospital in my constituency. It used to report to one minister and one ministry for its funding, its programs and the delivery of its service. It now reports to three different ministries, three different deputy ministers, and the end result is that it cannot get any decisions out of any one of the three. The whole morale and service of that hospital is suffering badly because of that kind of inequity.

All right, the government is spending more money in Ontario. It is kind of proud of what it is doing. Last year it provided funding to the school boards in my constituency to allow them to build, in the region of Durham, some five new schools. This year it is giving them not one dollar for capital construction. One might argue that maybe my constituency does not need more schools. I should advise you, Mr. Speaker, that today as I stand here debating this issue we have over 200 portable classrooms in my constituency. At this time next year, without the addition of any new school facilities, it will probably be in the realm of 225.

How does the province of Ontario justify not putting any money into a high growth area that needs schools? It justifies it because it hired 8,000 civil servants. The salaries of those 8,000 civil servants would in fact pay an awful lot of school bills.

Things are different between the federal and provincial governments. Our hands are tied because we inherited a deficit that we had to deal with, whereas the Liberal government of the province of Ontario inherited a very healthy, stable economy from a previous provincial government with a budget that was well managed. That is absolutely contrary to what we inherited here in Ottawa.

I mentioned at the outset that nobody from the Liberal party, and certainly not the previous speaker, came up with any suggestions about how we could perhaps borrow less than the $26 billion. As you know, we came up with the GST proposal in our report and I note that the member did not really comment on that. The same report to which he was referring talked about the improved competitiveness of the Canadian economy. This report talks about the 9 per cent GST. When this was written, that was to be the rate of the GST. It talks about how much better it is going to be for the Canadian economy to deal with deficit reduction and the competitiveness of the Canadian economy. He did not get around to quoting those.

This report does comment on a reduced GST rate and suggests there would be some benefits to that. We came through with that. It is interesting that he ignored those comments in this book as well. That is understandable. One only wants to quote those statements which support one's particular view. I understand that.

I would like to come back to that GST report which the finance committee brought forward. I was a member of that committee, and quite proud to have been so. We came in with some excellent recommendations.

One of the recommendations we made was to establish an expenditure review committee. Many witnesses who appeared before us said that we have to cut spending. We did not allow those witnesses to pass on their comments about where we ought to cut spending because that really was not the role of the committee. Instead, we established a subcommittee and recommended, after the GST report was in, that the finance committee invite Canadians to make a submission to it as to how the federal government could cut some of its expenses.

At our first meeting, members of the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party who were members of that committee decided that they were not going to participate. They did not want to have anything to do with any submissions on how we might reduce our expenditures. They walked out.

Therefore, we know they are not interested in reducing expenditures. We know they are not interested in looking for ways of reducing expenditures. More to the point, they are not interested in allowing Canadians, who have some good ideas, to tell them their ideas.

You should be aware, Mr. Speaker, and maybe proud of the fact, that this committee carried on its process. We invited all those Canadians who had made submissions to the goods and services tax committee to come back and give us their expenditure reduction ideas. Unfortunately, we did not get an awful lot of submissions, but you can be rather proud that one of the better submissions we got was from the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce.

I know that your constituency is in Edmonton, Mr. Speaker, and you will be happy to know that there are some people who made excellent submissions and certainly the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce was one. We will certainly deal with that in committee.

The hon. colleague who spoke previously talked about the GST and how it was going to be a cost to Canada. He might consider it a cost. I happened to attend a meeting this morning in Toronto of an industry group that generally does not pay tax. To me it was a perfect example of why the government has to proceed with the goods and services tax.

It was a meeting of an industry that sells comic books. I did not know this detail until I spoke to this group. When you sell a comic book that is stapled together, it is taxable. If it is not stapled together but bound, it is not taxable. The difference as to whether it is taxable or not is a staple.

The fourth edition of a comic book in the same year, even though it is stapled together, is not taxable.

Mr. Richardson: This is the current system?

Mr. Soetens: This is the current system; the system that my colleagues here to the left want to keep in place.

Further, if there is an ad for something taxable in that fourth edition comic book that is not taxable, all of a sudden that book becomes taxable again. This is the stuff that my hon. colleagues on the left are all in favour of. That is one of the reasons why we got rid of it.

• (1720)

It was explained to me this morning by the group that is involved in this particular industry that by removing the federal sales tax from their inputs it is going to be more competitive with all kinds of comic books and games and novels that are imported into this country. They had clear examples of where they were uncompetitive because of the Canadian tax structure. They were positive about how they would do more business. That is, in fact, what the Government of Canada said.

Referring again to this book that my hon. colleague used a little while back, the Economic Council of Canada says we will do more activity by the elimination of the federal sales tax and replacement of it with the GST. We will do some $9 billion or so in extra economic activity. That is jobs. That is investment. That is a return to Canada of increased economic activity. That is healthy and that helps the deficit because, as you know, Mr. Speaker, taxes are inevitable under our system. As a result of that $9 billion of increased economic activity, people will pay more taxes and that helps to reduce the deficit. There is a very positive relationship between the GST and the deficit. My hon. colleague just ignores the fact that the GST will have anything to do with improving the over-all deficit projection.

There are some very clear, very concise moves that the government has taken on the goods and services tax which will in fact yield increased economic activity and will result in a reduced deficit.

Colleagues down the way are upset that the government would reduce its deficit, and I can understand why. So far they have been totally bereft of any policies. Their only hope for an election platform for the next election campaign is that those mean, bad Tories did not reduce the deficit. Their fear is that if we reduce the deficit, which we are going to do, they will not have anything to campaign on because they are totally bankrupt of ideas. Not only are they bankrupt of ideas, but I understand that their party is not all that well heeled financially either. In addition to being bankrupt of ideas, they might be bankrupt of over-all thought processes. There is another perspective that might be of interest.

I have another point to make about industrial competitiveness. I am glad the hon. gentleman quoted this book because it has an awful lot of very good information in it which he chose to ignore. It says:

> —Canadian productivity growth rates have exceeded those in the United States. According to figures compiled by Statistics Canada and the U.S. Bureau of Labour statistics, this is especially evident in transportation and storage, utilities, construction, and finance, insurance, and real estate— Since all of these industries produce important inputs to manufacturing and resource production, their strong productivity growth gives a boost to Canada's competitiveness.

I guess he did not see that. Just so that you are aware, Sir, that is on page 12. I would hope you would look that particular paragraph up as well because you may find it very interesting. Of course, there are an awful lot of very good quotes in this book on Canadian competitiveness. Again, I am pleased that the hon. gentleman used that book because it provided me with an opportunity to explain it all.

Mr. Milliken: You would have used it anyway.

Mr. Soetens: Actually you are right. I probably would have used it anyway.

The other point I would like to come back to is this idea of provincial governments being, shall we say, asked to carry the burden because we are reducing some of our expenditures. I mentioned, as an example, that in my riding, although there is a desperate need for schools, the provincial government chose not to fund one additional classroom.

I should also point out that in my riding in the last provincial campaign the provincial Liberals came in and said that it was going to fund an addition to our hospital of 125 beds. Mind you, the towns of Ajax and Pickering would have to raise some $7 million before the provincial government would kick in its share.

Needless to say that $7 million has been in the bank for a year. it seems that the provincial government has come along and said that it is sorry, it cannot fund it this year. There is an election coming, so maybe during the election it will fund the hospital.

I guess I am suggesting that over all the federal government has done a fine job of controlling its expenditures. I am sorry that I have to debate a bill to borrow $25 or $26 billion more, but maybe next year we will be debating a bill to borrow an awful lot less and the Liberal party will have given us, I am sure, all kinds of ideas on how we can borrow less money.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I of course enjoyed the numerous references in the hon. member's speech to my own. I know that he has now had a good long look at "Legacies", the twenty-sixth review of the Economic Council of Canada. I did not forget anything in the report, I just did not have time to read all the figures and statistics out of it which, clearly, he found of such interest.

The fact remains that the report made it clear that the budget deficit could be brought under control if the Minister of Finance took certain steps, and there was a recommendation contained in there. I used the recommendation as an indication that the government does not need advice from us on how to bring the deficit under control when it is paying $10 million to the Economic Council of Canada to provide it with that advice.

The fact is that, even if we were to provide the advice, this government ignores it. We have the evidence there in the form of the Economic Council of Canada report. We have seen the evidence in the Minister of Finance's own budget. He has clearly ignored the recommendations.

Will the hon. member tell us why it is he thinks the Minister of Finance has ignored these recommendations and is letting the deficit remain high, in fact go up? He referred in his speech to the deficit going down. It has not gone down, it has gone up over last year. He knows that. I know he would not want to mislead Canadians into thinking that the government is doing something that it patently is not.

Can he explain why it is, in his view, that the Minister of Finance has ignored this advice and is increasing the deficit at a time when he says it is so important that it be reduced?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to respond to that. From all the information I have, the deficit for 1989-90 was $30.5 billion. The projected deficit for 1990-91 is $28.5 billion. My first response to the hon. gentleman is that $28.5 billion is less than $30.5 billion. Now that is Conservative counting, not Liberal counting. I just point that out.

Second, he asked about some of these recommendations. Why did the finance minister not accept them? That is the difference between us. It recommends that we should freeze transfer payments to the provinces. We know that there are provinces in this country that cannot afford to have a total freeze. He ignores that. He would just a soon that provinces like Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island be frozen. Well, we know, as Conservatives, that we cannot do that.

It refers here to the indexing factor for family allowance. He says that we should deindex those things. Well, his party is going to have to make up its mind. The last time this government tried to deindex something, some five years ago, those people railed against it. They are going to have to make up their mind. Do they agree with full indexing, or do they not? It seems, if they are going to ask why we did not follow these recommendations, that they are either for them or they are not. It seems that they do not have the courage to take a position on these particular programs.

We are willing to take advice. Yes, we did not take all of their advice. But since he wants us to, why does the hon. gentleman not say: "You were right to take the advice of the Economic Council of Canada and put in place the goods and services tax"? Maybe he did not want to take that particular portion of these recommendations into consideration in his questions and comments.

He is going to have to make up his mind. He wants us to freeze payments to the provinces that do not have the abilities, and he does not want us to put the goods and services tax in place. Now, which of these recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada does he want us to follow?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am so glad I came in to hear the member for Ontario speak. It was somewhat confusing initially, but I must say it has inspired me. It was confusing because when I first walked in I thought I was in the Ontario legislature. I was pretty sure I had taken a wrong turn somewhere between Ottawa West and Parliament Hill, because we were talking about the fine performance of the Ontario government in controlling its deficit and its spending. Then I heard the member for Ontario—and maybe he is a little confused because of the name of his riding—complain about the goodies that have not been coming to his riding.

• (1730)

What did he expect to happen when his government reneged on cost shared programs with the province? Did he expect that the province of Ontario was going to let children go hungry because there was not enough money for social benefits? Did he expect that it was going to cut back on day care because the government was refusing to meet its commitments to cost share that program? Or, did he expect that it was going to kick kids out of university because the government was cutting transfer payments for post-secondary education?

I am sorry if the government's own actions are coming back on its own members in their own ridings. They have nobody but themselves to blame.

Then, as I listened a little further, I honestly thought that a miracle had happened and suddenly we, the Liberal opposition, were in government and that the people opposite were in opposition. I heard the member attacking the policies of the Liberal party. I thought how wonderful, here we are controlling the economy and the budget and they have nothing to do but criticize what they anticipate or project to be Liberal policies. It has put me in very fine form to comment on this borrowing bill.

We are borrowing $25.5 billion. That means we are adding that much to the national debt of $362 billion. The government likes to pretend that the amount of money we are borrowing and the amount of debt we have have absolutely nothing to do with the annual deficit that Canadians are paying. Of course it does. What you pay in annual payments depends on how much you already owe.

One thing that has struck me as I have looked at the budget documents is that five years ago the deficit was fairly evenly split between paying for programs and paying interest on debt. Now the deficit is not even enough to cover the cost of our borrowing. All the deficit goes to pay interest on debt, and then a good chunk more comes out of operating budgets to pay the interest on the debt.

It is also important to point out that this $25.5 billion is not the full extent of the government's borrowing this year; that it is actually $28.5 billion. One of the ways in which the government reduces the amount it actually goes out to the financial markets to borrow—down to $25.5 billion—is by borrowing from the federal superannuation fund.

One of the most contentious issues for many years around this place has been the lack of adequate return to the federal superannuation fund and the lack of action by the government on improvements to the fund that are required under our charter which it has refused to implement up until now. These are improvements that it has made already to pension funds of federally regulated bodies.

Why is it withholding this money, these proper and merited pension adjustments from public servants? The answer is quite simple. It is because it wants to hold them off and use them as bargaining chips against deindexing seniors' pensions, as it has done with many other elements in its budget.

The government likes to keep the federal superannuates' fund rich and healthier than it needs to be to meet its obligations and to meet benefits that public service employees have been entitled to ever since the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was passed. It does so because it likes to borrow from it so that it can pretend to Canadians that it is really borrowing less than it actually is.

I want to talk about one other aspect of the borrowing of Canada that I think has not been addressed until now. It is the amount of borrowing from non-residents. In the last five years non-resident borrowing has gone up from just over 10 per cent to nearly 20 per cent. The cost of this borrowing to Canadian taxpayers is pretty horrendous. Non-residents who lend money to Canada and get paid interest on those loans pay no taxes in Canada.

Let me just give you the figures, Mr. Speaker: 20 per cent of our borrowing is by non-residents—$50 billion of domestic debt is held by non-residents. If we assume a 12 per cent interest rate—and I doubt if we can count on that until the end of the year—that means $6 billion is going out of the Canadian economy to non-resident lenders. That is $6 billion which, if it were lent and paid in Canada, would be generating tax revenue back into the coffers of the government.

The amount of revenue that the government is forgoing by borrowing nearly 20 per cent outside the country is anywhere between $1.5 billion and $1.7 billion. This bill is borrowing darn close to $2 billion more than it needs to simply because the government has not controlled foreign borrowing and is paying interest out of the country and not collecting tax on that interest.

Meanwhile, what has it done to Canadians? While it is paying tax-free interest to non-residents, it has dropped the ability of Canadians to be tax free on the first $1,000 of interest they earn on what they have lent to their own government.

Mr. Speaker, $3 billion of this borrowing bill is just to cover the reserve for foreign denomination borrowing. The government needs to have a very close look at the impact of its foreign borrowings and its borrowing of foreign denominations on the deficit of the country.

The other thing that strikes me as we add more debt is the extent to which over the last few years we have sold off through privatization the assets of the country. It makes no sense to me to sell the House to pay the oil bill, which is what the government has been doing as it has privatized over 22 government operations or Crown corporations.

Canadians might accept selling off their assets which they have paid for if they knew that the sale of those assets was going to pay off the debt so that the deficit and the amount of interest they pay could in fact be reduced. But, no, the sale of the assets of Canadian taxpayers has been used simply to pay more interest and to keep on adding to the operating budget.

This budget has been characterized as the no tax budget. It is important to notice that borrowing would be much higher if the government had not managed to transfer much of its responsibilities to others.

I want to talk about 12 different items that to me are new charges on Canadians. It does not matter if we call them taxes or not. They are new charges on Canadians. They are the equivalent of raising taxes.

The first thing we had better remember is that this is the GST budget. Boy, if that is not a whopper of a new tax, I do not know what is. Some 260 million dollars of the borrowing in this bill are attributable only to pay for advertising to tell Canadians that they like a tax that they know darn well they do not like. It is to pay for several thousand new tax collectors so Canadians can be policed to make sure they are not escaping one whit of one dollar of a new tax that they do not like.

• (1740)

We are looking at a $6 billion increase in taxes to Canadians through the GST. They are now paying $18 billion in federal sales tax. The government will collect $24 billion to end up with a net revenue of $18 billion. In the meantime it will pay all the administrative costs of sending out $8.7 million in cheques to compensate partially for this new tax. What a waste of money.

Second, this is the budget that will increase both municipal and provincial taxes to pay for services that the Government of Canada has a commitment to cost share fifty-fifty. It is now reneging on that agreement. It is failing to meet its commitments in important areas such as education, social services, and day care—all of which are cost shared programs. The result of that is going to be an average of $576 over five years that Canadian taxpayers will have to pick up in additional municipal or provincial taxes to compensate for what the government is not now paying for.

Third, one of the more blatant items in this bill is fees for students. There is a 3 per cent charge on students who qualify for student loans only because they have already proved they are too poor to go to university without getting a loan. Now we are telling them that they have to pay fee on top of that.

Fourth, we have to remember that this is the clawback budget. This is the budget in which the government says that seniors and children's benefits and nothing else will be taxed at 100 per cent for some seniors, some children, and some families. Millionaires can make an extra $1 million and be taxed at no more than 25 per cent. Yet the benefits payable to seniors and children this year become taxable at 100 per cent.

This is the year in which the government starts getting the unemployed, the workers and the employers to pay through their fees for obligations that have up until now been the responsibility of the Government of Canada. Even though Bill C–21 is not through the House yet, the government is collecting those extra taxes from the employed. It is collecting those extra taxes from the employers. It is collecting them from the unemployed by not paying them the benefits that they are now entitled to.

Is the government saying to people who are supposed to benefit from this bill: "We will also make your benefits retroactive to January 1, because we have made the charges retroactive to January 1"? No, it is not. It is saying: "We are gouging you starting January 1, but you are not benefiting until this bill gets through the House".

This is the year in which the personal income surtax effectively goes up to 5 per cent. This is the year in which deindexing of personal income tax deductions means a 3 per cent rise in taxes paid and a 3 per cent loss in the value of tax credits.

Eighth, this is the year in which the proportion of taxes from individuals increases again while the proportion of taxes from corporations drops by 3 per cent.

This is the year in which we see an elimination of funding, not to the government's own programs, not to cabinet ministers who now have the ability to pull twice as many people out of government departments to help them in their political offices. We are eliminating funds to those in society who are the least powerful, who most need the support of the government to solve their own problems and to communicate their needs to government. I will be coming back to that.

This is the year in which we see a continuation in the reduction of the corporate tax rate that has taken place in the last couple of years. It will go from 36 per cent down to 29 per cent.

I want to talk about a couple of the changes that are part of the budget which has led to this borrowing bill. I want to talk about the people who are being deprived of funding and then where some increased spending is going, spending that I really do not think Canadians want to be paying for.

I want to talk about the reduction in funding to native Canadians and in particular the absolutely unforgivable cut to native newspapers and native broadcasting. The very survival of native languages is dependent upon the native languages newspapers that will be wiped out by these cuts. Meanwhile, the government has the audacity to suggest that aboriginal languages should be mixed in with heritage languages, and that it should start spending money on an institute while the languages die in the communities of Canada's native people.

This is the year in which the promotion of tolerance and understanding is being undermined in this budget. Cuts to heritage language programs represent a threat to the preservation and understanding of ethnic languages and cultures, and to the values attached to the preservation of these ideals.

This is the year in which we have seen the cut that has been restored only temporarily to women's centres so that women can act to redress their own inequitable situation in Canadian society. Need I remind hon. members that when the economy suffers it is women who suffer first and suffer most.

On the other hand Canadians are being asked to borrow for these types of things. They are being asked to pay $1.6 million to redecorate a cabinet minister's drop–in centre in Halifax; $3 million for ceremonial and state occasions so that politicians can stand up on platforms and get applauded; $160 million to the Boeing Corporation, although I think it is actually $166 million; and $32.6 million to CSIS.

At the same time not one whit, not one cent is going to replace the $450 million that the government over the last five years has cut from spending on alternative energy and conservation. I think we know where the priorities of this government are.

The most important issue for Canadians is the environment. Yet this government in its two mandates has cut spending on alternative energy and energy conservation—the most important contribution we can make to cleaning up the air that the whole world breathes. That spending has been cut from $500 million to $50 million, and the budget does nothing to redress that.

It cuts investment in the education of our young people. It cuts investment in science and technology that will secure a prosperous future for Canada and for future generations.

I would be remiss if I did not stand up and speak against this package of borrowing and all the changes in priorities that go with it that I think are entirely contrary to the kind of nation that Canadians have come to be proud of.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Ottawa West whether she understands compound interest or not.

It is a fact that when we assumed government in 1984 that the national debt was approximately $200 billion. While we have reduced the deficit every year, there still has been a deficit. While the books show that we have paid interest, we really have not paid it to the tune of the deficit each year.

The national debt is now—and I want this on the record—$350 billion, the hon. member might think that this government is responsible for that. But that is not the case.

Compound interest over the last five and half years accounts for another $120 billion. The total debt of the country which can be directly attributed to the Liberal government of 1984 and to the Liberals prior to that time—and they had something like 15 years of deficits—is $320 billion which must be placed directly in their laps. We should take responsibility for $30 billion, which is the difference between $320 billion and $350 billion. We will do that because we are working on that as well.

• (1750)

I want the record to show that this $320 billion which is the albatross that is on the people of this country—our children and grandchildren—should be placed right over there.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, aside from the rather condescending manner in which the member started his comments, does he not think that after nearly six years in office it is time to start acting like a government and not an opposition party? Does he not think it is time to stop blaming a party that has not been in office since 1984 for the financial mismanagement of his party over the last six years?

Mr. Richardson: The question is: Do you understand compound interest?

Mrs. Catterall: Of course I understand compound interest. Do not be so condescending!

I also understand that one pays off one's debts when one sells off billions of dollars worth of assets. One does not keep on paying more money into operations. One does not keep on adding to the costs of government.

Mr. Attewell: I do not believe you understand compound interest.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. One question at a time.

Mr. Richardson: We are waiting for the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a questions or comment the hon. Minister of State for Finance.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that we had a deficit in the current account, apart from the debt which was building up, to pay for Old Age Security and the programs that the Liberals had put in place. We had to borrow $16 billion. How can you pay a debt in that kind of situation? We have turned that around. Now we have a surplus of $9 billion. That is a $25 billion turnaround in our operation to start paying for the debt the Liberals left us.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I cannot leave that on the record. The member has suggested that somehow Old Age Security is a draw on taxpayers. He knows very well that when the Old Age Security was introduced in the early 1950's it was a contributory plan. It remained as a contributory plan on the income tax form until the mid 1970's when that line was taken off the tax form.

The rate of tax was not reduced because the line came off the tax form. Canadian taxpayers have continued since 1952 to pay for Old Age Security. His is the government that is denying them the return on their investment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member from Markham have a supplementary question?

Mr. Attewell: Not really, Mr. Speaker, although I do not think the hon. member for Ottawa West really has dealt with compound interest. She does not seem to agree that the Liberal party is responsible for $120 billion of the $150 billion growth in national debt over the last five years.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, in the last five years this government has had an opportunity through increased employment, declining interest rates, a better world economy and a trade surplus like we have not enjoyed for over a decade to deal with that deficit, not to continue compounding it.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have been just outside in the lobby listening to the debate of my colleague for Ottawa West. She has made a lot of sense, as usual. She made a lot more sense than some of the comments from the other side.

Mr. Richardson: That makes two of you in this room who think that.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): We have the western peanut gallery hurling insults over here. If the hon. member would like to speak, I would gladly cut my comments short so that we could listen to his impassioned plea about the deficit.

One of the things I would like to ask my colleague concerns this government's absolute apoplectic pursuit of problems concerning the national deficit. I, like many Canadians, listened during the last election campaign and over and over again we heard the government and ministers of the Crown telling us that the deficit was under control. We heard that there was no problem with the deficit, that this government had spending under control. Every time we turned a corner we heard that every promise of the government during that campaign was not a promise, it was a spending commitment and that it had all the funds necessary.

I would like to ask my colleague from Ottawa who understands the pulse of Canadians very well what she thinks about this absolute flip-flop the day after the last general election. On one hand we had no problem with the deficit and the next day we had a complete preoccupation with it.

Does she think this group opposite was completely truthful in its campaign rhetoric?

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to answer that question concerning sacred trusts and a commitment to child care. All of these things were budgeted for and suddenly we did not have the money for them the day after the election. I think it is clear that Canadians have a litany of broken promises and broken commitments.

I just want to say to my colleagues who persist in perpetuating a myth that I do not understand compound interest that anybody understands the way to avoid paying interest on interest on interest on interest is to start paying off your debt, not sell your assets without paying off your debt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On that basis, questions and comments are now terminated.

On debate the hon. member for Calgary Southeast.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I think it might be helpful to members, just so that they do not have to keep bringing in the heavy-hitters to balance their speeches, to give a little background to explain how we got into the situation that we are in today.

The member who just spoke wanted to walk away from the fact that the Liberal government in 1984 left this country with a $200 billion debt. Few Canadians have a real grasp of the magnitude of $200 billion. It is an awful lot of money.

The debt increases every year. It continues to increase, and not just until we get to a point where we can bring in enough revenues to pay not only for all the programs Canadians enjoy, but to pay the interest on the national debt. That was something which the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville pointed out so well. I was delighted with his comments. He attempted to explain, before he was rudely interrupted, compound interest and how this $200 billion that our government inherited in 1984 would have grown by $120 billion to be, today, $320 billion if we had done nothing else.

But that is not the largest part of the problem. To be saddled upon entering government with a debt of $200 billion was not enough of a legacy for these Liberals to leave behind. After 20 years of profligate spending and waste and increasing expenditures every year for 20 years, they left us in a position in which we had built-in structured expenditures in this country to pay for all the worthy and worthwhile programs of government. I refer to seniors' pensions, family allowances, payments to those in need, as well as the maintaining of government operations such as airports, Customs, et cetera. They had fixed expenditures in the year we took office amounting to $87 billion.

You just cannot turn off the tap on these fixed expenditures and say: "We are going to lay off all those people. We are going to shut down 10 per cent of the runway. We are going to close off part of our border. We are not going to give 100 per cent of pensions to people every year, people who have paid into them. We are not going to take care of those people on unemployment". You do not turn the tap off instantly on those programs. These are things that over a period of 20 years Canadians had come to learn to expect from government.

We had fixed expenditures which demanded $87 billion in revenue every year, plus a $200 billion debt with a $22 billion interest payment. When we became a government we found a bill every year for at least $100 billion. On the other hand, we had a fixed revenue base of only $80 billion. How can that be? Surely, the Liberal government would not have established a system where it expended $100 billion a year and brought in only $80 billion. The whole tax system—our income tax system, our corporate tax system and our excise tax system combined—brought in only $80 billion. Yet, for 20 years it continued to expend more than it brought in.

• (1800)

It is interesting to note that, in the years 1970–75, the Liberal governments of the day increased expenditures from one year to the next on an average by 17.9 per cent. How is that? If you folks want more out there and you want to re-elect the Liberals, let us buy you at the rate of 17.9 per cent a year every year.

In the next five years they had some conscience. A little guilt snuck in and they said: "We cannot keep doing this to the country. We are running the country into the ground." In a great effort to reduce expenditures, in the period 1975 to 1980, the Liberals only increased by an average of 10 per cent per year. I do not know how many people across the country were getting wage increases at 10 per cent a year, but the Liberal government did not have any problem in its low-spending years to increase at the rate of 10 per cent a year. It lost some seats and the government at the end of that period because it had shown such restraint. It went from 17.9 per cent spending increases annually down to 10 per cent.

The Liberal government was not able to buy enough votes so the people of Canada elected a Conservative government in 1979. Unfortunately, it was a minority government. Aided by the socialists, the Liberals were able to defeat that government. We got them again, Mr. Speaker, and they came back with a vengeance. The Liberals said: "We could not get re-elected when we only increased our budget 10 per cent a year. We are not going to let that happen again." By golly, they got right after it. From the period of 1979 to 1984, before we kicked them out, they increased the rate of expenditure every year by an average of 14.1 per cent a year.

Canadians said: "Wait a minute. We have had enough of this nonsense. All they do is spend and get this country further into debt." When this government took office in 1984, the accumulated debt of the Liberal party was $200 billion. We had a fixed rate of expenditure of $100 billion and it was bringing in only $80 billion. The first thing one has to do before addressing the national debt is at least to get revenues up to expenditures or expenditures down to revenues.

Where was the money being spent? I think Canadians know where the money was being spent. Thirty-three per cent was in direct transfers to persons. These were transfers to pay pensions, unemployment insurance, family allowance cheques and all the operations of governments. Those expenditures, increasing at the rates I spoke of earlier, made the country grow. It had been increasing over the previous 15 years at outrageous levels and this government said it had to stop. We are going to try to increase revenues broadly and to increase the level of the economy so that we have more people employed and more jobs for Canadians. Let us make the economy more effective and productive. When we have more people working and more companies creating jobs,the burden is spread out. More people are paying tax and tax revenues will go up. Individual taxes do not go up. The base is spread. More taxpayers mean more tax revenue comes in, and that is what it attempted to do. I must say did a very good job.

The record shows that, for the period from when it was elected in 1984 to today, the increase in spending in Canada of the Conservative government has been 3.5 per cent. In the first five years of the Liberal government it was 17.9 per cent. In the next five years, it was 10 per cent per year. In the next five years, it was 14.1 per cent.

When the former Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Turner, was finance minister, the Liberals had a 24 per cent increase from one year to the next. There was an increase in expenditures of 24 per cent in one year.

What has our government done? On average, since this government was elected in 1984, expenditures have risen 3.5 per cent.

Mr. Milliken: Rubbish.

Mr. Richardson: It is right here in the Public Accounts. It is available to any Canadian. Those are the facts. It is not the hyperbole and nonsense we have been hearing from the Liberals this afternoon. That is a fact and there it is in black and white.

An hon. member: It is over 7 per cent.

Mr. Richardson: We are talking about program spending. It is what we have control over in terms of a government and what we have control over in terms of our spending. What we do not have control over is paying off their debt.

The member says it was 7 per cent. Admittedly, we do have to have to pay the interest on the debt. The debt that was $200 billion when we took office is now up to $350 billion. Of that interest, $120 billion is simply compound interest that was here when we arrived as a government in 1984.

This government has shown fiscal responsibility. Since it was elected six years ago, instead of raising expenditures at a rate of 17 per cent or 24 per cent, government spending has increased 3.5 per cent. Inflation has been over 4 per cent. So, in real dollar terms, federal spending has actually been reduced over that period.

At the same time, because of the increase in the economy, we broadened the base. More people are working. A total of 1,604,000 jobs have been created in Canada since 1984 and 86 per cent of those jobs are full-time. In contrast, 89 per cent of the jobs created by the last Liberal government were part-time jobs. A total of 966,000 jobs have been created for women. This represents 60 per cent of the total jobs created.

In 1984, when this government was elected, unemployment was 11.6 per cent. Across the country today, it is considerably reduced. It has been consistently at the level of 6.5 per cent to 7 per cent ever since. It is 7 per cent today. We still have a low unemployment level because more Canadians are working. When more Canadians are working, they pay taxes. They broaden the base. The more people paying into the pot, the greater the revenues for the country.

The expenditures that were up here with the Liberals and the revenues that were down here been brought together. In 1987 they actually crossed. For the first time in a long time, when the Conservatives came in, Mike Wilson took two-and-a-half years to get to a point where we were bringing in as much money as we were spending. We were not spending more money than we brought in, with the exception of interest on the debt.

Since 1987, and for every year since 1987 that this government has been in office and Michael Wilson has been finance minister, we have had a surplus budget. We have actually brought in more than we have spent on government programs. Wouldn't that be great? It would be great. We could lower taxes right away, but we still have to pay the compounding interest on the Liberal debt.

• (1810)

We are on the right track; we are going in the right direction. Instead of spending more than we bring in every year, we have turned it around. In the past four years, we actually spent less than we brought in, and we are starting to pay the interest on that national debt. In 1994, when we will have passed it to a sufficient point, we can then start to attack the principal of that debt and benefit all Canadians.

I want to get into a number of other areas, because I have heard such outrageous statements made by some of the opposition members this year. I thought it would be helpful for Canadians to get a grasp of what kind of mess the Conservatives inherited back in 1984. It is simply not fair to say: "You cannot keep going back there and blaming those Liberals. Gosh, they were thrown out of office six years ago."

Unfortunately for all Canadians, we could not throw out their debt with them. We inherited that debt. Had we done anything else, that debt would have grown to $320 billion today, simply compounding the disgraceful economic performance of 15 years of Liberal governments.

I might just leave it at that point. I would be delighted to answer any questions that the Liberal research establishment can come up with if one of the members would like to read one of them to me.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that what he says is inaccurate.

As I started to say in my speech, although unfortunately I ran out of time, there is a litany of problems with this government's financial management. I could not get to this part of it when I was cut off earlier, so perhaps I can refresh the hon. member's memory now.

"A New Direction for Canada: An Agenda for Economic Renewal"—I daresay the hon. member does not have a copy of this—was the title of this gobbledegook that the Minister of Finance tabled in the House on November 8, 1984. It was shortly after the election, the hon. member will recall, and this was supposed to tell us about what the Tory government was going to do for Canadians.

It stated that if it left existing policies in place, certain things would be just absolutely dreadful. The government said that by 1990–91 the federal deficit would reach $37.3 billion if it did not do anything about it. It is forecast at $28 billion. With interest rates going the way they have been, we know it is going to be a bit more than that. It will be very close to the $37 billion that was predicted if it did nothing.

It has done stuff. The government has hiked taxes 31 times. It also promised that it would bring spending under control in its fight against the deficit. We know that program spending has increased substantially, 4.6 per cent in 1986–87, 7.6 per cent in 1987–88, 3.1 per cent in 1988–89. This year it is supposed to go up—

Mr. Richardson: It didn't go up this year.

Mr. Milliken: Yes. Program expenditures. It is ignoring all the increases in the expending on the debt. In addition, the prediction was that program spending would reach $103 billion, under the status quo budget, by 1990–91. This is what the Minister of Finance said would be so dreadful, so absolutely frightful in 1984. Yet, according to the government's plan, spending is going to be $109 billion. How did it get so much higher?

This was supposed to be a worst case scenario if the government did nothing. It has done something. It has botched up, that is what it has done. The government has hiked taxes. It has taxed Canadians to the hilt and it still has not managed to do anything to bring government expenditures under control.

In addition, the government predicted that government revenue under this worst case scenario, if nothing was done, would get to $100 billion by 1990–91. According to the current plan, it is going to be $120 billion. What happened? This was a worst case scenario. In fact, everything is worse than predicted. Why? Because the Minister of Finance, I suggest, is incompetent. He should resign, get out, and let someone else run the administration of the country. Does the hon. member not agree with that?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to constrain my laughter at the humourist from the Liberal Party. He has the audacity to stand up in this House and speak to all Canadians about the alleged incompetence of this finance minister. The Liberal party finance minister who later became leader of the Liberal party and very briefly Prime Minister of Canada had increased expenditures 24 per cent from one year to the next. Then he stands up and asks for the resignation of the present Minister of Finance and criticizes him for having a budget increase this year of 3.1 per cent. It is on the record.

Mr. Speaker, you have just heard him criticize our finance minister for having a 3.1 per cent increase. We hear this from the people who brought us average increases of 17.9 per cent for five years, 10 per cent increases for the next five years and for the last five years of their government, annual increases in government expenditures of 14.1 per cent. Yet he has the audacity to stand up in this House and ask for the resignation of a finance minister who has been able to keep program expenditures to a rate this year of 3.1 per cent. I will leave it to Canadians to decide who is humourous and who is going to get this economy back on its feet and Canadians working again.

Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I commend the member for Calgary Southeast for his presentation today. I listened with a great deal of bemusement to his remarks.

My question deals with the fact that right up to 1984, the governing party opposite begged Canadians on their knees every election campaign to let them take over. Yet every time we talk about the economy I do not hear the members getting up and saying, well, here is how we fixed everything. What I hear is that they have a case of selective amnesia. It starts the day after the 1984 election and the only thing they can refer to is pre-1984, which is subject to a great deal of interpretation and which most Canadians are not terribly concerned about. What Canadians are concerned about is your inability to deal with the economy in a consistent and fair manner and in accordance with your words during election campaigns.

I would like to ask the hon. member exactly what type of course give in his caucus that they have such a selective memory loss, and can find nothing to explain away the problems that this country has other than to say it is somebody else's problem.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how these guys like to keep walking into this. I give them credit for leading with their jaw. They want to come here and get it right in the kisser. They say to me, selective memory, I do not think there is any Canadian who needs a selective memory to know the kind of debt these Liberals left us with.

The annual deficit has fallen from a record $38 billion in the last year of the Liberal government to $28 billion in 1990-91. In dollar terms, the deficit has been cut by one-fourth. In 1984 the deficit was 35 cents on every dollar. This has now fallen to 19 cents. We do not have to talk about anyone's memory. These are facts and anyone can see them in the public accounts and are available to the public.

This government has shown fiscal responsibility. We have had to make some tough decisions, limit some programs and cut some spending, but we are getting this country on its feet again. Is it working? I mentioned earlier a total of 1,604,000 jobs have been created since we came into office in 1984. Of those, 966,000 have been created for women. The unemployment rate has fallen from 11.6 per cent when the hon. member party's was in office to 7.7 per cent in February.

• (1820)

People are working in Canada. Canadians are productive now, and we do not have a government wasting their money and spending more than it brings in. The day of reckoning has come. This government is dealing with it, and we are solving the debt problem that the Liberals created.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker. I would love to answer more questions from my colleague, because it is kind of fun to straighten him out and to tell Canadians what a mess they left.

When these people talk about resignations of finance ministers, we just have to look at the record I talked about today both in terms of the legacy left by the Liberal party and the remarkable progress that has been made since 1984 by the current Minister of Finance. I think we should put a statue on Parliament Hill of this Minister of Finance.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Calgary Southeast about legacies that have been left.

Our finance minister has been chastised for what he, in the minds of the opposition, has been doing. I would like to ask the member for Calgary Southeast if he would care to comment on this. In the last majority Liberal government did they not, in that year of the $38 billion deficit, forecast something in the range of a $33 billion deficit and were out some $6 billion in their forecast?

In the year before that when they forecast a $28 billion deficit, in fact it was $33 billion. They were out substantially. If you go back through five finance ministers who they had in that last term of office, they were all big shooters and all out on their forecasts. Here we are as the new government and we have had only one finance minister. Each and every year, he has been within $1 billion of what he forecast. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I think you know and certainly the people in Edmonton Northwest know that what the member for Ontario has just said is absolutely true.

I want to comment on the representation made by the hon. member for Ontario, and the accuracy of forecasting of previous Liberal finance ministers who were out $6 billion a year in any of their forecasts. This government has never been out by as much as $1 billion. When the hon. member was giving those numbers, I thought he might have been giving us something else.

When talking about $38 billion deficits and the Liberal party, they did not even include the deficit in the UIC account. That is $10 billion. They kind of shoved it under the desk somewhere. "Let's not include that in the national debt and in the deficit. We have separate accounting for that one." It is only when this government came clean and said to Canadians in 1984: "We are not going to kid you about the situation in the economy. We are going to lay it all on the table."

We keep dragging these things out. Every time we open another closet, more ghosts jump out, we see more bills left over from the Liberal government. But we have it on track. We turned it around since 1987. We are now running surpluses in our program budget. It is all on the table. It is all up front for people to see. Canadians know about the economic situation in this country. They know it is not easy, but they know we have taken the tough decisions. We are taking the proper direction to get over this mountain of debt and see the future of a prosperous, economic Canada.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am in a jolly good mood after listening to all the blarney that I just heard from my hon. colleague from Calgary Southeast.

As I said earlier, I flew here today and I was a little cranky when I got here. After listening to the world according to the member for Calgary Southeast, I find that there is still some pleasure in stretching the facts and selective memory and life. It is called blarney.

I rise today to participate in this debate on the government borrowing bill, Bill C-65, in which the government is attempting to borrow untold billions of dollars to finance its misdirected economic policies. The hon. member from Calgary Southeast and his colleagues read very well from the notes given to them by the propaganda section of the Department of Finance, but as hard as they try, Canadians do not appear to be listening. If Canadians were listening and buying the drivel that is coming from the government benches opposite, I think the member's party would be a little better than 15 per cent in the polls. I should not have to tell that to the hon. member—especially one who comes from Calgary, that bastion of Torydom.

I am sure everybody realizes that it used to be a given that Alberta always would elect Conservatives, that Alberta was Tory-Tory land. Well, I can tell you that because of this government's economic agenda things have changed, even in Tory Alberta.

Did I just hear the Minister of Transport say, "Right on"? I think he did. Even in Conservative Alberta, Toryism is a bad word. It is a word that is no longer said without a few expletive deletives—which are unparliamentary and therefore I cannot put them on the record of this place. But if there are a few Conservative members here who have not heard what they are being called in that province I will gladly see them outside the Chamber and let them know just what they are—unless, of course, their delicate ears can't take it.

We have just gone through six years of a Tory agenda. It has been an agenda of deceit and mismanagement. The Conservative party came into power in 1984 after a world-wide recession. Now the hon. members on the other side do not want to admit that, but it was a world-wide economic recession. They came in at the tail end when the recovery was beginning. The framework was already in place for economic recovery, thank goodness. We did not have people starving in the streets because Liberal economic and social policies ensured that the safety nets were there to catch Canadians. To listen to some of the members opposite, they would have preferred it if those people had starved in the streets. They would have preferred it if the people who lost their jobs during the world-wide economic recession somehow managed to get their keep in the garbage dumps or begging from the affluent on Bay Street.

Well, Liberal policies were quite different. The deficit increased, but it did so because Liberal social programs worked. And, Mr. Speaker, I for one am not about to sit down and apologize to that group opposite for saving the livelihood and future of many Canadians during that period of time.

But in 1984 these guys and gals came forward and said: "We've got a better way. Elect us and life is going to be rosy. We are going to create so much wealth across this country. We are going to ensure that the Liberal social policies and programs are maintained. We are going to ensure that there is not one chicken in every pot but two."

But what we did not know in Atlantic Canada was that they might have been giving us a chicken but they were taking our fish. We know that now, Mr. Speaker. These people came to power in 1984 on a thinly veiled Liberal agenda. They tried to be Liberals. They tried to talk about social progressivism. They tried to talk about a marriage between free enterprise and management of an economy and government intervention when necessary to support the regions of this country least able to look after themselves, and people in that same circumstance.

Well, perhaps the biggest lie—and this will go down in history I am sure—that we have ever heard in a campaign was what the Conservative party handed out during the election campaign. I alluded to it earlier in a question and comment. What I said was that every time the New Democratic Party or the Liberal party put a plank forward in their campaigns, the Tory party would dismiss it.

I remember the Minister of Finance saying—and I hope your selective memory is turned off and you can hear it clearly now—that these were not promises. These were spending commitments. Well, if they were spending commitments that were made in the fall of 1988, they were written with disappearing ink. The day after these rogues got re-elected they came into the Chamber and all of a sudden the books were changed. Surely to goodness from 1984 to 1988, if they had any competency at all, they would have been able to find out where the books were.

Either they were so incompetent between 1984 and 1988 that they did not know what fiscal and economic circumstances they had at their disposal in 1988, prior to the campaign, or they did not tell Canadians the truth. I don't know which sin is worse. I will leave that for the electorate to decide at the next election.

• (1830)

The government came back saying: "We've got the money. We've got the programs". I do not know how these ladies and gentlemen opposite can sit in their seats when they know very well that the day after the election campaign, all of a sudden, the Prime Minister's polls told him he should go out and spook the Canadian public about the deficit because we convinced them during the campaign that it was not a problem. If the deficit is a problem, we had better spend some taxpayers' money to change their minds. That is exactly what they set out to do.

The non-problem deficit in November all of a sudden in December became this onerous, triple-headed monster that would devour the Canadian economy. The Tories would rally on their horse to save Canadians from that terrible fate. What did they do? They reneged and squelched on every promise and commitment. I will not call them promises, I will call them what the Minister of Finance called them. He called them spending commitments. The government squelched on its commitments.

What has the government done since being elected? Government members are in this Chamber today asking us to approve Bill C-65, the borrowing authority, which will mean that we agree with their spending priorities.

They used to talk about jobs, jobs, jobs but in actual fact it has turned into cuts, cuts, cuts. Look at what they did in regional development. It is a big shell game. They can talk their best rhetoric on the other side of the House about windows, five-year averages, seven-year averages, you can put flour and milk in and make a nice cake for the people of Atlantic Canada, the fact of life in relative terms, and I quote very loosely because I do not have exact figures in front of me.

The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has done studies which show in relative terms that the degree of disparity between central Canada, or Canada on average, and Atlantic Canada has grown. You do not have to be a mathematical wizard to sit down and look at the indicators to see that. Look at the level of unemployment vis-à-vis the percentage of national unemployment in 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987. You will find there is a growing gap between the rich and the poor in this country. The government says: "Yes, but everyone is better off than in 1982, 1983, 1984." We were in a recession then.

What I am trying to put forward to members opposite is that during the intervening years of recovery—and some have recovered much quicker than others, it has taken place world-wide—the government should have taken the opportunity, if it had a heart, to redistribute the new resources to the poorer areas of the country to try to alleviate the real triple-headed monster, regional disparity.

In effect, what the government has done is bring in one of the most regressive fiscal regimes in the history of this country. It has done this at a time when linguistic and racial tensions have increased in this country. Now it has added a new one called regional tension.

If any members doubt the passion with which I speak, they should go to a community in Atlantic Canada that has been shut down because of this government's neglect of regional economic policy. The only department that was seen to be an agency to promote a policy within the central government structure of regional development has been dismantled by Bill C-3. There will not be a department responsible to cabinet for regional development in Atlantic Canada. It will be done through agencies.

In the last 18 months, the government has allowed $1.221 billion in regional development agreements to lapse in Atlantic Canada. The more we cried in this House and the more we asked the minister responsible for ACOA to give us figures, the more he tried to get into five-year or seven-year averages. The buck stops at the desk of those individuals in Atlantic Canada who feel the bite of this government's economic policies. The fact is, of $1.221 billion in economic development agreements, this government has only put up $274 million to renew them. You do not have to know how to add and subtract very well to know that is $1 billion short.

The Deputy Prime Minister said on a number of occasions that he was so committed to a national passenger rail transportation system in this country that his government was going to do it right. They were going to modernize and update the system so that we would have a modern, efficient national transportation system. The now Minister of Transport gets up and says: "We had to kill it to save it". That is basically what he said. He said: "The corpse looks fine. We have saved the corpse. It looks wonderful". But they killed the dream of a national rail transportation system from coast to coast.

The new Minister of Transport is laughing. Well, Mr. Minister, if you could go to Nova Scotia and see what people think about your economic and transportation policies, on Cape Breton Island and all through mainland Nova Scotia where you have cut the train, maybe you would be smiling somewhere else right now. You would not be smiling in this Chamber, because you have lost the faith of the people in those respects. Not just here, but in northern Ontario and western Canada as well.

We have also seen a government that talked about how concerned it was about social programs. These are the masters of doublespeak. These are the great pretenders on the national stage.

They came in with a bill that in effect attacked our seniors' pensions. In that bill they did not say "claw back" because they do not like to call a thing for what it is. We said: "You are going to claw back those seniors' pensions". They said: "No, no, we are not".

There is a thing called Consumer Price Index, minus 3. It means that as inflation goes up, it is not fully indexed to inflation. The seniors now know, six months after that is passed, exactly what it is going to mean to them now, in 10, 15, and 20 years time.

They were so concerned about redistributing wealth in this country that they cut Established Programs Financing, EPF, a fundamental tenet of economic policy in this country, whereby this country thought it was fair, just and necessary to keep this country together, to ensure that there were programs of national standards in health and in post-secondary education.

In Nova Scotia in the next few years, according to the government's own documents, we are going to lose $80 million. That is in a province of less than a million people. I do not know if they think the salt air grows loonies on trees down there or what. But I can tell you right now that because of this government's cut-backs and the transferring of economic responsibility for its deficit, they have now caused the budget surpluses of the provinces of Nova Scotia and P.E.I. to be turned into budget deficits. In turn that has been passed on to the poorest municipalities in this country, the municipalities in Atlantic Canada.

On equalization, I am told that in January an official from the office of the Minister of Finance met with officials of the Ministers of Finance of Atlantic Canada. He said: "There is going to be a minor modification to equalization. Do not worry about it". When the Minister of Finance of P.E.I. was preparing his final budget document before he presented it to the public in Prince Edward Island, they called from the office of the Minister of Finance and said: "That little adjustment is maybe going to be a little bigger. Instead of being $600,000, it is going to $13.5 million".

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Thirteen and a half million dollars to a province of about 140,000 people. That is not chicken feed. Those are real dollars for real programs that are necessary.

We had a debate in this House last week about the at and east program. They certainly did not mind coming after Atlantic Canadians on the at and east program. They had basically earmarked every program of support and equalization in this country for the garbage bin. That is what they have done because they are playing the politics of the centre. The politics of the centre says: "When you do the numbers folks, if we only have x number of dollars to spend, we are going to spend them in central Canada". That is what it says.

The minister rolls his eyes. How else can you say it? You have cut billions of dollars from regional development. In the regions of this country you have severed the national rail transportation system and at the same time you support the policies of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and those very policies of the Governor of the Bank of Canada do what? They are supposed to be there to slow down growth in the golden belt in southern Ontario. Who has to pay the piper? Just businesses in southern Ontario? Just consumers in southern Ontario? No. This government is putting people in my riding out of business because it is supporting or telling the Governor of the Bank of Canada what the interest rate policy should be.

If anybody ever doubts that the Governor of the Bank of Canada knows what it is like to suffer, then they should have seen him on television the other night when he was chased by reporters. After coming from a committee hearing and being asked: "Do you think you should speak to average Canadians?" "Oh", he said, "I think the members of the committee are the people who are supposed to speak to average Canadians."

I can understand how the Governor of the Bank of Canada could say that. There are not too many people, average or otherwise in this country, who make the salary that that man makes and would have the gall and the audacity to take a 29 per cent increase at the same time that he is manipulating the economic lever of interest rates to their highest level in years and telling Canadians to tighten their belts. "Do with less. Those of us who got more, boys, we are rolling in the dough". That is exactly what he did.

We have seen this government increase taxes 33 times since 1984. I do not know how government members can get up and look at themselves in the mirror in the morning. Go and talk to somebody who is on a fixed income and living below the poverty line. These people still pay income tax because our tax system still needs major reform. If you ask those individuals who are on pensions or on an annuity: "Are you better off today than last year or the year before?", they will tell you that they are not.

This government has a regressive taxation policy. There are no loopholes for the average Canadians. There are no loopholes for the seniors in my riding who are trying to live on poverty wages. There are no loopholes. There certainly is for the upper income levels. The government has shut down women's centres right across this country. It even went after the veterans.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, I am a proud member of the Royal Canadian Legion. I was at the Royal Canadian Legion in Dartmouth, the Centennial Branch, and I was flipping eggs on Sunday, because I try to do my bit to make sure that those good service organizations like the Royal Canadian Legion have enough money coming in so they can sustain themselves.

This government has broken the trust that was placed in it by many Royal Canadian Legion members when it decided to change some of the Veterans Affairs programs. If the government members think that they are going to still join in the camaraderie that is legendary in Legions across this country, they have not visited since this last budget came down.

With regard to the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C–21, that members opposite are apoplectic about because the Senate of Canada is holding it up at this point, people in Nova Scotia are trying to tell the government to change things. The Senate of Canada, God forbid in this day and age, has more support right now as an unelected body than the government opposite. The Senate knows that the government's economic policies are leading to economic and regional tensions that we simply do not need.

One of the aspects that I want to talk about concerning the UIC bill is how this government comes in and talks about how it is trying to make the system more fair. I spent Saturday in the communities of east Preston and north Preston. These communities are the largest indigenous black communities in Canada. They have been there for many hundreds of years. The economic problems that they find themselves with are problems that could be addressed easily by a government that had the wherewithal, the courage and the political will power to deal with them.

I am speaking directly to the members opposite. There is a major problem in that community. It is six miles from the largest metropolitan area in Atlantic Canada. There are over 5,000 souls who live there. It is the largest indigenous black community in Canada. They have suffered for far too long from a lack of attention by successive governments of whatever political stripe. We are now in a situation where this community is crying out for assistance. If I have a 7 per cent unemployment rate in the city of Dartmouth, they are suffering a 30 per cent unemployment rate. There is systemic racism, a thing we never like to speak about either in this Chamber or elsewhere. There is systemic racism at work. There are young blacks in that community who see themselves with no future and have asked repeatedly for the federal and provincial governments to sit down, take some of the billions of dollars we are talking about today, and direct it into the community. They are ruining lives out there. This government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia are ruining the futures of many of those individuals because they have the economic and policy tools to make a real difference.

I have been dealing with the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Hopefully, we are making slow progress. I have met on at least one occasion and have spoken to the minister of employment twice in the House about putting some flexibility into the programs. As yet, the flexibility is not there.

Today in The Daily News, one of the largest distribution newspapers in the metropolitan Halifax—Dartmouth area, there was an article on the front page with a big headline. One of the councillors, Mr. Wayne Adams, who is a member of that community, said that if governments do not act soon and use the resources that are theirs to give the community the tools it needs to get out of this collaring which has taken place for two centuries in that community, there will be major problem and perhaps civil disobedience.

I call on the members here when we are dealing with all these government expenditures to put a little heart in their deliberations on the other side and to put a little pressure on members of their cabinet so that when we talk about those who need it the most, not just regionally but in the sense of some minority groups across this country, they do not all suffer equally under the knife of fiscal restraint. If everybody suffers equally under the knife of fiscal restraint some bleed a lot more than others, and they are members of minority groups across this country and people that live in the poorest regions.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to make a few comments on Bill C-65 to provide borrowing authority. Here is how I would my express views. It is quite obvious this time around that if the government needs to borrow $25.5 billion to meet its cash requirements it is due to the fact that the problem is not recent and dates back to a number of years. Lets us go back to the early 70s when the government could operate with a $300 million budget surplus and a national debt of $17.2 or $17.3 billion. It was at that time that the expenditures of the Canadian government began to rise dramatically. Expenditures went up by something like 17.9 per cent. For the second term they increased by 10.1 per cent because the government had decided to cut back on its own outlays. Over the third term, from 1980 to 1984, the annual increases averaged 14.1 per cent. Needless to say all these higher expenditures put a lot of pressure on the government's cash requirements.

In 1984, when the Liberal government was defeated, we took office looking at a financial statement showing an annual deficit of $38.3 billion and a national debt of about $200 billion. We finally took over as a government with a plan of action and a definite goal. The government had put its cards on the table and was quite prepared to begin the task of reducing the deficit and the national debt.

With the kind of financial pressure I have just described, it is quite clear that we need a few years to set our financial house in order and get back on the right track.

Mr. Hogue: Stagnation it was!

Mr. Couture: Economic stagnation indeed.

In 1984 the government took very positive measures designed to balance the Canadian budget. By that I mean the government set its sights on bolstering the country's economy and worked relentlessly to create new jobs so that Canadians would be able to lead a decent life. It was a complete turn around as compared with the situation that had prevailed during the 14 preceding years.

• (1850)

Considering that we went from a $300 million budget surplus in 1970 to a $38.3 billion annual operating deficit in 1984, I must say that one has to be really unable to manage the financial affairs of the nation to post such a pitiful performance. Today's borrowing authority is the result of that performance. The government needs to borrow $25.5 billion, a figure which is altogether justified in light of everyting I have just said.

The first thing the government had to do between 1984 and 1988 was to reduce the annual rise in expenditures. The figures bear repeating because they are quite simply mind-blowing: 17.9 per cent in the first term—this is an annual average, of course—10.1 per cent in the second, and 14.1 in the third. When the new Conservative government took over in 1984—and I can say this with a clear conscience, Mr. Speaker, because I was a Canadian citizen at the time, not a Member of Parliament—it had a very precise and soundly structured plan of action with clearly defined objectives. Sure enough, we saw the government implement this plan of action right from the beginning. From 1984 to 1988 the increase in annual expenditures dropped to 3.6 per cent and the annual operating deficit declined from $38.3 to $28.1 billion. That in itself was quite an achievement. During that same period we created over 1.5 million new jobs for the benefit and to the satisfaction of Canadians.

But the government did not choose to sit on its laurels and kept on steering the same course, following the same policies and setting the same objectives. In 1988 it chose to stay the course by limiting spending increases to 3.2 per cent over the next four years.

A while ago I heard my hon. colleague from Calgary Southeast (Mr. Richardson) say that, since 1984, expenditures in Canada have risen by an average of 3.5 per cent a year, which is the exact figure.

Our economic performance is worth mentioning. We created a lot of jobs and restored the faith of many Canadians in their economy.

Mr. Hogue: Yes!

Mr. Couture: Canadians who, through their entrepreneurial spirit—

Mr. Hogue: Thanks to the Minister!

Mr. Couture: —and their leadership, played an active role in the economy by creating new jobs and improving the general situation in this country. I think Bill C-65 now before the House is quite justified in light of the economic performance between 1970 and 1984. Since 1984, spending has actually been cut, as demonstrated by the figures I just mentioned. Naturally, this kind of commitment requires cut-backs. Obviously, the government must limit its spending, ensure an acceptable standard of living for Canadians, assist in the development of certain sectors, but it must also make budget cuts. I believe this government has done a great job.

A while ago I heard people talk about budget cuts to VIA Rail.

Of course, when no one in a country or region takes the train any more, I wonder why we must maintain rail service for those regions. If there is no one on board, if no one needs the train to travel, I think that it must be cut. Our government has understood that very well, unlike the Liberal government which for over 14 years understood absolutely nothing and left us a very difficult situation that it will take several more years to correct. We are now definitely on the right track. The deficit has dropped from about $38.3 billion in 1984 to $28.1 billion. In 1994, the deficit will probably be less than $10 billion. That is what the people opposite do not understand.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Interest rates are now at 15 per cent.

Mr. Couture: Naturally, we cannot confuse interest rates with all that. We are talking about borrowing authority and treasury requirements—that is what we should be talking about, but we can talk about interest rates for 30 seconds.

Mr. Hogue: We understand.

Mr. Couture: Interest rates—Naturally, our monetary policy is designed to get Canadians through economic situations with the government in control. We remember very well that the Liberal government did in 1979, 1980 and 1981 when it lost control of demand pressures.

Mr. Hogue: Deplorable!

Mr. Couture: Interest rates were 22, 23, 24 per cent—

Mr. Hogue: Unacceptalbe!

Mr. Couture: —which our government and our Minister of Finance absolutely do not want to see happen again. As long as there will be inflationist pressures in the country, I think it is perfectly appropriate to use the monetary policy to alleviate those pressures for the benefit of all Canadians in years to come, because we do not we want 24 per cent interest rates anymore. You have allowed that, but we are not going to allow it. We are going to manage this country in such a way that, by 1994, we will have met our goals.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this delineates precisely Bill C-65, an Act to provide the government with the borrowing authority it needs to replenish its cash flow. I guess the members opposite also know well where this requirement comes from. It is not new, it goes back a number of years and results for a large part from the very poor economic performance of the former government which, of course, forces us today to take the necessary steps to put the government and indeed Canada in its proper place.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Saint-Jean on his excellent speech, particularly when he reminded us of what the opposition did when it was in power. The hon. member would probably like to tell us about the disastrous effects that the 22, 23 and 24 per cent interest rates under a Liberal government had on his riding of Saint-Jean. Could he give us a few examples of what happened in his constituency when the interest rate was 22 per cent and investments dried up?

Mr. Couture: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. In 1982–83, interest rates in the country were going unchecked. The then Minister of Finance did not attempt to use the monetary policy to control inflation and prevent interest rates from reaching 24 per cent. Obviously, when interest rates fluctuate between 20 and 24 per cent, the vast majority of businesses experience major difficulties. In our riding, like everywhere else in Canada, some had to close up shop because they could not meet their expenses.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1900)

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL TRADE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to draw the government's attention to the situation in the textile and clothing industry.

On May 24 last year, almost a year ago, I asked the Minister for International trade about fraud charges laid by Canada Customs against Canadian textile importers concerning merchandise manufactured in Korea, shipped to front companies in Japan and transhipped to Canada as merchandise of Japanese origin, thus violating bilateral agreements and section 17 of the Export and Import Permits Act.

Since Canada's major textile companies happen to be in my riding and I am a former textile worker, I am of course very much concerned about the industry.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may recall that the textile industry and its principal customer, the clothing industry, have close ties. The latter industry buys nearly 40 per cent of textile production, which represents as much as half of its production costs.

Like Canada, the riding of Drummond has a great deal at stake in the textile and free trade talks.

More than 3,000 jobs in the riding of Drummond depend on the textile and clothing industries, which is some indication of the very important role still played by these industries in our region's economy.

The main companies are Celanese, Dominion Textile, Consoltex, Textiles Monterey, Textiles Dionne, Teinturerie Elite, Drummond Hosiery and a number of others.

Mr. Speaker, to give some idea of the importance of a company like Dominion Textile in the Drummondville area, this company generates a wage bill of $20 million annually, pays $400,000 in taxes to the town of Drummondville and contributes over $50,000 to various social activities. It employs 700 people.

Swift Textiles Canada, a division of Dominion Textile Inc., because of its denim manufacturing facilities has one of the most modern plants in the world. The streamlining of these facilities over the past year, will have required over $30 million in investments and this, without any subsidy.

In the Province of Quebec, Dominion Textile provides jobs to 5,300 people in its Sherbrooke, Magog, Valleyfield, Grandby, Trois-Rivières and Drummondville plants.

Many wonder at the size and scope of Canada's textile and clothing industry. The textile industry, which consists of 1,070 plants, has 63,800 employees, 43 per cent of them women. The plants are mostly concentrated in Quebec and Ontario, these two provinces providing respectively 52 per cent and 41 per cent of all the jobs. The remaining jobs can be found mostly in the Atlantic Provinces.

This industry has a total annual sales figure of $5.8 billion. Exports account for approximately 11 per cent of that amount, some $660 million. On the other hand, imports represent nearly one-third of the domestic market.

Ever since the early 1970s, Mr. Speaker, the textile industry has maintained its share of the domestic market at a fairly constant level, which is 70 per cent. Imports come mostly from other industrialized nations, especially the United States. Since 1980, however, countries where production costs are very low are exerting increasing pressure on industrialized nations; they account now for one-fourth of all imports.

As to the clothing industry, it is made up of manufacturing plants which supply clothes to consumers and other industries. Some 99 per cent Canadian-owned, the 2,500 plants which provide jobs to approximately 113,000 workers are mostly located in major urban centres in Quebec (60 per cent of jobs), Ontario (30 per cent), and Manitoba (6 per cent). Moreover, nearly 75 per cent of the jobs are held by women who represent the majority of the nearly 30,000 industry workers who are working at home.

The industry sales figure has been estimated at $5.7 billion a year, including $4 million in exports. Imports, on the other hand, represent approximately 2.1 billion a year.

In recent years, thanks to the help of the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, industry leaders made a concerted effort to boost their competitiveness by applying new technologies to the various production stages such as computer-assisted design and manufacturing. So far these efforts alone have not made it possible to offset the cost advantage enjoyed by exporters from low-wage countries.

The stakes are high, Mr. Speaker: more than half the jobs in the Canadian textile and garment industry are in Quebec where 55 of the 75 ridings depend on that industry.

Canada's textile industry is modern, capital intensive and well managed, yet it is small when compared to that of the United States where close to 50 per cent of all our textile imports come from. In less than eight years they will come in duty-free. True, Canadian manufacturers will have gained access to the American market, but this will call for huge investments in Canada and great marketing expertise.

The Free Trade Agreement with the United States has to be a major adjustment challenge for Canadian producers.

The government intends to reduce Canadian duty on textiles to levels close or identical to that of the US.

The outcome of the Uruguay round of negotiations concerning lower tariffs will not be made public before year's end.

Finally we are not at all sure that the signatories to the multifibre agreement will agree to put the textile and garment trade back under standard GATT regulations.

Canadian textile producers will face a challenge if ever the multifibre agreement falls apart.

In Europe for example, according to Le Figaro of October 27, 1989, there is some talk of returning world textile and garment trade under stricter GATT regulations concerning such things as export subsidies, dumping practices, or trade mark and design piracy.

The article also refers to the fact that new cases of unfair practices are uncovered daily.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the current Geneva negotiations, I should like to hear from the minister what is the government position concerning stricter GATT regulations, and does the government intend to harmonize these discussions with the position of the European Economic Community?

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Drummond both here this evening and in the House on May 24 last last year regarding the investigation by officials of Revenue Canada and External Affairs into the trans-shipment of Korean polyester filament fabric through Japan.

As the hon. member knows, seven companies in Montreal and two in Toronto were charged under Section 17 of the Export and Import Permits Act. That section deals with furnishing false or misleading information to obtain an import permit. These cases are currently before the courts so I am unable to comment on the specifics of those cases.

These companies were charged based on evidence seized during raids on the offices of a number of textile importing companies in March of last year. The Special Trade Relations Bureau of External Affairs and International Trade Canada has been investigating the alleged circumvention of the Canada-Korea textile restraint agreement for the past two years. It was alleged that the Korean mills had been shipping finished polyester fabric to shell companies in Japan. These companies would then ship the fabrics to Canada with documentation stating that the goods were of Japanese origin. Documents seized in the raid confirmed these allegations and enough evidence was gathered to lay charges.

Since the laying of charges last year, we have imposed additional documentation requirements in support of applications for import permits for a range of man-made fabrics sourced from a number of countries, including Japan. These applications must now be accompanied by a certificate of origin issued by a competent authority in the exporting country or a mill certificate endorsed by the manufacturing mill.

Departmental officials met with Japanese officials last June in order to tighten up the certification of origin system to prevent further occurrences of such trans-shipments.

There have also been two rounds of consultation with Korean officials in order to negotiate compensation for the circumvention of our bilateral agreement. It appears that the Koreans are prepared to provide some compensation in terms of future quota. We are currently preparing further information and a third and hopeful final round of consultation is anticipated later this year. It appears the Koreans are anticipating the results of these consultations as they are yet to fully allocate the 1990 polyester fabric quota to their exporters.

We consider this to be a serious breach of our bilateral restraint with Korea and we intend to seek full compensation. Officials continue to monitor imports of textiles and clothing from all sources and action is taken quickly if trans-shipment or circumvention is suspected.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to return to the subject of the goods and services tax. I want to remind the government again how harmful this tax will be to northerners.

On February 19, I asked the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons to exempt northerners from this unfair tax. My question to the minister dealt with the high cost of living in the north, and I cited as examples the cost of some basic groceries in Clyde River, a community on Baffin Island in my constituency.

I had just returned from a visit to that community, and while I was there I had made a point of going to the grocery store. I paid $5 for one dozen eggs, over $9 for a 5-pound bag of potatoes, $4.29 for a litre of milk, and over $8 for a dozen apples.

In southern Canada prices for these same items are one-half to one-third lower, yet my constituents have to pay shockingly high prices for the same basic foods every day. Many have to pay these prices on an average income of about $10,000 a year.

Unemployment rates in the Northwest Territories are high. The over-all unemployment rate of the Northwest Territories is about 16 per cent. The rates in the regions which comprise my constituency are however much higher. In the Baffin and Kewatin regions, the unemployment rate is about 21 per cent. In the Kitikmeot, the rate is 31 per cent. In several communities, the rates are close to 80 per cent. Many people are therefore living on fixed incomes: unemployment insurance, social assistance and pensions.

The point I was making to the minister was that many of my constituents are hard-pressed to make ends meet now. When someone on a fixed income has to pay $4.29 for a litre of milk and more than $9 for a 5-pound bag of potatoes, that individual has not much disposable income left once the groceries are bought. Even though basic groceries will not be subject to the goods and services tax, almost everything else my constituents need will be subject to the new tax.

The minister says there will be no GST applied to the transportation of food. That is all very well and good, but the goods and services tax will be charged on virtually every other good transported to the north. I do not think the minister has grasped the fact that there are no roads to the communities or between the communities in my constituency. The government also does not seem to understand that the communities I represent do not have large shopping plazas or even the variety of stores that southern Canada does.

In the small settlements, residents order food and other necessities from stores in southern Canada. Fuel, clothing, and construction materials have to be flown in during the winter months or barged in on the sea-lift in the summer. These items are not cheap; nor are the freight rates to ship these goods up to the north. Air freight from Ottawa to Iqaluit, for example, is close to $3 a kilogram for goods between 45 and 200 kilograms.

Fuel, clothing, and construction materials will be subject to the goods and services tax. The transportation of these basic goods will also be subject to the goods and services tax. With the kind of cost increases these goods will bear, people will have to cut back on their purchases. Either people will cut back on the groceries they buy in order to buy other goods such as clothing, or they will cut back on other goods in order to buy the groceries they need.

Last October, I asked the Minister of Finance for the studies he said he had that showed the north would be better off with the goods and services tax. He did not produce them last October and to date he has not produced them. The Minister of Finance is virtually the only person who thinks that this tax will benefit northern Canada.

The minister said in the House in February in reply to my question that the GST is very positive for the industries of the north. The Government of the Northwest Territories does not share his optimism.

I would like to quote from brief of the Government of the Northwest Territories to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance last October: "The goods and services tax has the potential to seriously harm our important industries. In so doing, the tax would hamper our efforts to build greater economic self-sufficiency in the Northwest Territories. The long-term benefits to production in the Northwest Territories predicted the federal finance department are very doubtful and, even if positive, will be relatively small. Any such benefits are unlikely to be large enough to offset the short-term costs of the new tax. We expect that any gains from increased output will be enjoyed mainly by owners of large businesses or by temporary employees from the south. Long-term residents of the Northwest Territories, particularly small business owners and those participating in the traditional economy, are unlikely to share those benefits".

Service industry products such as tourism or trade, are more expensive in the north, and higher costs will affect competitiveness. The tourism industry is an especially important and growing industry in the Northwest Territories. It stands to be substantially hurt by the goods and services tax.

Small businesses are facing enormous GST compliance and administration costs. These businesses do not now have any sales taxes to administer, and accounting services are not available in small communities.

In summary, I can only repeat what I have said on several other occasions in this House concerning the goods and services tax proposal. The GST is unfair. It is unfair to all Canadians, but it will place a particularly heavy burden on northerners.

Whether the tax is 9 per cent or 7 per cent, northerners cannot afford this additional imposition. The proposed sales tax credit will not offset the increased costs for low income residents in the north. The government has not considered the unique northern economy, nor has it considered northern consumers in its GST design.

I urge the government again to reconsider. Scrap the GST.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is concerned about the high cost of living in the North and the impact of the goods and services tax, the GST.

First, let me reiterate that the North, like all other regions of Canada, will benefit from the introduction of the GST. By removing federal sales tax from business inputs, the GST will have a very positive effect on capital-intensive, resource-based industries such as mining and oil and gas. These industries are important to the economy of the North and the member's region.

Overall, our analysis indicates that national economic output will expand by 1.4 per cent, or about $9 billion. The North will share in these gains; its economic output is expected to grow by about the national average, 1.4 per cent. This expansion in economic activity will benefit all Northerners by creating permanent jobs and, of course, raising real incomes.

The hon. member expressed concern about the cost of food in the North. The government recognizes the level of prices of such commodities in the North; that is why the income tax system provides benefits to residents in northern areas.

With respect to sales tax, it must be realized that under the existing federal sales tax, groceries bear some indirect sales tax imbedded in the price of the product from the beginning of the production chain. This occurs because many of the inputs used to produce food, like building materials used in processing plants, for example, are taxed. As well, the vehicles transporting the groceries to the North, loading equipment and motive fuels all currently bear federal sales tax.

In total, groceries currently bear about 1 to 2 per cent federal sales tax indirectly.

Under the GST, the sale of basic groceries will not be taxed. And, in contrast to the existing federal sales tax, the input tax credit mechanism under the GST ensures that all the indirect tax now imbedded in the price of groceries will be removed. As a result, the cost of basic groceries will be reduced by 1 or 2 per cent under the GST.

To ensure that sales tax reform is fair, a key element is the refundable GST credit paid to low-and modest-income Canadians. Credit cheques will be mailed four times a year, and the first cheques will be sent in December 1990, before the GST takes effect.

Indeed, the refundable GST credit will ensure that families earning less than $30,000 a year will actually be better off in 1991 than they are under the present system.

In summary, the GST will provide important benefits to residents of Northern Canada by improving potential economic output, creating jobs and raising income levels.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I asked my question of the minister on March 9. At the time, I was asking about trying to keep people of the area in their communities during the downturn until the aid package came.

As a supplementary question, I mentioned to the minister that we needed a new reassessment of the stocks in the Scotia—Fundy before any further steps were taken. I cannot emphasize enough that the fishermen in southwestern Nova Scotia are not convinced that the department's current stock estimates are accurate. Just ask the 50 or 60 fishermen who occupied the Department of Fisheries office in Yarmouth last Tuesday in protest of the lack of quota for inshore draggers so far this year; ask the 500 or so people who turned out today to talk about the proposal that was given to them late on Friday in answer to their proposal. They are not happy with the assessment.

I should add that the fishermen are not alone in their suspicions about stock assessment in the Scotia—Fundy. Mr. Leslie Harris, Chairman of the government's independent review of the northern cod stock told me in committee that he also thought that the methods currently being used in the Scotia—Fundy were not good enough for such an important fishery.

I would like to tell the House and the people across Canada about the 500 people who were there this afternoon and what they were looking for. They were looking for their fair share of the natural resource outside their area.

Their history has been of year-round fishing. They have had lobster, herring, scallop and groundfish in the past. They had access to markets. In a county like Shelburne County, according to the report I had done for me, fish represents 100 per cent of the economy of Shelburne County. It represents 50 per cent of the economy of Yarmouth County and 60 per cent of the economy Digby County. Those counties have had access to those markets, have had access to the fishery for as far back as there have been settlements in those areas. At one time we had the healthiest fishery in Atlantic Canada. We don't today.

Over the last six years in this fishery, their quotes have decreased on rather bad stock evaluations. No one will say that there is not haddock. There was not haddock in the 1970s. They have seen a freezer factor ship given a licence to take pollock, which was the old stand-by fish in that area, a freezer factory ship that should be going for the underutilized species.

They have also seen what happened in the off-shore within that area. They have seen foreigners. Today, one fishermen, Joey Nickerson, said in that meeting that he had gone out for silver hake. He has a 45 foot boat. He was beside these foreigners fishing for silver hake. I think he said the foreigners had 180 per cent pollock. It was not silver hake they were fishing on Brown's.

Brown's was closed to all the local boats in that area, but he could go to Brown's if he fished silver hake. That is a 45 foot boat along side these huge foreign freezer factory ships and big trawlers fishing about 60 miles from shore.

It does not make sense to the people. It does not make sense to me. It should not make sense to the opposition. It should not make sense to the minister. What are his departmental officials telling him? Who are his departmental officials allowing to get to him? The big foreigners, the off-shore? Certainly not the inshore fishermen who have been looking for a meeting with the minister or with any other ministers concerned with the groundfish.

Along with this they have been kept from going to what we call the Easter which is above Halifax. There are people who have fished there all their lives, eight years or longer, and they are not allowed to go at this time of the year into that area.

The other day I brought up in the House that there was a silver hake box with 42 foreigners fishing there when our fishermen cannot even go there. It is right next to the closed spawning area. The same dividing line that goes with the silver hake box for the foreigners is a dividing line for the spawning pollock. The foreigners are allowed to go there and fish at this time of year, but not our own boats.

The other thing that they have been faced with over the last six years is no clear stock evaluation. I have referred to the fact that Mr. Harris has said that before.

About 10 days ago they put in a proposal to the department. After at least five years, if not longer, of talking about a mesh size with the departmental officials at least five times a year, they have come to the agreement that they should have 130-square mesh. The department sends back 140-square mesh. There is never an agreement between the departmental officials and these fishermen. There is frustration. There is going to be some hard feelings. I am sure the minister would not like to see happen the threats that were being talked about today just because his officials are not playing fair with the people.

They are asking for 25,000 pounds a trip, each week, for 40 weeks. There are approximately 250 boats that we are talking about and there are 112 licensed foreigners out there fishing within our 200-mile limit. There is also a freezer factory ship fishing within our waters, close to our coastal waters, and now the offshore.

I plead with this House that what is happening to the three counties I have mentioned should not be happening anywhere in Canada. This government is strictly looking to please an offshore that was bailed out again. The National Sea Products and the Fishery Products were bailed out again last week by being able to close those communities. Not that they left the boats; they still get the plants, but the government pays out $150 million.

We do not want that to happen in that area. We want fish. We want an evaluation of the stocks, and we want fair share of the natural resource that is at their doorstep.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties with answering these questions is that from the time that question is asked there is an add-on and we get into an area that does not cover the actual reply.

The hon. member has asked about the government's plan for addressing the problem of the Atlantic fishing industry, particularly the assistance that will be provided to communities in the Scotia-Fundy region.

The $584 million Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program recently announced has three major elements: rebuilding the fish stocks, assistance to adjust to the current reality of lessening employment in the fishery, and economic diversification both within and outside the fishing sector. All these elements will contribute to stabilizing and generating employment opportunities in fishing communities affected by the TAC reductions.

By placing additional resources of $150 million into the needed scientific research, data and information collection, monitoring, and enforcement, we are taking the long-term measures necessary to rebuild stocks so that employment from the fishing sector can be optimized.

Changes to the Fisheries Act will be introduced shortly. They will also enhance protection of fish stocks by strengthening statistical reporting requirements and increasing penalties for fishing and habitat offences.

As exemplified by the recent meeting with Mr. Marin of the European Economic Community, intensive diplomatic and legal initiatives are under way to address the problem of foreign overfishing outside Canada's 200-mile limit.

I am confident that all these measures, taken together, will rebuild our fish stocks so that they can once again support a viable, thriving industry.

The government and all Atlantic Canadians must face the difficult reality that the fishery cannot support all who seek employment in this area. That is why $120 million of federal contribution to the Plant Workers Adjustment Program is so important. This initiative to help plant workers and trawlermen who lose their jobs will be developed in full consultation with the provinces, the companies, and the unions. It will offer affected workers the financial means to make choices about their future.

• (1930)

The $146 million funding for economic diversification, which will augment the over $2 billion the federal government will spend on regional development in Atlantic Canada by 1993-94, has been provided to give fisheries dependent communities the leverage needed to diversify within and outside the fishery. Communities will be encouraged to look at such new opportunities as under-utilized species, aquaculture and new fish product development, while outside the fishery, development in tourism, ocean industries and other sectors will be considered.

Communities will be empowered to make their own decisions to create lasting employment. When you take into account these elements and the $158 million previously announced for short term assistance and addi tional fisheries enforcement capacity, I think it is clear that the government is committed to the workers of the Atlantic fishery.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.31 p.m.
